Article 87 of the 1982 Convention (developing article 2 of the 1958 Geneva Convention on the High Seas) provides that the high seas are open to all states and that the freedom of the high seas is exercised under the conditions laid down in the Convention and by other rules of international law. It includes inter alia the freedoms of navigation, overflight, the laying of submarine cables and pipelines,[292] the construction of artificial islands and other installations permitted under international law,[293] fishing, and the conduct of scientific research.[294] Such freedoms are to be exercised with due regard for the interests of other states in their exercise of the [289] See e.g. Brown, International Law of the Sea, vol. I, chapter 14; O'Connell, International Law of the Sea, vol. II, chapter 21, and Churchill and Lowe, Law of the Sea, chapter 11. See also Oppenheim's International Law, pp. 710 ff. and Nguyen Quoc Dinh et al., Droit International Public, p. 1194.

[290] See article 2 of the 1958 High Seas Convention and article 89 of the 1982 Convention.

[291] ICJ Reports, 1951, p. 116; 18 ILR, p. 86. See above, p. 559.

[292] Subject to Part VI of the Convention, dealing with the continental shelf.

[293] Subject to Part VI of the Convention, dealing with the continental shelf.

[294] Subject to Part VI of the Convention, dealing with the continental shelf, and Part XIII, dealing with marine scientific research.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

freedom of the high seas, and also with due regard for the rights under the Convention regarding activities in the International Seabed Area.[295]

Australia and New Zealand alleged before the ICJ, in the Nuclear Tests case,[296] that French nuclear testing in the Pacific infringed the principle of the freedom of the seas, but this point was not decided by the Court. The 1963 Nuclear Test Ban Treaty prohibited the testing of nuclear weapons on the high seas as well as on land, but France was not a party to the treaty, and it appears not to constitute a customary rule binding all states, irrespective of the treaty.[297] Nevertheless, article 88 of the 1982 Convention provides that the high seas shall be reserved for peaceful purposes.

Principles that are generally acknowledged to come within article 2 include the freedom to conduct naval exercises on the high seas and the freedom to carry out research studies.

The freedom of navigation[298] is a traditional and well-recognised facet of the doctrine of the high seas, as is the freedom of fishing.[299] This was reinforced by the declaration by the Court in the Fisheries Jurisdiction cases[300] that Iceland's unilateral extension of its fishing zones from 12 to 50 miles constituted a violation of article 2 of the High Seas Convention, which is, as the preamble states, 'generally declaratory of established principles of international law'. The freedom of the high seas applies not only to coastal states but also to states that are landlocked.[301]

The question of freedom of navigation on the high seas in times of armed conflict was raised during the Iran–Iraq war, which during its

[295] See below, p. 628.

[296] ICJ Reports, 1974, pp. 253 and 457; 57 ILR, pp. 350, 605. See also the Order of the International Court of Justice of 22 September 1995 in the Request for an Examination of the Situation in Accordance with Paragraph 63 of the Court's Judgment of 20 December 1974 in the Nuclear Tests (New Zealand v. France) case, ICJ Reports, 1995, p. 288, where the Court refused to accede to a request by New Zealand to re-examine the 1974 judgment in view of the resumption by France of underground nuclear testing in the South Pacific.

[297] Note, however, the development of regional agreements prohibiting nuclear weapons: see the Treaty of Tlatelolco for the Prohibition of Nuclear Weapons in Latin America, 1967, which extends the nuclear weapons ban to the territorial sea, airspace and any other space over which a state party exercises sovereignty in accordance with its own legislation; the Treaty of Rarotonga establishing a South Pacific Nuclear-Free Zone, 1985; the African Nuclear Weapon-Free Treaty, 1996 and the Treaty on the Southeast Asia Nuclear Weapon-Free Zone, 1995.

[298] See the Corfu Channel case, ICJ Reports, 1949, pp. 4, 22; 16 AD, p. 155, and Nicaragua v. United States, ICJ Reports, 1986, pp. 14, 111–12; 76 ILR, pp. 349, 445.

[299] See the Anglo-Norwegian Fisheries case, ICJ Reports, 1951, pp. 116, 183; 18 ILR, pp. 86, 131. See also below, p. 623.

[300] ICJ Reports, 1974, p. 3.

[301] See above, p. 607.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

latter stages involved attacks upon civilian shipping by both belligerents. Rather than rely on the classical and somewhat out-of-date rules of the laws of war at sea,[302] the UK in particular analysed the issue in terms of the UN Charter. The following statement was made:[303]

> The UK upholds the principle of freedom of navigation on the high seas and condemns all violations of the law of armed conflicts including attacks on merchant shipping. Under article 51 of the UN Charter, a state actively engaged in armed conflict (as in the case of Iran and Iraq) is entitled in exercise of its inherent right of self-defence to stop and search a foreign merchant ship on the high seas if there is reasonable ground for suspecting that the ship is taking arms to the other side for use in the conflict. This is an exceptional right: if the suspicion proves to be unfounded and if the ship has not committed acts calculated to give rise to suspicion, then the ship's owners have a good claim for compensation for loss caused by the delay. This right would not, however, extend to the imposition of a maritime blockade or other forms of economic warfare.

Jurisdiction on the high seas[304]

The foundation of the maintenance of order on the high seas has rested upon the concept of the nationality of the ship, and the consequent jurisdiction of the flag state over the ship. It is, basically, the flag state that will enforce the rules and regulations not only of its own municipal law but of international law as well. A ship without a flag will be deprived of many of the benefits and rights available under the legal regime of the high seas.

Each state is required to elaborate the conditions necessary for the grant of its nationality to ships, for the registration of ships in its territory and for the right to fly its flag.[305] The nationality of the ship will depend upon the flag it flies, but article 91 of the 1982 Convention also stipulates that there must be a 'genuine link' between the state and the ship.[306] This [302] See e.g. Churchill and Lowe, Law of the Sea, chapter 17, and C. J. Colombos, International Law of the Sea, 6th edn, London, 1967, part II.

[303] Parliamentary Papers, 1987–8, HC, Paper 179–II, p. 120 and UKMIL, 59 BYIL, 1988, p. 581.

[304] See e.g. Oppenheim's International Law, p. 731.

[305] Article 5 of the 1958 High Seas Convention and article 91 of the 1982 Convention.

[306] Article 5 of the High Seas Convention, 1958 had added to this the requirement that 'in particular the state must effectively exercise its jurisdiction and control in administrative, technical and social matters over ships flying its flag'. This requirement appears in article 94 of the 1982 Convention.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

provision, which reflects 'a well-established rule of general international law',[307] was intended to check the use of flags of convenience operated by states such as Liberia and Panama which would grant their nationality to ships requesting such because of low taxation and the lack of application of most wage and social security agreements. This enabled the ships to operate at very low costs indeed. However, what precisely the 'genuine link' consists of and how one may regulate any abuse of the provisions of article 5 are unresolved questions. Some countries, for example the United States, maintain that the requirement of a 'genuine link' really only amounts to a duty to exercise jurisdiction over the ship in an efficacious manner, and is not a pre-condition for the grant, or the acceptance by other states of the grant, of nationality.[308]

An opportunity did arise in 1960 to discuss the meaning of the provision in the IMCO case.[309] The International Court was called upon to define the 'largest ship-owning nations' for the purposes of the constitution of a committee of the Inter-Governmental Maritime Consultative Organisation. It was held that the term referred only to registered tonnage so as to enable Liberia and Panama to be elected to the committee. Unfortunately, the opportunity was not taken of considering the problems of flags of convenience or the meaning of the 'genuine link' in the light of the true ownership of the ships involved, and so the doubts and ambiguities remain.

The UN Conference on Conditions of Registration of Ships, held under the auspices of the UN Conference on Trade and Development, convened in July 1984 and an agreement was signed in 1986. It attempts to deal with the flags of convenience issue, bearing in mind that nearly one-third of the world's merchant fleet by early 1985 flew such flags. It specifies that flag states should provide in their laws and regulations for the ownership of ships flying their flags and that those should include appropriate provision for participation by nationals as owners of such ships, and that such provisions should be sufficient to permit the flag state to exercise effectively its jurisdiction and control over ships flying its flag.[310]

The issue of the genuine link arose in the context of the Iran–Iraq war and in particular Iranian attacks upon Kuwaiti shipping. This prompted [307] See the 1999 decision of the International Tribunal for the Law of the Sea in M/V Saiga (No. 2), 120 ILR, pp. 143, 175.

[308] See Churchill and Lowe, Law of the Sea, pp. 213 ff.
[309] ICJ Reports, 1960, p. 150; 30 ILR, p. 426.
[310] Keesing's Contemporary Archives, p. 33952.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

Kuwait to ask the UK and the USA to reflag Kuwaiti tankers. The USA agreed in early 1987 to reflag eleven such tankers under the US flag and to protect them as it did other US-flagged ships in the Gulf.[311] The UK also agreed to reflag some Kuwaiti tankers, arguing that only satisfaction of Department of Trade and Industry requirements was necessary.[312] Both states argued that the genuine link requirement was satisfied and, in view of the ambiguity of state practice as to the definition of genuine link in such instances, it is hard to argue that the US and UK acted unlawfully. The International Tribunal for the Law of the Sea in M/V Saiga (No. 2) has underlined that determination of the criteria and establishment of the procedures for granting and withdrawing nationality to ships are matters within the exclusive jurisdiction of the flag state, although disputes concerning such matters may be subject to the dispute settlement procedures of the 1982 Convention. The question of the nationality of a ship was a question of fact to be determined on the basis of evidence adduced by the parties.[313] The conduct of the flag state, 'at all times material to the dispute', was an important consideration in determining the nationality or registration of a ship.[314] The Tribunal has also confirmed that the requirement of a genuine link was in order to secure effective implementation of the duties of the flag state and not to establish criteria by reference to which the validity of the registration of ships in a flag state may be challenged by other states.[315]

Ships are required to sail under the flag of one state only and are subject to its exclusive jurisdiction (save in exceptional cases). Where a ship does sail under the flags of more than one state, according to convenience, it may be treated as a ship without nationality and will not be able to claim any of the nationalities concerned.[316] A ship that is stateless, and does not fly a flag, may be boarded and seized on the high seas. This point was accepted by the Privy Council in the case of Naim Molvan v.

[311] See 26 ILM, 1987, pp. 1429–30, 1435–40 and 1450–2. See also 37 ICLQ, 1988, pp. 424–45, and M. H. Nordquist and M. G. Wachenfeld, 'Legal Aspects of Reflagging Kuwaiti Tankers and Laying of Mines in the Persian Gulf', 31 German YIL, 1988, p. 138.

[312] See e.g. 119 HC Deb., col. 645, 17 July 1987.

[313] 120 ILR, pp. 143, 175–6. See also the decision by the International Tribunal for the Law of the Sea in the Grand Prince case, 2001, paras. 81 ff., 125 ILR, pp. 272, 297 ff. See www.itlos.org/start2_en.html.

[314] M/V Saiga, 120 ILR, pp. 143, 176 and the Grand Prince case, 2001, para. 89, 125 ILR, pp. 272, 299.

[315] M/V Saiga, 120 ILR, pp. 143, 179.

[316] Article 6 of the 1958 Convention and article 92 of the 1982 Convention.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

Attorney-General for Palestine,[317] which concerned the seizure by the British navy of a stateless ship attempting to convey immigrants into Palestine.

The basic principle relating to jurisdiction on the high seas is that the flag state alone may exercise such rights over the ship.[318] This was elaborated in the Lotus case,[319] where it was held that 'vessels on the high seas are subject to no authority except that of the state whose flag they fly'.[320] This exclusivity is without exception regarding warships and ships owned or operated by a state where they are used only on governmental non-commercial service. Such ships have, according to articles 95 and 96 of the 1982 Convention, 'complete immunity from the jurisdiction of any state other than the flag state'.[321]

Exceptions to the exclusivity of flag-state jurisdiction

However, this basic principle is subject to exceptions regarding other vessels, and the concept of the freedom of the high seas is similarly limited by the existence of a series of exceptions.

Right of visit

Since the law of the sea depends to such an extent upon the nationality of the ship, it is well recognised in customary international law that warships have a right of approach to ascertain the nationality of ships. However, this right of approach to identify vessels does not incorporate the right to board or visit ships. This may only be undertaken, in the absence of hostilities between the flag states of the warship and a merchant vessel and in the absence of special treaty provisions to the contrary, where the ship is engaged in piracy or the slave trade, or, though flying a foreign flag or no flag at all, is in reality of the same nationality as the warship or of no nationality. But the warship has to operate carefully in such circumstances, [317] [1948] AC 351; 13 AD, p. 51. See also e.g. US v. Dominguez 604 F.2d 304 (1979); US v. Cortes 588 F.2d 106 (1979); US v. Monroy 614 F.2d 61 (1980) and US v. Marino-Garcia 679 F.2d 1373 (1982). In the latter case, the Court referred to stateless vessels as 'international pariahs', ibid., p. 1383.

[318] See article 6 of the 1958 Convention and article 92 of the 1982 Convention.

[319] PCIJ, Series A, No. 10, 1927, p. 25; 4 AD, p. 153. See also Sellers v. Maritime Safety Inspector [1999] 2 NZLR 44, 46–8; 120 ILR, p. 585.

[320] Note that duties of the flag state are laid down in articles 94, 97, 98, 99, 113 and 115 of the 1982 Convention.

[321] See articles 8 and 9 of the High Seas Convention, 1958.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

since it may be liable to pay compensation for any loss or damage sustained if its suspicions are unfounded and the ship boarded has not committed any act justifying them. Thus, international law has settled for a narrow exposition of the right of approach, in spite of earlier tendencies to expand this right, and the above provisions were incorporated into article 22 of the High Seas Convention. Article 110 of the 1982 Convention added to this list a right of visit where the ship is engaged in unauthorised broadcasting and the flag state of the warship has under article 109 of the Convention jurisdiction to prosecute the offender.

Piracy[322]

The most formidable of the exceptions to the exclusive jurisdiction of the flag state and to the principle of the freedom of the high seas is the concept of piracy. Piracy is strictly defined in international law and was declared in article 101 of the 1982 Convention to consist of any of the following acts:

> (a) Any illegal acts of violence, detention or any act of depredation, committed for private ends by the crew or the passengers of a private ship or private aircraft and directed: (i) on the high seas, against another ship or aircraft, or against persons or property on board such ship or aircraft; (ii) against a ship, aircraft, persons or property in a place outside the jurisdiction of any state; (b) Any act of voluntary participation in the operation of a ship or of an aircraft with knowledge of facts making it a pirate ship or aircraft; (c) Any act of inciting or of intentionally facilitating an act described in subparagraph (a) or (b).[323]

The essence of piracy under international law is that it must be committed for private ends. In other words, any hijacking or takeover for political reasons is automatically excluded from the definition of piracy. Similarly, any acts committed on the ship by the crew and aimed at the ship itself or property or persons on the ship do not fall within this category.

Any and every state may seize a pirate ship or aircraft whether on the high seas or on terra nullius and arrest the persons and seize the property on board. In addition, the courts of the state carrying out the seizure

[322] See e.g. Brown, International Law of the Sea, vol. I, p. 299; Oppenheim's International Law, p. 746, and B. H. Dubner, The Law of International Sea Piracy, The Hague, 1979.

[323] See also article 15 of the High Seas Convention, 1958. Note that article 105 of the 1982 Convention deals with the seizure of pirate boats or aircraft, while article 106 provides for compensation in the case of seizure without adequate grounds. See also Athens Maritime Enterprises Corporation v. Hellenic Mutual War Risks Association [1983] 1 All ER 590; 78 ILR, p. 563.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

have jurisdiction to impose penalties, and may decide what action to take regarding the ship or aircraft and property, subject to the rights of third parties that have acted in good faith.[324] The fact that every state may arrest and try persons accused of piracy makes that crime quite exceptional in international law, where so much emphasis is placed upon the sovereignty and jurisdiction of each particular state within its own territory. The first multilateral treaty concerning the regional implementation of the Convention's provisions on piracy was the Regional Cooperation Agreement on Combating Piracy and Armed Robbery against Ships in Asia in 2005, which calls for the establishment of an information-sharing centre in Singapore and extends the regulation of piracy beyond the high seas to events taking place in internal waters, territorial seas and archipelagic waters.[325]

The slave trade[326]

Although piracy may be suppressed by all states, most offences on the high seas can only be punished in accordance with regulations prescribed by the municipal legislation of states, even where international law requires such rules to be established. Article 99 of the 1982 Convention provides that every state shall take effective measures to prevent and punish the transport of slaves in ships authorised to fly its flag and to prevent the unlawful use of its flag for that purpose. Any slave taking refuge on board any ship, whatever its flag, shall ipso facto be free.[327] Under article 110, warships may board foreign merchant ships where they are reasonably suspected of engaging in the slave trade; offenders must be handed over to the flag state for trial.[328]

[324] See article 19 of the 1958 Convention and article 105 of the 1982 Convention. See also the Convention for the Suppression of Unlawful Acts Against the Safety of Maritime Navigation, 1988 and Protocol, 1989. Note that on 18 April 2008, a French court charged six Somalis with piracy following the release of hostages taken from a French yacht that they had allegedly seized in the Gulf of Aden. The Somalis were apprehended by French forces and removed to France with the permission of the President of Somalia: see www.news.bbc.co.uk/1/hi/world/Europe/7355598.stm.

[325] See 44 ILM, 2005, p. 829.

[326] See e.g. Brown, International Law of the Sea, vol. I, p. 309.

[327] See also article 13 of the High Seas Convention, 1958.

[328] See also article 22 of the High Seas Convention, 1958. Several international treaties exist with the aim of suppressing the slave trade and some provide for reciprocal rights of visits and search on the high seas: see e.g. Churchill and Lowe, Law of the Sea, pp. 171–2. Note also that under article 108 of the 1982 Convention all states are to co-operate in the suppression of the illicit drug trade.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

Unauthorised broadcasting[329]

Under article 109 of the 1982 Convention, all states are to co-operate in the suppression of unauthorised broadcasting from the high seas. This is defined to mean transmission of sound or TV from a ship or installation on the high seas intended for reception by the general public, contrary to international regulations but excluding the transmission of distress calls. Any person engaged in such broadcasting may be prosecuted by the flag state of the ship, the state of registry of the installation, the state of which the person is a national, any state where the transmission can be received or any state where authorised radio communication is suffering interference.

Any of the above states having jurisdiction may arrest any person or ship engaging in unauthorised broadcasting on the high seas and seize the broadcasting apparatus.[330]

Hot pursuit[331]

The right of hot pursuit of a foreign ship is a principle designed to ensure that a vessel which has infringed the rules of a coastal state cannot escape punishment by fleeing to the high seas. In reality it means that in certain defined circumstances a coastal state may extend its jurisdiction onto the high seas in order to pursue and seize a ship which is suspected of infringing its laws. The right, which has been developing in one form or another since the nineteenth century,[332] was comprehensively elaborated in article 111 of the 1982 Convention, building upon article 23 of the High Seas Convention, 1958.

It notes that such pursuit may commence when the authorities of the coastal state have good reason to believe that the foreign ship has violated its laws. The pursuit must start while the ship, or one of its boats, is within the internal waters, territorial sea or contiguous zone of the coastal state and may only continue outside the territorial sea or contiguous zone if it is uninterrupted. However, if the pursuit commences while the foreign [329] See e.g. J. C. Woodliffe, 'The Demise of Unauthorised Broadcasting from Ships in International Waters', 1 Journal of Estuarine and Coastal Law, 1986, p. 402, and Brown, International Law of the Sea, vol. I, p. 312.

[330] See also article 110 of the 1982 Convention. In addition, see the European Agreement for the Prevention of Broadcasting transmitted from Stations outside National Territories.

[331] See e.g. N. Poulantzas, The Right of Hot Pursuit in International Law, 2nd edn, The Hague, 2002, and Oppenheim's International Law, p. 739. See also W. C. Gilmore, 'Hot Pursuit: The Case of R v. Mills and Others', 44 ICLQ, 1995, p. 949.

[332] See e.g. the I'm Alone case, 3 RIAA, p. 1609 (1935); 7 AD, p. 203.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

ship is in the contiguous zone, then it may only be undertaken if there has been a violation of the rights for the protection of which the zone was established. The right may similarly commence from the archipelagic waters. In addition, the right will apply mutatis mutandis to violations in the exclusive economic zone or on the continental shelf (including safety zones around continental shelf installations) of the relevant rules and regulations applicable to such areas.

Hot pursuit only begins when the pursuing ship has satisfied itself that the ship pursued or one of its boats is within the limits of the territorial sea or, as the case may be, in the contiguous zone or economic zone or on the continental shelf. It is essential that prior to the chase a visual or auditory signal to stop has been given at a distance enabling it to be seen or heard by the foreign ship and pursuit may only be exercised by warships or military aircraft or by specially authorised government ships or planes. The right of hot pursuit ceases as soon as the ship pursued has entered the territorial waters of its own or a third state. The International Tribunal for the Law of the Sea has emphasised that the conditions laid down in article 111 are cumulative, each one of them having to be satisfied in order for the pursuit to be lawful.[333] In stopping and arresting a ship in such circumstances, the use of force must be avoided if at all possible and, where it is unavoidable, it must not go beyond what is reasonable and necessary in the circumstances.[334]

Collisions

Where ships are involved in collisions on the high seas, article 11 of the High Seas Convention declares, overruling the decision in the Lotus case,[335] that penal or disciplinary proceedings may only be taken against the master or other persons in the service of the ship by the authorities of either the flag state or the state of which the particular person is a national. It also provides that no arrest or detention of the ship, even for investigation purposes, can be ordered by other than the authorities of the flag state. This was reaffirmed in article 97 of the 1982 Convention.

[333] M/V Saiga, 120 ILR, pp. 143, 194.

[334] Ibid., p. 196. See also the I'm Alone case, 3 RIAA, p. 1609 (1935); 7 AD, p. 203, and the Red Crusader case, 35 ILR, p. 485. Note that article 22(1)f of the Straddling Stocks Convention, 1995 provides that an inspecting state shall avoid the use of force except when and to the degree necessary to ensure the safety of the inspectors and where the inspectors are obstructed in the execution of their duties. In addition, the force used must not exceed that reasonably required in the circumstances.

[335] PCIJ, Series A, No. 10, 1927, p. 25; 4 AD, p. 153.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

Treaty rights and agreements[336]

In many cases, states may by treaty permit each other's warships to exercise certain powers of visit and search as regards vessels flying the flags of the signatories to the treaty.[337] For example, most of the agreements in the nineteenth century relating to the suppression of the slave trade provided that warships of the parties to the agreements could search and sometimes detain vessels suspected of being involved in the trade, where such vessels were flying the flags of the treaty states. The Convention for the Protection of Submarine Cables of 1884 gave the warships of contracting states the right to stop and ascertain the nationality of merchant ships that were suspected of infringing the terms of the Convention, and other agreements dealing with matters as diverse as arms trading and liquor smuggling contained like powers. Until recently, the primary focus of such activities in fact concerned drug trafficking.[338] However, the question of the proliferation of weapons of mass destruction (WMD) is today of great importance.[339] This issue has been tackled by a mix of international treaties, bilateral treaties, international co-operation and Security Council action. Building on the Security Council statement in 1992 identifying the proliferation of WMD as a threat to international peace and security,[340] the US announced the Proliferation Security Initiative in May 2003. A statement of Interdiction Principles agreed by participants in the initiative in September 2003 provided for the undertaking of effective measures to interdict the transfer or transport of WMD, their delivery systems and related materials to and from states and non-state actors of proliferation concern. Such measures were to include the boarding and [336] See e.g. Churchill and Lowe, Law of the Sea, pp. 218 ff.

[337] This falls within article 110, which notes that 'Except where acts of interference derive from powers conferred by treaty . . . '.

[338] See the UK–US Agreement on Vessels Trafficking in Drugs, 1981 and US v. Biermann, 83 AJIL, 1989, p. 99; 84 ILR, p. 206. See also e.g. the Vienna Convention Against Illicit Traffic in Narcotic Drugs and Psychotropic Substances, 1988 and the Council of Europe Agreement on Illicit Traffic by Sea, 1995. But see as to enforcement of the Straddling Stocks Convention, below, p. 623.

[339] See e.g. M. Byers, 'Policing the High Seas: The Proliferation Security Initiative', 98 AJIL, 2004, p. 526; D. Joyner, 'The Proliferation Security Initiative: Nonproliferation, Counterproliferation and International Law', 30 Yale JIL, 2005, p. 507; D. Guilfoyle, 'Interdicting Vessels to Enforce the Common Interest: Maritime Countermeasures and the Use of Force', 56 ICLQ, 2007, p. 69, and Guilfoyle, 'Maritime Interdiction of Weapons of Mass Destruction', 12 Journal of Conflict and Security Law, 2007, p. 1. See also the statement of the UK Foreign Office Minister of 25 April 2006, UKMIL, 77 BYIL, 2006, pp. 773–4.

[340] S/23500, 31 January 1992.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

search of any vessel flying the flag of one of the participants, with their consent, in internal waters, territorial seas or beyond the territorial seas, where such vessel is reasonably suspected of carrying WMD materials to or from states or non-state actors of proliferation concern.[341] In addition, the US has signed a number of bilateral WMD interdiction agreements, providing for consensual boarding of vessels.[342]

In a further development, Security Council resolution 1540 (2004) required all states inter alia to prohibit and criminalise the transfer of WMD and delivery systems to non-state actors, although there is no direct reference to interdiction.[343] In addition, a Protocol adopted in 2005 to the Convention on the Suppression of Unlawful Acts against the Safety of Maritime Navigation provides essentially for the criminalisation of knowingly transporting WMD and related materials by sea and provides for enforcement by interdiction on the high seas.[344]

Pollution[345]

Article 24 of the 1958 Convention on the High Seas called on states to draw up regulations to prevent the pollution of the seas by the discharge of oil or the dumping of radioactive waste, while article 1 of the Convention on the Fishing and Conservation of the Living Resources of the High Seas, of the same year, declared that all states had the duty to adopt, or co-operate with other states in adopting, such measures as may be necessary for the conservation of the living resources of the high seas. Although these provisions have not proved an unqualified success, they have been reinforced by an interlocking series of additional agreements covering the environmental protection of the seas.

The International Convention relating to Intervention on the High Seas in Cases of Oil Pollution Casualties, signed in 1969 and in force as of June 1975, provides that the parties to the Convention may take such measures on the high seas:

[341] Participants include the US, UK, Australia, Canada, France, Germany, Italy, Japan, the Netherlands, New Zealand, Norway, Poland, Portugal, Singapore, Spain and Turkey: see Guilfoyle, 'Maritime Interdiction', p. 12.

[342] Including with Liberia, Panama, Croatia, Cyprus and Belize: see Guilfoyle, 'Maritime Interdiction', p. 22.

[343] See below, chapter 22, pp. 1208 and 1240.

[344] Guilfoyle, 'Maritime Interdiction', pp. 28 ff.

[345] See Brown, International Law of the Sea, vol. I, chapter 15; Churchill and Lowe, Law of the Sea, chapter 15, and O'Connell, International Law of the Sea, vol. II, chapter 25. See also below, chapter 15.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

> as may be necessary to prevent, mitigate or eliminate grave and imminent danger to their coastline or related interests from pollution or threat of pollution of the sea by oil, following upon a maritime casualty or acts related to such a casualty, which may reasonably be expected to result in major harmful consequences.

This provision came as a result of the Torrey Canyon incident in 1967[346] in which a Liberian tanker foundered off the Cornish coast, spilling massive quantities of oil and polluting large stretches of the UK and French coastlines. As a last resort to prevent further pollution, British aircraft bombed the tanker and set it ablaze. The Convention on Intervention on the High Seas provided for action to be taken to end threats to the coasts of states, while the Convention on Civil Liability for Oil Pollution Damage, also signed in 1969 and which came into effect in June 1975, stipulated that the owners of ships causing oil pollution damage were to be liable to pay compensation.

The latter agreement was supplemented in 1971 by the Convention on the Establishment of an International Fund for Compensation for Oil Pollution Damage which sought to provide for compensation in circumstances not covered by the 1969 Convention and aid shipowners in their additional financial obligations.

These agreements are only a small part of the web of treaties covering the preservation of the sea environment. Other examples include the 1954 Convention for the Prevention of Pollution of the Seas by Oil, with its series of amendments designed to ban offensive discharges; the 1972 Oslo Convention for the Prevention of Marine Pollution by Dumping from Ships and Aircraft and the subsequent London Convention on the Dumping of Wastes at Sea later the same year; the 1973 Convention for the Prevention of Pollution from Ships; and the 1974 Paris Convention for the Prevention of Marine Pollution from Land-Based Sources.[347]

Under the 1982 Convention nearly fifty articles are devoted to the protection of the marine environment. Flag states still retain the competence to legislate for their ships, but certain minimum standards are imposed [346] 6 ILM, 1967, p. 480. See also the Amoco Cadiz incident in 1978, e.g. Churchill and Lowe, Law of the Sea, p. 241, and the Aegean Sea and Braer incidents in 1992–3, e.g. G. Plant, '"Safer Ships, Cleaner Seas": Lord Donaldson's Inquiry, UK Government's Response and International Law', 44 ICLQ, 1995, p. 939.

[347] Also a variety of regional and bilateral agreements have been signed, Churchill and Lowe, Law of the Sea, pp. 263–4.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

upon them.[348] It is also provided that states are responsible for the fulfilment of their international obligations concerning the protection and preservation of the marine environment and are liable in accordance with international law. States must also ensure that recourse is available in accordance with their legal systems for prompt and adequate compensation or other relief regarding damage caused by pollution of the marine environment by persons under their jurisdiction.[349]

States are under a basic obligation to protect and preserve the marine environment.[350] Article 194 of the 1982 Convention also provides that:

> 1. States shall take, individually or jointly as appropriate, all measures consistent with this Convention that are necessary to prevent, reduce and control pollution of the marine environment from any source, using for this purpose the best practicable means at their disposal and in accordance with their capabilities, and they shall endeavour to harmonise their policies in this connection.
>
> 2. States shall take all measures necessary to ensure that activities under their jurisdiction or control are so conducted as not to cause damage by pollution to other States and their environment, and that pollution arising from incidents or activities under their jurisdiction or control does not spread beyond the areas where they exercise sovereign rights in accordance with this Convention.
>
> 3. The measures taken pursuant to this Part shall deal with all sources of pollution of the marine environment. These measures shall include, inter alia, those designed to minimise to the fullest possible extent:
>
> (a) the release of toxic, harmful, or noxious substances, especially those which are persistent, from land-based sources, from or through the atmosphere or by dumping;
> (b) pollution from vessels, in particular measures for preventing accidents and dealing with emergencies, ensuring the safety of operations at sea, preventing intentional and unintentional discharges, and regulating the design, construction, equipment, operation and manning of vessels;
> (c) pollution from installations and devices used in exploitation of the natural resources of the seabed and subsoil, in particular measures for preventing accidents and dealing with emergencies, ensuring the safety of operations at sea, and regulating the design, construction, equipment, operation and manning of such installations or devices;

[348] See article 211. See also generally articles 192–237, covering inter alia global and regional co-operation, technical assistance, monitory and environmental assessment, and the development of the enforcement of international and domestic law preventing pollution.

[349] Article 235. [350] Article 192.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

(d) pollution from other installations and devices operating in the marine environment, in particular for preventing accidents and dealing with emergencies, ensuring the safety of operations at sea, and regulating the design, construction, equipment, operation and manning of such installations or devices.

4. In taking measures to prevent, reduce or control pollution of the marine environment, states shall refrain from unjustifiable interference with activities carried out by other states in the exercise of their rights and in pursuance of their duties in conformity with this Convention.[351]

Straddling stocks[352]

The freedom to fish on the high seas is one of the fundamental freedoms of the high seas, but it is not total or absolute.[353] The development of [351] See also the Mox case, the International Tribunal for the Law of the Sea, Provisional Measures Order of 3 December 2001, www.itlos.org/start2_en.html; the OSPAR award of 2 July 2003, see www.pca-cpa.org/upload/files/OSPAR%20Award.pdf; the arbitral tribunal's suspension of proceedings, Order No. 3 of 24 June 2003 and Order No. 4 of 14 November 2003, see www.pca-cpa.org/upload/files/MOX%20Order%20no3.pdf and www.pca-cpa.org/upload/files/MOX%20Order%20No4.pdf and 126 ILR, pp. 257 ff. and 310 ff. See also the decision of the European Court of Justice of 30 May 2006, Case C-459/03, Commission v. Ireland, 45 ILM, 2006, p. 1074, where the Court found that by instituting proceedings against the UK under the Law of the Sea Convention dispute settlement mechanisms, Ireland had breached its obligations under articles 10 and 292 of the European Community Treaty and articles 192 and 193 of the European Atomic Energy Treaty.

[352] See e.g. Brown, International Law of the Sea, vol. I, p. 226; Churchill and Lowe, Law of the Sea, p. 305; F. Orrego Vicuña, The Changing International Law of High Seas Fisheries, Cambridge, 1999; W. T. Burke, The New International Law of Fisheries, Oxford, 1994; H. Gherari, 'L'Accord de 4 août 1995 sur les Stocks Chevauchants et les Stocks de Poisson Grands Migrateurs', 100 RGDIP, 1996, p. 367; B. Kwiatowska, 'Creeping Jurisdiction beyond 200 Miles in the Light of the 1982 Law of the Sea Convention and State Practice', 22 Ocean Development and International Law, 1991, p. 167; E. Miles and W. T. Burke, 'Pressures on the UN Convention on the Law of the Sea 1982 Arising from New Fisheries Conflicts: The Problem of Straddling Stocks', 20 Ocean Development and International Law, 1989, p. 352; E. Meltzer, 'Global Overview of Straddling and Highly Migratory Fish Stocks: The Nonsustainable Nature of High Seas Fisheries', 25 Ocean Development and International Law, 1994, p. 256; P. G. G. Davies and C. Redgwell, 'The International Legal Regulation of Straddling Fish Stocks', 67 BYIL, 1996, p. 199; D. H. Anderson, 'The Straddling Stocks Agreement of 1995 – An Initial Assessment', 45 ICLQ, 1996, p. 463, and D. Freestone and Z. Makuch, 'The New International Environmental Law of Fisheries: The 1995 United Nations Straddling Stocks Agreement', 7 Yearbook of International Environmental Law, 1996, p. 3.

[353] See article 2 of the High Seas Convention, 1958 and articles 1 and 6 of the Geneva Convention on Fishing and Conservation of the Living Resources of the High Seas, 1958, and article 116 of the 1982 Convention. In particular, the freedom to fish is subject to a state's treaty obligations, to the interests and rights of coastal states and to the requirements of exclusive economic zones has meant that the area of high seas has shrunk appreciably, so that the bulk of fish stocks are now to be found within the economic zones of coastal states. In addition, the interests of such coastal states have extended to impinge more clearly upon the regulation of the high seas.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

Article 56(1) of the 1982 Convention provides that coastal states have sovereign rights over their economic zones for the purpose of exploring and exploiting, conserving and managing the fish stocks of the zones concerned. Such rights are accompanied by duties as to conservation and management measures in order to ensure that the fish stocks in exclusive economic zones are not endangered by over-exploitation and that such stocks are maintained at, or restored to, levels which can produce the maximum sustainable yield.[354] Where the same stock or stocks of associated species occur within the exclusive economic zones of two or more coastal states, these states shall seek either directly or through appropriate subregional or regional organisations to agree upon the measures necessary to co-ordinate and ensure the conservation and development of such stocks.[355] Article 116(b) of the 1982 Convention states that the freedom to fish on the high seas is subject to the rights and duties as well as the interests of coastal states as detailed above, while the 1982 Convention lays down a general obligation upon states to co-operate in taking such measures for their respective nationals as may be necessary for the conservation of the living resources of the high seas and a variety of criteria are laid down for the purpose of determining the allowable catch and establishing other conservation measures.[356]

A particular problem is raised with regard to straddling stocks, that is stocks of fish that straddle both exclusive economic zones and high seas, for if the latter were not in some way regulated, fishery stocks regularly present in the exclusive economic zone could be depleted by virtue of unrestricted conservation. See generally on international fisheries law, www.oceanlaw.net/ and above, p. 581, with regard to the Fisheries Jurisdiction case.

354 Article 61. See also article 62.

355 Article 63(1). This is without prejudice to the other provisions of this Part of the 1982 Convention.

356 See articles 117–20. A series of provisions in the 1982 Convention apply with regard to particular species, e.g. article 64 concerning highly migratory species (such as tuna); article 65 concerning marine mammals (such as whales, for which see also the work of the International Whaling Commission); article 66 concerning anadromous species (such as salmon); article 67 concerning catadromous species (such as eels) and article 68 concerning sedentary species (which are regarded as part of the natural resources of a coastal state's continental shelf: see article 77(4)).

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

fishing of those stocks while they were present on the high seas. Article 63(2) of the 1982 Convention stipulates that where the same stock or stocks of associated species occur both within the exclusive economic zone and in an area beyond and adjacent to the zone (i.e. the high seas), the coastal state and the states fishing for such stocks in the adjacent area shall seek, either directly or through appropriate subregional or regional organisations, to agree upon the measures necessary for the conservation of these stocks in the adjacent area.

The provisions in the 1982 Convention, however, were not deemed to be fully comprehensive[357] and, as problems of straddling stocks grew more apparent,[358] a Straddling Stocks Conference was set up in 1993 and produced an agreement two years later. The Agreement emphasises the need to conserve and manage straddling fish stocks and highly migratory species and calls in particular for the application of the precautionary approach.[359] Coastal states and states fishing on the high seas shall pursue co-operation in relation to straddling and highly migratory fish stocks either directly or through appropriate subregional or regional organisations and shall enter into consultations in good faith and without delay at the request of any interested state with a view to establishing appropriate arrangements to ensure conservation and management of the stocks.[360] Much emphasis is placed upon subregional and regional organisations and article 10 provides that in fulfilling their obligation to co-operate through such organisations or arrangements, states shall inter alia agree on measures to ensure the long-term sustainability of straddling and highly migratory fish stocks and agree as appropriate upon participatory rights such as allocations of allowable catch or levels of fishing effort. In particular, the establishment of co-operative mechanisms for effective [357] See e.g. Burke, New International Law of Fisheries, pp. 348 ff., and B. Kwiatowska, 'The High Seas Fisheries Regime: At a Point of No Return?', 8 International Journal of Marine and Coastal Law, 1993, p. 327.

[358] E.g. with regard to the Grand Banks of Newfoundland, the Bering Sea, the Barents Sea, the Sea of Okhotsk and off Patagonia and the Falklands, see Anderson, 'Straddling Stocks Agreement', p. 463.

[359] See articles 5 and 6 of the Straddling Stocks Agreement. See also, with regard to this approach, below, chapter 15, p. 868. See generally on the agreement which came into force on 11 December 2001, www.un.org/Depts/los/convention_agreements/ convention_overview_fish_stocks.htm.

[360] Article 8. Note that by article 1(3) the agreement 'applies mutatis mutandis to other fishing entities whose vessels fish on the high seas'. This was intended to refer to Taiwan: see e.g. Orrego Vicuña, High Seas Fisheries, p. 139, and Anderson, 'Straddling Stocks Agreement', p. 468.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

monitoring, control, surveillance and enforcement, decision-making procedures facilitating the adoption of such measures of conservation and management, and the promotion of the peaceful settlement of disputes are called for. The focus in terms of implementation is upon the flag state. Article 18 provides that flag states shall take such measures as may be necessary to ensure that their vessels comply with subregional and regional conservation and management measures, while article 19 provides that flag states must enforce such measures irrespective of where violations occur and investigate immediately any alleged violation. Article 21 deals specifically with subregional and regional co-operation in enforcement and provides that in any area of the high seas covered by such an organisation or arrangement, a state party which is also a member or participant in such an organisation or arrangement may board and inspect fishing vessels flying the flag of another state party to the Agreement. This applies whether that state party is or is not a member of or a participant in such a subregional or regional organisation or arrangement. The boarding and visiting powers are for the purpose of ensuring compliance with the conservation and management measures established by the organisation or arrangement. Where, following a boarding and inspection, there are clear grounds for believing that a vessel has engaged in activities contrary to the relevant conservation and management measures, the inspecting state shall secure evidence and promptly notify the flag state. The flag state must respond within three working days and either fulfil its investigation and enforcement obligations under article 19 or authorise the inspecting state to investigate. In the latter case, the flag state must then take enforcement action or authorise the inspecting state to take such action. Where there are clear grounds for believing that the vessel has committed a serious violation and the flag state has failed to respond or take action as required, the inspectors may remain on board and secure evidence and may require the master to bring the vessel into the nearest appropriate port.[361] Article 23 provides that a port state has the right and duty to take measures in accordance with international law to promote the effectiveness of subregional, regional and global conservation and management measures.[362]

One of the major regional organisations existing in this area is the North Atlantic Fisheries Organisation (NAFO), which came into being [361] See also article 22.

[362] Note that by article 17(3) the fishing entities referred to in article 1(3) may be requested to co-operate with the organisations or arrangements in question.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

following the Northwest Atlantic Fisheries Convention, 1978. The organisation has established a Fisheries Commission with responsibility for conservation measures in the area covered by this Convention. The European Community is a party to the Convention, although it has objected on occasions to NAFO's total catch quotas and the share-out of such quotas among state parties. In particular, a dispute developed with regard to the share-out of Greenland halibut, following upon a decision by NAFO to reduce the EC share of this fishery in 1995.[363] The EC formally objected to this decision using NAFO procedures and established its own halibut quota, which was in excess of the NAFO quota. In May 1994, Canada had amended its Coastal Fisheries Protection Act 1985 in order to enable it to take action to prevent further destruction of straddling stocks and by virtue of which any vessel from any nation fishing at variance with good conservation rules could be rendered subject to Canadian action. In early 1995, regulations were issued in order to protect Greenland halibut outside Canada's 200-mile limit from overfishing. On 9 March 1995, Canadian officers boarded a Spanish vessel fishing on the high seas on the Grand Banks some 245 miles off the Canadian coast. The captain was arrested and the vessel seized and towed to a Canadian harbour. Spain commenced an application before the International Court, but this failed on jurisdictional grounds.[364] In April 1995, an agreement between the EC and Canada was reached, under which the EC obtained an increased quota for Greenland halibut and Canada stayed charges against the vessel and agreed to repeal the provisions of the regulation banning Spanish and Portuguese vessels from fishing in the NAFO regulatory area. Improved control and enforcement procedures were also agreed.[365] Problems have also arisen in other areas: for example, the 'Donut Hole', a part of the high seas in the Bering Sea surrounded by the exclusive economic zones of Russia and the US,[366] and the 'Peanut Hole', a part of the high seas in the Sea of Okhotsk surrounded by Russia's economic zone. In 2001, the Convention on the Conservation and Management of Highly Migratory Fish Stocks in the Western and Central Pacific Ocean was signed. This agreement establishes a Commission to determine inter alia the [363] See e.g. P. G. G. Davies, 'The EC/Canadian Fisheries Dispute in the Northwest Atlantic', 44 ICLQ, 1995, p. 927.

[364] ICJ Reports, 1998, p. 432.
[365] See European Commission Press Release, WE/15/95, 20 April 1995.
[366] See the Convention on the Conservation and Management of Pollock Resources in the Central Bering Sea, 1994.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

total allowable catch within the area and to adopt standards for fishing operations.[367]

The international seabed[368]

Introduction

In recent years the degree of wealth contained beneath the high seas has become more and more apparent. It is estimated that some 175 billion dry tonnes of mineable manganese nodules are in existence, scattered over some 15 per cent of the seabed. This far exceeds the land-based reserves of the metals involved (primarily manganese, nickel, copper and cobalt).[369] While this source of mineral wealth is of great potential importance to the developed nations possessing or soon to possess the technical capacity to mine such nodules, it poses severe problems for developing states, particularly those who are dependent upon the export earnings of a few categories of minerals. Zaire, for example, accounts for over one third of total cobalt production, while Gabon and India each account for around 8 per cent of total manganese production.[370] By the early 1990s, there appeared to be six major deep sea mining consortia with the participation of numerous American, Japanese, Canadian, British, Belgian, German, Dutch and French companies.[371] The technology to mine is at an advanced stage and some basic investment has been made, although it is unlikely that there will be considerable mining activity for several years to come.

[367] Note also the existence of other agreements with regard to specific species of fish, e.g. the International Convention for the Conservation of Atlantic Tuna, 1966; the Convention for the Conservation of Southern Bluefin Tuna, 1993 and the Indian Ocean Tuna Commission Agreement, 1993.

[368] See e.g. Brown, International Law of the Sea, vol. I, chapter 17; O'Connell, International Law of the Sea, vol. I, chapter 12; Churchill and Lowe, Law of the Sea, chapter 12; E. Luard, The Control of the Seabed, Oxford, 1974; B. Buzan, Seabed Politics, New York, 1976; T. G. Kronmiller, The Lawfulness of Deep Seabed Mining, New York, 2 vols., 1980; E. D. Brown, Sea-Bed Energy and Mineral Resources and the Law of the Sea, London, 3 vols., 1986; A. M. Post, Deepsea Mining and the Law of the Sea, The Hague, 1983; A. D. Henchoz, Règlementations Nationales et Internationales de l'Exploration et de l'Exploitation des Grans Fonds Marins, Zurich, 1992; Oppenheim's International Law, p. 812, and Nguyen Quoc Dinh et al., Droit International Public, p. 1210.

[369] See e.g. Seabed Mineral Resource Development, UN Dept. of International Economic and Social Affairs, 1980, ST/ESA/107, pp. 1–2.

[370] Ibid., p. 3. Zaire is now called the Democratic Republic of the Congo.

[371] Ibid., pp. 10–12.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

In 1969, the UN General Assembly adopted resolution 2574 (XXIV) calling for a moratorium on deep seabed activities and a year later a Declaration of Principles Governing the Seabed and Ocean Floor and the Subsoil Thereof, beyond the Limits of National Jurisdiction ('the Area') was adopted. This provided that the Area and its resources were the 'common heritage of mankind' and could not be appropriated, and that no rights at all could be acquired over it except in conformity with an international regime to be established to govern its exploration and exploitation.

The 1982 Law of the Sea Convention (Part XI)

Under the Convention, the Area[372] and its resources are deemed to be the common heritage of mankind and no sovereign or other rights may be recognised. Minerals recovered from the Area in accordance with the Convention are alienable, however.[373] Activities in the Area are to be carried out for the benefit of mankind as a whole by or on behalf of the International Seabed Authority (the Authority) established under the Convention.[374] The Authority is to provide for the equitable sharing of such benefits.[375] Activities in the Area are to be carried out under article 153 by the Enterprise (i.e. the organ of the Authority established as its operating arm) and by states parties or state enterprises, or persons possessing the nationality of state parties or effectively controlled by them, acting in association with the Authority. The latter 'qualified applicants' will be required to submit formal written plans of work to be approved by the Council after review by the Legal and Technical Commission.[376]

This plan of work is to specify two sites of equal estimated commercial value. The Authority may then approve a plan of work relating to one of these sites and designate the other as a 'reserved site' which may only [372] Defined in article 1 as the 'seabed and ocean floor and subsoil thereof beyond national jurisdiction'. This would start at the outer edge of the continental margin or at least at a distance of 200 nautical miles from the baselines.

[373] Articles 136 and 137.

[374] See below, p. 633. Note that certain activities in the Area do not need the consent of the Authority, e.g. pipeline and cable laying and scientific research not concerning seabed resources: see articles 112, 143 and 256.

[375] Article 140. See also article 150.

[376] See also Annex III, articles 3 and 4. Highly controversial requirements for transfer of technology are also included, ibid., article 5.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

be exploited by the Authority, via the Enterprise or in association with developing states.[377]

Resolution I of the Conference established a Preparatory Commission to make arrangements for the operation of the Authority and the International Tribunal for the Law of the Sea. [378]

Resolution II of the Conference made special provision for eight 'pioneer investors', four from France, Japan, India and the USSR and four from Belgium, Canada, the Federal Republic of Germany, Italy, Japan, the Netherlands, the UK and the USA, and possibly others from developing states, to be given pioneer status. Each investor must have invested at least $30 million in preparation for seabed mining, at least 10 per cent of which must be invested in a specific site. Sponsoring states must provide certification that this has happened.[379] Such pioneer investors are to be able to carry out exploration activities pending entry into force of the Convention with priority over the other applicants (apart from the Enterprise) in the allocation of exploitation contracts.[380] India, France, Japan and the USSR were registered as pioneer investors in 1987 on behalf of various consortia.[381] China was registered as a pioneer investor in March 1991,[382] while the multinational Interoceanmetal Joint Organisation was registered as a pioneer investor in August that year.[383] Several sites have [377] Ibid., articles 8 and 9. The production policies of the Authority are detailed in article 151 of the Convention.

[378] 21(4) UN Chronicle, 1984, pp. 44 ff. See also 25 ILM, 1986, p. 1329 and 26 ILM, 1987, p. 1725.

[379] See Churchill and Lowe, Law of the Sea, p. 230.

[380] See 21(4) UN Chronicle, 1984, pp. 45–7.

[381] See LOS/PCN/97–99 (1987). See also the Understanding of 5 September 1986 making various changes to the rules regarding pioneer operations, including extending the deadline by which the $30 million investment had to be made and establishing a Group of Technical Experts, LOS/PCN/L.41/Rev.1. See also Brown, International Law of the Sea, vol. I, pp. 448–54. An Understanding of 30 August 1990 dealt with training costs, transfer of technology, expenditure on exploration and the development of a mine site for the Authority, ibid., pp. 454–5, while an Understanding of 22 February 1991 dealt with the avoidance of overlapping claims signed by China on the one hand and seven potential pioneer investor states on the other (Belgium, Canada, Italy, the Netherlands, Germany, the UK and the US), ibid., p. 455.

[382] Brown, International Law of the Sea, vol. I, p. 455.

[383] Ibid., p. 456. This organisation consisted of Bulgaria, Czechoslovakia, Poland, the Russian Federation and Cuba. See, for the full list of registered pioneer investors, www.isa.org.jm/en/default.htm. The first fifteen-year contracts for exploration for polymetallic nodules in the deep seabed were signed at the headquarters of the International Seabed Authority in Jamaica in March 2001, ibid.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

been earmarked for the Authority, all on the Clarion–Clipperton Ridge in the North-Eastern Equatorial Pacific.

The regime for the deep seabed, however, was opposed by the United States in particular and, as a consequence, it voted against the adoption of the 1982 Convention. The UK also declared that it would not sign the Convention until a satisfactory regime for deep seabed mining was established.[384] Concern was particularly expressed regarding the failure to provide assured access to seabed minerals, lack of a proportionate voice in decision-making for countries most affected, and the problems that would be caused by not permitting the free play of market forces in the development of seabed resources.[385]

The Reciprocating States Regime

As a result of developments in the Conference on the Law of the Sea, many states began to enact domestic legislation with the aim of establishing an interim framework for exploration and exploitation of the seabed pending an acceptable international solution. The UK Deep Sea Mining (Temporary Provisions) Act 1981, for example, provided for the granting of exploration licences (but not in respect of a period before 1 July 1981) and exploitation licences (but not for a period before 1 January 1988).[386]

A 1982 Agreement[387] called for consultations to avoid overlapping claims under national legislation and for arbitration to resolve any dispute.[388] The Preparatory Commission, however, adopted a declaration in 1985 stating that any claim, agreement or action regarding the Area and its resources undertaken outside the Commission itself, which was [384] See e.g. The Times, 16 February 1984, p. 4, and 33 HC Deb., col. 404, 2 December 1982.

[385] See e.g. the US delegate, UN Chronicle, June 1982, p. 16.

[386] The Act also provided for a Deep Sea Mining Levy to be paid by the holder of an exploitation licence into a Deep Sea Mining Fund and for mutual recognition of licences. A number of countries adopted similar, unilateral legislation, e.g. the US in 1980, 19 ILM, 1980, p. 1003; 20 ILM, 1981, p. 1228 and 21 ILM, 1982, p. 867; West Germany, 20 ILM, 1981, p. 393 and 21 ILM, 1982, p. 832; the USSR, 21 ILM, 1982, p. 551; France, 21 ILM, 1982, p. 808, and Japan, 22 ILM, 1983, p. 102: see Brown, International Law of the Sea, vol. I, pp. 456 ff.

[387] The 1982 Agreement Concerning Interim Arrangements Relating to Polymetallic Nodules of the Deep Seabed (France, Federal Republic of Germany, UK, US), 21 ILM, 1982, p. 950.

[388] See also the Provisional Understanding Regarding Deep Seabed Mining (Belgium, France, Federal Republic of Germany, Italy, Japan, Netherlands, UK, US), 23 ILM, 1984, p. 1354.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

incompatible with the 1982 Convention and its related resolutions, 'shall not be recognised'.[389]

The 1994 Agreement on Implementation of the Seabed Provisions of the Convention on the Law of the Sea[390]

Attempts to ensure the universality of the 1982 Convention system and thus prevent the development of conflicting deep seabed regimes began in earnest in 1990 in consultations sponsored by the UN Secretary-General, with more flexibility being shown by states.[391] Eventually, the 1994 Agreement emerged. The states parties undertake in article 1 to implement Part XI of the 1982 Convention in accordance with the Agreement. By article 2, the Agreement and Part XI are to be interpreted and applied together as a single instrument and, in the event of any inconsistency, the provisions in the former document are to prevail. States can only express their consent to become bound by the Agreement if they at the same time or previously express their consent to be bound by the Convention. Thus, conflicting systems operating with regard to the seabed became impossible. The Agreement also provides in article 7 for provisional application if it had not come into force on 16 November 1994 (the date on which the Convention came into force).[392] The Agreement was thus able to be provisionally applied by states that had consented to its adoption in the General Assembly, unless they had otherwise notified the depositary (the UN Secretary-General) in writing; by states and entities signing the agreement, unless they had otherwise notified the depositary in writing; by states and entities which had consented to its provisional application

[389] See Law of the Sea Bulletin, no. 6, October 1985, p. 85. But see the 1987 Agreement on the Resolution of Practical Problems, 26 ILM, 1987, p. 1502. This was an attempt by the states involved to prevent overlapping claims.

[390] 33 ILM, 1994, p. 1309. See also B. H. Oxman, 'The 1994 Agreement and the Convention', 88 AJIL, 1994, p. 687; L. B. Sohn, 'International Law Implications of the 1994 Agreement', ibid., p. 696; J. I. Charney, 'US Provisional Application of the 1994 Deep Seabed Agreement', ibid., p. 705; D. H. Anderson, 'Further Efforts to Ensure Universal Participation in the United Nations Convention on the Law of the Sea', 43 ICLQ, 1994, p. 886, and Report of the UN Secretary-General, A/50/713, 1 November 1995.

[391] See e.g. D. H. Anderson, 'Efforts to Ensure Universal Participation in the United Nations Convention on the Law of the Sea', 42 ICLQ, 1993, p. 654, and Brown, International Law of the Sea, vol. I, p. 462.

[392] The Agreement came into force on 28 July 1996, being thirty days after the date on which forty states had established their consent to be bound under procedures detailed in articles 4 and 5.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

by so notifying the depositary in writing; and by states which had acceded to the Agreement.

The Annex to the Agreement addresses a number of issues raised by developed states. In particular, it is provided that all organs and bodies established under the Convention and Agreement are to be cost-effective and based upon an evolutionary approach taking into account the functional needs of such organs or bodies; a variety of institutional arrangements are detailed with regard to the work of the International Seabed Authority (section 1); the work of the Enterprise is to be carried out initially by the Secretariat of the Authority and the Enterprise shall conduct its initial deep seabed mining operations through joint ventures that accord with sound commercial principles (section 2); decision-making in the Assembly and Council of the Authority is to comply with a series of specific rules[393] (section 3); the Assembly upon the recommendation of the Council may conduct a review at any time of matters referred to in article 155(1) of the Convention, notwithstanding the provisions of that article as a whole (section 4); and transfer of technology to the Enterprise and developing states is to be sought on fair and reasonable commercial terms on the open market or through joint-venture arrangements (section 5).[394]

The International Seabed Authority [395]

The Authority is the autonomous organisation which the states parties to the 1982 Convention have agreed is to organise and control activities in the Area, particularly with a view to administering its resources.[396] It became fully operational in June 1996. The principal organs of the Authority are the Assembly, the Council and the Secretariat. Also to be noted are the Legal and Technical Commission and the Finance Committee. The [393] Note especially the increase in the role of the Council vis-à-vis the Assembly with regard to general policy matters. Note also that the Agreement guarantees a seat on the Council for the state 'on the date of entry into force of the Convention having the largest economy in terms of gross domestic product', i.e. the US (section 3, para. 15a), and establishes groups of states on the Council of states with particular interests (section 3, paras. 10 and 15).

[394] Thus, the provisions in the Convention on the mandatory transfer of technology are not to apply (section 5, para. 2). Note also that provisions in the Convention regarding production ceilings and limitations, participation in commodity agreements, etc. are not to apply (section 6, para. 7).

[395] Details of the Authority may be found at www.isa.org.jm/en/default.htm.

[396] Article 157.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

Assembly is composed of all members of the Authority, i.e. all states parties to the Convention, and at July 2007 there were 155.[397] The Assembly is the supreme organ of the Authority with powers to elect inter alia the Council, Secretary-General and the members of the Governing Boards of the Enterprise and its Director-General, to establish subsidiary organs and to assess the contributions of members to the administrative budget. It has the power to establish the general policy of the Authority.[398] The Council consists of thirty-six members elected by the Assembly in accordance with certain criteria.[399] The Council is the executive organ of the Authority and has the power to establish the specific policies to be pursued by the Authority.[400] The Council has two organs, an Economic Planning Commission and a Legal and Technical Commission.[401] The

[397] See www.isa.org.jm/en/about/members/states. See also article 159(1).

[398] Article 160. However, the effect of the 1994 Agreement on Implementation has been to reduce the power of the Assembly in favour of the Council by providing in Annex, section 3 that decisions of the Assembly in areas for which the Council also has competence or on any administrative, budgetary or financial matter be based upon the recommendations of the Council, and if these recommendations are not accepted, the matter has to be returned to the Council. Further, this section also provides that, as a general rule, decision-making in the organs of the Authority should be by consensus.

[399] Article 161(1) provides for members to be elected in the following order: (a) four members from among those states parties which, during the last five years for which statistics are available, have either consumed more than 2 per cent of total world consumption or have had net imports of more than 2 per cent of total world imports of the commodities produced from the categories of minerals to be derived from the Area, and in any case one state from the Eastern European (Socialist) region, as well as the largest consumer; (b) four members from among the eight states parties which have the largest investments in preparation for and in the conduct of activities in the Area, either directly or through their nationals, including at least one state from the Eastern European (Socialist) region; (c) four members from among states parties which, on the basis of production in areas under their jurisdiction, are major net exporters of the categories of minerals to be derived from the Area, including at least two developing states whose exports of such minerals have a substantial bearing upon their economies; (d) six members from among developing states parties, representing special interests. The special interests to be represented shall include those of states with large populations, states which are landlocked or geographically disadvantaged, states which are major importers of the categories of minerals to be derived from the Area, states which are potential producers of such minerals, and least developed states; (e) eighteen members elected according to the principle of ensuring an equitable geographical distribution of seats in the Council as a whole, provided that each geographical region shall have at least one member elected under this subparagraph. For this purpose, the geographical regions shall be Africa, Asia, Eastern European (Socialist), Latin America and Western European and Others.

[400] Article 162. In some cases, Council decisions have to be adopted by consensus and in others by two-thirds majority vote: see article 161.

[401] Articles 163–5. As to the secretariat, see articles 166–9.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

organ of the Authority actually carrying out activities in the Area is the Enterprise.[402]

Settlement of disputes[403]

The 1982 Convention contains detailed and complex provisions regarding the resolution of law of the sea disputes. Part XV, section 1 lays down the general provisions. Article 279 expresses the fundamental obligation to settle disputes peacefully in accordance with article 2(3) of the UN Charter and using the means indicated in article 33,[404] but the parties are able to choose methods other than those specified in the Convention.[405] States of the European Union, for example, have agreed to submit fisheries disputes amongst member states to the European Court of Justice under the EC Treaty.

Article 283 of the Convention provides that where a dispute arises, the parties are to proceed 'expeditiously to an exchange of views regarding its settlement by negotiation or other peaceful means' and article 284 states that the parties may resort if they wish to conciliation procedures, in which case a conciliation commission will be established, whose report will be non-binding.[406] Where no settlement is reached by means freely chosen by the parties, the compulsory procedures laid down in Part XV, section 2 become operative.[407] Upon signing, ratifying or acceding to the Convention, or at any time thereafter, a state may choose one of the following means of dispute settlement: the International Tribunal for the Law of the Sea,[408] the International Court of Justice,[409] an arbitral tribunal

[402] See article 170 and Annex IV.

[403] See e.g. N. Klein, Dispute Settlement in the UN Convention on the Law of the Sea, Cambridge, 2005; J. G. Merrills, International Dispute Settlement, 4th edn, Cambridge, 2005, chapter 8; Churchill and Lowe, Law of the Sea, chapter 19; J. Collier and A. V. Lowe, The Settlement of Disputes in International Law, Oxford, 1999, chapter 5; A. E. Boyle, 'Dispute Settlement and the Law of the Sea Convention: Problems of Fragmentation and Jurisdiction', 46 ICLQ, 1997, p. 37; R. Ranjeva, 'Le Règlement des Différends' in Traité du Nouveau Droit de la Mer (eds. R. J. Dupuy and D. Vignes), Paris, 1985, p. 1105; J. P. Quéneudec, 'Le Choix des Procédures de Règlement des Différends selon la Convention des NU sur le Droit de la Mer' in Mélanges Virally, Paris, 1991, p. 383, and A. O. Adede, The System for the Settlement of Disputes under the United Nations Convention on the Law of the Sea, Dordrecht, 1987.

[404] See further below, chapter 18. [405] Article 280.

[406] See Annex V, Section 1. [407] See articles 286 and 287.

[408] Annex VI. [409] See below, chapter 19.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

under Annex VII[410] or a special arbitral tribunal under Annex VIII for specific disputes.[411]

There are some exceptions to the obligation to submit a dispute to one of these mechanisms in the absence of a freely chosen resolution process by the parties. Article 297(1) provides that disputes concerning the exercise by a coastal state of its sovereign rights or jurisdiction in the exclusive economic zone may only be subject to the compulsory settlement procedure in particular cases.[412] Article 297(2) provides that while disputes concerning marine scientific research shall be settled in accordance with section 2 of the Convention, the coastal state is not obliged to accept the submission to such compulsory settlement of any dispute arising out of the exercise by the coastal state of a right or discretion to regulate, authorise and conduct marine scientific research in its economic zone or on its continental shelf or a decision to order suspension or cessation of such research.[413] Article 297(3) provides similarly that while generally disputes with regard to fisheries shall be settled in accordance with section 2, the coastal state shall not be obliged to accept the submission to compulsory settlement of any dispute relating to its sovereign rights with respect to the [410] This procedure covers both disputes concerning states and those concerning international organisations, such as the European Union. A five-person tribunal is chosen by the parties from a panel to which each state party may make up to four nominations. Annex VII arbitrations have included Australia and New Zealand v. Japan (Southern Bluefin Tuna), Award of 4 August 2000, 119 ILR, p. 508; Ireland v. UK (Mox) 126 ILR, pp. 257 ff. and 310 ff.; Barbados v. Trinidad and Tobago, Award of 11 April 2006 and Guyana v. Suriname, Award of 17 September 2007. The latter cases may be found on the Permanent Court of Arbitration website, www.pca-cpa.org.

[411] I.e. relating to fisheries, protection and preservation of the marine environment, marine scientific research, or navigation, including pollution from vessels and by dumping: see article 1, Annex VIII. The nomination process is slightly different from Annex VII situations.

[412] That is, with regard to an allegation that a coastal state has acted in contravention of the provisions of the Convention in regard to the freedoms and rights of navigation, overflight or the laying of submarine cables and pipelines, or in regard to other internationally lawful uses of the sea specified in article 58; or when it is alleged that a state in exercising these freedoms, rights or uses has acted in contravention of the Convention or of laws or regulations adopted by the coastal state in conformity with the Convention and other rules of international law not incompatible with the Convention; or when it is alleged that a coastal state has acted in contravention of specified international rules and standards for the protection and preservation of the marine environment which are applicable to the coastal state and which have been established by the Convention or through a competent international organisation or diplomatic conference in accordance with the Convention.

[413] In such a case, the dispute is to be submitted to the compulsory conciliation provisions under Annex V, section 2, provided that the conciliation commission shall not call in question the exercise by the coastal state of its discretion to designate specific areas as referred to in article 246, paragraph 6, or of its discretion to withhold consent in accordance with article 246, paragraph 5.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

living resources in the exclusive economic zone or their exercise, including its discretionary powers for determining the allowable catch, its harvesting capacity, the allocation of surpluses to other states and the terms and conditions established in its conservation and management laws and regulations.[414] There are also three situations with regard to which states may opt out of the compulsory settlement procedures.[415]

The Convention also provides for a Seabed Disputes Chamber of the International Tribunal for the Law of the Sea,[416] which under article 187 shall have jurisdiction with regard to matters concerning the Deep Seabed and the International Seabed Authority. By article 188, inter-state disputes concerning the exploitation of the international seabed are to be submitted only to the Seabed Disputes Chamber.

One problem that has arisen has been where a dispute arises under one or more conventions including the 1982 Law of the Sea Convention, and the impact that this may have upon dispute settlement. In the Southern Bluefin Tuna case between Australia and New Zealand on the one hand and Japan on the other,[417] the arbitration tribunal had to consider the effect of the 1993 Convention for the Conservation of Southern Bluefin Tuna, the binding settlement procedures of which require the consent of all parties to the dispute. However, these states were also parties to the 1982 Convention, the provisions of which concerning highly migratory fish stocks (which included the southern bluefin tuna) referred to compulsory arbitration.[418] The parties were unable to agree within the Commission established by the 1993 Convention and the applicants invoked the compulsory arbitration provisions of the 1982 Convention. The International Tribunal for the Law of the Sea indicated provisional measures[419] and the matter went to arbitration. Japan argued that the dispute was one under the 1993 Convention so that its consensual settlement procedures were applicable[420] and not the compulsory procedures under the 1982 Convention. The tribunal held that the dispute was one common to both Conventions and that there was only one dispute. Article 281(1) of the 1982 Convention provides essentially for the priority of procedures agreed to by the parties, so that the 1982 Convention's provisions would [414] In such a case, the dispute in certain cases is to be submitted to the compulsory conciliation provisions under Annex V, section 2: see further article 297(3)(b).

[415] Disputes concerning delimitation and claims to historic waters; disputes concerning military and law enforcement activities, and disputes in respect of which the Security Council is exercising its functions: see article 298(1).

[416] See Annex VI, section 4. [417] 119 ILR, p. 508. [418] See Part XV and Annex VII.

[419] 117 ILR, p. 148. The International Tribunal called for arbitration and stated that the latter tribunal would prima facie have jurisdiction.

[420] See article 16 of the 1993 Convention.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

only apply where no settlement had been reached using the other means agreed by the parties and the agreement between the parties does not exclude any further procedure. Since article 16 of the 1993 Convention fell within the category of procedures agreed by the parties and thus within article 281(1), the intent and thus the consequence of article 16 was to remove proceedings under that provision from the reach of the compulsory procedures of the 1982 Convention.[421] Accordingly, the extent to which the compulsory procedures of the 1982 Convention apply depends on the circumstances and, in particular, the existence and nature of any other agreement between the parties relating to peaceful settlement.[422]

Outside the framework of the 1982 Convention, states may adopt a variety of means of resolving disputes, ranging from negotiations, inquiries,[423] conciliation[424] and arbitration[425] to submission to the International Court of Justice.[426]

The International Tribunal for the Law of the Sea[427]

The Tribunal was established as one of the dispute settlement mechanisms under Part XV of the Law of the Sea Convention. The Statute of the [421] See 119 ILR, pp. 549–52.

[422] See also B. Oxman, 'Complementary Agreements and Compulsory Jurisdiction', 95 AJIL, 2001, p. 277. Note that the Arbitral Tribunal established under Annex VII of the Convention in the Mox case, between Ireland and the UK, suspended hearings on 13 June 2003 due to uncertainty as to whether relevant provisions of the Convention fell within the competence of the European Community or member states: see Order No. 3 of 24 June 2003 and Order No. 4 of 14 November 2003, 126 ILR, pp. 257 ff. and 310 ff. See also the decision of the European Court of Justice of 30 May 2006, Case C-459/03, Commission v. Ireland.

[423] E.g. the Red Crusader incident, 35 ILR, p. 485. See further on these mechanisms, below, chapters 18 and 19.

[424] E.g. the Jan Mayen Island Continental Shelf dispute, 20 ILM, 1981, p. 797; 62 ILR, p. 108.

[425] E.g. the Anglo-French Continental Shelf case, Cmnd 7438; 54 ILR, p. 6.

[426] E.g. the Anglo-Norwegian Fisheries case, ICJ Reports, 1951, p. 116; 18 ILR, p. 84; the North Sea Continental Shelf cases, ICJ Reports, 1969, p. 16; 41 ILR, p. 29 and others referred to in this chapter.

[427] See e.g. P. C. Rao and R. Khan, The International Tribunal for the Law of the Sea: Law and Practice, The Hague, 2001; P. C. Rao and P. Gautier, Rules of the International Tribunal for the Law of the Sea: A Commentary, The Hague, 2006; M. M. Marsit, Le Tribunal du Droit de la Mer, Paris, 1999; A. E. Boyle, 'The International Tribunal for the Law of the Sea and the Settlement of Disputes' in The Changing World of International Law in the 21st Century (eds. J. Norton, M. Andenas and M. Footer), The Hague, 1998; D. Anderson, 'The International Tribunal for the Law of the Sea', in Remedies in International Law (eds. M. D. Evans and S. V. Konstanidis), Oxford, 1998, p. 71; J. Collier and V. Lowe, The Settlement of Disputes in International Law, Oxford, 1999, chapter 5; Churchill and Lowe, Law of the Sea, chapter 19; Merrills, International Dispute Settlement, chapter 8; Nguyen Quoc Dinh et al., Droit International Public, p. 912, and G. Eiriksson, The International Tribunal for the Law of the Sea, The Hague, 2000. See also www.itlos.org.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

Tribunal[428] provides that it shall be composed of twenty-one independent members enjoying the highest reputation for fairness and integrity and of recognised competence in the field of the law of the sea, while the representation of the principal legal systems of the world and equitable geographical distribution are to be assured.[429] Judges are elected for nine-year terms by the states parties to the Convention.[430] The Statute also allows for the appointment of ad hoc judges. Article 17 provides that where the Tribunal includes a member of the nationality of one of the parties to the dispute, any other party may choose a person to participate as a member of the Tribunal. Where in a dispute neither or none of the parties have a judge of the same nationality, they may choose a person to participate as a member of the Tribunal.[431] The Tribunal may also, at the request of a party or of its own motion, decide to select no fewer than two scientific or technical experts to sit with it, but without the right to vote.[432]

The Tribunal, based in Hamburg, is open to states parties to the Convention[433] and to entities other than states parties in accordance with Part XI of the Convention, concerning the International Seabed Area, thereby including the International Seabed Authority, state enterprises and natural and juridical persons in certain circumstances,[434] or in any case submitted pursuant to any other agreement conferring jurisdiction on the Tribunal which is accepted by all the parties to that case.[435] The jurisdiction of the Tribunal comprises all disputes and all applications submitted to it in accordance with the Convention and all matters specifically provided for in any other agreement which confers jurisdiction on the Tribunal.[436] The provisions of the Convention and other rules of international law not

[428] Annex VI of the Convention.

[429] Article 2 of the Statute. A quorum of eleven judges is required to constitute the Tribunal, article 13.

[430] Article 5.

[431] See also articles 8, 9 and 18–22 of the Rules of the Tribunal 1997 (as amended in March and September 2001). Note, in particular, that under article 22 of the Rules, a non-state entity may choose an ad hoc judge in certain circumstances.

[432] Article 289 of the Convention and article 15 of the Rules.

[433] Article 292(1) of the Convention and article 20(1) of the Statute. This would include the European Community (now Union): see article 1(2) of the Convention.

[434] See in particular articles 153 and 187 of the Convention. See also A. Serdy, 'Bringing Taiwan into the International Fisheries Fold: The Legal Personality of a Fishing Entity', 75 BYIL, 2004, p. 183.

[435] Article 20(2) of the Statute.

[436] Article 21. Where the parties to a treaty in force covering law of the sea matters so agree, any disputes concerning the interpretation or application of such treaty may be submitted to the Tribunal, article 22.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

incompatible with the Convention constitute the applicable law of the Tribunal.[437]

Pursuant to Part XI, section 5 of the Convention and article 14 of the Statute, a Seabed Disputes Chamber of the Tribunal has been formed with jurisdiction to hear disputes regarding activities in the international seabed area. The Chamber is composed of eleven judges representing the principal legal systems of the world and with equitable geographical distribution.[438] Ad hoc chambers consisting of three judges may be established if a party to a dispute so requests. The composition is determined by the Seabed Disputes Chamber with the approval of the parties to the dispute.[439] The Chamber shall apply the provisions of the Convention and other rules of international law not incompatible with the Convention,[440] together with the rules, regulation and procedures of the International Seabed Authority adopted in accordance with the Convention and the terms of contracts concerning activities in the International Seabed Area in matters relating to those contracts.[441] The Seabed Disputes Chamber has jurisdiction to give advisory opinions at the request of the Assembly or the Council of the International Seabed Authority on legal questions arising within the scope of their activities and such opinions shall be given as a matter of urgency.[442] In addition, the Tribunal may create such chambers of three or more persons as it considers necessary[443] and a five-person Chamber of Summary Procedure.[444]

[437] Article 293 of the Convention and article 23 of the Statute.

[438] See article 35. The Chamber shall be open to the states parties, the International Seabed Authority and the other entities referred to in Part XI, section 5 of the Convention. Ad hoc judges may be chosen: see articles 23–5 of the Rules.

[439] Articles 187 and 188 of the Convention and article 36 of the Statute. See also article 27 of the Rules.

[440] Article 293 of the Convention.

[441] Article 38 of the Statute. The decisions of the Seabed Chamber shall be enforceable in the territories of the states parties in the same manner as judgments or orders of the highest court of the state party in whose territory the enforcement is sought, article 39. Articles 115–23 of the Rules deal with procedural issues in contentious cases before the Chamber.

[442] See articles 159(10) and 191. See also articles 130–7 of the Rules.

[443] See article 15(1). A Chamber for Fisheries Disputes (1997), a Chamber for Marine Environment Disputes (1997) and a Chamber for Maritime Delimitation Disputes (2007) have been formed under this provision. Under article 15(2), the Tribunal may form a chamber for dealing with a specific dispute if the parties so wish and a Chamber was formed in December 2000 to deal with the Swordfish Stocks dispute between Chile and the European Community. See also articles 29 and 30 and 107–9 of the Rules.

[444] Article 15(3). This may hear cases on an accelerated procedure basis and provisional measures applications when the full Tribunal is not sitting: see article 25(2). See also article 28 of the Rules.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

The Tribunal[445] and the Seabed Disputes Chamber have the power to prescribe provisional measures in accordance with article 290 of the Convention.[446] Article 290 provides inter alia that if a dispute has been duly submitted to the Tribunal, which considers that prima facie it has jurisdiction, any provisional measures considered appropriate under the circumstances to preserve the respective rights of the parties to the dispute or to prevent serious harm to the marine environment pending the final decision may be prescribed. Such provisional measures may be modified or revoked as soon as the circumstances justifying them have changed or ceased to exist. Further, the Tribunal or, with respect to activities in the International Seabed Area, the Seabed Disputes Chamber, may prescribe, modify or revoke provisional measures if it considers that prima facie the tribunal which is to be constituted would have jurisdiction and that the urgency of the situation so requires. Once constituted, the tribunal to which the dispute has been submitted may modify, revoke or affirm those provisional measures. The Convention also makes it clear that provisional measures are binding, requiring the parties to the dispute to comply promptly with any provisional measures prescribed under article 290.[447]

Where a party does not appear before the Tribunal, the other party may request that the Tribunal continue the hearings and reach a decision.[448] Before so doing, the Tribunal must satisfy itself not only that it has jurisdiction, but also that the claim is well founded in fact and law.[449] A party may present a counter-claim in its counter-memorial, provided that it is directly concerned with the subject-matter of the claim of the other party and that it comes within the jurisdiction of the Tribunal.[450] The Statute provides also for third-party intervention, where a state party considers that it has an interest of a legal nature which may be affected by the decision in any dispute. It is for the Tribunal to decide on this request and, if [445] See also the Resolution on Internal Judicial Practice, 31 October 1997, and articles 40–2 of the Rules.

[446] Article 25(1) of the Statute. See also articles 89–95 of the Rules. See e.g. S. Rosenne, Provisional Measures in International Law: The International Court of Justice and the International Tribunal for the Law of the Sea, The Hague, 2004.

[447] See article 290(6) of the Convention. Article 95(1) of the Rules declares that each party is required to submit to the Tribunal a report and information on compliance with any provisional measures prescribed.

[448] See generally Part III of the Rules concerning the procedure of the Tribunal. As to preliminary proceedings and preliminary objections, see article 294 of the Convention and articles 96 and 97 of the Rules.

[449] Article 28.

[450] See article 98 of the Rules.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

such a request is granted, the decision of the Tribunal in the dispute shall be binding upon the intervening state party in so far as it relates to matters in respect of which that state party intervened.[451] This is different from the equivalent provision relating to the International Court of Justice and thus should avoid the anomalous position of the non-party intervener.[452] There is, however, a right to intervene in cases where the interpretation or application of the Convention is in question.[453] Decisions of the Tribunal are final and binding as between the parties to the dispute.[454]

The Tribunal also has jurisdiction to give advisory opinions on a legal question if an international agreement related to the purposes of the Convention specifically provides for the submission to the Tribunal of a request for such an opinion.[455]

The Tribunal has heard a number of cases since its first case in 1997. Most of these cases have concerned article 292 of the Convention which provides that where a state party has detained a vessel flying the flag of another state party and has not complied with the prompt release requirement upon payment of a reasonable bond or other financial security, the question of release from detention may be submitted to the Tribunal.[456] In the Camouco case,[457] for example, the Tribunal discussed the scope of the article and held that it would not be logical to read into it the requirement of exhaustion of local remedies. Article 292 provided for an independent remedy and no limitation should be read into it that would have the effect of defeating its very object and purpose.[458] The Tribunal found a violation of article 292 in the case of the Volga, where it was held that the bond set for the release of the vessel in question, while reasonable in terms of the financial condition, was not reasonable in that the non-financial conditions set down by the Respondent with regard to the vessel carrying a vessel monitoring system (VMS) and the submission of information about the owner of the ship could not be considered as [451] Article 31. See also articles 99–104 of the Rules.

[452] See below, chapter 19, p. 1097.
[453] Article 32.
[454] Article 33. In the case of a dispute as to the meaning or scope of the decision, the Tribunal shall construe it upon the request of any party. See also articles 126–9 of the Rules.
[455] Article 138 of the Rules. In such cases, articles 130–7 of the Rules concerning the giving of advisory opinions by the Seabed Disputes Chamber shall apply mutatis mutandis.
[456] See e.g. Y. Tanaka, 'Prompt Release in the United Nations Convention on the Law of the Sea: Some Reflections on the Itlos Jurisprudence', 51 NILR, 2004, p. 237, and D. R. Rothwell and T. Stephens, 'Illegal Southern Ocean Fishing and Prompt Release: Balancing Coastal and Flag State Rights and Interests', 53 ICLQ, 2004, p. 171.
[457] Case No. 5, judgment of 7 February 2000. See 125 ILR, p. 164.
[458] Ibid., paras. 57 and 58.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

components of the bond or other financial security for the purposes of article 292 of the Convention. It was also held that the circumstances of the seizure of the vessel were not relevant to a consideration of a breach of article 292, while the proceeds of the catch were irrelevant to the bond issue.[459] In the Hoshinmaru (Japan v. Russia) case, the Tribunal held that it was not reasonable that a bond should be set on the basis of the maximum penalties applicable to the owner and the Master, nor was it reasonable that the bond should be calculated on the basis of the confiscation of the vessel, given the circumstances of the case. In setting a reasonable bond for the release of the vessel the Tribunal stated that the amount of the bond should be proportionate to the gravity of the alleged offences.[460]

The Mox case[461] was a case where the parties (Ireland and the UK) appeared before the Tribunal at the provisional measures stage under article 290(5), while later moving to an arbitral tribunal for the merits. The Tribunal prescribed provisional measures requiring the parties to exchange information regarding the possible consequences for the Irish Sea arising out of the commissioning of the Mox nuclear plant, to monitor the risks or the effects of the operation of the plant and to devise, as appropriate, measures to prevent any pollution of the marine environment which might result from the operation of the plant. In so doing, the Tribunal specifically mentioned statements made by the UK concerning inter alia transportation of radioactive material, which the Tribunal characterised as 'assurances' and which it placed 'on record'.[462]

The Saiga (No. 2) (Saint Vincent and the Grenadines v. Guinea) case[463] has been one of the most important decisions to date made by the Tribunal.[464] Issues addressed included the impermissibility of extending customs jurisdiction into the exclusive economic zone, the failure to comply with the rules underpinning the right of hot pursuit under article 111 of the Law of the Sea Convention, the use of force and admissibility issues such as the registration of the vessel and the need for a 'genuine link'.[465]

[459] 126 ILR, p. 433. See also as to prompt release issues, the Juno Trader 128 ILR, p. 267.
[460] See www.itlos.org/start2_en.html (6 August 2007).
[461] Case No. 10, Order of 3 December 2001. See 126 ILR, pp. 257 ff. and 310 ff.
[462] Ibid., paras. 78–80. See also as to provisional measures, the Land Reclamation (Malaysia v. Singapore) case, 126 ILR, p. 487.
[463] Case No. 2, judgment of 1 July 1999. See 120 ILR, p. 143.
[464] See e.g. B. H. Oxman and V. Bantz, 'The M/V "Saiga" (No. 2) (St Vincent and the Grenadines v. Guinea)', 94 AJIL, 2000, p. 40, and L. de la Fayette, 'The M/V Saiga (No. 2) Case', 49 ICLQ, 2000, p. 467.
[465] See above, p. 611.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

The Tribunal's part in the Southern Bluefin Tuna case[466] was limited to the grant of provisional measures.[467] Thereafter the matter went to arbitration.[468] As far as the Tribunal was concerned, this was the first case applying article 290(5) of the Law of the Sea Convention regarding the grant of provisional measures pending the constitution of an arbitral tribunal to which the dispute had been submitted. The Tribunal thus had to satisfy itself that prima facie the arbitral tribunal would have jurisdiction.[469] This the Tribunal was able to do and the measures it prescribed included setting limits on the annual catches of the fish in question. The Tribunal's judgment in the application for prompt release in the Grand Prince case[470] focused on jurisdiction and, in particular, whether the requirements under article 91 of the Law of the Sea Convention regarding nationality of ships had been fulfilled.[471] The Tribunal emphasised that, like the International Court, it had to satisfy itself that it had jurisdiction to hear the application and thus possessed the right to deal with all aspects of jurisdiction, whether or not they had been expressly raised by the parties.[472] The Tribunal concluded that the documentary evidence submitted by the applicant failed to establish that it was the flag state of the vessel when the application was made, so that the Tribunal did not have jurisdiction to hear the case.[473]

Suggestions for further reading

D. Anderson, Modern Law of the Sea: Selected Essays, The Hague, 2007

R. Churchill and A. V. Lowe, The Law of the Sea, 3rd edn, Manchester, 1999

International Maritime Boundaries (eds. J. I. Charney and L. M. Alexander), Washington, vols. I–III, 1993–8, ibid. (eds. J. I. Charney and R. W. Smith), vol. IV, 2002 and ibid. (eds. D. A. Colson and R. W. Smith), vol. V, 2005, The Hague

Law of the Sea: Progress and Prospects (eds. D. Freestone, R. Barnes and D. Ong), Oxford, 2006

[466] Case Nos. 3 and 4, Order of 27 August 1999. See 117 ILR, p. 148.

[467] See e.g. R. Churchill, 'The Southern Bluefin Tuna Cases', 49 ICLQ, 2000, p. 979, and B. Kwiatkowska, 'The Southern Bluefin Tuna Cases', 15 International Journal of Marine and Coastal Law, 2000, p. 1 and 94 AJIL, 2000, p. 150.

[468] 119 ILR, p. 508. See e.g. A. E. Boyle, 'The Southern Bluefin Tuna Arbitration', 50 ICLQ, 2001, p. 447.

[469] See the Order, paras. 40 ff.; 117 ILR, pp. 148, 160. See also above, p. 637.

[470] Case No. 8, judgment of 20 April 2001. See 125 ILR, p. 272.

[471] Ibid., paras. 62 ff. [472] Ibid., para. 79. [473] Ibid., para. 93.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

12

Jurisdiction

Jurisdiction concerns the power of the state under international law to regulate or otherwise impact upon people, property and circumstances and reflects the basic principles of state sovereignty, equality of states and non-interference in domestic affairs.[1] Jurisdiction is a vital and indeed central feature of state sovereignty, for it is an exercise of authority which may alter or create or terminate legal relationships and obligations. It may be achieved by means of legislative, executive or judicial action. In each case, the recognised authorities of the state as determined by the legal system of that state perform certain functions permitted them which affect the life around them in various ways. In the UK, Parliament passes binding statutes, the courts make binding decisions and the administrative machinery of government has the power and jurisdiction (or legal authority) to enforce the rules of law. It is particularly necessary to distinguish between the capacity to make law, whether by legislative or executive or judicial action (prescriptive jurisdiction or the jurisdiction to prescribe) and the capacity to ensure compliance with such law whether by executive

[1] See e.g. C. E. Amerasinghe, Jurisdiction of International Tribunals, The Hague, 2003; Universal Jurisdiction: National Courts and the Prosecution of Serious Crimes under International Law (ed. S. Macedo), Philadelphia, 2004; L. Reydams, Universal Jurisdiction: International and Municipal Legal Perspectives, Oxford, 2002; La Saisine des Jurisdictions Internationales (eds. H. Ruiz Fabri and J.-M. Sorel), Paris, 2006; Y. Shany, The Competing Jurisdictions of International Courts and Tribunals, Oxford, 2003; M. Hirst, Jurisdiction and the Ambit of the Criminal Law, Oxford, 2003; M. Akehurst, 'Jurisdiction in International Law', 46 BYIL, 1972–3, p. 145; F. A. Mann, 'The Doctrine of Jurisdiction in International Law', 111 HR, 1964, p. 1, and Mann, 'The Doctrine of Jurisdiction in International Law Revisited After Twenty Years', 186 HR, 1984, p. 9; D. W. Bowett, 'Jurisdiction: Changing Problems of Authority over Activities and Resources', 53 BYIL, 1982, p. 1; R. Y. Jennings, 'Extraterritorial Jurisdiction and the United States Antitrust Laws', 33 BYIL, 1957, p. 146; Oppenheim's International Law (eds. R. Y. Jennings and A. D. Watts), 9th edn, London, 1992, pp. 456 ff.; I. Brownlie, Principles of Public International Law, 6th edn, Oxford, 2003, chapters 14 and 15; O. Schachter, International Law in Theory and Practice, Dordrecht, 1991, chapter 12, and R. Higgins, Problems and Process, Oxford, 1994, chapter 4. See also Third US Restatement of Foreign Relations Law, 1987, vol. I, part IV.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

action or through the courts (enforcement jurisdiction or the jurisdiction to enforce). Jurisdiction, although primarily territorial, may be based on other grounds, for example nationality, while enforcement is restricted by territorial factors.

To give an instance, if a man kills somebody in Britain and then manages to reach the Netherlands, the British courts have jurisdiction to try him, but they cannot enforce it by sending officers to the Netherlands to apprehend him. They must apply to the Dutch authorities for his arrest and dispatch to Britain. If, on the other hand, the murderer remains in Britain then he may be arrested and tried there, even if it becomes apparent that he is a German national. Thus, while prescriptive jurisdiction (or the competence to make law) may be exercised as regards events happening within the territorial limits irrespective of whether or not the actors are nationals, and may be founded on nationality as in the case of a British subject suspected of murder committed abroad who may be tried for the offence in the UK (if he is found in the UK, of course), enforcement jurisdiction is another matter entirely and is essentially restricted to the presence of the suspect in the territorial limits.[2]

However, there are circumstances in which it may be possible to apprehend a suspected murderer, but the jurisdictional basis is lacking. For example, if a Frenchman has committed a murder in Germany he cannot be tried for it in Britain, notwithstanding his presence in the country, although, of course, both France and Germany may apply for his extradition and return to their respective countries from Britain.

Thus, while jurisdiction is closely linked with territory it is not exclusively so tied. Many states have jurisdiction to try offences that have taken place outside their territory, and in addition certain persons, property and situations are immune from the territorial jurisdiction in spite of being situated or taking place there. Diplomats, for example, have extensive immunity from the laws of the country in which they are working[3] and various sovereign acts by states may not be questioned or overturned in the courts of a foreign country.[4]

The whole question of jurisdiction is complex, not least because of the relevance also of constitutional issues and conflict of laws rules. International law tries to set down rules dealing with the limits of a state's exercise

[2] Reference has also been made to the jurisdiction to adjudicate, whereby persons or things are rendered subject to the process of a state's court system: see Third US Restatement of Foreign Relations Law, p. 232.

[3] See below, chapter 13, p. 750. [4] Ibid., p. 697.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

of governmental functions while conflict of laws (or private international law) will attempt to regulate in a case involving a foreign element whether the particular country has jurisdiction to determine the question, and secondly, if it has, then the rules of which country will be applied in resolving the dispute.

The grounds for the exercise of jurisdiction are not identical in the cases of international law and conflict of laws rules. In the latter case, specific subjects may well be regulated in terms of domicile or residence (for instance as regards the recognition of foreign marriages or divorces) but such grounds would not found jurisdiction where international law matters were concerned.[5] Although it is by no means impossible or in all cases difficult to keep apart the categories of international law and conflict of laws, nevertheless the often different definitions of jurisdiction involved are a confusing factor.

One should also be aware of the existence of disputes as to jurisdictional competence within the area of constitutional matters. These problems arise in federal court structures, as in the United States, where conflicts as to the extent of authority of particular courts may arise.

While the relative exercise of powers by the legislative, executive and judicial organs of government is a matter for the municipal legal and political system, the extraterritorial application of jurisdiction will depend upon the rules of international law, and in this chapter we shall examine briefly the most important of these rules.

The principle of domestic jurisdiction[6]

It follows from the nature of the sovereignty of states that while a state is supreme internally, that is within its own territorial frontiers, it must not intervene in the domestic affairs of another nation. This duty of non-intervention within the domestic jurisdiction of states provides for the shielding of certain state activities from the regulation of international law. State functions which are regarded as beyond the reach of international legal control and within the exclusive sphere of state management include the setting of conditions for the grant of nationality

[5] See generally, G. C. Cheshire and P. M. North, Private International Law, 13th edn, London, 1999. Questions may also arise as to the conditions required for leave for service abroad: see e.g. Al-Adsani v. Government of Kuwait and Others 100 ILR, p. 465.

[6] See e.g. Brownlie, Principles, pp. 290 ff., and M. S. Rajan, United Nations and Domestic Jurisdiction, 2nd edn, London, 1961. See further above, chapter 4.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

and the elaboration of the circumstances in which aliens may enter the country.

However, the influence of international law is beginning to make itself felt in areas hitherto regarded as subject to the state's exclusive jurisdiction. For example, the treatment by a country of its own nationals is now viewed in the context of international human rights regulations, although in practice the effect of this has often been disappointing.[7]

Domestic jurisdiction is a relative concept, in that changing principles of international law have had the effect of limiting and reducing its extent[8] and in that matters of internal regulation may well have international repercussions and thus fall within the ambit of international law. This latter point has been emphasised by the International Court of Justice. In the Anglo-Norwegian Fisheries case[9] it was stressed that:

> [a]lthough it is true that the act of delimitation [of territorial waters] is necessarily a unilateral act, because only the coastal state is competent to undertake it, the validity of the delimitation with regard to other states depends upon international law.[10]

The principle was also noted in the Nottebohm case,[11] where the Court remarked that while a state may formulate such rules as it wished regarding the acquisition of nationality, the exercise of diplomatic protection upon the basis of nationality was within the purview of international law. In addition, no state may plead its municipal laws as a justification for the breach of an obligation of international law.[12]

Accordingly, the dividing line between issues firmly within domestic jurisdiction on the one hand, and issues susceptible to international legal regulation on the other, is by no means as inflexible as at first may appear.

Article 2(7) of the UN Charter declares that:

> [n]othing contained in the present Charter shall authorise the United Nations to intervene in matters which are essentially within the domestic jurisdiction of any state or shall require the members to submit such matters to settlement under the present Charter.

[7] See above, chapters 6 and 7.

[8] Whether a matter is or is not within the domestic jurisdiction of states is itself a question for international law: see Nationality Decrees in Tunis and Morocco case, PCIJ, Series B, No. 4, 1923, pp. 7, 23–4; 2 AD, pp. 349, 352.

[9] ICJ Reports, 1951, p. 116; 18 ILR, p. 86.

[10] ICJ Reports, 1951, p. 132; 18 ILR, p. 95.

[11] ICJ Reports, 1955, pp. 4, 20–1; 22 ILR, pp. 349, 357.

[12] See above, chapter 4, p. 133.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

This paragraph, intended as a practical restatement and reinforcement of domestic jurisdiction, has constantly been reinterpreted in the decades since it was first enunciated. It has certainly not prevented the United Nations from discussing or adopting resolutions relating to the internal policies of member states and the result of over fifty years of practice has been the further restriction and erosion of domestic jurisdiction.

In the late 1940s and 1950s, the European colonial powers fought a losing battle against the United Nations debate and adoption of resolutions concerning the issues of self-determination and independence for their colonies. The involvement of the United Nations in human rights matters is constantly deepening and, until their disappearance, South Africa's domestic policies of apartheid were continually criticised and condemned. The expanding scope of United Nations concern has succeeded in further limiting the extent of the doctrine of domestic jurisdiction.[13] Nevertheless, the concept does retain validity in recognising the basic fact that state sovereignty within its own territorial limits is the undeniable foundation of international law as it has evolved, and of the world political and legal system.[14]

Legislative, executive and judicial jurisdiction

Legislative jurisdiction[15] refers to the supremacy of the constitutionally recognised organs of the state to make binding laws within its territory. Such acts of legislation may extend abroad in certain circumstances.[16] The state has legislative exclusivity in many areas. For example, a state lays down the procedural techniques to be adopted by its various organs, such as courts, but can in no way seek to alter the way in which foreign courts operate. This is so even though an English court might refuse to recognise a judgment of a foreign court on the grounds of manifest bias. An English law cannot then be passed purporting to alter the procedural conditions under which the foreign courts operate.

[13] See e.g. R. Higgins, The Development of International Law Through the Political Organs of the United Nations, Oxford, 1963. See also the view of the British Foreign Secretary on 27 January 1993 that article 2(7) was 'increasingly eroded as humanitarian concerns prevail over the respect for each nation's right to manage or mis-manage its affairs and its subjects', UKMIL, 64 BYIL, 1993, p. 599.

[14] Note also the importance of the doctrine of the exhaustion of domestic remedies: see above, chapter 6, p. 273.

[15] See e.g. Akehurst, 'Jurisdiction', pp. 179 ff.

[16] See further below, p. 688.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

International law accepts that a state may levy taxes against persons not within the territory of that state, so long as there is some kind of real link between the state and the proposed taxpayer, whether it be, for example, nationality or domicile.[17] A state may nationalise foreign-owned property situated within its borders,[18] but it cannot purport to take over foreign-owned property situated abroad. It will be obvious that such a regulation could not be enforced abroad, but the reference here is to the prescriptive jurisdiction, or capacity to pass valid laws.

The question of how far a court will enforce foreign legislation is a complicated one within, basically, the field of conflict of laws, but in practice it is rare for one state to enforce the penal or tax laws of another state.[19]

Although legislative supremacy within a state cannot be denied, it may be challenged. A state that adopts laws that are contrary to the provisions of international law, for example as regards the treatment of aliens or foreign property within the country, will render itself liable for a breach of international law on the international scene, and will no doubt find itself faced with protests and other action by the foreign state concerned. It is also possible that a state which abuses the rights it possesses to legislate for its nationals abroad may be guilty of a breach of international law. For example, if France were to order its citizens living abroad to drive only French cars, this would most certainly infringe the sovereignty and independence of the states in which such citizens were residing and would constitute an illegitimate exercise of French legislative jurisdiction.[20]

Executive jurisdiction relates to the capacity of the state to act within the borders of another state.[21] Since states are independent of each other and possess territorial sovereignty,[22] it follows that generally state

[17] Akehurst, 'Jurisdiction', pp. 179–80. [18] See below, chapter 14, p. 827.

[19] See e.g. Cheshire and North, Private International Law, chapter 8. English courts in general will not enforce the penal laws of foreign states. It will be for the court to decide what a foreign penal law is. See also Huntington v. Attrill [1893] AC 150, and Marshall CJ, The Antelope 10 Wheat 123 (1825). As far as tax laws are concerned, see Government of India v. Taylor [1955] AC 491; 22 ILR, p. 286. See in addition Attorney-General of New Zealand v. Ortiz [1982] 3 All ER 432; 78 ILR, p. 608, particularly Lord Denning, and ibid. [1983] 3 All ER 93 (House of Lords); 78 ILR, p. 631. See also Williams & Humbert v. W & H Trade Marks [1985] 2 All ER 619 and [1986] 1 All ER 129 (House of Lords); 75 ILR, p. 269, and Re State of Norway's Application [1986] 3 WLR 452 and [1989] 1 All ER 745, 760–2 (House of Lords). See also above, p. 186.

[20] See Mann, 'Doctrine of Jurisdiction', pp. 36–62. [21] See Akehurst, 'Jurisdiction', p. 147.

[22] See e.g. Lotus case, PCIJ, Series A, No. 10, 1927, p. 18; 4 AD, p. 153, and the Island of Palmas case, 2 RIAA, pp. 829, 838 (1928); 4 AD, p. 103.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

officials may not carry out their functions on foreign soil (in the absence of express consent by the host state)[23] and may not enforce the laws of their state upon foreign territory. It is also contrary to international law for state agents to apprehend persons or property abroad. The seizure of the Nazi criminal Eichmann by Israeli agents in Argentina in 1960 was a clear breach of Argentina's territorial sovereignty and an illegal exercise of Israeli jurisdiction.[24] Similarly, the unauthorised entry into a state of military forces of another state is clearly an offence under international law.

Judicial jurisdiction[25] concerns the power of the courts of a particular country to try cases in which a foreign factor is present. There are a number of grounds upon which the courts of a state may claim to exercise such jurisdiction. In criminal matters these range from the territorial principle to the universality principle and in civil matters from the mere presence of the defendant in the country to the nationality and domicile principles. It is judicial jurisdiction which forms the most discussed aspect of jurisdiction and criminal questions are the most important manifestation of this.

Civil jurisdiction[26]

Although jurisdiction in civil matters is enforced in the last resort by the application of the sanctions of criminal law, there are a number of differences between civil and criminal issues in this context.

In general it is fair to say that the exercise of civil jurisdiction has been claimed by states upon far wider grounds than has been the case in criminal matters, and the resultant reaction by other states much more muted.[27] This is partly due to the fact that public opinion is far more easily roused where a person is tried abroad for criminal offences than if a person is involved in a civil case.

In common law countries, such as the United States and Britain, the usual basis for jurisdiction in civil cases remains service of a writ upon the defendant within the country, even if the presence of the defendant

[23] This cannot, of course, be taken too far. An official would still be entitled, for example, to sign a contract: see Akehurst, 'Jurisdiction', p. 147.

[24] See further below, p. 680. [25] See e.g. Akehurst, 'Jurisdiction', pp. 152 ff.

[26] Ibid., pp. 170 ff.; Mann, 'Doctrine of Jurisdiction', pp. 49–51, and Brownlie, Principles, p. 298. See also Bowett, 'Jurisdiction', pp. 1–4.

[27] See e.g. Akehurst, 'Jurisdiction', pp. 152 ff.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

is purely temporary and coincidental.[28] In continental European countries on the other hand, the usual ground for jurisdiction is the habitual residence of the defendant in the particular state.

Many countries, for instance the Netherlands, Denmark and Sweden, will allow their courts to exercise jurisdiction where the defendant in any action possesses assets in the state, while in matrimonial cases the commonly accepted ground for the exercise of jurisdiction is the domicile or residence of the party bringing the action.[29]

In view of, for example, the rarity of diplomatic protests and the relative absence of state discussions, some writers have concluded that customary international law does not prescribe any particular regulations as regards the restriction of courts' jurisdiction in civil matters.[30]

Criminal jurisdiction[31]

International law permits states to exercise jurisdiction (whether by way of legislation, judicial activity or enforcement) upon a number of grounds.[32] There is no obligation to exercise jurisdiction on all, or any particular one, of these grounds. This would be a matter for the domestic system to decide. The importance of these jurisdictional principles is that they are accepted by all states and the international community as being consistent with international law. Conversely, attempts to exercise jurisdiction upon another ground would run the risk of not being accepted by another state.

The territorial principle

The territorial basis for the exercise of jurisdiction reflects one aspect of the sovereignty exercisable by a state in its territorial home, and is the indispensable foundation for the application of the series of legal [28] See e.g. Maharanee of Baroda v. Wildenstein [1972] 2 All ER 689. See also the Civil Jurisdiction and Judgments Act 1982.

[29] See, for example, the 1970 Hague Convention on the Recognition of Divorces and Legal Separations.

[30] See e.g. Akehurst, 'Jurisdiction', p. 177. Cf. Mann, 'Doctrine of Jurisdiction', pp. 49–51, and see also Brownlie, Principles, p. 298, and Bowett, 'Jurisdiction', pp. 3–4.

[31] See e.g. Akehurst, 'Jurisdiction', pp. 152 ff.; Mann, 'Doctrine of Jurisdiction', pp. 82 ff., and D. P. O'Connell, International Law, 2nd edn, London, 1970, vol. II, pp. 823–31.

[32] It was noted in the Wood Pulp case that 'the two undisputed bases on which state jurisdiction is founded in international law are territoriality and nationality', [1998] 4 CMLR 901 at 920; 96 ILR, p. 148.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

rights that a state possesses.[33] That a country should be able to legislate with regard to activities within its territory and to prosecute for offences committed upon its soil is a logical manifestation of a world order of independent states and is entirely understandable since the authorities of a state are responsible for the conduct of law and the maintenance of good order within that state. It is also highly convenient since in practice the witnesses to the crime will be situated in the country and more often than not the alleged offender will be there too.[34]

Thus, all crimes committed (or alleged to have been committed) within the territorial jurisdiction of a state may come before the municipal courts and the accused if convicted may be sentenced. This is so even where the offenders are foreign citizens.[35] The converse of the concept of territorial jurisdiction is that the courts of one country do not, as a general principle, have jurisdiction with regard to events that have occurred or are occurring in the territory of another state.[36] Further, there is a presumption that legislation applies within the territory of the state concerned and not outside.[37] One state cannot lay down criminal laws for another in [33] See Lord Macmillan, Compañía Naviera Vascongado v. Cristina SS [1938] AC 485, 496–7; 9 AD, pp. 250, 259. Note also Bowett's view that the 'dynamism and adaptability of the principle in recent years has been quite remarkable', 'Jurisdiction', p. 5, and Marshall CJ in The Schooner Exchange v. McFaddon 7 Cranch 116, 136 (1812) to the effect that '[t]he jurisdiction of the nation within its own territory is necessarily exclusive and absolute'. Donaldson LJ also pointed to the general presumption in favour of the territoriality of jurisdiction, R v. West Yorkshire Coroner, ex parte Smith [1983] QB 335, 358; 78 ILR, p. 550. See also, for the view that the concept of jurisdiction is essentially territorial, Banković v. Belgium, European Court of Human Rights, Judgment of 12 December 2001, paras. 63, 67 and 71; 123 ILR, pp. 110, 111 and 113, and Al-Skeini v. Secretary of State for Defence [2007] UKHL 26, para. 109, per Lord Brown; 133 ILR, p. 736.

[34] See e.g. the Separate Opinion of Judge Guillaume in Congo v. Belgium, ICJ Reports, 2002, pp. 3, 36; 128 ILR, pp. 60, 92.

[35] See e.g. Holmes v. Bangladesh Binani Corporation [1989] 1 AC 1112, 1137; 87 ILR, pp. 365, 380–1, per Lord Griffiths and Lord Browne-Wilkinson in Ex parte Pinochet (No. 3) [2000] 1 AC 147, 188; 119 ILR, p. 139.

[36] See e.g. Kaunda v. President of South Africa (CCT 23/04) [2004] ZACC 5 (4 August 2004) and R v. Cooke [1998] 2 SCR 597.

[37] See as to the UK, e.g. F. Bennion, Statutory Interpretation, 4th London, edn, 2002, p. 282. See also Clark (Inspector of Taxes) v. Oceanic Contractors Inc. [1983] 2 AC 130, 145, per Lord Scarman; Al Sabah v. Grupo Torras SA [2005] UKPC 1, [2005] 2 AC 333, para. 13, per Lord Walker of Gestingthorpe for the Privy Council; Lawson v. Serco Limited [2006] UKHL 3, [2006] ICR 250, para. 6, per Lord Hoffmann; Agassi v. Robinson (Inspector of Taxes) [2006] UKHL 23, [2006] 1 WLR 1380, paras. 16, 20, per Lord Scott of Foscote and Lord Walker of Gestingthorpe, and Al-Skeini v. Secretary of State for Defence [2007] UKHL 26, paras. 11 ff. per Lord Bingham. But note that in Masri v. Consolidated Contractors [2008] EWCA Civ 303 at para. 31, it was said that, 'nowadays the presumption has little

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

the absence of consent, nor may it enforce its criminal legislation in the territory of another state in the absence of consent.[38]

The principal ground for the exercise of criminal jurisdiction is, therefore, territoriality,[39] although it is not the only one. There are others, such as nationality, but the majority of criminal prosecutions take place in the territory where the crime has been committed. However, the territorial concept is more extensive than at first appears since it encompasses not only crimes committed wholly on the territory of a state but also crimes in which only part of the offence has occurred in the state: one example being where a person fires a weapon across a frontier killing somebody in the neighbouring state. Both the state where the gun was fired and the state where the injury actually took place have jurisdiction to try the offender, the former under the subjective territorial principle of territoriality and the latter under the objective territorial principle. Of course, which of the states will in the event exercise its jurisdiction will depend upon where the offender is situated, but the point remains that both the state where the offence was commenced and the state where the offence was concluded may validly try the offender.[40] For example, the Scottish Solicitor General made it clear that Scottish courts had jurisdiction with regard to the alleged bombers of the airplane which exploded over the Scottish town of Lockerbie as the locus of the force and it is simply a matter of construction'. See also Société Eram Shipping Co. Ltd v. Cie Internationale de Navigation [2004] 1AC 260, para. 54 (per Lord Hoffmann) and Office of Fair Trading v. Lloyds TSB Bank plc [2007] UKHL 48.

[38] See e.g. the Separate Opinion of Judge Guillaume, Congo v. Belgium, ICJ Reports, 2002, pp. 3, 36; 128 ILR, pp. 60, 92. However, in a situation of belligerent occupation, the occupier may exercise certain criminal enforcement powers with regard to the local population: see the Fourth Geneva Convention on the Protection of Civilian Persons, articles 64–78.

[39] See the statement by a Home Office Minister, noting that 'As a general rule, our courts have jurisdiction to try offences that are committed within this country's territory only. This is because generally speaking the Government believes that trials are best conducted in the jurisdiction in which they occurred not least because there are very real difficulties associated with the obtaining of evidence necessary to effectively prosecute here offences that are committed in foreign jurisdictions. The Government have no plans to depart from this general rule', HC Deb., vol. 445 col. 1419, Written Answer, 2 May 2006, UKMIL, 77 BYIL, 2006, p. 756.

[40] See e.g. the Lotus case, PCIJ, Series A, No. 10, 1927, pp. 23, 30; 4 AD, pp. 153, 159, and Judge Moore, ibid., p. 73; the Harvard Research Draft Convention on Jurisdiction with Respect to Crime, 29 AJIL, 1935, Supp., p. 480 (article 3), and Akehurst, 'Jurisdiction', pp. 152–3. See Lord Wilberforce, DPP v. Doot [1973] AC 807, 817; 57 ILR, pp. 117, 119 and R v. Berry [1984] 3 All ER 1008. See also Strassheim v. Dailey 221 US 280 (1911); US v. Columba-Colella 604 F.2d 356 and US v. Perez-Herrera 610 F.2d 289.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

offences.[41] Such a situation would also apply in cases of offences against immigration regulations and in cases of conspiracy where activities have occurred in each of two, or more, countries.[42] Accordingly, courts are likely to look at all the circumstances in order to determine in which jurisdiction the substantial or more significant part of the crime in question was committed.[43]

The nature of territorial sovereignty in relation to criminal acts was examined in the Lotus case.[44] The relevant facts may be summarised as follows. The French steamer, the Lotus, was involved in a collision on the high seas with the Boz-Kourt, a Turkish collier. The latter vessel sank and eight sailors and passengers died as a result. Because of this the Turkish authorities arrested the French officer of the watch (at the time of the incident) when the Lotus reached a Turkish port. The French officer was charged with manslaughter and France protested strongly against this action, alleging that Turkey did not have the jurisdiction to try the offence. The case came before the Permanent Court of International Justice, which was called upon to decide whether there existed an international rule prohibiting the Turkish exercise of jurisdiction.

Because the basis of international law is the existence of sovereign states, the Court regarded it as axiomatic that restrictions upon the [41] Before the International Court in oral pleadings at the provisional measures phase of the Lockerbie case, CR 92/3, pp. 11–12, UKMIL, 63 BYIL, 1992, p. 722. The trial of the two accused took place in the Netherlands, but in a facility that was deemed to be a Scottish court, with Scottish judges and lawyers and under Scots law: see e.g. A. Aust, 'Lockerbie: The Other Case', 49 ICLQ, 2000, p. 278, and for the verdict, see 94 AJIL, 2000, p. 405.

[42] See e.g. Board of Trade v. Owen [1957] AC 602, 634 and DPP v. Stonehouse [1977] 2 All ER 909, 916; 73 ILR, p. 252. In R v. Abu Hamza, The Times, 30 November 2006, the Court of Appeal (Criminal Division) held that it was an offence for a person to incite a foreign national in England and Wales to commit murder abroad. See also the Home Secretary speaking as to the Criminal Justice Bill on 14 April 1993, and noting that the effect of the proposed legislation would be to ensure that where a fraud had a significant connection with the UK, British courts would have jurisdiction, whether or not the final element of the crime occurred within the country, UKMIL, 64 BYIL, 1993, pp. 646–7. See G. Gilbert, 'Crimes Sans Frontières: Jurisdictional Problems in English Law', 63 BYIL, 1992, pp. 415, 430 ff. Note also Akehurst, who would restrict the operation of the doctrine so that jurisdiction could only be claimed by the state where the primary effect is felt, 'Jurisdiction', p. 154.

[43] See e.g. La Forest J in Libman v. The Queen (1985) 21 CCC (3d) 206 and Lord Griffiths in Somchai Liangsiriprasert v. The United States [1991] 1 AC 225; 85 ILR, p. 109.

[44] PCIJ, Series A, No. 10, 1927; 4 AD, p. 153. See e.g. Mann, 'Doctrine of Jurisdiction', pp. 33–6, 39, 92–3; J. W. Verzijl, The Jurisprudence of the World Court, Leiden, vol. I, 1965, pp. 73–98, and Schachter, 'International Law', p. 250. See also Oppenheim's International Law, p. 478.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

independence of states could not be presumed.[45] However, a state was not able to exercise its power outside its frontiers in the absence of a permissive rule of international law. But, continued the Court, this did not mean that 'international law prohibits a state from exercising jurisdiction in its own territory, in respect of any case which relates to acts which have taken place abroad and in which it cannot rely on some permissive rule of international law'. In this respect, states had a wide measure of discretion limited only in certain instances by prohibitive rules.[46] Because of this, countries had adopted a number of different rules extending their jurisdiction beyond the territorial limits so that 'the territoriality of criminal law, therefore, is not an absolute principle of international law and by no means coincides with territorial sovereignty'.[47] The Court rejected the French claim that the flag state had exclusive jurisdiction over the ship on the high seas, saying that no rule to that effect had emerged in international law, and stated that the damage to the Turkish vessel was equivalent to affecting Turkish territory so as to enable that country to exercise jurisdiction on the objective territorial principle, unrestricted by any rule of international law prohibiting this.[48]

The general pronouncements by the Court leading to the dismissal of the French contentions have been criticised by writers for a number of years, particularly with respect to its philosophical approach in treating states as possessing very wide powers of jurisdiction which could only be restricted by proof of a rule of international law prohibiting the action concerned.[49] It is widely accepted today that the emphasis lies the other way around.[50] It should also be noted that the Lotus principle as regards collisions at sea has been overturned by article 11(1) of the High Seas Convention, 1958, which emphasised that only the flag state or the state of which the alleged offender was a national has jurisdiction over sailors regarding incidents occurring on the high seas. The territorial principle covers crimes committed not only upon the land territory of the state but also upon the territorial sea and in certain cases upon the contiguous and

[45] PCIJ, Series A, No. 10, 1927, pp. 18–19; 4 AD, p. 155.
[46] PCIJ, Series A, No. 10, 1927, p. 19; 4 AD, p. 156.
[47] PCIJ, Series A, No. 10, 1927, p. 20.
[48] Ibid., p. 24; 4 AD, p. 158.
[49] See e.g. G. Fitzmaurice, 'The General Principles of International Law Considered from the Standpoint of the Rule of Law', 92 HR, 1957, pp. 1, 56–7, and H. Lauterpacht, International Law: Collected Papers, Cambridge, 1970, vol. I, pp. 488–9.
[50] See e.g. the Anglo-Norwegian Fisheries case, ICJ Reports, 1951, p. 116; 18 ILR, p. 86 and the Nottebohm case, ICJ Reports, 1955, p. 4; 22 ILR, p. 349.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

other zones and on the high seas where the state is the flag state of the vessel.[51]

As modern communications develop, so states evolve new methods of dealing with new problems. In the case of the Channel Tunnel, for example, providing a land link between the UK and France, these countries entered into an agreement whereby each state was permitted to exercise jurisdiction within the territory of the other. The Protocol concerning Frontier Controls and Policing, Co-operation in Criminal Justice, Public Safety and Mutual Assistance relating to the Channel Fixed Link was signed on 25 November 1991.[52] Under this Protocol, French and UK frontier control officers are empowered to work in specified parts of one another's territory. These areas are termed 'control zones' and are located at Cheriton, Coquelles, on board through trains and at international railway stations. The frontier control laws and regulations of one state thus apply and may be enforced in the other. In particular, the officers of the adjoining state shall in their exercise of national powers be permitted in the control zone in the host state to detain or arrest persons in accordance with the frontier control laws and regulations of the adjoining state. Article 38(2) of the Protocol provides that within the Fixed Link (i.e. the Tunnel), each state shall have jurisdiction and shall apply their own law when it cannot be ascertained with certainty where an offence has been committed or when an offence committed in the territory of one state is related to an offence committed on the territory of the other state or when an offence has begun in or has been continued in its own territory.[53] However, it is also provided that the state which first receives the person suspected of having committed such an offence shall have priority in exercising jurisdiction.

Another example of such cross-state territorial jurisdictional arrangements may be found in the Israel–Jordan Treaty of Peace, 1994. Annex I(b) and (c) of the Treaty, relating to the Naharayim/Baqura Area and the Zofar/Al-Ghamr Area respectively, provides for a special regime on a temporary basis. Although each area itself is recognised as under Jordan's sovereignty, with Israeli private land ownership rights and property

[51] See above, chapter 11.

[52] The Protocol was brought into force in the UK by the Channel Tunnel (International Arrangements) Order 1993: see e.g. UKMIL, 64 BYIL, 1993, p. 647. See also the Protocol of 29 May 2000, UKMIL, 71 BYIL, 2000, p. 589, and the Eurotunnel case, partial award of 30 January 2007, 132 ILR, p. 1.

[53] This is in addition to the normal territorial jurisdiction of the states within their own territory up to the frontier in the Tunnel under the sea, article 38(1).

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

interests, Jordan undertakes to grant unimpeded entry to, exit from, land usage and movement within the area to landowners and to their invitees or employees and not to apply its customs or immigration legislation to such persons. In particular, Jordan undertakes to permit with minimum formality the entry of uniformed Israeli police officers for the purpose of investigating crime or dealing with other incidents solely involving the landowners, their invitees or employees. Jordan undertakes also not to apply its criminal laws to activities in the area involving only Israeli nationals, while Israeli laws applying to the extraterritorial activities of Israelis may be applied to Israelis and their activities in the area. Israel could also take measures in the area to enforce such laws.[54]

Thus although jurisdiction is primarily and predominantly territorial, it is not inevitably and exclusively so and states are free to consent to arrangements whereby jurisdiction is exercised outside the national territory and whereby jurisdiction by other states is exercised within the national territory.[55]

A rather more unusual situation developed with regard to persons detained by the US in Guantanamo Bay Naval Base, situated in a part of the island of Cuba leased to the US pursuant to agreements made in 1903 and 1934. Following the conflict in Afghanistan in 2001 and thereafter, persons were taken to and held in Guantanamo Bay, which the US initially argued lay outside federal jurisdiction, being under US control but not sovereignty.[56] The Supreme Court, however, in Rasul v. Bush held that District Courts did have jurisdiction to hear petitions challenging the legality of detention of foreign nationals who had been detained abroad in connection with an armed conflict and held at Guantanamo Bay.[57]

[54] See also e.g. the treaties of 1903 and 1977 between the US and Panama concerning jurisdictional rights over the Panama Canal Zone and the NATO Status of Forces Agreement, 1951 regulating the exercise of jurisdiction of NATO forces based in other NATO states. The Boundary Commission in Eritrea/Ethiopia noted that it was not unknown for states to locate a checkpoint or customs post in the territory of a neighbouring state, Decision of 13 April 2002, 130 ILR, pp. 1, 112.

[55] Jurisdiction, and its concomitant international responsibility for acts done in the exercise of that jurisdiction, may also exist on the basis of the acts of officials committed abroad and on the basis of actual control of the territory in question in specific contexts. See e.g. Loizidou v. Turkey (Preliminary Objections), European Court of Human Rights, Series A, No. 310, 1995, p. 20; 103 ILR, p. 621. For the European Convention on Human Rights, see above, chapter 7 and for international responsibility, see below, chapter 14.

[56] Relying upon Johnson v. Eisenträger 339 US 763 (1950).

[57] 542 US 466 (2004). Congress then passed the Detainee Treatment Act of 2005, which denied jurisdiction concerning an application for habeas corpus with regard to an alien detainee at Guantanamo Bay. In Hamdan v. Rumsfeld 548 US 557, 576–7, the Court

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

The nationality principle [58]

Since every state possesses sovereignty and jurisdictional powers and since every state must consist of a collection of individual human beings, it is essential that a link between the two be legally established. That link connecting the state and the people it includes in its territory is provided by the concept of nationality.[59]

By virtue of nationality, a person becomes entitled to a series of rights ranging from obtaining a valid passport enabling travel abroad to being able to vote. In addition, nationals may be able to undertake various jobs (for example in the diplomatic service) that a non-national may be barred from. Nationals are also entitled to the protection of their state and to various benefits prescribed under international law. On the other hand, states may not mistreat the nationals of other states nor, ordinarily, conscript them into their armed forces, nor prosecute them for crimes committed outside the territory of the particular state.

held this provision inapplicable to pending cases. The Military Commissions Act of 2006 subsequently provided for denial of jurisdiction with regard to detained aliens determined to be an enemy combatant with effect from 11 September 2001, i.e. including applications pending at the time of the adoption of this Act. However, in Boumediene v. Bush 553 US – (2008), US Supreme Court, 12 June 2008, Slip Opinion, it was held that the doctrine of habeas corpus did apply, thus permitting applications by detained enemy combatants to the federal courts challenging their detention. Justice Kennedy, writing for the majority, while noting that, 'In considering both the procedural and substantive standards used to impose detention to prevent acts of terrorism, proper deference must be accorded to the political branches', declared that, 'The laws and Constitution are designed to survive, and remain in force, in extraordinary times.' Ibid., pp. 67 and 70.

[58] Akehurst, 'Jurisdiction', pp. 156–7; Harvard Research Draft Convention on Jurisdiction with Respect to Crime, 29 AJIL, 1935, Supp., pp. 519 ff.; M. Whiteman, Digest of International Law, Washington, DC, 1967, vol. VIII, pp. 1–22, 64–101, 105–13, 119–87; R. Donner, The Regulation of Nationality in International Law, 2nd edn, New York, 1995; D. Campbell and J. Fisher, International Immigration and Nationality Law, The Hague, 1993; M. J. Verwilghen, 'Conflits de Nationalité, Plurinationalité et Apatridie', 277 HR, 1999, p. 9; J. F. Rezek, 'Le Droit International de la Nationalité', 198 HR, 1986 III, p. 333; H. Silving, 'Nationality in Comparative Law', 5 American Journal of Comparative Law, 1956, p. 410, and Brownlie, Principles, p. 301 and chapter 19. See also Nguyen Quoc Dinh, P. Daillier and A. Pellet, Droit International Public, 7th edn, Paris, 2002, pp. 492 ff., and below, chapter 14, p. 808.

[59] Note that several instruments provide for a right to a nationality: see e.g. the Universal Declaration on Human Rights, 1948; the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights, 1966; the Convention on the Rights of the Child, 1989 and the European Convention on Nationality, 1997. See also A. Grossman, 'Nationality and the Unrecognised State', 50 ICLQ, 2001, p. 849.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

The concept of nationality is important since it determines the benefits to which persons may be entitled and the obligations (such as conscription) which they must perform. The problem is that there is no coherent, accepted definition of nationality in international law and only conflicting descriptions under the different municipal laws of states. Not only that, but the rights and duties attendant upon nationality vary from state to state.

Generally, international law leaves the conditions for the grant of nationality to the domestic jurisdiction of states.

This was the central point in the Nationality Decrees in Tunis and Morocco case.[60] This concerned a dispute between Britain and France over French nationality decrees which had the effect of giving French nationality to the children of certain British subjects. The Court, which had been requested to give an advisory opinion by the Council of the League of Nations, declared that:

> [t]he question of whether a certain matter is or is not solely within the jurisdiction of a state is an essentially relative question, it depends upon the development of international relations. Thus, in the present state of international law, questions of nationality are, in the opinion of this court, in principle within this reserved domain.[61]

However, although states may prescribe the conditions for the grant of nationality, international law is relevant, especially where other states are involved. As was emphasised in article 1 of the 1930 Hague Convention on the Conflict of Nationality Laws:

> it is for each state to determine under its own law who are its nationals. This law shall be recognised by other states in so far as it is consistent with international conventions, international custom and the principles of law generally recognised with regard to nationality.

The International Court of Justice noted in the Nottebohm case[62] that, according to state practice, nationality was:

> a legal bond having as its basis a social fact of attachment, a genuine connection of existence, interests and sentiments, together with the existence of reciprocal rights and duties.

[60] PCIJ, Series B, No. 4, 1923; 2 AD, p. 349.
[61] PCIJ, Series B, No. 4, 1923, p. 24.
[62] ICJ Reports, 1955, pp. 4, 23; 22 ILR, pp. 349, 360. See also below, p. 813.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

It was a legal manifestation of the link between the person and the state granting nationality and a recognition that the person was more closely connected with that state than with any other.[63]

Since the concept of nationality provides the link between the individual and the benefits of international law, it is worth pointing to some of the basic ideas associated with the concept, particularly with regard to its acquisition.[64]

In general, the two most important principles upon which nationality is founded in states are first by descent from parents who are nationals (jus sanguinis) and second by virtue of being born within the territory of the state (jus soli).

It is commonly accepted that a child born of nationals of a particular state should be granted the nationality of that state by reason of descent. This idea is particularly utilised in continental European countries, for example, France, Germany and Switzerland, where the child will receive the nationality of his father, although many municipal systems do provide that an illegitimate child will take the nationality of his mother. On the other hand, in common law countries such as Britain and the US the doctrine of the jus sanguinis is more restricted, so that where a father has become a national by descent it does not always follow that that fact alone will be sufficient to make the child a national.

The common law countries have tended to adopt the jus soli rule, whereby any child born within the territorial limits of the state automatically becomes a national thereof.[65] The British Nationality Act of 1948, for example, declared that 'every person born within the United Kingdom and Colonies ··· shall be a citizen of the United Kingdom and Colonies by birth'.[66] There is an exception to this, however, which applies to virtually every country applying the jus soli rule, and that is with regard to persons entitled to immunity from the jurisdiction of the state. In other words, the children of diplomatic personnel born within the country do [63] See below, chapter 14, p. 815, as to dual nationality and state responsibility for injuries to aliens.

[64] See e.g. Brownlie, Principles, p. 378; P. Weiss, Nationality and Statelessness in International Law, 2nd edn, Germantown, 1979, and H. F. Van Panhuys, The Role of Nationality in International Law, Leiden, 1959.

[65] See e.g. United States v. Wong Kim Ark 169 US 649 (1898).

[66] But see now the British Nationality Act of 1981.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

not automatically acquire its nationality.[67] Precisely how far this exception extends varies from state to state. Some countries provide that this rule applies also to the children of enemy alien fathers[68] born in areas under enemy occupation.[69]

Nationality may also be acquired by the wives of nationals, although here again the position varies from state to state. Some states provide for the automatic acquisition of the husband's nationality, others for the conditional acquisition of nationality and others merely state that the marriage has no effect as regards nationality. Problems were also caused in the past by the fact that many countries stipulated that a woman marrying a foreigner would thereby lose her nationality.

The Convention of 1957 on the Nationality of Married Women provides that contracting states accept that the marriage of one of their nationals to an alien shall not automatically affect the wife's nationality, although a wife may acquire her husband's nationality by special procedures should she so wish.

It should be noted also that article 9 of the Convention on the Elimination of All Forms of Discrimination against Women, 1979 provides that states parties shall grant women equal rights with men to acquire, change or retain their nationality and that in particular neither marriage to an alien nor change of nationality by the husband during marriage shall automatically change the nationality of the wife, render her stateless or force upon her the nationality of the husband. It is also provided that women shall have equal rights with men with respect to the nationality of their children. As far as children themselves are concerned, article 24(3) of the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights, 1966 stipulated that every child has the right to acquire a nationality, while this is reaffirmed in article 7 of the Convention on the Rights of the Child, 1989.

Nationality may be obtained by an alien by virtue of a naturalisation process usually involving a minimum period of residence, but the conditions under which this takes place vary considerably from country to country.[70]

[67] See e.g. In re Thenault 47 F.Supp. 952 (1942) and article 12, Convention on Conflict of Nationality Law, 1930. See also article II, Optional Protocol on Acquisition of Nationality (UN Conference on Diplomatic Law), 1961.

[68] But see Inglis v. Sailor's Snug Harbour 3 Peters 99 (1830), US Supreme Court.

[69] Note the various problems associated with possible extensions of the jus soli rule, e.g. regarding births on ships: see Brownlie, Principles, pp. 379 ff. See also Lam Mow v. Nagle 24 F.2d 316 (1928); 4 AD, pp. 295, 296.

[70] See e.g. Weiss, Nationality, p. 101.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

Civil jurisdiction, especially as regards matters of personal status, in a number of countries depends upon the nationality of the parties involved. So that, for example, the appropriate matrimonial law in any dispute for a Frenchman anywhere would be French law. However, common law countries tend to base the choice of law in such circumstances upon the law of the state where the individual involved has his permanent home (domicile).

Many countries, particularly those with a legal system based upon the continental European model, claim jurisdiction over crimes committed by their nationals, notwithstanding that the offence may have occurred in the territory of another state.[71] Common law countries tend, however, to restrict the crimes over which they will exercise jurisdiction over their nationals abroad to very serious ones.[72] In the UK this is generally limited to treason, murder and bigamy committed by British nationals abroad.[73] Under section 21 of the Antarctic Act 1994, when a British national does or omits to do anything in Antarctica which would have constituted an offence if committed in the UK, then such person will be deemed to have committed an offence and be liable to be prosecuted and punished if convicted. In addition, the War Crimes Act 1991 provides for [71] See e.g. Gilbert, 'Crimes', p. 417. See also Re Gutierrez 24 ILR, p. 265, Public Prosecutor v. Antoni 32 ILR, p. 140 and Serre et Régnier, Recueil Dalloz Sirey (jurisprudence), 1991, p. 395.

[72] See the statement by a Home Office Minister, noting that 'We have exceptionally, however, assumed extra-territorial jurisdiction over some serious crime, such as murder, where the factors in favour of the ability to prosecute here outweigh those against', HC Deb., vol. 445, col. 1419, Written Answer, 2 May 2006, UKMIL, 77 BYIL, 2006, p. 756. Note, however, the comment by Lord Rodger that 'there can be no objection in principle to Parliament legislating for British citizens outside the United Kingdom, provided that the particular legislation does not offend against the sovereignty of other states', Al-Skeini v. Secretary of State for Defence [2007] UKHL 26, para. 46; 133 ILR, p. 716.

[73] See e.g. the Official Secrets Acts 1911 (s. 10), 1970 (s. 8) and 1989 (s. 15); the Offences Against the Person Act 1861 ss. 9 and 57; the Merchant Shipping Act 1894 s. 686(1) and R v. Kelly [1982] AC 665; 77 ILR, p. 284 and the Suppression of Terrorism Act 1978 s. 4. See P. Arnell, 'The Case for Nationality-Based Jurisdiction', 50 ICLQ, 2001, p. 955. This has now been extended to cover various sexual offences committed abroad: see the Sexual Offences (Conspiracy and Incitement) Act 1996; the Sex Offenders Act 1997 and the Sexual Offences Act 2003 s. 72, and certain offences of bribery and corruption committed overseas by UK companies or nationals: see the Anti-Terrorism Crime and Security Act 2001, Part 12. Note that in Skiriotes v. Florida 313 US 69, 73 (1941); 10 AD, pp. 258, 260, Hughes CJ declared that 'the United States is not debarred by any rule of international law from governing the conduct of its own citizens upon the high seas or even in foreign countries when the rights of other nations or their nationals are not infringed'. See also DUSPIL, 1976, pp. 449–57, regarding legislation to subject US nationals and citizens to US district court jurisdiction for crimes committed outside the US, particularly regarding Antarctica.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

jurisdiction against a person who was on 8 March 1990 or subsequently became a British citizen or resident in the UK. Proceedings for murder, manslaughter or culpable homicide may be brought against that person in the UK, irrespective of his nationality at the time of the alleged offence, if the offence was committed during the Second World War in a place that was part of Germany or under German occupation and constituted a violation of the laws and customs of war.[74] Further, the common law countries have never protested against the extensive use of the nationality principle to found jurisdiction in criminal matters by other states.

It should be finally noted that by virtue of article 91 of the 1982 Convention on the Law of the Sea, ships have the nationality of the state whose flag they are entitled to fly. Each state is entitled to fix the conditions for the grant of its nationality to ships, for the registration of ships in its territory and for the right to fly its flag. However, there must be a genuine link between the state and the ship.[75] By article 17 of the Chicago Convention on International Civil Aviation, 1944, aircraft have the nationality of the state in which they are registered, although the conditions for registration are a matter for domestic law.[76]

The passive personality principle[77]

Under this principle, a state may claim jurisdiction to try an individual for offences committed abroad which have affected or will affect nationals of the state.

The leading case on this particular principle is the Cutting case in 1886[78] which concerned the publication in Texas of a statement defamatory of a Mexican by an American citizen. Cutting was arrested while in Mexico and convicted of the offence (a crime under Mexican law) with Mexico maintaining its right to jurisdiction upon the basis of the passive personality principle. The United States strongly protested against this, but there [74] See also, with regard to the nationality of ships and aircraft, above, chapter 11, p. 611, and below, p. 677, and as to the nationality of corporations, below, chapter 14, p. 815. See further, as to the nationality of claims, below, chapter 14, p. 808.

[75] See also article 5 of the Geneva Convention on the High Seas, 1958.

[76] See article 19.

[77] See e.g. Akehurst, 'Jurisdiction', pp. 162–6; Mann, 'Doctrine of Jurisdiction', pp. 40–1; E. Beckett, 'The Exercise of Criminal Jurisdiction over Foreigners', 6 BYIL, 1925, p. 44 and Beckett, 'Criminal Jurisdiction over Foreigners', 8 BYIL, 1927, p. 108; W. W. Bishop, 'General Course of Public International Law, 1965', 115 HR, 1965, pp. 151, 324, and Higgins, Problems and Process, p. 65. See also the Eichmann case, 36 ILR, pp. 5, 49–57, 304.

[78] J. B. Moore, Digest of International Law, Washington, 1906, vol. II, p. 228.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

was an inconclusive end to the incident, the charges being withdrawn by the injured party.[79]

A strong attack on this principle was made by Judge Moore, in a Dissenting Opinion in the Lotus case,[80] since the Turkish criminal code provided for jurisdiction where harm resulted to a Turkish national. However, the Court did not resolve the issue and concentrated upon the objective territorial jurisdiction principle.[81]

The overall opinion has been that the passive personality principle is rather a dubious ground upon which to base claims to jurisdiction under international law and it has been strenuously opposed by the US[82] and the UK, although a number of states apply it.

However, article 9 of the International Convention against the Taking of Hostages, 1979, in detailing the jurisdictional bases that could be established with regard to the offence, included the national state of a hostage 'if that state considers it appropriate'.[83] The possibility of using the passive personality concept was taken up by the US in 1984 in the Comprehensive Crime Control Act[84] inter alia implementing the Convention and in the provision extending the special maritime and territorial jurisdiction of the US to include '[a]ny place outside the jurisdiction of any nation with respect to an offence by or against a national of the United States'.[85] In 1986, following the Achille Lauro incident,[86] the US adopted the Omnibus Diplomatic Security and Anti-Terrorism Act,[87] inserting into the criminal

[79] See US Foreign Relations, 1886, p. viii; 1887, p. 757; and 1888, vol. II, p. 1114.

[80] PCIJ, Series A, No. 10, 1927, p. 92; 4 AD, p. 153.

[81] PCIJ, Series A, No. 10, 1927, pp. 22–3. See also O'Connell, International Law, vol. II, pp. 901–2, and Higgins, Problems and Process, pp. 65–6.

[82] See, for example, US protests to Greece, concerning the service of summonses by Greek Consuls in the US on US nationals involved in accidents with Greek nationals occurring in the United States, DUSPIL, 1973, pp. 197–8 and DUSPIL, 1975, pp. 339–40.

[83] See Rees v. Secretary of State for the Home Department [1986] 2 All ER 321. See generally, J. J. Lambert, Terrorism and Hostages in International Law, Cambridge, 1990. See also article 3(1)c of the Convention on the Prevention and Punishment of Crimes against Internationally Protected Persons, 1973 and article 5(1)c of the Convention against Torture, 1984.

[84] See new section 1203 of the Criminal Code, 18 USC para. 1203, Pub. L. No. 98-473, ch. 19, para. 2002(a), 98 Stat. 1976, 2186.

[85] Pub. L. No. 98-473, para. 1210, 98 Stat. at 2164. Note also article 689(1) of the French Code of Criminal Procedure adopted in 1975.

[86] See below, p. 679.

[87] Pub. L. No. 99-399, tit. XII, para. 1202(a), 100 Stat. 853, 896. See e.g. C. Blakesley, 'Jurisdictional Issues and Conflicts of Jurisdiction' in Legal Responses to International Terrorism (ed. M. C. Bassiouni), Charlottesville, 1988. See also article 689 of the French Code of Criminal Procedure 1975.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

code a new section which provided for US jurisdiction over homicide and physical violence outside the US where a national of the US is the victim. The section is less sweeping than it appears, since the written certification of the Attorney General is required, before a prosecution may commence by the US, to the effect that the offence was intended to coerce, intimidate or retaliate against a government or a civilian population.

In US v. Yunis (No. 2)[88] the issue concerned the apprehension of a Lebanese citizen by US agents in international waters and his prosecution in the US for alleged involvement in the hijacking of a Jordanian airliner. The only connection between the hijacking and the US was the fact that several American nationals were on that flight. The Court accepted that both the universality principle[89] and the passive personality principle provided an appropriate basis for jurisdiction in the case. It was stated that although the latter principle was the most controversial of the jurisdictional principles in international law, 'the international community recognises its legitimacy'.[90] It was pointed out that although the US had historically opposed the passive personality principle, it had been accepted by the US and the international community in recent years in the sphere of terrorist and other internationally condemned crimes.[91] Judges Higgins, Kooijmans and Buergenthal in their Joint Separate Opinion in the Congo v. Belgium (Arrest Warrant) case noted that in this particular context, the passive personality principle 'today meets with relatively little opposition'.[92]

The protective principle[93]

This principle provides that states may exercise jurisdiction over aliens who have committed an act abroad which is deemed prejudicial to the [88] 681 F.Supp. 896 (1988); 82 ILR, p. 344. See also US v. Yunis (No. 3) 924 F.2d 1086, 1091; 88 ILR, pp. 176, 181.

[89] See below, p. 668. [90] 681 F.Supp. 896, 901; 82 ILR, p. 349.

[91] 681 F.Supp. 896, 902; 82 ILR, p. 350. Note that a comment to paragraph 402 of the Third US Restatement of Foreign Relations Law, vol. I, p. 240, states that the passive personality principle 'is increasingly accepted as applied to terrorist and other organised attacks on a state's nationals by reason of their nationality, or to assassinations of a state's diplomatic representatives or other officials'. See also US v. Benitez 741 F.2d 1312, 1316 (1984), cert. denied, 471 US 1137, 105 S. Ct. 2679 (1985).

[92] ICJ Reports, 2002, pp. 3, 63, 76–7; 128 ILR, pp. 60, 118, 132.

[93] See e.g. Akehurst, 'Jurisdiction', pp. 157–9; Harvard Research, pp. 543–63, and M. Sahovic and W. W. Bishop, 'The Authority of the State: Its Range with Respect to Persons and Places' in Manual of Public International Law (ed. M. Sørensen), London, 1968, pp. 311, 362–5. See also M. S. McDougal, H. Lasswell and V. Vlasic, Law and Public Order in Space, New Haven, 1963, pp. 699–701.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

security of the particular state concerned. It is a well-established concept, although there are uncertainties as to how far it extends in practice and particularly which acts are included within its net.[94]

The principle is justifiable on the basis of protection of a state's vital interests, since the alien might not be committing an offence under the law of the country where he is residing and extradition might be refused if it encompassed political offences. However, it is clear that it is a principle that can easily be abused, although usually centred upon immigration and various economic offences, since far from protecting important state functions it could easily be manipulated to subvert foreign governments. Nevertheless, it exists partly in view of the insufficiency of most municipal laws as far as offences against the security and integrity of foreign states are concerned.[95]

This doctrine seems to have been applied in the British case of Joyce v. Director of Public Prosecutions,[96] involving the infamous pro-Nazi propagandist 'Lord Haw-Haw'. Joyce was born in America, but in 1933 fraudulently acquired a British passport by declaring that he had been born in Ireland. In 1939, he left Britain and started working for German radio. The following year, he claimed to have acquired German nationality. The case turned on whether the British court had jurisdiction to try him after the war, on a charge of treason. The House of Lords decided that jurisdiction did exist in this case. Joyce had held himself out to be a British subject and had availed himself of the protection (albeit fraudulently) of a British passport. Accordingly he could be deemed to owe allegiance to the Crown, and be liable for a breach of that duty. The fact that the treason occurred outside the territory of the UK was of no consequence since states were not obliged to ignore the crime of treason committed against them outside their territory. Joyce was convicted and suffered the penalty for his actions.[97]

[94] See e.g. In re Urios 1 AD, p. 107 and article 694(1) of the French Code of Criminal Procedure.

[95] See e.g. Rocha v. US 288 F.2d 545 (1961); 32 ILR, p. 112; US v. Pizzarusso 388 F. 2d 8 (1968), and US v. Rodriguez 182 F.Supp. 479 (1960). See also the Italian South Tyrol Terrorism case, 71 ILR, p. 242.

[96] [1946] AC 347; 15 AD, p. 91.

[97] See, with regard to US practice, Rocha v. US 288 F.2d 545 (1961); US v. Pizzarusso 388 F.2d 8 (1968) and US v. Layton 509 F.Supp. 212 (1981). See also Third US Restatement of Foreign Relations Law, vol. I, pp. 237 ff. and the Omnibus Diplomatic Security and Anti-Terrorism Act 1986. The US has also asserted jurisdiction on the basis of the protective principle over aliens on the high seas: see the Maritime Drug Law Enforcement Act 1986 and US v. Gonzalez 776 F.2d 931 (1985) and see also S. Murphy, 'Extraterritorial Application of US Laws to Crimes on Foreign Vessels', 97 AJIL, 2003, p. 183.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

The protective principle is often used in treaties providing for multiple jurisdictional grounds with regard to specific offences.[98]

The universality principle[99]

Under this principle, each and every state has jurisdiction to try particular offences. The basis for this is that the crimes involved are regarded as particularly offensive to the international community as a whole. There are two categories that clearly belong to the sphere of universal jurisdiction, which has been defined as the competence of the state to prosecute alleged offenders and to punish them if convicted, irrespective of the place of commission of the crime and regardless of any link of active or passive nationality or other grounds of jurisdiction recognised by international law.[100] These are piracy[101] and war crimes. However, there are a growing number of other offences which by international treaty may be subject to the jurisdiction of contracting parties and which form a distinct category closely allied to the concept of universal jurisdiction.

War crimes, crimes against peace and crimes against humanity

In addition to piracy, war crimes are now accepted by most authorities as subject to universal jurisdiction, though of course the issues

[98] See e.g. the Hostages Convention, 1979; the aircraft hijacking conventions and the Safety of United Nations and Associated Personnel Convention, 1994: see below, pp. 676 ff.

[99] See e.g. Akehurst, 'Jurisdiction', pp. 160–6; Bowett, 'Jurisdiction', pp. 11–14; Harvard Research, pp. 563–92; Jennings, 'Extraterritorial Jurisdiction', p. 156; Gilbert, 'Crimes', p. 423; K. C. Randall, 'Universal Jurisdiction under International Law', 66 Texas Law Review, 1988, p. 785; M. C. Bassiouni, Crimes Against Humanity in International Criminal Law, Dordrecht, 1992; L. Reydams, Universal Jurisdiction, Oxford, 2003; Redress Report on Legal Redress for Victims of International Crimes, March 2004; M. Inazumi, Universal Jurisdiction in Modern International Law for Prosecuting Serious Crimes under International Law, Antwerp, 2005; R. O'Keefe, 'Universal Jurisdiction: Clarifying the Basic Concept', 2 Journal of International Criminal Justice, 2004, p. 735; A. H. Butler, 'The Doctrine of Universal Jurisdiction: A Review of the Literature,' 11 Criminal Law Forum, 2001, p. 353; M. Henzelin, Le Principe de l'Universalité en Droit Pénal International, Brussels, 2000, and L. Benvenides, 'The Universal Jurisdiction Principle: Nature and Scope', 1 Annuario Mexicano de Derecho Internacional, 2001, p. 58. See also the Princeton Principles on Universal Jurisdiction, Princeton, 2001 and the Cairo Arusha Principles on Universal Jurisdiction in Respect of Gross Human Rights Violations, Inazumi, Universal Jurisdiction, p. 5. Note also H. Kissinger, 'The Pitfalls of Universal Jurisdiction', Foreign Affairs, July/August 2001.

[100] See the resolution adopted by the Institut de Droit International on 26 August 2005, para. 1.

[101] As to piracy, see above, chapter 8, p. 398 and chapter 11, p. 615

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

involved are extremely sensitive and highly political.[102] While there is little doubt about the legality and principles of the war crimes decisions emerging after the Second World War, a great deal of controversy arose over suggestions of war crimes with regard to American personnel connected with the Vietnam war,[103] Pakistani soldiers involved in the Bangladesh war of 1971 and persons concerned with subsequent conflicts.

Article 6 of the Charter of the International Military Tribunal of 1945 referred to crimes against peace, violations of the law and customs of war and crimes against humanity as offences within the jurisdiction of the Tribunal for which there was to be individual responsibility.[104] This article can now be regarded as part of international law. In a resolution unanimously approved by the General Assembly of the United Nations in 1946, the principles of international law recognised by the Charter of the Nuremberg Tribunal and the judgment of the Tribunal were expressly confirmed.[105] The General Assembly in 1968 adopted a Convention on the Non-Applicability of Statutory Limitations to War Crimes and Crimes Against Humanity, reinforcing the general conviction that war crimes form a distinct category under international law, susceptible to universal jurisdiction,[106] while the four Geneva 'Red Cross' Conventions of 1949 also contain provisions for universal jurisdiction over grave breaches.[107] Such grave breaches include wilful killing, torture or inhuman treatment, unlawful deportation of protected [102] See e.g. Akehurst, 'Jurisdiction', p. 160; A. Cowles, 'Universality of Jurisdiction over War Crimes', 33 California Law Review, 1945, p. 177; Brownlie, Principles, pp. 303–5; Bowett, 'Jurisdiction', p. 12; Higgins, Problems and Process, p. 56; Mann, 'Doctrine of Jurisdiction', p. 93, and Bassiouni, Crimes against Humanity, p. 510. See also the Eichmann case, 36 ILR, pp. 5 and 277 and the UN War Crimes Commission, 15 Law Reports of Trials of War Criminals, 1949, p. 26. However, cf. the Separate Opinion of Judge Guillaume in Congo v. Belgium, ICJ Reports, 2002, pp. 3, 42; 128 ILR, p. 98 (restricting universal jurisdiction to piracy) and the Joint Separate Opinion, ibid., pp. 3, 78; 128 ILR, p. 134 (universal jurisdiction may possibly exist with regard to the Geneva Conventions of 1949 on war crimes, etc.). See further above, chapter 8.

[103] See e.g. Calley v. Calloway 382 F.Supp. 650 (1974), rev'd 519 F.2d 184 (1975), cert. denied 425 US 911 (1976).

[104] See also article 228 of the Treaty of Versailles, 1919.

[105] Resolution 95 (I). See also Yearbook of the ILC, 1950, vol. II, p. 195; 253 HL Deb., col. 831, 2 December 1963; the British Manual of Military Law, Part III, 1958, para. 637; Brownlie, Principles, pp. 561 ff., and P. Weiss, 'Time Limits for the Prosecution of Crimes against International Law', 53 BYIL, 1982, pp. 163, 188 ff.

[106] See e.g. Weiss, 'Time Limits'.

[107] See article 49 of the First Geneva Convention; article 50 of the Second Geneva Convention; article 129 of the Third Geneva Convention and article 146 of the Fourth Geneva persons and the taking of hostages. The list was extended in Protocol I of 1977 to the 1949 Conventions to include, for example, attacking civilian populations.[108]

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

Nuremberg practice demonstrates that crimes against peace consist of the commission by the authorities of a state of acts of aggression. In theory this is not controversial, but in practice serious problems are likely to arise within the framework of universal jurisdiction.[109] However, whether this category can be expanded to include support for international terrorism is open to question. Crimes against humanity clearly cover genocide and related activities. They differ from war crimes in applying beyond the context of an international armed conflict, but cover essentially the same substantive offences.[110] The UN Secretary-General's Report on the Establishment of an International Tribunal for the Former Yugoslavia[111] noted in the commentary to article 5 of what became the Statute of the Tribunal[112] that 'crimes against humanity are aimed at any civilian population and are prohibited regardless of whether they are committed in an armed conflict, international or internal in character' and that 'crimes against humanity refer to inhumane acts of a very serious nature, such as wilful killing, torture or rape, committed as part of a widespread or systematic attack against any civilian population on national, political, ethnic, racial or religous grounds'.[113] The 1998 Rome Statute for the International Criminal Court provides that jurisdiction is limited to the 'most serious crimes of concern to the international community as a whole' being genocide, crimes against humanity, war crimes and aggression,[114] and that a person who commits a crime within the jurisdiction of the Court 'shall be individually responsible and liable for punishment' in accordance with the Statute.[115]

Convention. See also e.g. G. I. A. D. Draper, The Red Cross Conventions, London, 1958, p. 105. Cf. Bowett, 'Jurisdiction', p. 12.

[108] See further above, chapter 8, and below, chapter 21.

[109] See e.g. R v. Jones [2006] UKHL 16; 132 ILR, p. 668, and see above, chapter 4, p. 146.

[110] See e.g. Brownlie, Principles, p. 562; L. C. Green, The Contemporary Law of Armed Conflict, 2nd edn, Manchester, 2000, chapter 18; E. Schwelb, 'Crimes Against Humanity', 23 BYIL, 1946, p. 178. See also the Commentary to article 20 of the Draft Statute for an International Criminal Court which refers to the concept as a term of art, Report of the International Law Commission, A/49/10, 1994, p. 75.

[111] S/25704, 1993, at paragraphs 47–8. [112] Security Council resolution 827 (1993).

[113] See article 3 of the Statute of the International Criminal Tribunal for Rwanda, 1994, Security Council resolution 955 (1994). See also the Barbie case, 100 ILR, p. 330 and the Touvier case, ibid., p. 337.

[114] Article 5. [115] Article 25.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

The International Law Commission adopted a Draft Code of Crimes against the Peace and Security of Mankind in 1996.[116] Article 8 provides that each state party shall take such measures as may be necessary to establish its jurisdiction over the crimes laid down in the Draft, while article 9 provides that a state in whose territory an individual alleged to have committed a crime against the peace and security of mankind is present shall either extradite or prosecute that individual. The Commentary to this article declares that the national courts of states parties would be entitled to exercise the 'broadest possible jurisdiction' over the crimes 'under the principle of universal jurisdiction'.[117] The Crimes against the Peace and Security of Mankind, for which there is individual responsibility, comprise aggression (article 16);[118] genocide (article 17); crimes against humanity (article 18); crimes against UN and associated personnel (article 19); and war crimes (article 20).[119]

The fact that a particular activity may be seen as an international crime does not of itself establish universal jurisdiction and state practice does not appear to have moved beyond war crimes, crimes against peace and crimes against humanity in terms of permitting the exercise of such jurisdiction. In particular, references made to, for example, apartheid, mercenaries and environmental offences in the 1991 Draft but omitted in the Draft Code adopted in 1996 must be taken as de lege ferenda.

In so far as universal jurisdiction as manifested in domestic courts is concerned, the starting point is the Eichmann case[120] decided by the District Court of Jerusalem and the Supreme Court of Israel in 1961. Eichmann was prosecuted and convicted under an Israeli law of 1951 for [116] Report of the International Law Commission, A/51/10, 1996, p. 9. This had been under consideration since 1982: see General Assembly resolution 36/106 of 10 December 1981. A Draft Code was formulated in 1954 by the ILC and submitted to the UN General Assembly: see Yearbook of the ILC, 1954, vol. II, p. 150. The General Assembly postponed consideration of it until a definition of aggression had been formulated, resolution 897 (IX). This was achieved in 1974: see resolution 3314 (XXIX). A Draft Code was provisionally adopted in 1991: see A/46/10 and 30 ILM, 1991, p. 1584.

[117] Report of the International Law Commission, A/51/10, 1996, p. 51. This does not apply to the crime of aggression.

[118] Article 8 provides that jurisdiction concerning individuals will rest with an international criminal court.

[119] Additional crimes referred to in the 1991 Draft also included recruitment, use, financing and training of mercenaries; international terrorism; illicit traffic in narcotic drugs and wilful and severe damage to the environment.

[120] 36 ILR, pp. 5 and 277. See also the Barbie cases, 78 ILR, pp. 78, 125, 136 and Demjanjuk v. Petrovsky 776 F.2d 571 (1985); 79 ILR, p. 534. See also Keesing's Record of World Events, p. 36189 regarding the Demjanjuk case in Israel.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

war crimes, crimes against the Jewish people and crimes against humanity. The District Court declared that far from limiting states' jurisdiction with regard to such crimes, international law was actually in need of the legislative and judicial organs of every state giving effect to its criminal interdictions and bringing the criminals to trial. The fact that the crimes were committed prior to the establishment of the state of Israel did not prevent the correct application of its powers pursuant to universal jurisdiction under international law. Israel's municipal law merely reflected the offences existing under international law.

It is a matter for domestic law whether the presence of the accused is required for the exercise of the jurisdiction of the particular domestic court. Different states adopt different approaches. The Belgian Court of Cassation took the view in its decision of 12 February 2003 in HSA et al. v. SA et al. that the presence of the accused was not necessary.[121] But this was in the context of the Belgian Statute of 1993, as amended in 1999, which provided for a wide jurisdiction in the case of genocide, crimes against humanity and war crimes. This Statute was amended on 23 April 2003 to provide that the alleged serious violation of international law in question shall be one committed against a person who at the time of the commission of the acts is a Belgian national or legally resident in Belgium for at least three years and that any prosecution, including a preliminary investigation phase, may only be undertaken at the request of the Federal Prosecutor. In addition, the Federal Prosecutor may decide not to proceed where it appears that in the interests of the proper administration of justice and in compliance with Belgium's international obligations, the case would be better placed before an international court or the court of the place where the acts were committed or the courts of the state of nationality of the alleged offender or the courts of the place where he may be found.[122] The Statute was further amended on 5 August 2003, requiring a foreigner wishing to submit an application to be resident in Belgium for a minimum of three years.[123] It appears that Belgium has in effect ceased to permit prosecutions under the universal jurisdiction model in the absence of the accused.[124] This is consistent with the approach of the Institut de Droit International which has stated that 'the exercise of [121] Relating to the indictment of defendants Ariel Sharon, Amos Yaron and others concerning events in the Shabra and Shatilla camps in Lebanon in 1982, No. P. 02.1139. F/1.

[122] See article 16(2), 42 ILM, 2003, pp. 1258 ff.

[123] Moniteur Belge, 7 August 2003, pp. 40506–15.

[124] See e.g. Inazumi, Universal Jurisdiction, p. 97. See also S. Ratner, 'Belgium's War Crimes Statute: A Postmortem', 97 AJIL, 2003, p. 888.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

universal jurisdiction requires the presence of the alleged offender in the territory of the prosecuting state or on board a vessel flying its flag or an aircraft which is registered under its laws or other lawful forms of control over the alleged offender'.[125]

The Supreme Court of Spain decided on 25 February 2003 in the Guatemalan Genocide case that jurisdiction would cover only acts of genocide in which Spanish nationals were victims.[126] However, this decision was overturned on 26 September 2005 by the Constitutional Court which decided that the domestic jurisdiction provision with regard to crimes against humanity was not limited to cases involving Spanish nationals who were victims of genocide and that no tie to Spain was needed in order to initiate a complaint.[127]

Treaties providing for jurisdiction

In addition to the accepted universal jurisdiction to apprehend and try pirates and war criminals, there are a number of treaties which provide for the suppression by the international community of various activities, ranging from the destruction of submarine cables to drug trafficking and slavery.[128] These treaties provide for the exercise of state jurisdiction but not for universal jurisdiction. Some conventions establish what might be termed a quasi-universal jurisdiction in providing for the exercise of jurisdiction upon a variety of bases by as wide a group of states parties as possible coupled with an obligation for states parties to establish such jurisdiction in domestic law. In many instances the offence involved will constitute jus cogens. The view is sometimes put forward that where a norm of jus cogens exists, particularly where the offence is regarded as especially serious, universal jurisdiction as such may be created.[129] More correct is the approach that in such circumstances international law recognises that domestic legal orders may validly establish and exercise jurisdiction over the alleged offenders. Such circumstances thus include the presence of [125] Resolution adopted on 26 August 2005, para. 3(b).

[126] Judgment No. 327/2003. See also the same court's decision a few months later in the Peruvian Genocide case, where it was held that Spanish courts could not exercise universal jurisdiction over claims of genocide and other serious crimes alleged to have been committed by Peruvian officials from 1986, Judgment No. 712/2003.

[127] Judgment No. 237/2005. See e.g. N. Roht-Arriaza, 'Guatemala Genocide Case. Judgment no. STC 237/2005', 100 AJIL, 2006, p. 207.

[128] See e.g. Akehurst, 'Jurisdiction', pp. 160–1.

[129] See e.g. Millett LJ in Ex parte Pinochet (No. 3) [2000] 1 AC 147, 275; 119 ILR, p. 229. See also R. Van Alebeek, 'The Pinochet Case: International Human Rights Law on Trial', 71 BYIL, 2000, p. 29.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

the accused in the state concerned and in this way may be differentiated from universal jurisdiction as such, where, for example, a pirate may be apprehended on the high seas and then prosecuted in the state. Therefore, the type of jurisdiction at issue in such circumstances cannot truly be described as universal, but rather as quasi-universal.[130] Judges Higgins, Kooijmans and Buergenthal in their Joint Separate Opinion in Congo v. Belgium referred to this situation rather as an 'obligatory territorial jurisdiction over persons' or 'the jurisdiction to establish a territorial jurisdiction over persons for extraterritorial events' rather than as true universal jurisdiction.[131]

There are a number of treaties that follow the quasi-universal model, that is providing for certain defined offences to be made criminal offences within the domestic orders of states parties; accepting an obligation to arrest alleged offenders found on the national territory and then prosecuting those persons on the basis of a number of stated jurisdictional grounds, ranging from territoriality to nationality and passive personality grounds. Such treaties normally also provide for mutual assistance and for the offences in question to be deemed to be included as extraditable offences in any extradition treaty concluded between states parties. The agreements in question include, for example, the UN Torture Convention, 1984[132] and treaties relating to hostage-taking, currency counterfeiting, hijacking and drug trafficking. Such treaties are then normally implemented nationally.[133]

It is interesting to note that the International Law Commission's Draft Statute for an International Criminal Court proposed that the court would have jurisdiction in certain conditions with regard to a range of 'treaty crimes',[134] but this suggestion was not found acceptable in later discussions [130] The phrase 'conditional universal jurisdiction' has also been suggested: see A. Cassese, 'When may Senior State Officials be Tried for International Crimes?', 13 EJIL, 2002, pp. 853, 856.

[131] ICJ Reports, 2002, pp. 3, 74–5; 128 ILR, pp. 60, 130–1. See also the Separate Opinion of Judge Guillaume, who uses the term 'subsidiary universal jurisdiction' to refer to the international conventions in question providing for the trial of offenders arrested on national territory and not extradited: ibid., p. 40; 128 ILR, p. 96.

[132] See further above, chapter 6, p. 326.

[133] See e.g. the UK Taking of Hostages Act 1982.

[134] That is those arising out of the Geneva Conventions of 1949 and Protocol I thereto; the Hague Convention, 1970; the Montreal Convention, 1971; the Apartheid Convention, 1973; the Internationally Protected Persons Convention, 1973; the Hostages Convention, 1979; the Torture Convention, 1984; the Safety of Maritime Navigation Convention and Protocol, 1988 and the Convention against Illicit Traffic in Narcotic Drugs and

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

and does not appear in the 1998 Rome Statute. It is helpful to look at some of these treaties. The Convention against Torture, 1984 provides that each state party shall ensure that all acts of torture are offences under domestic criminal law[135] and shall take such measures as may be necessary to establish its jurisdiction over torture offences where committed in any territory under its jurisdiction or on board a ship or aircraft registered in the state concerned or when the alleged offender is a national or when the victim is a national if that state considers it appropriate.[136] Further, each state party agrees to either extradite or prosecute alleged offenders,[137] while agreeing that the offences constitute extraditable offences within the context of extradition agreements concluded between states parties.[138] This Convention was the subject of consideration in Ex parte Pinochet (No. 3), where the majority of the House of Lords held that torture committed outside the UK was not a crime punishable under UK law until the provisions of the Convention against Torture were implemented by s. 134 of the Criminal Justice Act 1988.[139] Lord Millett, however, took the view that torture was a crime under customary international law with universal jurisdiction and that since customary international law was part of the common law,[140] English courts 'have and always have had extraterritorial criminal jurisdiction in respect of universal jurisdiction under customary international law'.[141] The Convention on the Prevention and Punishment of Crimes against Internationally Protected Persons, including Diplomatic Agents, was adopted in 1973 by the General Assembly of the United Nations and came into force in 1977. This stipulates that contracting states should make acts such as assaults upon the person, premises and transport of such persons a crime under their domestic law.[142] This, of course, would require little if any revision of existing penal statutes. Each state is to establish its jurisdiction over these crimes when committed in its territory or on board ships or aircraft registered in its territory, or when the alleged offender is a national or when the crimes have been committed against an internationally protected person functioning on behalf of that state.[143] A person is regarded as internationally protected where he is a head of Psychotropic Substances, 1988: see Report of the International Law Commission, A/49/10, 1994, pp. 141 ff.

[135] Article 4. [136] Article 5. [137] Article 7. [138] Article 8.

[139] [2000] 1 AC 147, 148, 159–60, 188–90, 202, 218–19 and 233; 119 ILR, p. 135.

[140] See above, chapter 4, p. 141.

[141] [2000] 1 AC 147, 276; 119 ILR, p. 135. See also e.g. R. O'Keefe, 'Customary International Crimes in English Courts', 72 BYIL, 2001, p. 293.

[142] Article 2. See e.g. the UK Internationally Protected Persons Act 1978. [143] Article 3.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

state or government, or foreign minister abroad, or state representative or official of an international organisation.[144]

The International Convention against the Taking of Hostages, 1979 came into force in 1983 and, like the Internationally Protected Persons Treaty, requires each state party to make the offence punishable under national law,[145] and provides that states parties must either extradite or prosecute an alleged offender found on their territory and incorporate the offence of hostage-taking into existing and future extradition treaties. The grounds upon which a state party may exercise jurisdiction are laid down in article 5 and cover offences committed in its territory or on board a ship or aircraft registered in that state; by any of its nationals, or if that state considers it appropriate, by stateless persons having their habitual residence in its territory; in order to compel that state to do or abstain from doing any act; or with respect to a hostage who is a national of that state, if that state considers it appropriate.

The Convention on the Safety of United Nations and Associated Personnel, 1994 provides that attacks upon UN or associated personnel or property be made a crime under national law by each state party[146] and that jurisdiction should be established with regard to such offences when the crime is committed in the territory of that state or on board a ship or aircraft registered in that state or when the alleged offender is a national of that state. States parties may also establish their jurisdiction over any such crimes when committed by a stateless person whose habitual residence is in the state concerned, or with regard to a national of that state, or in an attempt to compel that state to do or to abstain from doing any act.[147] In addition, the state in whose territory the alleged offender is present shall either prosecute or extradite such person.[148]

As far as the hijacking of and other unlawful acts connected with aircraft is concerned, the leading treaties are the Tokyo Convention on Offences and Certain Other Acts Committed on Board Aircraft, 1963, the Hague Convention for the Suppression of Unlawful Seizure of Aircraft, 1970 and the Montreal Convention for the Suppression of Unlawful Acts against the Safety of Civil Aviation, 1971. The latter two instruments arose as a result of the wave of aircraft hijacking and attacks upon civilian planes that took place in the late 1960s, and tried to deal with the problem of how to apprehend and punish the perpetrators of such deeds.

[144] Article 1. [145] See e.g. the UK Taking of Hostages Act 1982.
[146] Article 9. [147] Article 10. [148] Article 14.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

The Tokyo Convention applies to both general offences and acts which, whether or not they are offences, may or do jeopardise the safety of the aircraft or of persons or property therein or which jeopardise good order and discipline on board. It provides for the jurisdiction of the contracting state over aircraft registered therein while the aircraft is in flight, or on the surface of the high seas or on any other area outside the territory of any state. Contracting states are called upon to take the necessary measures to establish jurisdiction by municipal law over such aircraft in such circumstances. In addition, the Convention permits interference with an aircraft in flight in order to establish criminal jurisdiction over an offence committed on board in certain specific circumstances by contracting states not being the state of registration. The circumstances specified are where the offence has effect on the territory of such state; has been committed by or against a national or permanent resident of such state; is against the security of such state; consists of a breach of any rules or regulations relating to the flight or manoeuvre of aircraft in force in such state or where the exercise of jurisdiction is necessary to ensure the observance of any obligation of such state under a multilateral international agreement.[149] No obligation to extradite is provided for.

The Hague Convention provides that any person who, on board an aircraft in flight, is involved in the unlawful seizure of that aircraft (or attempts the same), commits an offence which contracting states undertake to make punishable by severe penalties. Each contracting state is to take such measures as may be necessary to establish its jurisdiction over the offence or related acts of violence when the offence is committed on board an aircraft registered in that state, when the aircraft in question lands in its territory with the alleged offender still on board or when the offence is committed on board an aircraft leased without a crew to a lessee who has his principal place of business, or if the lessee has no such place of business, his permanent residence, in that state. The Convention also provides that contracting states in the territory of which an alleged offender is found must either extradite or prosecute him.

The Montreal Convention contains similar rules as to jurisdiction and extradition as the Hague Convention but is aimed at controlling and punishing attacks and sabotage against civil aircraft in flight and on the ground [149] Article 4. See S. Shuber, Jurisdiction over Crimes on Board Aircraft, The Hague, 1973; N. D. Joyner, Aerial Hijacking as an International Crime, Dobbs Ferry, 1974, and E. McWhinney, Aerial Piracy and International Terrorism, 2nd edn, Dordrecht, 1987. See also the US Anti-Hijacking Act of 1974.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

rather than dealing with hijacking directly.[150] A Protocol to the Montreal Convention was signed in 1988. This provides for the suppression of unlawful acts of violence at airports serving international civil aviation which cause or are likely to cause serious injury, and acts of violence which destroy or seriously damage the facilities of an airport serving international civil aviation or aircraft not in service located thereon or disrupt the service of the airport.[151]

The wide range of jurisdictional bases is to be noted, although universality as such is not included. Nevertheless, condemnation of this form of activity is widespread and it is likely that hijacking has become an international crime of virtually universal jurisdiction in practice.[152] Further, it is possible that international terrorism may in time be regarded as a crime of universal jurisdiction.[153]

Of course questions as to enforcement will arise where states fail either to respect their obligations under the above Conventions or, if they are not parties to them, to respect customary law on the reasonable assumption that state practice now recognises hijacking as an unlawful act.[154] A number of possibilities exist, in addition to recourse to the United Nations

[150] Note that neither the Tokyo nor the Hague Conventions apply to aircraft used in military, customs or police services: see articles 1(4) and 3(2) respectively.

[151] Note the Hindawi episode, where the European Community imposed sanctions upon Syria in a situation where it emerged during a court case in the UK that an attempt to smuggle a bomb onto an Israeli airliner in 1986 in London had been supported by Syrian intelligence: see Keesing's Contemporary Archives, pp. 34771–2 and 34883–4.

[152] See US v. Yunis (No. 2) 681 F.Supp. 896, 900–1 (1988); 82 ILR, pp. 344, 348. See also US v. Yunis (No. 3) 924 F.2d 1086, 1091 (1991); 88 ILR, pp. 176, 181.

[153] Note that in Flatow v. Islamic Republic of Iran, the US District Court stated that 'international terrorism is subject to universal jurisdiction', 999 F.Supp. 1, 14 (1998); 121 ILR, p. 618. See also the Convention on the Protection of All Persons from Enforced Disappearance, 2006, which requires all states parties to make enforced disappearance a criminal offence and further defines the widespread or systematic practice of enforced disappearance as a crime against humanity. States parties must take the necessary measures to establish jurisdiction on the basis of territoriality, nationality or, where the state deems it appropriate, the passive personality principle and must then either prosecute or extradite. The offence of enforced disappearance is deemed to be included as an extraditable offence in any extradition treaty existing between states parties before the entry into force of the Convention and states parties undertake to include it as an extraditable offence in future treaties, while the offence is not to be regarded as a political offence or as an offence connected with a political offence or as an offence inspired by political motives. Accordingly, a request for extradition based on such an offence may not be refused on these grounds alone. Further, no person may be sent to a state where there are substantial grounds for believing that he or she may be the subject of an enforced disappearance.

[154] See e.g. General Assembly resolution 2645 (XXV) and Security Council resolution 286 (1970).

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

and the relevant international air organisations.[155] Like-minded states may seek to impose sanctions upon errant states. The 1978 Bonn Declaration, for example, agreed that 'in cases where a country refuses the extradition or prosecution of, those who have hijacked an aircraft and/or does not return such aircraft' action would be taken to cease all flights to and from that country and its airlines.[156] Bilateral arrangements may also be made, which provide for the return of, or prosecution of, hijackers.[157] States may also, of course, adopt legislation which enables them to prosecute alleged hijackers found in their territory,[158] or more generally seeks to combat terrorism. The 1984 US Act to Combat International Terrorism, for example, provides for rewards for information concerning a wide range of terrorist acts primarily (although not exclusively) within the territorial jurisdiction of the US.[159]

Other acts of general self-help have also been resorted to. In 1973, for example, Israeli warplanes intercepted a civil aircraft in Lebanese airspace in an unsuccessful attempt to apprehend a guerrilla leader held responsible for the killing of civilians aboard hijacked aircraft. Israel was condemned for this by the UN Security Council[160] and the International Civil Aviation Organisation.[161]

On the night of 10–11 October 1985, an Egyptian civil aircraft carrying the hijackers of the Italian cruise ship Achille Lauro was intercepted over the Mediterranean Sea by US Navy fighters and compelled to land in Sicily. The US justified its action generally by reference to the need to combat international terrorism, while the UK Foreign Secretary noted it was relevant to take into account the international agreements on hijacking and hostage-taking.[162] However, nothing in these Conventions, it is suggested, would appear to justify an interception of a civilian aircraft over the high

[155] See above, chapter 10, p. 542.

[156] See UKMIL, 49 BYIL, 1978, p. 423. The states making the Declaration were the UK, France, US, Canada, West Germany, Italy and Japan.

[157] See e.g. the US–Cuban Memorandum of Understanding on Hijacking of Aircraft and Vessels and Other Offences, 1973.

[158] See e.g. the US Anti-Hijacking Act of 1974 and the UK Civil Aviation Act 1982 s. 92 and the Aviation Security Act 1982.

[159] See further, as to international terrorism, below, chapter 20, p. 1159.

[160] Resolution 337 (1973). [161] ICAO Doc. 9050-LC/169-1, at p. 196 (1973).

[162] See Keesing's Contemporary Archives, p. 34078 and The Times, 6 February 1986, p. 4. In this context, one should also note the hijack of a TWA airliner in June 1985, the murder of a passenger and the prolonged detention in the Lebanon of the remaining passengers and the crew: see Keesing's Contemporary Archives, p. 34130. See also A. Cassese, Violence and Law in the Modern Age, Cambridge, 1988, chapter 4.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

seas or over any area other than the territory of the intercepting state and for specified reasons. The apprehension of terrorists is to be encouraged, but the means must be legitimate. On 4 February 1986, the Israeli Air Force intercepted a Libyan civil aircraft en route from Libya to Syria in an attempt to capture terrorists, arguing that the aircraft in question was part of a terrorist operation.[163]

Nevertheless, there may be circumstances where an action taken by a state as a consequence of hostile hijacking or terrorist operations would be justifiable in the context of self-defence.[164]

Illegal apprehension of suspects and the exercise of jurisdiction[165]

It would appear that unlawful apprehension of a suspect by state agents acting in the territory of another state is not a bar to the exercise of jurisdiction. Such apprehension would, of course, constitute a breach of international law and the norm of non-intervention involving state responsibility,[166] unless the circumstances were such that the right of self-defence could be pleaded.[167] It could be argued that the seizure, being a violation of international law, would only be compounded by permitting the abducting state to exercise jurisdiction,[168] but international practice on the whole demonstrates otherwise.[169] In most cases a distinction is clearly drawn between the apprehension and jurisdiction to prosecute and one should also distinguish situations where the apprehension has

[163] See The Times, 5 February 1986, p. 1.

[164] See e.g. as to the 1976 Entebbe incident, below, chapter 20, p. 1143.

[165] See e.g. F. Morgenstern, 'Jurisdiction in Seizures Effected in Violation of International Law', 29 BYIL, 1952, p. 256; P. O'Higgins, 'Unlawful Seizure and Irregular Extradition', 36 BYIL, 1960, p. 279; A. Lowenfeld, 'US Law Enforcement Abroad: The Constitution and International Law', 83 AJIL, 1989, p. 880, Lowenfeld, 'US Law Enforcement Abroad: The Constitution and International Law, Continued', 84 AJIL, 1990, p. 444, Lowenfeld, 'Kidnapping by Government Order: A Follow-Up', 84 AJIL, 1990, p. 712, and Lowenfeld, 'Still More on Kidnapping', 85 AJIL, 1991, p. 655. See also F. A. Mann, 'Reflections on the Prosecution of Persons Abducted in Breach of International Law' in International Law at a Time of Perplexity (ed. Y. Dinstein), Dordrecht, 1989, p. 407, and Higgins, Problems and Process, p. 69.

[166] See e.g. article 2(4) of the United Nations Charter and Nicaragua v. US, ICJ Reports, 1986, p. 110; 76 ILR, p. 349. See further below, chapter 20.

[167] Note, in particular, the view of the Legal Adviser of the US Department of State to the effect that '[w]hile international law therefore permits extraterritorial "arrests" in situations which permit a valid claim of self-defence, decisions about any extraterritorial arrest entail grave potential implications for US personnel, for the United States, and for our relations with other states', 84 AJIL, 1990, pp. 725, 727.

[168] See Mann, 'Jurisdiction', p. 415.

[169] See e.g. the Eichmann case, 36 ILR, pp. 5 and 277.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

taken place on or over the high seas from cases where it has occurred without consent on the territory of another state. A further distinction that has been made relates to situations where the abduction has taken place from a state with which the apprehending state has an extradition treaty which governs the conditions under which movement of alleged offenders occurs between the two. A final distinction may be drawn as between cases depending upon the type of offences with which the offender is charged, so that the problem of the apprehension interfering with the prosecution may be seen as less crucial in cases where recognised international crimes are alleged.[170] Of course, any such apprehension would constitute a violation of the human rights of the person concerned, but whether that would impact upon the exercise of jurisdiction as such is the key issue here.

Variations in approaches are evident between states. The US Court of Appeals in US v. Toscanino[171] held that the rule that jurisdiction was unaffected by an illegal apprehension[172] should not be applied where the presence of the defendant has been secured by force or fraud, but this approach has, it seems, been to a large extent eroded. In US ex rel. Lujan v. Gengler[173] it was noted that the rule in Toscanino was limited to cases of 'torture, brutality and similar outrageous conduct'.[174] The issue came before the US Supreme Court in Sosa v. Alvarez-Machain,[175] in which the view was taken that the issue essentially revolved around a strict interpretation of the relevant extradition treaty between Mexico and the US. The Court noted that where the terms of an extradition treaty in force between the states concerned prohibited abduction then jurisdiction could not be exercised. Otherwise the rule in Ker would apply and the prosecution would proceed. This applied even though there were some differences between the cases, in that, unlike the situation in Ker, the US government had been involved in the abduction

[170] See Higgins, Problems and Process, p. 69.

[171] 500 F.2d 267 (1974); 61 ILR, p. 190.

[172] See, in particular, Ker v. Illinois 119 US 436 (1886) and Frisbie v. Collins 342 US 519 (1952). These cases have given rise to the reference to the Ker–Frisbie doctrine.

[173] 510 F.2d 62 (1975); 61 ILR, p. 206. See also US v. Lira 515 F.2d 68 (1975); Lowenfeld, 'Kidnapping', p. 712; Afouneh v. Attorney-General 10 AD, p. 327, and Re Argoud 45 ILR, p. 90.

[174] This approach was reaffirmed in US v. Yunis both by the District Court, 681 F.Supp. 909, 918–21 (1988) and by the Court of Appeals, 30 ILM, 1991, pp. 403, 408–9.

[175] 119 L Ed 2d 441 (1992); 95 ILR, p. 355. See also M. Halberstam, 'In Defence of the Supreme Court Decision in Alvarez-Machain', 86 AJIL, 1992, p. 736, and M. J. Glennon, 'State-Sponsored Abduction: A Comment on United States v. Alvarez-Machain', ibid., p. 746.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

and the state from whose territory the apprehension took place had protested.[176]

In the UK, the approach has appeared to alter somewhat. In R v. Plymouth Justices, ex parte Driver,[177] it was noted that once a person was in lawful custody within the jurisdiction, the court had no power to inquire into the circumstances in which he had been brought into the jurisdiction. However, in R v. Horseferry Road Magistrates' Court, ex parte Bennett,[178] the House of Lords declared that where an extradition treaty existed with the relevant country under which the accused could have been returned, 'our courts will refuse to try him if he has been forcibly brought within our jurisdiction in disregard of those procedures by a process to which our own police, prosecuting or other executive authorities have been a knowing party'.[179] The approach in this case was extended in R v. Latif to cover entrapment.[180] However, where an accused was taking legal action to quash a decision to proceed with an extradition request, the fact that he had been lured into the jurisdiction was not sufficient to vitiate the proceedings since safeguards as to due process existed in the light of the Home Secretary's discretion and under the law of the state to whom he was to be extradited.[181] Further, in Ex parte Westfallen, the High Court took the view that where there had been no illegality, abuse of power or [176] 119 L Ed 2d 451; 95 ILR, p. 363. See also the Dissenting Opinion, which took the view that the abduction had in fact violated both international law and the extradition treaty, 119 L Ed 2d 456–79; 95 ILR, pp. 369–79. The accused was eventually acquitted and returned to Mexico: see Alvarez-Machain v. United States 107 F.3d 696, 699 (9th Cir. 1996). He also commenced an action for compensation. In that action the US Court of Appeals for the Ninth Circuit stated that his abduction was a violation of the law of nations in that international human rights law had been breached: see Alvarez-Machain v. United States 41 ILM, 2002, pp. 130, 133.

[177] [1986] 1 QB 95; 77 ILR, p. 351. See also Ex parte Susannah Scott (1829) 9 B & C 446; Sinclair v. HM Advocate (1890) 17 R (J) 38 and R v. Officer Commanding Depot Battalion RASC Colchester, ex parte Elliott [1949] 1 All ER 373. Cf. R v. Bow Street Magistrates, ex parte Mackerson (1981) 75 Cr App R 24.

[178] [1993] 3 WLR 90; 95 ILR, p. 380.

[179] [1993] 3 WLR 105; 95 ILR, p. 393, per Lord Griffiths. See also Lord Bridge, [1993] 3 WLR 110; 95 ILR, p. 399 and Lord Slynn, [1993] 3 WLR 125; 95 ILR, p. 416. The House of Lords was also influenced by the decision of the South Africa Supreme Court in State v. Ebrahim, 95 ILR, p. 417, where the conviction and sentence before a South African court of a person were set aside as a consequence of his illegal abduction by state officials from Swaziland. This view was based both on Roman-Dutch and South African common law and on international law.

[180] [1996] 1 WLR 104, see Lord Steyn, at 112–13. See also R v. Mullen [1999] 2 Cr App R 143.

[181] See In re Schmidt [1995] 1 AC 339; 111 ILR, p. 548 (House of Lords).

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

violation of international law or of the domestic law of the foreign states involved, the decisions under challenge could not be impugned nor the subsequent criminal proceedings be vitiated.[182]

The US Alien Tort Claims Act[183]

Under this Act, the First Congress established original district court jurisdiction over all causes where an alien sues for a tort 'committed in violation of the law of nations or a treaty of the United States'.[184] In Filartiga v. Pena-Irala,[185] the US Court of Appeals for the Second Circuit interpreted this provision to permit jurisdiction over a private tort action by a Paraguayan national against a Paraguayan police official for acts of torture perpetrated in that state, it being held that torture by a state official constituted a violation of international law. This amounted to an important move in the attempt to exercise jurisdiction in the realm of international human rights violations, although one clearly based upon a domestic statute permitting such court competence. The relevant issues in such actions would thus depend upon the definition of the 'law of nations' in particular cases.[186]

In Tel-Oren v. Libyan Arab Republic,[187] however, the Court dismissed an action under the same statute brought by survivors and representatives of persons murdered in an armed attack on an Israeli bus in 1978 for lack of subject-matter jurisdiction. The three judges differed in their reasoning. Judge Edwards held that the law of nations did not impose liability on non-state entities like the PLO. Judge Bork, in a departure from the Filartiga principles, declared that 'an explicit grant of a cause of action [had to exist] before a private individual [will] be allowed to enforce principles of international law in a federal tribunal',[188] while Senior Judge Robb held that the case was rendered non-justiciable by the political question doctrine.

[182] [1998] 1 WLR 652, 665–7. See also C. Warbrick, 'Judicial Jurisdiction and Abuse of Process', 49 ICLQ, 2000, p. 489.

[183] 28 USC, para. 1350 (1982), originally enacted as part of the Judiciary Act of 1789. See also 28 USC, para. 1331, and above, chapter 4, p. 159.

[184] Cassese notes that the extensive civil jurisdiction claimed under this Act has not been challenged by other states, 'When may Senior State Officials', p. 859.

[185] 630 F.2d 876 (2d Cir. 1980); 77 ILR, p. 169. See also 577 F.Supp. 860 (1984); 77 ILR, p. 185, awarding punitive damages.

[186] In establishing the content of the 'law of nations', the courts must interpret international law as it exists today, 630 F.2d 876, 881 (1980); 77 ILR, pp. 169, 175.

[187] 726 F.2d 774 (1984); 77 ILR, p. 204. See also 'Agora', 79 AJIL, 1985, pp. 92 ff. for a discussion of the case.

[188] 726 F.2d 801; 77 ILR, p. 230.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

Further restrictions upon the Filartiga doctrine have also been manifested. It has, for example, been held that the Alien Tort Claims Act does not constitute an exception to the principle of sovereign immunity so that a foreign state could not be sued,[189] while it has also been held that US citizens could not sue for violations of the law of nations under the Act.[190]

In Sanchez-Espinoza v. Reagan,[191] suit was brought against a variety of present and former US executive officials for violation inter alia of domestic and international law with regard to the US support of the 'Contra' guerrillas fighting against the Nicaraguan government. The Alien Tort Claims Act was cited, but the Court of Appeals noted that the statute arguably only covered private, non-governmental acts that violated a treaty or customary international law and, relying on Tel-Oren, pointed out that customary international law did not cover private conduct 'of this sort'.[192] Thus the claim for damages could only be sustained to the extent that the defendants acted in an official capacity and, even if the Alien Tort Claims Act applied to official state acts, the doctrine of domestic sovereign immunity precluded the claim. In Kadić v. Karadžić,[193] the US Court of Appeals emphasised the 'liability of private persons for certain violations of customary international law and the availability of the Alien Tort Act to remedy such violations'.[194] In particular, it was noted that the proscription of genocide and war crimes and other violations of international humanitarian law applied to both state and non-state actors, although torture and summary execution (when not perpetrated in the course of genocide or war crimes) were proscribed by international law only when committed by state officials or under colour of law.[195] Even in this case, it may be that all that was required was 'the semblance of official authority' rather than establishing statehood under the formal criteria of international law.[196] The Court also held that the Torture Victim Protection Act 1992, which provides a cause of action for torture and extrajudicial killing by an individual 'under actual or apparent authority, or colour of law, of any foreign nation', was not itself a jurisdictional statute and depended upon the establishment of jurisdiction under either

[189] Siderman v. Republic of Argentina 965 F.2d 699 (1992).
[190] Handel v. Artukovic 601 F.Supp. 1421 (1985); 79 ILR, p. 397.
[191] 770 F.2d 202 (1985); 80 ILR, p. 586. [192] 770 F.2d 206–7; 80 ILR, pp. 590–1.
[193] 34 ILM, 1995, p. 1592. [194] Ibid., p. 1600. [195] Ibid., pp. 1602–6.
[196] Ibid., p. 1607.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

the Alien Tort Act or under the general federal question jurisdiction of section 1331.[197]

The Alien Tort Act was relied upon again in the Amerada Hess case which concerned the bombing of a ship in international waters by Argentina during the Falklands war and where it was claimed that the federal courts had jurisdiction under the Act. A divided Court of Appeals[198] held that the Act provided, and the Foreign Sovereign Immunities Act did not preclude,[199] federal subject-matter jurisdiction over suits in tort by aliens against foreign sovereigns for violations of international law. However, the Supreme Court unanimously disagreed.[200] It was noted that the Act did not expressly authorise suits against foreign states and that at the time the Foreign Sovereign Immunities Act was enacted, the 1789 Act had never provided the jurisdictional basis for a suit against a foreign state.[201] Since the Congress had decided to deal comprehensively with sovereign immunity in the Foreign Sovereign Immunities Act, it appeared to follow that this Act alone provided the basis for federal jurisdiction over foreign states. This basis was thus exclusive. The Court did note, however, that the Alien Tort Claims Act was unaffected by the Foreign Sovereign Immunities Act in so far as non-state defendants were concerned.[202] In Alvarez-Machain v. United States, the accused in the case noted above[203] commenced an action for compensation under the Act following his acquittal. The Court of Appeals for the Ninth Circuit rejected the claim that the Act required that the international law principle violated should also constitute a norm of jus cogens. The Court also rejected the contention that the applicant could sue for the violation of Mexican sovereignty implicit in his abduction. However, it affirmed that the applicant's rights to freedom of movement, to remain in his country and to security of his person (which are part of the 'law of nations') were violated, while his detention was arbitrary since [197] Ibid., pp. 1607–8. Note, however, that since the Antiterrorism and Effective Death Penalty Act 1996 amending the Foreign Sovereign Immunities Act, an exception to immunity is created with regard to states, designated by the Department of State as terrorist states, which committed a terrorist act, or provided material support and resources to an individual or entity which committed such an act, which resulted in the death or personal injury of a US citizen.

[198] Amerada Hess Shipping Corp. v. Argentine Republic 830 F.2d 421 (1987); 79 ILR, p. 8.

[199] See below, chapter 13, p. 707.

[200] Argentine Republic v. Amerada Hess Shipping Corp. 109 S. Ct. 683 (1989); 81 ILR, p. 658.

[201] 109 S. Ct. 689; 81 ILR, pp. 664–5.

[202] 109 S. Ct. 690. See also Smith v. Libya 101 F.3d 239 (1996); 113 ILR, p. 534.

[203] See above, p. 681.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

not pursuant to a Mexican warrant. Accordingly, compensation under the Act could be claimed.[204]

The Alien Tort Claims Act was further discussed by the Supreme Court in Sosa v. Alvarez-Machain, where it was held that the Alien Tort Claims Act was a jurisdictional statute creating no new causes of action and enacted on the understanding that the common law would provide a cause of action for the modest number of international law violations thought to carry personal liability at the time, being offences against ambassadors, violation of safe conducts and piracy.[205]

Extradition[206]

The practice of extradition enables one state to hand over to another state suspected or convicted criminals who have fled to the territory of the former. It is based upon bilateral treaty law and does not exist as an obligation upon states in customary law.[207] It is usual to derive from existing treaties on the subject certain general principles, for example that of double criminality, i.e. that the crime involved should be a crime in both states concerned,[208] and that of specialty, i.e. a person surrendered may be tried and punished only for the offence for which extradition had been sought and granted.[209] In general, offences of a political [204] 41 ILM, 2002, p. 130. See also the decision of 3 June 2003.

[205] 542 US 692, 714 ff. (2004) and see above, chapter 4, p. 160. Note that in Rasul v. Bush, the Supreme Court held that it was immaterial that the petitioners invoking the Alien Tort statute were being held in military custody in Guantanamo Bay, 542 US 466 (2004).

[206] See e.g. I. A. Shearer, Extradition in International Law, Leiden, 1971; M. C. Bassiouni, International Extradition and World Public Order, Leiden, 1974; C. Nicholls, C. Montgomery and J. B. Knowles, The Law of Extradition and Mutual Assistance, 2nd edn, Oxford, 2007; I. Stanbrook and C. Stanbrook, The Law and Practice of Extradition, 2nd edn, Oxford, 2000; M. Forde, The Law of Extradition in the UK, London, 1995; A. Jones and A. Doobay, Jones and Doobay on Extradition and Mutual Assistance, London, 2004; G. Gilbert, Aspects of Extradition Law, Dordrecht, 1991, and Gilbert, Transnational Fugitive Offenders in International Law: Extradition and Other Mechanisms, The Hague, 1998; L. Henkin, R. C. Pugh, O. Schochter and H. Smit, International Law: Cases and Materials, 3rd edn, St Paul, 1993, p. 1111 and Oppenheim's International Law, p. 958. See also Study of the Secretariat on Succession of States in Respect of Bilateral Treaties, Yearbook of the ILC, 1970, vol. II, pp. 102, 105.

[207] See e.g. the Joint Declaration of Judges Evensen, Tarassov, Guillaume and Aguilar Maudsley, the Lockerbie case, ICJ Reports, 1992, pp. 3, 24; 94 ILR, pp. 478, 507 and the Dissenting Opinion of Judge Bedjaoui, ICJ Reports, 1992, p. 38; 94 ILR, p. 521.

[208] But see now the House of Lords decisions in Government of Denmark v. Nielsen [1984] 2 All ER 81; 74 ILR, p. 458 and United States Government v. McCaffery [1984] 2 All ER 570.

[209] See e.g. Oppenheim's International Law, p. 961.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

character have been excluded,[210] but this would not cover terrorist activities.[211] As noted above, it is common for many treaties laying down multiple bases for the exercise of jurisdiction to insist that states parties in whose territory the alleged offender is present either prosecute or extradite such person.[212] In addition, many treaties provide for the automatic inclusion within existing bilateral extradition treaties between states parties to such treaties of the offence concerned.[213] Many states will not allow the extradition of nationals to another state,[214] but this is usually in circumstances where the state concerned has wide powers to prosecute nationals for offences committed abroad. Further, the relevance of human rights law to the process should be noted in that extradition to a state that may torture or inhumanely treat the person concerned would, for example, violate the European Convention on Human Rights.[215]

[210] Ibid., p. 962.

[211] See e.g. the European Convention on the Suppression of Terrorism, 1977, article 1 of which provides a list of offences which are not to be regarded as political offences or inspired by political motives, an approach which is also adopted in article 11 of the Convention for the Suppression of Terrorist Bombing, 1997. See also the McMullen case, 74 AJIL, 1980, p. 434; the Eain case, ibid., p. 435; Re Piperno, ibid., p. 683 and US v. Mackin 668 F.2d 122 (1981); 79 ILR, p. 459. A revised directive on international extradition was issued by the US Department of State in 1981: see 76 AJIL, 1982, pp. 154–9. Note also the view of the British Home Secretary, The Times, 25 June 1985, p. 1, that the political offences 'loophole' as it applied to violent offences was not suitable to extradition arrangements between the democratic countries 'sharing the same high regard for the fundamental principles of justice and operating similar independent judicial systems'. The UK law relating to extradition was consolidated in the Extradition Act 1989. Note in addition the Extradition Act 2003, providing inter alia for fast-track extradition procedures within the European Union, extended by the UK in the Extradition Act 2003 (Designation of Part 2 Territories) Order 2003 to the US despite an assymetrical arrangement with the US under the UK–US Extradition Treaty, 2003: see e.g. Nicholls et al., Law of Extradition, pp. 10 ff. and Norris v. Secretary of State for the Home Department [2006] UWHC 280 (Admin) and Norris v. USA [2008] UKHL 16. See also Government of Belgium v. Postlethwaite [1987] 2 All ER 985 and R v. Chief Metropolitan Magistrate, ex parte Secretary of State for the Home Department [1988] 1 WLR 1204.

[212] See above, p. 673.

[213] See e.g. article 8 of the Hague Convention for the Suppression of the Unlawful Seizure of Aircraft, 1970, article 8 of the Montreal Convention for the Suppression of Unlawful Acts against the Safety of Civil Aviation, 1971, article 8 of the Internationally Protected Persons Convention, 1973 and article 4 of the European Convention for the Suppression of Terrorism, 1977.

[214] See e.g. article 3(1) of the French Extradition Law of 1927, and article 16 of the Basic Law of the Federal Republic of Germany.

[215] See e.g. the Soering case, European Court of Human Rights, 1989, Series A, No. 161; 98 ILR, p. 270 and Saadi v. Italy, European Court of Human Rights, judgment of 28 February 2008.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

Extraterritorial jurisdiction[216]

Claims have arisen in the context of economic issues whereby some states, particularly the United States, seek to apply their laws outside their territory[217] in a manner which may precipitate conflicts with other states.[218] Where the claims are founded upon the territorial and nationality theories of jurisdiction, problems do not often arise, but claims made upon the basis of the so-called 'effects' doctrine have provoked considerable controversy. This goes beyond the objective territorial principle to a situation where the state assumes jurisdiction on the grounds that the behaviour of a party is producing 'effects' within its territory. This is so even though all the conduct complained of takes place in another state.[219] The effects doctrine has been energetically maintained particularly by the US in the area of antitrust regulation.[220] The classic statement of the American [216] See e.g. Extraterritorial Jurisdiction (ed. A. V. Lowe), London, 1983; D. Rosenthal and W. Knighton, National Laws and International Commerce, London, 1982; K. M. Meessen, 'Antitrust Jurisdiction under Customary International Law', 78 AJIL, 1984, p. 783; A. V. Lowe, 'Blocking Extraterritorial Jurisdiction: The British Protection of Trading Interests Act 1980', 75 AJIL, 1981, p. 257; Akehurst, 'Jurisdiction', pp. 190 ff.; Extraterritorial Application of Law and Responses Thereto (ed. C. Olmstead), Oxford, 1984; B. Stern, 'L'Extra-territorialité "Revisitée": Où Il est Question des Affaires Alvarez-Machain, Pâte de Bois et de Quelques Autres', AFDI, 1992, p. 239; Higgins, Problems and Process, p. 73, and Oppenheim's International Law, p. 466. See also P. Torremans, 'Extraterritorial Application of EC and US Competition Law', 21 European Law Review, 1996, p. 280.

[217] Note that there is a general presumption against the extraterritorial application of legislation: see e.g. the House of Lords decision in Holmes v. Bangladesh Biman Corporation [1989] 1 AC 1112, 1126; 87 ILR, pp. 365, 369, per Lord Bridge, and Air India v. Wiggins [1980] 1 WLR 815, 819; 77 ILR, pp. 276, 279, per Lord Bridge, and the US Supreme Court decision in EEOC v. Arabian American Oil Company and Aramco Services 113 L Ed 2d 274, 282 (1991); 90 ILR, pp. 617, 622.

[218] The UK government has stated that it opposes all assertions of extraterritorial jurisdiction by other states on UK individuals and/or companies: see Ministerial Statement, HL Deb., vol. 673, cWA277–8, 21 July 2005, UKMIL, 76 BYIL, 2006, p. 850.

[219] The true 'effects' doctrine approach should be distinguished from other heads of jurisdiction such as the objective territorial principle, where part of the offence takes place within the jurisdiction: see e.g. US v. Noriega 808 F.Supp. 791 (1992); 99 ILR, p. 143. In many cases the disputes have centred upon nationality questions, the US regarding subsidiaries of US companies abroad as of US nationality even where such companies have been incorporated abroad, while the state of incorporation has regarded them as of its nationality and thus subject not to US law but to its law: see e.g. Higgins, Problems and Process, p. 73.

[220] See e.g. the US Sherman Antitrust Act 1896, 15 USC, paras. 1 ff. See also the controversies engendered by the US freezing of Iranian assets in 1979 and the embargo imposed under the Export Administration Act in 1981 and 1982 on equipment intended for use on the Siberian gas pipeline, R. Edwards, 'Extraterritorial Application of the US Iranian Assets Control Regulations', 75 AJIL, 1981, p. 870; J. Bridge, 'The Law and Politics of United

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

doctrine was made in US v. Aluminum Co. of America,[221] in which the Court declared that:

> any state may impose liabilities, even upon persons not within its allegiance, for conduct outside its borders that has consequences within its borders which the state reprehends.[222]

The doctrine was to some extent modified by the requirement of intention and the view that the effect should be substantial, but the wide-ranging nature of the concept aroused considerable opposition outside the US, as did American attempts to take evidence abroad under very broad pre-trial discovery provisions in US law[223] and the possibility of treble damage awards.[224] The US courts, perhaps in view of the growing opposition of foreign states, modified their approach in the Timberlane Lumber Co. v. Bank of America[225] and Mannington Mills v. Congoleum Corporation[226] cases. It was stated that in addition to the effects test, of the earlier cases, the courts had to take into account a balancing test, 'a jurisdictional rule of reason', involving a consideration of other nations' interests and the full nature of the relationship between the actors concerned and the US.[227] A series of factors that needed to be considered in the process of balancing was put forward in the latter case.[228] The view taken by the States Foreign Policy Export Controls', 4 Legal Studies, 1984, p. 2, and A. V. Lowe, 'Public International Law and the Conflict of Laws', 33 ICLQ, 1984, p. 575.

221 148 F.2d 416 (1945).

222 Ibid., p. 443. This approach was reaffirmed in a series of later cases: see e.g. US v. Timken Roller Bearing Co. 83 F.Supp. 284 (1949), affirmed 341 US 593 (1951); US v. The Watchmakers of Switzerland Information Center, Inc. cases, 133 F.Supp. 40 and 134 F.Supp. 710 (1963); 22 ILR, p. 168, and US v. General Electric Co. 82 F.Supp. 753 (1949) and 115 F.Supp. 835 (1953). See also Hazeltine Research Inc. v. Zenith Radio Corporation 239 F.Supp. 51 (1965), affirmed 395 US 100 (1969).

223 See e.g. the statement of the UK Attorney General that 'the wide investigating procedures under the United States antitrust legislation against persons outside the United States who are not United States citizens constitute an "extraterritorial" infringement of the proper jurisdiction and sovereignty of the United Kingdom', Rio Tinto Zinc v. Westinghouse Electric Corporation [1978] 2 WLR 81; 73 ILR, p. 296. See also Lowe, Extraterritorial Jurisdiction, pp. 159–60 and 165–71. But see Société Internationale v. Rogers 357 US 197 (1958); 26 ILR, p. 123; US v. First National City Bank 396 F.2d 897 (1968); 38 ILR, p. 112; In re Westinghouse Electric Corporation 563 F.2d 992 (1977) and In re Uranium Antitrust Litigation 480 F.Supp. 1138 (1979).

224 See e.g. Meessen, 'Antitrust Jurisdiction', p. 794.

225 549 F.2d 597 (1976); 66 ILR, p. 270.

226 595 F.2d 1287 (1979); 66 ILR, p. 487.

227 See particularly K. Brewster, Antitrust and American Business Abroad, New York, 1958.

228 595 F.2d 1287, 1297 (1979); 66 ILR, pp. 487, 496. See also the Timberlane case, 549 F.2d 597, 614 (1976); 66 ILR, pp. 270, 285. The need for judicial restraint in applying the effects doctrine in the light of comity was emphasised by the State Department: see 74 AJIL,

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

Third Restatement of Foreign Relations Law,[229] it should be noted, is that a state may exercise jurisdiction based on effects in the state, when the effect or intended effect is substantial and the exercise of jurisdiction is reasonable. It is noted that the principle of reasonableness calls for limiting the exercise of jurisdiction so as to minimise conflict with the jurisdiction of other states, particularly the state where the act takes place.[230] However, the assumption by the courts of a basically diplomatic function, that is, weighing and considering the interests of foreign states, stimulated criticism.[231]

The US courts modified their approach. In Laker Airways v. Sabena,[232] the Court held inter alia that once US antitrust law was declared applicable, it could not be qualified or ignored by virtue of comity. The judicial interest balancing under the Timberlane precedent should not be engaged in since the courts on both sides of the Atlantic were obliged to follow the directions of the executive. Accordingly, the reconciliation of conflicting interests was to be undertaken only by diplomatic negotiations. Quite how such basic and crucial differences of opinion over the effects doctrine can be resolved is open to question and international fora have been suggested as the most appropriate way forward.[233]

In the Hartford Fire Insurance Co. v. California case before the US Supreme Court,[234] Judge Souter writing for the majority stated that it 1980, pp. 179–83. See also the US Foreign Trade Antitrust Improvements Act 1982, where jurisdiction was said to be dependent on 'direct, substantial and reasonably foreseeable effect'.

229 Para. 402, p. 239 and para. 403, p. 250.

230 See also the US Department of Justice, Antitrust Enforcement Guidelines for International Operations, 1988, pp. 31–2. But see now the Supreme Court's decision in Hartford Fire Insurance Co. v. California 113 S. Ct. 2891 (1993), discussed below.

231 See e.g. H. Maier, 'Interest Balancing and Extraterritorial Jurisdiction', 31 American Journal of Comparative Law, 1983, p. 579, and Maier, 'Resolving Extraterritorial Conflicts or There and Back Again', 25 Va. JIL, 1984, p. 7; W. Fugate, 'Antitrust Aspect of the Revised Restatement of Foreign Relations Law', ibid., p. 49, and Bowett, 'Jurisdiction', pp. 21–2. See also Lowe, Extraterritorial Jurisdiction, pp. 58–62.

232 731 F.2d 909 (1984). However, cf. the continuation of the Timberlane litigation, 749 F.2d 1378 (1984), which reaffirms the approach of the first Timberlane case.

233 See e.g. Bowett, 'Jurisdiction', pp. 24–6 and Meessen, 'Antitrust Jurisdiction', pp. 808–10. See also Lowe, Extraterritorial Jurisdiction, part 3.

234 113 S. Ct. 2891 (1993). See e.g. A. F. Lowenfeld, 'Conflict, Balancing of Interest, and the Exercise of Jurisdiction to Prescribe: Reflections of the Insurance Antitrust Case', 89 AJIL, 1995, p. 42; P. R. Trimble, 'The Supreme Court and International Law: The Demise of Restatement Section 403', ibid., p. 53, and L. Kramer, 'Extraterritorial Application of American Law after the Insurance Antitrust Case: A Reply to Professors Lowenfeld and Trimble', ibid., p. 750.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

was well established that the relevant US legislation (the Sherman Act) 'applies to foreign conduct that was meant to produce and did in fact produce some substantial effect in the United States'.[235] It was felt that a person subject to regulation by two states (here the UK with regard to the London reinsurance market and the US) could comply with the laws of both and there was no need in this case to address other considerations concerning international comity.[236] The Dissenting Opinion in this case took the view that such exercise of extraterritorial jurisdiction was subject to the test of reasonableness,[237] a view that the majority did not embrace.

Foreign states had started reacting to the effects doctrine by the end of the 1970s and early 1980s by enacting blocking legislation. Under the UK Protection of Trading Interests Act 1980, for example, the Secretary of State in dealing with extraterritorial actions by a foreign state may prohibit the production of documents or information to the latter's courts or authorities. In addition, a UK national or resident may sue in an English court for recovery of multiple damages paid under the judgment of a foreign court.[238]

The Protection of Trading Interests Act was used in connection with the action by the liquidator of Laker Airways to sue various major airlines, the Midland Bank and McDonnell Douglas in the US for conspiracy to violate the antitrust laws of the United States. Two of the airlines, British Airways and British Caledonian, sought to prevent this suit in the US by bringing an action to restrain the liquidator in the UK. Thus, the effects doctrine was not actually in issue in the case, which centred upon the application of the US antitrust law in connection with alleged conspiratorial activities in the US. The UK government, holding the view that the Bermuda II agreement regulating transatlantic airline activity[239] prohibited antitrust actions against UK airlines, issued instructions under the 1980 Act forbidding compliance with any requirement imposed

[235] 113 S. Ct. 2891, at 2909. [236] Ibid., at 2911. [237] Ibid., at 2921.

[238] See Lowe, 'Conflict of Law', pp. 257–82; 50 BYIL, 1979, pp. 357–62 and 21 ILM, 1982, pp. 840–50. See also the Australian Foreign Proceedings (Prohibition of Certain Evidence) Act 1976, the Danish Limitation of Danish Shipowners' Freedom to Give Information to Authorities of Foreign Countries 1967 and the Finnish Law Prohibiting a Shipowner in Certain Cases to Produce Documents 1968. In some cases, courts have applied aspects of domestic law to achieve the same aim: see e.g. the Fruehauf case, 5 ILM, 1966, p. 476. Several states have made diplomatic protests at extraterritorial jurisdictional claims: see e.g. Report of the 51st Session of the International Law Association, 1964, pp. 565 ff.

[239] See The Use of Airspace and Outer Space (ed. Chia-Jui Cheng), The Hague, 1993, pp. 25 ff.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

pursuant to US antitrust measures, including the provision of information.[240] The Court of Appeal felt that the order and directions required them in essence to prevent the Laker action in the US,[241] but the House of Lords disagreed.[242] It was held that the order and directions did not affect the appellant's right to pursue the claim in the US because the 1980 Act was concerned with 'requirements' and 'prohibitions' imposed by a foreign court,[243] so that the respondents would not be prohibited by the direction from paying damages on a 'judgment' given against them in the US.[244] In fact the Court refused to restrain the US action.

The Court also refused to grant judicial review of the order and directions, since the appellant had failed to show that no reasonable minister would have issued such order and directions, this being the requisite test in ministerial decisions concerning international relations.[245] The case, however, did not really turn on the 1980 Act, but it was the first time the issue had come before the courts.[246]

The dispute over extraterritoriality between the US and many other states has been apparent across a range of situations since the freezing of Iranian assets and the Siberian pipeline episode. The operation of the Western supervision of technological exports to the communist bloc through COCOM was also affected, while that system still existed, since the US sought to exercise jurisdiction with respect to exports from third states to communist states.[247] The adoption of legislation in the US imposing sanctions on Cuba, Iran and Libya has also stimulated opposition in view of the extraterritorial reach of such measures. The extension of [240] The Protection of Trading Interests (US Anti-trust Measures) Order 1983. Two directions were issued as well.

[241] British Airways Board v. Laker Airways Ltd [1983] 3 All ER 375; 74 ILR, p. 36.

[242] [1984] 3 All ER 39; 74 ILR, p. 65. But see also Midland Bank plc v. Laker Airways Ltd [1986] 2 WLR 707; 118 ILR, p. 540.

[243] S. 1(3). [244] [1984] 3 All ER 39, 55–6; 74 ILR, p. 84.

[245] [1984] 3 All ER 39, 54–5; 74 ILR, p. 83. See also Associated Provincial Picture Houses Ltd v. Wednesbury Corp. [1947] 2 All ER 680.

[246] See also the statement by the Minister of State, Department of Trade and Industry, listing the statutory instruments, orders and directions made under the Protection of Trading Interests Act, 220 HC Deb., cols. 768–70, Written Answers, 12 March 1993; UKMIL, 64 BYIL, 1993, pp. 644–6.

[247] See the US and UK agreement in 1984 to consult should problems appear to arise with regard to the application of US export controls to individuals or businesses in the UK, or if the UK were contemplating resorting to the Protection of Trading Interests Act in relation to such controls, 68 HC Deb., col. 332, Written Answer, 23 November 1984, and 88 HC Deb., col. 373, Written Answer, 6 December 1985. See also Current Legal Developments, 36 ICLQ, 1987, p. 398.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

sanctions against Cuba in the Cuban Democracy Act of 1992, for example, prohibited the granting of licences under the US Cuban Assets Control Regulations for certain transactions between US-owned or controlled firms in the UK and Cuba, and this led to the adoption of an order under the Protection of Trading Interests Act 1980 by the UK government.[248] The adoption of the Helms-Burton legislation in March 1996, amending the 1992 Act by further tightening sanctions against Cuba, provided inter alia for the institution of legal proceedings before the US courts against foreign persons or companies deemed to be 'trafficking' in property expropriated by Cuba from American nationals.[249] In addition, the legislation enables the US to deny entry into the country of senior executives (and their spouses and minors) of companies deemed by the US State Department to be so 'trafficking'. This legislation, together with the adoption of the D'Amato Act in mid-1996,[250] led to protests from many states, including the UK and Canada.[251] The Inter-American Juridical Committee of the Organisation of American States, 'directed' by the OAS General Assembly 'to examine and decide upon the validity under international law' of the Helms-Burton legislation,[252] unanimously concluded that:

> the exercise of such jurisdiction over acts of 'trafficking in confiscated property' does not conform with the norms established by international law for the exercise of jurisdiction in each of the following respects:
>
> a) A prescribing state does not have the rights to exercise jurisdiction over acts of 'trafficking' abroad by aliens unless specific conditions are fulfilled which do not appear to be satisfied in this situation.

[248] See UKMIL, 64 BYIL, 1993, p. 643. The proposed adoption of this legislation led to UK protests as well: see UKMIL, 63 BYIL, 1992, pp. 726 ff.

[249] This part of the legislation was suspended by the President for six months as from July 1996: see, as to the legislation, 35 ILM, 1996, p. 357.

[250] Intended to impose sanctions on persons or entities participating in the development of the petroleum resources of Iran or Libya. As to the legislation concerning Iran and Libya, see 35 ILM, 1996, p. 1273.

[251] Canada also announced that legislation would be introduced under the Foreign Extraterritorial Measures Act 1985 to help protect Canadian companies against the US Act: see Canadian Foreign Affairs Ministry Press Release No. 115, 17 June 1996. Note that the UN General Assembly, in resolution 50/10 (1995), called upon the US to end its embargo against Cuba. See also A. F. Lowenfeld, 'Congress and Cuba: The Helms-Burton Act', 90 AJIL, 1996, p. 419; B. M. Clagett, 'Title III of the Helms-Burton Act is Consistent with International Law', ibid., p. 434; S. K. Alexander, 'Trafficking in Confiscated Cuban Property', 16 Dickinson Journal of International Law, 1998, p. 523, and A. V. Lowe, 'US Extraterritorial Jurisdiction: The Helms-Burton and D'Amato Acts', 46 ICLQ, 1997, p. 378.

[252] OAS Doc. OEA/SER.P AG/doc.3375/96, 4 June 1996.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

> b) A prescribing state does not have the rights to exercise jurisdiction over acts of 'trafficking' abroad by aliens under circumstances where neither the alien nor the conduct in question has any connnection with its territory and where no apparent connection exists between such acts and the protection of its essential sovereign interests.[253]

The European Community, in particular, took a strong stance on the US approach. It declared in a letter to the Congressional Committee considering changes in the US export control legislation in March 1984 that:

> US claims to jurisdiction over European subsidiaries of US companies and over goods and technology of US origin located outside the US are contrary to the principles of international law and can only lead to clashes of both a political and legal nature. These subsidiaries, goods and technology must be subject to the laws of the country where they are located.[254]

There was an attempt to solve such extraterritoriality conflicts in the Agreement Regarding the Application of Competition Laws signed by the European Commission on 23 September 1991 with the US.[255] This called inter alia for notification and co-ordination of such activities, with emphasis placed upon the application of comity. However, the European Court of Justice held that the Commission had acted ultra vires in concluding such an agreement.[256] The Agreement was re-introduced in the Decision of the Council and the Commission of 10 April 1995, which rectified certain competence problems arising as a result of the decision.[257] Nevetheless, it remains of uncertain value, not least because the question of private law suits in the US is not dealt with. The root problems of conflict have not been eradicated at all.

The adoption in 1992 of US legislation amending the Cuban Assets Control Regime stimulated a démarche from the European Community protesting against the extraterritorial application of US law,[258] as did the adoption of the Helms-Burton Act of 1996.[259] However, the EU–US [253] CJI/SO/II/doc.67/96 rev. 5, para. 9, 23 August 1996; 35 ILM, 1996, pp. 1329, 1334. It should be noted that under article 98 of the Charter of the OAS, Opinions of the Committee have no binding effect.

[254] Cited in Current Legal Developments, 36 ICLQ, 1987, p. 399. See also UKMIL, 56 BYIL, 1985, pp. 480–1.

[255] See 30 ILM, 1991, p. 1487. See also Torremans, 'Extraterritorial', pp. 289 ff.

[256] Case C-327/91, French Republic v. Commission of the European Communities [1994] ECR I-3641.

[257] [1995] OJ L 95/45. [258] See UKMIL, 63 BYIL, 1992, p. 725.

[259] See e.g. European Commission Press Release WE 27/96, 18 July 1996 and 35 ILM, 1996, p. 397. See also Council Regulation No. 2271/96, 36 ILM, 1997, p. 127, and the Canadian

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

Memorandum of Understanding of 1997 provided for the continued suspension by the US of Title III so long as the EU continued efforts to promote democracy in Cuba.[260]

However, the European Community itself has wrestled with the question of exercising jurisdiction over corporations not based in the Community in the field of competition law.[261] In ICI v. Commission,[262] the European Court of Justice established jurisdiction with regard to a series of restrictive agreements to fix the price of dyestuffs on the ground that the defendant undertakings had corporate subsidiaries that were based within the Community, and declined to follow the Advocate General's suggestion[263] that jurisdiction should be founded upon direct and immediate, reasonably foreseeable and substantial effect.

The Wood Pulp case[264] concerned a number of non-EC companies and an association of US companies alleged to have entered into a price-fixing arrangement. The European Commission had levied fines on the jurisdictional basis that the effects of the price agreements and practices were direct, substantial and intended within the EC.[265] An action was then commenced before the European Court of Justice for annulment of the Commission's decision under article 173 of the EEC Treaty. Advocate General Darmon argued that international law permitted a state (and therefore the EC) to apply its competition laws to acts done by foreigners abroad if those acts had direct, substantial and foreseeable effects within the state concerned.[266]

The Court, however, took the view that the companies concerned had acted within the EC and were therefore subject to Community law. It was noted that where producers from third states sell directly to purchasers within the Community and engage in price competition in order to win orders from those customers, that constitutes competition within Foreign Extraterritorial Measures Act 1996 (countering the Helms-Burton Act), ibid., p. 111.

260 36 ILM, 1997, p. 529. On 18 May 1998, the Understanding with Respect to Disciplines for the Strengthening of Investment Protection was reached whereby the EU agreed to suspend action in the World Trade Organisation against the extraterritorial aspects of Helms-Burton in exchange for an EU-wide exemption by the US from the extraterritorial elements of the Act: see UKMIL, 76 BYIL, 2006, pp. 850–1.

261 But not the UK: see e.g. Attorney General's Reference (No. 1 of 1982) [1983] 3 WLR 72, where the Court of Appeal refused to extend the scope of local jurisdiction over foreign conspiracies based on the effects principle.

262 [1972] ECR 619; 48 ILR, p. 106. 263 [1972] ECR 619, 693–4.

264 A. Ahlstrom Oy v. Commission [1988] 4 CMLR 901. 265 Ibid., p. 916.

266 Ibid., p. 932.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

the Community, and, where such producers sell at prices that are actually co-ordinated, that restricts competition within the Community within the meaning of article 85 of the EEC Treaty. It was stressed that the decisive factor was the place where the price-fixing agreement was actually implemented, not where the agreement was formulated.[267] In other words, the Court founded its jurisdiction upon an interpretation of the territoriality principle, if somewhat stretched. It did not take the opportunity presented to it by the opinion of the Advocate General of accepting the effects principle of jurisdiction. Nevertheless, the case does appear to suggest that price-fixing arrangements intended to have an effect within the Community that are implemented there would be subject to the jurisdiction of the Community, irrespective of the nationality of the companies concerned and of the place where the agreement was reached.[268]

Suggestions for further reading

M. Akehurst, 'Jurisdiction in International Law', 46 BYIL, 1972–3, p. 145

R. Donner, The Regulation of Nationality in International Law, 2nd edn, New York, 1995

F. A. Mann, 'The Doctrine of Jurisdiction in International Law Revisited After Twenty Years', 186 HR, 1984, p. 9

L. Reydams, Universal Jurisdiction: International and Municipal Legal Perspectives, Oxford, 2002

[267] Ibid., pp. 940–1. Note that the Court held that the association of US companies (KEA) was not subject to Community jurisdiction on the ground that it had not played a separate role in the implementation within the Community of the arrangements in dispute, ibid., pp. 942–3.

[268] See e.g. D. Lange and J. B. Sandage, 'The Wood Pulp Decision and its Implications for the Scope of EC Competition Law', 26 Common Market Law Review, 1989, p. 137, and L. Collins, European Community Law in the United Kingdom, 4th edn, London, 1990, p. 7. See also S. Weatherill and P. Beaumont, EU Law, 3rd edn, London, 1999, chapter 22.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

13

Immunities from jurisdiction

In the previous chapter, the circumstances in which a state may seek to exercise its jurisdiction in relation to civil and criminal matters were considered. In this chapter the reverse side of this phenomenon will be examined, that is those cases in which jurisdiction cannot be exercised as it normally would because of special factors. In other words, the concern is with immunity from jurisdiction and those instances where there exist express exceptions to the usual application of a state's legal powers.

The concept of jurisdiction revolves around the principles of state sovereignty, equality and non-interference. Domestic jurisdiction as a notion attempts to define an area in which the actions of the organs of government and administration are supreme, free from international legal principles and interference. Indeed, most of the grounds for jurisdiction can be related to the requirement under international law to respect the territorial integrity and political independence of other states.

Immunity from jurisdiction, whether as regards the state itself or as regards its diplomatic representatives, is grounded in this requirement. Although constituting a derogation from the host state's jurisdiction, in that, for example, the UK cannot exercise jurisdiction over foreign ambassadors within its territory, it is to be construed nevertheless as an essential part of the recognition of the sovereignty of foreign states, as well as an aspect of the legal equality of all states.

Sovereign immunity[1]

Sovereignty until comparatively recently was regarded as appertaining to a particular individual in a state and not as an abstract manifestation

[1] See generally e.g. H. Fox, The Law of State Immunity, Oxford, 2002; A. Dickinson, R. Lindsay and J. P. Loonam, State Immunity: Selected Materials and Commentary, Oxford, 2004; I. Pingel-Lenuzza, Les Immunités des États en Droit International, Brussels, 1998; J. Bröhmer, State Immunity and the Violation of Human Rights, The Hague, 1997; G. M. Badr, of the existence and power of the state.[2] The sovereign was a definable person, to whom allegiance was due. As an integral part of this mystique, the sovereign could not be made subject to the judicial processes of his country. Accordingly, it was only fitting that he could not be sued in foreign courts. The idea of the personal sovereign would undoubtedly have been undermined had courts been able to exercise jurisdiction over foreign sovereigns. This personalisation was gradually replaced by the abstract concept of state sovereignty, but the basic mystique remained. In addition, the independence and equality of states made it philosophically as well as practically difficult to permit municipal courts of one country to manifest their power over foreign sovereign states, without their consent.[3] Until recently, the international law relating to sovereign (or state) immunity relied virtually exclusively upon domestic case-law and latterly legislation, although the European Convention on State Immunity, 1972 was a notable exception. However, in 2004 the UN adopted the Convention on Jurisdictional Immunities of States and Their Property.[4]

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

State Immunity, The Hague, 1984; S. Sucharitkul, State Immunities and Trading Activities in International Law, Leiden, 1959, and Sucharitkul, 'Immunities of Foreign States before National Authorities', 149 HR, 1976, p. 87; I. Sinclair, 'The Law of Sovereign Immunity: Recent Developments', 167 HR, 1980, p. 113; A. Aust, 'The Law of State Immunity', 53 ICLQ, 2004, p. 255; UN Legislative Series, Materials on Jurisdictional Immunities of States and Their Property, New York, 1982; 10 Netherlands YIL, 1979; J. Candrian, L'Immunité des États face aux Droits de l'Homme et à la Protection des Biens Culturels, Zurich, 2005; Droit des Immunités et Exigencies du Procès Équitable (ed. I. Pingel), Paris, 2004; H. Lauterpacht, 'The Problem of Jurisdictional Immunities of Foreign States', 28 BYIL, 1951, p. 220; R. Higgins, 'Certain Unresolved Aspects of the Law of State Immunity', 29 NILR, 1982, p. 265; J. Crawford, 'International Law of Foreign Sovereigns: Distinguishing Immune Transactions', 54 BYIL, 1983, p. 75; C. J. Lewis, State and Diplomatic Immunity, 3rd edn, London, 1990; C. H. Schreuer, State Immunity: Some Recent Developments, Cambridge, 1988; Nguyen Quoc Dinh, P. Daillier and A. Pellet, Droit International Public, 7th edn, Paris, 2002, p. 450, and Oppenheim's International Law (eds. R. Y. Jennings and A. D. Watts), 9th edn, London, 1992, p. 341. See also the cases on sovereign immunity collected in ILR, volumes 63–5; ILA, Report of the Sixtieth Conference, 1982, p. 325 and Report of the Sixty-sixth Conference, 1994, p. 452; Annuaire de l'Institut de Droit International, vol. 64 I, 1991, p. 84, and Report of the International Law Commission, 1991, A/46/10, p. 8.

[2] See A. Watts, 'The Legal Position in International Law of Heads of State, Heads of Governments and Foreign Ministers', 247 HR, 1994 III, p. 13.

[3] See also Ex parte Pinochet (No. 3) [2000] 1 AC 147, 201 (per Lord Browne-Wilkinson) and 268–9 (per Lord Millett); 119 ILR, pp. 152, 221–3.

[4] See e.g. E. Denza, 'The 2005 UN Convention on State Immunity in Perspective', 55 ICLQ, 2006, p. 395; R. Gardiner, 'UN Convention on State Immunity: Form and Function', 55 ICLQ, 2006, p. 407; G. Hafner and L. Lange, 'La Convention des Nations Unies sur les Immunités Jurisdictionnelles des États et de Leurs Biens', 50 AFDI, 2004, p. 45, and H. Fox, 'In Defence of State Immunity: Why the UN Convention on State Immunity is Important', 55 ICLQ, 2006, p. 399.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

The classic case illustrating the relationship between territorial jurisdiction and sovereign immunity is The Schooner Exchange v. McFaddon,[5] decided by the US Supreme Court. Chief Justice Marshall declared that the jurisdiction of a state within its own territory was exclusive and absolute, but it did not encompass foreign sovereigns. He noted that the:

> perfect equality and absolute independence of sovereigns . . . have given rise to a class of cases in which every sovereign is understood to waive the exercise of a part of that complete exclusive territorial jurisdiction, which has been stated to be the attribute of every nation.[6]

Lord Browne-Wilkinson stated in Ex parte Pinochet (No. 3) that,

> It is a basic principle of international law that one sovereign state (the forum state) does not adjudicate on the conduct of a foreign state. The foreign state is entitled to procedural immunity from the processes of the forum state. This immunity extends to both criminal and civil liability.[7]

Lord Millett in Holland v. Lampen-Wolfe put the point as follows:

> State immunity . . . is a creature of customary international law and derives from the equality of sovereign states. It is not a self-imposed restriction on the jurisdiction of its courts which the United Kingdom has chosen to adopt. It is a limitation imposed from without upon the sovereignty of the United Kingdom itself.[8]

Sovereign immunity is closely related to two other legal doctrines, non-justiciability and act of state. Reference has been made earlier to the interaction between the various principles,[9] but it is worth noting here that the concepts of non-justiciability and act of state posit an area of international activity of states that is simply beyond the competence of the domestic tribunal in its assertion of jurisdiction, for example, that the courts would not adjudicate upon the transactions of foreign sovereign states.[10] On the

[5] 7 Cranch 116 (1812).

[6] Ibid., p. 137. It therefore followed that, 'national ships of war entering the port of a friendly power open for their reception, are to be considered as exempted by the consent of that power from its jurisdiction'. Such rules would not apply to private ships which are susceptible to foreign jurisdiction abroad. See also Republic of the Philippines v. Pimentel 553 US_(2008), US Supreme Court, 12 June 2008, Slip Opinion, pp. 11–12.

[7] [2000] 1 AC 147, 201; 119 ILR, p. 152.

[8] [2000] 1 WLR 1573, 1588; 119 ILR, p. 367.

[9] See above, chapter 4, p. 179.

[10] See e.g. Buttes Gas and Oil Co. v. Hammer (No. 3) [1982] AC 888; 64 ILR, p. 332; Buck v. Attorney-General [1965] 1 Ch. 745; 42 ILR, p. 11 and Goff J, I° Congreso del Partido [1978] 1 QB 500, 527–8; 64 ILR, pp. 154, 178–9. See also Sinclair, 'Sovereign Immunity', p. 198.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

other hand, the principle of jurisdictional immunity asserts that in particular situations a court is prevented from exercising the jurisdiction that it possesses. Thus, immunity from jurisdiction does not mean exemption from the legal system of the territorial state in question. The two concepts are distinct. In International Association of Machinists & Aerospace Workers v. OPEC,[11] it was declared that the two concepts were similar in that they reflect the need to respect the sovereignty of foreign states, but that they differed in that the former went to the jurisdiction of the court and was a principle of international law, whereas the latter constituted a prudential doctrine of domestic law having internal constitutional roots. Accordingly, the question of sovereign immunity is a procedural one and one to be taken as a preliminary issue,[12] logically preceding the issue of act of state.[13]

In practice, however, the distinction is not always so evident and arguments presented before the court founded both upon non-justiciability and sovereign immunity are to be expected. It is also an interesting point to consider the extent to which the demise of the absolute immunity approach has affected the doctrine of non-justiciability.

As far as the act of state doctrine is concerned in particular in this context, some disquiet has been expressed by courts that the application of that principle may in certain circumstances have the effect of reintroducing the absolute theory of sovereign immunity. In Letelier v. Republic of Chile,[14] for example, Chile argued that even if its officials had ordered

See further above, p. 182. Note also that 'a claim to state immunity is essentially a public claim that demands open litigation', Harb v. King Fahd [2005] EWCA Civ 632, para. 28, per Thorpe LJ.

[11] 649 F.2d 1354, 1359; 66 ILR, pp. 413, 418. Reaffirmed in Asociacion de Reclamantes v. The United Mexican States 22 ILM, 1983, pp. 625, 641–2. See also Ramirez v. Weinberger 23 ILM, 1984, p. 1274; Goldwater v. Carter 444 US 996 (1979) and Empresa Exportadora de Azucar v. Industria Azucarera Nacional SA [1983] 2 LL. R 171; 64 ILR, p. 368.

[12] This has been reaffirmed by the International Court of Justice in its Advisory Opinion in the Difference Relating to Immunity from Legal Process case, ICJ Reports, 1999, pp. 62, 88; 121 ILR, pp. 405, 432–3. Mance LJ stated in the Court of Appeal decision in Jones v. Saudi Arabia that 'claims to state immunity should be resolved at an early stage in the proceedings', [2004] EWCA Civ 1394, para. 10; 129 ILR, p. 653. See also Republic of the Philippines v. Pimentel 553 US-(2008), US Supreme Court, 12 June 2008, Slip Opinion, p. 11, holding that consideration of the merits of the case where sovereign immunity was pleaded would itself constitute an infringement of sovereign immunity.

[13] See e.g. Siderman v. Republic of Argentina 965 F.2d 699 (1992); 103 ILR, p. 454.

[14] 488 F.Supp. 665 (1980); 63 ILR, p. 378. Note that the US Court of Appeals has held that the Foreign Sovereign Immunities Act 1976 does not supersede the act of state doctrine: see Helen Liu v. Republic of China 29 ILM, 1990, p. 192.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

the assassination of Letelier in the US, such acts could not be the subject of discussion in the US courts as the orders had been given in Chile. This was not accepted by the Court since to do otherwise would mean emasculating the Foreign Sovereign Immunities Act by permitting a state to bring back the absolute immunity approach 'under the guise of the act of state doctrine'.[15] In somewhat different circumstances, Kerr LJ signalled his concern in Maclaine Watson v. The International Tin Council[16] that the doctrine of non-justiciability might be utilised to bypass the absence of sovereign immunity with regard to a state's commercial activities.

Of course, once a court has determined that the relevant sovereign immunity legislation permits it to hear the case, it may still face the act of state argument. Such legislation implementing the restrictive immunity approach does not supplant the doctrine of act of state or non-justiciability,[17] although by accepting that the situation is such that immunity does not apply the scope for the non-justiciability plea is clearly much reduced.[18]

The absolute immunity approach

The relatively uncomplicated role of the sovereign and of government in the eighteenth and nineteenth centuries logically gave rise to the concept of absolute immunity, whereby the sovereign was completely immune from foreign jurisdiction in all cases regardless of circumstances. However, the unparalleled growth in the activities of the state, especially with regard to commercial matters, has led to problems and in most countries to a modification of the above rule. The number of governmental agencies and public corporations, nationalised industries and other state organs created a reaction against the concept of absolute immunity, partly because it would enable state enterprises to have an advantage over private companies. Accordingly many states began to adhere to the doctrine of restrictive immunity, under which immunity was available as regards governmental activity, but not where the state was engaging in commercial activity. Governmental acts with regard to which immunity would be granted are termed acts jure imperii, while those relating to private or trade activity are termed acts jure gestionis.

[15] 488 F.Supp. 665, 674. [16] [1988] 3 WLR 1169, 1188; 80 ILR, pp. 191, 209.

[17] See International Association of Machinists & Aerospace Workers v. OPEC 649 F.2d 1354, 1359–60; 66 ILR, pp. 413, 418. See also Liu v. Republic of China 29 ILM, 1990, pp. 192, 205.

[18] See the interesting discussion of the relationship between non-justiciability and immunity by Evans J in Australia and New Zealand Banking Group v. Commonwealth of Australia, 1989, transcript, pp. 59–60.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

The leading practitioner of the absolute immunity approach has been the United Kingdom, and this position was established in a number of important cases.[19]

In the Parlement Belge case,[20] the Court of Appeal emphasised that the principle to be deduced from all the relevant preceding cases was that every state > declines to exercise by means of its courts any of its territorial jurisdiction over the person of any sovereign or ambassador of any other state, or over the public property of any state which is destined to public use . . . though such sovereign, ambassador or property be within its jurisdiction.[21]

The wide principle expressed in this case gave rise to the question as to what kind of legal interest it was necessary for the foreign sovereign to have in property so as to render it immune from the jurisdiction of the British courts.

Commonly regarded as the most extreme expression of the absolute immunity doctrine is the case of the Porto Alexandre.[22] This concerned a Portuguese requisitioned vessel against which a writ was issued in an English court for non-payment of dues for services rendered by tugs near Liverpool. The vessel was exclusively engaged in private trading operations, but the Court felt itself constrained by the terms of the Parlement Belge principle to dismiss the case in view of the Portuguese government interest.

Differences of opinion as to the application of the immunity rules were revealed in the House of Lords in the Cristina case.[23] This followed a Spanish Republican government decree requisitioning ships registered in Bilbao which was issued while the Cristina was on the high seas. On its arrival in Cardiff the Republican authorities took possession of the ship, whereupon its owners proceeded to issue a writ claiming possession. The case turned on the argument to dismiss the case, by the Republican government, in view of its sovereign immunity. The majority of the House

[19] But note a series of early cases which are not nearly so clear in their adoption of a broad absolute immunity doctrine: see e.g. The Prins Frederik (1820) 2 Dod. 451; Duke of Brunswick v. King of Hanover (1848) 2 HLC 1 and De Haber v. Queen of Portugal (1851) 17 QB 171. See also Phillimore J in The Charkieh (1873) LR 4A and E 59.

[20] (1880) 5 PD 197.

[21] Brett LJ, ibid., pp. 214–15. Note, of course, that the principle relates to public property destined for public, not private, use.

[22] [1920] P. 30; 1 AD, p. 146. See e.g. Sinclair, 'Sovereign Immunity', p. 126. See also The Jupiter [1924] P. 236, 3 AD, p. 136.

[23] [1938] AC 485; 9 AD, p. 250.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

of Lords accepted this in view of the requisition decree taking over the ship.

However, two of the Lords criticised the Porto Alexandre decision and doubted whether immunity covered state trading vessels,[24] while Lord Atkin took more of a fundamentalist absolute approach.[25]

In Krajina v. Tass Agency[26] the Court of Appeal held that the Agency was a state organ of the USSR and was thus entitled to immunity from local jurisdiction. This was followed in Baccus SRL v. Servicio Nacional del Trigo,[27] where the Court felt that the defendants, although a separate legal person under Spanish law, were in effect a department of state of the Spanish government. How the entity was actually constituted was regarded as an internal matter, and it was held entitled to immunity from suit.

A different view from the majority was taken by Lord Justice Singleton who, in a Dissenting Opinion, condemned what he regarded as the extension of the doctrine of sovereign immunity to separate legal entities.[28]

There is some limitation to the absolute immunity rule to the extent that a mere claim by a foreign sovereign to have an interest in the contested property would have to be substantiated before the English court would grant immunity. Since this involves some submission by the foreign sovereign to the local jurisdiction, immunity is not unqualifiedly absolute. Once the court is clear that the claim by the sovereign is not merely illusory or founded on a manifestly defective title, it will dismiss the case. This was brought out in Juan Ysmael v. Republic of Indonesia[29] in which the asserted interest in a vessel by the Indonesian government was regarded as manifestly defective so that the case was not dismissed on the ground of sovereign immunity.[30]

American cases, however, have shown a rather different approach, one that distinguishes between ownership on the one hand and possession and control on the other. In two cases particularly, immunity was refused [24] See e.g. Lord Macmillan, [1938] AC 485, 498; 9 AD, p. 260.

[25] [1938] AC 485, p. 490. See also Berizzi Bros. C. v. SS Pesaro 271 US 562 (1926); 3 AD, p. 186 and The Navemar 303 US 68 (1938); 9 AD, p. 176.

[26] [1949] 2 All ER 274; 16 AD, p. 129. See also Cohen LJ, [1949] 2 All ER 274, 281.

[27] [1957] 1 QB 438; 23 ILR, p. 160.

[28] [1957] 1 QB 438, 461; 23 ILR, p. 169.

[29] [1955] AC 72; 21 ILR, p. 95. See also USA and France v. Dollfus Mieg et Compagnie [1952] AC 582; 19 ILR, p. 163.

[30] See Higgins, 'Unresolved Aspects', p. 273, who raises the question as to whether this test would be rigorous in an era of restrictive immunity. See also R. Higgins, Problems and Process, Oxford, 1994, chapter 5.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

where the vessels concerned, although owned by the states claiming immunity, were held subject to the jurisdiction since at the relevant time they were not in the possession or control of these states.[31]

Since the courts will not try a case in which a foreign state is the defendant, it is necessary to decide what a foreign state is in each instance. Where doubts are raised as to the status of a foreign entity and whether or not it is to be regarded as a state for the purposes of the municipal courts, the executive certificate issued by the UK government will be decisive.

The case of Duff Development Company v. Kelantan[32] is a good example of this point. Kelantan was a Malay state under British protection. Both its internal and external policies were subject to British direction and it could in no way be described as politically independent. However, the UK government had issued an executive certificate to the effect that Kelantan was an independent state and that the Crown neither exercised nor claimed any rights of sovereignty or jurisdiction over it. The House of Lords, to whom the case had come, declared that once the Crown recognised a foreign ruler as sovereign, this bound the courts and no other evidence was admissible or needed. Accordingly, Kelantan was entitled to sovereign immunity from the jurisdiction of the English courts.

The restrictive approach

A number of states in fact started adopting the restrictive approach to immunity, permitting the exercise of jurisdiction over non-sovereign acts, at a relatively early stage.[33] The Supreme Court of Austria in 1950, in a comprehensive survey of practice, concluded that in the light of the increased activity of states in the commercial field the classic doctrine of absolute immunity had lost its meaning and was no longer a rule of international [31] The Navemar 303 US 68 (1938); 9 AD, p. 176 and Republic of Mexico v. Hoffman 324 US 30 (1945); 12 AD, p. 143.

[32] [1924] AC 797; 2 AD, p. 124. By s. 21 of the State Immunity Act 1978, an executive certificate is deemed to be conclusive as to, for example, statehood in this context. See also Trawnik v. G*ordon Lennox* [1985] 2 All ER 368 as to the issue of a certificate under s. 21 on the status of the Commander of UK Forces in Berlin.

[33] See e.g. Belgium and Italy, Lauterpacht, 'Problem'; Badr, State Immunity, chapter 2; Sinclair, 'Sovereign Immunity' and I. Brownlie, Principles of Public International Law, 6th edn, Oxford, 2003, pp. 323 ff. See also the Brussels Convention on the Immunity of State-owned Ships, 1926, which assimilated the position of such ships engaged in trade to that of private ships regarding submission to the jurisdiction, and the 1958 Conventions on the Territorial Sea and on the High Seas. See now articles 31, 32, 95 and 96 of the 1982 Convention on the Law of the Sea.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

law.[34] In 1952, in the Tate letter, the United States Department of State declared that the increasing involvement of governments in commercial activities coupled with the changing views of foreign states to absolute immunity rendered a change necessary and that thereafter 'the Department [will] follow the restrictive theory of sovereign immunity'.[35] This approach was also adopted by the courts, most particularly in Victory Transport Inc. v. Comisaria General de Abasteciementos y Transportes.[36] In this case, the Court, in the absence of a State Department 'suggestion' as to the immunity of the defendants, a branch of the Spanish Ministry of Commerce, affirmed jurisdiction since the chartering of a ship to transport wheat was not strictly a political or public act. The restrictive theory approach was endorsed by four Supreme Court Justices in Alfred Dunhill of London Inc. v. Republic of Cuba.[37]

As far as the UK was concerned, the adoption of the restrictive approach occurred rather later.[38]

In the Philippine Admiral case,[39] the vessel, which was owned by the Philippine government, had writs issued against it in Hong Kong by two shipping corporations. The Privy Council, hearing the case on appeal from the Supreme Court of Hong Kong, reviewed previous decisions on sovereign immunity and concluded that it would not follow the Porto Alexandre case.[40] Lord Cross gave four reasons for not following the earlier case. First, that the Court of Appeal wrongly felt that they were bound by the Parlement Belge[41] decision. Secondly, that the House of Lords in The Cristina[42] had been divided on the issue of immunity for state-owned vessels engaged in commerce. Thirdly, that the trend of opinion was against the absolute immunity doctrine; and fourthly that it was 'wrong' to apply the doctrine since states could in the Western world be sued in their [34] Dralle v. Republic of Czechoslovakia 17 ILR, p. 155. This case was cited with approval by the West German Supreme Constitutional Court in The Empire of Iran 45 ILR, p. 57 and by the US Court of Appeals in Victory Transport Inc. v. Comisaria General de Abasteciementos y Transportes 35 ILR, p. 110.

[35] 26 Department of State Bulletin, 984 (1952).

[36] 35 ILR, p. 110. See also e.g. National City Bank of New York v. Republic of China 22 ILR, p. 210 and Rich v. Naviera Vacuba 32 ILR, p. 127.

[37] 15 ILM, 1976, pp. 735, 744, 746–7; 66 ILR, pp. 212, 221, 224.

[38] See, for some early reconsiderations, Lord Denning in Rahimtoola v. Nizam of Hyderabad [1958] AC 379, 422; 24 ILR, pp. 175, 190.

[39] [1976] 2 WLR 214; 64 ILR, p. 90. Sinclair describes this as a 'historic landmark', 'Sovereign Immunity', p. 154. See also R. Higgins, 'Recent Developments in the Law of Sovereign Immunity in the United Kingdom', 71 AJIL, 1977, pp. 423, 424.

[40] [1920] P. 30; 1 AD, p. 146. [41] (1880) 5 PD 197. [42] [1938] AC 485; 9 AD, p. 250.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

own courts on commercial contracts and there was no reason why foreign states should not be equally liable to be sued.[43] Thus, the Privy Council held that in cases where a state-owned merchant ship involved in ordinary trade was the object of a writ, it would not be entitled to sovereign immunity and the litigation would proceed.

In the case of Thai-Europe Tapioca Service Ltd v. Government of Pakistan,[44] a German-owned ship on charter to carry goods from Poland to Pakistan had been bombed in Karachi by Indian planes during the 1971 war. Since the agreement provided for disputes to be settled by arbitration in England, the matter came eventually before the English courts. The cargo had previously been consigned to a Pakistani corporation, and that corporation had been taken over by the Pakistani government. The shipowners sued the government for the sixty-seven-day delay in unloading that had resulted from the bombing. The government pleaded sovereign immunity and sought to have the action dismissed.

The Court of Appeal decided that since all the relevant events had taken place outside the jurisdiction and in view of the action being in personam against the foreign government rather than against the ship itself, the general principle of sovereign immunity would have to stand.

Lord Denning declared in this case that there were certain exceptions to the doctrine of sovereign immunity. It did not apply where the action concerned land situated in the UK or trust funds lodged in the UK or debts incurred in the jurisdiction for services rendered to property in the UK, nor was there any immunity when a commercial transaction was entered into with a trader in the UK 'and a dispute arises which is properly within the territorial jurisdiction of our courts'.[45]

This unfortunate split approach, absolute immunity for actions in personam and restrictive immunity for actions in rem did not, however, last long. In Trendtex Trading Corporation Ltd v. Central Bank of Nigeria,[46] all three judges of the Court of Appeal accepted the validity of the restrictive approach as being consonant with justice, comity and international practice.[47] The problem of precedent was resolved for two of the judges by declaring that international law knew no doctrine of stare decisis.[48] The [43] [1976] 2 WLR 214, 232; 64 ILR, pp. 90, 108. Note that Lord Cross believed that the absolute theory still obtained with regard to actions in personam, [1976] 2 WLR 214, 233.

[44] [1975] 1 WLR 1485; 64 ILR, p. 81.

[45] [1975] 1 WLR 1485, 1490–1; 64 ILR, p. 84.

[46] [1977] 2 WLR 356; 64 ILR, p. 122.

[47] [1977] 2 WLR 356, 366–7 (Denning MR), 380 (Stephenson LJ) and 385–6 (Shaw LJ).

[48] Ibid., pp. 365–6 and 380. But cf. Stephenson LJ, ibid., p. 381. See further above, chapter 4, p. 145.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

clear acceptance of the restrictive theory of immunity in Trendtex was reaffirmed in later cases,[49] particularly by the House of Lords in the I° Congreso del Partido case[50] and in Alcom Ltd v. Republic of Colombia.[51]

The majority of states now have tended to accept the restrictive immunity doctrine[52] and this has been reflected in domestic legislation.[53] In particular, the US Foreign Sovereign Immunities Act 1976,[54] provides in section 1605 for the grounds upon which a state may be subject to the jurisdiction (as general exceptions to the jurisdictional immunity of a foreign state), while the UK State Immunity Act 1978[55] similarly provides for a general rule of immunity from the jurisdiction of the courts with a range of exceptions thereto.[56]

[49] See e.g. Hispano Americana Mercantil SA v. Central Bank of Nigeria [1979] 2 LL. R 277; 64 ILR, p. 221.

[50] [1981] 2 All ER 1064; 64 ILR, p. 307, a case concerned with the pre-1978 Act common law. See also Planmount Ltd v. Republic of Zaire [1981] 1 All ER 1110; 64 ILR, p. 268.

[51] [1984] 2 All ER 6; 74 ILR, p. 179. See also Jones v. Saudi Arabia [2006] UKHL 26, para. 8 (per Lord Bingham); 129 ILR, pp. 716.

[52] See e.g. the Administration des Chemins de Fer du Gouvernement Iranien case, 52 ILR, p. 315 and the Empire of Iran case, 45 ILR, p. 57; see also Sinclair, 'Sovereign Immunity'; Badr, State Immunity; and UN, Materials. Note also Abbott v. Republic of South Africa before the Spanish Constitutional Court, 86 ILR, p. 512; Manauta v. Embassy of Russian Federation 113 ILR, p. 429 (Argentinian Supreme Court); US v. Friedland 182 DLR (4th) 614; 120 ILR, p. 417 and CGM Industrial v. KPMG 1998 (3) SA 738; 121 ILR, p. 472.

[53] See e.g. the Singapore State Immunity Act 1979; the Pakistan State Immunity Ordinance 1981; the South African Foreign States Immunities Act 1981; the Canadian State Immunity Act 1982 and the Australian Foreign States Immunities Act 1985. See also article 5 of the UN Convention on Jurisdictional Immunities of States and Their Property, 2004. Note that this Convention, which is not in force as at the date of writing, does not apply to criminal proceedings.

[54] See e.g. G. Delaume, 'Public Debt and Sovereign Immunity: The Foreign Sovereign Immunities Act of 1976', 71 AJIL, 1977, p. 399; Sinclair, 'Sovereign Immunity', pp. 243 ff., and D. Weber, 'The Foreign Sovereign Immunities Act of 1976', 3 Yale Studies in World Public Order, 1976, p. 1. Note that in Republic of Austria v. Altmann, the US Supreme Court held that the Foreign Sovereign Immunities Act applied to acts which occurred prior to its enactment and even prior to the adoption by the US of the restrictive immunity approach in 1952, 541 US 677 (2004).

[55] See e.g. D. W. Bowett, 'The State Immunity Act 1978', 37 Cambridge Law Journal, 1978, p. 193; R. C. A. White, 'The State Immunity Act 1978', 42 MLR, 1979, p. 72; Sinclair, 'Sovereign Immunity', pp. 257 ff., and M. N. Shaw, 'The State Immunity Act 1978', New Law Journal, 23 November 1978, p. 1136.

[56] See also the 1972 European Convention on State Immunity. The Additional Protocol to the European Convention, which establishes a European Tribunal in matters of State Immunity to determine disputes under the Convention, came into force on 22 May 1985, to be composed initially of the same members as the European Court of Human Rights: see Council of Europe Press Release, C(85)39. See generally UN, Materials, Part I 'National Legislation', and Badr, State Immunity, chapter 3. See also the Inter-American

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

The former Soviet Union and some other countries generally adhered to the absolute immunity theory, although in practice entered into many bilateral agreements permitting the exercise of jurisdiction in cases where a commercial contract had been signed on the territory of the other state party.[57]

Sovereign and non-sovereign acts

With the acceptance of the restrictive theory, it becomes crucial to analyse the distinction between those acts that will benefit from immunity and those that will not. In the Victory Transport case,[58] the Court declared that it would (in the absence of a State Department suggestion)[59] refuse to grant immunity, unless the activity in question fell within one of the categories of strictly political or public acts: viz. internal administrative acts, legislative acts, acts concerning the armed forces or diplomatic activity and public loans.

However, the basic approach of recent legislation[60] has been to proclaim a rule of immunity and then list the exceptions, so that the onus of proof falls on the other side of the line.[61] This approach is mirrored in article 5

Draft Convention on Jurisdictional Immunity of States, 22 ILM, 1983, p. 292. Note that the large number of cases precipitated by the 1979 Iran Hostages Crisis and the US freezing of assets were argued on the basis of the restrictive theory, before being terminated: see e.g. R. Edwards, 'Extraterritorial Application of the US Iranian Assets Control Regulations', 75 AJIL, 1981, p. 870. See also Dames and Moore v. Regan 101 S. Ct. 1972 (1981); 72 ILR, p. 270.

57 See, for a number of examples, UN, Materials, pp. 134–50. See also M. M. Boguslavsky, 'Foreign State Immunity: Soviet Doctrine and Practice', 10 Netherlands YIL, 1979, p. 167. See, as to Philippines practice, US v. Ruiz and De Guzman 102 ILR, p. 122; US v. Guinto, Valencia and Others, ibid., p. 132 and The Holy See v. Starbright Sales Enterprises, ibid., p. 163.

58 336 F.2d 354 (1964); 35 ILR, p. 110. See also P. Lalive, 'L'Immunité de Juridiction des États et des Organisations Internationales', 84 HR, 1953, p. 205, and Lauterpacht, 'Problem', pp. 237–9.

59 Note that since the 1976 Foreign Sovereign Immunities Act, the determination of such status is a judicial, not executive, act.

60 See e.g. s. 1 of the State Immunity Act 1978; s. 1604 of the US Foreign Sovereign Immunities Act 1976 and s. 9 of the Australian Foreign States Immunities Act 1985. See also Saudi Arabia v. Nelson 123 L Ed 2d 47 (1993); 100 ILR, p. 544.

61 See also article 15 of the European Convention on State Immunity, 1972. Article II of the Revised Draft Articles for a Convention on State Immunity adopted by the International Law Association in 1994, Report of the Sixty-sixth Conference, 1994, p. 22, provides that: 'In principle, a foreign state shall be immune from the adjudicatory jurisdiction of a forum state for acts performed by it in the exercise of its sovereign authority, i.e. jure imperii. It shall not be immune in the circumstances provided in article III.'

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

of the UN Convention on Jurisdictional Immunities of States and Their Property, 2004, which notes that:[62]

> A state enjoys immunity in respect of itself and its property, from the jurisdiction of the courts of another state subject to the provisions of the present Convention.

In such circumstances, the way in which the 'state' is defined for sovereign immunity purposes becomes important. Article 2(1)b of the Convention declares that 'state' means: (i) the state and its various organs of government; (ii) constituent units of a federal state or political subdivisions of the state, which are entitled to perform acts in the exercise of sovereign authority, and are acting in that capacity; (iii) agencies or instrumentalities of the state or other entities, to the extent that they are entitled to perform and are actually performing acts in the exercise of sovereign authority of the state; and (iv) representatives of the state acting in that capacity.[63]

With the adoption of the restrictive theory of immunity, the appropriate test becomes whether the activity in question is of itself sovereign (jure imperii) or non-sovereign (jure gestionis). In determining this, the predominant approach has been to focus upon the nature of the transaction rather than its purpose.[64]

However, it should be noted that article 2(2) of the Convention provides that:

[62] There is extensive state practice on whether immunity should be seen as a derogation from territorial sovereignty and thus to be justified in each particular case, or as a rule of international law as such, thus not requiring substantiation in each and every case: see Yearbook of the ILC, 1980, vol. II, part 2, pp. 142 ff.

[63] Note that the provision in point (iv) is somewhat confusing in the light of article 3 which states that the Convention is without prejudice to the privileges and immunities of diplomatic and consular missions, special missions and missions to international organisations, and the immunities granted to heads of state.

[64] See e.g. s. 1603(d) of the US Foreign Sovereign Immunities Act of 1976. The section-by-section analysis of the Act emphasises that 'the fact that goods or services to be procured through a contract are to be used for a public purpose is irrelevant; it is the initially commercial nature of an activity or transaction that is critical', reproduced in UN, Materials, pp. 103, 107. See also the Empire of Iran case, 45 ILR, pp. 57, 80–1; Trendtex Trading Corporation Ltd v. Central Bank of Nigeria [1977] 2 WLR 356; 64 ILR, p. 122; Non-resident Petitioner v. Central Bank of Nigeria 16 ILM, 1977, p. 501 (a German case); Planmount Ltd v. Republic of Zaire [1981] 1 All ER 1110; 64 ILR, p. 268 and Saudi Arabia v. Nelson 123 L Ed 2d 47 (1993); 100 ILR, p. 544 (US Supreme Court). See also article I of the Revised Draft Articles for a Convention on State Immunity adopted by the International Law Association in 1994, Report of the Sixty-sixth Conference, 1994, p. 23.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

> In determining whether a contract or transaction is a 'commercial transaction' . . . reference should be made primarily to the nature of the contract or transaction, but its purpose should also be taken into account if the parties to the contract or transaction have so agreed, or if, in the practice of the state of the forum, that purpose is relevant to determining the non-commercial character of the contract or transaction.

The reason for the modified 'nature' test was in order to provide an adequate safeguard and protection for developing countries, particularly as they attempt to promote national economic development. The ILC Commentary notes that a two-stage approach is posited, to be applied successively. First, reference should be made primarily to the nature of the contract or transaction and, if it is established that it is non-commercial or governmental in nature, no further enquiry would be needed. If, however, the contract or transaction appeared to be commercial, then reference to its purpose should be made in order to determine whether the contract or transaction was truly sovereign or not. States should be given an opportunity to maintain that in their practice a particular contract or transaction should be treated as non-commercial since its purpose is clearly public and supported by reasons of state. Examples given include the procurement of medicaments to fight a spreading epidemic, and food supplies.[65] This approach, a modification of earlier drafts,[66] is not uncontroversial and some care is required. It would, for example, be unhelpful if the purpose criterion were to be adopted in a manner which would permit it to be used to effect a considerable retreat from the restrictive immunity approach. This is not to say, however, that no consideration whatsoever of the purpose of the transaction in question should be undertaken.

Lord Wilberforce in I° Congreso del Partido[67] emphasised that in considering whether immunity should be recognised one had to consider the whole context in which the claim is made in order to identify the 'relevant act' which formed the basis of that claim. In particular, was it an act jure gestionis, or in other words 'an act of a private law character such as a private citizen might have entered into'?[68] This use of the private law/public law dichotomy, familiar to civil law systems, was particularly noticeable, although different states draw the distinction at [65] Report of the International Law Commission, 1991, pp. 29–30.

[66] Yearbook of the ILC, 1983, vol. II, part 2.
[67] [1983] AC 244, 267; 64 ILR, pp. 307, 318.
[68] [1983] AC 244, 262; 64 ILR, p. 314.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

different points.[69] It should also be noted, however, that this distinction is less familiar to common law systems. In addition, the issues ascribed to the governmental sphere as distinct from the private area rest upon the particular political concept proclaimed by the state in question, so that a clear and comprehensive international consensus regarding the line of distinction is unlikely.[70] The characterisation of an act as jure gestionis or jure imperii will also depend upon the perception of the issue at hand by the courts. Lord Wilberforce also noted that while the existence of a governmental purpose or motive could not convert what would otherwise be an act jure gestionis or an act of private law into one done jure imperii,[71] purpose may be relevant if throwing some light upon the nature of what was done.[72]

The importance of the contextual approach at least as the starting point of the investigation was also emphasised by the Canadian Supreme Court in United States of America v. The Public Service Alliance of Canada and Others (Re Canada Labour Code).[73] It was noted that the contextual approach was the only reasonable basis for applying the restrictive immunity doctrine for the alternative was to attempt the impossible, 'an antiseptic distillation of a "once-and-for-all" characterisation of the activity in question, entirely divorced from its purpose'.[74] The issue was also considered by the Supreme Court of Victoria, Australia, in Reid v. Republic of Nauru,[75] which stated that in some situations the separation of act, motive and purpose might not be possible. The motive or purpose underlying particular conduct may constitute part of the definition of the act itself in some cases, while in others the nature or quality of the act performed might not be ascertainable without reference to the context within which it is carried out. The Court also made the point that a relevant factor was the perception held or policy adopted in each particular country as to the attributes of sovereignty itself.[76] The point that 'unless we can inquire into the purpose of such acts, we cannot determine their nature' was also made by the US Court of Appeals in De Sanchez v. Banco Central de Nicaragua and Others.[77]

[69] See e.g. Sinclair, 'Sovereign Immunity', pp. 210–13, and the Empire of Iran case, 45 ILR, pp. 57, 80. See also article 7 of the European Convention on State Immunity, 1972.
[70] See e.g. Crawford, 'International Law', p. 88, and Lauterpacht, 'Problem', pp. 220, 224–6.
[71] [1983] AC 244, 267; 64 ILR, p. 318. [72] [1983] AC 244, 272; 64 ILR, p. 323.
[73] (1992) 91 DLR (4th) 449; 94 ILR, p. 264. [74] [1992] 91 DLR (4th) 463; 94 ILR, p. 278.
[75] [1993] 1 VR 251; 101 ILR, p. 193. [76] [1993] 1 VR 253; 101 ILR, pp. 195–6.
[77] 770 F.2d 1385, 1393 (1985); 88 ILR, pp. 75, 85.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

The particular issue raised in the Congreso case was whether immunity could be granted where, while the initial transaction was clearly commercial, the cause of the breach of the contract in question appeared to be an exercise of sovereign authority. In that case, two vessels operated by a Cuban state-owned shipping enterprise and delivering sugar to a Chilean company were ordered by the Cuban government to stay away from Chile after the Allende regime had been overthrown. The Cuban government pleaded sovereign immunity on the grounds that the breach of the contract was occasioned as a result of a foreign policy decision. The House of Lords did not accept this and argued that once a state had entered the trading field, it would require a high standard of proof of a sovereign act for immunity to be introduced. Lord Wilberforce emphasised that:

> in order to withdraw its action from the sphere of acts done jure gestionis, a state must be able to point to some act clearly done jure imperii[78] and that the appropriate test was to be expressed as follows:

> it is not just that the purpose or motive of the act is to serve the purposes of the state, but that the act is of its own character a governmental act, as opposed to an act which any private citizen can perform.[79]

In the circumstances of the case, that test had not been satisfied. One of the two ships, the Playa Larga, had been owned at all relevant times by the Cuban government, but the second ship, the Marble Islands, was owned by a trading enterprise not entitled to immunity. When this ship was on the high seas, it was taken over by the Cuban government and ordered to proceed to North Vietnam, where its cargo was eventually donated to the people of that country. The Court was unanimous in rejecting the plea of immunity with regard to the Playa Larga, but was split over the second ship.

Two members of the House of Lords, Lord Wilberforce and Lord Edmund-Davies, felt that the key element with regard to the Marble Islands, as distinct from the Playa Larga, where the government had acted as owner of the ship and not as governmental authority, was that the Republic of Cuba directed the disposal of the cargo in North Vietnam. This was not part of any commercial arrangement which was conducted by the demise charterer, who was thus responsible for the civil wrongs

[78] [1981] 2 All ER 1064, 1075; 64 ILR, p. 320.
[79] Ibid., quoting the judge at first instance, [1978] 1 All ER 1169, 1192; 64 ILR, p. 179.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

committed. The acts of the government were outside this framework and accordingly purely governmental.[80]

However, the majority held that the Cuban government had acted in the context of a private owner in discharging and disposing of the cargo in North Vietnam and had not regarded itself as acting in the exercise of sovereign powers. Everything had been done in purported reliance upon private law rights in that the demise charterers had sold the cargo to another Cuban state enterprise by ordinary private law sale and in purported reliance upon the bill of lading which permitted the sale in particular instances. It was the purchaser that donated the cargo to the Vietnamese people.[81]

In many respects, nevertheless, the minority view is the more acceptable one, in that in reality it was the Cuban government's taking control of the ship and direction of it and its cargo that determined the issue and this was done as a deliberate matter of state policy. The fact that it was accomplished by the private law route rather than, for example, by direct governmental decree should not settle the issue conclusively. In fact, one thing that the case does show is how difficult it is in reality to distinguish public from private acts.[82]

In Littrell v. United States of America (No. 2),[83] Hoffman LJ in the Court of Appeal emphasised that it would be facile in the case, which concerned medical treatment for a US serviceman on an American base in the UK, to regard the general military context as such as determinative. One needed to examine carefully all the relevant circumstances in order to decide whether a sovereign or a non-sovereign activity had been involved. Important factors to be considered included where the activity actually took place, whom it involved and what kind of act itself was involved.[84] In Holland v. Lampen-Wolfe, the House of Lords dealt with a case concerning

[80] [1981] 2 All ER 1064, 1077 and 1081; 64 ILR, pp. 321, 327.

[81] [1981] 2 All ER 1079–80, 1082 and 1083; 64 ILR, pp. 325, 328, 329.

[82] Note that if the State Immunity Act 1978 had been in force when the cause of action arose in this case, it is likely that the claim of immunity would have completely failed: see s. 10. See also Kuwait Airways Corporation v. Iraqi Airways Co. [1995] 1 WLR 1147, where the House of Lords separated out a series of events and held that an initial sovereign act did not characterise the situation as a whole: see below, p. 714.

[83] [1995] 1 WLR 82, 95; 100 ILR, p. 438. Note that the case, as it concerned foreign armed forces in the UK, fell outside the State Immunity Act 1978 and was dealt with under common law.

[84] See also Hicks v. US 120 ILR, p. 606, where the Employment Appeal Tribunal held that the primary purpose of recreation facilities at an airbase was to increase the effectiveness of the central military activity of that base which was clearly a sovereign activity.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

the activities of a US citizen and civilian teaching at a US military base in the UK who argued that a memorandum written by the defendant was libellous.[85] Relying upon Hoffman LJ's approach, the House of Lords emphasised that the context in which the act concerned took place was the provision of education within a military base, an activity designed 'as part of the process of maintaining forces and associated civilians on the base by US personnel to serve the needs of the US military authorities'.[86] Accordingly, the defendant was entitled to immunity.

The problem of sovereign immunity with regard to foreign bases was also addressed by the Canadian Supreme Court in United States of America v. The Public Service Alliance of Canada (Re Canada Labour Code).[87] The Court emphasised that employment at the base was a multifaceted activity and could neither be labelled as such as sovereign or commercial in nature. One had to determine which aspects of the activity were relevant to the proceedings at hand and then to assess the impact of the proceedings on these attributes as a whole.[88] The closer the activity in question was to undisputable sovereign acts, such as managing and operating an offshore military base, the more likely it would be that immunity would be recognised. In Kuwait Airways Corporation v. Iraqi Airways Co.,[89] Lord Goff, giving the leading judgment in the House of Lords, adopted Lord Wilberforce's statement of principle in Congreso and held that 'the ultimate test of what constitutes an act jure imperii is whether the act in question is of its own character a governmental act, as opposed to an act which any private citizen can perform'.[90] Further, the Court held that the fact that an initial act was an act jure imperii did not determine as such the characterisation of subsequent acts.[91]

[85] Similarly a US citizen and civilian.

[86] [2000] 1 WLR 1573, 1577 (per Lord Hope, who stated that 'the context is all important', ibid.).

[87] (1992) 91 DLR (4th) 449; 94 ILR, p. 264.

[88] (1992) 91 DLR (4th) 466; 94 ILR, p. 281.

[89] [1995] 1 WLR 1147, 1160; 103 ILR, p. 340. For later proceedings in this case, see 116 ILR, p. 534 (High Court); [2000] 2 All ER (Comm.) 360; [2001] 2 WLR 1117 (Court of Appeal) and [2002] UKHL 19 (House of Lords).

[90] Note that in Sengupta v. Republic of India 65 ILR, pp. 325, 360, it was emphasised that in deciding whether immunity applied, one had to consider whether it was the kind of contract an individual might make, whether it involved the participation of both parties in the public functions of the state, the nature of the alleged breach and whether the investigation of the claim would involve an investigation into the public or sovereign acts of the foreign state.

[91] [1995] 1 WLR 1147, 1162–3. See further below, p. 731.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

State immunity and violations of human rights [92]

With the increasing attention devoted to the relationship between international human rights law and domestic systems, the question has arisen as to whether the application of sovereign immunity in civil suits against foreign states for violations of human rights law has been affected. To date state practice suggests that the answer to this is negative. In Saudi Arabia v. Nelson, the US Supreme Court noted that the only basis for jurisdiction over a foreign state was the Foreign Sovereign Immunities Act 1976 and, unless a matter fell within one of the exceptions, the plea of immunity would succeed.[93] It was held that although the alleged wrongful arrest, imprisonment and torture by the Saudi government of Nelson would amount to abuse of the power of its police by that government, 'a foreign state's exercise of the power of its police has long been understood for the purposes of the restrictive theory as peculiarly sovereign'.[94] However, the US Foreign Sovereign Immunities Act was amended in 1996 by the Antiterrorism and Effective Death Penalty Act which created an exception to immunity with regard to states, designated by the Department of State as terrorist states, which committed a terrorist act, including hostage-taking, or provided material support and resources to an individual or entity which committed such an act which resulted in the death or personal injury of a US citizen.[95] In Simpson v. Libya, the US Court of Appeals held that the hostage exception to immunity applied where three conditions had been met: where the state in question had been designated as a 'state sponsor of terrorism'; where it had been provided with a reasonable [92] See e.g. Bröhmer, State Immunity; S. Marks, 'Torture and the Jurisdictional Immunity of Foreign States', 1997 CLJ, p. 8; R. van Alebeek, 'The Pinochet Case', 71 BYIL, 2000, pp. 49 ff., and van Alebeek, Immunities of States and Their Officials in International Criminal Law and International Human Rights Law, Oxford, 2008; K. Reece Thomas and J. Small, 'Human Rights and State Immunity: Is There Immunity From Civil Liability for Torture?', 50 NILR, 2003, p. 1; K. Parlett, 'Immunity in Civil Proceedings for Torture: The Emerging Exception', 2 European Human Rights Law Review, 2006, p. 49; H. Fox, 'State Immunity and the International Crime of Torture', 2 European Human Rights Law Review, 2006, p. 142; Redress, Immunity v Accountability, London, 2005, and L. Caplan, 'State Immunity, Human Rights and Jus Cogens: A Critique of the Normative Hierarchy Theory', 97 AJIL, 2003, p. 741.

[93] 123 L Ed 2d 47, 61 (1993); 100 ILR, pp. 544, 553.

[94] 123 L Ed 2d 47, 57. See also e.g. Controller and Auditor General v. Sir Ronald Davidson [1996] 2 NZLR 278 and Princz v. Federal Republic of Germany 26 F.3d 1166 (DC Cir. 1994).

[95] This provision is retroactive. See Flatow v. Islamic Republic of Iran 999 F.Supp. 1 (1998); 121 ILR, p. 618 and Alejandre v. Republic of Cuba 996 F.Supp. 1239 (1997); 121 ILR, p. 603.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

opportunity to arbitrate the claim; and where the claimant or victim was a citizen of the US. The Court found it unnecessary for the plaintiff to have to show that the hostage-taker had issued a demand showing his intended purposes to a third party, since the definition of hostage-taking focused on the state of mind of the hostage-taker himself. Accordingly, third-party awareness of a hostage-taker's intent was not a required element.[96]

In Bouzari v. Iran, the Superior Court of Justice of Ontario, Canada, noted, in the light of the Canadian State Immunity Act 1982, that 'regardless of the state's ultimate purpose, exercises of police, law enforcement and security powers are inherently exercises of governmental authority and sovereignty'[97] and concluded that an international custom existed to the effect that there was an ongoing rule providing state immunity for acts of torture committed outside the forum state.[98] The English Court of Appeal in Al-Adsani v. Government of Kuwait[99] held that the State Immunity Act provided for immunity for states apart from specific listed express exceptions, and there was no room for implied exceptions to the general rule even where the violation of a norm of jus cogens (such as the prohibition of torture) was involved. The Court rejected an argument that the term 'immunity' in domestic legislation meant immunity from sovereign acts that were in accordance with international law, thus excluding torture for which immunity could not be claimed. In Holland v. Lampen-Wolfe, the House of Lords held that recognition of sovereign immunity did not involve a violation of the rights of due process contained in article 6 of the European Convention on Human Rights since it was argued that immunity derives from customary international law while the obligations under article 6 derived from a treaty freely entered into by the UK. Accordingly, 'The United Kingdom cannot, by its own act of acceding to the Convention and without the consent of the United States, obtain a power of adjudication over the United States which international law denies it.'[100] The European Court of Human Rights in Al-Adsani v. UK

[96] 470 F.3d 356 (2006). [97] 124 ILR, pp. 427, 435.

[98] Ibid., p. 443. The Court dismissed arguments that either the Convention against Torture or the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights imposed an obligation on states to create a civil remedy with regard to acts of torture committed abroad, or that such an obligation existed as a rule of jus cogens: see at pp. 441 and 443.

[99] (1996) 1 LL. R 104; 107 ILR, p. 536. But see Evans LJ in Al-Adsani v. Government of Kuwait 100 ILR, p. 465, which concerned leave to serve proceedings upon the government of Kuwait and in which it had been held that there was a good arguable case that, under the State Immunity Act, there was no immunity for a state in respect of alleged acts of torture.

[100] [2000] 1 WLR 1573, 1588 (per Lord Millett); 119 ILR, p. 384.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

analysed this issue, that is whether state immunity could exist with regard to civil proceedings for torture in the light of article 6 of the European Convention.[101] The Court noted that the grant of sovereign immunity to a state in civil proceedings pursued the legitimate aim of complying with international law to promote comity and good relations between states through the respect of another state's sovereignty and that the European Convention on Human Rights should be interpreted in harmony with other rules of international law, including that relating to the grant of state immunity.[102] The Court concluded that it could not discern in the relevant materials before it, 'any firm basis for concluding that, as a matter of international law, a state no longer enjoys immunity from civil suit in the courts of another state where acts of torture are alleged'[103] and held that immunity thus still applied in such cases.[104]

In Jones v. Saudi Arabia, the House of Lords, faced with claims that individuals had been systematically tortured while in official custody in Saudi Arabia, held that under Part 1 of the State Immunity Act 1978, an approach reflecting that adopted in international law (particularly in the UN Convention on Jurisdictional Immunities), a foreign state was immune unless one of the exceptions provided for in the legislation applied. None of the exceptions mentioned injuries caused by torture abroad.[105] Further, the fact that torture was prohibited by a jus cogens rule of international law did not suffice to remove the immunity granted by international law to a state nor to confer jurisdiction to hear civil claims in respect of torture committed outside of the state where it was sought to exercise jurisdiction.[106] Particular emphasis was placed on the distinction between the prohibition of torture as a substantive rule of law and the existence of the rule of immunity which constitutes a procedural bar to the exercise of jurisdiction and does not contradict the prohibition.[107] Lord Hoffmann underlined that as a matter of international practice, no procedural rule of international law had developed enabling states to [101] Judgment of 21 November 2001; 123 ILR, p. 24.

[102] Ibid., paras. 54 and 55. [103] Ibid., para. 61.
[104] Ibid., para. 66. This decision was later affirmed in Kalogeropoulou v. Greece and Germany, European Court of Human Rights, judgment of 12 December 2002; 129 ILR, p. 537.
[105] [2006] UKHL 26, para. 9 (per Lord Bingham); 129 ILR, p. 717.
[106] Ibid., paras. 24–8; 129 ILR, pp. 726–8.
[107] See e.g. para. 24 (Lord Bingham) and para. 44 (Lord Hoffmann), 129 ILR, pp. 726 and 732, both citing Fox, State Immunity, p. 525 to this effect, who further noted that the existence of immunity merely diverted any breach of the prohibition 'to a different method of settlement'.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

assume civil jurisdiction over other states in cases in which torture was alleged.[108]

In the case of criminal proceedings, the situation is rather different. Part I of the State Immunity Act (the substantive part) does not apply to criminal proceedings, although Part III (concerning certain status issues) does. In Ex parte Pinochet (No. 3),[109] the House of Lords held by six votes to one that General Pinochet was not entitled to immunity in extradition proceedings (which are criminal proceedings) with regard to charges of torture and conspiracy to torture where the alleged acts took place after the relevant states (Chile, Spain and the UK) had become parties to the Convention against Torture, although the decision focused on head of state immunity and the terms of the Convention.[110]

Commercial acts

Of all state activities for which immunity is no longer to be obtained, that of commercial transactions is the primary example and the definition of such activity is crucial.[111]

Section 3(3) of the State Immunity Act 1978 defines the term 'commercial transaction' to mean:

> (a) any contract for the supply of goods or services;
> (b) any loan or other transaction for the provision of finance and any guarantee or indemnity in respect of any such transaction or of any other financial obligation; and
> (c) any other transaction or activity (whether of a commercial, industrial, financial, professional or other similar character) into which a state enters or in which it engages otherwise than in the exercise of sovereign authority.

[108] Ibid., paras. 45 ff.; 129 ILR, pp. 732 ff. Note that the controversial case of Ferrini v. Federal Republic of Germany before the Italian Court of Cassation is to contrary effect, (2004) Cass sez un 5044/04: see P. De Sena and F. De Vittor, 'State Immunity and Human Rights: The Italian Supreme Court Decision on the Ferrini Case', 16 EJIL, 2005, p. 89; Fox, 'State Immunity and the Crime of Torture', and Lords Bingham and Hoffmann in Jones v. Saudi Arabia at paras. 22 and 63 respectively.

[109] [2000] 1 AC 147; 119 ILR, p. 135.

[110] See further below, p. 735. Note, however, that Lords Hope, Millett and Phillips held that there was no immunity for widespread and systematic acts of official torture, [2000] 1 AC 147, 246–8, 275–7, 288–92; 119 ILR, pp. 198–201, 228–31, 242–7.

[111] In his discussion of the development of the restrictive theory of sovereign or state immunity in Alcom v. Republic of Colombia [1984] 2 All ER 6, 9; 74 ILR, pp. 180, 181, Lord Diplock noted that the critical distinction was between what a state did in the exercise of its sovereign authority and what it did in the course of commercial activities. The former enjoyed immunity, the latter did not. See also Schreuer, State Immunity, chapter 2.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

Thus a wide range of transactions are covered[112] and, as Lord Diplock pointed out,[113] the 1978 Act does not adopt the straightforward dichotomy between acts jure imperii and those jure gestionis. Any contract falling within section 3 would be subject to the exercise of jurisdiction and the distinction between sovereign and non-sovereign acts in this context would not be relevant, except in so far as transactions falling within section 3(3)c were concerned, in the light of the use of the term 'sovereign authority'. The Act contains no reference to the public/private question, but the Congreso case (dealing with the pre-Act law) would seem to permit examples from foreign jurisdictions to be drawn upon in order to determine the nature of 'the exercise of sovereign authority'.

Section 3(1) of the State Immunity Act provides that a state is not immune as respects proceedings relating to:

> (a) a commercial transaction entered into by the state; or > (b) an obligation of the state which by virtue of a contract (whether a commercial transaction or not) falls to be performed wholly or partly in the United Kingdom.[114]

The scope of section 3(1)a was discussed by the Court in Australia and New Zealand Banking Group v. Commonwealth of Australia.[115] This case arose out of the collapse of the International Tin Council in 1985. The ensuing litigation sought, by various routes, to ascertain whether the member states of the ITC (which was itself an international organisation with separate personality) could be held liable themselves for the debts of that organisation – a prospect vigorously opposed by the states concerned. The case in question concerned an attempt by the brokers and banks to hold the member states of the ITC liable in tort for losses caused by misrepresentation and fraudulent trading.

It was argued by the defendants that as far as section 3(1) was concerned, the activity in question had to be not only commercial within the Act's definition but also undertaken 'otherwise than in the exercise of sovereign authority'. Evans J saw little difference in practice between the two terms in the context.[116] The defendants also argued that the term [112] Thus, for example, the defence of sovereign immunity was not available in an action relating to a contract for the repair of an ambassador's residence, Planmount Ltd v. Republic of Zaire [1981] 1 All ER 1110; 64 ILR, p. 268.

[113] Alcom v. Republic of Colombia [1984] 2 All ER 6, 10; 74 ILR, p. 183.

[114] Note that by s. 3(3), s. 3(1) does not apply to a contract of employment between a state and an individual.

[115] 1989, transcript, pp. 52 ff. [116] Ibid., p. 54.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

'activity' meant something more than a single act or sequence of acts. Evans J did not accept this, but did emphasise that the activity in question had to be examined in context. It was held that both the trading and loan contracts under discussion in the case were commercial and that, if it could be demonstrated that the member states of the ITC had authorised them, such authorisation would amount to commercial activity within the meaning of section 3.[117] However, in practice the distinction between commercial activities undertaken by a state and activities undertaken under the colour of sovereign authority may be a difficult one to draw. In AIC Ltd v. Nigeria, the High Court decided that proceedings to register a foreign judgment were not proceedings relating to a commercial transaction even if the foreign judgment concerned proceedings relating to such a transaction, so that the exception to immunity did not apply.[118] In KJ International v. MV Oscar Jupiter, the Supreme Court of South Africa held that a commercial transaction was not necessarily a transaction with a commercial purpose and that where a ship had been transferred by the Romanian government to one company which had then transferred it to another, the activities of the latter could not be seen as commercial transactions of the government. Accordingly, no loss of immunity would take place for this reason. However, the transfer of the ship by the Romanian government to the Moldovan government to be operated by the latter for profit did constitute a commercial transaction, so that immunity was lost.[119] In Svenska Petroleum v. Lithuania, the Court of Appeal emphasised that the distinction between a commercial transaction and a transaction entered into by a state in the exercise of its sovereign authority drawn in s. 3 of the State Immunity Act, which was virtually identical to article 2(1)c of the UN Convention on Jurisdictional Immunities which was accepted as reflecting the current international thinking on the topic,[120] was not an easy matter to determine.[121] It was held that s. 3 was one of a group of sections dealing with the courts' adjudicative jurisdiction and that it was therefore natural to interpret the phrase in that context as being directed to the subject-matter of the proceedings themselves rather than the source of the legal relationship which had given rise to them.[122] Accordingly, the

[117] Ibid., pp. 56–7.

[118] [2003] EWHC 1357; 129 ILR, p. 571. This was approved by the Court of Appeal in Svenska Petroleum v. Lithuania [2006] EWCA Civ 1529, para. 137.

[119] 131 ILR, p. 529.

[120] Citing Lord Bingham in Jones v. Saudi Arabia [2006] UKHL 26, para. 8, and see below, p. 725.

[121] [2006] EWCA Civ 1529, paras. 132–3.

[122] Ibid., para. 137.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

government of Lithuania was not immune from proceedings to enforce an arbitration award.

The scope of section 3(1)b was discussed by the Court of Appeal in Maclaine Watson v. Department of Trade and Industry,[123] which concerned the direct action by the brokers and banks against the member states of the ITC in respect of liability for the debts of the organisation on a contractual basis. It was held that the 'contract' referred to need not have been entered into by the state as such. That particular phrase was absent from section 3(1)b. Accordingly, the member states would not have been able to benefit from immunity in the kind of secondary liability of a guarantee nature that the plaintiffs were inter alia basing their case upon.[124] This view was adopted in the tort action against the member states[125] in the more difficult context where the obligation in question was a tortious obligation on the part of the member states, that is the authorisation or procuring of a misrepresentation inducing the creditors concerned to make a contract with another party (the ITC).[126]

Section 1603(d) of the US Foreign Sovereign Immunities Act 1976 defines 'commercial activity' as 'a regular course of commercial conduct or a particular commercial transaction or act'. It is also noted that the commercial character of an activity is to be determined by reference to the nature of the activity rather than its purpose. The courts have held that the purchases of food were commercial activities[127] as were purchases of cement,[128] the sending by a government ministry of artists to perform in the US under a US impresario[129] and activities by state airlines.[130]

The issuance of foreign governmental Treasury notes has also been held to constitute a commercial activity, but one which once validly statute-barred by passage of time cannot be revived or altered.[131]

[123] [1988] 3 WLR 1033; 80 ILR, p. 49.

[124] [1988] 3 WLR 1104–5 (Kerr LJ) and 1130 (Nourse LJ); 80 ILR, pp. 119, 148.

[125] Australia and New Zealand Banking Group v. Commonwealth of Australia, 1989, transcript, pp. 57–9.

[126] It should be noted that Evans J reached his decision on this point only with considerable hesitation and reluctance, ibid., p. 59.

[127] See e.g. Gemini Shipping v. Foreign Trade Organisation for Chemicals and Foodstuffs 63 ILR, p. 569 and ADM Milling Co. v. Republic of Bolivia 63 ILR, p. 56.

[128] NAC v. Federal Republic of Nigeria 63 ILR, p. 137.

[129] United Euram Co. v. USSR 63 ILR, p. 228.

[130] Argentine Airlines v. Ross 63 ILR, p. 195.

[131] Schmidt v. Polish People's Republic 742 F.2d 67 (1984). See also Jackson v. People's Republic of China 596 F.Supp. 386 (1984); Amoco Overseas Oil Co. v. Compagnie Nationale Algérienne 605 F.2d 648 (1979); 63 ILR, p. 252 and Corporacion Venezolana de Fomenta v. Vintero Sales 629 F.2d 786 (1980); 63 ILR, p. 477.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

In Callejo v. Bancomer,[132] a case in which a Mexican bank refused to redeem a certificate of deposit, the District Court dismissed the action on the ground that the bank was an instrumentality of the Mexican government and thus benefited from sovereign immunity, although the Court of Appeals decided the issue on the basis that the act of state doctrine applied since an investigation of a sovereign act performed wholly within the foreign government's territory would otherwise be required. In other cases, US courts have dealt with the actions of Mexican banks consequent upon Mexican exchange control regulations on the basis of sovereign immunity.[133] However, the Supreme Court in Republic of Argentina v. Weltover Inc.[134] held that the act of issuing government bonds was a commercial activity and the unilateral rescheduling of payment of these bonds also constituted a commercial activity. The Court, noting that the term 'commercial' was largely undefined in the legislation, took the view that its definition related to the meaning it had under the restrictive theory of sovereign immunity and particularly as discussed in Alfred Dunhill v. Republic of Cuba.[135] Accordingly, 'when a foreign government acts, not as regulator of a market, but in the manner of a private player within it, the foreign sovereign's actions are "commercial" within the meaning of the FSIA . . . the issue is whether the particular actions that the foreign state performs (whatever the motives behind them) are the type of actions by which a private party engages in "trade or traffic or commerce"'. In this case, the bonds in question were debt instruments that could be held by [132] 764 F.2d 1101 (1985). See also Chisholm v. Bank of Jamaica 643 F.Supp. 1393 (1986); 121 ILR, p. 487. Note that in Dole Food Co. v. Patrickson, the US Supreme Court, in its decision of 22 April 2003, held that in order to constitute an instrumentality under the Foreign Sovereign Immunities Act, the foreign state concerned must itself own a majority of a corporation's shares. Indirect subsidiaries would not benefit from immunity since such companies cannot come within the statutory language granting instrumentality status to an entity a 'majority of whose shares or other ownership interest is owned by a foreign state or political subdivision thereof': see s. 1603(b)(2). Only direct ownership would satisfy the statutory requirement. The statutory reference to ownership of 'shares' showed that Congress intended coverage to turn on formal corporate ownership and a corporation and its shareholders were distinct entities. Further, instrumentality status was to be determined as at the time of the filing of the complaint: see Case No. 01–593, pp. 4–8.

[133] See e.g. Braka v. Nacional Financiera, No. 83-4161 (SDNY 9 July 1984) and Frankel v. Banco Nacional de Mexico, No. 82-6457 (SDNY 31 May 1983), cited in 80 AJIL, 1986, p. 172, note 5.

[134] 119 L Ed 2d 394 (1992); 100 ILR, p. 509.

[135] 425 US 682 (1976); 66 ILR, p. 212. Here, the plurality stated that a foreign state engaging in commercial activities was exercising only those powers that can be exercised by private citizens, 425 US 704.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

private persons and were negotiable and could be traded on the international market.[136] This approach was followed in Guevera v. Peru by the Court of Appeals for the Eleventh Circuit, which held that a foreign state's offer of a reward in exchange for information concerning a fugitive fell within the 'commercial activity' exception to immunity.[137]

The purchase of military equipment by Haiti for use by its army[138] and a military training agreement whereby a foreign soldier was in the US were held not to be commercial activities.[139] It has also been decided that Somalia's participation in an Agency for International Development programme constituted a public or governmental act,[140] while the publication of a libel in a journal distributed in the US was not a commercial activity where the journal concerned constituted an official commentary of the Soviet government.[141] Section 1604(a)4 also provides for an exception to immunity where 'rights in immovable property situated in the United States are in issue' and the Supreme Court in Permanent Mission of India to the US v. City of New York held that this provided jurisdiction over a suit brought by New York City to establish tax liens on real property owned by the governments of India and Mongolia.[142]

Many cases before the US courts have, however, centred upon the jurisdictional requirements of section 1605(a), which states that a foreign state is not immune in any case in which the action is based upon a commercial activity carried on in the US by a foreign state; or upon an act performed in the US in connection with a foreign state's commercial activity elsewhere; or upon an act outside the territory of the US in connection with a foreign state's commercial activity elsewhere, when that act causes a direct effect in the US.[143]

[136] 119 L Ed 2d 394, 405; 100 ILR, p. 515. Reaffirmed in Saudi Arabia v. Nelson 123 L Ed 2d 47, 61 (1993); 100 ILR, pp. 545, 553.

[137] DC Docket No. 04-23223-CV-MGC, 1 November 2006.

[138] Aerotrade Inc. v. Republic of Haiti 63 ILR, p. 41.

[139] Castro v. Saudi Arabia 63 ILR, p. 419.

[140] Transamerican Steamship Corp. v. Somali Democratic Republic 590 F.Supp. 968 (1984) and 767 F.2d 998. This is based upon the legislative history of the 1976 Act: see the HR Rep. No. 1487, 94th Cong., 2d Sess. 16 (1976).

[141] Yessenin-Volpin v. Novosti Press Agency 443 F.Supp. 849 (1978); 63 ILR, p. 127. See also Schreuer, State Immunity, pp. 42–3, providing a list of criteria with respect to identifying commercial transactions.

[142] 127 S. Ct. 2352 (2007).

[143] See e.g. International Shoe Co. v. Washington 326 US 310 (1945); McGee v. International Life Insurance Co. 355 US 220 (1957); Libyan-American Oil Co. v. Libya 482 F.Supp. 1175 (1980); 62 ILR, p. 220; Perez et al. v. The Bahamas 482 F.Supp. 1208 (1980); 63 ILR,

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

In Zedan v. Kingdom of Saudi Arabia,[144] for example, the US Court of Appeals in discussing the scope of section 1605(a)(2) emphasised that the commercial activity in question taking place in the US had to be substantial, so that a telephone call in the US which initiated a sequence of events which resulted in the plaintiff working in Saudi Arabia was not sufficient. Additionally, where an act is performed in the US in connection with a commercial activity of a foreign state elsewhere, this act must in itself be sufficient to form the basis of a cause of action,[145] while the direct effect in the US provision of an act abroad in connection with a foreign state's commercial activity elsewhere was subject to a high threshold. As the Court noted,[146] in cases where this clause was held to have been satisfied, 'something legally significant actually happened in the United States'.[147] However, in Republic of Argentina v. Weltover Inc.,[148] the Court rejected the suggestion that section 1605(a)(2) contained any unexpressed requirement as to substantiality or foreseeability and supported the Court of Appeals' view that an effect was direct if it followed as an immediate consequence of the defendant's activity.[149] In the case, it was sufficient that the respondents had designated their accounts in New York as the place of payment and Argentina had made some interest payments into them prior to the rescheduling decision.

Article 10 of the UN Convention on Jurisdictional Immunities provides that there is no immunity where a state engages in a 'commercial transaction' with a foreign natural or juridical person (but not another state) in a situation where by virtue of the rules of private international law a dispute comes before the courts of another state, unless the parties to the commercial transaction otherwise expressly agree. However, the

p. 350 and Thos. P. Gonzalez Corp v. Consejo Nacional de Produccion de Costa Rica 614 F.2d 1247 (1980); 63 ILR, p. 370, aff'd 652 F.2d 186 (1982).

144 849 F.2d 1511 (1988).

145 Ibid. Note that the Supreme Court in Saudi Arabia v. Nelson 123 L Ed 2d 47, 58–9; 100 ILR, pp. 545, 550–1, held that the phrase 'based on' appearing in the section, meant 'those elements of a claim that, if proven, would entitle a plaintiff to relief under his theory of the case'.

146 849 F.2d 1515.

147 Referring to the cases of Transamerican Steamship Corp. v. Somali Democratic Republic 767 F.2d 998, 1004, where demand for payment in the US by an agency of the Somali government and actual bank transfers were held to be sufficient, and Texas Trading & Milling Corp. v. Federal Republic of Nigeria 647 F.2d 300, 312; 63 ILR, pp. 552, 563, where refusal to pay letters of credit issued by a US bank and payable in the US to financially injured claimants was held to suffice.

148 119 L Ed 2d 394 (1992); 100 ILR, p. 509.

149 119 L Ed 2d 407; 100 ILR, p. 517, citing 941 F.2d at 152.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

immunity of a state is unaffected where a state enterprise or other entity established by a state which has an independent legal personality and is capable of suing or being sued and acquiring, owning or possessing and disposing of property, including property which that state has authorised it to operate or manage, is involved in a proceeding which relates to a commercial transaction in which that entity is engaged.

Article 2(1)c of the Convention provides that the term 'commercial transaction' means:

> (i) any commercial contract or transaction for the sale of goods or the supply of services;
> (ii) any contract for a loan or other transaction of a financial nature, including any obligation of guarantee or of indemnity in respect of any such loan or transaction;
> (iii) any other contract or transaction of a commercial, industrial, trading or professional nature, but not including a contract of employment of persons.[150]

Contracts of employment

Section 4(1) of the State Immunity Act 1978 provides that a state is not immune as respects proceedings relating to a contract of employment between the state and an individual where the contract was made in the UK or where the work is to be performed wholly or in part there.[151] The section does not apply if at the time of the proceedings the individual is a national of the state concerned[152] or at the time the contract was made the individual was neither a national nor habitual resident of the UK or the parties to the contract have otherwise agreed in writing. However, these provisions do not apply with regard to members of a diplomatic mission or consular post,[153] a fact that has rendered section 4(1) significantly weaker.[154] There have been a number of cases concerning immunity and contracts of employment, particularly with regard to employment at foreign embassies. In Sengupta v. Republic of India, for example, a broad [150] See as to earlier drafts of this provision, Report of the International Law Commission, 1991, pp. 13 and 69, and Yearbook of the ILC, 1986, vol. II, part 2, p. 8.

[151] See e.g. H. Fox, 'Employment Contracts as an Exception to State Immunity: Is All Public Service Immune?', 66 BYIL, 1995, p. 97, and R. Garnett, 'State Immunity in Employment Matters', 46 ICLQ, 1997, p. 81.

[152] See e.g. Arab Republic of Egypt v. Gamal Eldin [1996] 2 All ER 237.

[153] S. 16(1)a.

[154] See e.g. Saudi Arabia v. Ahmed [1996] 2 All ER 248; 104 ILR, p. 629.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

decision prior to the 1978 Act, the Employment Appeal Tribunal held on the basis of customary law that immunity existed with regard to a contract of employment dispute since the workings of the mission in question constituted a form of sovereign activity.[155]

The position in other countries is varied. In United States of America v. The Public Service Alliance of Canada (Re Canada Labour Code), for example, it was held that the conduct of labour relations at a foreign military base was not a commercial activity so that the US was entitled to sovereign immunity in proceedings before a labour tribunal,[156] while in Norwegian Embassy v. Quattri, for example, the Italian Court of Cassation referred to an international trend of restricting immunity with regard to employment contracts. The Court held that under customary international law immunity was available, but this was restricted to acts carried out in the exercise of the foreign state's public law functions. Accordingly, no immunity existed with regard to acts carried out by the foreign state in the capacity of a private individual under the internal law of the receiving state. An example of this would be employment disputes where the employees' duties were of a merely auxiliary nature and not intrinsic to the foreign public law entity.[157] In Barrandon v. USA, the French Court of Cassation (1992) and subsequently the Court of Appeal of Versailles (1995) held that immunity was a privilege not guaranteed by an international treaty to which France was a party and could only be invoked by a state which believed it was entitled to rely upon it. Immunity from jurisdiction was limited to acts of sovereign power (puissance publique) or acts performed in the interest of a public service. In the instant case, the plaintiff, a nurse and medical secretary at the US embassy, had performed functions clearly in the interest of a public service of the respondent state and immunity was therefore applicable.[158] However, on appeal the Court of Cassation (1998) reversed this decision and held that her tasks did not give her any special responsibility for the performance of the public [157] 114 ILR, p. 525. See also Canada v. Cargnello 114 ILR, p. 559. See also a number of German cases also holding that employment functions forming part of the core sphere of sovereign activity of the foreign states would attract immunity, otherwise not, X v. Argentina 114 ILR, p. 502; the French Consulate Disabled Employee case, 114 ILR, p. 508 and Muller v. USA 114 ILR, p. 513.

[155] 65 ILR, p. 325. See also Military Affairs Office of the Embassy of the State of Kuwait v. Caramba-Coker, EAT 1054/02/RN, Employment Appeals Tribunal (2003) and Aziz v. Republic of Yemen [2005] EWCA Civ 745.

[156] (1992) 91 DLR (4th) 449; 94 ILR, p. 264.

[158] 113 ILR, p. 464.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

service of the embassy, so that her dismissal was an ordinary act of administration so that immunity was not applicable.[159] Practice is far from consistent. Courts in a number of states have accepted immunity claims in such state immunity/employment situations,[160] while courts in others have rejected such claims.[161]

Other non-immunity areas

Domestic and international instruments prohibit sovereign immunity in cases of tortious activity.[162] Article 11 of the European Convention on State Immunity, 1972, for example, refers to 'redress for injury to the person or damage to tangible property, if the facts which occasioned the injury or damage occurred in the territory of the state of the forum, and if the author of the injury or damage was present in that territory at the time when those facts occurred'.

Section 5 of the UK State Immunity Act provides that a state is not immune as respects proceedings in respect of death or personal injury, or damage to or loss of tangible property, caused by an act or omission in the UK,[163] while section 1605(a)(5) of the US Foreign Sovereign Immunities Act 1976, although basically similar, does include exceptions relating to the exercise of the state's discretionary functions and to claims arising out of malicious prosecution, abuse of process, libel, slander, misrepresentation, deceit or interference with contractual rights. In Letelier v. Chile,[164] the Court rejected a claim that the torts exception in this [159] 116 ILR, p. 622. The case was remitted to the Court of Appeal for decision.

[160] See e.g. the Brazilian Embassy Employee case, 116 ILR, p. 625 (Portuguese Supreme Court) and Ramos v. USA 116 ILR, p. 634 (High Court of Lisbon).

[161] See e.g. Landano v. USA 116 ILR, p. 636 (Labour Court of Geneva); Nicoud v. USA 116 ILR, p. 650 (Labour Court of Geneva); M v. Arab Republic of Egypt 116 ILR, p. 656 (Swiss Federal Tribunal); R v. Republic of Iraq 116 ILR, p. 664 (Swiss Federal Tribunal); François v. State of Canada 115 ILR, p. 418 (Labour Court of Brussels); Kingdom of Morocco v. DR 115 ILR, p. 421 (Labour Court of Brussels); De Queiroz v. State of Portugal 115 ILR, p. 430 (Labour Court of Brussels); Zambian Embassy v. Sendanayake 114 ILR, p. 532 (Italian Court of Cassation), and Carbonar v. Magurno 114 ILR, p. 534 (Italian Court of Cassation).

[162] See e.g. Schreuer, State Immunity, chapter 3.

[163] See also s. 6 of the Canadian State Immunity Act 1982; s. 6 of the South African Foreign Sovereign Immunity Act 1981; s. 7 of the Singapore State Immunity Act 1979; and s. 13 of the Australian Foreign States Immunities Act 1985. See also article 12 of the UN Convention on Jurisdictional Immunities.

[164] 488 F.Supp. 665 (1980); 63 ILR, p. 378.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

legislation referred only to private acts and held that it could apply to political assassinations.[165]

Sections 6-11 of the UK Act detail the remainder of the wide-ranging non-immunity areas and include proceedings relating to immovable property (section 6)[166] except with regard to proceedings concerning a state's title to or right to possession of property used for the purposes of a diplomatic mission;[167] patents, trademarks, designs, plant breeders' rights or copyrights (section 7); proceedings relating to a state's membership of a body corporate, an unincorporated body or partnership, with members other than states which is incorporated or constituted under UK law or is controlled from or has its principal place of business in the UK (section 8); where a state has agreed in writing to submit to arbitration and with respect to proceedings in the UK courts relating to that arbitration (section 9); Admiralty proceedings with regard to state-owned ships used or intended for use for commercial purposes (section 10); and proceedings relating to liability for various taxes, such as VAT (section 11). This, together with generally similar provisions in the legislation of other states,[168] demonstrates how restricted the concept of sovereign acts is now becoming in practice in the context of sovereign immunity, although definitional problems remain.

The personality issue – instrumentalities and parts of the state[169]

Whether the absolute or restrictive theory is applied, the crucial factor is to determine the entity entitled to immunity. If the entity, in very general terms, is not part of the apparatus of state, then no immunity can arise. Shaw LJ in Trendtex Trading Corporation Ltd v. Central Bank of [165] Note that the Greek Special Supreme Court in Margellos v. Federal Republic of Germany held that in customary international law a foreign state continued to enjoy immunity in respect of a tort committed in another state in which its armed forces had participated, 129 ILR, p. 526. See also article 31 of the European Convention on State Immunity. See also the Distomo Massacre case, 129 ILR, p. 556.

[166] The winding-up of a company is not protected by immunity where the state is not directly impleaded: see s. 6(3) and Re Rafidain [1992] BCLC 301; 101 ILR, p. 332.

[167] S. 16(1)b.

[168] See e.g. s. 1605 of the US Foreign Sovereign Immunities Act 1976 and ss. 10–21 of the Australian Foreign States Immunities Act 1985. Note in particular the inclusion in the US legislation of an exception to immunity with regard to rights in property taken in violation of international law, s. 1605(a)(3), which does not appear in other domestic legislation.

[169] See e.g. Schreuer, State Immunity, chapter 5.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

Nigeria[170] cautioned against too facile an attribution of immunity particularly in the light of the growth of governmental functions, since its acceptance resulted in a significant disadvantage to the other party.

A department of government would, however, be entitled to immunity, even if it had a separate legal personality under its own law.[171] The issue was discussed in detail in the Trendtex case. It was emphasised that recourse should be had to all the circumstances of the case. The fact of incorporation as a separate legal identity was noted in Baccus SRL v. Servicio Nacional del Trigo[172] and both Donaldson J at first instance and Denning MR emphasised this.[173] The question arises in analysing whether a body is a corporation or not, and indeed whether it is or is not an arm of government, as to which law is relevant. Each country may have its own rules governing incorporation, and similarly with regard to government departments. Should English law therefore merely accept the conclusions of the foreign law? The majority of the Court in Baccus was of the view that foreign law was decisive in questions relating to incorporation and whether corporateness was consistent with the recognition of immunity, and to a certain extent this was accepted in Trendtex. Shaw LJ declared that 'the constitution and powers of Nigerian corporation must be viewed in the light of the domestic law of Nigeria'.[174] However, the status on the international scene of the entity in question must be decided, it was held, by the law of the country in which the issue as to its status has been raised. The Court had to determine whether the Nigerian Bank could constitute a government department as understood in English law.[175] It was also noted that where a material difference existed between English law and the foreign law, this would be taken into account, but the Court was satisfied that this was not the case in Trendtex.

This position of pre-eminence for English law must not be understood to imply the application of decisions of English courts relating to immunities granted internally. These could be at best only rough guides to be utilised depending on the circumstances of each case. If the view taken by the foreign law was not conclusive, neither was the attitude adopted by the foreign government. It was a factor to be considered, again, but no more than that. In this, the Court followed Krajina v. Tass Agency.[176] The point

[170] [1977] 2 WLR 356, 383; 64 ILR, pp. 122, 147.
[171] Baccus SRL v. Servicio Nacional del Trigo [1957] 1 QB 438; 23 ILR, p. 160.
[172] [1957] 1 QB 438, 467. [173] [1977] 2 WLR 356, 370; 64 ILR, p. 133.
[174] [1977] 2 WLR 356, 385; 64 ILR, p. 149. [175] [1977] 2 WLR 356, 385; 64 ILR, p. 175.
[176] [1949] 2 All ER 274.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

was also made that the evidence provided by Nigerian officials, including the High Commissioner, that the Bank was a government organ, was not conclusive. This was because the officials might very well be applying a test of governmental control which would not be decisive for the courts of this country.[177]

Of more importance was the legislative intention of the government in creating and regulating the entity and the degree of its control. Stephenson LJ in fact based his decision upon this point. An express provision in the creative legislation to the effect that the Bank was an arm of government was not necessary, but the Bank had to prove that the intention to make it an organ of the Nigerian state was of necessity to be implied from the enabling Central Bank of Nigeria Act 1958 and subsequent decrees. This the Bank had failed to do and Stephenson LJ accordingly allowed the appeal.[178] It could be argued that the judge was placing too much stress upon this aspect, particularly in the light of the overall approach of the Court in applying the functional rather than the personality test. In many ways, Stephenson LJ was also looking at the attributes of the Bank but from a slightly different perspective. He examined the powers and duties of the entity and denied it immunity since the intention of the government to establish the Bank as an arm of itself could not be clearly demonstrated. The other judges were concerned with the functions of the Bank as implying governmental status per se.

The Court clearly accepted the functional test as the crucial guide to the determination of sovereign immunity. In this it was following the modern approach which has precipitated the change in emphasis from the personality of the entity for which immunity is claimed to the nature of the subject matter. This functional test looks to the powers, duties and control of the entity within the framework of its constitution and activities.

In such difficult borderline decisions, the proposition put forward by Shaw LJ is to be welcomed. He noted that:

> where the issue of status trembles on a fine edge, the absence of any positive indication that the body in question was intended to possess sovereign status and its attendant privileges must perforce militate against the view that it enjoys that status or is entitled to those privileges.[179]

[177] [1977] 2 WLR 356, 370 and 374; 64 ILR, p. 137, 139.
[178] [1977] 2 WLR 356, 374–6. See also Shaw LJ, ibid., p. 384; 64 ILR, p. 149.
[179] Ibid.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

In Czarnikow Ltd v. Rolimpex,[180] the House of Lords accepted as correct the findings of the arbitrators that although Rolimpex had been established by the Polish government and was controlled by it, it was not so closely connected with the government as to be an organ or department of the state. It had separate legal personality and had considerable freedom in day-to-day commercial activities.

Under section 14(1) of the State Immunity Act of 1978, a state is deemed to include the sovereign or other head of state in his public capacity,[181] the government and any department of that government, but not any entity 'which is distinct from the executive organs of the government of the state and capable of suing or being sued'. This modifies the Baccus and Trendtex approaches to some extent. Such a separate entity would only be immune if the proceedings related to acts done 'in the exercise of sovereign authority' and the circumstances are such that a state would have been so immune.[182] In determining such a situation, all the relevant circumstances should be taken into consideration.[183] In Kuwait Airways Corporation v. Iraqi Airways Co., the House of Lords, in discussing the position of the Iraqi Airways Company (IAC), analysed the relevant transactions as a whole but felt able to separate out differing elements and treat them discretely. In brief, aircraft of the plaintiffs (KAC) had been seized by IAC consequent upon the Iraqi invasion of Kuwait in 1990 and pursuant to orders from the Iraqi government. Revolutionary Command Council[184] resolution 369 purported to dissolve KAC and transfer all of its assets to IAC. From that point on, IAC treated the aircraft in question as part of its own fleet. The issue was whether the fact that the initial appropriation was by governmental action meant that the plea of immunity continued to be available to IAC. The House of Lords held that it was not. Once resolution 369 came into effect the situation changed and immunity was no longer applicable since the retention and use of the aircraft were not acts done in the exercise of sovereign authority. A characterisation of the appropriation of the property as a sovereign act could not be determinative of the characterisation of its subsequent retention and use.[185]

The US Foreign Sovereign Immunities Act of 1976 provides in section 1603 that 'foreign state' includes a political subdivision of such a state [180] [1979] AC 351, 364 (Lord Wilberforce) and 367 (Viscount Dilhorne).

[181] See further below, p. 735. [182] S. 14(2).
[183] See e.g. Holland v. Lampen-Wolfe [2000] 1 WLR 1573.
[184] Essentially the Iraqi government.
[185] [1995] 1 WLR 1147, 1163 (per Lord Goff). Cf. Lord Mustill at 1174 who argued that the context should be taken as a whole so that immunity continued.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

and its agencies or instrumentalities. This is defined to mean any entity which is a separate legal person and which is an organ of a foreign state or political subdivision thereof or a majority of whose shares or other ownership interest is owned by a foreign state or political subdivision thereof and which is neither a citizen of a state of the United States nor created under the laws of any third country.[186] This issue of personality has occasioned problems and some complex decisions.[187]

In First National City Bank v. Banco Para el Comercio Exterior de Cuba (Bancec),[188] for example, the Supreme Court suggested a presumption of separateness for state entities, under which their separate legal personalities were to be recognised unless applicable equitable principles mandated otherwise or the parent entity so completely dominated the subsidiary as to render it an agent of the parent.[189]

The meaning of the term 'government' as it appears in section 14(1) of the State Immunity Act was discussed in Propend Finance v. Sing. The Court of Appeal held that it must be given a broad meaning and, in particular, that it should be construed in the light of the concept of sovereign authority. Accordingly, 'government' meant more than it would in other contexts in English law where it would mean simply the government of the United Kingdom. In particular it would include the performance of police functions as part of governmental activity. Further, individual employees or officers of a foreign state were entitled to the same protection as that which envelops the state itself. The Court thus concluded that both the Australian Federal Police superintendent and Commissioner, the defendants in the case, were covered by state immunity.[190] The view that the agent of a foreign state would enjoy immunity in respect of his acts of a sovereign or governmental nature was reaffirmed in Re P (No. 2). The Court accepted that the removal from the country of the family of a diplomat based in the UK and their return to the US at the end of his mission was in compliance with a direct order from his government. This [186] See e.g. Gittler v. German Information Centre 408 NYS 2d 600 (1978); 63 ILR, p. 170; Carey v. National Oil Co. 453 F.Supp. 1097 (1978); 63 ILR, p. 164 and Yessenin-Volpin v. Novosti Press Agency 443 F.Supp. 849 (1978); 63 ILR, p. 127. See also Sinclair, 'Sovereign Immunity', pp. 248–9 and 258–9. Note, in addition, articles 6 and 7 of the European Convention on State Immunity, 1972.

[187] See also article 2(1)b of the UN Convention on Jurisdictional Immunities: see above, p. 725.

[188] 462 US 611 (1983); 80 ILR, p. 566.

[189] See also Foremost-McKesson Inc. v. Islamic Republic of Iran 905 F.2d 438 (1990).

[190] 111 ILR, pp. 611, 667–71.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

was held to constitute an act of a governmental nature and thus subject to state immunity.[191] In Jones v. Saudi Arabia, the House of Lords, overturning the Court of Appeal decision to the contrary on this point, held that there was 'a wealth of authority to show that . . . the foreign state is entitled to claim immunity for its servants as it could if sued itself. The foreign state's right to immunity cannot be circumvented by suing its servants or agents.'[192]

One particular issue that has caused controversy in the past relates to the status of component units of federal states.[193] There have been cases asserting immunity[194] and denying immunity[195] in such circumstances. In Mellenger v. New Brunswick Development Corporation,[196] Lord Denning emphasised that since under the Canadian Constitution

> Each provincial government, within its own sphere, retained its independence and autonomy directly under the Crown . . . It follows that the Province of New Brunswick is a sovereign state in its own right and entitled if it so wishes to claim sovereign immunity.

However, article 28 of the European Convention on State Immunity, 1972 provides that constituent states of a federal state do not enjoy immunity, although this general principle is subject to the proviso that federal state parties may declare by notification that their constituent states may invoke the benefits and carry out the obligations of the Convention.[197]

The State Immunity Act follows this pattern in that component units of a federation are not entitled to immunity. However, section 14(5) provides that the Act may be made applicable to the 'constituent territories of a [191] [1998] 1 FLR 1027, 1034–5; 114 ILR, p. 485. See also J. C. Barker, 'State Immunity, Diplomatic Immunity and Act of State: A Triple Protection Against Legal Action?', 47 ICLQ, 1998, p. 950.

[192] [2006] UKHL 26, para. 10 (per Lord Bingham); 129 ILR, p. 717. This applied to acts done to such persons as servants or agents, officials or functionaries of the state, ibid.

[193] See e.g. I. Bernier, International Legal Aspects of Federalism, London, 1973, pp. 121 ff. and Sucharitkul, State Immunities, p. 106.

[194] See e.g. Feldman c. État de Bahia, Pasicrisie Belge, 208, II, 55; État de Céara c. Dorr et autres 4 AD, p. 39; État de Céara c. D'Archer de Montgascon, 6 AD, p. 162 and Dumont c. État d'Amazonas 15 AD, p. 140. See also État de Hesse c. Jean Neger 74 Revue Générale de Droit International Public, 1970, p. 1108.

[195] See e.g. Sullivan v. State of Sao Paulo 122 F.2d 355 (1941); 10 AD, p. 178.

[196] [1971] 2 All ER 593, 595; 52 ILR, pp. 322, 324. See also Swiss-Israel Trade Bank v. Salta 55 ILR, p. 411.

[197] See e.g. I. Sinclair, 'The European Convention on State Immunity', 22 ICLQ, 1973, pp. 254, 279–80.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

federal state by specific Order in Council'.[198] Where no such order is made, any such 'constituent territory' would be entitled to immunity only if it conformed with section 14(2), being a separate entity acting in the exercise of sovereign authority and in circumstances in which the state would be immune.[199] While the matter is thus determined in so far as the Act operates in the particular circumstances, s. 16(4) states that Part I of the Act does not apply to criminal proceedings. In the case of Alamieyeseigha v. CPS, the Court did not accept that the state of Bayelsa, a constituent unit of the Nigerian Federation, and its Governor were entitled to state immunity with regard to criminal proceedings, a claim made on the basis of Mellenger.[200] Key to the decision was the fact that Bayelsa state had no legal powers to conduct foreign relations on its own behalf, external affairs being exclusively reserved to the federal government under the Nigerian Constitution. As further and decisive evidence, the Court referred to the certificate from the UK Foreign Office to the effect that Bayelsa was a constituent territory of the Federal Republic of Nigeria.[201]

Article 2(1)b of the UN Convention on Jurisdictional Immunities, it should be noted, includes within its definition of state, 'constituent units of a federal state'.[202] The issue of the status of the European Community in this context was raised in the course of the ITC litigation as the EEC was a party to the sixth International Tin Agreement, 1982 under which the ITC was constituted. The Court of Appeal in Maclaine Watson v. Department of Trade and Industry[203] held that the EEC's claim to sovereign immunity was untenable. It had been conceded that the EEC was not a state and thus could not rely on the State Immunity Act 1978, but it was argued that the Community was entitled to immunity analogous to sovereign immunity under the rules of common law. This approach was held by Kerr [198] An Order in Council has been made with respect to the constituent territories of Austria, SI 1979 no. 457, and Germany, SI 1993 no. 2809. The Act may also be extended to dependent territories: see e.g. the State Immunity (Overseas Territories) Order 1979, SI 1979 no. 458 and the State Immunity (Jersey) Order 1985, SI 1985 no. 1642.

[199] See e.g. BCCI v. Price Waterhouse [1997] 4 All ER 108; 111 ILR, p. 604.

[200] [2005] EWHC 2704. [201] Ibid., paras. 38 ff.

[202] See also the Report of the International Law Commission, 1991, p. 13. Note that article I of the Revised Draft Articles for a Convention on State Immunity adopted by the International Law Association in 1994 defines the term 'foreign state' to include the government of the state, any other state organs and agencies and instrumentalities of the state not possessing legal personality distinct from the state. No specific reference to units of federal states is made.

[203] [1988] 3 WLR 1033; 80 ILR, p. 49.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

LJ to be 'entirely misconceived'.[204] Although the EEC had personality in international law and was able to exercise powers and functions analogous to those of sovereign states, this did not lead on to immunity as such. This was because sovereign immunity was 'a derogation from the normal exercise of jurisdiction by the courts and should be accorded only in clear cases',[205] while the concept itself was based upon the equality of states. The EEC Treaty, 1957 and the Merger Treaty, 1965 themselves made no claim for general immunity and nothing else existed upon which such a claim could be based.[206]

The personality issue – immunity for government figures[207]

The question of immunity ratione personae arises particularly and most strongly in the case of heads of state. Such immunity issues may come into play either with regard to international tribunals or within domestic orders. Taking the first, it is clear that serving heads of state, and other governmental officials, may be rendered susceptible to the jurisdiction of international tribunals, depending, of course, upon the terms of the constitutions of such tribunals. The provisions of, for example, the Versailles Treaty, 1919 (article 227); the Charter of the International Military Tribunal at Nuremberg, 1945 (article 7); the Statutes of the Yugoslav and Rwanda International Criminal Tribunals (articles 7 and 6 respectively); the Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court, 1998 (article 27) and the Statute for the Special Court for Sierra Leone, 2002 (article 6(2)) all expressly state that individual criminal responsibility will exist irrespective of any official status, including that of head of state. This was reaffirmed by the Special Court for Sierra Leone in its decision concerning the claim for immunity made by Charles Taylor.[208]

[204] [1988] 3 WLR 1107; 80 ILR, p. 122.

[205] Victory Transport v. Comisaria General de Abastecimientos y Transportes 336 F.2d 354 (1964), cited with approval by Ackner LJ in Empresa Exportadora de Azucar v. Industria Azucarera Nacional [1983] 2 LL. R 171, 193 and Lord Edmund-Davies in I° Congreso del Partido [1983] 1 AC 244, 276.

[206] [1988] 3 WLR 1033, 1108–12; 80 ILR, pp. 49, 123. Nourse and Ralph Gibson LLJ agreed with Kerr LJ completely on this issue, ibid., pp. 1131 and 1158; 80 ILR, pp. 150, 180.

[207] See e.g. Y. Simbeye, Immunity and International Criminal Law, Aldershot, 2004, and A. Borghi, L'Immunité des Dirigeants Politiques en Droit International, Geneva, 2003.

[208] Case No. SCSL-2003-01-I, Decision on Immunity from Jurisdiction, 31 May 2004, 128 ILR, p. 239.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

The situation of immunity before domestic courts is more complex.[209] First, the question of the determination of the status of head of state before domestic courts is primarily a matter for the domestic order of the individual concerned. In Republic of the Philippines v. Marcos (No. 1),[210] for example, the US Court of Appeals for the Second Circuit held that the Marcoses, the deposed leader of the Philippines and his wife, were not entitled to claim sovereign immunity. In a further decision, the Court of Appeals for the Fourth Circuit held in In re Grand Jury Proceedings, Doe No. 770 [211] that head of state immunity was primarily an attribute of state sovereignty, not an individual right, and that accordingly full effect should be given to the revocation by the Philippines government of the immunity of the Marcoses.[212] Also relevant would be the attitude adopted by the executive in the state in which the case is being brought. In US v. Noriega,[213] the District Court noted that head of state immunity was grounded in customary international law, but in order to assert such immunity, a government official must be recognised as head of state and this had not happened with regard to General Noriega.[214] This was confirmed by the Court of Appeals for the Eleventh Circuit, who noted that the judiciary deferred to the executive in matters concerning jurisdiction over foreign sovereigns and their instrumentalities, and, in the Noriega situation, the executive had demonstrated the view that he should not be granted head of state status. This was coupled with the fact that he had never served as constitutional ruler of Panama and that state had not sought immunity for him; further the charges related to his private enrichment.[215] In First American Corporation v. Al-Nahyan, the District Court noted that the Foreign Sovereign Immunities Act did not affect the right of the US government to file a Suggestion of Immunity asserting [209] See e.g. the observations submitted by the UK government to the European Court of Human Rights concerning Association SOS Attentats v. France, regarding the immunity of President Gaddafi of Libya in criminal and civil proceedings in France, UKMIL, 77 BYIL, 2006, pp. 735 ff.

[210] 806 F.2d 344 (1986); 81 ILR, p. 581. See also e.g. Re Honecker 80 ILR, p. 365.

[211] 817 F.2d 1108 (1987); 81 ILR, p. 599.

[212] See also Doe v. United States of America 860 F.2d 40 (1988); 121 ILR, p. 567.

[213] 746 F.Supp. 1506, 1519 (1990); 99 ILR, pp. 143, 161.

[214] See also Watts, 'Legal Position', pp. 52 ff. See also H. Fox, 'The Resolution of the Institute of International Law on the Immunities of Heads of State and Government', 51 ICLQ, 2002, p. 119.

[215] 117 F.3d 1206 (1997); 121 ILR, p. 591. See also Flatow v. Islamic Republic of Iran 999 F.Supp. 1 (1998); 121 ILR, p. 618.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

immunity with regard to a head of state and this would be binding on the courts.[216]

Secondly, international law has traditionally made a distinction between the official and private acts of a head of state.[217] In the case of civil proceedings, this means that a head of state may be susceptible to the jurisdiction where the question concerns purely private acts as distinct from acts undertaken in exercise or ostensible exercise of public authority.[218]

Thirdly, serving heads of state benefit from absolute immunity from the exercise of the jurisdiction of a foreign domestic court.[219] This was reaffirmed in Ex parte Pinochet (No. 3). Lord Browne-Wilkinson, for example, noted that, 'This immunity enjoyed by a head of state in power and an ambassador in post is a complete immunity attaching to the person of the head of state or ambassador and rendering him immune from all actions or prosecutions whether or not they relate to matters done for the benefit of the state.'[220] Lord Hope referred to the 'jus cogens character of the immunity enjoyed by serving heads of state ratione personae'.[221] This approach affirming the immunity of a serving head of state is endorsed by the decision of the French Cour de Cassation in the Ghaddafi case.[222] In Tachiona v. USA, the Court of Appeals for the Second Circuit, although deciding the issue as to the immunity of President Mugabe of Zimbabwe on the basis of diplomatic immunity, expressly doubted that the Foreign Sovereign Immunities Act was meant to change the common

[216] 948 F.Supp. 1107 (1996); 121 ILR, p. 577.

[217] See e.g. Draft Articles with Commentary on Jurisdictional Immunities, ILC Report, 1991, A/46/10, pp. 12, 15, 18 and 22.

[218] See e.g. Republic of the Philippines v. Marcos (No. 1), 806 F.2d 344 (1986); 81 ILR, p. 581; Jimenez v. Aristeguieta 33 ILR, p. 353; Lafontant v. Aristide 103 ILR, pp. 581, 585 and Mobutu and Republic of Zaire v. Société Logrine 113 ILR, p. 481. See also Watts, 'Legal Position', pp. 54 ff.

[219] See e.g. Watts, 'Legal Position', p. 54. See also Djibouti v. France, ICJ Reports, 2008, paras. 170 ff.

[220] [2000] 1 AC 147, 201–2; 119 ILR, p. 135.

[221] [2000] 1 AC 244. See also Lord Goff at 210; Lord Saville at 265 and Lord Millett at 269. See also the decision of 12 February 2003 of the Belgian Court of Cassation in HSA et al. v. SA et al., No. P. 02.1139. F/1, affirming the immunity of Prime Minister Sharon of Israel.

[222] Arrêt no. 1414, 14 March 2001, Cass. Crim. 1. See e.g. S. Zappalà, 'Do Heads of State in Office Enjoy Immunity from Jurisdiction for International Crimes? The Ghaddafi Case Before the French Cour de Cassation', 12 EJIL, 2001, p. 595. See also Tatchell v. Mugabe, unreported decision of the Bow Street Magistrates' Court, 14 January 2004, affirming the absolute immunity of President Mugabe, the Head of State of Zimbabwe.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

law of head of state immunity,[223] a proposition affirmed in earlier case-law.[224]

Fourthly, the immunity of a former head of state differs in that it may be seen as moving from a status immunity (ratione personae) to a functional immunity (ratione materiae), so that immunity will only exist for official acts done while in office. The definition of official acts is somewhat unclear, but it is suggested that this would exclude acts done in clear violation of international law. It may be concluded at the least from the judgment in Ex parte Pinochet (No. 3) that the existence of the offence in question as a crime under international law by convention will, when coupled in some way by a universal or extraterritorial mechanism of enforcement, operate to exclude a plea of immunity ratione materiae at least in so far as states parties to the relevant treaty are concerned.[225] This may be a cautious reading and the law in this area is likely to evolve further.

The question as to whether immunities ratione personae apply to other governmental persons has been controversial.[226] The International Law Commission, for example, in its commentary on the Draft Articles on Jurisdictional Immunities (which led to the UN Convention on Jurisdictional Immunities) distinguished between the special position as regards immunities ratione personae of personal sovereigns (which would include heads of state) and diplomatic agents and that of other representatives of the government who would have only immunities ratione materiae.[227]

[223] 386 F.3d 205 (2004).

[224] See Wei Ye v. Jiang Zemin 383 F.3d 620 (2004), noting also that the State Department's suggestion as to immunity was conclusive.

[225] [2000] 1 AC 147 at e.g. 204–5 (Lord Browne-Wilkinson); 246 (Lord Hope); 262 (Lord Hutton); 266–7 (Lord Saville); 277 (Lord Millett); 290 (Lord Phillips); 119 ILR, p. 135. Note that by virtue of s. 20 of the State Immunity Act cross-referring to the Diplomatic Privileges Act 1964 incorporating the Vienna Convention on Diplomatic Relations, 1961, the immunities of a head of state were assimilated to those of the head of a diplomatic mission. Article 39(2) of the Vienna Convention provides that once a diplomat's functions have come to an end, immunity will only exist as regards acts performed 'in the exercise of his functions'.

[226] Note that as far as UK law is concerned, the provisions of s. 20(1) of the State Immunity Act do not apply so that the analogy with diplomatic agents is not relevant: see previous footnote.

[227] See the Report of the International Law Commission, 1991, pp. 24–7. See also Watts, 'Legal Position', pp. 53 and 102, who adopts a similar position. Lord Millett in Ex parte Pinochet (No. 3) took the view that immunity ratione personae was 'only narrowly available. It is confined to serving heads of state and heads of diplomatic missions, their families and servants. It is not available to serving heads of government who are not also heads of state . . . ', [2000] 1 AC 147 at 268; 119 ILR, p. 135.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

However, in its judgment in the Congo v. Belgium case, the International Court of Justice stated that, 'in international law it is firmly established that . . . certain holders of high-ranking office in a state, such as the head of state, head of government and minister for foreign affairs, enjoy immunities from jurisdiction in other states, both civil and criminal'.[228] The Court took the view that serving Foreign Ministers would benefit from immunity ratione personae on the basis that such immunities were in order to ensure the effective performance of their functions on behalf of their states.[229] The extent of such immunities would be dependent upon the functions exercised, but they were such that 'throughout the duration of his or her office, he or she when abroad enjoys full immunity from criminal jurisdiction and inviolability',[230] irrespective of whether the acts in question have been performed in an official or a private capacity.[231] This absolute immunity from the jurisdiction of foreign courts would also apply with regard to war crimes or crimes against humanity.[232] Immunities derived from customary international law would remain opposable to national courts even where such courts exercised jurisdiction under various international conventions requiring states parties to extend their criminal jurisdiction to cover the offences in question.[233] The Court concluded by noting that after a person ceased to hold the office of Foreign Minister, the [228] ICJ Reports, 2002, pp. 3, 20; 128 ILR, p. 76. See also A. Cassese, 'When May Senior State Officials Be Tried for International Crimes?', 13 EJIL, 2002, p. 853. See also Djibouti v. France, ICJ Reports, 2008, paras. 181 ff.

[229] ICJ Reports, 2002, pp. 3, 21–2. [230] Ibid., p. 22. [231] Ibid. [232] Ibid., p. 24.

[233] Ibid., pp. 24–5. See, as to such conventions, above, chapter 12, p. 673. See also the application brought by the Government of the Republic of the Congo against France on 9 December 2002. France consented to the Court's jurisdiction on 11 April 2003. In its Application, the Republic of the Congo seeks the annulment of the investigation and prosecution measures taken by the French judicial authorities further to a complaint for crimes against humanity and torture filed by various associations against inter alia the President of the Republic of the Congo, Mr Denis Sassou Nguesso, and the Congolese Minister of the Interior, Mr Pierre Oba, together with other individuals including General Norbert Dabira, Inspector-General of the Congolese Armies. The Application further states that, in connection with these proceedings, an investigating judge of the Meaux tribunal de grande instance issued a warrant for the President of the Republic of the Congo to be examined as a witness. The Republic of the Congo declares this to be a violation of international law. See also the order of the ICJ of 17 June 2003 refusing an indication of provisional measures in this case. Rwanda introduced an application against France on 18 April 2007 concerning international arrest warrants issued by the latter's judicial authorities against three Rwandan officials on 20 November 2006 and a request sent to the United Nations Secretary-General that President Paul Kagame of Rwanda should stand trial at the International Criminal Tribunal for Rwanda (ICTR). France has to date not given its consent to this application and there is no other jurisdictional basis.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

courts of other countries may prosecute with regard to acts committed before or after the period of office and also 'in respect of acts committed during that period of office in a private capacity'.[234] This appears to leave open the question of prosecution for acts performed in violation of international law (such as, for example, torture), unless these are deemed to fall within the category of private acts.

It is also uncertain as to how far the term used by the Court, 'holders of high-ranking office in a state', might extend and practice is unclear.[235]

Waiver of immunity

It is possible for a state to waive its immunity from the jurisdiction of the court. Express waiver of immunity from jurisdiction, however, which must be granted by an authorised representative of the state,[236] does not of itself mean waiver of immunity from execution.[237] In the case of implied waiver, some care is required. Section 2 of the State Immunity Act provides for loss of immunity upon submission to the jurisdiction, either by a prior written agreement[238] or after the particular dispute has arisen. A state is deemed to have submitted to the jurisdiction where the state has instituted proceedings or has intervened or taken any step in the [234] ICJ Reports, 2002, pp. 25–6. But see the Dissenting Opinion of Judge Al-Khasawneh.

[235] See above, note 228. See also Application for Arrest Warrant Against General Shaul Mofaz, decision of the Bow Street Magistrates' Court, 12 February 2004, where it was held that a serving Defence Minister of another state would benefit from immunities before the English court, 128 ILR, p. 709.

[236] See e.g. R v. Madan [1961] QB 1, 7. Although this was a case on diplomatic immunity which preceded the 1964 Diplomatic Privileges Act incorporating the Vienna Convention on Diplomatic Relations, 1961, the Court of Appeal in Aziz v. Republic of Yemen [2005] EWCA Civ 745, para. 48, held the statement to be of general application, including with regard to a consideration of waiver of state immunity under the 1978 Act.

[237] See e.g. article 20 of the UN Convention on Jurisdictional Immunities. Note, however, that the issue will turn upon the interpretation of the terms of the waiver: see A Company v. Republic of X [1990] 2 LL. R 520; 87 ILR, p. 412. However, it is suggested that the principle that waiver of immunity from jurisdiction does not of itself constitute a waiver of immunity from the grant of relief by the courts is of the nature of a presumption, thus placing the burden of proof to the contrary upon the private party and having implications with regard to the standard of proof required. See also Sabah Shipyard v. Pakistan [2002] EWCA Civ. 1643 at paras. 18 ff.

[238] Overruling Kahan v. Pakistan Federation [1951] 2 KB 1003; 18 ILR, p. 210. Submission to the jurisdiction by means of a provision in a contract must be in clear, express language. The choice of UK law as the governing law of the contract did not amount to such a submission: see Mills v. USA 120 ILR, p. 612.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

proceedings.[239] Article 8 of the UN Convention on Jurisdictional Immunities is essentially to the same effect.[240]

If a state submits to proceedings, it is deemed to have submitted to any counter-claim arising out of the same legal relationship or facts as the claim.[241] A provision in an agreement that it is to be governed by the law of the UK is not to be taken as a submission. By section 9 of the State Immunity Act, a state which has agreed in writing to submit a dispute to arbitration is not immune from proceedings in the courts which relate to the arbitration.[242] In Svenska Petroleum v. Lithuania, the Court of Appeal held that a failure to challenge an award made without jurisdiction did not of itself amount to an agreement in writing on Lithuania's part to submit the dispute to arbitration.[243] However, the Court noted that there was no basis for construing section 9 of the State Immunity Act (particularly when viewed in the context of the provisions of section 13 dealing with execution) as excluding proceedings relating to the enforcement of a foreign arbitral award. It was emphasised that arbitration was a consensual procedure and the principle underlying section 9 was that, if a state had [239] But not where the intervention or step taken is only for the purpose of claiming immunity, or where the step taken by the state is in ignorance of facts entitling it to immunity if those facts could not reasonably have been ascertained and immunity is claimed as soon as reasonably practicable, s. 2(5). See also article 1 of the European Convention on State Immunity, 1972.

[240] This provides that: '1. A state cannot invoke immunity from jurisdiction in a proceeding before a court of another state if it has: (a) itself instituted the proceeding; or (b) intervened in the proceeding or taken any other step relating to the merits. However, if the state satisfies the court that it could not have acquired knowledge of facts on which a claim to immunity can be based until after it took such a step, it can claim immunity based on those facts, provided it does so at the earliest possible moment. 2. A state shall not be considered to have consented to the exercise of jurisdiction by a court of another state if it intervenes in a proceeding or takes any other step for the sole purpose of: (a) invoking immunity; or (b) asserting a right or interest in property at issue in the proceeding. 3. The appearance of a representative of a state before a court of another state as a witness shall not be interpreted as consent by the former state to the exercise of jurisdiction by the court. 4. Failure on the part of a state to enter an appearance in a proceeding before a court of another state shall not be interpreted as consent by the former state to the exercise of jurisdiction by the court'.

[241] See also article 1 of the European Convention on State Immunity, 1972 and article 9 of the UN Convention on Jurisdictional Immunities.

[242] See also article 12 of the European Convention on State Immunity, 1972 and article 17 of the UN Convention on Jurisdictional Immunities.

[243] [2006] EWCA Civ 1529, para. 113. See also Donegal v. Zambia [2007] EWHC 197 (Comm), holding that written submissions to the jurisdiction with regard to a compromise agreement amounted to a waiver of immunity.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

agreed to submit to arbitration, it had thus rendered itself amenable to such process as might be necessary to render the arbitration effective.[244]

The issue of waiver is also a key factor in many US cases. Section 1605(a)(1) of the Foreign Sovereign Immunities Act 1976 provides that a foreign state is not immune where it has waived its immunity either expressly or by implication, notwithstanding any withdrawal of the waiver which the foreign state may purport to effect, except in accordance with the terms of the waiver.[245] The Court of Appeals has held, however, that the implied waiver provision did not extend to conduct constituting a violation of jus cogens.[246]

Pre-judgment attachment[247]

Section 1610(d) of the US Foreign Sovereign Immunities Act 1976 prohibits the attachment of the property of a foreign state before judgment unless that state has explicitly waived its immunity from attachment prior to judgment and the purpose of the attachment is to secure satisfaction of a judgment that has been or may be entered against the foreign state. A variety of cases in the US has arisen over whether general waivers contained in treaty provisions may be interpreted as permitting pre-judgment attachment, in order to prevent the defendant from removing his assets from the jurisdiction. The courts generally require clear evidence of the intention to waive pre-judgment attachment, although that actual phrase need not necessarily be used.[248]

[244] [2006] EWCA Civ 1529, paras. 117 and 123. See also The Akademik Fyodorov 131 ILR, p. 460.

[245] See e.g. Siderman v. Republic of Argentina 965 F.2d 699 (1992); 103 ILR, p. 454. It should also be noted that a substantial number of bilateral treaties expressly waive immunity from jurisdiction. This is particularly the case where the states maintaining the absolute immunity approach are concerned: see e.g. UN, Materials, part III. See also USA v. Friedland (1998) 40 OR (3d) 747; 120 ILR, p. 418.

[246] Smith v. Libya 101 F.3d 239 (1996); 113 ILR, p. 534. See also Hirsch v. State of Israel 962 F.Supp. 377 (1997); 113 ILR, p. 543.

[247] See e.g. J. Crawford, 'Execution of Judgments and Foreign Sovereign Immunity', 75 AJIL, 1981, pp. 820, 867 ff., and Schreuer, State Immunity, p. 162.

[248] See e.g. Behring International Inc. v. Imperial Iranian Air Force 475 F.Supp. 383 (1979); 63 ILR, p. 261; Reading & Bates Corp. v. National Iranian Oil Company 478 F.Supp. 724 (1979); 63 ILR, p. 305; New England Merchants National Bank v. Iran Power Generation and Transmission Company 19 ILM, 1980, p. 1298; 63 ILR, p. 408; Security Pacific National Bank v. Government of Iran 513 F.Supp. 864 (1981); Libra Bank Ltd v. Banco Nacional de Costa Rica 676 F.2d 47 (1982); 72 ILR, p. 119; S & S Machinery Co. v. Masinexportimport 706 F.2d 411 (1981); 107 ILR, p. 239, and O'Connell Machinery v. MV Americana 734 F.2d 115 (1984); 81 ILR, p. 539. See also article 23 of the European Convention on State

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

Under the UK State Immunity Act 1978, no relief may be given against a state by way of injunction or order for specific performance, recovery of land or recovery of any property without the written consent of that state.[249] The question has therefore arisen as to whether a Mareva injunction,[250] ordering that assets remain within the jurisdiction pending the outcome of the case, may be obtained, particularly since this type of injunction is interlocutory and obtained without notice (ex parte). It is suggested that an application for a Mareva injunction may indeed be made without notice since immunity may not apply in the circumstances of the case. In applying for such an injunction, a plaintiff is under a duty to make full and frank disclosure and the standard of proof is that of a 'good and arguable case', explaining, for example, why it is contended that immunity would not be applicable. It is then for the defendant to seek to discharge the injunction by arguing that these criteria have not been met. The issue as to how the court should deal with such a situation was discussed in A Company v. Republic of X.[251] Saville J noted that the issue of immunity had to be finally settled at the outset so that when a state sought to discharge a Mareva injunction on the grounds of immunity, the court could not allow the injunction to continue on the basis that the plaintiff has a good arguable case that immunity does not exist, for if immunity did exist 'then the court simply has no power to continue the injunction'. Accordingly, a delay between the granting of the injunction ex parte and the final determination by the court of the issue was probably unavoidable.[252] The situation is generally the same in other countries.[253]

Immunity prohibiting such action. Article 18 of the UN Convention on Jurisdictional Immunities provides that 'no pre-judgment measures of constraint, such as attachment or arrest, against property of a state may be taken in connection with a proceeding before a court of another state unless and except to the extent that: (a) the state has expressly consented to the taking of such measures as indicated: (i) by international agreement; (ii) by an arbitration agreement or in a written contract; or (iii) by a declaration before the court or by a written communication after a dispute between the parties has arisen; or (b) the state has allocated or earmarked property for the satisfaction of the claim which is the object of that proceeding'.

249 S. 13(2).

250 See Mareva Compania Naviera v. International Bulkcarriers [1975] 2 LL. R 509. See also S. Gee, Mareva Injunctions & Anton Piller Relief, 2nd edn, London, 1990, especially at p. 22.

251 [1990] 2 LL. R 520; 87 ILR, p. 412.

252 [1990] 2 LL. R 525; 87 ILR, p. 417, citing Maclaine Watson v. Department of Trade and Industry [1988] 3 WLR 1033 at 1103–4 and 1157–8.

253 But see the case of Condor and Filvem v. Minister of Justice 101 ILR, p. 394 before the Italian Constitutional Court in 1992.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

Immunity from execution[254]

Immunity from execution is to be distinguished from immunity from jurisdiction, particularly since it involves the question of the actual seizure of assets appertaining to a foreign state. As such it poses a considerable challenge to relations between states and accordingly states have proved unwilling to restrict immunity from enforcement judgment in contradistinction to the situation concerning jurisdictional immunity. Consent to the exercise of jurisdiction does not imply consent to the execution or enforcement of any judgment obtained.[255]

Article 23 of the European Convention on State Immunity, 1972 prohibits any measures of execution or preventive measures against the property of a contracting state in the absence of written consent in any particular case. However, the European Convention provides for a system of mutual enforcement of final judgments rendered in accordance with its provisions[256] and an Additional Protocol provides for proceedings to be taken before the European Tribunal of State Immunity, consisting basically of members of the European Court of Human Rights. Article 19 of the UN Convention on Jurisdictional Immunities provides that no post-judgment measures of constraint, such as attachment, arrest or execution, against property of a state may be taken in connection with a proceeding before a court of another state unless, and except to the extent that, the state has expressly consented to the taking of such measures as indicated by international agreement; an arbitration agreement or in a written contract; or by a declaration before the court or by a written communication after a dispute between the parties has arisen; or where the state has allocated or earmarked property for the satisfaction of the claim which is the object of that proceeding; or where it has been established that the property is specifically in use or intended for use by the state for other than government non-commercial purposes and is in the territory of the state of the forum, provided that post-judgment measures of constraint may only be taken against property

[254] See e.g. Schreuer, State Immunity, chapter 6; Sinclair, 'Sovereign Immunity', chapter 4; Nguyen Quoc Dinh et al., Droit International Public, p. 453; Crawford, 'Execution of Judgments'; A. Reinisch, 'European Court Practice Concerning State Immunity from Enforcement Measures', 17 EJIL, 2006, p. 803; H. Fox, 'Enforcement Jurisdiction, Foreign State Property and Diplomatic Immunity', 34 ICLQ, 1985, p. 115, and various articles in 10 Netherlands YIL, 1979.

[255] See e.g. article 20 of the UN Convention on Jurisdictional Immunities.

[256] Article 20 of the European Convention on State Immunity.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

that has a connection with the entity against which the proceeding was directed.

Section 13(2)b of the UK State Immunity Act provides, for instance, that 'the property of a state shall not be subject to any process for the enforcement of a judgment or arbitration award or, in an action in rem, for its arrest, detention or sale'. Such immunity may be waived by written consent but not by merely submitting to the jurisdiction of the courts,[257] while there is no immunity from execution in respect of property which is for the time being in use or intended for use for commercial purposes.[258] It is particularly to be noted that this latter stipulation is not to apply to a state's central bank or other monetary authority.[259] Thus, a Trendtex type of situation could not arise again in the same form. It was emphasised in AIC Ltd v. Federal Government of Nigeria that this absolute immunity accorded to the property of a foreign state's central bank applied irrespective of the source of the funds in the account or the purpose for which the account was maintained,[260] while in AIG Capital Partners Inc. v. Republic of Kazakhstan, it was noted that the term 'property' in the Act had to be given a broad meaning and included all real and personal property, including any right or interest, whether legal, equitable or contractual. The property in question appertained to the central bank if held in its name, irrespective of the capacity in which the bank held it or the purpose for which it was held.[261]

It is also interesting that the corresponding provision in the US Foreign Sovereign Immunities Act of 1976 is more restrictive with regard to immunity from execution.[262] The principle that existence of immunity from [257] S. 13(3). See also s. 14 of the South African Foreign Sovereign Immunity Act 1981; s. 14 of the Pakistan State Immunity Ordinance 1981; s. 15 of the Singapore State Immunity Act 1979 and s. 31 of the Australian Foreign States Immunities Act 1985.

[258] S. 13(4).

[259] S. 14(4), which provides that, 'Property of a state's central bank or other monetary authority shall not be regarded for the purposes of subsection (4) of section 13 above as in use or intended for use for commercial purposes; and where any such bank or authority is a separate entity subsections (1) to (3) of that section shall apply to it as if references to a state were references to the bank or authority.' See also Fox, State Immunity, p. 393, and W. Blair, 'The Legal Status of Central Bank Investments under English Law' [1998] CLJ, pp. 374, 380–1.

[260] [2003] EWHC 1357, paras. 46 ff.; 129 ILR, p. 571.

[261] [2005] EWHC 2239 (Comm), paras. 33 ff.; 129 ILR, p. 589.

[262] S. 1610. Thus, for example, there would be no immunity with regard to property taken in violation of international law. See also First National City Bank v. Banco Para El Comercio Exterior de Cuba 462 US 611 (1983); 80 ILR, p. 566; Letelier v. Republic of Chile 748 F.2d 790 (1984) and Foxworth v. Permanent Mission of the Republic of Uganda to the United

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

jurisdiction does not automatically entail immunity from execution has been reaffirmed in the case-law on a number of occasions.[263]

In 1977, the West German Federal Constitutional Court in the Philippine Embassy case[264] declared that:

> forced execution of judgment by the state of the forum under a writ of execution against a foreign state which has been issued in respect of non-sovereign acts ... of that state, or property of that state which is present or situated in the territory of the state of the forum, is inadmissible without the consent of the foreign state if ... such property serves sovereign purposes of the foreign state.

In particular it was noted that:

> claims against a general current bank account of the embassy of a foreign state which exists in the state of the forum and the purpose of which is to cover the embassy's costs and expenses are not subject to forced execution by the state of the forum.[265]

This was referred to approvingly by Lord Diplock in Alcom Ltd v. Republic of Colombia,[266] a case which similarly involved the attachment of a bank account of a diplomatic mission. The House of Lords unanimously accepted that the general rule in international law was not overturned in the State Immunity Act. In Alcom, described as involving a question of law of 'outstanding international importance',[267] it was held that such a bank account would not fall within the section 13(4) exception relating to commercial purposes, unless it could be shown by the person seeking to attach the balance that 'the bank account was earmarked by the foreign state solely ... for being drawn on to settle liabilities incurred in Nations 796 F.Supp. 761 (1992); 99 ILR, p. 138. See also G. R. Delaume, 'The Foreign Sovereign Immunities Act and Public Debt Litigation: Some Fifteen Years Later', 88 AJIL, 1994, pp. 257, 266. Note that in 1988, the legislation was amended to include a provision that, with regard to measures of execution following confirmation of an arbitral award, all the commercial property of the award debtor was open to execution: new s. 1610(a)(6), ibid.

263 See e.g. Abbott v. South Africa 113 ILR, p. 411 (Spanish Constitutional Court); Centre for Industrial Development v. Naidu 115 ILR, p. 424 and Flatow v. Islamic Republic of Iran 999 F.Supp. 1 (1998); 121 ILR, p. 618. See also The Akademik Fyodorov, 131 ILR, pp. 460, 485–6.

264 See UN, Materials, p. 297; 65 ILR, pp. 146, 150.

265 UN, Materials, pp. 300–1; 65 ILR, p. 164.

266 [1984] 2 All ER 6; 74 ILR, p. 180, overturning the Court of Appeal Decision, [1984] 1 All ER 1; 74 ILR, p. 170.

267 [1984] 2 All ER 14; 74 ILR, p. 189.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

commercial transactions'.[268] The onus of proof lies upon the applicant. It is also to be noted that under section 13(5) of the Act, a certificate by a head of mission to the effect that property was not in use for commercial purposes was sufficient evidence of that fact, unless the contrary was proven.[269] The question of determining property used for commercial purposes is a significant and complex one that will invariably depend upon an analysis of various factors, as seen in the light of the law of the forum state,[270] for example the present and future use of the funds and their origin.[271]

In Banamar v. Embassy of the Democratic and Popular Republic of Algeria,[272] the Italian Supreme Court reaffirmed the rule that customary international law forbids measures of execution against the property of foreign states located in the territory of the state seeking to exercise jurisdiction and used for sovereign purposes, and held that it lacked jurisdiction to enforce a judgment against a foreign state by ordering execution against bank accounts standing in the name of that state's embassy. This approach appears to have been modified in Condor and Filvem v. Minister of Justice[273] before the Italian Constitutional Court in 1992. The Court held that it could no longer be affirmed that there existed an international customary rule forbidding absolutely coercive measures against the property of foreign states. In order for immunity against execution not to apply, it is necessary not only to demonstrate that the activity or transaction concerned was jure gestionis, but also to show that the property to which the request for execution refers is not destined to accomplish public functions (jure imperii) of the foreign state.[274]

However, the Spanish Constitutional Court in Abbott v. South Africa held that bank accounts held by foreign states used for the purposes of ordinary diplomatic or consular activity were immune from attachment or execution even where the funds were also used for commercial [268] [1984] 2 All ER 13; 74 ILR, p. 187. But cf. Birch Shipping Corporation v. Embassy of the United Republic of Tanzania 507 F.Supp. 311 (1980); 63 ILR, p. 524. But see the decision of the Swiss Federal Tribunal in 1990 in Z v. Geneva Supervisory Authority for the Enforcement of Debts and Bankruptcy, 102 ILR, p. 205, holding that funds allocated for the diplomatic service of a foreign state were immune from attachment.

[269] Such certificate had been issued by the Colombian Ambassador. See below, p. 750, with regard to diplomatic immunities.

[270] See the West German Federal Constitutional Court decision in the National Iranian Oil Co. case, 22 ILM, 1983, p. 1279.

[271] See e.g. Eurodif Corporation v. Islamic Republic of Iran 23 ILM, 1984, p. 1062.

[272] 84 AJIL, 1990, p. 573; 87 ILR, p. 56. See also Libya v. Rossbeton SRL, 87 ILR, p. 63.

[273] 101 ILR, p. 394.

[274] Ibid., pp. 401–2.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

purposes,[275] while the Austrian Supreme Court held in Leasing West GmbH v. Algeria that a general bank account of a foreign embassy allocated partly but not exclusively for diplomatic purposes was immune from enforcement proceedings without the consent of the state concerned. Attachment could only take place if the account could be shown to be used exclusively for private purposes.[276]

The burden and standard of proof

Since section 1 of the State Immunity Act stipulates that a state is immune from the jurisdiction of the courts of the UK except as provided in the following sections, it is clear that the burden of proof lies upon the plaintiff to establish that an exception to immunity applies.[277] However, the court is under a duty to ensure that effect is given to the immunity conferred by the State Immunity Act 1978 and of its own motion if necessary.[278]

As far as the standard of proof is concerned, the Court of Appeal in Maclaine Watson v. Department of Trade and Industry[279] held that whenever a claim of immunity is made, the court must deal with it as a preliminary issue and on the normal test of balance of probabilities.[280] It would be insufficient to apply the 'good arguable case' test usual in Order 11[281] cases with regard to leave to serve.[282] To have decided otherwise would have meant that the state might have lost its claim for immunity upon the more impressionistic 'good arguable case' basis, which in practice is decided upon affidavit evidence only, and would have been precluded from pursuing its claim at a later stage since that could well be construed

[275] 113 ILR, pp. 411, 423–4. [276] 116 ILR, p. 526.

[277] See also Staughton J in Rayner v. Department of Trade and Industry [1987] BCLC 667; Donegal v. Zambia [2007] EWHC 197 (Comm), para. 428, and Fox, State Immunity, p. 177.

[278] Mummery J stated that, 'The overriding duty of the court, of its own motion, is to satisfy itself that effect has been given to the immunity conferred by the State Immunity Act 1978. That duty binds all tribunals and courts, not just the court or tribunal which heard the original proceedings. If the tribunal in the original proceedings has not given effect to the immunity conferred by the Act, then it must be the duty of the appeal tribunal to give effect to it by correcting the error': see United Arab Emirates v. Abdelghafar [1995] ICR 65, 73–4; 104 ILR, pp. 647, 654–5. See also Military Affairs Office of the Embassy of Kuwait v. Caramba-Coker, Appeal No. EAT/1054/02/RN, Employment Appeal Tribunal (2003).

[279] [1988] 3 WLR 1033, 1103 and 1157; 80 ILR, pp. 49, 118, 179.

[280] This would be done procedurally under Order 12, Rule 8 of the Rules of the Supreme Court, 1991. See also A Company v. Republic of X 87 ILR, pp. 412, 417.

[281] Rules of the Supreme Court, 1991.

[282] See e.g. Vitkovice Horni v. Korner [1951] AC 869.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

as submission to the jurisdiction under section 2(3) of the State Immunity Act.

The question of service of process upon a foreign state arose in Westminster City Council v. Government of the Islamic Republic of Iran,[283] where Peter Gibson J held that without prior service upon the Iranian government, the court was unable to deal with the substantive issue before it which concerned the attempt by the Westminster City Council to recover from the Iranian government charges incurred by it in rendering the Iranian embassy safe after it had been stormed in the famous 1980 siege. In the absence of diplomatic relations between the UK and Iran at that time and in the absence of Iranian consent, there appeared to be no way to satisfy the requirement in section 12 of the State Immunity Act that 'any writ or other document required to be served for instituting proceedings against a state shall be served by being transmitted through the Foreign and Commonwealth Office to the Ministry of Foreign Affairs of the state'. The question also arose in Kuwait Airways Corporation v. Iraqi Airways.[284] Since at the relevant time there was no British diplomatic presence in Baghdad, the necessary documents were lodged pursuant to Order 11, Rule 7 at the Central Office, whence they were sent to the Foreign and Commonwealth Office and thence to the Iraqi Embassy in London with a request for transmission to Baghdad. The House of Lords held that since the writ was not forwarded to the Iraqi Ministry of Foreign Affairs in Baghdad, the writ was not served as required under section 12(1) of the 1978 Act.[285]

Conclusion

Although sovereign immunity is in various domestic statutes proclaimed as a general principle, subject to wide-ranging exceptions, it is, of course, itself an exception to the general rule of territorial jurisdiction. The enumeration of non-immunity situations is so long, that the true situation of a rapidly diminishing exception to jurisdiction should be appreciated. In many instances, it has only been with practice that it has become apparent how much more extensive the submission to jurisdiction has become under domestic legislation. In Letelier v. Republic of Chile,[286] for example, section 1605(a)5 providing for foreign state liability for injury, [283] [1986] 3 All ER 284; 108 ILR, p. 557. [284] [1995] 1 WLR 1147; 103 ILR, p. 340.

[285] [1995] 1 WLR 1156 (per Lord Goff). See also AN International Bank Plc v. Zambia 118 ILR, p. 602.

[286] 488 F.Supp. 665 (1980); 63 ILR, p. 378.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

death and loss of property occurring in the US was used to indict the secret service of Chile with regard to the murder of a former Chilean Foreign Minister in Washington. Similarly in Verlinden v. Central Bank of Nigeria,[287] the Supreme Court permitted a Dutch company to sue the Central Bank of Nigeria in the US,[288] although the Tel-Oren[289] case may mark a modification of this approach. The amendment to the Act providing for jurisdiction in cases of state-sponsored terrorism has also been a significant development.[290]

The principle of diplomatic immunity may often be relevant in a sovereign immunity case. This is considered in the next section.

Diplomatic law[291]

Rules regulating the various aspects of diplomatic relations constitute one of the earliest expressions of international law. Whenever in history there [287] 22 ILM, 1983, p. 647; 79 ILR, p. 548.

[288] Nevertheless, it would appear that the Foreign Sovereign Immunities Act of 1976 does require some minimum jurisdictional links: see generally International Shoe Co. v. Washington 326 US 310 (1945) and Perez v. The Bahamas 482 F.Supp. 1208 (1980); 63 ILR, p. 350, cf. State Immunity Act of 1978.

[289] 726 F.2d 774 (1984); 77 ILR, p. 193. See further above, p. 683.

[290] See above, p. 715.

[291] See e.g. E. Denza, Diplomatic Law, 3rd edn, Oxford, 2008; P. Cahier, Le Droit Diplomatique Contemporain, Geneva, 1962; M. Hardy, Modern Diplomatic Law, Manchester, 1968; Do Naslimento e Silva, Diplomacy in International Law, Leiden, 1973; L. S. Frey and M. L. Frey, The History of Diplomatic Immunity, Ohio, 1999; Satow's Guide to Diplomatic Practice (ed. P. Gore-Booth), 5th edn, London, 1979; B. Sen, A Diplomat's Handbook of International Law and Practice, 3rd edn, The Hague, 1988; J. Brown, 'Diplomatic Immunity: State Practice under the Vienna Convention on Diplomatic Relations', 37 ICLQ, 1988, p. 53; Société Français de Droit International, Aspects Récents du Droit des Relations Diplomatiques, Paris, 1989; G. V. McClanahan, Diplomatic Immunity, London, 1989; B. S. Murty, The International Law of Diplomacy, Dordrecht, 1989; L. Dembinski, The Modern Law of Diplomacy, Dordrecht, 1990; J. Salmon, Manuel de Droit Diplomatique, Brussels, 1994, and Salmon, 'Immunités et Actes de la Fonction', AFDI, 1992, p. 313; J. C. Barker, The Abuse of Diplomatic Privileges and Immunities, Aldershot, 1996, and Barker, The Protection of Diplomatic Personnel, Aldershot, 2006; C. E. Wilson, Diplomatic Privileges and Immunities, Tucson, 1967; M. Whiteman, Digest of International Law, Washington, 1970, vol. VII; Third US Restatement of Foreign Relations Law, St Paul, 1987, pp. 455 ff.; House of Commons Foreign Affairs Committee, The Abuse of Diplomatic Immunities and Privileges, 1984 and the UK Government Response to the Report, Cmnd 9497, and Memorandum on Diplomatic Privileges and Immunities in the United Kingdom, UKMIL, 63 BYIL, 1992, p. 688. See also R. Higgins, 'The Abuse of Diplomatic Privileges and Immunities: Recent United Kingdom Experience', 79 AJIL, 1985, p. 641, and Higgins, Problems and Process, Oxford, 1994, p. 86; A. James, 'Diplomatic Relations and Contacts', 62 BYIL, 1991, p. 347; Nguyen Quoc Dinh et al., Droit International Public, p. 739, and Oppenheim's International Law, chapters 10 and 11.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

has been a group of independent states co-existing, special customs have developed on how the ambassadors and other special representatives of other states were to be treated.[292]

Diplomacy as a method of communication between various parties, including negotiations between recognised agents, is an ancient institution and international legal provisions governing its manifestations are the result of centuries of state practice. The special privileges and immunities related to diplomatic personnel of various kinds grew up partly as a consequence of sovereign immunity and the independence and equality of states, and partly as an essential requirement of an international system. States must negotiate and consult with each other and with international organisations and in order to do so need diplomatic staffs. Since these persons represent their states in various ways, they thus benefit from the legal principle of state sovereignty. This is also an issue of practical convenience.

Diplomatic relations have traditionally been conducted through the medium of ambassadors[293] and their staffs, but with the growth of trade and commercial intercourse the office of consul was established and expanded. The development of speedy communications stimulated the creation of special missions designed to be sent to particular areas for specific purposes, often with the head of state or government in charge. To some extent, however, the establishment of telephone, telegraph, telex and fax services has lessened the importance of the traditional diplomatic personnel by strengthening the centralising process. Nevertheless, diplomats and consuls do retain some useful functions in the collection of information and pursuit of friendly relations, as well as providing a permanent presence in foreign states, with all that that implies for commercial and economic activities.[294]

The field of diplomatic immunities is one of the most accepted and uncontroversial of international law topics, as it is in the interest of all states ultimately to preserve an even tenor of diplomatic relations, although not all states act in accordance with this. As the International Court noted in the US Diplomatic and Consular Staff in Tehran case:[295]

[292] See e.g. G. Mattingley, Renaissance Diplomacy, London, 1955, and D. Elgavish, 'Did Diplomatic Immunity Exist in the Ancient Near East?', 2 Journal of the History of International Law, 2000, p. 73. See also Watts, 'Legal Position'.

[293] See, as to the powers of ambassadors, First Fidelity Bank NA v. Government of Antigua and Barbuda Permanent Mission 877 F.2d 189 (1989); 99 ILR, p. 125.

[294] See generally Satow's Guide, chapter 1.

[295] ICJ Reports, 1980, p. 3; 61 ILR, p. 504.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

> the rules of diplomatic law, in short, constitute a self-contained regime, which on the one hand, lays down the receiving state's obligations regarding the facilities, privileges and immunities to be accorded to diplomatic missions and, on the other, foresees their possible abuse by members of the mission and specifies the means at the disposal of the receiving state to counter any such abuse.[296]

The Vienna Convention on Diplomatic Relations, 1961

This treaty, which came into force in 1964,[297] emphasises the functional necessity of diplomatic privileges and immunities for the efficient conduct of international relations[298] as well as pointing to the character of the diplomatic mission as representing its state.[299] It both codified existing laws and established others.[300] Questions not expressly regulated by the Convention continue to be governed by the rules of customary international law.[301] The International Court has recently emphasised that the Convention continues to apply notwithstanding the existence of a state of armed conflict between the states concerned.[302]

There is no right as such under international law to diplomatic relations, and they exist by virtue of mutual consent.[303] If one state does not [296] ICJ Reports, 1980, p. 40; 61 ILR, p. 566. See also, affirming that the rules of diplomatic law constitute a self-contained regime, the decision of the German Federal Constitutional Court of 10 June 1997, Former Syrian Ambassador to the German Democratic Republic 115 ILR, p. 597.

[297] The importance of the Convention was stressed in the Iranian Hostages case, ICJ Reports, 1980, pp. 330–430; 61 ILR, p. 556. Many of its provisions are incorporated into English law by the Diplomatic Privileges Act 1964.

[298] See also 767 Third Avenue Associates v. Permanent Mission of the Republic of Zaire to the United Nations 988 F.2d 295 (1993); 99 ILR, p. 194.

[299] See Yearbook of the ILC, 1958, vol. II, pp. 94–5. The extraterritorial theory of diplomatic law, according to which missions constituted an extension of the territory of the sending state, was of some historic interest but not of practical use, ibid. See also Radwan v. Radwan [1973] Fam. 24; 55 ILR, p. 579 and McKeel v. Islamic Republic of Iran 722 F.2d 582 (1983); 81 ILR, p. 543. Note that in US v. Kostadinov 734 F.2d 906, 908 (1984); 99 ILR, pp. 103, 107, the term 'mission' in the Convention was defined not as the premises occupied by diplomats, but as a group of people sent by one state to another.

[300] See e.g. the Iranian Hostages case, ICJ Reports, 1980, pp. 3, 24; 61 ILR, p. 550.

[301] Preamble to the Convention.

[302] Democratic Republic of the Congo v. Uganda, ICJ Reports, 2005, pp. 168, 274. See also the Iranian Hostages case, ICJ Reports, 1980, pp. 3, 40; and the decisions of the Eritrea–Ethiopia Claims Commission on 19 December 2005, in the Partial Award, Diplomatic Claim, Ethiopia's Claim 8, para. 24 and the Partial Award, Diplomatic Claim, Eritrea's Claim 20, para. 20.

[303] Article 2.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

wish to enter into diplomatic relations, it is not legally compelled so to do. Accordingly, the Convention specifies in article 4 that the sending state must ensure that the consent (or agrément) of the receiving state has been given for the proposed head of its mission, and reasons for any refusal of consent do not have to be given. Similarly, by article 9 the receiving state may at any time declare any member of the diplomatic mission persona non grata without having to explain its decision, and thus obtain the removal of that person.[304] However, the principle of consent as the basis of diplomatic relations may be affected by other rules of international law. For example, the Security Council in resolution 748 (1992), which imposed sanctions upon Libya, decided that 'all states shall: (a) significantly reduce the number and level of the staff at Libyan diplomatic missions and consular posts and restrict or control the movement within their territory of all such staff who remain . . . '.

The main functions of a diplomatic mission are specified in article 3 and revolve around the representation and protection of the interests and nationals of the sending state, as well as the promotion of information and friendly relations. Article 41(1) also emphasises the duty of all persons enjoying privileges and immunities to respect the laws and regulations of the receiving state and the duty not to interfere in the internal affairs of that state.

Article 13 provides that the head of the mission is deemed to have taken up his functions in the receiving state upon presentation of credentials. Heads of mission are divided into three classes by article 14, viz. ambassadors or nuncios accredited to heads of state and other heads of mission of equivalent rank; envoys, ministers and internuncios accredited to heads of state; and chargés d'affaires accredited to ministers of foreign affairs.[305] It is customary for a named individual to be in charge of a diplomatic mission. When, in 1979, Libya designated its embassies as 'People's Bureaux' to be run by revolutionary committees, the UK insisted upon and obtained the nomination of a named person as the head of the mission.[306]

[304] See e.g. the Ethiopian demand that Eritrea reduce its diplomatic staff at the commencement of the armed conflict between the states: see Eritrea–Ethiopia Claims Commission, decision of 19 December 2005, Partial Award, Eritrea's Claim 20, paras. 40 ff.

[305] The rules as to heads of missions are a modern restatement of the rules established in 1815 by the European powers: see Denza, Diplomatic Law, p. 110.

[306] Comment by Sir Antony Acland, Minutes of Evidence Taken Before the Foreign Affairs Committee, Report, p. 20. See also DUSPIL, 1979, pp. 571–3.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

The inviolability of the premises of the mission

In order to facilitate the operations of normal diplomatic activities, article 22 of the Convention specifically declares that the premises of the mission are inviolable and that agents of the receiving state are not to enter them without the consent of the mission. This appears to be an absolute rule[307] and in the Sun Yat Sen incident in 1896, the Court refused to issue a writ of habeas corpus with regard to a Chinese refugee held against his will in the Chinese legation in London.[308] Precisely what the legal position would be in the event of entry without express consent because, for example, of fire-fighting requirements or of danger to persons within that area, is rather uncertain under customary law, but under the Convention any justification pleaded by virtue of implied consent would be regarded as at best highly controversial.[309] The receiving state is under a special duty to protect the mission premises from intrusion or damage or 'impairment of its dignity'.[310] The US Supreme Court, for example, while making specific reference to article 22 of the Vienna Convention, emphasised in Boos v. Barry that, 'The need to protect diplomats is grounded in our Nation's important interest in international relations . . . Diplomatic personnel are essential to conduct the international affairs so crucial to the well-being of this Nation.'[311] It was also noted that protecting foreign diplomats in the US ensures that similar protection would be afforded to US diplomats abroad.[312] The Supreme Court upheld a District of Columbia statute which made it unlawful to congregate within 500 feet of diplomatic premises and refuse to disperse after having been so ordered by the police, and stated that, 'the "prohibited quantum of disturbance" is whether normal [307] See e.g. 767 Third Avenue Associates v. Permanent Mission of the Republic of Zaire to the United Nations 988 F.2d 295 (1993); 99 ILR, p. 194.

[308] A. D. McNair, International Law Opinions, Oxford, 1956, vol. I, p. 85. The issue was resolved by diplomatic means.

[309] The original draft of the article would have permitted such emergency entry, but this was rejected: see Denza, Diplomatic Law, pp. 144 ff. In 1973 an armed search of the Iraqi Embassy in Pakistan took place and considerable quantities of arms were found. As a result the Iraqi ambassador and an attaché were declared personae non grata, ibid., p. 149. As to further examples, see ibid., pp. 149–50. A search by US troops of the residence of the Nicaraguan ambassador in Panama in 1989 was condemned in a draft Security Council resolution by a large majority, but was vetoed by the US, ibid. Nevertheless, Denza concludes that, 'In the last resort, however, it cannot be excluded that entry without the consent of the sending State may be justified in international law by the need to protect human life', ibid., p. 150.

[310] See e.g. the statement of US President Johnson after a series of demonstrations against the US Embassy in Moscow in 1964–5, 4 ILM, 1965, p. 698.

[311] 99 L.Ed.2d 333, 345–6 (1988); 121 ILR, p. 551. [312] Ibid.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

embassy activities have been or are about to be disrupted'.[313] By the same token, the premises of a mission must not be used in a way which is incompatible with the functions of the mission.[314]

In 1979, the US Embassy in Tehran, Iran was taken over by several hundred demonstrators. Archives and documents were seized and fifty diplomatic and consular staff were held hostage. In 1980, the International Court declared that, under the 1961 Convention (and the 1963 Convention on Consular Relations):

> Iran was placed under the most categorical obligations, as a receiving state, to take appropriate steps to ensure the protection of the United States Embassy and Consulates, their staffs, their archives, their means of communication and the free movement of the members of their staffs.[315]

These were also obligations under general international law.[316] The Court in particular stressed the seriousness of Iran's behaviour and the conflict between its conduct and its obligations under 'the whole corpus of the international rules of which diplomatic and consular law is comprised, rules the fundamental character of which the Court must here again strongly affirm'.[317] In Congo v. Uganda, the International Court held that attacks on the Ugandan Embassy in Kinshasa, the capital of Congo, and attacks on persons on the premises by Congolese armed forces constituted a violation of article 22.[318] In addition, the Court emphasised that the Vienna

[313] 99 L.Ed.2d 351. See also Minister for Foreign Affairs and Trade v. Magno 112 ALR 529 (1992–3); 101 ILR, p. 202.

[314] Article 41(3) of the Vienna Convention. Note that in Canada v. Edelson, 131 ILR, p. 279, the Israeli Supreme Court held that a dispute over a lease granted to Canada, as represented by the Canadian Ambassador, raised issues of state immunity rather than diplomatic immunity. It was further held that there was no state immunity with regard to the lease of buildings for a residence for the Ambassador as leasing was a private law act.

[315] The Iranian Hostages case, ICJ Reports, 1980, pp. 3, 30–1; 61 ILR, p. 556. This the Iranians failed to do, ICJ Reports, 1980, pp. 31–2. The Court emphasised that such obligations concerning the inviolability of the members of a diplomatic mission and of the premises, property and archives of the mission continued even in cases of armed conflict or breach of diplomatic relations, ibid., p. 40. See also DUSPIL, 1979, pp. 577 ff.; K. Gryzbowski, 'The Regime of Diplomacy and the Tehran Hostages', 30 ICLQ, 1981, p. 42, and L. Gross, 'The Case Concerning United States Diplomatic and Consular Staff in Tehran: Phase of Provisional Measures', 74 AJIL, 1980, p. 395.

[316] See e.g. Belgium v. Nicod and Another 82 ILR, p. 124.

[317] The Iranian Hostages case, ICJ Reports, 1980, p. 42; 61 ILR, p. 568. The Court particularly instanced articles 22, 25, 26 and 27 and analogous provisions in the 1963 Consular Relations Convention, ibid.

[318] ICJ Reports, 2005, paras. 337–8 and 340.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

Convention not only prohibits any infringements of the inviolability of the mission by the receiving state itself but also puts the receiving state under an obligation to prevent others, such as armed militia groups, from doing so.[319]

On 8 May 1999, during the Kosovo campaign, the Chinese Embassy in Belgrade was bombed by the US. The US declared that it had been a mistake and apologised. In December 1999, the US and China signed an Agreement providing for compensation to be paid by the former to the latter of $28m. At the same time, China agreed to pay $2.87m to the US to settle claims arising out of rioting and attacks on the US Embassy in Beijing, the residence of the US consulate in Chengdu and the consulate in Guangzhu.[320]

On 17 April 1984, a peaceful demonstration took place outside the Libyan Embassy in London. Shots from the Embassy were fired that resulted in the death of a policewoman. After a siege, the Libyans inside left and the building was searched in the presence of a Saudi Arabian diplomat. Weapons and other relevant forensic evidence were found.[321] The issue raised here, in the light of article 45(a) which provides that after a break in diplomatic relations, 'the receiving state must . . . respect and protect the premises of the mission', is whether that search was permissible. The UK view is that article 45(a) does not mean that the premises continue to be inviolable[322] and this would clearly appear to be correct. There is a distinction between inviolability under article 22 and respect and protection under article 45(a).

The suggestion has also been raised that the right of self-defence may also be applicable in this context. It was used to justify the search of personnel leaving the Libyan Embassy[323] and the possibility was noted [319] Ibid., para. 342, citing the Iranian Hostages case, ICJ Reports, 1980, pp. 30–2. See also the condemnation by the Eritrea–Ethiopia Claims Commission of the entry, ransacking and seizure by Ethiopian security agents of the Eritrean Embassy residence, as well as vehicles and other property, without Eritrea's consent, Partial Award, Diplomatic Claim, Eritrea's Claim 20, para. 46.

[320] See DUSPIL, 2000, pp. 421–8. In addition, the US had earlier made a number of ex gratia payments to the individuals injured and to the families of those killed in the Embassy bombing, ibid., p. 428. See also Denza, Diplomatic Law, p. 166.

[321] See Foreign Affairs Committee, Report, p. xxvi.

[322] Memorandum by the Foreign and Commonwealth Office, Foreign Affairs Committee, Report, p. 5.

[323] Ibid., p. 9. Such a search was declared essential for the protection of the police, ibid. Note the reference to self-defence is both to domestic and international law, ibid.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

that in certain limited circumstances it may be used to justify entry into an embassy.[324]

A rather different issue arises where mission premises have been abandoned. The UK enacted the Diplomatic and Consular Premises Act in 1987, under which states wishing to use land as diplomatic or consular premises are required to obtain the consent of the Secretary of State. Once such consent has been obtained (although this is not necessary in the case of land which had this status prior to the coming into force of the Act), it could be subsequently withdrawn. The Secretary of State has the power to require that the title to such land be vested in him where that land has been lying empty, or without diplomatic occupants, and could cause damage to pedestrians or neighbouring buildings because of neglect, providing that he is satisfied that to do so is permissible under international law (section 2). By section 3 of the Act, the Secretary of State is able to sell the premises, deduct certain expenses and transfer the residue to the person divested of his interest.

This situation occurred with respect to the Cambodian Embassy in London, whose personnel closed the building after the Pol Pot takeover of Cambodia in 1975, handing the keys over to the Foreign Office.[325] In 1979, the UK withdrew its recognition of the Cambodian government after the Vietnamese invasion and since that date had had no dealings with any authority as the government of that country. Squatters moved in shortly thereafter. These premises were made subject to section 2 of the Diplomatic and Consular Premises Act in 1988[326] and the Secretary of State vested the land in himself. This was challenged by the squatters and in R v. Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs, ex parte Samuel,[327] Henry J held that the Secretary of State had acted correctly and in accordance with the duty imposed under article 45 of the Vienna Convention. The Court of Appeal dismissed an appeal,[328] holding that the [324] See the comments of the Legal Adviser to the FCO, Minutes of Evidence, Foreign Affairs Committee, Report, p. 28. Of course, entry can be made into the building with the consent of the receiving state, as for example when Iran requested the UK to eject militants who had taken over their London embassy in 1980.

[325] See C. Warbrick, 'Current Developments', 38 ICLQ, 1989, p. 965.

[326] See s. 2 of the Diplomatic and Consular Premises (Cambodia) Order, SI 1988 no. 30.

[327] The Times, 10 September 1988.

[328] The Times, 17 August 1989; 83 ILR, p. 232. Note that in Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs v. Tomlin, The Times, 4 December 1990; [1990] 1 All ER 920, the Court of Appeal held that in this situation, the extended limitation period of thirty years under s. 15(1) of and Schedule 1 to the Limitation Act 1980 was applicable and the squatters could not rely on twelve years' adverse possession.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

relevant section merely required that the Secretary of State be satisfied that international law permitted such action.[329]

In Westminster City Council v. Government of the Islamic Republic of Iran,[330] the issue concerned the payment of expenses arising out of repairs to the damaged and abandoned Iranian Embassy in London in 1980. The council sought to register a land charge, but the question of the immunity of the premises under article 22 of the Vienna Convention was raised. Although the Court felt that procedurally it was unable to proceed,[331] reference was made to the substantive issue and it was noted that the premises had ceased to be diplomatic premises in the circumstances and thus the premises were not 'used' for the purpose of the mission as required by article 22, since that phrase connoted the present tense. The inviolability of diplomatic premises, however, must not be confused with extraterritoriality. Such premises do not constitute part of the territory of the sending state.[332]

Whether a right of diplomatic asylum exists within general international law is doubtful and in principle refugees are to be returned to the authorities of the receiving state in the absence of treaty or customary rules to the contrary. The International Court in the Asylum case between Colombia and Peru[333] emphasised that a decision to grant asylum involves a derogation from the sovereignty of the receiving state 'and constitutes an intervention in matters which are exclusively within the competence of that state. Such a derogation from territorial sovereignty cannot be recognised unless its legal basis is established in each particular case.' Where treaties exist regarding the grant of asylum, the question will arise as to the respective competences of the sending and receiving state or the state granting asylum and the territorial state. While the diplomats of the sending state may provisionally determine whether a refugee meets any condition laid down for the grant of asylum under an applicable treaty this would not bind the receiving state, for 'the principles of international law do not recognise any rule of unilateral and definitive qualification by [329] Note that in the US, embassies temporarily abandoned due to broken relations may be sequestered and turned to other uses pending resumption of relations. This has been the case with regard to Iranian, Cambodian and Vietnamese properties that have been in the custody of the Office of Foreign Missions: see McClanahan, Diplomatic Immunity, pp. 53 and 110. See also the US Foreign Missions Act 1982.

[330] [1986] 3 All ER 284; 108 ILR, p. 557. [331] See above, p. 748.

[332] See e.g. Persinger v. Islamic Republic of Iran 729 F.2d 835 (1984). See also Swiss Federal Prosecutor v. Kruszyk 102 ILR, p. 176.

[333] ICJ Reports, 1950, pp. 266, 274–5.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

the state granting asylum'.[334] It may be that in law a right of asylum will arise for 'urgent and compelling reasons of humanity',[335] but the nature and scope of this is unclear.

The diplomatic bag

Article 27 provides that the receiving state shall permit and protect free communication on behalf of the mission for all official purposes. Such official communication is inviolable and may include the use of diplomatic couriers and messages in code and in cipher, although the consent of the receiving state is required for a wireless transmitter.[336]

Article 27(3) and (4) deals with the diplomatic bag,[337] and provides that it shall not be opened or detained[338] and that the packages constituting the diplomatic bag 'must bear visible external marks of their character and may contain only diplomatic documents or articles intended for official use'.[339] The need for a balance in this area is manifest. On the one hand, missions require a confidential means of communication, while on the other the need to guard against abuse is clear. Article 27, however, lays the emphasis upon the former.[340] This is provided that article 27(4) is complied with. In the Dikko incident on 5 July 1984, a former Nigerian minister was kidnapped in London and placed in a crate to be flown to Nigeria. The crate was opened at Stansted Airport, although accompanied by a person claiming diplomatic status. The crate[341] did not contain an official seal and was thus clearly not a diplomatic bag.[342] When, in March

[334] Ibid., p. 274. [335] Oppenheim's International Law, p. 1084.

[336] There was a division of opinion at the Vienna Conference between the developed and developing states over this issue. The former felt that the right to instal and use a wireless did not require consent: see Denza, Diplomatic Law, pp. 214 ff.

[337] Defined in article 3(2) of the Draft Articles on the Diplomatic Courier and the Diplomatic Bag adopted by the International Law Commission in 1989 as 'the packages containing official correspondence, and documents or articles intended exclusively for official use, whether accompanied by diplomatic courier or not, which are used for the official communication referred to in article 1 and which bear visible external marks of their character' as a diplomatic bag: see Yearbook of the ILC, 1989, vol. II, part 2, p. 15.

[338] Article 27(3). [339] Article 27(4).

[340] This marked a shift from earlier practice: see Yearbook of the ILC, 1989, vol. II, part 2, p. 15.

[341] An accompanying crate contained persons allegedly part of the kidnapping operation.

[342] See Foreign Affairs Committee, Report, pp. xxxiii–xxxiv. Note also the incident in 1964 when an Israeli was found bound and drugged in a crate marked 'diplomatic mail' at Rome Airport. As a result, the Italians declared one Egyptian official at the Embassy persona non grata and expelled two others, Keesing's Contemporary Archives, p. 20580. In 1980, a crate bound for the Moroccan Embassy in London split open at Harwich to reveal $500,000 worth of drugs, The Times, 13 June 1980. In July 1984, a lorry belonging to the

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

2000, diplomatic baggage destined for the British High Commission in Harare was detained and opened by the Zimbabwe authorities, the UK government protested vigorously and announced the withdrawal of its High Commissioner for consultations.[343]

In view of suspicions of abuse, the question has arisen as to whether electronic screening, not involving opening or detention, of the diplomatic bag is legitimate. The UK appears to take the view that electronic screening of this kind would be permissible, although it claims not to have carried out such activities, but other states do not accept this.[344] It is to be noted that after the Libyan Embassy siege in April 1984, the diplomatic bags leaving the building were not searched.[345] However, Libya had entered a reservation to the Vienna Convention, reserving its right to open a diplomatic bag in the presence of an official representative of the diplomatic mission concerned. In the absence of permission by the authorities of the sending state, the diplomatic bag was to be returned to its place of origin. Kuwait and Saudi Arabia made similar reservations which were not objected to.[346] This is to be contrasted with a Bahraini reservation to article 27(3) which would have permitted the opening of diplomatic bags in certain circumstances.[347] The Libyan reservation could have been relied upon by the UK in these conditions.

It is also interesting to note that after the Dikko incident, the UK Foreign Minister stated that the crates concerned were opened because of the suspicion of human contents. Whether the crates constituted diplomatic bags or not was a relevant consideration with regard to a right to search, but:

> the advice given and the advice which would have been given had the crate constituted a diplomatic bag took fully into account the overriding duty to preserve and protect human life.[348]

USSR was opened for inspection by West German authorities on the grounds that a lorry itself could not be a bag. The crates inside the lorry were accepted as diplomatic bags and not opened, Foreign Affairs Committee, Report, p. xiii, note 48.

343 See UKMIL, 71 BYIL, 2000, pp. 586–7.

344 See the Legal Adviser, FCO, Foreign Affairs Committee, Report, p. 23. See also 985 HC Deb., col. 1219, 2 June 1980, and Cmnd 9497. See further Yearbook of the ILC, 1988, vol. II, part 1, p. 157, and Denza, Diplomatic Law, pp. 238 ff.

345 Foreign Affairs Committee, Report, p. xxx.

346 See Denza, Diplomatic Law, pp. 229 ff. The UK did not object and regarded the reservations in fact as reflective of customary law prior to the Convention, Memorandum of the FCO, Foreign Affairs Committee, Report, p. 4.

347 This was objected to, Foreign Affairs Committee, Report, p. 4, and see Denza, Diplomatic Law, pp. 230–1.

348 See Foreign Affairs Committee, Report, p. 50.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

This appears to point to an implied exception to article 27(3) in the interests of humanity. It is to be welcomed, provided, of course, it is applied solely and strictly in these terms.

The issue of the diplomatic bag has been considered by the International Law Commission, in the context of article 27 and analogous provisions in the 1963 Consular Relations Convention, the 1969 Convention on Special Missions and the 1975 Convention on the Representation of States in their Relations with International Organisations. Article 28 of the Draft Articles on the Diplomatic Courier and the Diplomatic Bag, as finally adopted by the International Law Commission in 1989, provides that the diplomatic bag shall be inviolable wherever it may be. It is not to be opened or detained and 'shall be exempt from examination directly or through electronic or other technical device'. However, in the case of the consular bag, it is noted that if the competent authorities of the receiving or transit state have serious reason to believe that the bag contains something other than official correspondence and documents or articles intended exclusively for official use, they may request that the bag be opened in their presence by an authorised representative of the sending state. If this request is refused by the authorities of the sending state, the bag is to be returned to its place of origin.[349] It was thought that this preserved existing law. Certainly, in so far as the consular bag is concerned, the provisions of article 35(3) of the Vienna Convention on Consular Relations are reproduced, but the stipulation of exemption from electronic or other technical examination does not appear in the Vienna Convention on Diplomatic Relations and the view of the Commission that this is mere clarification[350] is controversial.[351]

As far as the diplomatic courier is concerned, that is, a person accompanying a diplomatic bag, the Draft Articles provide for a regime of privileges, immunities and inviolability that is akin to that governing diplomats. He is to enjoy personal inviolability and is not liable to any form of arrest or detention (draft article 10), his temporary accommodation is inviolable (draft article 17), and he will benefit from immunity from the criminal and civil jurisdiction of the receiving or transit state in [349] Draft article 28(2). See Yearbook of the ILC, 1989, vol. II, part 2, pp. 42–3. See also S. McCaffrey, 'The Forty-First Session of the International Law Commission', 83 AJIL, 1989, p. 937.

[350] Yearbook of the ILC, 1989, vol. II, part 2, p. 43.

[351] See e.g. Yearbook of the ILC, 1980, vol. II, pp. 231 ff.; ibid., 1981, vol. II, pp. 151 ff. and ibid., 1985, vol. II, part 2, pp. 30 ff. See also A/38/10 (1983) and the Memorandum by Sir Ian Sinclair, member of the ILC, dealing with the 1984 session on this issue, Foreign Affairs Committee, Report, pp. 79 ff.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

respect of all acts performed in the exercise of his functions (draft article 18). In general, his privileges and immunities last from the moment he enters the territory of the receiving or transit state until he leaves such state (draft article 21).[352]

Diplomatic immunities – property

Under article 22 of the Vienna Convention, the premises of the mission are inviolable[353] and, together with their furnishings and other property thereon and the means of transport, are immune from search, requisition, attachment or execution. By article 23, a general exception from taxation in respect of the mission premises is posited. The Court in the Philippine Embassy case explained that, in the light of customary and treaty law, 'property used by the sending state for the performance of its diplomatic functions in any event enjoys immunity even if it does not fall within the material or spatial scope' of article 22.[354] It should also be noted that the House of Lords in Alcom Ltd v. Republic of Colombia[355] held that under the State Immunity Act 1978 a current account at a commercial bank in the name of a diplomatic mission would be immune unless the plaintiff could show that it had been earmarked by the foreign state solely for the settlement of liabilities incurred in commercial transactions. An account used to meet the day-to-day running expenses of a diplomatic mission would therefore be immune. This approach was also based upon the obligation contained in article 25 of the Vienna Convention on Diplomatic Relations, which provided that the receiving state 'shall accord full facilities for the performance of the functions of the mission'. The House of Lords noted that the negative formulation of this principle meant that neither the executive nor the legal branch of government in the receiving state must act in such manner as to obstruct the mission in carrying out its functions.[356]

Section 16(1)b of the State Immunity Act provides, however, that the exemption from immunity in article 6 relating to proceedings involving immovable property in the UK did not extend to proceedings concerning 'a state's title to or its possession of property used for the purposes of a [352] See e.g. McClanahan, Diplomatic Immunity, p. 64, and Yearbook of the ILC, 1985, vol. II, part 2, pp. 36 ff.

[353] By article 30(1) of the Convention, the private residence of a diplomatic agent shall enjoy the same inviolability and protection as the premises of the mission.

[354] See UN, Materials, pp. 297, 317; 65 ILR, pp. 146, 187.

[355] [1984] 2 All ER 6; 74 ILR, p. 180.

[356] [1984] 2 All ER 9; 74 ILR, p. 182. See also Denza, Diplomatic Law, pp. 156–9 and 202.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

diplomatic mission'. It was held in Intpro Properties (UK) Ltd v. Sauvel[357] by the Court of Appeal that the private residence of a diplomatic agent, even where used for embassy social functions from time to time, did not constitute use for the purposes of a diplomatic mission and that in any event the proceedings did not concern the French government's title to or possession of the premises, but were merely for damages for breach of a covenant in a lease. Accordingly, there was no immunity under section 16.

It is to be noted that by article 24 of the Vienna Convention, the archives and documents of the mission are inviolable at any time and wherever they may be.[358] Although 'archives and documents' are not defined in the Convention, article 1(1)k of the Vienna Convention on Consular Relations provides that the term 'consular archives' includes 'all the papers, documents, correspondence, books, films, tapes and registers of the consular post together with the ciphers and codes, the card-indexes and any article of furniture intended for their protection or safekeeping'. The term as used in the Diplomatic Relations Convention cannot be less than this.[359]

The question of the scope of article 24 was discussed by the House of Lords in Shearson Lehman v. Maclaine Watson (No. 2),[360] which concerned the intervention by the International Tin Council in a case on the grounds that certain documents it was proposed to adduce in evidence were inadmissible. This argument was made in the context of article 7 of the International Tin Council (Immunities and Privileges) Order 1972 which stipulates that the ITC should have the 'like inviolability of official archives as . . . is accorded in respect of the official archives of a diplomatic mission'. Lord Bridge interpreted the phrase 'archives and documents of the mission' in article 24 as referring to the archives and documents 'belonging to or held by the mission'.[361] Such protection was not confined to executive or judicial action by the host state, but would cover, for example, the situation where documents were put into circulation by virtue of theft or other improper means.[362]

[357] [1983] 2 All ER 495; 64 ILR, p. 384.

[358] This goes beyond previous customary law: see e.g. Rose v. R [1947] 3 DLR 618. See also Renchard v. Humphreys & Harding Inc. 381 F.Supp. 382 (1974); the Iranian Hostages case, ICJ Reports, 1980, pp. 3, 36, and Denza, Diplomatic Law, pp. 189 ff.

[359] See e.g. Denza, Diplomatic Law, p. 195.

[360] [1988] 1 WLR 16; 77 ILR, p. 145.

[361] [1988] 1 WLR 24; 77 ILR, p. 150.

[362] [1988] 1 WLR 27; 77 ILR, p. 154. See also Fayed v. Al-Tajir [1987] 2 All ER 396; 86 ILR, p. 131.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

Diplomatic immunities – personal

The person of a diplomatic agent[363] is inviolable under article 29 of the Vienna Convention and he may not be detained or arrested.[364] This principle is the most fundamental rule of diplomatic law and is the oldest established rule of diplomatic law.[365] In resolution 53/97 of January 1999, for example, the UN General Assembly strongly condemned acts of violence against diplomatic and consular missions and representatives,[366] while the Security Council issued a presidential statement, condemning the murder of nine Iranian diplomats in Afghanistan.[367] States recognise that the protection of diplomats is a mutual interest founded on functional requirements and reciprocity.[368] The receiving state is under an obligation to 'take all appropriate steps' to prevent any attack on the person, freedom or dignity of diplomatic agents.[369]

After a period of kidnappings of diplomats, the UN Convention on the Prevention and Punishment of Crimes against Internationally Protected Persons, Including Diplomatic Agents was adopted in 1973. This provides that states parties must make attacks upon such persons a crime in internal law with appropriate penalties and take such measures as may be necessary to establish jurisdiction over these crimes. States parties are obliged [363] Defined in article 1(e) as the head of the mission or a member of the diplomatic staff of the mission. See above, p. 735, with regard to head of state immunities. See also e.g. US v. Noriega 746 F.Supp. 1506, 1523–5; 99 ILR, pp. 145, 165–7.

[364] Note that by article 26 the receiving state is to ensure to all members of the mission freedom of movement and travel in its territory, subject to laws and regulations concerning prohibited zones or zones regulated for reasons of national security.

[365] See Denza, Diplomatic Law, pp. 256 ff.

[366] See also resolution 42/154 and Secretary-General's Reports A/INF/52/6 and Add.1 and A/53/276 and Corr.1.

[367] SC/6573 (15 September 1998). See also the statement of the UN Secretary-General, SG/SM/6704 (14 September 1998).

[368] See e.g. the US Supreme Court in Boos v. Barry 99 L Ed 2d 333, 346 (1988); 121 ILR, pp. 499, 556.

[369] Note that in Harb v. King Fahd [2005] EWCA Civ 632, para. 40, the Court of Appeal held that article 29 was not breached by the court hearing an issue relating to sovereign immunity in open court where the sovereign in question wished a challenge to an application for maintenance to be held in private. In Mariam Aziz v. Aziz and Sultan of Brunei [2007] EWCA Civ 712, paras. 88 ff., it was held by the Court of Appeal that while under international law a state is obliged to take steps to prevent physical attacks on, or physical interference with, a foreign head of state in the jurisdiction, it was doubted whether the rule extended to preventing conduct by individuals which was simply offensive or insulting to a foreign head of state abroad.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

to extradite or prosecute offenders.[370] The most blatant example of the breach of the obligation to protect diplomats was the holding of the US diplomats as hostages in Iran in 1979–80, where the International Court held that the inaction of the Iranian government faced with the detention of US diplomatic and consular staff over an extended period constituted a 'clear and serious violation' of article 29.[371] In Congo v. Uganda, the International Court held that the maltreatment by Congo forces of persons within the Ugandan Embassy constituted a violation of article 29 in so far as such persons were diplomats, while the maltreatment of Ugandan diplomats at the airport similarly breached the obligations laid down in article 29.[372]

However, in exceptional cases, a diplomat may be arrested or detained on the basis of self-defence or in the interests of protecting human life.[373]

Article 30(1) provides for the inviolability of the private residence[374] of a diplomatic agent, while article 30(2) provides that his papers, correspondence and property[375] are inviolable. Section 4 of the Diplomatic Privileges Act 1964 stipulates that where a question arises as to whether a person is or is not entitled to any privilege or immunity under the Act, which incorporates many of the provisions of the Vienna Convention, a certificate issued by or under the authority of the Secretary of State stating any fact relating to that question shall be conclusive evidence of that fact.

[370] See articles 2, 3, 6 and 7. Such crimes are by article 8 deemed to be extraditable offences in any extradition treaty between states parties. See Duff v. R [1979] 28 ALR 663; 73 ILR, p. 678.

[371] ICJ Reports, 1980, pp. 3, 32, 35–7; 61 ILR, p. 530.

[372] ICJ Reports, 2005, paras. 338–40. See also the decision of the Eritrea–Ethiopia Claims Commission on 19 December 2005 in Partial Award, Diplomatic Claim, Ethiopia's Claim 8, that Eritrea was liable for violating article 29 by arresting and briefly detaining the Ethiopian Chargé d'Affaires in September 1998 and October 1999 without regard to his diplomatic immunity.

[373] ICJ Reports, 1980, p. 40. See also Denza, Diplomatic Law, p. 267.

[374] As distinct from the premises of the mission. Such residence might be private leased or leased by the sending state for use as such residential premises and may indeed be temporary only. Temporary absence would not lead to a loss of immunity, but permanent absence would: see e.g. Agbor v. Metropolitan Police Commissioner [1969] 2 All ER 707 and Denza, Diplomatic Law, pp. 270 ff. S. 9 of the Criminal Law Act 1977 makes it a criminal offence knowingly to trespass on any premises which are the private residence of a diplomatic agent.

[375] Except that this is limited by article 31(3): see below, p. 767. Possession alone of property would be sufficient, it appears, to attract inviolability: see Denza, Diplomatic Law, p. 277.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

As far as criminal jurisdiction is concerned, diplomatic agents enjoy complete immunity from the legal system of the receiving state,[376] although there is no immunity from the jurisdiction of the sending state.[377] This provision noted in article 31(1) reflects the accepted position under customary law. The only remedy the host state has in the face of offences alleged to have been committed by a diplomat is to declare him persona non grata under article 9.[378] Specific problems have arisen with regard to motoring offences.[379]

Article 31(1) also specifies that diplomats[380] are immune from the civil and administrative jurisdiction of the state in which they are serving, except in three cases:[381] first, where the action relates to private immovable property situated within the host state (unless held for mission purposes);[382] secondly, in litigation relating to succession matters in which [376] See e.g. Dickinson v. Del Solar [1930] 1 KB 376; 5 AD, p. 299; the Iranian Hostages case, ICJ Reports, 1980, pp. 3, 37; 61 ILR, p. 530 and Skeen v. Federative Republic of Brazil 566 F.Supp. 1414 (1983); 121 ILR, p. 481. See also Denza, Diplomatic Law, pp. 280 ff.

[377] Article 31(4).

[378] See e.g. the incident in Washington DC in 1999, when an attaché of the Russian Embassy was declared persona non grata for suspected 'bugging' of the State Department, 94 AJIL, 2000, p. 534.

[379] However, the US has tackled the problem of unpaid parking fines by adopting s. 574 of the Foreign Operations, Export Financing and Related Programs Appropriations Act 1994, under which 110 per cent of unpaid parking fines and penalties must be withheld from that state's foreign aid. In addition, the State Department announced in December 1993 that registration renewal of vehicles with unpaid or unadjudicated parking tickets more than one year old would be withheld, thus rendering the use of such vehicles illegal in the US: see 'Contemporary Practice of the United States Relating to International Law', 88 AJIL, 1994, p. 312. It is also required under the US Diplomatic Relations Act 1978 that diplomatic missions, their members and families hold liability insurance and civil suits against insurers are permitted. Note that the UK has stated that persistent failure by diplomats to respect parking regulations and to pay fixed penalty parking notices 'will call into question their continued acceptability as members of diplomatic missions in London', UKMIL, 63 BYIL, 1992, p. 700. See also Denza, Diplomatic Law, pp. 288–9 and UKMIL, 77 BYIL, 2006, pp. 741 ff.

[380] Note that a diplomat who is a national or permanent resident of the receiving state will only enjoy immunity from jurisdiction and inviolability in respect of official acts performed in the exercise of his functions, article 38.

[381] Article 31(1)a, b and c. Note that there is no immunity from the jurisdiction of the sending state, article 31(4).

[382] See Intpro Properties (UK) Ltd v. Sauvel [1983] 2 All ER 495; 64 ILR, p. 384. In the Deputy Registrar case, 94 ILR, pp. 308, 311, it was held that article 31(1)a was declaratory of customary international law. In Hildebrand v. Champagne 82 ILR, p. 121, it was held that this provision did not cover the situation where a claim was made for payment for charges under a lease. See also Largueche v. Tancredi Feni 101 ILR, p. 377 and De Andrade v. De Andrade 118 ILR, pp. 299, 306–7. Article 13 of the UN Convention on Jurisdictional

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

the diplomat is involved as a private person (for example as an executor or heir); and, finally, with respect to unofficial professional or commercial activity engaged in by the agent.[383] In a document issued by the Foreign Office in 1987, entitled Memorandum on Diplomatic Privileges and Immunities in the United Kingdom,[384] it was noted that a serious view was taken of any reliance on diplomatic immunity from civil jurisdiction to evade a legal obligation and that such conduct could call into question the continued acceptability in the UK of a particular diplomat.[385] By article 31(2), a diplomat cannot be obliged to give evidence as a witness, while by article 31(3), no measures of execution may be taken against such a person except in the cases referred to in article 31(1)a, b and c and provided that the measures concerned can be taken without infringing the inviolability of his person or of his residence. Diplomatic agents are generally exempt from the social security provisions in force in the receiving state,[386] from all dues and taxes, personal or real, regional or municipal except for indirect taxes,[387] from personal and public services[388] and from customs duties and inspection.[389] The personal baggage of a diplomat is exempt from inspection unless there are serious grounds for presuming that it contains articles not covered by the specified exemptions in article 36(1). Inspections can only take place in the presence of the diplomat or his authorised representative.[390]

Article 37 provides that the members of the family of a diplomatic agent forming part of his household[391] shall enjoy the privileges and immunities specified in articles 29 to 36 if not nationals of the receiving state.[392] In UK practice, members of the family include spouses and minor children

Immunities provides for an exception to state immunity for proceedings which relate to the determination of any right or interest of the state in, or its possession or use of, or any obligation of the state arising out of its interest in, or its possession or use of, immovable property situation in the forum state.

383 See Portugal v. Goncalves 82 ILR, p. 115. This exception does not include ordinary contracts incidental to life in the receiving state, such as a contract for domestic services: see Tabion v. Mufti 73 F.3d 535 and Denza, Diplomatic Law, pp. 301 ff. See also De Andrade v. De Andrade 118 ILR, pp. 299, 306–7, noting that the purchase by a diplomat of the home unit as an investment was not a commercial activity within the meaning of the provision.

384 See UKMIL, 58 BYIL, 1987, p. 549.

385 Annex F, reproducing a memorandum dated February 1985, ibid., p. 558. See Annex F of the 1992 Memorandum, UKMIL, 63 BYIL, 1992, p. 698.

386 Article 33. 387 Article 34 and see subsections b to g for certain other exceptions.

388 Article 35. 389 Article 36(1). 390 Article 36(2).

391 See Brown, 'Diplomatic Immunity', pp. 63–6 and Denza, Diplomatic Law, pp. 391 ff.

392 The rationale behind this is to ensure the diplomat's independence and ability to function free from harassment: see Denza, Diplomatic Law, pp. 393–4.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

(i.e. under the age of eighteen); children over eighteen not in permanent paid employment (such as students); persons fulfilling the social duties of hostess to the diplomatic agent; and the parent of a diplomat living with him and not engaged in paid permanent employment.[393]

Members of the administrative and technical staff (and their households), if not nationals or permanent residents of the receiving state, may similarly benefit from articles 29–35,[394] except that the article 31(1) immunities do not extend beyond acts performed in the course of their duties, while members of the service staff, who are not nationals or permanent residents of the receiving state, benefit from immunity regarding acts performed in the course of official duties.[395]

Immunities and privileges start from the moment the person enters the territory of the receiving state on proceeding to take up his post or, if already in the territory, from the moment of official notification under article 39.[396] In R v. Governor of Pentonville Prison, ex parte Teja,[397] Lord Parker noted that it was fundamental to the claiming of diplomatic immunity that the diplomatic agent 'should have been in some form accepted or received by this country'.[398] This view was carefully interpreted by the Court of Appeal in R v. Secretary of State for the Home Department, ex parte Bagga[399] in the light of the facts of the former case so that, as Parker LJ held, if a person already in the country is employed as a secretary, for example, at an embassy, nothing more than notification is required before that person would be entitled to immunities. While it had been held in [393] Ibid., pp. 394–5. Since the Civil Partnership Act 2004, household would include same sex partners. See, for the slightly different US practice, ibid., pp. 395–6. The term 'spouse' may be interpreted to include more than one wife in a polygamous marriage forming part of the household of the diplomat and may include a partner not being married to the diplomat, ibid., pp. 394–6.

[394] The privileges specified in article 36(1) in relation to exemption from customs duties and taxes apply only to articles imported at the time of first installation.

[395] Customary law prior to the Vienna Convention was most unclear on immunities of such junior diplomatic personnel and it was recognised that these provisions in article 37 constituted a development in such rules: see e.g. Denza, Diplomatic Law, pp. 401 ff. and Yearbook of the ILC, 1958, vol. II, pp. 101–2. See also S v. India 82 ILR, p. 13.

[396] See also article 10, which provides that the Ministry of Foreign Affairs of the receiving state shall be notified of the appointment of members of the mission, their arrival and their final departure or the termination of their functions with the mission. There are similar requirements with regard to family members and private servants. See also Lutgarda Jimenez v. Commissioners of Inland Revenue [2004] UK SPC 00419 (23 June 2004), and Denza, Diplomatic Law, pp. 88 ff.

[397] [1971] 2 QB 274; 52 ILR, p. 368.

[398] [1971] 2 QB 282; 52 ILR, p. 373.

[399] [1991] 1 QB 485; 88 ILR, p. 404.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

R v. Lambeth Justices, ex parte Yusufu[400] that article 39, in the words of Watkins LJ, provided 'at most some temporary immunity between entry and notification to a person who is without a diplomat', the court in Bagga disagreed strongly.[401] Immunity clearly did not depend upon notification and acceptance,[402] but under article 39 commenced upon entry. Article 40 provides for immunity where the person is in the territory in transit between his home state and a third state to which he has been posted.[403] Where, however, a diplomat is in a state which is neither the receiving state nor a state of transit between his state and the receiving state, there will be no immunity.[404] Immunities and privileges normally cease when the person leaves the country or on expiry of a reasonable period in which to do so.[405] However, by article 39(2) there would be continuing immunity with regard to those acts that were performed in the exercise of his functions as a member of the mission. It follows from this formulation that immunity would not continue for a person leaving the receiving state for any act which was performed outside the exercise of his functions as a member of a diplomatic mission even though he was immune from prosecution at the time. This was the view taken by the US Department of State with regard to an incident where the ambassador of Papua New Guinea was responsible for a serious automobile accident involving damage to five cars and injuries to two persons.[406] The ambassador was withdrawn from the US and assurances sought by Papua New Guinea that any criminal investigation of the incident or indictment of the former ambassador under US domestic law would be quashed were rejected. The US refused to accept the view that international law precluded the prosecution of the former diplomat for non-official acts committed during his period of accreditation.[407] In Propend Finance v. Sing, the Court took a broad view

[400] [1985] Crim. LR 510; 88 ILR, p. 323.

[401] [1991] 1 QB 485, 498; 88 ILR, pp. 404, 412.

[402] [1991] 1 QB 499; 88 ILR, p. 413, 'save possibly in the case of a head of mission or other person of diplomatic rank', ibid. See also Lutgarda Jimenez v. Commissioners of Inland Revenue [2004] UK SPC 00419 (23 June 2004), and Denza, Diplomatic Law, p. 431.

[403] See Brown, 'Diplomatic Immunity', p. 59, and Bergman v. de Sieyès 170 F.2d 360 (1948). See also R v. Governor of Pentonville Prison, ex parte Teja [1971] 2 QB 274; 52 ILR, p. 368. Note that such immunity only applies to members of his family if they were accompanying him or travelling separately to join him or return to their country, Vafadar 82 ILR, p. 97.

[404] See e.g. Public Prosecutor v. JBC 94 ILR, p. 339.

[405] Article 39, and see Shaw v. Shaw [1979] 3 All ER 1; 78 ILR, p. 483.

[406] See 81 AJIL, 1987, p. 937.

[407] See the Tabatabai case, 80 ILR, p. 388; US v. Guinand 688 F.Supp. 774 (1988); 99 ILR, p. 117; Empson v. Smith [1965] 2 All ER 881; 41 ILR, p. 407 and Shaw v. Shaw [1979] 3

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

of diplomatic functions, including within this term police liaison functions so that immunity continued under article 39(2).[408]

In the Former Syrian Ambassador to the GDR case, the German Federal Constitutional Court held that article 39(2) covered the situation where the ambassador in question was accused of complicity in murder by allowing explosives to be transferred from his embassy to a terrorist group. He was held to have acted in the exercise of his official functions. It was argued that diplomatic immunity from criminal proceedings knew of no exception for particularly serious crimes, the only resort being to declare him persona non grata.[409] The Court, in perhaps a controversial statement, noted that article 39(2), while binding on the receiving state, was not binding on third states.[410] Accordingly the continuing immunity of the former ambassador to the German Democratic Republic under article 39(2) was not binding upon the Federal Republic of Germany.

Although a state under section 4 of the State Immunity Act of 1978 is subject to the local jurisdiction with respect to contracts of employment made or wholly or partly to be performed in the UK, section 16(1)a provides that this is not to apply to proceedings concerning the employment of the members of a mission within the meaning of the Vienna Convention[411] and this was reaffirmed in Sengupta v. Republic of India,[412] a case concerning a clerk employed at the Indian High Commission in London.[413]

All ER 1; 78 ILR, p. 483. See also Y. Dinstein, 'Diplomatic Immunity from Jurisdiction Ratione Materiae', 15 ICLQ, 1966, p. 76.

408 111 ILR, pp. 611, 659–61. See also Re P (No. 2) [1998] 1 FLR 1027; 114 ILR, p. 485.

409 121 ILR, pp. 595, 607–8.

410 Ibid., pp. 610–12. See B. Fassbender, 'S v. Berlin Court of Appeal and District Court of Berlin-Tiergarten', 92 AJIL, 1998, pp. 74, 78.

411 Or to members of a consular post within the meaning of the 1963 Consular Relations Convention enacted by the Consular Relations Act of 1968.

412 64 ILR, p. 352. See further above, p. 725.

413 Diplomatic agents are also granted exemptions from certain taxes and customs duties. However, this does not apply to indirect taxes normally incorporated in the price paid; taxes on private immovable property in the receiving state unless held on behalf of the sending state for purposes of the mission; various estate, succession or inheritance duties; taxes on private income having its source in the receiving state; charges for specific services, and various registration, court and record fees with regard to immovable property other than mission premises: see article 34 of the Vienna Convention. See also UK Memorandum, p. 693.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

Waiver of immunity

By article 32 of the 1961 Vienna Convention, the sending state may waive the immunity from jurisdiction of diplomatic agents and others possessing immunity under the Convention.[414] Such waiver must be express.[415] Where a person with immunity initiates proceedings, he cannot claim immunity in respect of any counter-claim directly connected with the principal claim.[416] Waiver of immunity from jurisdiction in respect of civil or administrative proceedings is not to be taken to imply waiver from immunity in respect of the execution of the judgment, for which a separate waiver is necessary.

In general, waiver of immunity has been unusual, especially in criminal cases.[417] In a memorandum entitled Department of State Guidance for Law Enforcement Officers With Regard to Personal Rights and Immunities of Foreign Diplomatic and Consular Personnel[418] the point is made that waiver of immunity does not 'belong' to the individual concerned, but is for the benefit of the sending state. While waiver of immunity in the face of criminal charges is not common, 'it is routinely sought and occasionally granted'. However, Zambia speedily waived the immunity of an official at its London embassy suspected of drugs offences in 1985.[419]

In Fayed v. Al-Tajir,[420] the Court of Appeal referred to an apparent waiver of immunity by an ambassador made in pleadings by way of defence. Kerr LJ correctly noted that both under international and English law, immunity was the right of the sending state and that therefore 'only the sovereign can waive the immunity of its diplomatic representatives. They cannot do so themselves.'[421] It was also pointed out that the defendant's defence filed in the proceedings brought against him was not an appropriate vehicle for waiver of immunity by a state.[422] In A Company v. Republic of X,[423] Saville J noted that whether or not there was a

[414] See Denza, Diplomatic Law, pp. 330 ff.

[415] See e.g. Public Prosecutor v. Orhan Olmez 87 ILR, p. 212.

[416] See e.g. High Commissioner for India v. Ghosh [1960] 1 QB 134; 28 ILR, p. 150.

[417] See McClanahan, Diplomatic Immunity, p. 137, citing in addition an incident where the husband of an official of the US Embassy in London was suspected of gross indecency with a minor, where immunity was not waived, but the person concerned was returned to the US. But see Denza, Diplomatic Law, pp. 345 ff., noting the examples of waivers of immunity.

[418] Reproduced in 27 ILM, 1988, pp. 1617, 1633.

[419] McClanahan, Diplomatic Immunity, pp. 156–7.

[420] [1987] 2 All ER 396.

[421] Ibid., p. 411.

[422] Ibid., pp. 408 (Mustill LJ) and 411–12 (Kerr LJ).

[423] [1990] 2 LL. R 520, 524; 87 ILR, pp. 412, 416, citing Kahan v. Pakistan Federation [1951] 2 KB 1003; 18 ILR, p. 210.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

power to waive article 22 immunities (and he was unconvinced that there existed such a power), no mere inter partes agreement could bind the state to such a waiver, but only an undertaking or consent given to the Court itself at the time when the Court is asked to exercise jurisdiction over or in respect of the subject matter of the immunities. In view of the principle that immunities adhere to the state and not the individual concerned, such waiver must be express and performed clearly by the state as such.

Consular privileges and immunities: the Vienna Convention on Consular Relations, 1963[424]

Consuls represent their state in many administrative ways, for instance, by issuing visas and passports and generally promoting the commercial interests of their state. They have a particular role in assisting nationals in distress with regard to, for example, finding lawyers, visiting prisons and contacting local authorities, but they are unable to intervene in the judicial process or internal affairs of the receiving state or give legal advice or investigate a crime.[425] They are based not only in the capitals of receiving states, but also in the more important provincial cities. However, their political functions are few and they are accordingly not permitted the same degree of immunity from jurisdiction as diplomatic agents.[426] Consuls must possess a commission from the sending state and the authorisation (exequatur) of a receiving state.[427] They are entitled to the same exemption from taxes and customs duties as diplomats.

Article 31 emphasises that consular premises are inviolable and may not be entered by the authorities of the receiving state without consent. Like diplomatic premises, they must be protected against intrusion or [424] See e.g. L. T. Lee, Consular Law and Practice, 2nd edn, Durham, 1991, and Lee, Vienna Convention on Consular Relations, Durham, 1966; M. A. Ahmad, L'Institution Consulaire et le Droit International, Paris, 1973, and Satow's Guide, book III. See also Nguyen Quoc Dinh et al., Droit International Public, p. 757; Oppenheim's International Law, pp. 1142 ff., and Third US Restatement of Foreign Relations Law, pp. 474 ff. The International Court in the Iranian Hostages case stated that this Convention codified the law on consular relations, ICJ Reports, 1980, pp. 3, 24; 61 ILR, pp. 504, 550. See also the Consular Relations Act 1968.

[425] See e.g. the UK Foreign Office leaflet entitled 'British Consular Services Abroad' quoted in UKMIL, 70 BYIL, 1999, p. 530, and see also Ex parte Ferhut Butt 116 ILR, pp. 607, 618.

[426] See further above, p. 725, with regard to employment and sovereign immunity disputes, a number of which concerned consular activities.

[427] Articles 10, 11 and 12.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

impairment of dignity,[428] and similar immunities exist with regard to archives and documents[429] and exemptions from taxes.[430] Article 35 provides for freedom of communication, emphasising the inviolability of the official correspondence of the consular post and establishing that the consular bag should be neither opened nor detained. However, in contrast to the situation with regard to the diplomatic bag,[431] where the authorities of the receiving state have serious reason to believe that the bag contains other than official correspondence, documents or articles, they may request that the bag be opened and, if this is refused, the bag shall be returned to its place of origin.

Article 36(1) constitutes a critical provision and, as the International Court emphasised in the LaGrand (Germany v. USA) case, it 'establishes an interrelated regime designed to facilitate the implementation of the system of consular protection'.[432] Article 36(1)a provides that consular officers shall be free to communicate with nationals of the sending state and to have access to them, while nationals shall have the same freedom of communication with and access to consular officers. In particular, article 36(1)b provides that if the national so requests, the authorities of the receiving state shall without delay inform the consular post of the sending state of any arrest or detention. The authorities in question shall inform the national of the sending state without delay of his or her rights. Similarly, any communication from the detained national to the consular post must be forwarded without delay. The International Court held that article 36(1) created individual rights for the persons concerned which could be invoked by the state, which, by virtue of the Optional Protocol on Compulsory Settlement of Disputes attached to the Convention, may be brought before the Court.[433] The International Court has subsequently underlined that violations of individual rights under this provision may also violate the rights of the state itself, while such violations could also constitute violations of the individual.[434]

The Court held that the US had breached its obligations under article 36(1)[435] by not informing the LaGrand brothers of their rights under [428] But note Security Council resolution 1193 (1998) condemning the Taliban authorities in Afghanistan for the capture of the Iranian consulate-general. See also R (B) v. Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs [2004] EWCA Civ 1344; 131 ILR, p. 616.

[429] Article 33. [430] Article 32. [431] See above, p. 759.

[432] ICJ Reports, 2001, pp. 466, 492; 134 ILR, pp. 1, 31. See also the Avena (Mexico v. USA) case, ICJ Reports, 2004, pp. 12, 39; 134 ILR, pp. 120, 142.

[433] ICJ Reports, 2001, p. 494; 134 ILR, p. 33.

[434] The Avena (Mexico v. USA) case, ICJ Reports, 2004, pp. 12, 36; 134 ILR, pp. 120, 139.

[435] ICJ Reports, 2001, p. 514; 134 ILR, p. 52. In an Advisory Opinion of 1 October 1999, the Inter-American Court of Human Rights concluded that the duty to notify detained

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

that provision 'without delay'.[436] The International Court reaffirmed its approach in the Avena case, brought by Mexico against the US on substantially similar grounds to the LaGrand case.[437]

Article 41 provides that consular officers may not be arrested or detained except in the case of a grave crime and following a decision by the competent judicial authority. If, however, criminal proceedings are instituted against a consul, he must appear before the competent authorities. The proceedings are to be conducted in a manner that respects his official position and minimises the inconvenience to the exercise of consular functions. Under article 43 their immunity from jurisdiction is restricted in both criminal and civil matters to acts done in the official exercise of consular functions.[438] In Koeppel and Koeppel v. Federal Republic of Nigeria,[439] for example, it was held that the provision of refuge by the Nigerian Consul-General to a Nigerian national was an act performed in the exercise of a consular function within the meaning of article 43 and thus attracted consular immunity.

The Convention on Special Missions, 1969[440]

In many cases, states will send out special or ad hoc missions to particular countries to deal with some defined issue in addition to relying upon the permanent staffs of the diplomatic and consular missions. In such circumstances, these missions, whether purely technical or politically foreign nationals of the right to seek consular assistance under article 36(1) constituted part of the corpus of human rights, Series A 16, OC-16/99, 1999 and 94 AJIL, 2000, p. 555. See above, chapter 7, p. 389. Note that the International Court in the LaGrand case felt it unnecessary to deal with this argument, ICJ Reports, 2001, pp. 466, 494–5. As to the right of access to nationals, see also the Yugoslav incident of summer 2000, where the UK protested at the absence of information with regard to the arrest by Yugoslavia of British citizens seconded to the UN Mission in Kosovo: see UKMIL, 71 BYIL, 2000, p. 608.

436 The Court has noted that the obligation on the detaining authorities to provide the necessary information under article 36(1)b arises once it is realised that the detainee is a foreign national or when there are grounds to think that the person is probably a foreign national, the Avena case, ICJ Reports, 2004, pp. 12, 43 and 49; 134 ILR, pp. 120, 146 and 153.

437 ICJ Reports, 2004, p. 12. See as to the obligations of the US in the two cases as found by the International Court, below, chapter 19, p. 1103. See also as to the response of the US courts to these cases, above, chapter 4, pp. 135 and 164, note 178.

438 See e.g. Princess Zizianoff v. Kahn and Bigelow 4 AD, p. 384. See generally, as to consular functions, DUSPIL, 1979, pp. 655 ff. Note that waiver of consular immunities under article 45, in addition to being express, must also be in writing.

439 704 F.Supp. 521 (1989); 99 ILR, p. 121.

440 See e.g. Hardy, Modern Diplomatic Law, p. 89, and Oppenheim's International Law, pp. 1125 ff. The Convention came into force in June 1985.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

important, may rely on certain immunities which are basically derived from the Vienna Conventions by analogy with appropriate modifications. By article 8, the sending state must let the host state know of the size and composition of the mission, while according to article 17 the mission must be sited in a place agreed by the states concerned or in the Foreign Ministry of the receiving state.

By article 31 members of special missions have no immunity with respect to claims arising from an accident caused by a vehicle, used outside the official functions of the person involved, and by article 27 only such freedom of movement and travel as is necessary for the performance of the functions of the special mission is permitted.

The question of special missions was discussed in the Tabatabai case before a series of German courts.[441] The Federal Supreme Court noted that the Convention had not yet come into force and that there were conflicting views as to the extent to which it reflected existing customary law. However, it was clear that there was a customary rule of international law which provided that an ad hoc envoy, charged with a special political mission by the sending state, may be granted immunity by individual agreement with the host state for that mission and its associated status and that therefore such envoys could be placed on a par with members of the permanent missions of states.[442] The concept of immunity protected not the diplomat as a person, but rather the mission to be carried out by that person on behalf of the sending state. The question thus turned on whether there had been a sufficiently specific special mission agreed upon by the states concerned, which the Court found in the circumstances.[443] In US v. Sissoko, the District Court held that the Convention on Special Missions, to which the US was not a party, did not constitute customary international law and was thus not binding upon the Court.[444]

The Vienna Convention on the Representation of States in their Relations with International Organisations of a Universal Character, 1975 [445]

This treaty applies with respect to the representation of states in any international organisation of a universal character, irrespective of whether [441] See 80 ILR, p. 388. See also Böckslaff and Koch, 'The Tabatabai Case: The Immunity of Special Envoys and the Limits of Judicial Review', 25 German YIL, 1982, p. 539.

[442] 80 ILR, pp. 388, 419. [443] Ibid., p. 420.

[444] 999 F.Supp. 1469 (1997); 121 ILR, p. 600. See also Re Bo Xilai 76 BYIL, 2005, p. 601.

[445] See e.g. J. G. Fennessy, 'The 1975 Vienna Convention on the Representation of States in their Relations with International Organisations of a Universal Character', 70 AJIL, 1976, p. 62.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

or not there are diplomatic relations between the sending and the host states.

There are many similarities between this Convention and the 1961 Vienna Convention. By article 30, for example, diplomatic staff enjoy complete immunity from criminal jurisdiction, and immunity from civil and administrative jurisdiction in all cases, save for the same exceptions noted in article 31 of the 1961 Convention. Administrative, technical and service staff are in the same position as under the latter treaty (article 36).

The mission premises are inviolable and exempt from taxation by the host state, while its archives, documents and correspondence are equally inviolable.

The Convention has received an unenthusiastic welcome, primarily because of the high level of immunities it provides for on the basis of a controversial analogy with diplomatic agents of missions.[446] The range of immunities contrasts with the general situation under existing conventions such as the Convention on the Privileges and Immunities of the United Nations, 1946.[447]

The immunities of international organisations

As far as customary rules are concerned, the position is far from clear and it is usually dealt with by means of a treaty, providing such immunities to the international institution sited on the territory of the host state as are regarded as functionally necessary for the fulfilment of its objectives.

Probably the most important example is the General Convention on the Privileges and Immunities of the United Nations of 1946, which sets out the immunities of the United Nations and its personnel and emphasises the inviolability of its premises, archives and documents.[448]

[446] It should be noted that among those states abstaining in the vote adopting the Convention were France, the US, Switzerland, Austria, Canada and the UK, all states that host the headquarters of important international organisations: see Fennessy, '1975 Vienna Convention', p. 62.

[447] See in particular article IV. See also, for a similar approach in the Convention on the Privileges and Immunities of the Specialised Agencies, 1947, article V.

[448] See further below, chapter 23, p. 1318. See, as to the privileges and immunities of foreign armed forces, including the NATO Status of Forces Agreement, 1951, which provides for a system of concurrent jurisdiction, S. Lazareff, Status of Military Forces under Current International Law, Leiden, 1971; Brownlie, Principles, pp. 362 ff., and J. Woodliffe, The Peacetime Use of Foreign Military Installations under Modern International Law, Dordrecht, 1992.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

Suggestions for further reading

E. Denza, Diplomatic Law, 3rd edn, Oxford, 2008

A. Dickinson, R. Lindsay and J. P. Loonam, State Immunity: Selected Materials and Commentary, Oxford, 2004

H. Fox, The Law of State Immunity, Oxford, 2002

C. H. Schreuer, State Immunity: Some Recent Developments, Cambridge, 1988

I. Sinclair, 'The Law of Sovereign Immunity: Recent Developments', 167 HR, 1980, p. 113

A. Watts, 'The Legal Position in International Law of Heads of State, Heads of Governments and Foreign Ministers', 247 HR, 1994 III, p. 13

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

14

State responsibility

State responsibility is a fundamental principle of international law, arising out of the nature of the international legal system and the doctrines of state sovereignty and equality of states. It provides that whenever one state commits an internationally unlawful act against another state, international responsibility is established between the two. A breach of an international obligation gives rise to a requirement for reparation.[1]

Accordingly, the focus is upon principles concerned with second-order issues, in other words the procedural and other consequences flowing from a breach of a substantive rule of international law.[2] This has led to a number of issues concerning the relationship between the rules of [1] See generally J. Crawford, The International Law Commission's Articles on State Responsibility, Cambridge, 2002; Obligations Multilatérales, Droit Impératif et Responsabilité Internationale des États (ed. P. M. Dupuy), Paris, 2003; Issues of State Responsibility before International Judicial Institutions (eds. M. Fitzmaurice and D. Sarooshi), Oxford, 2003; M. Forteau, Droit de la Sécurité Collective et Droit de la Responsabilité Internationale de l'État, Paris, 2006; N. H. B. Jørgensen, The Responsibility of States for International Crimes, Oxford, 2003; International Responsibility Today: Essays in Memory of Oscar Schachter (ed. M. Ragazzi), The Hague, 2005; S. Villalpando, L'Émergence de la Communauté Internationale dans la Responsabilité des États, Paris, 2005; C. Eagleton, The Responsibility of States in International Law, New York, 1928; International Law of State Responsibility for Injuries to Aliens (ed. R. B. Lillich), Charlottesville, 1983; R. B. Lillich, 'Duties of States Regarding the Civil Rights of Aliens', 161 HR, 1978, p. 329, and Lillich, The Human Rights of Aliens in Contemporary International Law, Charlottesville, 1984; I. Brownlie, System of the Law of Nations: State Responsibility, Part I, Oxford, 1983; Bin Cheng, General Principles of Law as Applied by International Courts and Tribunals, London, 1953; United Nations Codification of State Responsibility (eds. M. Spinedi and B. Simma), New York, 1987; Société Français de Droit International, La Responsabilité dans le Système International, Paris, 1991; B. Stern, 'La Responsabilité Internationale Aujourd'hui . . . Demain . . . ' in Mélanges Apollis, Paris, 1992; Nguyen Quoc Dinh, P. Daillier and A. Pellet, Droit International Public, 7th edn, Paris, 2002, p. 729, and Oppenheim's International Law (eds. R. Y. Jennings and A. D. Watts), 9th edn, London, 1992, chapter 4. See also the Secretary-General's Compilation of Decisions of International Courts, Tribunals and Other Bodies, A/62/62, 1 February 2007, as supplemented by A/62/62/Add.1, 17 April 2007.

[2] See Yearbook of the ILC, 1973, vol. II, pp. 169–70. The issue of state responsibility for injuries caused by lawful activities will be noted in chapter 15.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

state responsibility and those relating to other areas of international law. The question as to the relationship between the rules of state responsibility and those relating to the law of treaties arose, for example, in the Rainbow Warrior Arbitration between France and New Zealand in 1990.[3] The arbitration followed the incident in 1985 in which French agents destroyed the vessel Rainbow Warrior in harbour in New Zealand. The UN Secretary-General was asked to mediate and his ruling in 1986[4] provided inter alia for French payment to New Zealand and for the transference of two French agents to a French base in the Pacific, where they were to stay for three years and not to leave without the mutual consent of both states.[5] However, both the agents were repatriated to France before the expiry of the three years for various reasons, without the consent of New Zealand. The 1986 Agreement contained an arbitration clause and this was invoked by New Zealand. The argument put forward by New Zealand centred upon the breach of a treaty obligation by France, whereas that state argued that only the law of state responsibility was relevant and that concepts of force majeure and distress exonerated it from liability.

The arbitral tribunal decided that the law relating to treaties was relevant, but that the legal consequences of a breach of a treaty, including the determination of the circumstances that may exclude wrongfulness (and render the breach only apparent) and the appropriate remedies for breach, are subjects that belong to the customary law of state responsibility.[6]

It was noted that international law did not distinguish between contractual and tortious responsibility, so that any violation by a state of any obligation of whatever origin gives rise to state responsibility and consequently to the duty of reparation.[7] In the Gabčíkovo–Nagymaros Project case, the International Court reaffirmed the point that

> A determination of whether a convention is or is not in force, and whether it has or has not been properly suspended or denounced, is to be made pursuant to the law of treaties. On the other hand, an evaluation of the extent to which the suspension or denunciation of a convention, seen as incompatible with the law of treaties, involves the responsibility of the state which proceeded to it, is to be made under the law of state responsibility.[8]

The Arbitration Commission on Yugoslavia also addressed the issue of the relationship between state responsibility and other branches of [3] 82 ILR, p. 499. [4] See 81 AJIL, 1987, p. 325 and 74 ILR, p. 256.

[5] See also the Agreement between France and New Zealand of 9 July 1986, 74 ILR, p. 274.
[6] 82 ILR, pp. 499, 551. [7] Ibid. See further below, p. 801.
[8] ICJ Reports, 1997, pp. 7, 38; 116 ILR, p. 1.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

international law in Opinion No. 13, when asked a question as to whether any amounts due in respect of war damage might affect the distribution of assets and debts in the succession process affecting the successor states of the Former Yugoslavia. The Commission, in producing a negative answer, emphasised that the question of war damage was one that fell within the sphere of state responsibility, while the rules relating to state succession fell into a separate area of international law. Accordingly, the two issues had to be separately decided.[9]

Matters regarding the responsibility of states are necessarily serious and it is well established that a party asserting a fact must prove it.[10] The Eritrea–Ethiopia Claims Commission has taken the position that 'clear and convincing evidence' would be required in order to support findings as to state responsibility,[11] while the International Court has held that claims against a state involving 'charges of exceptional gravity' must be proved by evidence that is 'fully conclusive'.[12]

In addition to the wide range of state practice in this area, the International Law Commission worked extensively on this topic. In 1975 it took a decision for the draft articles on state responsibility to be divided into three parts: part I to deal with the origin of international responsibility, part II to deal with the content, forms and degrees of international responsibility and part III to deal with the settlement of disputes and the implementation of international responsibility.[13] Part I was provisionally adopted by the Commission in 1980[14] and the Draft Articles were finally adopted on 9 August 2001.[15] General Assembly resolution 56/83 of

[9] 96 ILR, pp. 726, 728.

[10] See e.g. Genocide Convention (Bosnia v. Serbia) case, ICJ Reports, 2007, para. 204.

[11] See e.g. Partial Award, Prisoners of War, Eritrea's Claim 17, 1 July 2003, paras. 46 and 49, and Partial Award, Civilian Claims, Ethiopia's Claim 5, 17 December 2004, para. 35.

[12] Genocide Convention (Bosnia v. Serbia) case, ICJ Reports, 2007, para. 209. See as to evidence and the International Court, below, chapter 19, p. 1088.

[13] Yearbook of the ILC, 1975, vol. II, pp. 55–9. See also P. Allott, 'State Responsibility and the Unmaking of International Law', 29 Harvard International Law Journal, 1988, p. 1; S. Rosenne, The ILC's Draft Articles on State Responsibility, Dordrecht, 1991; 'Symposium: The ILC's State Responsibility Articles', 96 AJIL, 2002, p. 773; 'Symposium: Assessing the Work of the International Law Commission on State Responsibility', 13 EJIL, 2002, p. 1053, and P. M. Dupuy, 'Quarante Ans de Codification de Droit de la Responsabilité Internationale des États: Un Bilan', 107 RGDIP, 2003, p. 305.

[14] Yearbook of the ILC, 1980, vol. II, part 2, pp. 30 ff.

[15] ILC Commentary 2001, A/56/10, 2001. This Report contains the Commentary of the ILC to the Articles, which will be discussed in the chapter. The Commentary may also be found in Crawford, Articles. Note that the ILC Articles do not address issues of either the responsibility of international organisations or the responsibility of individuals: see articles 57 and 58.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

12 December 2001 annexed the text of the articles and commended them to governments, an unusual procedure which must be seen as giving particular weight to the status of the articles.[16]

The nature of state responsibility

The essential characteristics of responsibility hinge upon certain basic factors: first, the existence of an international legal obligation in force as between two particular states; secondly, that there has occurred an act or omission which violates that obligation and which is imputable to the state responsible, and finally, that loss or damage has resulted from the unlawful act or omission.[17]

These requirements have been made clear in a number of leading cases. In the Spanish Zone of Morocco claims,[18] Judge Huber emphasised that:

> responsibility is the necessary corollary of a right. All rights of an international character involve international responsibility. Responsibility results in the duty to make reparation if the obligation in question is not met.[19] and in the Chorzów Factory case,[20] the Permanent Court of International Justice said that:

> it is a principle of international law, and even a greater conception of law, that any breach of an engagement involves an obligation to make reparation.

Article 1 of the International Law Commission's Articles on State Responsibility reiterates the general rule, widely supported by practice,[21] that every internationally wrongful act of a state entails responsibility.

[16] See also General Assembly resolution 59/35. Assembly resolution 62/61 of 8 January 2008 further commended the Articles on State Responsibility to states and decided to examine the question of a convention on the topic. See also S. Rosenne, 'State Responsibility: Festina Lente', 75 BYIL, 2004, p. 363, and J. Crawford and S. Olleson, 'The Continuing Debate on a UN Convention on State Responsibility', 54 ICLQ, 2005, p. 959.

[17] See e.g. H. Mosler, The International Society as a Legal Community, Dordrecht, 1980, p. 157, and E. Jiménez de Aréchaga, 'International Responsibility' in Manual of Public International Law (ed. M. Sørensen), London, 1968, pp. 531, 534.

[18] 2 RIAA, p. 615 (1923); 2 AD, p. 157.

[19] 2 RIAA, p. 641.

[20] PCIJ, Series A, No. 17, 1928, p. 29; 4 AD, p. 258. See also the Corfu Channel case, ICJ Reports, pp. 4, 23; 16 AD, p. 155; the Spanish Zone of Morocco case, 2 RIAA, pp. 615, 641 and the Mayagna (Sumo) Indigenous Community of Awas Tingni v. Nicaragua, Inter-American Court of Human Rights, Judgment of 31 August 2001 (Ser. C) No. 79, para. 163.

[21] See e.g. ILC Commentary 2001, p. 63.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

Article 2 provides that there is an internationally wrongful act of a state when conduct consisting of an action or omission is attributable to the state under international law and constitutes a breach of an international obligation of the state.[22] This principle has been affirmed in the case-law.[23] It is international law that determines what constitutes an internationally unlawful act, irrespective of any provisions of municipal law.[24] Article 12 stipulates that there is a breach of an international obligation[25] when an act of that state is not in conformity with what is required of it by that obligation, regardless of its origin or character.[26] A breach that is of a continuing nature extends over the entire period during which the act continues and remains not in conformity with the international obligation in question,[27] while a breach that consists of a composite act will also extend over the entire period during which the act or omission continues and remains not in conformity with the international obligation.[28] A state assisting another state[29] to commit an internationally wrongful act will also be responsible if it so acted with knowledge of the circumstances and where it would be wrongful if committed by that state.[30] State responsibility may co-exist with individual responsibility. The two are not mutually exclusive.[31]

[22] See Yearbook of the ILC, 1976, vol. II, pp. 75 ff. and ILC Commentary 2001, p. 68.

[23] See e.g. Chorzów Factory case, PCIJ, Series A, No. 9, p. 21 and the Rainbow Warrior case, 82 ILR, p. 499.

[24] Article 3. See generally Yearbook of the ILC, 1979, vol. II, pp. 90 ff.; ibid., 1980, vol. II, pp. 14 ff. and ILC Commentary 2001, p. 74. See also Noble Ventures v. Romania, ICSID award of 12 October 2005, para. 53 and above, chapter 4, pp. 133 ff.

[25] By which the state is bound at the time the act occurs, Article 13 and ILC Commentary 2001, p. 133. This principle reflects the general principle of intertemporal law: see e.g. the Island of Palmas case, 2 RIAA, pp. 829, 845 and above, chapter 9, p. 508.

[26] See the Gabčíkovo–Nagymaros (Hungary v. Slovakia) Project case, ICJ Reports, 1997, pp. 7, 38; 116 ILR, p. 1 and ILC Commentary 2001, p. 124.

[27] See article 14. See also e.g. the Rainbow Warrior case, 82 ILR, p. 499; the Gabčíkovo–Nagymaros (Hungary v. Slovakia) Project case, ICJ Reports, 1997, pp. 7, 54; Genocide Convention (Bosnia v. Serbia) case, ICJ Reports, 2007, para. 431; Loizidou v. Turkey, Merits, European Court of Human Rights, Judgment of 18 December 1996, paras. 41–7 and 63–4; 108 ILR, p. 443 and Cyprus v. Turkey, European Court of Human Rights, Judgment of 10 May 2001, paras. 136, 150, 158, 175, 189 and 269; 120 ILR, p. 10.

[28] Article 15.

[29] Or directing or controlling it, see article 17; or coercing it, see article 18.

[30] Article 16. See also the Genocide Convention (Bosnia v. Serbia) case, ICJ Reports, 2007, para. 420.

[31] See article 58. See also the Genocide Convention (Bosnia v. Serbia) case, ICJ Reports, 2007, para. 173, and A. Nollkaemper, 'Concurrence between Individual Responsibility and State Responsibility in International Law', 52 ICLQ, 2003, p. 615.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

The question of fault [32]

There are contending theories as to whether responsibility of the state for unlawful acts or omissions is strict or whether it is necessary to show some fault or intention on the part of the officials concerned. The principle of objective responsibility (the so-called 'risk' theory) maintains that the liability of the state is strict. Once an unlawful act has taken place, which has caused injury and which has been committed by an agent of the state, that state will be responsible in international law to the state suffering the damage irrespective of good or bad faith. To be contrasted with this approach is the subjective responsibility concept (the 'fault' theory) which emphasises that an element of intentional (dolus) or negligent (culpa) conduct on the part of the person concerned is necessary before his state can be rendered liable for any injury caused.

The relevant cases and academic opinions are divided on this question, although the majority tends towards the strict liability, objective theory of responsibility.

In the Neer claim[33] in 1926, an American superintendent of a Mexican mine was shot. The USA, on behalf of his widow and daughter, claimed damages because of the lackadaisical manner in which the Mexican authorities pursued their investigations. The General Claims Commission dealing with the matter disallowed the claim, in applying the objective test.

In the Caire claim,[34] the French–Mexican Claims Commission had to consider the case of a French citizen shot by Mexican soldiers for failing to supply them with 5,000 Mexican dollars. Verzijl, the presiding commissioner, held that Mexico was responsible for the injury caused in accordance with the objective responsibility doctrine, that is 'the responsibility for the acts of the officials or organs of a state, which may devolve upon it even in the absence of any "fault" of its own'.[35]

A leading case adopting the subjective approach is the Home Missionary Society claim[36] in 1920 between Britain and the United States. In this [32] See e.g. Crawford, Articles, p. 12; H. Lauterpacht, Private Law Sources and Analogies of International Law, Cambridge, 1927, pp. 135–43; Nguyen Quoc Dinh et al., Droit International Public, p. 766; Brownlie, Principles of Public International Law, 6th edn, Oxford, 2003, pp. 425 ff. and Brownlie, System, pp. 38–46, and Aréchaga, 'International Responsibility', pp. 534–40. See also J. G. Starke, 'Imputability in International Delinquencies', 19 BYIL, 1938, p. 104, and Cheng, General Principles, pp. 218–32.

[33] 4 RIAA, p. 60 (1926); 3 AD, p. 213.

[34] 5 RIAA, p. 516 (1929); 5 AD, p. 146.

[35] 5 RIAA, pp. 529–31. See also The Jessie, 6 RIAA, p. 57 (1921); 1 AD, p. 175.

[36] 6 RIAA, p. 42 (1920); 1 AD, p. 173.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

case, the imposition of a 'hut tax' in the protectorate of Sierra Leone triggered off a local uprising in which Society property was damaged and missionaries killed. The tribunal dismissed the claim of the Society (presented by the US) and noted that it was established in international law that no government was responsible for the acts of rebels where it itself was guilty of no breach of good faith or negligence in suppressing the revolt. It should, therefore, be noted that the view expressed in this case is concerned with a specific area of the law, viz. the question of state responsibility for the acts of rebels. Whether one can analogise from this generally is open to doubt.

In the Corfu Channel case,[37] the International Court appeared to lean towards the fault theory[38] by saying that:

> it cannot be concluded from the mere fact of the control exercised by a state over its territory and waters that that state necessarily knew, or ought to have known, of any unlawful act perpetrated therein, nor yet that it necessarily knew, or should have known, the authors. This fact, by itself and apart from other circumstances, neither involves prima facie responsibility nor shifts the burden of proof.[39]

On the other hand, the Court emphasised that the fact of exclusive territorial control had a bearing upon the methods of proof available to establish the knowledge of that state as to the events in question. Because of the difficulties of presenting direct proof of facts giving rise to responsibility, the victim state should be allowed a more liberal recourse to inferences of fact and circumstantial evidence.[40]

However, it must be pointed out that the Court was concerned with Albania's knowledge of the laying of mines,[41] and the question of prima facie responsibility for any unlawful act committed within the territory of the state concerned, irrespective of attribution, raises different issues. It cannot be taken as proof of the acceptance of the fault theory. It may be concluded that doctrine and practice support the objective theory and that this is right, particularly in view of the proliferation of state organs

[37] ICJ Reports, 1949, p. 4; 16 AD, p. 155.
[38] See e.g. Oppenheim's International Law, p. 509.
[39] ICJ Reports, 1949, pp. 4, 18; 16 AD, p. 157. Cf. Judges Krylov and Ecer, ibid., pp. 71–2 and 127–8. See also Judge Azevedo, ibid., p. 85.
[40] ICJ Reports, 1949, pp. 4, 18.
[41] See Brownlie, Principles, pp. 427–9.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

and agencies.[42] The Commentary to the ILC Articles emphasised that the Articles did not take a definitive position on this controversy, but noted that standards as to objective or subjective approaches, fault, negligence or want of due diligence would vary from one context to another depending upon the terms of the primary obligation in question.[43]

Imputability [44]

Imposing upon the state absolute liability wherever an official is involved encourages that state to exercise greater control over its various departments and representatives. It also stimulates moves towards complying with objective standards of conduct in international relations.

State responsibility covers many fields. It includes unlawful acts or omissions directly committed by the state and directly affecting other states: for instance, the breach of a treaty, the violation of the territory of another state, or damage to state property. An example of the latter heading is provided by the incident in 1955 when Bulgarian fighter planes shot down an Israeli civil aircraft of its state airline, El Al.[45] Another example of state responsibility is illustrated by the Nicaragua case,[46] where the International Court of Justice found that acts imputable to the US included the laying of mines in Nicaraguan internal or territorial waters and certain attacks on Nicaraguan ports, oil installations and a naval base by its agents.[47] In the Corfu Channel case,[48] Albania was held responsible for the consequences of mine-laying in its territorial waters on the basis [42] The question of intention is to be distinguished from the problem of causality, i.e. whether the act or omission in question actually caused the particular loss or damage: see e.g. the Lighthouses case, 23 ILR, p. 352.

[43] ILC Commentary 2001, pp. 69–70.

[44] See e.g. Yearbook of the ILC, 1973, vol. II, p. 189. See also Brownlie, System, pp. 36–7 and chapter 7; Nguyen Quoc Dinh et al., Droit International Public, p. 773; L. Condorelli, 'L'Imputation à l'État d'un Fait Internationallement Illicite', 188 HR, 1984, p. 9, and R. Higgins, 'The Concept of "the State": A Variable Geometry and Dualist Perceptions' in Mélanges Abi-Saab, The Hague, 2001, p. 547.

[45] See the Aerial Incident case, ICJ Reports, 1955, pp. 127, 130. See also the incident where a Soviet fighter plane crashed in Belgium. The USSR accepted responsibility for the loss of life and damage that resulted and compensation was paid: see 91 ILR, p. 287, and J. Salmon, 'Chute sur le Territoire Belge d'un Avion Militaire Sovietique de 4 Juillet 1989, Problèmes de Responsabilité', Revue Belge de Droit International, 1990, p. 510.

[46] Nicaragua v. United States, ICJ Reports, 1986, p. 14; 76 ILR, p. 349.

[47] ICJ Reports, 1986, pp. 48–51 and 146–9; 76 ILR, pp. 382, 480.

[48] ICJ Reports, 1949, p. 4; 16 AD, p. 155.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

of knowledge possessed by that state as to the presence of such mines, even though there was no finding as to who had actually laid the mines. In the Rainbow Warrior incident,[49] the UN Secretary-General mediated a settlement in which New Zealand received inter alia a sum of $7 million for the violation of its sovereignty which occurred when that vessel was destroyed by French agents in New Zealand.[50] The state may also incur responsibility with regard to the activity of its officials in injuring a national of another state, and this activity need not be one authorised by the authorities of the state.

The doctrine depends on the link that exists between the state and the person or persons actually committing the unlawful act or omission. The state as an abstract legal entity cannot, of course, in reality 'act' itself. It can only do so through authorised officials and representatives. The state is not responsible under international law for all acts performed by its nationals. Since the state is responsible only for acts of its servants that are imputable or attributable to it, it becomes necessary to examine the concept of imputability (also termed attribution). Imputability is the legal fiction which assimilates the actions or omissions of state officials to the state itself and which renders the state liable for damage resulting to the property or person of an alien.

Article 4 of the ILC Articles provides that the conduct of any state organ (including any person or entity having that status in accordance with the internal law of the state) shall be considered as an act of the state concerned under international law where the organ exercises legislative, executive, judicial or any other function, whatever position it holds in the organisation of the state and whatever its character as an organ of the central government or of a territorial unit of the state. This approach reflects customary law. As the International Court noted in Difference Relating to Immunity from Legal Process of a Special Rapporteur, 'According to a well-established rule of international law, the conduct of any organ of a state must be regarded as an act of that state.'[51] The International Court

[49] See 81 AJIL, 1987, p. 325 and 74 ILR, pp. 241 ff. See also above, p. 778.

[50] Note also the USS Stark incident, in which a US guided missile frigate on station in the Persian Gulf was attacked by Iraqi aircraft in May 1987. The Iraqi government agreed to pay compensation of $27 million: see 83 AJIL, 1989, pp. 561–4.

[51] ICJ Reports, 1999, pp. 62, 87; 121 ILR, pp. 405, 432. See also e.g. the OSPAR (Ireland v. UK) case, Final Award, 2 July 2003, para. 144; 126 ILR, 334, 379, the Massey case, 4 RIAA, p. 155 (1927); 4 AD, p. 250 and the Salvador Commercial Company case, 15 RIAA, p. 477 (1902). As an example of the state organ concerned being from the judiciary, see the Sunday Times case, European Court of Human Rights, Series A, vol. 30, 1979; 58 ILR,

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

in the Genocide Convention (Bosnia v. Serbia) case regarded it as 'one of the cornerstones of the law of state responsibility, that the conduct of any state organ is to be considered an act of the state under international law, and therefore gives rise to the responsibility of the state if it constitutes a breach of an obligatrion of the state'. It was a rule of customary international law.[52] It would clearly cover units and sub-units within a state.[53]

Article 5, in reaction to the proliferation of government agencies and parastatal entities, notes that the conduct of a person or of an entity not an organ of the state under article 4 but which is empowered by the law of that state to exercise elements of governmental authority shall be considered an act of the state under international law, provided the person or entity is acting in that capacity in the particular instance. This provision is intended inter alia to cover the situation of privatised corporations which retain certain public or regulatory functions. Examples of the application of this article might include the conduct of private security firms authorised to act as prison guards or where private or state-owned airlines exercise certain immigration controls[54] or with regard to a railway company to which certain police powers have been granted.[55]

Article 5 issues may also arise where an organ or an agent of a state are placed at the disposal of another international legal entity in a situation where both the state and the entity exercise elements of control over the organ or agent in question. This occurs most clearly where a military contingent is placed by a state at the disposal of the UN for peace-keeping purposes. Both the state and the UN will exercise a certain jurisdiction over the contingent. The question arose in Behrami v. France before the European Court of Justice as to whether troops from certain NATO states forming part of KFOR and concerned in the particular instance with demining operations in the province of Kosovo could fall under the jurisdiction of the Court or whether the appropriate responsible organ was KFOR operating under the authority of the United Nations, a body not susceptible

p. 491, and from the legislature, see e.g. the Young, James and Webster case, European Court of Human Rights, Series A, vol. 44, 1981; 62 ILR, p. 359.

[52] ICJ Reports, 2007, para. 385.

[53] Thus, not only would communes, provinces and regions of a unitary state be concerned, see e.g. the Heirs of the Duc de Guise case, 13 RIAA, p. 161 (1951); 18 ILR, p. 423, but also the component states of a federal state, see e.g. the LaGrand (Provisional Measures) case, ICJ Reports, 1999, pp. 9, 16; 118 ILR, pp. 39, 46, the Davy case, 9 RIAA, p. 468 (1903); the Janes case, 4 RIAA, p. 86 (1925); 3 AD, p. 218 and the Pellat case, 5 AD, p. 145. See also Yearbook of the ILC, 1971, vol. II, part I, pp. 257 ff. and ILC Commentary 2001, pp. 84 ff.

[54] ILC Commentary 2001, p. 92.

[55] Yearbook of the ILC, 1974, vol. II, pp. 281–2.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

to the jurisdiction of the Court. The Court held that the key question was whether the UN Security Council retained ultimate authority and control so that operational command only was delegated and that this was so in the light of resolution 1244. Accordingly, responsibility for the impugned action was attributable to the UN, so that jurisdiction did not exist with regard to the states concerned for the European Court.[56]

Article 6 provides that the conduct of an organ placed at the disposal of a state by another state shall be considered as an act of the former state under international law, if that organ was acting in the exercise of elements of the governmental authority of the former state. This would, for example, cover the UK Privy Council acting as the highest judicial body for certain Commonwealth countries.[57]

Ultra vires acts

An unlawful act may be imputed to the state even where it was beyond the legal capacity of the official involved, providing, as Verzijl noted in the Caire case,[58] that the officials 'have acted at least to all appearances as competent officials or organs or they must have used powers or methods appropriate to their official capacity'.

This was reaffirmed in the Mossé case,[59] where it was noted that:

> Even if it were admitted that . . . officials . . . had acted . . . outside the statutory limits of the competence of their service, it should not be deduced, without further ado, that the claim is not well founded. It would still be necessary to consider a question of law . . . namely whether in the international order the state should be acknowledged responsible for acts performed by officials within the apparent limits of their functions, in accordance with a line of conduct which was not entirely contrary to the instructions received.

In Youman's claim,[60] militia ordered to protect threatened American citizens in a Mexican town instead joined the riot, during which the Americans were killed. These unlawful acts by the militia were imputed to the state of Mexico, which was found responsible by the General Claims Commission. In the Union Bridge Company case,[61] a British official of the Cape [56] Judgment of 2 May 2007, paras. 134 ff. See also Bosphorus Airways v. Ireland, European Court of Human Rights, judgment of 30 June 2005. As to the Kosovo situation, see above, chapter 9, p. 452.

[57] Yearbook of the ILC, 1974, vol. II, p. 288 and ILC Commentary 2001, p. 98.

[58] 5 RIAA, pp. 516, 530 (1929); 5 AD, pp. 146, 148.

[59] 13 RIAA, p. 494 (1953); 20 ILR, p. 217.

[60] 4 RIAA, p. 110 (1926); 3 AD, p. 223.

[61] 6 RIAA, p. 138 (1924); 2 AD, p. 170.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

Government Railway mistakenly appropriated neutral property during the Boer War. It was held that there was still liability despite the honest mistake and the lack of intention on the part of the authorities to appropriate the material in question. The key was that the action was within the general scope of duty of the official. In the Sandline case, the Tribunal emphasised that, 'It is a clearly established principle of international law that acts of a state will be regarded as such even if they are ultra vires or unlawful under the internal law of the state . . . their [institutions, officials or employees of the state] acts or omissions when they purport to act in their capacity as organs of the state are regarded internationally as those of the state even though they contravene the internal law of the state.'[62]

Article 7 of the ILC Articles provides that the conduct of an organ or of a person or entity empowered to exercise elements of governmental authority shall be considered an act of the state under international law if acting in that capacity, even if it exceeds its authority or contravenes instructions.[63] This article appears to lay down an absolute rule of liability, one not limited by reference to the apparent exercise of authority and, in the context of the general acceptance of the objective theory of responsibility, is probably the correct approach.[64]

Although private individuals are not regarded as state officials so that the state is not liable for their acts, the state may be responsible for failing to exercise the control necessary to prevent such acts. This was emphasised in the Zafiro case[65] between Britain and America in 1925. The Tribunal held the latter responsible for the damage caused by the civilian crew of a naval ship in the Philippines, since the naval officers had not adopted effective preventative measures.

State control and responsibility

Article 8 of the ILC Articles provides that the conduct of a person or group of persons shall be considered as an act of state under international [62] 117 ILR, pp. 552, 561. See also Azinian v. United Mexican States 121 ILR, pp. 1, 23; SPP(ME) Ltd v. Egypt 106 ILR, p. 501 and Metalclad Corporation v. United Mexican States 119 ILR, pp. 615, 634.

[63] See ILC Commentary 2001, p. 99 and see also Yearbook of the ILC, 1975, vol. II, p. 67.

[64] See e.g. the Caire case, 5 RIAA, p. 516 (1929); 5 AD, p. 146; the Velásquez Rodríguez case, Inter-American Court of Human Rights, Series C, No. 4, 1989, para. 170; 95 ILR, pp. 259, 296 and Ilaşcu v. Moldova and Russia, European Court of Human Rights, judgment of 8 July 2004, para. 319. See also T. Meron, 'International Responsibility of States for Unauthorised Acts of Their Officials', 33 BYIL, 1957, p. 851.

[65] 6 RIAA, p. 160 (1925); 3 AD, p. 221. See also Re Gill 5 RIAA, p. 157 (1931); 6 AD, p. 203.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

law if the person or group of persons is in fact acting on the instructions of, or under the direction or control of, that state in carrying out the conduct. The first proposition is uncontroversial, but difficulties have arisen in seeking to define the necessary direction or control required for the second proposition. The Commentary to the article emphasises that, 'Such conduct will be attributable to the state only if it directed or controlled the specific operation and the conduct complained of was an integral part of the operation.'[66] Recent case-law has addressed the issue.

In the Nicaragua case, the International Court declared that in order for the conduct of the contra guerrillas to have been attributable to the US, who financed and equipped the force, 'it would in principle have to be proved that that state had effective control of the military or paramilitary operation in the course of which the alleged violations were committed'.[67] In other words, general overall control would have been insufficient to ground responsibility. However, in the Tadić case, the International Criminal Tribunal for the Former Yugoslavia adopted a more flexible approach, noting that the degree of control might vary according to the circumstances and a high threshold might not always be required.[68] In this case, of course, the issue was of individual criminal responsibility. Further, the situation might be different where the state deemed responsible was in clear and uncontested effective control of the territory where the violation occurred. The International Court of Justice in the Namibia case stated that, 'Physical control of a territory and not sovereignty or legitimacy of title, is the basis of state liability for acts affecting other states.'[69] This was reaffirmed in Loizidou v. Turkey, where the European Court of Human Rights noted that, bearing in mind the object and purpose of the European Convention on Human Rights, > the responsibility of a contracting party may also arise when as a consequence of military action – whether lawful or unlawful – it exercises effective control of an area outside its national territory. The obligation to secure, in such an area, the rights and freedoms set out in the Convention, derives from the fact of such control whether it be exercised directly, through its armed forces, or through a subordinate local administration.[70]

[66] ILC Commentary 2001, p. 104.
[67] ICJ Reports, 1986, pp. 14, 64–5; 76 ILR, p. 349.
[68] 38 ILM, 1999, pp. 1518, 1541.
[69] ICJ Reports, 1971, pp. 17, 54; 42 ILR, p. 2.
[70] Preliminary Objections, European Court of Human Rights, Series A, No. 310, 1995, pp. 20, 24; 103 ILR, p. 621, and the merits judgment, European Court of Human Rights, Judgment of 18 December 1996, para. 52; 108 ILR, p. 443. See also Cyprus v. Turkey, European Court of Human Rights, Judgment of 10 May 2001, para. 76; 120 ILR, p. 10.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

The International Court returned to the issue in the Genocide Convention (Bosnia v. Serbia) case and reaffirmed its approach in the Nicaragua case. It noted that the Appeal Chamber's judgment in Tadić did not concern issues of state responsibility nor a question that was indispensable for the exercise of its jurisdiction. It held that the 'overall control' test was not appropriate for state responsibility and that the test under customary law was that reflected in article 8 whereby the state would be responsible for the acts of persons or groups (neither state organs nor equated with such organs) where an organ of the state gave the instructions or provided the direction pursuant to which the perpetrators of the wrongful act acted or where it exercised effective control over the action during which the wrong was committed.[71]

Article 9 of the ILC Articles provides that the conduct of a person or a group of persons shall be considered as an act of the state under international law if the person or group was in fact exercising elements of the governmental authority in the absence or default of the official authorities and in circumstances such as to call for the exercise of those elements of authority.[72]

Mob violence, insurrections and civil wars

Where the governmental authorities have acted in good faith and without negligence, the general principle is one of non-liability for the actions of rioters or rebels causing loss or damage.[73] The state, however, is under a duty to show due diligence. Quite what is meant by this is difficult to quantify and more easily defined in the negative.[74] It should also be noted that special provisions apply to diplomatic and consular personnel.[75]

Article 10 of the ILC Articles provides that where an insurrectional movement is successful either in becoming the new government of a state or in establishing a new state in part of the territory of the pre-existing

[71] ICJ Reports, 2007, paras. 403–6.

[72] See e.g. the Yeager case, 17 Iran–US CTR, 1987, pp. 92, 104.

[73] See e.g. the Home Missionary Society case, 6 RIAA, pp. 42, 44 (1920); 1 AD, p. 173; the Youmans case, 4 RIAA, p. 110 (1926); 3 AD, p. 223 and the Herd case, 4 RIAA, p. 653 (1930). See also P. Dumberry, 'New State Responsibility for Internationally Wrongful Acts by an Insurrectional Movement', 17 EJIL, 2006, p. 605.

[74] E.g. Judge Huber, the Spanish Zone of Morocco claims, 2 RIAA, pp. 617, 642 (1925); 2 AD, p. 157. See Brownlie, Principles, pp. 436 ff. and the Sambaggio case, 10 RIAA, p. 499 (1903). See also Yearbook of the ILC, 1957, vol. II, pp. 121–3, and G. Schwarzenberger, International Law, 3rd edn, London, 1957, pp. 653 ff.

[75] See above, chapter 13, pp. 764 ff.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

state, it will be held responsible for its activities prior to its assumption of authority.[76]

The issue of the responsibility of the authorities of a state for activities that occurred prior to its coming to power was raised before the Iran–US Claims Tribunal. In Short v. The Islamic Republic of Iran,[77] the Tribunal noted that the international responsibility of a state can be engaged where the circumstances or events causing the departure of an alien are attributable to it, but that not all departures of aliens from a country in a period of political turmoil would as such be attributable to that state.[78] In the instant case, it was emphasised that at the relevant time the revolutionary movement had not yet been able to establish control over any part of Iranian territory and the government had demonstrated its loss of control. Additionally, the acts of supporters of a revolution cannot be attributed to the government following the success of the revolution, just as acts of supporters of an existing government are not attributable to the government. Accordingly, and since the claimant was unable to identify any agent of the revolutionary movement the actions of whom forced him to leave Iran, the claim for compensation failed.[79] In Yeager v. The Islamic Republic of Iran,[80] the Tribunal awarded compensation for expulsion, but in this case it was held that the expulsion was carried out by the Revolutionary Guards after the success of the revolution. Although the Revolutionary Guards were not at the time an official organ of the Iranian state, it was determined that they were exercising governmental authority with the knowledge and acquiescence of the revolutionary state, making Iran liable for their acts.[81]

Falling somewhat between these two cases is Rankin v. The Islamic Republic of Iran,[82] where the Tribunal held that the claimant had not proved that he had left Iran after the revolution as a result of action by the Iranian government and the Revolutionary Guards as distinct from leaving because of the general difficulties of life in that state during the revolutionary period. Thus Iranian responsibility was not engaged.

Where a state subsequently acknowledges and adopts conduct as its own, then it will be considered as an act of state under international law entailing responsibility, even though such conduct was not attributable [76] See E. M. Borchard, The Diplomatic Protection of Citizens Abroad, New York, 1927, p. 241 and the Bolivian Railway Company case, 9 RIAA, p. 445 (1903). See also the ILC Commentary 2001, p. 112.

[77] 16 Iran–US CTR, p. 76; 82 ILR, p. 148.

[78] 16 Iran–US CTR, p. 83; 82 ILR, pp. 159–60.

[79] 16 Iran–US CTR, p. 85; 82 ILR, p. 161.

[80] 17 Iran–US CTR, p. 92; 82 ILR, p. 178.

[81] 17 Iran–US CTR, p. 104; 82 ILR, p. 194.

[82] 17 Iran–US CTR, p. 135; 82 ILR, p. 204.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

to the state beforehand.[83] In the Iranian Hostages case, for example, the International Court noted that the initial attack on the US Embassy by militants could not be imputable to Iran since they were clearly not agents or organs of the state. However, the subsequent approval of the Ayatollah Khomeini and other organs of Iran to the attack and the decision to maintain the occupation of the Embassy translated that action into a state act. The militants thus became agents of the Iranian state for whose acts the state bore international responsibility.[84]

Circumstances precluding wrongfulness[85]

Where a state consents to an act by another state which would otherwise constitute an unlawful act, wrongfulness is precluded provided that the act is within the limits of the consent given.[86] The most common example of this kind of situation is where troops from one state are sent to another at the request of the latter.[87] Wrongfulness is also precluded where the act constitutes a lawful measure of self-defence taken in conformity with the Charter of the UN.[88] This would also cover force used in self-defence as defined in the customary right as well as under article 51 of the Charter, since that article refers in terms to the 'inherent right' of individual and collective self-defence.[89] Further, the ILC Commentary makes it clear that the fact that an act is taken in self-defence does not necessarily mean that all wrongfulness is precluded, since the principles relating to human rights and humanitarian law have to be respected. The International Court, in particular, noted in its advisory opinion in the Legality of the Threat or Use of Nuclear Weapons that, 'Respect for the environment is one of the elements that go to assessing whether an action is in conformity with the principles of necessity and proportionality' and thus in accordance with the right to self-defence.[90]

[83] Article 11 and see ILC Commentary 2001, p. 118.

[84] ICJ Reports, 1980, pp. 3, 34–5; 61 ILR, pp. 530, 560. See also above, chapter 13, p. 755.

[85] See e.g. M. Whiteman, Digest of International Law, Washington, 1970, vol. VII, pp. 837 ff.; Yearbook of the ILC, 1979, vol. II, part 1, pp. 21 ff.; ibid., 1980, vol. II, pp. 26 ff. and ILC Commentary 2001, p. 169. See also Nguyen Quoc Dinh et al., Droit International Public, p. 782, and A. V. Lowe, 'Precluding Wrongfulness or Responsibility: A Plea for Excuses', 10 EJIL, 1999, p. 405.

[86] See article 20 of the ILC Articles. See further ILC Commentary 2001, p. 173.

[87] See e.g. the dispatch of UK troops to Muscat and Oman in 1957, 574 HC Deb., col. 872, 29 July 1957, and to Jordan in 1958, SCOR, 13th Sess., 831st meeting, para. 28.

[88] Article 21 and see also ILC Commentary 2001, p. 177.

[89] See further below, chapter 20, p. 1131.

[90] ICJ Reports, 1996, pp. 226, 242; 110 ILR, p. 163.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

Article 22 of the ILC Articles provides that the wrongfulness of an act is precluded if and to the extent that the act constitutes a countermeasure.[91] International law originally referred in this context to reprisals, whereby an otherwise unlawful act is rendered legitimate by the prior application of unlawful force.[92] The term 'countermeasures' is now the preferred term for reprisals not involving the use of force.[93] Countermeasures may be contrasted with the provisions laid down in article 60 of the Vienna Convention on the Law of Treaties, 1969, which deals with the consequences of a material breach of a treaty in terms of the competence of the other parties to the treaty to terminate or suspend it.[94] While countermeasures do not as such affect the legal validity of the obligation which has been breached by way of reprisal for a prior breach, termination of a treaty under article 60 would under article 70 free the other parties to it from any further obligations under that treaty.

The International Court stated in the Gabčíkovo–Nagymaros Project case that,

> In order to be justifiable, a countermeasure must meet certain conditions . . . In the first place it must be taken in response to a previous international wrongful act of another state and must be directed against that state . . . Secondly, the injured state must have called upon the state committing the wrongful act to discontinue its wrongful conduct or to make reparation for it . . . In the view of the Court, an important consideration is that the effects of a countermeasure must be commensurate with the injury suffered, taking account of the rights in question . . . [and] its purpose must be to induce the wrongdoing state to comply with its obligations under international law, and . . . the measure must therefore be reversible.[95]

[91] See ILC Commentary 2001, p. 180. See also Crawford, Articles, pp. 47 ff.

[92] See e.g. the Naulilaa case, 2 RIAA, p. 1025 (1928); 4 AD, p. 466 and the Cysne case, 2 RIAA, p. 1056; 5 AD, p. 150.

[93] See e.g. the US–France Air Services Agreement case, 54 ILR, pp. 306, 337. See also Report of the International Law Commission, 1989, A/44/10 and ibid., 1992, A/47/10, pp. 39 ff. See also C. Annacker, 'Part Two of the International Law Commission's Draft Articles on State Responsibility', 37 German YIL, 1994, pp. 206, 234 ff.; M. Dawidowicz, 'Public Law Enforcement Without Public Law Safeguards? An Analysis of State Practice on Third-Party Countermeasures and Their Relationship to the UN Security Council', 77 BYIL, 2006, p. 333; E. Zoller, Peacetime Unilateral Remedies: An Analysis of Countermeasures, New York, 1984, and O. Y. Elagab, The Legality of Non-Forcible Counter-Measures in International Law, Oxford, 1988.

[94] See further below, chapter 16, p. 948.

[95] ICJ Reports, 1997, pp. 7, 55–7; 116 ILR, p. 1. Note that the ILC took the view that the duty to choose measures that are reversible is not absolute, ILC Commentary 2001, p. 332. See also the Nicaragua case, ICJ Reports, 1986, pp. 14, 102; 76 ILR, p. 1.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

In other words, lawful countermeasures must be in response to a prior wrongful act and taken in the light of a refusal to remedy it, directed against the state committing the wrongful act and proportionate. Further, there is no requirement that the countermeasures taken should be with regard to the same obligation breached by the state acting wrongfully. Thus, the response to a breach of one treaty may be action taken with regard to another treaty, provided that the requirements of necessity and proportionality are respected.[96]

The ILC Articles deal further with countermeasures in Chapter II. Article 49 provides that an injured state[97] may only take countermeasures against a state responsible for the wrongful act in order to induce the latter to comply with the obligations consequent upon the wrongful act.[98] Countermeasures are limited to the non-performance for the time being of international obligations of the state taking the measures and shall, as far as possible, be taken in such a way as to permit the resumption of performance of the obligation in question.[99] Article 50 makes it clear that countermeasures shall not affect the obligation to refrain from the threat or use of force as embodied by the UN Charter, obligations for the protection of human rights, obligations of a humanitarian character prohibiting reprisals and other obligations of jus cogens.[100] By the same token, obligations under any applicable dispute settlement procedure between the two states continue,[101] while the state taking countermeasures must respect the inviolability of diplomatic or consular agents, premises, archives and documents.[102] Article 51 emphasises the requirement for proportionality, noting that countermeasures must be commensurate with the injury suffered, taking into account the gravity of the internationally wrongful act and the rights in question.[103] Article 52 provides that before taking countermeasures, the injured state must call upon the responsible

[96] See ILC Commentary 2001, pp. 326–7. [97] See further below, p. 796.
[98] See further below, p. 800. [99] See ILC Commentary 2001, p. 328.
[100] See Eritrea–Ethiopia Claims Commission, Partial Award, Prisoners of War, Eritrea's Claim 17, 1 July 2003, para. 159, noting that Ethiopia's suspension of prisoner of war exchanges could not be justified as a countermeasure as it affected obligations of a human rights or humanitarian nature.
[101] See e.g. 'Symposium on Counter-Measures and Dispute Settlement,' 5 EJIL, 1994, p. 20, and Report of the International Law Commission, 1995, A/50/10, pp. 173 ff. See also Annacker, 'Part Two', pp. 242 ff.
[102] See further ILC Commentary 2001, p. 333.
[103] See the US–France Air Services Agreement Arbitration 54 ILR, pp. 303, 337. See also the ILC Commentary 2001, p. 341 and the Report of the ILC on its 44th Session, 1992, A/47/10, p. 70.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

state to fulfil its obligations and notify that state of any decision to take countermeasures while offering to negotiate. However, the injured state may take such countermeasures as are necessary to preserve its rights. Where the wrongful acts have ceased or the matter is pending before a court or tribunal with powers to take binding decisions, then countermeasures should cease (or where relevant, not be taken).[104] Countermeasures shall be terminated as soon as the responsible state has complied with its obligations.[105]

Force majeure has long been accepted as precluding wrongfulness,[106] although the standard of proof is high. In the Serbian Loans case,[107] for example, the Court declined to accept the claim that the First World War had made it impossible for Serbia to repay a loan. In 1946, following a number of unauthorised flights of US aircraft over Yugoslavia, both states agreed that only in cases of emergency could such entry be justified in the absence of consent.[108] Article 23 of the ILC Articles provides for the preclusion of wrongfulness where the act was due to the occurrence of an irresistible force or of an unforeseen event beyond the control of the state, making it materially impossible in the circumstances to perform obligation.[109] In the Gill case,[110] for example, a British national residing in Mexico had his house destroyed as a result of sudden and unforeseen action by opponents of the Mexican government. The Commission held that failure to prevent the act was due not to negligence but to genuine inability to take action in the face of a sudden situation.

The emphasis, therefore, is upon the happening of an event that takes place without the state being able to do anything to rectify the event or avert its consequences. There had to be a constraint which the state was

[104] See ILC Commentary 2001, p. 345. [105] Ibid., p. 349.

[106] See e.g. Yearbook of the ILC, 1961, vol. II, p. 46 and ILC Commentary 2001, p. 183.

[107] PCIJ, Series A, No. 20, 1929, p. 39. See also the Brazilian Loans case, PCIJ, Series A, No. 20, 1929, p. 120; 5 AD, p. 466.

[108] Yearbook of the ILC, 1979, vol. II, p. 60 and ILC Commentary 2001, pp. 189–90. This example would cover both force majeure and distress (discussed below). Note also that article 18(2) provides that stopping and anchoring by ships during their passage through the territorial sea of another state is permissible where rendered necessary by distress or force majeure. See also article 14(3) of the Convention on the Territorial Sea and Contiguous Zone, 1958.

[109] However, this principle does not apply if the situation of force majeure is due wholly or partly to the conduct of the state invoking it or the state has assumed the risk of that situation occurring, article 23(2). See also Libyan Arab Foreign Investment Company v. Republic of Burundi 96 ILR, pp. 279, 318.

[110] 5 RIAA, p. 159 (1931); 6 AD, p. 203.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

unable to avoid or to oppose by its own power.[111] In other words, the conduct of the state is involuntary or at least involves no element of free choice.[112]

The issue of force majeure was raised by France in the Rainbow Warrior arbitration in 1990.[113] It was argued that one of the French agents repatriated to France without the consent of New Zealand had to be so moved as a result of medical factors which amounted to force majeure. The Tribunal, however, stressed that the test of applicability of this doctrine was one of 'absolute and material impossibility' and a circumstance rendering performance of an obligation more difficult or burdensome did not constitute a case of force majeure.[114]

Article 24 provides that wrongfulness is precluded if the author of the conduct concerned had no other reasonable way in a situation of distress of saving the author's life or the lives of other persons entrusted to his care.[115] This would cover, for example, the agreement in the 1946 US–Yugoslav correspondence that only in an emergency would unauthorised entry into foreign airspace be justified,[116] or the seeking of refuge in a foreign port without authorisation by a ship's captain in storm conditions.[117]

The difference between distress and force majeure is that in the former case there is an element of choice. This is often illusory since in both cases extreme peril exists and whether or not the situation provides an opportunity for real choice is a matter of some difficulty.[118] The Tribunal in the Rainbow Warrior arbitration[119] noted that three conditions were required to be satisfied in order for this defence to be applicable to the French action in repatriating its two agents: first, the existence of exceptional circumstances of extreme urgency involving medical and other considerations of an elementary nature, provided always that a prompt recognition of the existence of those exceptional circumstances is subsequently obtained from the other interested party or is clearly demonstrated; secondly, the re-establishment of the original situation as soon as the reasons of emergency invoked to justify the breach of the obligation (i.e. the repatriation) had disappeared; thirdly, the existence of a good faith effort to try to

[111] Yearbook of the ILC, 1979, vol. II, p. 133. [112] ILC Commentary 2001, p. 183.
[113] 82 ILR, pp. 499, 551. [114] Ibid., p. 553.
[115] ILC Commentary 2001, p. 189. This would not apply if the situation of distress is due wholly or partly to the conduct of the state invoking it or the act in question is likely to create a comparable or greater peril, article 24(2).
[116] See above, p. 541.
[117] Yearbook of the ILC, 1979, vol. II, p. 134 and ILC Commentary 2001, pp. 189–90.
[118] Yearbook of the ILC, 1979, vol. II, pp. 133–5. [119] 82 ILR, pp. 499, 555.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

obtain the consent of New Zealand according to the terms of the 1986 Agreement.[120] It was concluded that France had failed to observe these conditions (except as far as the removal of one of the agents on medical grounds was concerned).

Article 25 provides that necessity may not be invoked unless the act was the only means for the state to safeguard an essential interest against a 'grave and imminent peril' and the act does not seriously impair an essential interest of the other state or states or of the international community as a whole. Further, necessity may not be invoked if the international obligation in question excludes the possibility or the state has itself contributed to the situation of necessity.[121] An example of this kind of situation is provided by the Torrey Canyon,[122] where a Liberian oil tanker went aground off the UK coast but outside territorial waters, spilling large quantities of oil. After salvage attempts, the UK bombed the ship. The ILC took the view that this action was legitimate in the circumstances because of a state of necessity.[123] It was only after the incident that international agreements were concluded dealing with this kind of situation.[124]

The Tribunal in the Rainbow Warrior case took the view that the defence of state necessity was 'controversial'.[125] However, the International Court in the Gabčíkovo–Nagymaros Project case considered that it was 'a ground recognised in customary international law for precluding the wrongfulness of an act not in conformity with an international obligation', although it could only be accepted 'on an exceptional basis'.[126] The Court referred to the conditions laid down in an earlier version of, and essentially reproduced in, article 25 and stated that such conditions must be cumulatively satisfied.[127] In M/V Saiga (No. 2), the International

[120] See above, p. 779. [121] See ILC Commentary 2001, p. 194.

[122] Cmnd 3246, 1967. See also below, chapter 15, p. 900, note 322.

[123] Yearbook of the ILC, 1980, vol. II, p. 39. See also the Company General of the Orinoco case, 10 RIAA, p. 280.

[124] See e.g. the International Convention Relating to Intervention on the High Seas in Cases of Oil Pollution Casualties, 1969.

[125] 82 ILR, pp. 499, 554–5. The doctrine has also been controversial in academic writings: see Yearbook of the ILC, 1980, vol. II, part 1, pp. 47–9. See also J. Barboza, 'Necessity (Revisited) in International Law' in Essays in Honour of Judge Manfred Lachs (ed. J. Makarczyk), The Hague, 1984, p. 27, and R. Boed, 'State of Necessity as a Justification for Internationally Wrongful Conduct', 3 Yale Human Rights and Development Journal, 2000, p. 1.

[126] ICJ Reports, 1997, pp. 7, 40; 116 ILR, p. 1. See also R v. Director of the Serious Fraud Office and BAE Systems [2008] EWHC 714 (Admin), paras. 143 ff.

[127] ICJ Reports, 1997, p. 41. In addition, the state could not be the sole judge of whether these strictly defined conditions had been met. See also the Construction of a Wall advisory opinion, ICJ Reports, 2004, pp. 136, 194–5; 129 ILR, pp. 37, 113–15.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

Tribunal for the Law of the Sea discussed the doctrine on the basis of the ILC draft as approved by the International Court, but found that it did not apply as no evidence had been produced by Guinea to show that its essential interests were in grave and imminent peril and, in any event, Guinea's interests in maximising its tax revenue from the sale of gas oil to fishing vessels could be safeguarded by means other than extending its customs law to parts of the exclusive economic zone.[128]

Invocation of state responsibility[129]

Article 42 of the ILC Articles stipulates that a state is entitled as an injured state[130] to invoke[131] the responsibility of another state if the obligation breached is owed to that state individually or to a group of states, including that state or the international community as a whole, and the breach of the obligation specially affects that state or is of such a character as radically to change the position of all the other states to which the obligation is owed with respect to the further performance of the obligation. Responsibility may not be invoked if the injured state has validly waived the claim or is to be considered as having, by reason of its conduct, validly acquiesced in the lapse of the claim.[132] Any waiver would need to be clear and unequivocal,[133] while the question of acquiescence would have to be judged carefully in the light of the particular circumstances.[134] Where several states are injured by the same wrongful act, each state may separately invoke responsibility,[135] and where several states are responsible, the responsibility of each may be invoked.[136]

[128] 120 ILR, pp. 143, 191–2.

[129] See e.g. Annacker, 'Part Two', pp. 214 ff. See also ILC Commentary 2001, p. 294.

[130] The provisions concerning the injured state were particularly complex in earlier formulations: see e.g. article 40 of Part II of the ILC Draft Articles of 1996. See also Crawford, Articles, pp. 23 ff.

[131] I.e. taking measures of a formal kind, such as presenting a claim against another state or commencing proceedings before an international court or tribunal but not simply protesting: see ILC Commentary 2001, p. 294.

[132] Article 45. See also ILC Commentary 2001, p. 307.

[133] See the Nauru (Preliminary Objection) case, ICJ Reports, 1992, pp. 240, 247; 97 ILR, p. 1.

[134] ICJ Reports, 1992, pp. 253–4.

[135] Article 46. See also ILC Commentary 2001, p. 311.

[136] Article 47. See also ILC Commentary 2001, p. 313, noting that the general rule in international law is that of separate responsibility of a state for its own wrongful acts. There is neither a rule of joint and separate responsibility nor a prohibition of this. It will depend on the circumstances. See the Eurotunnel case, 132 ILR, pp. 1, 59–60. Note that the UK has taken the position that with regard to combined operations in Iraq, 'each nation

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

In the Barcelona Traction case, the International Court referred to the obligations of a state towards the international community as a whole as distinct from those owed to another state.[137] Article 48 builds upon this principle and provides that a state other than an injured state may invoke the responsibility of another state if either the obligation is owed to a group of states including that state, and is established for the protection of a collective interest of the group, or the obligation breached is owed to the international community as a whole. In such cases, cessation of the wrongful act and assurances and guarantees of non-repetition may be claimed,[138] as well as reparation.[139]

The consequences of internationally wrongful acts

Cessation

The state responsible for the internationally wrongful act is under an obligation to cease that act, if it is continuing, and to offer appropriate assurances and guarantees of non-repetition if circumstances so require.[140] The Tribunal in the Rainbow Warrior case held that in order for cessation to arise, the wrongful act had to have a continuing character and the violated rule must still be in force at the date the order is given.[141] The obligation to offer assurances of non-repetition was raised by Germany and discussed by the Court in the LaGrand case.[142] The Court held that a US commitment to ensure implementation of specific measures was sufficient to meet Germany's request for a general assurance of non-repetition,[143] while with regard to Germany's request for specific assurances, the Court noted that should the US fail in its obligation of consular notification, it would then be incumbent upon that state to allow the review and reconsideration of any conviction and sentence of a German would be directly liable for the consequences of actions taken by its own forces', HC Deb., vol. 436, col. 862W, 12 July 2005, UKMIL, 76 BYIL, 2005, p. 875.

137 ICJ Reports, 1970, pp. 3, 32; 46 ILR, p. 178.

138 As per article 30. 139 See ILC Commentary 2001, p. 318.

140 Article 30 and see ILC Commentary 2001, p. 216. See also C. Derman, 'La Cessation de l'Acte Illicite', Revue Belge de Droit International Public, 1990 I, p. 477.

141 82 ILR, pp. 499, 573.

142 ICJ Reports, 2001, p. 466; 134 ILR, p. 1. Cf. the Avena (Mexico v. USA) case, ICJ Reports, 2004, pp. 12, 68; 134 ILR, pp. 120, 171.

143 ICJ Reports, 2001, pp. 466, 512–13, 134 ILR, pp. 1, 50–1. This was reaffirmed in the Avena (Mexico v. USA) case, ICJ Reports, 2004, pp. 12, 69; 134 ILR, pp. 120, 172.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

national taking place in these circumstances by taking account of the violation of the rights contained in the Vienna Convention on Consular Relations.[144]

Reparation[145]

The basic principle with regard to reparation, or the remedying of a breach of an international obligation for which the state concerned is responsible,[146] was laid down in the Chorzów Factory case, where the Permanent Court of International Justice emphasised that,

> The essential principle contained in the actual notion of an illegal act is that reparation must, as far as possible, wipe out all the consequences of the illegal act and re-establish the situation which would, in all probability, have existed if that act had not been committed.[147]

This principle was reaffirmed in a number of cases, including, for example, by the International Court in the Gabčíkovo–Nagymaros Project case[148] and in the Genocide Convention (Bosnia v. Serbia) case,[149] and by the International Tribunal for the Law of the Sea in M/V Saiga (No. 2).[150]

[144] ICJ Reports, 2001, pp. 466, 513–41; 134 ILR, pp. 1, 51–2. See, as to consular notification, above, chapter 13, p. 773.

[145] See e.g. M. Whiteman, Damages in International Law, Washington, 3 vols., 1937–43; F. A. Mann, 'The Consequences of an International Wrong in International and National Law', 48 BYIL, 1978, p. 1; de Aréchaga, 'International Responsibility', pp. 564 ff., and de Aréchaga,'International Law in the Past Third of the Century', 159 HR, 1978, pp. 1, 285–7. See also Cheng, General Principles, pp. 233 ff.; Brownlie, System, part VIII, and C. Gray, Judicial Remedies in International Law, Oxford, 1987.

[146] See e.g. C. Dominicé, 'Observations sur les Droits de l'État Victime d'un Fiat Internationalement Illicite' in Droit International (ed. P. Weil), Paris, 1982, vol. I, p. 25, and B. Graefrath, 'Responsibility and Damage Caused: Relationship between Responsibility and Damage', HR, 1984 II, pp. 19, 73 ff.

[147] PCIJ, Series A, No. 17, 1928, pp. 47–8. In an earlier phase of the case, the Court stated that, 'It is a principle of international law that the breach of an engagement involves an obligation to make reparation in an adequate form. Reparation therefore is the indispensable complement of a failure to apply a convention', PCIJ, Series A, No. 9, 1927, p. 21. See also the Iranian Hostages case, ICJ Reports, 1980, pp. 3, 45; 61 ILR, pp. 530, 571, where the Court held that Iran was under a duty to make reparation to the US.

[148] ICJ Reports, 1997, pp. 7, 80; 116 ILR, p. 1.

[149] ICJ Reports, 2007, para. 460. See also the Construction of a Wall advisory opinion, ICJ Reports, 2004, pp. 136, 198; 129 ILR, pp. 37, 117–18 and Democratic Republic of the Congo v. Uganda, ICJ Reports, 2005, pp. 168, 257.

[150] 120 ILR, pp. 143, 199. See also S.D. Myers v. Canada 121 ILR, pp. 72, 127–8; Aloeboetoe v. Suriname, Inter-American Court of Human Rights, 1993, Series C, No. 15 at para. 43; 116 ILR, p. 260; Loayza Tamayo v. Peru (Reparations), Inter-American Court of Human

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

Article 31 of the Articles on State Responsibility provides that the responsible state is under an obligation to make full reparation for the injury caused by the internationally wrongful act and that injury includes any damage, whether material or moral, caused by the internationally wrongful act of a state. The obligation to make reparation is governed in all its aspects by international law, irrespective of domestic law provisions.[151] Article 34 provides that full reparation for the injury caused by the internationally wrongful act shall take the form of restitution, compensation and satisfaction, either singly or in combination.[152]

Restitution in kind is the obvious method of performing the reparation, since it aims to re-establish the situation which existed before the wrongful act was committed.[153] While restitution has occurred in the past,[154] it is more rare today, if only because the nature of such disputes has changed. A large number of cases now involve expropriation disputes, where it is politically difficult for the state concerned to return expropriated property to multinational companies.[155] Recognising some of these problems, article 35 provides for restitution as long as and to the extent that it is not

Rights, 1998, Series C, No. 42 at para. 84; 116 ILR, p. 388, and Suarez-Rosero v. Ecuador (Reparations), Inter-American Court of Human Rights, 1999, Series C, No. 44 at para. 39; 118 ILR, p. 92, regarding this as 'one of the fundamental principles of general international law, repeatedly elaborated upon by the jurisprudence'. See also the decision of 14 March 2003 of an UNCITRAL Arbitral Tribunal in CME Czech Republic BV v. The Czech Republic, Final Award.

151 See e.g. Suarez-Rosero v. Ecuador (Reparations), Inter-American Court of Human Rights, 1999, Series C, No. 44 at para. 42; 118 ILR, p. 92. See also article 32 of the ILC Articles.

152 See also ILC Commentary 2001, p. 235 and Suarez-Rosero v. Ecuador (Reparations), Inter-American Court of Human Rights, 1999, Series C, No. 44 at para. 42; 118 ILR, p. 92. Note further that interest is payable on any principal sum payable when necessary to achieve full reparation and will run from the date the principal sum should have been paid until the date it is paid, article 38 and see ILC Commentary 2001, p. 268. Article 39 provides that in the determination of reparation, account shall be taken of the contribution to the injury by wilful or negligent action or omission of the injured state or any person or entity in relation to whom reparation is sought: see also ILC Commentary 2001, p. 275 and the LaGrand case, ICJ Reports, 2001, pp. 466, 487 and 508; 134 ILR, pp. 1, 26 and 46.

153 See e.g. Annacker, 'Part Two', pp. 221 ff.

154 See e.g. the post-1945 Peace Treaties with Hungary, Romania and Italy. See also the Spanish Zone of Morocco case, 2 RIAA, p. 617 (1925); 2 AD, p. 157; the Martini case, 2 RIAA, p. 977 (1930); 5 AD, p. 153; the Palmagero Gold Fields case, 5 RIAA, p. 298 (1931) and the Russian Indemnity case, 11 RIAA, p. 431 (1912). Brownlie notes that in certain cases, such as the illegal possession of territory or acquisition of objects of special cultural, historical or religious significance, restitution may be the only legal remedy, System, p. 210, and the Temple case, ICJ Reports, 1962, pp. 6, 36–7; 33 ILR, pp. 48, 73.

155 See e.g. the Aminoil case, 66 ILR, pp. 529, 533.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

materially impossible and does not involve a burden out of all proportion to the benefit deriving from restitution instead of compensation.[156] In the Rainbow Warrior arbitration,[157] New Zealand sought inter alia an Order that the French Government return its agents from France to their previous place of confinement in the Pacific as required by the original agreement of 9 July 1986. New Zealand termed this request 'restitutio in integrum'. France argued that 'cessation' of the denounced behaviour was the appropriate terminology and remedy, although in the circumstances barred by time.[158] The Tribunal pointed to the debate in the International Law Commission on the differences between the two concepts[159] and held that the French approach was correct.[160] The obligation to end an illegal situation was not reparation but a return to the original obligation, that is cessation of the illegal conduct. However, it was held that since the primary obligation was no longer in force (in the sense that the obligation to keep the agents in the Pacific island concerned expired under the initial agreement on 22 July 1989), an order for cessation of the illegal conduct could serve no purpose.[161]

The question of the appropriate reparation for expropriation was discussed in several cases. In the BP case,[162] the tribunal emphasised that there was > no explicit support for the proposition that specific performance, and even less so restitutio in integrum, are remedies of public international law available at the option of a party suffering a wrongful breach by a co-contracting party . . . the responsibility incurred by the defaulting party for breach of an obligation to perform a contractual undertaking is a duty to pay damages . . . the concept of restitutio in integrum has been employed merely as a vehicle for establishing the amount of damages.[163]

However, in the Texaco case,[164] which similarly involved Libyan nationalisation of oil concessions, the arbitrator held that restitution in kind under international law (and indeed under Libyan law) constituted [156] See also ILC Commentary 2001, p. 237.

[157] 82 ILR, p. 499. [158] Ibid., p. 571.
[159] See e.g. Yearbook of the ILC, 1981, vol. II, part 1, pp. 79 ff. [160] 82 ILR, p. 572.
[161] Ibid., p. 573. Note that article 30 of the ILC Articles provides that the injured state is entitled, where appropriate, to obtain assurances or guarantees of non-repetition of the wrongful act.
[162] 53 ILR, p. 297. This concerned the expropriation by Libya of BP oil concessions.
[163] Ibid., p. 347. [164] 17 ILM, 1978, p. 1; 53 ILR, p. 389.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

> the normal sanction for non-performance of contractual obligations and that it is inapplicable only to the extent that restoration of the status quo ante is impossible.[165]

This is an approach that in political terms, particularly in international contract cases, is unlikely to prove acceptable to states since it appears a violation of sovereignty. The problems, indeed, of enforcing such restitution awards against a recalcitrant state may be imagined.[166]

The International Court noted in the Gabčíkovo–Nagymaros Project (Hungary/Slovakia) case that it was a 'well-established rule of international law that an injured state is entitled to obtain compensation from the state which has committed an internationally wrongful act for the damage caused by it'.[167] Article 36(1) provides that in so far as damage caused by an internationally wrongful act is not made good by restitution, the state responsible is under an obligation to give compensation.[168] Article 36(2) states that the compensation to be provided shall cover any financially assessable damage including loss of profits in so far as this is established.[169] The aim is to deal with economic losses actually caused. Punitive or exemplary damages go beyond the concept of reparation as such[170] and were indeed held in Velásquez Rodriguéz v. Honduras

[165] 17 ILM, 1978, p. 36; 53 ILR, pp. 507–8. In fact the parties settled the dispute by Libya supplying $152 million worth of crude oil, 17 ILM, 1998, p. 2.

[166] These points were explained by the arbitrator in the Liamco case, 20 ILM, 1981, pp. 1, 63–4; 62 ILR, pp. 141, 198. See also the Aminoil case, 21 ILM, 1982, p. 976; 66 ILR, p. 519. See further e.g. A. Fatouros, 'International Law and the International Contract', 74 AJIL, 1980, p. 134. The issue of compensation for expropriated property is discussed further below, p. 827.

[167] ICJ Reports, 1997, pp. 7, 81; 116 ILR, p. 1. See also the Construction of a Wall case, ICJ Reports, 2004, pp. 136, 198; 129 ILR, pp. 37, 117–18, and the Genocide Convention (Bosnia v. Serbia) case, ICJ Reports, 2007, para. 460. In the latter case, the Court referred to article 36.

[168] In the Gabčíkovo–Nagymaros Project case, ICJ Reports, 1997, pp. 7, 81; 116 ILR, p. 1, the Court held that both states were entitled to claim and obliged to provide compensation. Accordingly, the parties were called upon to renounce or cancel all financial claims and counter-claims. See more generally D. Shelton, Remedies in International Human Rights Law, 2nd edn, Oxford, 2005, and C. N. Brower and J. D. Brueschke, The Iran–United States Claims Tribunal, The Hague, 1998, chapters 14–18.

[169] See ILC Commentary 2001, p. 243. See also the Report of the International Law Commission on the Work of its Forty-Fifth Session, A/48/10, p. 185.

[170] See generally Whiteman, Damages, and Aréchaga, 'International Responsibility', p. 571. See also N. Jorgensen, 'A Reappraisal of Punitive Damages in International Law', 68 BYIL, 1997, p. 247; Yearbook of the ILC, 1956, vol. II, pp. 211–12, and Annacker, 'Part Two', pp. 225 ff.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

(Compensation) to be a principle 'not applicable in international law at this time'.[171]

Compensation is usually assessed on the basis of the 'fair market value' of the property lost, although the method used to calculate this may depend upon the type of property involved.[172] Loss of profits may also be claimed where, for example, there has been interference with use and enjoyment or unlawful taking of income-producing property or in some cases with regard to loss of future income.[173]

Damage includes both material and non-material (or moral) damage.[174] Monetary compensation may thus be paid for individual pain and suffering and insults. In the I'm Alone[175] case, for example, a sum of $25,000 was suggested as recompense for the indignity suffered by Canada, in having a ship registered in Montreal unlawfully sunk. A further example of this is provided by the France–New Zealand Agreement of 9 July 1986, concerning the sinking of the vessel Rainbow Warrior by French agents in New Zealand, the second paragraph of which provided for France to pay the sum of $7 million as compensation to New Zealand for 'all the damage which it has suffered'.[176] It is clear from the context that it covered more than material damage.[177] In the subsequent arbitration in 1990, the Tribunal declared that > an order for the payment of monetary compensation can be made in respect of the breach of international obligations involving . . . serious moral and legal damage, even though there is no material damage.[178]

However, the Tribunal declined to make an order for monetary compensation, primarily since New Zealand was seeking alternative remedies.[179]

Satisfaction constitutes a third form of reparation. This relates to non-monetary compensation and would include official apologies, the punishment of guilty minor officials or the formal acknowledgement of the unlawful character of an act.[180] The Tribunal in the Rainbow Warrior

[171] Inter-American Court of Human Rights, 1989, Series C, No. 7, pp. 34, 52; 95 ILR, p. 306.

[172] See on this the analysis in the ILC Commentary 2001, pp. 255 ff. See also the UNCITRAL Arbitral Tribunal decision of 14 March 2003 in CME Czech Republic BV v. The Czech Republic, Final Award.

[173] Ibid., pp. 260 ff. [174] See article 31(2).

[175] 3 RIAA, p. 1609 (1935); 7 AD, p. 203. [176] 74 ILR, pp. 241, 274.

[177] See the Arbitral Tribunal in the Rainbow Warrior case, 82 ILR, pp. 499, 574.

[178] 82 ILR, pp. 499, 575. [179] Ibid.

[180] See Annacker, 'Part Two', pp. 230 ff.; C. Barthe, 'Réflexions sur la Satisfaction en Droit International', 49 AFDI, 2003, p. 105; de Aréchaga, 'International Responsibility', p. 572; arbitration[181] pointed to the long-established practice of states and international courts of using satisfaction as a remedy for the breach of an international obligation, particularly where moral or legal damage had been done directly to the state. In the circumstances of the case, it concluded that the public condemnation of France for its breaches of treaty obligations to New Zealand made by the Tribunal constituted 'appropriate satisfaction'.[182] The Tribunal also made an interesting 'Recommendation' that the two states concerned establish a fund to promote close relations between their respective citizens and additionally recommended that the French government 'make an initial contribution equivalent to $2 million to that fund'.[183]

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

In some cases, a party to a dispute will simply seek a declaration that the activity complained of is illegal.[184] In territorial disputes, for example, such declarations may be of particular significance. The International Court, however, adopted a narrow view of the Australian submissions in the Nuclear Tests case,[185] an approach that was the subject of a vigorous dissenting opinion.[186] Article 37 of the ILC Articles provides that a state responsible for a wrongful act is obliged to give satisfaction for the injury thereby caused in so far as it cannot be made good by restitution or compensation. Satisfaction may consist of an acknowledgement of the breach, an expression of regret, a formal apology or another appropriate modality.[187] An example of such another modality might be an assurance or guarantee of non-repetition.[188]

D. W. Bowett, 'Treaties and State Responsibility' in Mélanges Virally, Paris, 1991, pp. 137, 144; and Schwarzenberger, International Law, p. 653. See also the I'm Alone case, 3 RIAA, pp. 1609, 1618 (1935); 7 AD, p. 206 and the Corfu Channel case, ICJ Reports, 1949, pp. 4, 35; 16 AD, pp. 155, 167.

[181] 82 ILR, p. 499. [182] 82 ILR, p. 577.

[183] Ibid., p. 578. See also the Genocide Convention (Bosnia v. Serbia), ICJ Reports, 2007, para. 463.

[184] See e.g. Certain German Interests in Polish Upper Silesia, PCIJ, Series A, No. 7, p. 18 (1926) and the Corfu Channel case, ICJ Reports, 1949, pp. 4, 35; 16 AD, p. 155. Note also that under article 41 of the European Convention on Human Rights, 1950, the European Court of Human Rights may award 'just satisfaction', which often takes the form of a declaration by the Court that a violation of the Convention has taken place: see e.g. the Neumeister case, European Court of Human Rights, Series A, No. 17 (1974); 41 ILR, p. 316. See also the Pauwels case, ibid., No. 135 (1989); the Lamy case, ibid., No. 151 (1989) and the Huber case, ibid., No. 188 (1990).

[185] ICJ Reports, 1974, p. 253; 57 ILR, p. 398.

[186] ICJ Reports, 1974, pp. 312–19; 57 ILR, p. 457.

[187] See ILC Commentary 2001, p. 263. Satisfaction is not to be disproportionate to the injury and not in a form which is humiliating to the responsible state, article 37(3).

[188] See above, p. 800.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

Serious breaches of peremptory norms (jus cogens)

One of the major debates taking place with regard to state responsibility concerns the question of international crimes. A distinction was drawn in article 19 of the ILC Draft Articles 1996 between international crimes and international delicts within the context of internationally unlawful acts. It was provided that an internationally wrongful act which results from the breach by a state of an international obligation so essential for the protection of fundamental interests of the international community that its breach was recognised as a crime by that community as a whole constitutes an international crime. All other internationally wrongful acts were termed international delicts.[189] Examples of such international crimes provided were aggression, the establishment or maintenance by force of colonial domination, slavery, genocide, apartheid and massive pollution of the atmosphere or of the seas. However, the question as to whether states can be criminally responsible has been highly controversial.[190] Some have argued that the concept is of no legal value and cannot be justified in principle, not least because the problem of exacting penal sanctions from states, while in principle possible, could only be creative of instability.[191] Others argued that, particularly since 1945, the attitude towards certain crimes by states has altered so as to bring them within the realm of international law.[192] The Rapporteur in his commentary to draft article 19 pointed to three specific changes since 1945 in this context to justify its inclusion: first, the development of the concept of jus cogens as a set of principles from which no derogation is permitted;[193] secondly, the rise of individual criminal responsibility directly under international law; and thirdly, the UN Charter and its provision for enforcement action against a state in the event of threats to or breaches of the peace or acts of [189] See M. Mohr, 'The ILC's Distinction between "International Crimes" and "International Delicts" and Its Implications' in Spinedi and Simma, UN Codification, p. 115, and K. Marek, 'Criminalising State Responsibility', 14 Revue Belge de Droit International, 1978–9, p. 460.

[190] See e.g. Oppenheim's International Law, pp. 533 ff. See also G. Gilbert, 'The Criminal Responsibility of States', 39 ICLQ, 1990, p. 345, and N. Jorgensen, The Responsibility of States for International Crimes, Oxford, 2000. As to individual criminal responsibility, see above, chapter 8.

[191] See e.g. I. Brownlie, International Law and the Use of Force by States, Oxford, 1963, pp. 150–4.

[192] See e.g. de Aréchaga, 'International Law'.

[193] See e.g. article 53 of the Vienna Convention on the Law of Treaties, 1969 and below, p. 944.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

aggression.[194] However, the ILC changed its approach[195] in the light of the controversial nature of the suggestion and the Articles as finally approved in 2001 omit any mention of international crimes of states, but rather seek to focus upon the particular consequences flowing from a breach of obligations erga omnes and of peremptory norms (jus cogens).[196]

Article 41 provides that states are under a duty to co-operate to bring to an end, through lawful means, any serious breach[197] by a state of an obligation arising under a peremptory norm of international law[198] and not to recognise as lawful any such situation.[199]

Diplomatic protection and nationality of claims[200]

The doctrine of state responsibility with regard to injuries to nationals rests upon twin pillars, the attribution to one state of the unlawful acts and omissions of its officials and its organs (legislative, judicial and executive) and the capacity of the other state to adopt the claim of the injured party. Indeed article 44 of the ILC Articles provides that the responsibility of a state may not be invoked if the claim is not brought in accordance with any applicable rule relating to nationality of claims.[201]

Nationality is the link between the individual and his or her state as regards particular benefits and obligations. It is also the vital link between the [194] Yearbook of the ILC, 1976, vol. II, pp. 102–5. Note also the Report of the International Law Commission, 1994, A/49/10, pp. 329 ff. and ibid., 1995, A/50/10, pp. 93 ff.

[195] See Crawford, Articles, pp. 17 ff. for a critical analysis of draft article 19 and a discussion of subsequent developments.

[196] See above, chapter 3, p. 123.

[197] Article 40(2) describes a breach as serious if it involves a gross or systematic failure by the responsible state to fulfil the obligation.

[198] Examples given of peremptory norms are the prohibitions of aggression, slavery and the slave trade, genocide, racial discrimination and apartheid, and torture, and the principle of self-determination: see ILC Commentary 2001, pp. 283–4.

[199] See, as to examples of non-recognition, above, chapter 9, p. 468. Article 41(3) is in the form of a saving clause, providing that the article is without prejudice to other consequences referred to in Part Two of the Articles and to such further consequences that such a breach may have under international law.

[200] See e.g. Oppenheim's International Law, p. 511; Nguyen Quoc Dinh et al., Droit International Public, p. 808; Brownlie, Principles, pp. 459 ff., and A. Vermeer-Künzli, 'A Matter of Interest: Diplomatic Protection and State Responsibility Erga Omnes', 56 ICLQ, 2007, p. 553. See also F. Orrego Vicuña, 'Interim Report on the Changing Law of Nationality of Claims', International Law Association, Report of the Sixty-Ninth Conference, London, 2000, p. 631.

[201] See ILC Commentary 2001, p. 304.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

individual and the benefits of international law. Although international law is now moving to a stage whereby individuals may acquire rights free from the interposition of the state, the basic proposition remains that in a state-oriented world system, it is only through the medium of the state that the individual may obtain the full range of benefits available under international law, and nationality is the key.[202]

The principle of diplomatic protection originally developed in the context of the treatment by a state of foreign nationals. However, the International Court has pointed out that, 'Owing to the substantive development of international law over recent decades in respect of the rights it accords to individuals, the scope ratione materiae of diplomatic protection, originally limited to alleged violations of the minimum standard of treatment of aliens, has subsequently widened to include, inter alia, internationally guaranteed human rights'.[203]

The International Law Commission adopted Draft Articles on Diplomatic Protection in 2006.[204] Article 1 provides that, for the purposes of the draft articles, > diplomatic protection consists of the invocation by a state, through diplomatic action or other means of peaceful settlement, of the responsibility of another state for an injury caused by an internationally wrongful act of that state to a natural or legal person that is a national of the former state with a view to the implementation of such responsibility.[205]

A state is under a duty to protect its nationals and it may take up their claims against other states. Diplomatic protection includes, in a broad sense, consular action, negotiation, mediation, judicial and arbitral proceedings, reprisals, a retort, severance of diplomatic relations, and economic pressures.[206] There is under international law, however, no obligation for states to provide diplomatic protection for their nationals

[202] See further on nationality, above, chapter 12, p. 659. Note also the claim for reparations made by Croatia in its application of 2 July 1999 to the International Court against Yugoslavia in the Application of the Genocide Convention case both on behalf of the state and 'as parens patriae for its citizens', Application, pp. 20–1.

[203] Diallo (Guinea v. Democratic Republic of the Congo), ICJ Reports, 2007, para. 39.

[204] See Report of the ILC on its 58th Session, A/61/10, 2006, p. 13.

[205] See the Diallo (Guinea v. Democratic Republic of the Congo) case, ICJ Reports, 2007, para. 39, where the Court noted that article 1 reflected customary law.

[206] Kaunda v. President of South Africa CCT 23/04, [2004] ZACC 5, paras. 26–7 and Van Zyl v. Government of RSA [2007] SCA 109 (RSA), para. 1.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

abroad,[207] although it can be said that nationals have a right to request their government to consider diplomatic protection and that government is under a duty to consider that request rationally.[208]

In addition, once a state does this, the claim then becomes that of the state. This is a result of the historical reluctance to permit individuals the right in international law to prosecute claims against foreign countries, for reasons relating to state sovereignty and non-interference in internal affairs.

This basic principle was elaborated in the Mavrommatis Palestine Concessions case.[209] The Permanent Court of International Justice pointed out that:

> By taking up the case of one of its subjects and by resorting to diplomatic action or international judicial proceedings on his behalf, a state is in reality asserting its own rights, its right to ensure, in the person of its subjects, respect for the rules of international law . . .

Once a state has taken up a case on behalf of one of its subjects before an international tribunal, in the eyes of the latter the state is sole claimant.[210] It follows that the exercise of diplomatic protection cannot be regarded as intervention contrary to international law by the state concerned. Coupled with this right of the state is the constraint that a state may in principle adopt the claims only of its own nationals. Diplomatic protection may not extend to the adoption of claims of foreign subjects,[211] although it has been suggested 'as an exercise in progressive development of the law' that a state [207] See e.g. HMHK v. Netherlands 94 ILR, p. 342 and Comercial F SA v. Council of Ministers 88 ILR, p. 691. See also Kaunda v. President of South Africa CCT 23/04, [2004] ZACC 5, paras. 29 and 34, noting that diplomatic protection is not recognised in international law as a human right, but a prerogative of the state to be exercised at its discretion (per Chief Justice Chaskalson).

[208] See Van Zyl v. Government of RSA [2007] SCA 109 (RSA), para. 6.

[209] PCIJ, Series A, No. 2, 1924, p. 12. See the Panevezys–Saldutiskis case, PCIJ, Series A/B, No. 76; 9 AD, p. 308. See also Vattel, who noted that 'whoever ill-treats a citizen indirectly injures the state, which must protect that citizen', The Law of Nations, 1916 trans., p. 136.

[210] See e.g. Lonrho Exports Ltd v. ECGD [1996] 4 All ER 673, 687; 108 ILR, p. 596.

[211] However, note article 20 of the European Community Treaty, under which every person holding the nationality of a member state (and thus a citizen of the European Union under article 17) is entitled to receive diplomatic protection by the diplomatic or consular authority of any member state on the same conditions as nationals of that state when in the territory of a third state where the country of his or her nationality is not represented.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

may adopt the claim of a stateless person or refugee who at the dates of the injury and presentation of the claim is lawfully and habitually resident in that state.[212] Such diplomatic protection is not a right of the national concerned, but a right of the state which it may or may not choose to exercise.[213] It is not a duty incumbent upon the state under international law. As the Court noted in the Barcelona Traction case, > within the limits prescribed by international law, a state may exercise diplomatic protection by whatever means and to whatever extent it thinks fit, for it is its own right that the state is asserting. Should the natural or legal person on whose behalf it is acting consider that their rights are not adequately protected, they have no remedy in international law.[214]

The UK takes the view that the taking up of a claim against a foreign state is a matter within the prerogative of the Crown, but various principles are outlined in its publication, 'Rules regarding the Taking up of International Claims by Her Majesty's Government', stated to be based on international law.[215] This distinguishes between formal claims and informal representations. In the former case, Rule VIII provides that, 'If, in exhausting any municipal remedies, the claimant has met with prejudice or obstruction, which are a denial of justice, HMG [Her Majesty's Government] may intervene on his behalf in order to secure justice.' In the latter case, the UK will consider making representations if, when all legal remedies have been exhausted, the British national has evidence of a miscarriage or denial of justice. This may apply to cases where fundamental violations of the national's human rights had demonstrably altered the course of justice. The UK has also stated that it would consider making [212] See article 8 of the Draft Articles on Diplomatic Protection. In R v. Al-Rawi [2006] EWCA Civ 1279, para. 89, the Court of Appeal held that there was no basis for accepting that non-British nationals enjoyed an Abbasi expectation that the UK government would consider making representations to a foreign state on their behalf. Article 8 was not regarded as part of customary international law, ibid., paras. 118–20. Note the special position of a national working for an international organisation, where there may be a danger to the independence of the official where diplomatic protection is exercised: see e.g. the Reparation case, ICJ Reports, 1949, pp. 174, 183.

[213] See e.g. the Interhandel case, ICJ Reports, 1957, pp. 6, 27; Administrative Decision No. V 7 RIAA, p. 119; 2 AD, pp. 185, 191 and US v. Dulles 222 F.2d 390. See also DUSPIL, 1973, pp. 332–4.

[214] ICJ Reports, 1970, pp. 3, 44; 46 ILR, p. 178.

[215] See 37 ICLQ, 1988, p. 1006 and UKMIL, 70 BYIL, 1999, p. 526.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

direct representations to third governments where it is believed that they were in breach of their international obligations.[216]

The issue was discussed by the Court of Appeal in Abbasi v. Secretary of State.[217] It was noted that there was no authority which supported the imposition of an enforceable duty on the UK authorities to protect its citizens; however, the Foreign Office had a discretion whether to exercise the right it had to protect British citizens and had indicated what a citizen may expect of it through, for example, the Rules regarding the Taking up of International Claims. The Court concluded that, in view of the Rules and official statements made,[218] there was a 'clear acceptance by the government of a role in relation to protecting the rights of British citizens abroad, where there is evidence of miscarriage or denial of justice'.[219] While the expectations raised by such Rules and statements were limited and the discretion wide, there was no reason why any decision or inaction by the government should not be judicially reviewable under English law, if it could be shown that such decision or inaction were irrational or contrary to legitimate expectation. It might thus be said that there existed an obligation to consider the position of any particular British citizen and consider the extent to which some action might be taken on his behalf.[220] This legitimate expectation of the citizen was that his or her request would be 'considered', and that in that consideration 'all relevant factors will be thrown into the balance'.[221] The Court held that the 'extreme case' where judicial review would lie in relation to diplomatic protection would be if the Foreign and Commonwealth Office were, contrary to its stated practice, to refuse even to consider whether to make diplomatic representations on behalf of a subject whose fundamental rights were being violated.[222]

The scope of a state to extend its nationality[223] to whomsoever it wishes is unlimited, except perhaps in so far as it affects other states. Article 1 of the Hague Convention on Certain Questions Relating to the Conflict of Nationality Laws, 1930, for example, provides that,

[216] UKMIL, 70 BYIL, 1999, pp. 528–9.
[217] [2002] EWCA Civ. 1598; 126 ILR, p. 685.
[218] See UKMIL, 70 BYIL, 1999, pp. 528–9.
[219] [2002] EWCA Civ. 1598, para. 92.
[220] Ibid., para. 106.
[221] Ibid., paras. 98–9.
[222] Ibid., para. 104. The Court noted that, 'In such, unlikely, circumstances we consider that it would be appropriate for the court to make a mandatory order to the Foreign Secretary to give due consideration to the applicant's case', ibid.
[223] Whether acquired by birth, descent, succession of states, naturalisation, or in another manner not inconsistent with international law: see article 4 of the ILC Draft Articles on Diplomatic Protection.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

> It is for each state to determine under its own law who are its nationals. This law shall be recognised by other states in so far as it is consistent with international conventions, international custom, and the principles of law generally recognised with regard to nationality . . . [224]

In the Nottebohm case,[225] the International Court of Justice decided that only where there existed a genuine link between the claimant state and its national could the right of diplomatic protection arise. However, the facts of that case are critical to understanding the pertinent legal proposition. The Government of Liechtenstein instituted proceedings claiming restitution and compensation for Nottebohm against Guatemala for acts of the latter which were alleged to be contrary to international law. Guatemala replied that Nottebohm's right to Liechtenstein nationality and thus its diplomatic protection was questionable. The person in question was born in Germany in 1881 and, still a German national, applied for naturalisation in Liechtenstein in 1939. The point was, however, that since 1905 (and until 1943 when he was deported as a result of war measures) Nottebohm had been permanently resident in Guatemala and had carried on his business from there. The Court noted that Liechtenstein was entirely free, as was every state, to establish the rules necessary for the acquisition of its nationality, but the crux of the matter was whether Guatemala was obliged to recognise the grant of Liechtenstein nationality. The exercise of diplomatic protection by a state regarding one of its nationals brought the whole issue of nationality out of the sphere of domestic jurisdiction and onto the plane of international law.[226] The Court emphasised that, according to state practice, nationality was a legal manifestation of the link between the person and the state granting nationality and the recognition [224] See Nationality Decrees in Tunis and Morocco, PCIJ Reports, 1923, Series B, No. 4, p. 24. See also article 3(2) of the European Convention on Nationality, 1997. This would include the rules of international human rights law: see e.g. Proposed Amendments to the Naturalisation Provision of the Political Constitution of Costa Rica, Inter-American Court of Human Rights, 1984, Series A, No. 4, para. 38; 79 ILR, p. 282.

[225] ICJ Reports, 1955, p. 4; 22 ILR, p. 349. The Court emphasised that to exercise protection, e.g. by applying to the Court, was to place oneself on the plane of international law, ibid., p. 16. See the Nationality Decrees in Tunis and Morocco case, PCIJ, Series B, No. 4, 1923, pp. 7, 21; 2 AD, p. 349, where it was noted that while questions of nationality were in principle within the domestic jurisdiction of states, the right of a state to use its discretion was limited by obligations undertaken towards other states. See also the Flegenheimer claim, 14 RIAA, p. 327 (1958); 25 ILR, p. 91, and article 1 of the 1930 Hague Convention on Nationality. See further on nationality and international law, above, chapter 12, p. 659.

[226] ICJ Reports, 1955, pp. 20–1; 22 ILR, p. 357.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

that the person was more closely connected with that state than with any other.[227]

Having brought out these concepts, the Court emphasised the tenuous nature of Nottebohm's links with Liechtenstein and the strength of his connection with Guatemala. Nottebohm had spent only a very short period of time in Liechtenstein and one of his brothers lived in Vaduz. Beyond that and the formal naturalisation process, there were no other links with that state. On the other hand, he had lived in Guatemala for some thirty years and had returned there upon obtaining his papers from Vaduz. Since the Liechtenstein nationality 'was granted without regard to the concept . . . adopted in international relations' in the absence of any genuine connection, the Court held that Liechtenstein was not able to extend its diplomatic protection to Nottebohm as regards Guatemala.[228] The case has been subject to criticism relating to the use of the doctrine of 'genuine connection' by the Court. The doctrine had until then been utilised with regard to the problems of dual nationality, so as to enable a decision to be made on whether one national state may sue the other on behalf of the particular national. Its extension to the issue of diplomatic protection appeared to be a new move altogether.[229]

The ILC in its Draft Articles on Diplomatic Protection adopted in 2006 did not require establishment of a genuine link as a requirement of nationality[230] and the Commentary argues that the Nottebohm case should be limited to its facts alone.[231]

The nationality must exist at the date of the injury, and should continue until at least the date of the formal presentation of the claim, although this latter point may depend upon a variety of other facts, for example any agreement between the contending states as regards the claim.[232]

[227] ICJ Reports, 1955, p. 23; 22 ILR, p. 359.

[228] ICJ Reports, 1955, pp. 25–6; 22 ILR, p. 362.

[229] See generally, Brownlie, Principles, chapter 19, and R. Y. Jennings, 'General Course on Principles of International Law', 121 HR, 1967, pp. 323, 459.

[230] Article 4 provides that a state of nationality means a state whose nationality that person has acquired, in accordance with the law of that state, by birth, descent, naturalisation, succession of states or in any other manner, not inconsistent with international law.

[231] Report of the ILC on its 58th Session, A/61/10, 2006, pp. 32–3. See also the Flegenheimer claim, 14 RIAA, p. 327 (1958); 25 ILR, p. 91.

[232] See e.g. Borchard, Diplomatic Protection, pp. 660 ff.; Whiteman, Digest, vol. VIII, 1967, pp. 1243–7, and the Nottebohm case, ICJ Reports, 1955, p. 4; 22 ILR, p. 349. See also the view of the US State Department that it has consistently declined to espouse claims which have not been continuously owned by US nationals: see 76 AJIL, 1982, pp. 836–9, and the Rules regarding International Claims issued by the UK Foreign and Commonwealth Office, 1985, to the same effect: see 37 ICLQ, 1988, p. 1006. See also I. Sinclair, 'Nationality

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

Where an individual possesses dual or multiple nationality, any state of which he is a national may adopt a claim of his against a third state[233] and there appears no need to establish a genuine link between the state of nationality and the dual or multiple national.[234] In the case of more than one state of nationality, the rule appears to be that the state with which he has the more effective connection may be able to espouse his claim as against the other state. In the Mergé case,[235] it was emphasised that the principle based on the sovereign equality of states, which excludes diplomatic protection in the case of dual nationality, must yield before the principle of effective nationality whenever such nationality is that of the claimant state. However, where such predominance is not proved, there would be no such yielding. In other words, the test for permitting protection by a state of a national against another state of which he is also a national is the test of effectiveness. This approach was reaffirmed by the Iran–US Claims Tribunal, where the Full Tribunal held that it had jurisdiction over claims against Iran by a dual national when the 'dominant and effective nationality' at the relevant time was American.[236] Article 7 of the ILC Draft Articles on Diplomatic Protection provides that a state of nationality may not exercise diplomatic protection in respect of a person against a state of which the person is also a national unless the nationality of the former state is predominant, both at the time of the injury and at the date of the official presentation of the claim.

As far as a corporation is concerned, it appears that there must be some tangible link between it and the state seeking to espouse its claim. Different of Claims: British Practice', 27 BYIL, 1950, p. 125. Note that article 5(2) of the ILC Draft Articles provides that protection may be offered even where the person was not a national at the date of the injury, provided that the person had the nationality of a predecessor state or lost his or her previous nationality and acquired, for a reason unrelated to the bringing of the claim, the nationality of the former state in a manner not inconsistent with international law.

233 14 RIAA, p. 236 (1955); 22 ILR, p. 443. See also the Canevaro case, 11 RIAA, p. 397 (1912). See article 6(1) of the ILC Draft Articles on Diplomatic Protection. See also article 3 of the Hague Convention on Certain Questions Relating to the Conflict of Nationality Laws, 1930.

234 See e.g. the Salem case, 2 RIAA, p. 1161 (1932); 6 AD, p. 188; the Mergé claim, 14 RIAA, p. 236 (1955); 22 ILR, p. 443 and Dallal v. Iran 3 Iran–US CTR, 1983, p. 23.

235 14 RIAA, p. 236 (1955); 22 ILR, p. 443. See also the Canevaro case, 11 RIAA, p. 397 (1912). Cf. the Salem case, 2 RIAA, p. 1161 (1932); 6 AD, p. 188.

236 Islamic Republic of Iran v. USA, Case No. A/18, 5 Iran–US CTR, p. 251; 75 ILR, p. 176; Esphahanian v. Bank Tejarat 2 Iran–US CTR, p. 157; 72 ILR, p. 478, and Malek v. Islamic Republic of Iran 19 Iran–US CTR, p. 48. See also Saghi v. Islamic Republic of Iran 87 AJIL, 1993, p. 447 and the decision of the Canadian Supreme Court in Schavernoch v. Foreign Claims Commission 1 SCR 1092 (1982); 90 ILR, p. 220.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

cases have pointed to various factors, ranging from incorporation of the company in the particular state to the maintenance of the administrative centre of the company in the state and the existence of substantial holdings by nationals in the company.[237]

The Court in the Barcelona Traction case[238] remarked that the traditional rule gave the right of diplomatic protection of a corporation to the state under the laws of which it is incorporated and in whose territory it has its registered office. Any application of the Nottebohm doctrine of the 'genuine connection' was rejected as having no general acceptance. Nevertheless, it remains true that some meaningful link must bind the state to the company which seeks its protection. The position as regards the shareholders in a company was discussed in that case. It concerned a dispute between Belgium and Spain relating to a company established in 1911 in Canada, which was involved in the production of electricity in Spain and the majority of whose shares were owned by Belgian nationals. After the Second World War, the Spanish authorities took a number of financial measures which resulted in harm to the company, and in 1948 it was declared bankrupt. The case concerned a Belgian claim in respect of injury to the shareholders, who were Belgian nationals, because of the steps that Spain had adopted. Spain replied by denying that Belgium had any standing in the case since the injury had been suffered by the company and not the shareholders.

The Court rejected the Belgian claim on the grounds that it did not have a legal interest in the matter. Although shareholders may suffer if wrong is done to a company, it is only the rights of the latter that have been infringed and thus entitle it to institute action. If, on the other hand (as did not happen here), the direct rights of the shareholders were affected, for example as regards dividends, then they would have an independent right of action; but otherwise, only if the company legally ceased to exist. The Court emphasised that the general rule of international law stated that where an unlawful act was committed against a company representing foreign capital, only the national state of the company could sue. In this case Canada had chosen not to intervene in the dispute. To accept the idea of the diplomatic protection of shareholders would, in the opinion of the International Court of Justice, result in the creation of an atmosphere of confusion and insecurity in economic relations especially since the shares [237] See e.g. Brownlie, Principles, pp. 463 ff., and Schwarzenberger, International Law, pp. 387–412. See also Sola Tiles Inc. v. Islamic Republic of Iran 83 ILR, p. 460.

[238] ICJ Reports, 1970, pp. 3, 42; 46 ILR, pp. 178, 216.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

of international companies are 'widely scattered and frequently change hands'.[239]

Article 9 of the ILC Draft Articles on Diplomatic Protection provides that the nationality of a corporation is the state where it was incorporated, although when the corporation is controlled by nationals of another state or states and has no substantial business activities in the state of incorporation, and the seat of management and the financial control of the corporation are both located in another state, that state shall be regarded as the state of nationality. Article 11 provides that the state of nationality of shareholders shall not be entitled to provide diplomatic protection to shareholders where the injury is to the corporation, unless the corporation has ceased to exist according to the law of the state of incorporation for a reason unrelated to the injury; or the corporation had, at the date of injury, the nationality of the state alleged to be responsible for causing the injury, and incorporation in that state was required by it as a precondition for doing business there.[240]

The International Court returned to the question of corporations in the Diallo case,[241] noting that,

> What matters, from the point of view of international law, is to determine whether or not these have a legal personality independent of their members. Conferring independent corporate personality on a company implies granting it rights over its own property, rights which it alone is capable of protecting. As a result, only the state of nationality may exercise diplomatic protection on behalf of the company when its rights are injured by a wrongful act of another state. In determining whether a company possesses independent and distinct legal personality, international law looks to the rules of the relevant domestic law.[242]

In so far as the shareholders of such corporations in the context of diplomatic protection were concerned, the Court emphasised that,

> The exercise by a state of diplomatic protection on behalf of a natural or legal person, who is associé or shareholder, having its nationality, seeks to engage the responsibility of another state for an injury caused to that person by an internationally wrongful act committed by that state. Ultimately, this is no

[239] ICJ Reports, 1970, p. 49; 46 ILR, p. 223. See also the Separate Opinion of Judge Oda, the Elettronica Sicula (US v. Italy) case, ICJ Reports, 1989, pp. 15, 84; 84 ILR, pp. 311, 390.

[240] However, where the injury is a direct one to shareholders as distinct from the corporation, their state of nationality is entitled to exercise diplomatic protection in respect of them: see article 12.

[241] ICJ Reports, 2007, paras. 60 ff.

[242] Ibid., para. 61.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

> more than the diplomatic protection of a natural or legal person as defined by Article 1 of the ILC draft Articles; what amounts to the internationally wrongful act, in the case of associés or shareholders, is the violation by the respondent state of their direct rights in relation to a legal person, direct rights that are defined by the domestic law of that state, as accepted by both Parties, moreover. On this basis, diplomatic protection of the direct rights of associés of a SPRL or shareholders of a public limited company is not to be regarded as an exception to the general legal régime of diplomatic protection for natural or legal persons, as derived from customary international law.[243]

The United Kingdom, according to the set of Rules regarding the Taking up of International Claims produced by the Foreign Office in 1985,[244] may intervene in Barcelona Traction situations where a national has an interest as a shareholder or otherwise, and the company is defunct, although this is regarded as an exceptional instance. The United Kingdom may also intervene where it is the national state of the company that actively wrongs the company in which a United Kingdom national has an interest as a shareholder or in some other respect; otherwise the UK would normally take up such a claim only in concert with the government of the state of incorporation of the company.[245] Further, practice varies as between states[246] and under different treaty regimes.[247]

[243] Ibid., para. 64. The Court also examined whether the general rule that where an unlawful act was committed against a foreign company only the national state of the company could sue still remained and concluded that it did, ibid., paras. 87 ff.

[244] See above, p. 811. The increase in the number of bilateral investment treaties in the 1970s may be partly explained as the response to the post-Barcelona Traction need to protect shareholders. See e.g. M. Sornarajah, 'State Responsibility and Bilateral Investment Treaties', 20 Journal of World Trade Law, 1986, pp. 79, 87. Note that in the Diallo case, ICJ Reports, 2007, para. 88, the Court noted that questions as to the rights of companies and their shareholders were in contemporary international law more a matter for bilateral and multilateral treaties for the protection of foreign investments and that the role of diplomatic protection 'had somewhat faded'.

[245] See also the position adopted by the UK in the III Finance Ltd v. Aegis Consumer Finance Inc. litigation before the US courts to the effect that entities incorporated in any territory for which the UK is internationally responsible are the UK citizens for the purposes of the US federal alienage jurisdiction statute in question, UKMIL, 71 BYIL, 2000, pp. 552 ff., and similarly in the Chase Manhattan Bank v. Traffic Stream (BVI) Infrastructure Ltd litigation, UKMIL, 72 BYIL, 2001, p. 603.

[246] See e.g. W. K. Geck, 'Diplomatic Protection' in Encyclopedia of Public International Law (ed. R. Bernhardt), Amsterdam, 1992, vol. X, p. 1053.

[247] See e.g. the Algiers Declaration concerning the settlement of US–Iranian claims, 20 ILR, 1981, p. 230; the Convention on the Settlement of Investment Disputes, 1965, article 25 and Third US Restatement of Foreign Relations Law, Washington, 1987, vol. I, pp. 127–8.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

The position with regard to ships is rather different. The International Tribunal for the Law of the Sea in M/V Saiga (No. 2) emphasised that under the Law of the Sea Convention, 1982 it is the flag state that bears the rights and obligations with regard to the ship itself so that 'the ship, every thing on it and every person involved or interested in its obligations are treated as an entity linked to the flag state. The nationalities of these persons are not relevant.'[248]

The exhaustion of local remedies[249]

Customary international law provides that before international proceedings are instituted or claims or representations made, the remedies provided by the local state should have been exhausted.[250] There is a theoretical dispute as to whether the principle of exhaustion of local remedies is a substantive or procedural rule or some form of hybrid concept,[251] but the purpose of the rule is both to enable the state to have an opportunity to redress the wrong that has occurred within its own legal order and to reduce the number of international claims that might be brought. Another factor, of course, is the respect that is to be accorded to the sovereignty and jurisdiction of foreign states by not pre-empting the operation of their legal systems. Article 44 of the ILC Articles on State Responsibility provides that the responsibility of a state may not be

[248] 120 ILR, pp. 143, 184–5 and see e.g. article 292 of the Law of the Sea Convention, 1982. See also the Grand Prince (Belize v. France) case, ITLOS, judgment of 20 April 2001, 125 ILR, p. 272.

[249] See further above, chapter 6, p. 273. See also the Panevezys Railway case, PCIJ, Series A/B, No. 76 (1939); 9 AD, p. 308; Whiteman, Digest, vol. III, p. 1558; Borchard, Diplomatic Protection, pp. 817–18; A. A. Cançado Trindade, The Application of the Rule of Exhaustion of Local Remedies in International Law, Cambridge, 1983; C. Law, The Local Remedies Rule in International Law, Geneva, 1961; C. F. Amerasinghe, Local Remedies in International Law, Cambridge, 2nd edn, 2004, and J. Kokott, 'Interim Report on the Exhaustion of Local Remedies', International Law Association, Report of the Sixty-Ninth Conference, London, 2000, p. 606.

[250] See e.g. the Interhandel (Switzerland v. USA) case, ICJ Reports, 1959, pp. 6, 27 and the Diallo (Guinea v. Democratic Republic of Congo) case, ICJ Reports, 2007, paras. 42 and 44. See also Ex parte Ferhut Butt 116 ILR, pp. 607, 614–15 (High Court) and 619 (Court of Appeal). The requirement also arises in a number of treaties: see e.g. article 35, European Convention on Human Rights; article 46, Inter-American Convention on Human Rights; article 5, Optional Protocol I, International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights; and article 295 of the Law of the Sea Convention.

[251] See e.g. the discussions in Yearbook of the ILC, 1977, vol. II, part 2, pp. 30 ff. and Report of the ILC on its 54th Session, 2002, pp. 131 ff. See also Kokott, 'Interim Report', pp. 612 ff.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

invoked if the claim is one to which the rule of exhaustion of local remedies applies and any available and effective local remedy has not been exhausted.[252]

Article 14 of the ILC Draft Articles on Diplomatic Protection reiterates the customary rule, noting that no international claim in respect of an injury to a national may be presented before that national has exhausted local remedies, which are defined as legal remedies open to an injured person before the judicial or administrative courts or bodies, whether ordinary or special, of the state alleged to be responsible for causing the injury. Article 15 provides that local remedies do not need to be exhausted where there are no reasonably available local remedies to provide effective redress, or the local remedies provide no reasonable possibility of such redress; there is undue delay in the remedial process which is attributable to the state alleged to be responsible; there was no relevant connection between the injured person and the state alleged to be responsible at the date of injury; the injured person is manifestly precluded from pursuing local remedies; or the state alleged to be responsible has waived the requirement that local remedies be exhausted.[253]

The general rule was well illustrated in the Ambatielos arbitration[254] between Greece and Britain. The former brought proceedings arising out of a contract signed by Ambatielos, which were rejected by the tribunal since the remedies available under English law had not been fully utilised. In particular, he had failed to call a vital witness and he had not appealed to the House of Lords from the decision of the Court of Appeal.

The requirement to exhaust local[255] remedies applies only to available effective remedies. It will not be sufficient to dismiss a claim merely because the person claiming had not taken the matter to appeal, where the appeal would not have affected the basic outcome of the case. This was stressed in the Finnish Ships arbitration[256] where shipowners brought

[252] ILC Commentary 2001, p. 305.

[253] The International Court noted in the Diallo case, ICJ Reports, 2007, para. 47, that administrative remedies can only be taken into consideration for purposes of the local remedies rule if they are aimed at vindicating a right and not at obtaining a favour, unless they constitute an essential prerequisite for the admissibility of subsequent contentious proceedings.

[254] 12 RIAA, p. 83 (1956); 23 ILR, p. 306.

[255] The terms domestic or municipal remedies are also used.

[256] 2 RIAA, p. 1479 (1934); 7 AD, p. 231.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

a claim before the Admiralty Transport Arbitration Board, but did not appeal against the unfavourable decision. It was held that since the appeal could only be on points of law, which could not overturn the vital finding of fact that there had been a British requisition of ships involved, any appeal would have been ineffective. Accordingly the claims of the shipowners would not be dismissed for non-exhaustion of local remedies.

In the Interhandel case,[257] the United States seized the American assets of a company owned by the Swiss firm Interhandel, in 1942, which was suspected of being under the control of a German enterprise. In 1958, after nine years of litigation in the US courts regarding the unblocking of the Swiss assets in America, Switzerland took the matter to the International Court of Justice. However, before a decision was reached, the US Supreme Court readmitted Interhandel into the legal proceedings, thus disposing of Switzerland's argument that the company's suit had been finally rejected. The Court dismissed the Swiss government's claim since the local remedies available had not been exhausted. Criticism has been levelled against this judgment on the ground that litigation extending over practically ten years could hardly be described as constituting an 'effective' remedy. However, the fact remains that the legal system operating in the United States had still something to offer the Swiss company even after that time.

The local remedies rule does not apply where one state has been guilty of a direct breach of international law causing immediate injury to another state, as for instance where its diplomatic agents are assaulted. But it does apply where the state is complaining of injury to its nationals.[258] The local remedies rule may be waived by treaty stipulation, as for example in Article V of the US–Mexico General Claims Convention of 1923 and Article XI of the Convention on International Liability for Damage caused by Space Objects, 1972.

The issue of local remedies was clarified in the Elettronica Sicula SpA (ELSI) case,[259] which referred to the concept as 'an important principle [257] ICJ Reports, 1959, p. 6; 27 ILR, p. 475. The Court declared that the 'rule that local remedies must be exhausted before international proceedings may be instituted is a well-established principle of customary international law', ICJ Reports, 1959, p. 27; 27 ILR, p. 490. See also Rules VII and VIII of the International Claims Rules of the FCO, above, p. 811; Pleadings, Israel v. Bulgaria, ICJ Reports, 1959, pp. 531–2, and T. Meron, 'The Incidence of the Rule of Exhaustion of Local Remedies', 25 BYIL, 1959, p. 95. Note, in addition, the North American Dredging Co. claim, 4 RIAA, p. 26 (1926); 3 AD, p. 4.

[258] See e.g. the Heathrow Airport User Charges Arbitration, 102 ILR, pp. 215, 277 ff.

[259] ICJ Reports, 1989, p. 15; 84 ILR, p. 311.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

of customary international law'.[260] The case concerned an action brought by the US against Italy alleging injuries to the Italian interests of two US corporations. Italy claimed that local remedies had not been exhausted, while the US argued that the doctrine did not apply since the case was brought under the Treaty of Friendship, Commerce and Navigation, 1948 between the two states which provided for the submission of disputes relating to the treaty to the International Court, with no mention of local remedies. The Chamber of the Court, however, firmly held that while the parties to an agreement could if they so chose dispense with the local remedies requirement in express terms, it 'finds itself unable to accept that an important principle of customary international law should be held to have been tacitly dispensed with'.[261] In other words, the presumption that local remedies need to be exhausted can only be rebutted by express provision to the contrary.

The Chamber also dealt with a claim by the US that the doctrine did not apply to a request for a declaratory judgment finding that the treaty in question had been violated. This claim in effect was based on the view that the doctrine would not apply in cases of direct injury to a state. The Chamber felt unable to find in the case a dispute over alleged violation of the treaty resulting in direct injury to the US that was both distinct from and independent of the dispute with regard to the two US corporations.[262] It was stressed that the matter 'which colours and pervades the US claim as a whole' was the alleged damage to the two US corporations.[263] In the light of this stringent test, it therefore seems that in such mixed claims involving the interests both of nationals and of the state itself one must assume that the local remedies rule applies.

The claim that local remedies had not in fact been exhausted in the case because the two US corporations had not raised the treaty issue before the Italian courts was rejected. It was held that it was sufficient if the essence of the claim had been brought before the competent tribunals. Accordingly, identity of claims as distinct from identity of issues is not required. The Chamber was not convinced that there clearly remained some remedy which the corporations, independently of their Italian subsidiary (ELSI), ought to have pursued and exhausted.[264]

[260] ICJ Reports, 1989, p. 42; 84 ILR, p. 348. [261] Ibid.

[262] ICJ Reports, 1989, pp. 42–4; 84 ILR, pp. 348–50.

[263] ICJ Reports, 1989, p. 43; 84 ILR, p. 349.

[264] ICJ Reports, 1989, pp. 46–8; 84 ILR, pp. 352–4. See e.g. M. H. Adler, 'The Exhaustion of the Local Remedies Rule After the International Court of Justice's Decision in ELSI', 39 ICLQ, 1990, p. 641, and F. A. Mann, 'Foreign Investment in the International Court of

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

The treatment of aliens[265]

The question of the protection of foreign nationals is one of those issues in international law most closely connected with the different approaches adopted to international relations by the Western and Third World nations. Developing countries, as well as communist countries formerly, have long been eager to reduce what they regard as the privileges accorded to capitalist states by international law. They lay great emphasis upon the sovereignty and independence of states and resent the economic influence of the West. The Western nations, on the other hand, have wished to protect their investments and nationals abroad and provide for the security of their property.

The diplomatic protection of nationals abroad developed as the number of nationals overseas grew as a consequence of increasing trading activities and thus the relevant state practice multiplied. In addition, since the US–UK Jay Treaty of 1794 numerous mixed claims commissions were established to resolve problems of injury to aliens,[266] while a variety of national claims commissions were created to distribute lump sums received from foreign states in settlement of claims.[267] Such international and national claims procedures together with diplomatic protection therefore enabled nationals abroad to be aided in cases of loss or injury in state responsibility situations.[268]

Justice: The ELSI Case', 86 AJIL, 1992, pp. 92, 101–2. See also the M/V Saiga (No. 2) case, 120 ILR, pp. 143, 182–4 and the LaGrand case, ICJ Reports, 2001, pp. 466, 487–8; 134 ILR, pp. 1, 26–7.

265 See references in footnote 1. See also Guha Roy, 'Is the Law of Responsibility of States for Injury to Aliens a Part of Universal International Law?', 55 AJIL, 1961, p. 863; A. Fatouros, 'International Law and the Third World', 50 Virginia Law Review, 1964, p. 783; I. Shihata, Legal Treatment of Foreign Investment, Dordrecht, 1993; Oppenheim's International Law, p. 903, and Third US Restatement of Foreign Relations Law, Washington, 1987, vol. II, p. 184. See also the Principles Concerning Admission and Treatment of Aliens adopted by the Asian–African Legal Consultative Committee at its fourth session: www.aalco.org/Principle%20Concerning%20admission%20and%20Treatment%20of%20aliens.htm.

266 See e.g. A. M. Stuyt, Survey of International Arbitrations, 1794–1889, 3rd edn, Dordrecht, 1990.

267 See e.g. International Claims (eds. R. B. Lillich and B. Weston), Charlottesville, 1982, and R. B. Lillich and B. Weston, International Claims: Their Settlements by Lump-Sum Agreements, Charlottesville, 2 vols., 1975. See also the US–People's Republic of China Claims Settlement Agreement of 1979, DUSPIL, 1979, pp. 1213–15, and Whiteman, Digest, vol. VIII, pp. 933–69.

268 Note the establishment of the UN Compensation Commission following the ending of the Gulf War in 1991 to enable the settlement of claims arising out of that conflict: see below, chapter 22, p. 1249.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

The relevant standard of treatment

The developed states of the West have argued historically that there exists an 'international minimum standard' for the protection of foreign nationals that must be upheld irrespective of how the state treats its own nationals, whereas other states maintained that all the state need do is treat the alien as it does its own nationals (the 'national treatment standard'). The reason for the evolution of the latter approach is to be found in the increasing resentment of Western economic domination rather than in the necessary neglect of basic standards of justice. The Latin American states felt, in particular, that the international minimum standard concept had been used as a means of interference in internal affairs.[269] Accordingly, the Calvo doctrine was formulated. This involved a reaffirmation of the principle of non-intervention coupled with the assertion that aliens were entitled only to such rights as were accorded nationals and thus had to seek redress for grievances exclusively in the domestic arena.[270] It was intended as a shield against external interference. The international standard concept itself developed during the nineteenth century and received extensive support in case-law.

In the Neer case,[271] for example, where the American superintendent of a mine in Mexico had been killed, the Commission held 'that the propriety of governmental acts should be put to the test of international standards', while in the Certain German Interests in Polish Upper Silesia case,[272] the Court recognised the existence of a common or generally accepted international law respecting the treatment of aliens, which is applicable to them despite municipal legislation. In the Garcia case,[273] the US–Mexican Claims Commission emphasised that there existed an international standard concerning the taking of human life, and in the Roberts claim,[274] reference was made to the test as to whether aliens were treated in accordance with ordinary standards of civilisation. If the principle is clear, the contents or definition of that principle are far from clear. In the Neer claim,[275] the Commission stated that the treatment of an alien, in order to constitute an international delinquency, [269] See e.g. Guha Roy, 'Law of Responsibility'; J. Castañeda, 'The Underdeveloped Nations and the Development of International Law', 15 International Organisation, 1961, p. 38, and R. P. Anand, New States and International Law, Delhi, 1972.

[270] See e.g. Lillich, 'Duties', p. 349.

[271] 4 RIAA, p. 60 (1926); 3 AD, p. 213.

[272] PCIJ, Series A, No. 7, 1926; 3 AD, p. 429.

[273] 4 RIAA, p. 119 (1926). See also the Chattin case, 4 RIAA, p. 282 (1927); 4 AD, p. 248.

[274] 4 RIAA, p. 77 (1926); 3 AD, p. 227.

[275] 4 RIAA, pp. 60, 61–2 (1926); 3 AD, p. 213. See similarly the Chattin case, 4 RIAA, p. 282 (1927); 4 AD, p. 248.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

> should amount to an outrage, to bad faith, to wilful neglect of duty, or to an insufficiency of governmental action so far short of international standards that every reasonable and impartial man would readily recognise its insufficiency.

In other words, a fairly high threshold is specified before the minimum standard applies. Some indeed have argued that the concept never involved a definite standard with a fixed content, but rather a 'process of decision',[276] a process which would involve an examination of the responsibility of the state for the injury to the alien in the light of all the circumstances of the particular case.[277] The issue of the content of such a standard has often been described in terms of the concept of denial of justice.[278] In effect, that concept refers to the improper administration of civil and criminal justice as regards an alien.[279] It would include the failure to apprehend and prosecute those wrongfully causing injury to an alien, as in the Janes claim,[280] where an American citizen was killed in Mexico. The identity of the murderer was known, but no action had been taken for eight years. The widow was awarded $12,000 in compensation for the non-apprehension and non-punishment of the murderer. It would also include unreasonably long detention and harsh and unlawful treatment in prison.[281]

A progressive attempt to resolve the divide between the national and international standard proponents was put forward by Garcia-Amador in a report on international responsibility to the International Law Commission in 1956. He argued that the two approaches were now synthesised in the concept of the international recognition of the essential rights of man.[282] He formulated two principles: first, that aliens had to enjoy the same rights and guarantees as enjoyed by nationals, which should not in any case be less than the fundamental human rights recognised and defined in international instruments; secondly, international responsibility would only be engaged if internationally recognised fundamental human rights were affected.[283] This approach did not prove attractive to the ILC at that time in the light of a number of problems. However, human rights [276] M. S. McDougal et al., Studies in World Public Order, New Haven, 1960, p. 869.

[277] See Lillich, 'Duties', p. 350.
[278] See e.g. A. V. Freeman, The International Responsibility of States for Denial of Justice, London, 1938.
[279] See AMCO v. Indonesia (Merits) 89 ILR, pp. 405, 451.
[280] 4 RIAA, p. 82 (1926); 3 AD, p. 218.
[281] See e.g. the Roberts claim, 4 RIAA, p. 77 (1926); 3 AD, p. 227 and the Quintanilla claim, 4 RIAA, p. 101 (1926); 3 AD, p. 224.
[282] Yearbook of the ILC, 1956, vol. II, pp. 173, 199–203.
[283] Yearbook of the ILC, 1957, vol. II, pp. 104, 112–13.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

law has developed considerably in recent years[284] and can now be regarded as establishing certain minimum standards of state behaviour with regard to civil and political rights. It is noticeable, for example, that the relevant instruments do not refer to nationals and aliens specifically, but to all individuals within the territory and subject to the jurisdiction of the state without discrimination.[285] One should also note the special efforts being made to deal with non-nationals, in particular the UN Declaration on the Human Rights of Individuals who are not Nationals of the Country in which they Live,[286] and the continuing concern with regard to migrant workers.[287]

Some differences as regards the relative rights and obligations of nationals and aliens are, of course, inevitable. Non-nationals do not have political rights and may be banned from employment in certain areas (e.g. the diplomatic corps), although they remain subject to the local law. It is also unquestioned that a state may legitimately refuse to admit aliens, or may accept them subject to certain conditions being fulfilled. Whether a state may expel aliens with equal facility is more open to doubt.

A number of cases assert that states must give convincing reasons for expelling an alien. In, for example, the Boffolo case,[288] which concerned an Italian expelled from Venezuela, it was held that states possess a general right of expulsion, but it could only be resorted to in extreme circumstances and accomplished in a manner least injurious to the person affected. In addition, the reasons for the expulsion must be stated before an international tribunal when the occasion demanded. Many municipal systems provide that the authorities of a country may deport aliens without reasons having to be stated. The position under customary international law is therefore somewhat confused. As far as treaty law is concerned, article 13 of the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights stipulates that an alien lawfully in the territory of a state party to the Convention

[284] See above, chapters 6 and 7.

[285] See e.g. article 2 of the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights, 1966 and article 1 of the European Convention on Human Rights, 1950.

[286] General Assembly resolution 40/144. See also E/CN.4/Sub.2/392 (1977) and R. B. Lillich and S. Neff, 'The Treatment of Aliens and International Human Rights Norms', 21 German YIL, 1978, p. 97.

[287] See further above, chapter 6, p. 333.

[288] 10 RIAA, p. 528 (1903). See also Dr Breger's case, Whiteman, Digest, vol. VIII, p. 861; R. Plender, International Migration Law, 2nd edn, Dordrecht, 1988, and G. Goodwin-Gill, International Law and the Movement of Persons Between States, Oxford, 1978.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

> may be expelled therefrom only in pursuance of a decision reached in accordance with law and shall, except where compelling reasons of national security otherwise require, be allowed to submit the reasons against his expulsion and to have his case reviewed by and be represented for the purpose before, the competent authority.

Article 3 of the European Convention on Establishment, 1956, provides that nationals of other contracting states lawfully residing in the territory may be expelled only if they endanger national security or offend against public order or morality, and Article 4 of the Fourth Protocol (1963) of the European Convention on Human Rights declares that 'collective expulsion of aliens is prohibited'.[289] The burden of proving the wrongfulness of the expelling state's action falls upon the claimant alleging expulsion and the relevant rules would also apply where, even though there is no direct law or regulation forcing the alien to leave, his continued presence in that state is made impossible because of conditions generated by wrongful acts of the state or attributable to it.[290] Where states have expelled aliens, international law requires their national state to admit them.[291]

The expropriation of foreign property[292]

The expansion of the Western economies since the nineteenth century in particular stimulated an outflow of capital and consequent heavy [289] Note also article 1 of Protocol 7 (1984) of the European Convention on Human Rights to the same general effect as article 13. See, as regards refugees, the 1951 Convention Relating to the Status of Refugees and the 1967 Protocol, and G. Goodwin-Gill, The Refugee in International Law, 2nd edn, Oxford, 1996.

[290] See Rankin v. The Islamic Republic of Iran 17 Iran–US CTR, pp. 135, 142; 82 ILR, pp. 204, 214. See also Goodwin-Gill, International Law and the Movement of Persons; Brownlie, Principles, pp. 498 ff., and M. Pellonpaa, Expulsion in International Law, Helsinki, 1984.

[291] This is a general principle, but cf. Lord Denning in the Thakrar case, [1974] QB 684; 59 ILR, p. 450. Note that the Lord Chancellor, in dealing with the expulsion of British aliens from East Africa, accepted that in international law a state was under a duty as between other states to accept expelled nationals: see 335 HL Deb., col. 497, 14 September 1972. See also Van Duyn v. Home Office [1974] ECR 1337; 60 ILR, p. 247.

[292] See e.g. G. White, Nationalisation of Foreign Property, London, 1961; B. Wortley, Expropriation of Public International Law, 1959; A. F. Lowenfeld, International Economic Law, 2nd edn, Oxford, 2008, part VI; M. Sornarajah, The International Law on Foreign Investment, 2nd edn, Cambridge, 2004, and Sornarajah, The Settlement of Foreign Investment Disputes, The Hague, 2000; I. Brownlie, 'Legal Status of Natural Resources', 162 HR, 1979, p. 245; R. Higgins, 'The Taking of Property by the State: Recent Developments in International Law', 176 HR, 1982, p. 267, and The Valuation of Nationalised Property in International Law (ed. R. B. Lillich), Charlottesville, 3 vols., 1972–5. See also Oppenheim's International Law, pp. 911 ff.; P. Muchlinski, Multinational Enterprises and the Law, 2nd edn, Oxford, investment in the developing areas of the world. This resulted in substantial areas of local economies falling within the ownership and control of Western corporations. However, with the granting of independence to the various Third World countries and in view of the nationalisation measures taken by the Soviet Union after the success of the communist revolution, such properties and influence began to come under pressure.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

In assessing the state of international law with regard to the expropriation of the property of aliens, one is immediately confronted with two opposing objectives, although they need not be irreconcilable in all cases. On the one hand, the capital-exporting countries require some measure of protection and security before they will invest abroad and, on the other hand, the capital-importing countries are wary of the power of foreign investments and the drain of currency that occurs, and are often stimulated to take over such enterprises. Nationalisation for one reason or another is now a common feature not only in communist and Afro-Asian states, but also in Western Europe. The need to acquire control of some key privately owned property is felt by many states to be an essential requirement in the interests of economic and social reform. Indeed it is true to say that extensive sectors of the economies of most West European states were at some stages under national control after having been taken into public ownership.

Since it can hardly be denied that nationalisation is a perfectly legitimate measure for a state to adopt and clearly not illegal as such under international law,[293] the problem arises where foreign property is involved. Not to expropriate such property in a general policy of nationalisation might be seen as equivalent to proposing a privileged status within the country for foreign property, as well as limiting the power of the state within its own jurisdiction. There is no doubt that under international law, expropriation of alien property is legitimate.[294] This is not disputed. However, certain conditions must be fulfilled.[295]

1999, pp. 491 ff.; A. Mouri, The International Law of Expropriation as Reflected in the Work of the Iran–US Claims Tribunal, Dordrecht, 1994; P. M. Norton, 'A Law of the Future or a Law of the Past? Modern Tribunals and the International Law of Expropriation', 85 AJIL, 1991, p. 474; N. Schrijver, Sovereignty over Natural Resources, Cambridge, 1997, and F. Beveridge, The Treatment and Taxation of Foreign Investment under International Law, Manchester, 2000.

293 See e.g. De Sanchez v. Banco Central de Nicaragua and Others 770 F.2d 1385, 1397; 88 ILR, pp. 75, 89.

294 See e.g. AMCO v. Indonesia (Merits) 89 ILR, pp. 405, 466.

295 See e.g. the World Bank Guidelines on the Treatment of Foreign Direct Investment, 31 ILM, 1992, p. 1363.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

The question, of course, arises as to the stage at which international law in fact becomes involved in such a situation. Apart from the relevance of the general rules relating to the treatment of aliens noted in the preceding section, the issue will usually arise out of a contract between a state and a foreign private enterprise. In such a situation, several possibilities exist. It could be argued that the contract itself by its very nature becomes 'internationalised' and thus subject to international law rather than (or possibly in addition to) the law of the contracting state. The consequences of this would include the operation of the principle of international law that agreements are to be honoured (pacta sunt servanda) which would constrain the otherwise wide competence of a state party to alter unilaterally the terms of a relevant agreement. This proposition was adopted by the Arbitrator in the Texaco v. Libya case in 1977,[296] where it was noted that this may be achieved in various ways: for example, by stating that the law governing the contract referred to 'general principles of law', which was taken to incorporate international law; by including an international arbitration clause for the settlement of disputes; and by including a stabilisation clause in an international development agreement, preventing unilateral variation of the terms of the agreement.[297] However, this approach is controversial and case-law is by no means consistent.[298] International law will clearly be engaged where the expropriation is unlawful, either because of, for example, the discriminatory manner in which it is carried out or the offering of inadequate or no compensation.[299]

[296] 53 ILR, p. 389.

[297] See e.g. C. Greenwood, 'State Contracts in International Law – The Libyan Oil Arbitrations', 53 BYIL, 1982, pp. 27, 41 ff. See also A. Fatouros, 'International Law and the Internationalised Contract', 74 AJIL, 1980, p. 134.

[298] See e.g. J. Paulsson, 'The ICSID Klöckner v. Cameroon Award: The Duties of Partners in North–South Economic Development Agreements', 1 Journal of International Arbitration, 1984, p. 145; the Aminoil case, 21 ILM, 1982, p. 976; 66 ILR, p. 519, and D. W. Bowett, 'State Contracts with Aliens: Contemporary Developments on Compensation for Termination or Breach', 59 BYIL, 1988, p. 49.

[299] See in particular article 1 of Protocol I of the European Convention on Human Rights, 1950 as regards the protection of the right to property and the prohibition of deprivation of possessions 'except in the public interest and subject to the conditions provided for by law and by the general principles of international law'. See e.g. the following cases: Marckx, European Court of Human Rights, Series A, No. 31; 58 ILR, p. 561; Sporrong and Lönnroth, ECHR, Series A, No. 52; 68 ILR, p. 86; Loizidou v. Turkey, Judgment of 18 December 1996; 108 ILR, p. 444. See also e.g. Jacobs and White European Convention on Human Rights (eds. C. Ovey and R. C. A. White), 4th edn, Oxford, 2006, chapter 15. However, it has been held that the reference to international law did not apply to the taking

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

The property question

Higgins has pointed to 'the almost total absence of any analysis of conceptual aspects of property'.[300] Property would clearly include physical objects and certain abstract entities, for example, shares in companies, debts and intellectual property. The 1961 Harvard Draft Convention on the International Responsibility of States for Injuries to Aliens[301] discusses the concept of property in the light of 'all movable and immovable property, whether tangible or intangible, including industrial, literary and artistic property as well as rights and interests in property'. In the Liamco case the arbitration specifically mentioned concession rights as forming part of incorporeal property,[302] a crucial matter as many expropriation cases in fact involve a wide variety of contractual rights.[303]

The nature of expropriation[304]

Expropriation involves a taking of property,[305] but actions short of direct possession of the assets in question may also fall within the category. The 1961 Harvard Draft would include, for example, 'any such unreasonable interference with the use, enjoyment or disposal of property as to justify an inference that the owner thereof will not be able to use, enjoy or dispose of the property within a reasonable period of time after the inception of such interference'.[306] In 1965, for example, after a series of Indonesian decrees, the UK government stated that:

by a state of the property of its own nationals: see Lithgow, European Court of Human Rights, Series A, No. 102; 75 ILR, p. 438; James, ECHR, Series A, No. 98; 75 ILR, p. 397 and Mellacher, ECHR, Series A, No. 169. See also Brock, 'The Protection of Property Rights Under the European Convention on Human Rights', Legal Issues of European Integration, 1986, p. 52.

300 Higgins, 'Taking of Property', p. 268.

301 55 AJIL, 1961, p. 548 (article 10(7)).

302 20 ILM, 1981, pp. 1, 53; 62 ILR, pp. 141, 189. See also the Shufeldt case, 2 RIAA, pp. 1083, 1097 (1930); 5 AD, p. 179.

303 See also below, p. 839, concerning the definition of 'investments' in bilateral investment treaties. See also article 1(6) of the European Energy Charter Treaty, 1994.

304 See e.g. R. Dolzer and C. Schreuer, Principles of International Investment Law, Oxford, 2008, chapter 6.

305 The North American Free Trade Agreement (NAFTA) Arbitration Tribunal noted that the term 'expropriation', 'carries with it the connotation of a "taking" by a government-type authority of a person's "property" with a view to transferring ownership of that property to another person, usually the authority that exercised its de jure or de facto power to do the "taking"', S.D. Myers v. Canada 121 ILR, pp. 72, 122.

306 55 AJIL, 1961, pp. 553–4 (article 10(3)a).

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

> in view of the complete inability of British enterprises and plantations to exercise and enjoy any of their rights of ownership in relation to their properties in Indonesia, Her Majesty's Government has concluded that the Indonesian Government has expropriated this property.[307]

In Starrett Housing Corporation v. Government of the Islamic Republic of Iran before the Iran–US Claims Tribunal,[308] it was emphasised by the Tribunal that:

> measures taken by a state can interfere with property rights to such an extent that these rights are rendered so useless that they must be deemed to have been expropriated, even though the state does not purport to have expropriated them and the legal title to the property formally remains with the original owner.

In that case, it was held that a taking had occurred by the end of January 1980 upon the appointment by the Iranian Housing Ministry of a temporary manager of the enterprise concerned, thus depriving the claimants of the right to manage and of effective control and use.[309] However, a series of events prior to that date, including armed incursions and detention of personnel, intimidation and interference with supplies and needed facilities, did not amount to a taking of the property, since investors in foreign countries assume certain risks with regard to disturbances and even revolution. The fact that the risks materialise, held the Tribunal, did not mean that property rights affected by the events could be deemed to have been taken.[310] There is clearly an important, but indistinct, dividing line here.

It has also been held that the seizure of a controlling stock interest in a foreign corporation is a taking of control of the assets and profits of the enterprise in question.[311] In Biloune v. Ghana Investment Centre, an [307] BPIL, 1964, p. 200. See also 4 ILM, 1965, pp. 440–7. Note also Shanghai Power Co. v. US 4 Cl. Ct. 237 (1983), where it was held that the settlement of the plaintiff's claim by the US government in an agreement with China for less than its worth did not constitute a taking for which compensation was required in the context of the Fifth Amendment.

[308] Interlocutory Award, 4 Iran–US CTR, p. 122; 85 ILR, p. 349.

[309] 4 Iran–US CTR, p. 154; 85 ILR, p. 390. See also Harza Engineering Co. v. The Islamic Republic of Iran 1 Iran–US CTR, p. 499; 70 ILR, p. 117, and AIG v. The Islamic Republic of Iran 4 Iran–US CTR, p. 96. See also SEDCO v. NIOC 84 ILR, p. 483.

[310] 4 Iran–US CTR, p. 156; 85 ILR, p. 392. Cf. the Concurring Opinion by Judge Holtzmann on this issue, 4 Iran–US CTR, pp. 159, 178; 85 ILR, p. 414.

[311] Kalamazoo Spice Extraction Company v. The Provisional Military Government of Socialist Ethiopia 86 ILR, p. 45 and 90 ILR, p. 596. See also Agip SpA v. The Government of the Popular Republic of the Congo 67 ILR, p. 319 and Benvenuti and Bonfant v. The Government of the Popular Republic of the Congo, ibid., p. 345.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

investor began construction work relying upon government representations although without building permits; a stop order was then issued based upon the absence of such permit. The Tribunal held that an indirect expropriation had taken place because the totality of the circumstances had the effect of causing the irreparable cessation of work on the project.[312]

Where the taking constitutes a process rather than one clear act, there will be a problem of determining when the process has reached the point at which an expropriation in fact has occurred.[313] This issue may be important, for example, in determining the valuation date for compensation purposes. In Santa Elena v. Costa Rica, the Tribunal stated that 'a property has been expropriated when the effect of the measures taken by the state has been to deprive the owner of title, possession or access to the benefit and economic use of his property . . . This is a matter of fact for the Tribunal to assess in the light of the circumstances of the case.'[314]

The expropriation of a given property may also include a taking of closely connected ancillary rights, such as patents and contracts, which had not been directly nationalised.[315]

[312] 95 ILR, pp. 183, 207–10. See also Metalclad Corporation v. United Mexican States 119 ILR, pp. 615, 639–40, a case under the North American Free Trade Agreement (NAFTA), article 1110 of which prohibits direct and indirect expropriation, where the Tribunal noted that expropriation included 'covert or incidental interference with the use of property which has the effect of depriving the owner, in whole or in significant part, of the use of reasonably to be expected economic benefit of property even if not necessarily to the obvious benefit of the host state', para. 108. See also CME v. Czech Republic 9 ICSID Reports, p. 121 and Middle East Cement Shipping v. Egypt 7 ICSID Reports, p. 178.

[313] See e.g. Generation Ukraine v. Ukraine 44 ILM 2005, p. 404, paras. 20.22 and 20.26, noting that the plea of 'creeping expropriation' proceeded on the basis of an investment existing at a particular time that was eroded by a series of acts attributable to the state to the extent that it is violative of the relevant international standard of protection against expropriation. See also Siemens v. Argentina, Award of 6 February 2007, and W. M. Reisman and R. D. Sloane, 'Indirect Expropriation and Its Valuation in the BIT Generation', 74 BYIL, 2003, p. 115.

[314] 39 ILM, 2000, pp. 1317, 1329.

[315] PCIJ, Series A, No. 7, 1926. See also the Norwegian Shipowners' Claims case, 1 RIAA, p. 307 (1922) and the Sporrong and Lönnroth case before the European Court of Human Rights, Series A, No. 52 (1982); 68 ILR, p. 86. See also Papamichalopoulos v. Greece, European Court of Human Rights, Series A, No. 260 (1993), p. 15. Note in addition Revere Copper v. Opic 56 ILR, p. 258. See G. C. Christie, 'What Constitutes a Taking of Property under International Law?', 38 BYIL, 1962, p. 307; DUSPIL, 1976, p. 444; Brownlie, System and State Responsibility, pp. 24–5; Whiteman, Digest, vol. VIII, pp. 1006 ff., and Third US Restatement on Foreign Relations Law, vol. II, pp. 200–1.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

Public purposes

The Permanent Court in the Certain German Interests in Polish Upper Silesia case noted that expropriation must be for 'reasons of public utility, judicial liquidation and similar measures'.[316] How far this extends is open to dispute, although it will cover wartime measures.

The issue was raised in the BP case,[317] where the reason for the expropriation of the BP property was the Libyan belief that the UK had encouraged Iran to occupy certain Persian Gulf Islands. The arbitrator explained that the taking violated international law, 'as it was made for purely extraneous political reasons and was arbitrary and discriminatory in character'.[318] This is ambiguous as to the public purpose issue, and in the Liamco case[319] it was held that 'the public utility principle is not a necessary requisite for the legality of a nationalisation'.[320] It is to be noted, however, that the 1962 General Assembly Resolution on Permanent Sovereignty over Natural Resources mentions this requirement,[321] although the 1974 Charter of Economic Rights and Duties of States does not.[322] The question may thus still be an open one,[323] although later practice suggests that general measures taken on a non-discriminatory basis for the public good would not constitute unlawful expropriation. The

[316] PCIJ, Series A, No. 7, 1926, p. 22. [317] 53 ILR, p. 297. [318] Ibid., p. 329.
[319] 20 ILM, 1981, p. 1; 62 ILR, p. 141. [320] 20 ILM, 1981, pp. 58–9; 62 ILR, p. 194.
[321] Paragraph 4 of the 1962 Resolution provides that '[n]ationalization, expropriation or requisitioning shall be based on grounds or reasons of public utility, security or the national interest which are recognized as overriding purely individual or private interests, both domestic and foreign. In such cases the owner shall be paid appropriate compensation in accordance with the rules in force in the state taking such measures in the exercise of its sovereignty and in accordance with international law. In any case where the question of compensation gives rise to a controversy, the national jurisdiction of the state taking such measures shall be exhausted. However, upon agreement by sovereign states and other parties concerned, settlement of the dispute should be made through arbitration or international adjudication.'
[322] Article 2(2)c of the 1974 Charter provides that every state has the right to 'nationalise, expropriate or transfer ownership of foreign property in which case appropriate compensation should be paid by the state adopting such measures, taking into account its relevant laws and regulations and all circumstances that the state considers pertinent. In any case where the question of compensation gives rise to a controversy, it shall be settled under the domestic law of the nationalising state and by its tribunals, unless it is freely and mutually agreed by all states concerned that other peaceful means be sought on the basis of the sovereign equality of states and in accordance with the principle of free choice of means.'
[323] See also Agip SpA v. The Government of the Popular Republic of the Congo 67 ILR, pp. 319, 336–9.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

Tribunal in Santa Elena v. Costa Rica took the view that international law permitted expropriation of foreign-owned property inter alia for a public purpose and noted that this might include a taking for environmental reasons.[324]

Compensation

The requirement often stipulated is for prompt, adequate and effective compensation, the formula used by US Secretary of State Hull on the occasion of Mexican expropriations.[325] It is the standard maintained in particular by the United States[326] and found in an increasing number of bilateral investment treaties.[327] However, case-law has been less clear. Early cases did not use the Hull formulation[328] and the 1962 Permanent Sovereignty Resolution referred to 'appropriate compensation', a phrase cited with approval by the arbitrator in the Texaco case[329] as a rule of customary law in view of the support it achieved. This was underlined in the Aminoil case,[330] where the tribunal said that the standard of 'appropriate compensation' in the 1962 resolution 'codifies positive principles'.[331] It was stated that the determination of 'appropriate compensation' was better accomplished by an inquiry into all the circumstances relevant to the particular concrete case than through abstract theoretical discussion.[332] However, while the 'appropriate compensation' formula of the 1962 resolution is linked to both national and international law, the 1974 Charter of Economic Rights and Duties of States links the formula to domestic law and considerations only. The former instrument is accepted as a reflection

[324] 39 ILM, 2000, pp. 1317, 1329. The fact that the taking was for a laudable environmental reason did not affect the duty to pay compensation, ibid. See also Too v. Greater Modesto Insurance Associates 23 Iran–US CTR, p. 378; Methanex v. USA 44 ILM, 2005, p. 1345 and Saluka v. Czech Republic, Partial Award, 17 March 2006.

[325] Hackworth, Digest, vol. III, 1940–4, p. 662. See also Muchlinski, Multinational Enterprises, pp. 496 ff., and E. Lauterpacht, 'Issues of Compensation and Nationality in the Taking of Energy Investments', 8 Journal of Energy and Natural Resources Law, 1990, p. 241.

[326] See e.g. DUSPIL, 1976, p. 444, and D. Robinson, 'Expropriation in the Restatement (Revised)', 78 AJIL, 1984, p. 176.

[327] Robinson, 'Expropriation', p. 178. See further below, p. 837.

[328] See e.g. the Chorzów Factory case, PCIJ, Series A, No. 17, 1928, p. 46; 4 AD, p. 268 and the Norwegian Shipowners' Claims case, 1 RIAA, pp. 307, 339–41 (1922). See also O. Schachter, 'Compensation for Expropriation', 78 AJIL, 1984, p. 121.

[329] 17 ILM, 1978, pp. 3, 29; 53 ILR, pp. 389, 489. See also Banco Nacional de Cuba v. Chase Manhattan Bank 658 F.2d 875 (1981); 66 ILR, p. 421.

[330] 21 ILM, 1982, p. 976; 66 ILR, p. 519.

[331] 21 ILM, 1982, p. 1032; 66 ILR, p. 601.

[332] 21 ILM, 1982, p. 1033.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

of custom, while the latter is not.[333] But in any event, it is unclear whether in practice there would be a substantial difference in result.[334]

It should also be noted that section IV(1) of the World Bank Guidelines on the Treatment of Foreign Direct Investment provides that a state may not expropriate foreign private investment except where this is done in accordance with applicable legal procedures, in pursuance in good faith of a public purpose, without discrimination on the basis of nationality and against the payment of appropriate compensation. Section IV(2) notes that compensation will be deemed to be appropriate where it is adequate, prompt and effective.[335] Article 13 of the European Energy Charter Treaty, 1994 provides that expropriation must be for a purpose which is in the public interest, not discriminatory, carried out under due process of law and accompanied by the payment of prompt, adequate and effective compensation.[336]

In the sensitive process of assessing the extent of compensation, several distinct categories should be noted. There is generally little dispute about according compensation for the physical assets and other assets of the enterprise such as debts or monies due. Although there are differing methods as to how to value such assets in particular cases,[337] the essential [333] See e.g. the Texaco case, 17 ILM, 1978, pp. 1, 29–31; 53 ILR, p. 489. Note that the Third US Restatement of Foreign Relations Law, p. 196 (para. 712), refers to the requirement of 'just compensation' and not the Hull formula. This is defined as 'an amount equivalent to the value of the property taken and to be paid at the time of taking or within a reasonable time thereafter with interest from the date of taking and in a form economically usable by the foreign national', ibid., p. 197. See also Schachter, 'Compensation', p. 121.

[334] See generally also R. Dolzer, 'New Foundation of the Law of Expropriation of Alien Property', 75 AJIL, 1981, p. 533, and M. Sornarajah, 'Compensation for Expropriation', 13 Journal of World Trade Law, 1979, p. 108, and Sornarajah, International Law on Foreign Investment.

[335] 31 ILM, 1992, p. 1382. Note also that article 1110 of the North American Free Trade Agreement, 1992 (NAFTA) provides that no party shall directly or indirectly nationalise or expropriate an investment of an investor of another party in its territory or take a measure tantamount to nationalisation or expropriation except where it is for a public purpose, on a non-discriminatory basis, in accordance with due process of law and upon payment of compensation. The payment of compensation is to be the fair market value of the expropriated investment immediately before the expropriation took place and should not reflect any change in value occurring because the intended expropriation had become known earlier. Valuation criteria shall include going concern value, asset value (including declared tax value of tangible property) and other criteria, as appropriate to determine fair market value. In addition, compensation shall be paid with interest, without delay and be fully realisable. See 32 ILM, 1993, p. 605.

[336] 34 ILM, 1995, p. 391.

[337] See e.g. the Aminoil case, 21 ILM, 1982, pp. 976, 1038; 66 ILR, pp. 519, 608–9.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

principle is that of fair market value.[338] Interest on the value of such assets will also normally be paid.[339] There is, however, disagreement with regard to the award of compensation for the loss of future profits. In AMCO v. Indonesia,[340] the Arbitral Tribunal held that:

> the full compensation of prejudice, by awarding to the injured party, the damnum emergens [loss suffered] and the lucrum cessans [expected profits] is a principle common to the main systems of municipal law, and therefore, a general principle of law which may be considered as a source of international law, although the compensation that could be awarded would cover only direct and foreseeable prejudice and not more remote damage.[341]

In Metalclad Corporation v. United Mexican States, the Tribunal noted that normally the fair market value of a going concern which has a history of profitable operation may be based on an estimate of future profits subject to a discounted cash flow analysis,[342] but where the enterprise has not operated for a sufficiently long time to establish a performance record or where it has failed to make a profit, future profits cannot be used so that to determine the fair market value, reference instead to the actual investment made may be appropriate.[343]

However, it has been argued that one may need to take into account whether the expropriation itself was lawful or unlawful. In INA Corporation v. The Islamic Republic of Iran,[344] the Tribunal suggested that in the case of a large-scale, lawful nationalisation, 'international law has undergone [338] Fair market value means essentially the amount that a willing buyer would pay a willing seller for the shares of a going concern, ignoring the expropriation situation completely: see e.g. INA Corporation v. The Islamic Republic of Iran 8 Iran–US CTR, pp. 373, 380; 75 ILR, p. 603.

[339] See the Memorandum of the Foreign and Commonwealth Office on the Practice of International Tribunals in Awarding Interest, UKMIL, 63 BYIL, 1992, p. 768.

[340] 24 ILM, 1985, pp. 1022, 1036–7; 89 ILR, pp. 405, 504. See also the Chorzów Factory case, PCIJ, Series A, No. 17, 1928; 4 AD, p. 268; the Sapphire case, 35 ILR, p. 136; the Norwegian Shipowners' Claims case, 1 RIAA, p. 307 (1922); the Lighthouses Arbitration 23 ILR, p. 299, and Benvenuti and Bonfant v. The Government of the Popular Republic of the Congo 67 ILR pp. 345, 375–9.

[341] 24 ILM, 1985, pp. 1022, 1037; 89 ILR, p. 505. See also Sola Tiles Inc. v. Islamic Republic of Iran 83 ILR, p. 460.

[342] 119 ILR, pp. 615, 641. See also Benvenuti and Bonfant v. The Government of the Popular Republic of the Congo 67 ILR, p. 345 and AGIP SPA v. The Government of the Popular Republic of the Congo 67 ILR, p. 318.

[343] 119 ILR, pp. 641–2. See also Phelps Dodge Corporation v. Iran 10 Iran–US CTR, 1986, pp. 121, 132–3 and Biloune v. Ghana Investment Centre 95 ILR, pp. 183, 228–9.

[344] 8 Iran–US CTR, p. 373; 75 ILR, p. 595.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

a gradual reappraisal, the effect of which may be to undermine the doctrinal value of any "full" or "adequate" (when used as identical to "full") compensation standard'. However, in a situation involving an investment of a small amount shortly before the nationalisation, international law did allow for compensation in an amount equal to the fair market value of the investment.[345] However, Judge Lagergren noted that the 'fair market value' standard would normally be discounted in cases of lawful large-scale nationalisations in taking account of 'all circumstances'.[346]

In Amoco International Finance Corporation v. The Islamic Republic of Iran,[347] Chamber Three of the Iran–US Claims Tribunal held that the property in question had been lawfully expropriated and that 'a clear distinction must be made between lawful and unlawful expropriations, since the rules applicable to the compensation to be paid by the expropriating state differ according to the legal characterisation of the taking'.[348] In the case of an unlawful taking, full restitution in kind or its monetary equivalent was required in order to re-establish the situation which would in all probability have existed if the expropriation had not occurred,[349] while in the case of lawful taking, the standard was the payment of the full value of the undertaking at the moment of dispossession. The difference was interpreted by the Tribunal to mean that compensation for lost profits was only available in cases of wrongful expropriation. As far as the actual method of valuation was concerned, the Tribunal rejected the 'discounted cash flow' method, which would involve the estimation of the likely future earnings of the company at the valuation date and discounting such earnings to take account of reasonably foreseeable risks, since it was likely to amount to restitution as well as being too speculative.[350]

Bilateral investment treaties

In practice, many of the situations involving commercial relations between states and private parties fall within the framework of bilateral

[345] 8 Iran–US CTR, p. 378; 75 ILR, p. 602.
[346] 8 Iran–US CTR, p. 390; 75 ILR, p. 614.
[347] 15 Iran–US CTR, pp. 189, 246–52; 83 ILR, p. 500.
[348] 15 Iran–US CTR, p. 246; 83 ILR, p. 565.
[349] See also Judge Lagergren's Separate Opinion in INA Corporation v. The Islamic Republic of Iran 8 Iran–US CTR, p. 385; 75 ILR, p. 609.
[350] But see e.g. AIG v. The Islamic Republic of Iran 4 Iran–US CTR, pp. 96, 109–10, where in a case of lawful expropriation lost profits were awarded. See also Brownlie, Principles, pp. 508 ff.; Section IV of the World Bank Guidelines, and article 13 of the European Energy Charter Treaty, 1994.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

agreements.[351] These arrangements are intended to encourage investment in a way that protects the basic interests of both the capital-exporting and capital-importing states. Indeed, there has been a remarkable expansion in the number of such bilateral investment treaties.[352] The British government, for example, has stated that it is policy to conclude as many such agreements as possible in order to stimulate investment flows. It has also been noted that they are designed to set standards applicable in international law.[353] The provisions of such agreements indeed are remarkably uniform and constitute valuable state practice.[354] While normally great care has to be taken in inferring the existence of a rule of customary international law from a range of bilateral treaties, the very number and uniformity of such agreements make them significant exemplars.

Some of these common features of such treaties may be noted. First, the concept of an investment is invariably broadly defined. In article 1(a) of the important UK–USSR bilateral investment treaty, 1989,[355] for example, it is provided that:

[351] See e.g. Lowenfeld, International Economic Law, pp. 554 ff.; E. Denza and D. Brooks, 'Investment Protection Treaties: United Kingdom Experience', 36 ICLQ, 1987, p. 908; A. Akinsanya, 'International Protection of Direct Foreign Investments in the Third World', 36 ICLQ, 1987, p. 58; F. A. Mann, 'British Treaties for the Promotion and Protection of Investments', 52 BYIL, 1981, p. 241; D. Vagts, 'Foreign Investment Risk Reconsidered: The View From the 1980s', 2 ICSID Review – Foreign Investment Law Journal, 1987, p. 1; P. B. Gann, 'The US Bilateral Investment Treaties Program', 21 Stanford Journal of International Law, 1986, p. 373, and I. Pogany, 'The Regulation of Foreign Investment in Hungary', 4 ICSID Review – Foreign Investment Law Journal, 1989, p. 39. See also J. Kokott, 'Interim Report on the Role of Diplomatic Protection in the Field of the Protection of Foreign Investment', International Law Association, Report of the Seventieth Conference, New Delhi, 2002, p. 259, and C. McLachlan, 'Investment Treaties and General International Law', 57 ICLQ, 2008, p. 361.

[352] Kokott estimates that close to 2,000 are in existence, 'Interim Report', p. 263. See, for earlier figures, 35 ILM, 1996, p. 1130; Denza and Brooks, 'Investment Protection Treaties', p. 913, and UKMIL, 58 BYIL, 1987, p. 621. Lowenfeld estimates that as of 2006, some 2,400 to 2,600 bilateral investment treaties were in effect, International Economic Law, p. 554.

[353] See the text of the Foreign Office statement in UKMIL, 58 BYIL, 1987, p. 620. Such agreements are in UK practice usually termed investment promotion and protection agreements (IPPAs). In March 2000, it was stated that the UK had entered into ninety-three such treaties, UKMIL, 71 BYIL, 2000, p. 606.

[354] See Kokott, 'Interim Report', p. 263. See also R. Dolzer, 'New Foundations of the Law of Expropriation of Alien Property', 75 AJIL, 1981, pp. 553, 565–6, and B. Kishoiyian, 'The Utility of Bilateral Investment Treaties in the Formulation of Customary International Law', 14 Netherlands Journal of International Law and Business, 1994, p. 327.

[355] Text reproduced in 29 ILM, 1989, p. 366.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

> the term 'investment' means every kind of asset and in particular, though not exclusively, includes:
>
> (i) movable and immovable property and any other related property rights such as mortgages;
> (ii) shares in, and stocks, bonds and debentures of, and any other form of participation in, a company or business enterprise;
> (iii) claims to money, and claims to performance under contract having a financial value;
> (iv) intellectual property rights, technical processes, know-how and any other benefit or advantage attached to a business;
> (v) rights conferred by law or under contract to undertake any commercial activity, including the search for, or the cultivation, extraction or exploitation of natural resources.[356]

Secondly, both parties undertake to encourage and create favourable conditions for investment, to accord such investments 'fair and equitable treatment' and to refrain from impairing by unreasonable or discriminatory measures the management, maintenance, use, enjoyment or disposal of investments in its territory.[357] Thirdly, investments by the contracting parties are not to be treated less favourably than those of other states.[358] As far as expropriation is concerned, article 5 of the UK–USSR agreement, by way of example, provides that investments of the contracting parties are not to be expropriated:

> except for a purpose which is in the public interest and is not discriminatory and against the payment, without delay, of prompt and effective compensation. Such compensation shall amount to the real value of the investment expropriated immediately before the expropriation or before the impending expropriation became public knowledge, whichever is the earlier, shall be made within two months of the date of expropriation, after which interest at a normal commercial rate shall accrue until the date of payment and shall be effectively realisable and be freely transferable. The investor affected shall have a right under the law of the contracting state making the expropriation, to prompt review, by a judicial or other independent authority of that party, of his or its case and of the valuation of his or its investment in accordance with the principles set out in this paragraph.

[356] See also, for example, the similar provisions in the UK–Philippines Investment Agreement, 1981 and the UK–Hungary Investment Agreement, 1987. See also article 1(6) of the European Energy Charter Treaty, 1994.
[357] See e.g. article 2 of the UK–USSR agreement.
[358] See e.g. article 3 of the UK–USSR agreement.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

Such practice confirms the traditional principles dealing with the conditions of a lawful expropriation and compensation, noting also the acceptance of the jurisdiction of the expropriating state over the issues of the legality of the expropriation and the valuation of the property expropriated.[359] An attempt to produce a Multilateral Agreement on Investment commenced in 1995 within the framework of the Organisation of Economic Co-operation and Development, but foundered in 1998.[360]

Lump-sum agreements

Many disputes over expropriation of foreign property have in fact been resolved directly by the states concerned on the basis of lump-sum settlements, usually after protracted negotiations and invariably at valuation below the current value of the assets concerned.[361] For example, the UK–USSR Agreement on the Settlement of Mutual Financial and Property Claims, 1986[362] dealt with UK government claims of the order of £500 million in respect of Russian war debt and private claims of British nationals amounting to some £400 million.[363] In the event, a sum in the region of £45 million was made available to satisfy these claims.[364] The [359] Note that provisions for compensation for expropriation may also be contained in Treaties of Friendship, Commerce and Navigation as part of a framework arrangement dealing with foreign trade and investment: see e.g. article IV(3) of the Convention of Establishment, 1959 between the US and France, 11 UST 2398.

[360] See e.g. S. J. Canner, 'The Multilateral Agreement on Investment', 31 Cornell International Law Journal, 1998, p. 657; A. Böhmer, 'The Struggle for a Multilateral Agreement on Investment – An Assessment of the Negotiation Process in the OECD', 41 German YIL, 1998, p. 267, and T. Waelde, 'Multilateral Investment Agreements (MITs) in the Year 2000' in Mélanges Philippe Kahn, Paris, 2000, p. 389. See also www.oecd.org/EN/document/0,,EN-document-92–3-no-6–27308–92,00.html. Discussions on investment continue within the framework of the World Trade Organisation: see www.wto.org/english/tratop_e/invest_e/invest_e.htm.

[361] See e.g. Lillich and Weston, International Claims: Their Settlement by Lump-Sum Agreements, and Lillich and Weston, 'Lump-Sum Agreements: Their Continuing Contribution to the Law of International Claims', 82 AJIL, 1988, p. 69. See also D. J. Bederman, 'Interim Report on Lump Sum Agreements and Diplomatic Protection', International Law Association, Report of the Seventieth Conference, New Delhi, 2002, p. 230.

[362] Cm 30. Note that this agreement dealt with claims arising before 1939.

[363] As against these claims, the USSR had made extensive claims in the region of £2 billion in respect of alleged losses caused by British intervention in the USSR between 1918 and 1921: see UKMIL, 57 BYIL, 1986, p. 606.

[364] The British government waived its entitlement to a share in the settlement in respect of its own claims, ibid., p. 608.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

Agreement also provided that money held in diplomatic bank accounts in the UK belonging to the pre-revolutionary Russian Embassy, amounting to some £2.65 million, was released to the Soviet authorities. As is usual in such agreements, each government was solely responsible for settling the claims of its nationals.[365] This was accomplished in the UK through the medium of the Foreign Compensation Commission, which acts to distribute settlement sums 'as may seem just and equitable to them having regard to all the circumstances'. A distinction was made as between bond and property claims and principles enunciated with regard to exchange rates at the relevant time.[366]

The question arises thus as to whether such agreements constitute state practice in the context of international customary rules concerning the level of compensation required upon an expropriation of foreign property. A Chamber of the Iran–US Claims Tribunal in SEDCO v. National Iranian Oil Co.[367] noted that deriving general principles of law from the conduct of states in lump-sum or negotiated settlements in other expropriation cases was difficult because of the 'questionable evidentiary value . . . of much of the practice available'. This was because such settlements were often motivated primarily by non-juridical considerations. The Chamber also held incidentally that bilateral investment treaties were also unreliable evidence of international customary standards of compensation. Views differ as to the value to be attributed to such practice,[368] but caution is required before accepting bilateral investment treaties and lump-sum agreements as evidence of customary law. This is particularly so with regard to the latter since they deal with specific situations rather than laying down a framework for future activity.[369] Nevertheless, it would be equally unwise to disregard them entirely. As with all examples of state practice and behaviour, careful attention must be paid to all the relevant circumstances both of the practice maintained and the principle under consideration.

[365] See also the UK–China Agreement on the Settlement of Property Claims 1987, UKMIL, 58 BYIL, 1987, p. 626.

[366] See, with respect to the UK–USSR agreement, the Foreign Compensation (USSR) (Registration and Determination of Claims) Order 1986, SI 1986/2222 and the Foreign Compensation (USSR) (Distribution) Order 1987.

[367] 10 Iran–US CTR, pp. 180, 185; 80 AJIL, 1986, p. 969.

[368] See e.g. Bowett, 'State Contracts with Aliens', pp. 65–6.

[369] Note the view of the International Court in the Barcelona Traction case that such settlements were sui generis and provided no guide as to general international practice, ICJ Reports, 1969, pp. 4, 40.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

Non-discrimination

It has been argued that non-discrimination is a requirement for a valid and lawful expropriation.[370] Although it is not mentioned in the 1962 resolution, the arbitrator in the Liamco[371] case strongly argued that a discriminatory nationalisation would be unlawful.[372] Nevertheless, in that case, it was held that Libya's action against certain oil companies was aimed at preserving its ownership of the oil and was non-discriminatory. Indeed, the arbitrator noted that the political motive itself was not the predominant motive for nationalisation and would not per se constitute sufficient proof of a purely discriminatory measure.[373] While the discrimination factor would certainly be a relevant factor to be considered, it would in practice often be extremely difficult to prove in concrete cases.

The Multilateral Investment Guarantee Agency[374]

One approach to the question of foreign investment and the balancing of the interests of the states concerned is provided by the Convention Establishing the Multilateral Investment Guarantee Agency, 1985, which came into force in 1988.[375] This Agency is part of the World Bank group and offers political risk insurance (guarantees) to investors and lenders. Membership is open to all members of the World Bank. Article 2 provides that the purpose of the Agency, which is an affiliate of the World Bank, is to encourage the flow of investment for productive purposes among member countries and, in particular, to developing countries. This is to be achieved in essence by the provision of insurance cover 'against non-commercial risks', such as restrictions on the transfer of currency, measures of expropriation, breaches of government contracts and losses resulting from war or civil disturbances.[376]

[370] See e.g. White, Nationalisation, pp. 119 ff. See also A. Maniruzzaman, 'Expropriation of Alien Property and the Principle of Non-Discrimination in the International Law of Foreign Investment', 8 Journal of Transnational Law and Policy, 1999, p. 141.

[371] 20 ILM, 1981, p. 1; 62 ILR, p. 141. [372] 20 ILM, 1981, pp. 58–9; 62 ILR, p. 194.

[373] 20 ILM, 1981, p. 60. See also Section IV of the World Bank Guidelines on the Treatment of Foreign Direct Investment, and article 13 of the European Energy Charter Treaty, 1994.

[374] See e.g. S. K. Chatterjee, 'The Convention Establishing the Multilateral Investment Guarantee Agency', 36 ICLQ, 1987, p. 76, and I. Shihata, The Multilateral Investment Guarantee Agency and Foreign Investment, Dordrecht, 1987. The Convention came into force on 12 April 1988: see 28 ILM, 1989, p. 1233 and see also www.miga.org/.

[375] See e.g. the UK Multilateral Investment Guarantee Agency Act 1988.

[376] Article 11.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

It is also intended that the Agency would positively encourage investment by means of research and the dissemination of information on investment opportunities. It may very well be that this initiative could in the long term reduce the sensitive nature of the expropriation mechanism.

Suggestions for further reading

I. Brownlie, System of the Law of Nations: State Responsibility, Part I, Oxford, 1983

J. Crawford, The International Law Commission's Articles on State Responsibility, Cambridge, 2002

W. K. Geck, 'Diplomatic Protection' in Encyclopedia of Public International Law (ed. R. Bernhardt), Amsterdam, 1992, vol. X, p. 1053

C. Gray, Judicial Remedies in International Law, Oxford, 1987

International Responsibility Today: Essays in Memory of Oscar Schachter (ed. M. Ragazzi), The Hague, 2005

'Symposium: The ILC's State Responsibility Articles', 96 AJIL, 2002, p. 773

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

15

International environmental law

Recent years have seen an appreciable growth in the level of understanding of the dangers facing the international environment[1] and an extensive range of environmental problems is now the subject of serious international concern.[2] These include atmospheric pollution, marine pollution,

[1] See generally P. Birnie and A. Boyle, International Law and the Environment, 2nd edn, Oxford, 2002; C. Redgwell, Intergenerational Trusts and Environmental Protection, Manchester, 1999; P. Sands, Principles of International Environmental Law, Manchester, 2nd edn, 2003; E. Benvenisti, Sharing Transboundary Resources, Cambridge, 2002; M. Bothe and P. Sand, La Politique de l'Environnement: De la Réglementation aux Instruments Économique, The Hague, 2003; The Oxford Handbook of International Environmental Law (eds. D. Bodansky, J. Brunee and E. Hay), Oxford, 2007; R. Romi, Droit International et Européen de l'Environnement, Paris, 2005; R. Wolfrum and N. Matz, Conflicts in International Environmental Law, Berlin, 2003; A. Kiss and J.-P. Beurier, Droit International de l'Environnement, 3rd edn, Paris, 2004; A. Kiss and D. Shelton, A Guide to International Environmental Law, The Hague, 2007, and Kiss, 'International Protection of the Environment' in The Structure and Process of International Law (eds. R. St J. Macdonald and D. Johnston), The Hague, 1983, p. 1069; J. Barros and D. M. Johnston, The International Law of Pollution, New York, 1974; International Environmental Law (eds. L. Teclaff and A. Utton), New York, 1974; Trends in Environmental Policy and Law (ed. M. Bothe), Gland, 1980; Hague Academy of International Law Colloque 1973, The Protection of the Environment and International Law (ed. A. Kiss); ibid., Colloque 1984, The Future of the International Law of the Environment (ed. R. J. Dupuy); J. Schneider, World Public Order of the Environment, Toronto, 1979; International Environmental Law (eds. C. D. Gurumatry, G. W. R. Palmer and B. Weston), St Paul, 1994; E. Brown Weiss, In Fairness to Future Generations: International Law, Common Patrimony and Intergenerational Equity, Dobbs Ferry, 1989; A. Boyle, 'Nuclear Energy and International Law: An Environmental Perspective', 60 BYIL, 1989, p. 257, and Nguyen Quoc Dinh, P. Daillier and A. Pellet, Droit International Public, 7th edn, Paris, 2002, p. 1269. See also Selected Multilateral Treaties in the Field of the Environment, Cambridge, 2 vols., 1991; A. O. Adede, International Environmental Law Digest, Amsterdam, 1993, and P. Sands and P. Galizzi, Documents in International Environmental Law, Manchester, 2nd edn, 2003.

[2] This may be measured by the fact that in July 1993, the International Court of Justice established a special Chamber to deal with environmental questions. It has as yet heard no cases. See R. Ranjeva, 'L'Environnement, La Cour Internationale de Justice et sa Chambre Spéciale pour les Questions d'Environnement', AFDI, 1994, p. 433. Note also the Environmental Annex (Annex IV) to the Israel–Jordan Peace Treaty, 1995 and article 18 of the Treaty, 34 ILM, 1995, p. 43. See also Annex II on Water Related Matters.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

global warming and ozone depletion, the dangers of nuclear and other extra-hazardous substances and threatened wildlife species.[3] Such problems have an international dimension in two obvious respects. First, pollution generated from within a particular state often has a serious impact upon other countries. The prime example would be acid rain, whereby chemicals emitted from factories rise in the atmosphere and react with water and sunlight to form acids. These are carried in the wind and fall eventually to earth in the rain, often thousands of miles away from the initial polluting event. Secondly, it is now apparent that environmental problems cannot be resolved by states acting individually. Accordingly, co-operation between the polluting and the polluted state is necessitated. However, the issue becomes more complicated in those cases where it is quite impossible to determine from which country a particular form of environmental pollution has emanated. This would be the case, for example, with ozone depletion. In other words, the international nature of pollution, both with regard to its creation and the damage caused, is now accepted as requiring an international response.

The initial conceptual problem posed for international law lies in the state-oriented nature of the discipline. Traditionally, a state would only be responsible in the international legal sense for damage caused where it could be clearly demonstrated that this resulted from its own unlawful activity.[4] This has proved to be an inadequate framework for dealing with environmental issues for a variety of reasons, ranging from difficulties of proof to liability for lawful activities and the particular question of responsibility of non-state offenders. Accordingly, the international community has slowly been moving away from the classic state responsibility approach to damage caused towards a regime of international co-operation.

A broad range of international participants are concerned with developments in this field. States, of course, as the dominant subjects of the international legal system are deeply involved, as are an increasing number of international organisations, whether at the global, regional or bilateral level. The United Nations General Assembly has adopted a number of resolutions concerning the environment,[5] and the UN Environment Programme was established after the Stockholm Conference of 1972. This has proved a particularly important organisation in the evolution of conventions and instruments in the field of environmental protection. It is based in Nairobi and consists of a Governing Council of fifty-eight members elected by the General Assembly. UNEP has been responsible for the development of a number of initiatives, including the 1985 Vienna Convention for the Protection of the Ozone Layer and the 1987 Montreal Protocol and the 1992 Convention on Biodiversity.[6] An Inter-Agency Committee on Sustainable Development was set up in 1992 to improve co-operation between the various UN bodies concerned with this topic. In the same year, the UN Commission on Sustainable Development was established by the General Assembly and the Economic and Social Council of the UN (ECOSOC). It consists of fifty-three states elected by ECOSOC for three-year terms and it exists in order to follow up the UN Conference on Environment and Development 1992.[7] The techniques of supervision utilised in international bodies include reporting,[8] inspection[9] and standard-setting through the adoption of conventions, regulations, guidelines and so forth. In 1994 it was agreed to transform the Global Environment Facility from a three-year pilot programme[10] into a permanent financial mechanism to award grants and concessional funds to developing countries for global environmental protection projects.[11] The Facility focuses upon climate change, the destruction of biological diversity, the pollution of international waters and ozone depletion. Issues of land-degradation[12] also fall within this framework.[13] In addition, a wide range of non-governmental organisations are also concerned with environmental issues.

[3] See, as to endangered species, e.g. M. Carwardine, The WWF Environment Handbook, London, 1990, and S. Lyster, International Wildlife Law, Cambridge, 1985. See also the Convention on International Trade in Endangered Species, 1973 covering animals and plants, and the Convention on Biological Diversity, 1992, which inter alia calls upon parties to promote priority access on a fair and equitable basis by all parties, especially developing countries, to the results and benefits arising from biotechnologies based upon genetic resources provided by contracting parties.

[4] See further above, chapter 14.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

[5] See e.g. resolutions 2398 (XXII); 2997 (XXVII); 34/188; 35/8; 37/137; 37/250; 42/187; 44/244; 44/228; 45/212 and 47/188.

[6] See generally www.unep.org/.

[7] See generally www.un.org/esa/sustdev/csd.htm.

[8] As e.g. under the Prevention of Marine Pollution from Land-Based Sources Convention, 1974 and the Basle Convention on the Control of Transboundary Movements of Hazardous Wastes, 1989.

[9] See e.g. the Antarctic Treaty, 1959 and the Protocol on Environmental Protection, 1991. See, with regard to the International Whaling Commission, P. Birnie, International Regulation of Whaling, New York, 1985, p. 199.

[10] See 30 ILM, 1991, p. 1735.

[11] See 33 ILM, 1994, p. 1273.

[12] See also the UN Convention to Combat Desertification, 1994, ibid., p. 1328.

[13] See generally www.gefweb.org/.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

It has been argued that there now exists an international human right to a clean environment.[14] There are, of course, a range of general human rights provisions that may have a relevance in the field of environmental protection, such as the right to life, right to an adequate standard of living, right to health, right to food and so forth, but specific references to a human right to a clean environment have tended to be few and ambiguous. The preamble to the seminal Stockholm Declaration of the UN Conference on the Human Environment 1972 noted that the environment was 'essential to . . . the enjoyment of basic human rights – even the right to life itself', while Principle 1 stated that 'Man has the fundamental right to freedom, equality and adequate conditions of life, in an environment of a quality that permits a life of dignity and well-being.' Article 24 of the African Charter of Human and Peoples' Rights, 1981 provided that 'all people shall have the right to a general satisfactory environment favourable to their development', while article 11 of the Additional Protocol to the American Convention on Human Rights, 1988 declared that 'everyone shall have the right to live in a healthy environment' and that 'the states parties shall promote the protection, preservation and improvement of the environment'. Article 29 of the Convention on the Rights of the Child, 1989 explicitly referred to the need for the education of the child to be directed inter alia to 'the development of respect for the natural environment'.

The final text of the Conference on Security and Co-operation in Europe (CSCE) meeting on the environment in Sofia in 1989 reaffirmed respect for the right of individuals, groups and organisations concerned with the environment to express freely their views, to associate with others and assemble peacefully, to obtain and distribute relevant information and to participate in public debates on environmental issues.[15] It should also be noted that the Convention on Environmental Impact Assessment in a Transboundary Context, 1991 calls for the 'establishment [14] See, for example, M. Pallemaerts, 'International Environmental Law from Stockholm to Rio: Back to the Future?' in Greening International Law (ed. P. Sands), London, 1993, pp. 1, 8; Environnement et Droits de l'Homme (ed. P. Kromarek), Paris, 1987; G. Alfredsson and A. Ovsiouk, 'Human Rights and the Environment', 60 Nordic Journal of International Law, 1991, p. 19; W. P. Gormley, Human Rights and Environment, Leiden, 1976; Human Rights and Environmental Protection (ed. A. Cançado Trindade), 1992; D. Shelton, 'Whatever Happened in Rio to Human Rights?', 3 Yearbook of International Environmental Law, 1992, p. 75; Birnie and Boyle, International Law and the Environment, pp. 252 ff., and Human Rights Approaches to Environmental Protection (eds. M. Anderson and A. E. Boyle), Oxford, 1996. See also M. Déjeant-Pons and M. Pallemaerts, Human Rights and the Environment, Council of Europe, 2002.

[15] CSCE/SEM.36. See also EC Directive 90/313, 1990.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

of an environmental impact assessment procedure that permits public participation' in certain circumstances.

However, the references to human rights in the Rio Declaration on Environment and Development adopted at the UN Conference on Environment and Development in 1992[16] are rather sparse. Principle 1 declares that human beings are 'at the centre of concerns for sustainable development. They are entitled to a healthy and productive life in harmony with nature.' Beyond this tangential reference, human rights concerns were not, it is fair to say, at the centre of the documentation produced by the 1992 conference. In fact, it is fair to say that the focus of the conference was rather upon states and their sovereign rights than upon individuals and their rights.

Nevertheless, moves to associate the two areas of international law are progressing cautiously. In 1994, the final report on Human Rights and the Environment was delivered to the UN Sub-Commission on Prevention of Discrimination and Protection of Minorities (as it was then called).[17] The Report contains a set of Draft Principles on Human Rights and the Environment, which includes the notion that 'human rights, an ecologically sound environment, sustainable development and peace are interdependent and indivisible' and that 'all persons have the right to a secure, healthy and ecologically sound environment. This right and other human rights, including civil, cultural, economic, political and social rights, are universal, interdependent and indivisible.' It remains to be seen whether this initiative will bear fruit.[18] The Institut de Droit International, a private but influential association, adopted a resolution on the environment at its Strasbourg Session in September 1997. Article 2 of this noted that 'Every human being has the right to live in a healthy environment'.[19]

An important stage has been reached with the adoption of the Aarhus Convention on Access to Information, Public Participation in Decision-Making and Access to Justice in Environmental Matters, 1998,[20] which [16] See generally, as to the Rio Conference, S. Johnson, The Earth Summit, Dordrecht, 1993.

[17] E/CN.4/Sub.2/1994/9.

[18] Note also the European Charter on Environment and Health, 1989 and the Dublin Declaration on the Environmental Imperative adopted by the European Council, 1990.

[19] See also L. Loucaides, 'Environmental Protection through the Jurisprudence of the European Convention on Human Rights', 75 BYIL, 2004, p. 249.

[20] Adopted through the United Nations Economic Commission for Europe. The Convention came into force on 30 October 2001, see generally www.unece.org/env/pp/, and the first meeting of states parties took place in October 2002. Note that governments accepted in January 2003 a Protocol which obliges companies to register annually their releases into

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

explicitly links human rights and the environment and recognises that 'adequate protection of the environment is essential to human well-being and the enjoyment of basic human rights, including the right to life itself'. Article 1 provides that each contracting party 'shall guarantee the rights of access to information, public participation in decision-making and access to justice in environmental matters' and thereby marks the acceptance by parties of obligations towards their own citizens. Article 9 stipulates that parties should establish a review procedure before a court of law or other independent and impartial body for any persons who consider that their request for information has not been properly addressed, and article 15 provides that 'optional arrangements of a non-confrontational, non-judicial and consultative status' should be established for reviewing compliance with the Convention. Such arrangements are to allow for appropriate public involvement 'and may include the option of considering communications from members of the public on matters relating to this Convention'. Decision 1/7 adopted on 30 October 2002 set up an eight-member Compliance Committee to consider submissions made with regard to allegations of non-compliance with the Convention by one party against another or by members of the public against any contracting party unless that party has opted out of the procedure within one year of becoming a party. The Committee may also prepare a report on compliance with or implementation of the provisions of the Convention and monitor, assess and facilitate the implementation of and compliance with the reporting requirements made under article 10, paragraph 2, of the Convention and specified in Decision 1/8.[21]

The question of the relationship between the protection of the environment and the need for economic development is another factor underpinning the evolution of environmental law. States that are currently attempting to industrialise face the problem that to do so in an environmentally safe way is very expensive and the resources that can be devoted to this are extremely limited. The Stockholm Declaration of the United Nations Conference on the Human Environment 1972 emphasised in Principle 8 that 'economic and social development is essential for ensuring a favourable living and working environment for man and for creating the environment and transfer to other companies of certain pollutants. This information will then appear in the Pollutant Release and Transfer Register.

[21] See generally R. R. Churchill and G. Uffstein, 'Autonomous Institutional Arrangements in Multilateral Environmental Agreements: A Little-Noticed Phenomenon in International Law', 94 AJIL, 2000, p. 623.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

conditions on earth that are necessary for the improvement of the quality of life', while the sovereign right of states to exploit their own resources was also stressed.[22] Principle 2 of the Rio Declaration, adopted at the United Nations Conference on Environment and Development 1992, noted that states have 'the sovereign right to exploit their own resources pursuant to their own environmental and developmental policies', while Principle 3 stated that 'the right to development must be fulfilled so as to equitably meet developmental and environmental needs of present and future generations'. The correct balance between development and environmental protection is now one of the main challenges facing the international community and reflects the competing interests posed by the principle of state sovereignty on the one hand and the need for international co-operation on the other. It also raises the issue as to how far one takes into account the legacy for future generations of activities conducted at the present time or currently planned. Many developmental activities, such as the creation of nuclear power plants for example, may have significant repercussions for many generations to come.[23] The Energy Charter Treaty[24] signed at Lisbon in 1994 by OECD and Eastern European and CIS states refers to environmental issues in the context of energy concerns in a rather less than robust fashion. Article 19 notes that contracting parties 'shall strive to minimise in an economically efficient manner harmful environmental impacts'. In so doing, parties are to act 'in a cost-effective manner'. Parties are to 'strive to take precautionary measures to prevent or minimise environmental degradation' and agree that the polluter should 'in principle, bear the cost of pollution, including transboundary pollution, with due regard to the public interest and without distorting investment in the energy cycle or international trade'.

[22] Principle 21. See also S. P. Subedi, 'Balancing International Trade with Environmental Protection', 25 Brooklyn Journal of International Law, 1999, p. 373; T. Schoenbaum, 'International Trade and Protection of the Environment', 91 AJIL, 1997, p. 268, and N. Bernasconi-Osterwalder, D. Magraw, M. J. Oliva, M. Orellana and E. Tuerk, Environment and Trade: A Guide to WTO Jurisprudence, London, 2006. Note the OECD Declaration on Integrating Climate Change Adaptation into Development Cooperation, 2006.

[23] See e.g. A. D'Amato, 'Do We Owe a Duty to Future Generations to Preserve the Global Environment?', 84 AJIL, 1990, p. 190; Sands, Principles, p. 199; E. Weiss, 'Our Rights and Obligations to Future Generations for the Environment', 84 AJIL, 1990, p. 198, and Weiss, Intergenerational Equity. See also Minors Oposa v. Secretary of the Department of Environment and Natural Resources, Supreme Court of the Philippines, 33 ILM, 1994, pp. 173, 185, and Judge Weeramantry's Dissenting Opinion in the Request for an Examination of the Situation in Accordance with Paragraph 63 of the Nuclear Tests Case, ICJ Reports, 1995, pp. 288, 341; 106 ILR, pp. 1, 63.

[24] 33 ILM, 1995, p. 360.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

One potentially innovative method for linking economic underdevelopment and protection of the environment is the 'debt for nature swaps' arrangement, whereby debts owed abroad may be converted into an obligation upon the debtor state to spend the amount of the debt upon local environment projects.[25]

State responsibility and the environment[26]

The basic duty of states

The principles of state responsibility[27] dictate that states are accountable for breaches of international law. Such breaches of treaty or customary international law enable the injured state to maintain a claim against the violating state, whether by way of diplomatic action or by way of recourse to international mechanisms where such are in place with regard to the subject matter at issue. Recourse to international arbitration or to the International Court of Justice is also possible provided the necessary jurisdictional basis has been established. Customary international law imposes several important fundamental obligations upon states in the area of environmental protection. The view that international law supports an approach predicated upon absolute territorial sovereignty, so that a state could do as it liked irrespective of the consequences upon other states, has long been discredited. The basic duty upon states is not so to act as to injure the rights of other states.[28] This duty has evolved partly out of the regime concerned with international waterways. In the International Commission on the River Oder case,[29] for example, the Permanent Court of International Justice noted that 'this community of interest in a navigable river becomes the basis of a common legal right, the essential features of which are the perfect equality of all riparian states in the use of the whole course of the river and the exclusion of any preferential privileges

[25] See e.g. F. G. Minujin, 'Debt-for-Nature Swops: A Financial Mechanism to Reduce Debt and Preserve the Environment', 21 Environmental Policy and Law, 1991, p. 146, and S. George, The Debt Boomerang, London, 1992, pp. 30–1.

[26] See e.g. B. D. Smith, State Responsibility and the Marine Environment, Oxford, 1988. See also R. Lefeber, Transboundary Environmental Interference and the Origin of State Liability, Dordrecht, 1996.

[27] See further above, chapter 14.

[28] See the doctrine expressed by Judson Harmon, Attorney-General of the United States in 1895, 21 Op. Att'y. Gen. 274, 283 (1895), cited in V. P. Nanda, International Environmental Law and Policy, New York, 1995, pp. 155–6.

[29] PCIJ, Series A, No. 23 (1929); 5 AD, p. 83.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

of any riparian state in relation to others'.[30] But the principle is of far wider application. It was held in the Island of Palmas case[31] that the concept of territorial sovereignty incorporated an obligation to protect within the territory the rights of other states.

In the Trail Smelter arbitration,[32] the Tribunal was concerned with a dispute between Canada and the United States over sulphur dioxide pollution from a Canadian smelter, built in a valley shared by British Columbia and the state of Washington, which damaged trees and crops on the American side of the border. The Tribunal noted that:

> under principles of international law, as well as the law of the United States, no state has the right to use or permit the use of territory in such a manner as to cause injury by fumes in or to the territory of another or the properties or persons therein, when the case is of serious consequence and the injury is established by clear and convincing evidence.[33]

The International Court reinforced this approach, by emphasising in the Corfu Channel case[34] that it was the obligation of every state 'not to allow knowingly its territory to be used for acts contrary to the rights of other states'.[35] The Court also noted in the Request for an Examination of the Situation in Accordance with Paragraph 63 of the Nuclear Tests Case 1974 case in 1995, that its conclusion with regard to French nuclear testing in the Pacific was 'without prejudice to the obligations of states to respect and protect the environment'.[36] In addition, in its Advisory Opinion to the UN General Assembly on the Legality of the Threat or Use of Nuclear Weapons, the Court declared that 'the existence of the general obligation of states to ensure that activities within their jurisdiction and control respect

[30] PCIJ, Series A, No. 23 (1929), p. 27; 5 AD, p. 84. See also the case concerning the Auditing of Accounts between the Netherlands and France, arbitral award of 12 March 2004, para. 97.

[31] 2 RIAA, pp. 829, 839 (1928).

[32] See 33 AJIL, 1939, p. 182 and 35 AJIL, 1941, p. 684; 9 AD, p. 315. See also J. E. Read, 'The Trail Smelter Arbitration', 1 Canadian YIL, 1963, p. 213; R. Kirgis, 'Technological Challenge of the Shared Environment: US Practice', 66 AJIL, 1974, p. 291, and L. Goldie, 'A General View of International Environmental Law – A Survey of Capabilities, Trends and Limits' in Hague Colloque 1973, pp. 26, 66–9.

[33] 35 AJIL, 1941, p. 716; 9 AD, p. 317. Canada invoked the Trail Smelter principle against the United States when an oil spill at Cherry Point, Washington, resulted in contamination of beaches in British Columbia: see 11 Canadian YIL, 1973, p. 333.

[34] ICJ Reports, 1949, pp. 4, 22; 16 AD, pp. 155, 158.

[35] See also the Dissenting Opinion of Judge de Castro in the Nuclear Tests case, ICJ Reports, 1974, pp. 253, 388; 57 ILR, pp. 350, 533, and the Lac Lanoux case, 24 ILR, p. 101.

[36] ICJ Reports, 1995, pp. 288, 306; 106 ILR, pp. 1, 28.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

the environment of other states or of areas beyond national control is now part of the corpus of international law relating to the environment'.[37]

This judicial approach has now been widely reaffirmed in international instruments. Article 192 of the Law of the Sea Convention, 1982 provides that 'states have the obligation to protect and preserve the marine environment', while article 194 notes that 'states shall take all measures necessary to ensure that activities under their jurisdiction and control are so conducted as not to cause damage by pollution to other states and their environment'.[38] The shift of focus from the state alone to a wider perspective including the high seas, deep seabed and outer space is a noticeable development.[39]

It is, however, Principle 21 of the Stockholm Declaration of 1972 that is of especial significance. It stipulates that, in addition to the sovereign right to exploit their own resources pursuant to their own environmental policies, states have 'the responsibility to ensure that activities within their jurisdiction or control do not cause damage to the environment of other states or of areas beyond the limits of national jurisdiction'. Although a relatively modest formulation repeated in Principle 2 of the Rio Declaration 1992 (with the addition of a reference to developmental policies), it has been seen as an important turning-point in the development of international environmental law.[40] Several issues of importance are raised in the formulation contained in Principle 21 and to those we now turn.

The appropriate standard

It is sometimes argued that the appropriate standard for the conduct of states in this field is that of strict liability. In other words, states are under an absolute obligation to prevent pollution and are thus liable for its effects irrespective of fault.[41] While the advantage of this is the increased [37] ICJ Reports, 1996, para. 29; 35 ILM, 1996, pp. 809, 821. See also the Gabčíkovo–Nagymaros Project case, ICJ Reports, 1997, pp. 6, 67; 116 ILR, p. 1.

[38] See also Principle 3 of the UN Environment Programme Principles of Conduct in the Field of the Environment concerning Resources Shared by Two or More States, 1978; the Charter of Economic Rights and Duties of States adopted in General Assembly resolution 1974 3281 (XXIX) and General Assembly resolution 34/186 (1979).

[39] See Boyle, 'Nuclear Energy', p. 271.

[40] See e.g. Sands, Principles, pp. 235–6, terming it the 'cornerstone of international environmental law'. See also the preamble to the Convention on Long-Range Transboundary Air Pollution, 1979 and the Legality of the Threat or Use of Nuclear Weapons advisory opinion, ICJ Reports, 1996, pp. 226, 241; 110 ILR, pp. 163, 191.

[41] See e.g. Goldie, 'General View', pp. 73–85, and Schneider, World Public Order, chapter 6. See also G. Handl, 'State Liability for Accidental Transnational Environmental Damage responsibility placed upon the state, it is doubtful whether international law has in fact accepted such a general principle.[42] The leading cases are inconclusive. In the Trail Smelter case[43] Canada's responsibility was accepted from the start, the case focusing upon the compensation due and the terms of the future operation of the smelter,[44] while the strict theory was not apparently accepted in the Corfu Channel case.[45] In the Nuclear Tests case[46] the Court did not discuss the substance of the claims concerning nuclear testing in view of France's decision to end its programme.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

It is also worth considering the Gut Dam arbitration between the US and Canada.[47] This concerned the construction of a dam by the Canadian authorities, with US approval, straddling the territory of the two states, in order to facilitate navigation in the St Lawrence River, prior to the existence of the Seaway. The dam affected the flow of water in the river basin and caused an increase in the level of water in the river and in Lake Ontario. This, together with the incidence of severe storms, resulted in heavy flooding on the shores of the river and lake and the US government claimed damages. The tribunal awarded a lump sum payment to the US, without considering whether Canada had been in any way negligent or at fault with regard to the construction of the dam. However, one must be cautious in regarding this case as an example of a strict liability approach, since the US gave its approval to the construction of the dam on the condition that US citizens be indemnified for any damage or detriment incurred as a result of the construction or operation of the dam in question.[48]

Treaty practice is variable. The Convention on International Liability for Damage Caused by Space Objects, 1972 provides for absolute liability for damage caused by space objects on the surface of the earth or to aircraft in flight (article II), but for fault liability for damage caused elsewhere or to persons or property on board a space object (article III).[49] Most treaties, however, take the form of requiring the exercise of diligent by Private Persons', 74 AJIL, 1980, p. 525; Birnie and Boyle, International Law and the Environment, pp. 182 ff., and Sands, Principles, pp. 881 ff.

[42] See e.g. Boyle, 'Nuclear Energy', pp. 289–97, and Handl, 'State Liability', pp. 535–53.

[43] 33 AJIL, 1939, p. 182 and 35 AJIL, 1941, p. 681; 9 AD, p. 315.

[44] See Boyle, 'Nuclear Energy', p. 292, and G. Handl, 'Balancing of Interests and International Liability for the Pollution of International Watercourses: Customary Principles of Law Revisited', 13 Canadian YIL, 1975, pp. 156, 167–8.

[45] ICJ Reports, 1949, pp. 4, 22–3; 16 AD, pp. 155, 158.

[46] ICJ Reports, 1974, p. 253; 57 ILR, p. 350.

[47] 8 ILM, 1969, p. 118.

[48] See Schneider, World Public Order, p. 165. Cf. Handl, 'State Liability', pp. 525, 538 ff.

[49] See e.g. the Canadian claim in the Cosmos 954 incident, 18 ILM, 1992, p. 907.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

control of sources of harm, so that responsibility is engaged for breaches of obligations specified in the particular instruments.[50]

The test of due diligence is in fact the standard that is accepted generally as the most appropriate one.[51] Article 194 of the Convention on the Law of the Sea, 1982, for example, provides that states are to take 'all measures ... that are necessary to prevent, reduce and control pollution of the marine environment from any source, using for this purpose the best practicable means at their disposal and in accordance with their capabilities'. Accordingly, states in general are not automatically liable for damage caused irrespective of all other factors. However, it is rather less clear what is actually meant by due diligence. In specific cases, such as the Convention on the Law of the Sea, 1982, for example, particular measures are specified and references made to other relevant treaties. In other cases, the issue remains rather more ambiguous.[52] The test of due diligence undoubtedly imports an element of flexibility into the equation and must be tested in the light of the circumstances of the case in question. States will be required, for example, to take all necessary steps to prevent substantial pollution and to demonstrate the kind of behaviour expected of 'good government',[53] while such behaviour would probably require the establishment of systems of consultation and notification.[54] It is also important to note that elements of remoteness and foreseeability are part of the framework of the liability of states. The damage that occurs must have been caused by the pollution under consideration. The tribunal in [50] See e.g. article 1 of the London Convention on the Prevention of Marine Pollution by Dumping of Wastes, 1972; article 2 of the Convention on Long-Range Transboundary Air Pollution, 1979; article 2 of the Vienna Convention for the Protection of the Ozone Layer, 1985 and articles 139, 194 and 235 of the Convention on the Law of the Sea, 1982; articles 7 and 8 of the Convention for the Regulation of Antarctic Mineral Resources Activities, 1988 and article 2 of the Convention on the Protection and Use of Transboundary Watercourses and International Lakes, 1992. See also the Commentary by the International Law Commission to article 7 of the Draft Articles on the Law of the Non-Navigational Uses of International Watercourses, Report of the International Law Commission, 46th Session, 1994, pp. 236 ff.

[51] This is the view taken by the ILC in its Commentary on the Draft Articles on Prevention of Transboundary Harm from Hazardous Activities, 2001, Report of the ILC on its 53rd Session, A/56/10, p. 392. See also e.g. Handl, 'State Liability', pp. 539–40; Boyle, 'Nuclear Energy', p. 272, and Birnie and Boyle, International Law and the Environment, pp. 112 ff.

[52] See e.g. the Long-Range Transboundary Air Pollution Convention, 1979.

[53] I.e. the standard of conduct expected from a government mindful of its international obligations: see R. J. Dupuy, 'International Liability for Transfrontier Pollution', in Bothe, Trends in Environmental Policy and Law, pp. 363, 369.

[54] See Responsibility and Liability of States in Relation to Transfrontier Pollution, an OECD Report by the Environment Committee, 1984, p. 4.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

the Trail Smelter case[55] emphasised the need to establish the injury 'by clear and convincing evidence'.

Damage caused

The first issue is whether indeed any damage must actually have been caused before international responsibility becomes relevant. Can there be liability for risk of damage? It appears that at this stage international law in general does not recognise such a liability,[56] certainly outside of the category of ultra-hazardous activities.[57] This is for reasons both of state reluctance in general and with regard to practical difficulties in particular. It would be difficult, although not impossible, both to assess the risk involved and to determine the compensation that might be due.

However, it should be noted that article 1(4) of the Convention on the Law of the Sea, 1982 defines pollution of the marine environment as 'the introduction by man, directly or indirectly, of substances or energy into the marine environment ... which results or is likely to result in ... deleterious effects'. In other words, actual damage is not necessary in this context. It is indeed possible that customary international law may develop in this direction, but it is too early to conclude that this has already occurred. Most general definitions of pollution rely upon damage or harm having been caused before liability is engaged.[58]

The next issue is to determine whether a certain threshold of damage must have been caused. In the Trail Smelter case,[59] the Tribunal focused on the need to show that the matter was of 'serious consequence', while article 1 of the Convention on Long-Range Transboundary Air Pollution, 1979 provides that the pollution concerned must result 'in deleterious effects of such a nature as to endanger human health, harm living resources and ecosystems and material property and impair or interfere with amenities and other legitimate uses of the environment'.[60] Article 3 of the ILA

[55] 35 AJIL, 1941, p. 716; 9 AD, p. 317.

[56] See e.g. Kiss, 'International Protection', p. 1076. [57] See below, p. 887.

[58] See also the commentary to the Montreal Rules adopted by the ILA in 1982, Report of the Sixtieth Conference, p. 159. Note, however, that the International Law Commission's Draft Articles on Prevention of Transboundary Harm from Hazardous Activities, adopted in 2001, concern activities not prohibited by international law which involve a 'risk of causing significant transboundary harm', Report of the ILC on its 53rd Session, p. 380.

[59] 35 AJIL, 1941, p. 716; 9 AD, p. 317.

[60] Note also that General Assembly resolution 2995 (XXVII) refers to 'significant harmful results'. See also article 1 of the ILC's Draft Articles on Prevention of Transboundary Harm from Hazardous Activities, Report of the ILC on its 53rd Session, p. 380.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

Montreal Rules 1982 stipulates that states are under an obligation to prevent, abate and control transfrontier pollution to such an extent that no substantial injury is caused in the territory of another state.[61] Such formulations do present definitional problems and the qualification as to the threshold of injury required is by no means present in all relevant instruments.[62] The issue of relativity and the importance of the circumstances of the particular case remain significant factors, but less support can be detected at this stage for linkage to a concept of reasonable and equitable use of its territory by a state occasioning liability for use beyond this.[63]

As far as the range of interests injured by pollution is concerned, the Trail Smelter case[64] focused upon loss of property. Later definitions of pollution in international instruments have broadened the range to include harm to living resources or ecosystems, interference with amenities and other legitimate uses of the environment or the sea. Article 1(4) of the Convention on the Law of the Sea, 1982, for example, includes impairment of quality for use of sea water and reduction of amenities. Article 1(2) of the Vienna Convention on the Ozone Layer, 1985 defines adverse effects upon the ozone layer as changes in the physical environment including climatic changes 'which have significant deleterious effects on human health or on the composition, resilience and productivity of natural and managed ecosystems or on materials useful to mankind',[65] while the Climate Change Convention, 1992 defines adverse effects of climate change as 'changes in the physical environment or biota resulting from climate change which have significant deleterious effects on the composition, resilience or productivity of natural and managed ecosystems or on the operation of socio-economic systems or on human health and welfare'.[66]

[61] Note the formulation by L. Oppenheim, International Law, 8th edn, London, 1955, vol. I, p. 291, that the interference complained of must be 'unduly injurious to the inhabitants of the neighbouring state'.

[62] See e.g. Principle 21 of the Stockholm Declaration and article 194 of the Convention on the Law of the Sea, 1982.

[63] See the views of e.g. R. Quentin-Baxter, Yearbook of the ILC, 1981, vol. II, part 1, pp. 112–19, and S. McCaffrey, ibid., 1986, vol. II, part 1, pp. 133–4. See also Boyle, 'Nuclear Energy', p. 275, and 'Chernobyl and the Development of International Environmental Law' in Perestroika and International Law (ed. W. Butler), London, 1990, pp. 203, 206.

[64] 35 AJIL, 1941, p. 684; 9 AD, p. 315. See also A. Rubin, 'Pollution by Analogy: The Trail Smelter Arbitration', 50 Oregon Law Review, 1971, p. 259.

[65] See also the OECD Recommendation of Equal Right of Access in Relation to Transfrontier Pollution, 1977 and article 1(15) of the Convention on the Regulation of Antarctic Mineral Resource Activities, 1988.

[66] Article 1(1).

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

The Convention on Regulation of Antarctic Mineral Resources, 1988[67] defines damage to the environment and ecosystem of that polar region as 'any impact on the living or non-living components of that environment or those ecosystems, including harm to atmospheric, marine or terrestrial life, beyond that which is negligible or which has been assessed and judged to be acceptable pursuant to [the] Convention'.[68] The Convention on the Protection and Use of Transboundary Watercourses and International Lakes, 1992 defines 'transboundary impact', which is the subject of provision, in terms of 'any significant adverse effect on the environment resulting from a change in the conditions of transboundary waters caused by a human activity'.[69] The Council of Europe's Convention on Civil Liability for Environmental Damage, 1993 defines damage to include loss or damage by 'impairment of the environment',[70] while the environment itself is taken to include natural resources both abiotic and biotic, property forming part of the cultural heritage and 'the characteristic aspects of the landscape'.[71] The type of harm that is relevant clearly now extends beyond damage to property,[72] but problems do remain with regard to general environmental injury that cannot be defined in material form.[73]

Liability for damage caused by private persons

A particular problem relates to the situation where the environmental injury is caused not by the state itself but by a private party.[74] A state is,

[67] See generally on Antarctica, C. Redgwell, 'Environmental Protection in Antarctica: The 1991 Protocol', 43 ICLQ, 1994, p. 599, and above, chapter 10, p. 534. Note Annex VI to the Protocol on Environmental Protection to the Antarctic Treaty, Liability Arising from Environmental Emergencies, 2005. See also, with regard to the Arctic, D. R. Rothwell, 'International Law and the Protection of the Arctic Environment', 44 ICLQ, 1995, p. 280.

[68] Article 1(15). See also article 2 of the Convention on Environmental Impact Assessment in a Transboundary Context, 1991 and article 1 of the Code of Conduct on Accidental Pollution of Transboundary Inland Waters, 1990.

[69] Article 1(2). [70] Article 2(7)c.

[71] Article 2(10). See also article 1 of the ILC's Draft Principles on the Allocation of Loss in the Case of Transboundary Harm Arising out of Hazardous Activities, 2006, A/61/10, pp. 110, 121.

[72] Note that the Canadian claim for clean-up costs consequential upon the crash of a Soviet nuclear-powered satellite was settled: see 18 ILM, 1979, p. 902.

[73] Note that Security Council resolution 687 (1991) declared that Iraq was liable under international law inter alia 'for any direct loss, damage, including environmental damage and the depletion of natural resources' occurring as a result of the unlawful invasion and occupation of Kuwait.

[74] See e.g. Handl, 'State Liability', and G. Doeker and T. Gehring, 'Private or International Liability for Transnational Environmental Damage – The Precedent of Conventional Liability Regimes', 2 Journal of Environmental Law, 1990, p. 1.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

of course, responsible for unlawful acts of its officials causing injury to nationals of foreign states[75] and retains a general territorial competence under international law. In general, states must ensure that their international obligations are respected on their territory. Many treaties require states parties to legislate with regard to particular issues, in order to ensure the implementation of specific obligations. Where an international agreement requires, for example, that certain limits be placed upon emissions of a particular substance, the state would be responsible for any activity that exceeded the limit, even if it were carried out by a private party, since the state had undertaken a binding commitment.[76] Similarly where the state has undertaken to impose a prior authorisation procedure upon a particular activity, a failure so to act which resulted in pollution violating international law would occasion the responsibility of the state.

In some cases, an international agreement might specifically provide for the liability of the state for the acts of non-state entities. Article 6 of the Outer Space Treaty, 1967, for example, stipulates that states parties bear international responsibility for 'national activities in outer space . . . whether such activities are carried out by governmental agencies or by non-governmental agencies'.[77]

Prevention of transboundary harm from hazardous activities[78]

The International Law Commission started considering in 1978 the topic of 'International Liability for the Injurious Consequences of Acts Not Prohibited by International Law'[79] and the main focus of the work of [77] See also article I of the Convention on International Liability for Damage Caused by Space Objects, 1972 and article XIV of the Moon Treaty, 1979. See further below, p. 893, with regard to civil liability schemes.

[75] See above, chapter 14. [76] See below, p. 873.

[78] See e.g. J. Barboza, 'International Liability for the Injurious Consequences of Acts not Prohibited by International Law and Protection of the Environment', 247 HR, 1994 III, p. 291; A. Boyle, 'State Responsibility and International Liability for Injurious Consequences of Acts not Prohibited by International Law: A Necessary Distinction?', 39 ICLQ, 1990, p. 1; M. Akehurst, 'International Liability for Injurious Consequences Arising out of Acts not Prohibited by International Law', 16 Netherlands YIL, 1985, p. 3; D. B. Magraw, 'Transboundary Harm: The International Law Commission's Study of International Liability', 80 AJIL, 1986, p. 305, and C. Tomuschat, 'International Liability for Injurious Consequences Arising out of Acts not Prohibited by International Law: The Work of the International Law Commission' in International Responsibility for Environmental Harm (eds. F. Francioni and T. Scovazzi), London, 1991, p. 37. See also Birnie and Boyle, International Law and the Environment, p. 105, and Sands, Principles, pp. 901 ff.

[79] See Yearbook of the ILC, 1978, vol. II, part 2, p. 149.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

the Commission was on environmental harm.[80] It was argued that international liability differed from state responsibility in that the latter is dependent upon a prior breach of international law,[81] while the former constitutes an attempt to develop a branch of law in which a state may be liable internationally with regard to the harmful consequences of an activity which is in itself not contrary to international law. This was a controversial approach. The theoretical basis and separation from state responsibility were questioned.[82] The ILC revised its work and eventually adopted Draft Articles on Prevention of Transboundary Harm from Hazardous Activities in 2001.[83]

Article 1 of the Draft provides that the articles are to apply to activities not prohibited by international law which involve a 'risk of causing significant transboundary harm through their physical consequences'. The Commentary to the Draft Articles specifies that the notion of risk is to be taken objectively 'as denoting an appreciation of possible harm resulting from an activity which a properly informed observer had or ought to have had'.[84] Members of the Commission had in the past been divided as to whether the focus of the topic should be upon risk or upon harm;[85] this now appears settled. Article 2 of the Draft provides that 'risk of causing significant transboundary harm' is to be defined as including 'a high probability of causing significant transboundary harm and a low probability of causing disastrous transboundary harm'.[86] In other words, the relevant threshold is established by a combination of risk and harm and this threshold must reach a level deemed 'significant'.[87] The International Law Commission has taken the view that this term, while factually based, means something more than 'detectable', but need not reach the level of 'serious' or 'substantial'.[88] The state of origin (i.e. where the activities are taking place or are to take place) 'shall take all appropriate measures to [80] See e.g. Quentin-Baxter's preliminary report, Yearbook of the ILC, 1980, vol. II, part 1, p. 24.

[81] See above, chapter 14.
[82] See e.g. Boyle, 'State Responsibility', p. 3, and I. Brownlie, System of the Law of Nations: State Responsibility, Part I, Oxford, 1983, p. 50.
[83] Report of the ILC on its 53rd Session, p. 379.
[84] Ibid., p. 385.
[85] See e.g. S. McCaffrey, 'The Fortieth Session of the International Law Commission', 83 AJIL, 1989, pp. 153, 170, and McCaffrey, 'The Forty-First Session of the International Law Commission', 83 AJIL, 1989, pp. 937, 944.
[86] Report of the ILC on its 53rd Session, p. 386.
[87] Ibid., p. 387. See also article 1 of the Code of Conduct on Accidental Pollution of Transboundary Inland Waters adopted by the Economic Commission for Europe in 1990.
[88] Report of ILC on its 53rd Session, p. 388.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

prevent significant transboundary harm or at any event to minimise the risk thereof'.[89] The relevant test is that of due diligence, this being that which is generally considered to be appropriate and proportional to the degree of risk of transboundary harm in the particular instance and this test requires the state to keep up to date with technological and scientific developments.[90]

States are to co-operate in good faith in trying to prevent such activities from causing significant transboundary injury and in minimising the effects of the risk, and they are to seek the assistance as necessary of competent international organisations.[91] The state is to take legislative, administrative and other action, including the establishment of suitable monitoring mechanisms to implement the provisions in the draft articles,[92] and is to require prior authorisation for any activities within the scope of the article.[93] In deciding upon such authorisation, the state must base its answer on an assessment of the possible transboundary harm, including any environmental impact assessment.[94] If a risk is indeed indicated by such an assessment, timely notification must be made to the state likely to be affected[95] and information provided,[96] while the states concerned are to enter into consultation with a view to achieving acceptable solutions regarding measures to be adopted in order to prevent or minimise the risk of causing significant transboundary harm or to minimise the risk thereof. Such solutions must be based on an equitable balance of interests.[97]

Article 10 of the Draft lays down a series of relevant factors and circumstances in achieving this 'equitable balance of interests'. These include the degree of risk of significant transboundary harm and the availability of means of preventing or minimising such risk or of repairing the harm; the importance of the activity, taking into account its overall advantages of a social, economic and technical character for the state of origin in relation to the potential harm for the states likely to be affected; the risk of significant harm to the environment and the availability of means of preventing or minimising such risk or restoring the environment; the economic viability of the activity in relation to the costs of prevention demanded by the states likely to be affected and to the possibility of carrying out the activity elsewhere or by other means or replacing it with an alternative activity; the degree to which the states likely to be affected

[89] Article 3. [90] Report of the ILC on its 53rd Session, p. 394.
[91] Article 4. [92] Article 5. [93] Article 6. [94] Article 7.
[95] Articles 8 and 17. [96] Article 8. See also articles 12, 13 and 14. [97] Article 9.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

are prepared to contribute to the costs of prevention; and the standards of protection which the states likely to be affected apply to the same or comparable activities and the standards applied in comparable regional or international practice.[98]

In 2006, the ILC adopted the Draft Principles on the Allocation of Loss in the Case of Transboundary Harm Arising out of Hazardous Activities,[99] the purpose of which is to ensure prompt and adequate compensation to victims of transboundary damage and to preserve and protect the environment. States are to take all necessary measures to ensure such compensation is available, including the imposition of liability upon operators without requiring proof of fault.[100]

The problems of the state responsibility approach

The application of the classical international law approach, founded upon state responsibility for breaches of international obligations and the requirement to make reparation for such breaches, to environmental problems is particularly problematic. The need to demonstrate that particular damage has been caused to one state by the actions of another state means that this model can only with difficulty be applied to more than a small proportion of environmental problems. In many cases it is simply impossible to prove that particular damage has been caused by one particular source, while this bilateral focus cannot really come to terms with the fact that the protection of the environment of the earth is truly a global problem requiring a global or pan-state response and one that cannot be successfully tackled in such an arbitrary and piecemeal fashion. Accordingly, the approach to dealing with environmental matters has shifted from the bilateral state responsibility paradigm to establishment and strengthening of international co-operation.

International co-operation

A developing theme of international environmental law, founded upon general principles, relates to the requirement for states to co-operate in dealing with transboundary pollution issues. Principle 24 of the Stockholm Declaration 1972 noted that 'international matters concerning the [98] This article draws upon article 6 of the Convention on the Law of the Non-Navigational Uses of International Watercourses, 1997.

[99] A/61/10, p. 110. [100] Principles 3 and 4.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

protection and improvement of the environment should be handled in a co-operative spirit', while Principle 7 of the Rio Declaration 1992 emphasised that 'states shall co-operate in a spirit of global partnership to conserve, protect and restore the health and integrity of the Earth's ecosystem'. Principle 13 of the Rio Declaration refers both to national and international activities in this field by stating that:

> states shall develop national law regarding liability and compensation for the victims of pollution and other environmental damage. States shall also co-operate in an expeditious and more determined manner to develop further international law regarding liability and compensation for adverse effects of environmental damage caused by activities within their jurisdiction or control to areas beyond their jurisdiction.[101]

The Corfu Channel case[102] established the principle that states are not knowingly to allow their territory to be used for acts contrary to the rights of other states and from this can be deduced a duty to inform other states of known environmental hazards. A large number of international agreements reflect this proposition. Article 198 of the Convention on the Law of the Sea, 1982, for example, provides that 'when a state becomes aware of cases in which the marine environment is in imminent danger of being damaged or had been damaged by pollution, it shall immediately notify other states it deems likely to be affected by such damage, as well as the competent international authorities'.[103] Article 13 of the Basle Convention on the Control of Transboundary Movement of Hazardous Wastes, 1989 provides that states parties shall, whenever it comes to their knowledge, ensure that in the case of an accident occurring during the transboundary movement of hazardous wastes which are likely to present risks to human health and the environment in other states, those states are immediately informed.[104]

It is also to be noted that in 1974 the OECD (the Organisation for Economic Co-operation and Development) adopted a Recommendation that prior to the initiation of works or undertakings that might create a risk of significant transfrontier pollution, early information should be [101] See also Principle 27. [102] ICJ Reports, 1949, pp. 4, 22; 16 AD, pp. 155, 158.

[103] See also article 211(7).
[104] See also e.g. article 8 of the International Convention for the Prevention of Pollution from Ships, 1973; Annex 6 of the Helsinki Convention on the Protection of the Marine Environment of the Baltic Sea, 1974 and article 9 of the Barcelona Convention for the Protection of the Mediterranean Sea, Protocol of Co-operation in Case of Emergency, 1976.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

provided to states that are or may be affected.[105] In 1988, the OECD adopted a Council Decision in which it is provided that states must provide information for the prevention of and the response to accidents at hazardous installations and transmit to exposed countries the results of their studies on proposed installations. A duty to exchange emergency plans is stipulated, as well as a duty to transmit immediate warning to exposed countries where an accident is an imminent threat.[106] The point is also emphasised in the Rio Declaration of 1992. Principle 18 provides that states shall immediately notify other states of any natural disasters or other emergencies that are likely to produce sudden harmful effects on the environment of those states, while Principle 19 stipulates that states shall provide prior and timely notification and relevant information to potentially affected states on activities that may have a significant adverse transboundary environmental effect and shall consult with those states at an early stage and in good faith.[107]

One may also point to a requirement of prior consultation. Article 5 of the ILA Montreal Rules provides that states planning to carry out activities which might entail a significant risk of transfrontier pollution shall give early notice to states likely to be affected. This provision builds upon, for example, the Lac Lanoux arbitration between France and Spain,[108] which concerned the proposed diversion of a shared watercourse. The arbitral tribunal noted in particular the obligation to negotiate in such circumstances.[109] Some treaties establish a duty of prior notification, one early example being the Nordic Convention on the Protection of the Environment, 1974. Article 5 of the Long-Range Transboundary Air Pollution Convention, 1979 provides that consultations shall be held, upon request, at an early stage between the state within whose jurisdiction the activity is to be conducted and states which are actually affected by or exposed to a significant risk of long-range transboundary air pollution.[110] The [105] Title E, para. 6. See also the OECD Recommendation for the Implementation of a Regime of Equal Right of Access and Non-Discrimination in Relation to Transfrontier Pollution, 1977, Title C, para. 8.

[106] C(88)84.

[107] See also article 3 of the Convention on Environmental Impact Assessment in a Transboundary Context, 1991 and Principle 5 of the ILC Draft Principles on the Allocation of Loss, 2006, A/61/10, p. 166.

[108] 24 ILR, p. 101.

[109] Ibid., p. 119. See also the North Sea Continental Shelf cases, ICJ Reports, 1969, pp. 3, 46–7; 41 ILR, pp. 29, 76.

[110] Note also that article 8(b) calls for the exchange of information inter alia on major changes in national policies and in general industrial development and on their potential

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

increasing range of state practice[111] has led the International Law Association to conclude that 'a rule of international customary law has emerged that in principle a state is obliged to render information on new or increasing pollution to a potential victim state'.[112] Article 8 of the ILC's Draft Articles on Prevention of Transboundary Harm from Hazardous Activities 2001 provides that where an assessment indicates a risk of causing significant transboundary harm, the state of origin is to inform the state likely to be affected with timely notification and information and may not take any decision on authorisation within six months of the response of the state likely to be affected.[113]

The evolution of a duty to inform states that might be affected by the creation of a source of new or increasing pollution has been accompanied by consideration of an obligation to make environmental impact assessments.[114] This requirement is included in several treaties.[115] Article 204 of the Convention on the Law of the Sea, 1982 provides that states should 'observe, measure, evaluate and analyse by recognised scientific methods, the risks or effects of pollution on the marine environment' and in particular 'shall keep under surveillance the effects of any activities which they permit or in which they engage in order to determine whether these activities are likely to pollute the marine environment'. Reports are to be published, while under article 206, when states have reasonable grounds for believing that planned activities under their jurisdiction or control may cause substantial pollution of, or significant and harmful changes impact, which would be likely to cause significant changes in long-range transboundary air pollution.

111 See ILA, Report of the Sixtieth Conference, 1982, pp. 172–3.

112 Ibid., p. 173. See also Institut de Droit International, Resolution on Transboundary Air Pollution, 1987, but cf. Sands, Principles, pp. 321–2. Note also e.g. the UNEP Recommendation concerning the Environment Related to Offshore Drilling and Mining within the Limits of National Jurisdiction, 1981 and the Canada–Denmark Agreement for Co-operation Relating to the Marine Environment, 1983.

113 Report of the ILC on its 53rd Session, p. 406. See also Principle 19 of the Rio Declaration, article 3 of the Convention on Environmental Impact Assessment in a Transboundary Context, 1991 and the Convention on the Law of the Non-Navigational Uses of International Watercourses, 1997, below, p. 883.

114 See e.g. the UNEP Principles of Environmental Impact Assessment, 1987. See also Sands, Principles, pp. 799 ff.

115 See e.g. the Kuwait Regional Convention for Co-operation on the Protection of the Marine Environment from Pollution, 1978, article XI; the Nordic Environmental Protection Convention, 1974, article 6, and the Protocol on Environmental Protection to the Antarctica Treaty, 1991, article 8. See also article 7 of the Draft Articles on Prevention of Transboundary Harm from Hazardous Activities 2001, Report of the ILC on its 53rd Session, p. 402.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

to, the marine environment, 'they shall, as far as practicable, assess the potential effects of such activities on the marine environment and shall communicate reports of such assessments'.[116]

The EEC Council Directive 85/337 provides that member states shall adopt all necessary measures to ensure that, before consent is given, projects likely to have significant effects on the environment are made subject to an assessment with regard to their effects,[117] while the issue was taken further in the Convention on Environmental Impact Assessment in a Transboundary Context, 1991. Under this Convention, states parties are to take the necessary legal, administrative and other measures to ensure that prior to a decision to authorise or undertake a proposed activity listed in Appendix I[118] that is likely to cause a significant adverse transboundary impact, an environmental impact assessment is carried out. The party of origin must notify any party which may be affected of the proposed activity, providing full information. Once the affected party decides to participate in the environmental impact assessment procedure under the provisions of the Convention, it must supply information to the party of origin of the proposed activity at its request relating to the potentially affected environment under its jurisdiction.[119] The documentation to be submitted to the competent authority of the party of origin is detailed in Appendix III and it is comprehensive. Consultations must take place between the party of origin and the affected parties concerning the potential transboundary impact and the measures to reduce or eliminate the impact,[120] and in taking the final decision on the proposed activity the parties

[116] A similar process is underway with regard to the siting of nuclear power installations: see e.g. the agreements between Spain and Portugal, 1980; the Netherlands and the Federal Republic of Germany, 1977; Belgium and France, 1966; and Switzerland and the Federal Republic of Germany, 1982. See also Boyle, 'Chernobyl', at p. 212.

[117] See also Directive 2004/35/EC, 21 April 2004, of the European Parliament and of the Council on environmental liability with regard to the prevention and remedying of environmental damage, as amended by Directive 2006/21/EC.

[118] These activities include crude oil and certain other refineries; thermal power stations and other combustion installations with a certain minimum power output and nuclear installations; nuclear facilities; major cast iron and steel installations; asbestos plants; integrated chemical installations; construction of motorways, long-distance railway lines and long airport runways; pipelines; large trading ports; toxic and dangerous waste installations; large dams and reservoirs; major mining; offshore hydrocarbon production; major oil and chemical storage facilities; deforestation of large areas.

[119] If it decides not so to participate, the environmental impact assessment procedure will continue or not according to the domestic law and practice of the state of origin, article 3(4).

[120] Article 5.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

shall ensure that due account is taken of the outcome of the environmental impact assessment and consultations held.[121] Post-project analyses may also be carried out under article 7.[122] Other instruments provide for such environmental impact assessments[123] and some international organisations have developed their own assessment requirements.[124] The question of environmental impact assessments was raised by Judge Weeramantry in his Dissenting Opinion in the Request for an Examination of the Situation in Accordance with Paragraph 63 of the Court's Judgment in the 1974 Nuclear Tests Case.[125] It was noted that the magnitude of the issue brought by New Zealand before the Court (the underground testing by France in the South Pacific of nuclear devices) was such as to make the principle of environmental impact assessments applicable. The Judge declared that 'when a matter is brought before it which raises serious environmental issues of global importance, and a prima facie case is made out of the possibility of environmental damage, the Court is entitled to take into account the Environmental Impact Assessment principle in determining its preliminary approach'.[126]

Other principles of international co-operation in the field of environmental protection are beginning to emerge and inform the development of legal norms. Principle 15 of the Rio Declaration states that 'in order to protect the environment, the precautionary approach shall be widely applied by states according to their capabilities. Where there are threats of serious or irreversible damage, lack of full scientific certainty shall not be used as a reason for postponing cost-effective measures to prevent environmental degradation.' This marks a step away from the traditional approach, which required states to act on the basis of scientific knowledge and constitutes a recognition that in certain circumstances to await formal scientific proof may prevent urgent action being taken in time. The Vienna Convention for the Protection of the Ozone Layer, 1985 and the 1987 Montreal Protocol to that Convention both referred in their respective preambles to 'precautionary measures',[127] while the Bergen Ministerial Declaration on Sustainable Development, 1990 noted that in order to [121] Article 6(1). Account must also be taken of concerns expressed by the public of the affected party in the areas likely to be affected under article 3(8).

[122] See also Appendix V.
[123] See e.g. the Antarctic Environment Protocol, 1991.
[124] See e.g. the World Bank under its Operational Directive 4.00 of 1989.
[125] ICJ Reports, 1995, pp. 288, 344; 106 ILR, p. 1. [126] ICJ Reports, 1995, p. 345.
[127] See also the preamble to the 1994 Oslo Protocol to the 1979 Long-Range Transboundary Air Pollution Convention and EC Regulation 178/2002 (with regard to food).

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

achieve sustainable development, policies must be based on the precautionary principle. It was emphasised that 'environmental measures must anticipate, prevent and attack the causes of environmental degradation' and part of Principle 15 of the Rio Declaration was repeated. The Convention on the Protection and Use of Transboundary Watercourses and International Lakes, 1992 provides in article 2(5)a that the parties would be guided by 'the precautionary principle, by virtue of which action to avoid the potential transboundary impact of the release of hazardous substances shall not be postponed on the ground that scientific research has not fully proved a causal link between these substances, on the one hand and the potential transboundary impact, on the other'. References to the precautionary principle appear also in the Convention on Biodiversity, 1992[128] and in the Convention on Climate Change, 1992.[129] The principle was described by Judge Weeramantry as one gaining increasing support as part of the international law of the environment.[130]

Recognition has also emerged of the special responsibility of developed states in the process of environmental protection.[131] Principle 7 of the Rio Declaration stipulates that 'states have common but differentiated responsibilities'. In particular, it is emphasised that 'the developed [128] Although the reference in the Preamble does not expressly invoke the term. See generally International Law and the Conservation of Biological Diversity (eds. M. Bowman and C. Redgwell), Dordrecht, 1995.

[129] Article 3(3). See also article 174 (ex article 130r(2)) of the EC Treaty and article 4(3) of the OAU Bamako Convention on the Ban of the Import into Africa and the Control of Transboundary Movement and Management of Hazardous Wastes within Africa, 1991. Note also articles 5 and 6 of the Straddling Fish Stocks and Highly Migratory Fish Stocks Agreement, 1995.

[130] In his Dissenting Opinion in the Request for an Examination of the Situation in Accordance with Paragraph 63 of the Court's Judgment in the 1974 Nuclear Tests Case, ICJ Reports, 1995, pp. 288, 342; 106 ILR, pp. 1, 64. See The Precautionary Principle and International Law (eds. D. Freestone and E. Hey), Dordrecht, 1996; P. Martin-Bidou, 'Le Principe de Précaution en Droit International de l'Environnement', 103 RGDIP, 1999, p. 631, and Le Principe de Précaution, Signification et Conséquences (eds. E. Zaccai and J. N. Missa), Brussels, 2000; Birnie and Boyle, International Law and the Environment, pp. 115 ff.; Sands, Principles, pp. 266 ff.; Le Principe de Précaution: Aspects de Droit International et Communautaire (ed. C. Leben), Paris, 2002, and A. Trouwborst, Evolution and Status of the Precautionary Principle in International Law, The Hague, 2002. See also the Commentary to the ILC Draft Articles on Prevention of Transboundary Harm from Hazardous Activities, 2001, Report of the ILC on its 53rd Session, p. 414 and the Guidelines for Applying the Precautionary Principle to Biodiversity Conservation and Natural Resource Management adopted by the International Union for the Conservation of Nature in May 2007.

[131] See e.g. D. French, 'Developing States and International Environmental Law: The Importance of Differentiated Responsibilities', 49 ICLQ, 2000, p. 35.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

countries acknowledge the responsibility that they bear in the international pursuit of sustainable development in view of the pressures their societies place on the global environment and of the technologies and financial resources they command'. Article 3(1) of the Convention on Climate Change provides that the parties should act to protect the climate system 'on the basis of equity and in accordance with their common but differentiated responsibilities and respective capabilities' so that the developed countries would take the lead in combating climate change.[132]

In addition, the concept of sustainable development has been evolving in a way that circumscribes the competence of states to direct their own development.[133] The International Court in the Gabčíkovo–Nagymaros Project case referred specifically to the concept of sustainable development,[134] while Principle 3 of the Rio Declaration notes that the right to development must be fulfilled so as to 'equitably meet developmental and environmental needs of present and future generations'[135] and Principle 4 states that in order to achieve sustainable development, environmental protection shall constitute an integral part of the development process.[136] Principle 27 called for co-operation in the further development of [132] See also articles 4 and 12. Note that the 1990 amendment to the 1987 Montreal Protocol on the Ozone Depleting Substances provides that the capacity of developing countries to comply with their substantive obligations will depend upon the implementation by the developed countries of their financial obligations.

[133] See e.g. Sustainable Development and International Law (ed. W. Lang), Dordrecht, 1995; Sustainable Development and Good Governance (eds. K. Ginther, E. Denters and P. de Waart), Dordrecht, 1995; Sands, Principles, pp. 252 ff., and Sands, 'International Law in the Field of Sustainable Development', 65 BYIL, 1994, p. 303; M.-C. Cordonier Segger and C. G. Weeramantry, Sustainable Justice: Reconciling Economic, Social and Environmental Law, Leiden, 2005; P. S. Elder, 'Sustainability', 36 McGill Law Journal, 1991, p. 832; D. McGoldrick, 'Sustainable Development and Human Rights: An Integrated Conception', 45 ICLQ, 1996, p. 796; International Law and Sustainable Development (eds. A. Boyle and D. Freestone), Oxford, 1999; Environmental Law, the Economy and Sustainable Development (eds. R. Revesz, P. Sands and R. Stewart), Cambridge, 2000; Birnie and Boyle, International Law and the Environment, p. 84, and X. Fuentes, 'Sustainable Development and the Equitable Utilisation of International Watercourses', 69 BYIL, 1998, p. 119. See also the Report of the ILA Committee on Legal Aspects of Sustainable Development, ILA, Report of the Sixty-sixth Conference, 1994, p. 111 and Report of the Seventieth Conference, 2002, p. 308.

[134] ICJ Reports, 1997, pp. 7, 78; 116 ILR, p. 1. See also the Shrimp/Turtle case, WTO Appellate Body, 38 ILM, 1999, p. 121, para. 129.

[135] See also Principle 1 of the Stockholm Declaration 1972.

[136] Note that article 2(1)vii of the Agreement Establishing the European Bank for Reconstruction and Development, 1990 calls upon the Bank to promote 'environmentally sound and sustainable development'.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

international law in the field of sustainable development.[137] The Climate Change Convention declares in article 3(4) that 'the parties have a right to, and should, promote sustainable development', while the Biodiversity Convention refers on several occasions to the notion of 'sustainable use'.[138] Quite what is meant by sustainable development is somewhat unclear and it may refer to a range of economic, environmental and social factors.[139] Clearly, however, some form of balance between these factors will be necessitated.[140]

Another emerging principle, more widely accepted in some countries and regions than others, is the notion that the costs of pollution should be paid by the polluter.[141] Principle 16 of the Rio Declaration notes that 'the polluter should, in principle, bear the costs of pollution, with due regard to the public interests and without distorting international trade and investment'. The principle has been particularly applied with regard to civil liability for damage resulting from hazardous activities[142] and has particularly been adopted by the Organisation for Economic Co-operation and Development[143] and the European Community.[144] The polluter-pays principle has been referred to both in the International Convention on Oil Pollution Preparedness, Response and Co-operation, 1990 and in the Convention on the Transboundary Effects of Industrial Accidents, 1992

[137] See also Agenda 21, adopted at the Rio Conference on Environment and Development, 1992, paras. 8 and 39.

[138] See e.g. the Preamble and articles 1, 8, 11, 12, 16, 17 and 18. See also the Statement of Principles for a Global Consensus on the Management, Conservation and Sustainable Development of All Types of Forests, adopted at the Rio Conference, 1992.

[139] See e.g. M. Redclift, 'Reflections on the "Sustainable Development" Debate', 1 International Journal of Sustainable Development and World Ecology, 1994, p. 3. Note that the Report of the GATT Panel on the United States Restrictions on the Import of Tuna declares that the objective of sustainable development, which includes the protection and preservation of the environment, has been widely recognised by the contracting parties to the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade, 33 ILM, 1994, p. 839.

[140] Note that the General Assembly established the Commission on Sustainable Development in resolution 47/191 in order to ensure an effective follow-up to the 1992 Conference on Environment and Development as well as generally to work for the integration of environment and development issues and to examine the progress of the implementation of Agenda 21 (the programme of action adopted by the Conference) in order to achieve sustainable development.

[141] See e.g. Sands, Principles, pp. 279 ff., and A. Boyle, 'Making the Polluter Pay? Alternatives to State Responsibility in the Allocation of Transboundary Environmental Costs' in Francioni and Scovazzi, International Responsibility for Environmental Harm, p. 363.

[142] See further below, p. 893.

[143] See e.g. the OECD Council Recommendations C(74)223 (1974) and C(89)88 (1989).

[144] See Article 174 of the EC Treaty.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

as 'a general principle of international environmental law'.[145] Again, quite how far this principle actually applies is uncertain. It is, in particular, unclear whether all the costs of an environmental clean-up would be covered. State practice appears to demonstrate that such costs should be apportioned between the parties.[146]

Atmospheric pollution[147]

Perhaps the earliest perceived form of pollution relates to the pollution of the air. The burning of fossil fuels releases into the atmosphere sulphur dioxide and nitrogen oxides which change into acids and are carried by natural elements and fall as rain or snow or solid particles. Such acids have the effect of killing living creatures in lakes and streams and of damaging soils and forests.[148] While the airspace above the territorial domain of a state forms part of that state,[149] the imprecise notion of the atmosphere would combine elements of this territorial sovereignty with areas not so defined. The legal characterisation of the atmosphere, therefore, is confused and uncertain, but one attractive possibility is to refer to it as a shared resource or area of common concern.[150]

The question of how one defines the term 'pollution' has been addressed in several international instruments. In a Recommendation adopted in 1974 by the Organisation for Economic Co-operation and Development,[151] pollution is broadly defined as 'the introduction by man, directly or indirectly, of substances or energy into the environment resulting in deleterious effects of such a nature as to endanger human health, harm living resources and ecosystems, and impair or interfere with amenities and other legitimate uses of the environment'.[152] This definition was substantially reproduced in the Geneva Convention on Long-Range [145] See also article 2(5)b of the Convention on the Protection and Use of Transboundary Watercourses and International Lakes, 1992 and Principle 4 of the ILC Draft Principles on the Allocation of Loss, 2006, A/61/10, p. 151.

[146] See e.g. Boyle, 'Making the Polluter Pay?', p. 365, and Birnie and Boyle, International Law and the Environment, p. 92.

[147] See Sands, Principles, pp. 317 ff., and Birnie and Boyle, International Law and the Environment, chapter 10.

[148] See Keesing's Record of World Events, pp. 36782 ff. (1989).

[149] See above, chapter 10, p. 541.

[150] See e.g. Birnie and Boyle, International Law and the Environment, p. 503.

[151] OECD Doc.C(74)224, cited in P. Sands, Chernobyl: Law and Communication, Cambridge, 1988, p. 150.

[152] Ibid., Title A.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

Transboundary Air Pollution, 1979[153] and in the Montreal Rules of International Law Applicable to Transfrontier Pollution adopted by the International Law Association in 1982.[154] Several points ought to be noted at this stage. First, actual damage must have been caused. Pollution likely to result as a consequence of certain activities is not included. Secondly, the harm caused must be of a certain level of intensity, and thirdly, the question of interference with legitimate uses of the environment requires further investigation.

The core obligation in customary international law with regard to atmospheric pollution was laid down in the Trail Smelter case,[155] which provided that no state had the right to use or permit the use of its territory in such a manner as to cause injury by fumes in or to the territory of another state or to persons or property therein, where the case was of serious consequence and the injury established by clear and convincing evidence.[156]

In 1979, on the initiative of the Scandinavian countries and under the auspices of the UN Economic Commission for Europe, the Geneva Convention on Long-Range Transboundary Air Pollution was signed.[157] The definition of pollution is reasonably broad,[158] while article 1(b) defines long-range transboundary air pollution as air pollution whose physical origin is situated wholly or in part within the area under the national jurisdiction of one state and which has adverse effects in the area under [153] The major difference being the substitution of 'air' for 'environment' in view of the focus of the Convention.

[154] Note that the term 'air' was replaced by 'environment'. See also article 1 of the Paris Convention for the Prevention of Marine Pollution from Land-Based Sources, 1974 and article 2 of the Barcelona Convention for the Protection of the Mediterranean Sea against Pollution, 1976. The Institut de Droit International, in a draft resolution accompanying its final report on Air Pollution Across National Frontiers, defines pollution as 'any physical, chemical or biological alteration in the composition or quality of the atmosphere which results directly or indirectly from human action or omission and produces injurious or deleterious effects across national frontiers', 62 I Annuaire de l'Institut de Droit International, 1987, p. 266.

[155] 35 AJIL, 1941, p. 716; 9 AD, p. 317.

[156] Note also the adoption in 1963 of the Treaty Banning Nuclear Weapon Tests in the Atmosphere, Outer Space and Under Water.

[157] See e.g. A. Rosencranz, 'The ECE Convention of 1979 on Long-Range Transboundary Air Pollution', 75 AJIL, 1981, p. 975; L. Tollan, 'The Convention on Long-Range Transboundary Air Pollution', 19 Journal of World Trade Law, 1985, p. 615, and A. Kiss, 'La Convention sur la Pollution Atmosphérique Transfrontière à Longue Distance', Revue Juridique de l'Environnement, 1981, p. 30. See also P. Okowa, State Responsibility for Transboundary Air Pollution, Oxford, 2000. See generally www.unece.org/env/lrtap/.

[158] See above, p. 871.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

the jurisdiction of another state at such a distance that it is not generally possible to distinguish the contribution of individual emission sources or groups of sources.

The obligations undertaken under the Convention, however, are modest. States 'shall endeavour to limit and, as far as possible, gradually reduce and prevent air pollution, including long-range transboundary air pollution'.[159] The question of state liability for damage resulting from such pollution is not addressed. The Convention provides that states are to develop policies and strategies by means of exchanges of information and consultation[160] and to exchange information to combat generally the discharge of air pollutants.[161] Consultations are to be held upon request at an early stage between contracting parties actually affected by or exposed to a significant risk of long-range transboundary air pollution and contracting parties within which and subject to whose jurisdiction a significant contribution to such pollution originates or could originate, in connection with activities carried on or contemplated therein.[162]

The parties also undertook to develop the existing 'Co-operative programme for the monitoring and evaluation of the long-range transmission of air pollutants in Europe' (EMEP) and in 1984 a Protocol was adopted dealing with the long-term financing of the project. Further Protocols to the Convention have been adopted. In 1985, the Helsinki Protocol was signed, dealing with the reduction of sulphur emissions or their transboundary fluxes by at least 30 per cent as soon as possible and at the latest by 1993, using 1980 levels as the basis for the calculation of reductions. This Protocol requires parties to report annually to the Executive Body of the Convention.[163] The Sophia Protocol was adopted in 1988 and concerned the control of emissions of nitrogen oxides or their transboundary fluxes. Under this Protocol the contracting parties undertook to reduce their national annual emissions of nitrogen oxides or their transboundary fluxes so that by the end of 1994 these would not exceed those of 1987. Negotiations for further reductions in national annual emissions were provided for, as was the exchange of technology in relevant areas and of information. In 1991, the Protocol concerning the control of emissions of volatile organic compounds and their transboundary fluxes was adopted.

[159] Article 2.

[160] Article 3. Note that under article 6, states undertake to develop the best policies and strategies using the 'best available technology which is economically feasible'.

[161] Article 4. See also article 8.

[162] Article 5. See also article 8(b).

[163] As to EU obligations concerning the curbing of emissions of sulphur dioxide and nitrogen dioxide, see e.g. Directive 99/30/EC and Sands, Principles, pp. 761 ff.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

Specific targets and timetables are established. However, the Protocol provides for a choice of at least three ways to meet the requirements, to be determined by the parties upon signature and dependent upon the level of volatile organic compounds emissions. In 1994, the Oslo Protocol on Further Reduction of Sulphur Emissions was adopted,[164] specifying sulphur emission ceilings for parties for the years 2000, 2005 and 2010, and accompanied by a reporting requirement to the Executive Body on a periodic basis.[165] An Implementation Committee was provided for in order to review the implementation of the Protocol and compliance by the parties with their obligations.[166] In 1998 two further protocols were concluded, one on persistent organic pollutants and the other on heavy metals. A Protocol of 1999 is intended to abate acidification, eutrophication and ground-level ozone. In 1997 a revised Implementation Committee was established and this has the responsibility to review compliance with all the Protocols of the Convention under a common procedure. It considers questions of non-compliance with a view to finding a 'constructive solution' and reports to the Executive Board.[167]

In 2001, the Stockholm Convention on Persistent Organic Pollutants was signed. The Convention provides for the control of the production, trade in, disposal and use of twelve named persistent organic pollutants (although there is a health exception temporarily for DDT). There is a procedure to add other such pollutants to the list and an interim financial mechanism with the Global Environmental Facility (GEF)[168] was established as the principal entity to help developing countries.[169] In May 2005, a conference of states parties established a subsidiary body, the Persistent Organic Pollutants Review Committee,[170] in order to assist in implementation activities.

[164] See 33 ILM, 1994, p. 1540. [165] Article 5. [166] Article 7.

[167] See Executive Board Decision 1997/2, annex, as amended in 2001, ECE/EB.AIR/75, annex V. The Executive Board may take decisions concerning the compliance of parties: see e.g. Decision 2002/8 criticising Spain. See, for the Board's decisions, www.unece.org/env/lrtap/conv/report/eb_decis.htm, and see the Committee's Ninth Report, 2006, ECE/EB.AIR/2006/3 and Adds. 1 and 2.

[168] The Global Environmental Facility was itself set up in 1991 to aid developing countries to fund projects and programmes protecting the global environment. In particular, the Facility supports projects related to biodiversity, climate change, international waters, land degradation, the ozone layer and persistent organic pollutants: see www.gefweb.org/interior.aspx?id=50. See also the Beijing Declaration of the Second Global Environmental Facility 2003, 44 ILM, 2005, p. 1004.

[169] See the Convention website, www.pops.int/.

[170] www.pops.int/documents/meetings/poprc/meeting_docs/reports/report_E.pdf.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

In 1986 a Protocol to the Paris Convention for the Prevention of Marine Pollution from Land-Based Sources[171] extended that agreement to atmospheric emissions of pollutants.[172] Article 212 of the Law of the Sea Convention, 1982 requires states to adopt laws and regulations to prevent, reduce and control atmospheric pollution of the marine environment, although no specific standards are set.[173]

Ozone depletion and global warming[174]

The problem of global warming and the expected increase in the temperature of the earth in the decades to come has focused attention on the issues particularly of the consumption of fossil fuels and deforestation. In addition, the depletion of the stratospheric ozone layer, which has the effect of letting excessive ultraviolet radiation through to the surface of the earth, is a source of considerable concern. The problem of the legal characterisation of the ozone layer is a significant one. Article 1(1) of the Vienna Convention for the Protection of the Ozone Layer, 1985 defines this area as 'the layer of atmospheric ozone above the planetary boundary layer'. This area would thus appear, particularly in the light of the global challenge posed by ozone depletion and climate change, to constitute a distinct unit with an identity of its own irrespective of national sovereignty or shared resources claims. UN General Assembly resolution

[171] See below, p. 898.

[172] Note also that in 1987 the Second International Conference on the Protection of the North Sea urged states to ratify the Protocol: see 27 ILM, 1988, p. 835; while in 1990 North Sea states agreed to achieve by 1999 a reduction of 50 per cent or more in atmospheric and river-borne emissions of hazardous substances, provided that best available technology permitted this: see IMO Doc. MEPC 29/INF.26.

[173] Note that the Canada–United States Air Quality Agreement, 1991 required the reduction of sulphur dioxide and nitrogen oxide emissions from the two states to agreed levels by the year 2000. Compliance monitoring by continuous emission monitoring systems was provided for.

[174] See e.g. International Law and Global Climate Change (eds. R. Churchill and D. Freestone), Dordrecht, 1991; Implementing the Climate Regime. International Compliance (eds. O. S. Stokke, J. Hovi and G. Ulfstein), London, 2005; P. Lawrence, 'International Legal Regulation for Protection of the Ozone Layer: Some Problems of Implementation', 2 Journal of Environmental Law, 1990, p. 17; T. Stoel, 'Fluorocarbon: Mobilising Concern and Action' in Environmental Protection, The International Dimension (eds. D. A. Kay and H. K. Jacobson), 1983, p. 45; Engelmann, 'A Look at Some Issues Before an Ozone Convention', 8 Environmental Policy and Law, 1982, p. 49; Heimsoeth, 'The Protection of the Ozone Layer', 10 Environmental Policy and Law, 1983, p. 34, and Birnie and Boyle, International Law and the Environment, p. 516. See also www.unep.org/ozone/index-en.shtml.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

43/53, for example, states that global climate change is 'the common concern of mankind'.[175] Whatever the precise legal status of this area, what is important is the growing recognition that the scale of the challenge posed can only really be tackled upon a truly international or global basis.

In the first serious effort to tackle the problem of ozone depletion, the Vienna Convention for the Protection of the Ozone Layer was adopted in 1985, entering into force three years later. This Convention is a framework agreement, providing the institutional structure for the elaboration of Protocols laying down specific standards concerning the production of chlorofluorocarbons (CFCs), the agents which cause the destruction of the ozone layer. Under the Convention, contracting parties agree to take appropriate measures to protect human health and the environment against adverse effects resulting or likely to result from human activities which modify or are likely to modify the ozone layer.[176] The parties also agree to co-operate in the collection of relevant material and in the formulation of agreed measures, and to take appropriate legislative or administrative action to control, limit, reduce or prevent human activities under their jurisdiction or control 'should it be found that these activities have or are likely to have adverse effects resulting from modification or likely modification of the ozone layer'.[177] A secretariat and disputes settlement mechanism were established.[178] However, overall the Convention is little more than a framework within which further action could be taken.

In 1987 the Montreal Protocol on Substances that Deplete the Ozone Layer was adopted and this called for a phased reduction of CFCs and a freeze on the use of halons.[179] The control measures of the Protocol are [175] See also the Noordwijk Declaration of the Conference on Atmospheric Pollution and Climate Change, 1989. See e.g. C. A. Fleischer, 'The International Concern for the Environment: The Concept of Common Heritage' in Bothe, Trends in Environmental Law and Policy, p. 321.

[176] Article 2(1). 'Adverse effects' is defined in article 1(2) to mean 'changes in the physical environment or biota, including changes in climate, which have significant deleterious effects on human health or on the composition, resilience and productivity of natural and managed ecosystems or on materials useful to mankind'.

[177] Article 2.

[178] Articles 7 and 11. See also the UN Environment Programme, Handbook for the Vienna Convention for the Protection of the Ozone Layer, 7th edn, Nairobi, 2006.

[179] See 26 ILM, 1987, p. 1541 and 28 ILM, 1989, p. 1301. See also R. Benedick, Ozone Diplomacy, Cambridge, MA, 1991, and A. C. Aman, 'The Montreal Protocol on Substances that Deplete the Ozone Layer: Providing Prospective Remedial Relief for Potential Damage to the Environmental Commons' in Francioni and Scovazzi, International Responsibility for Environmental Harm, p. 185. See also UN Environment Programme, Handbook for the Montreal Protocol on Substances that Deplete the Ozone Layer, 7th edn, Nairobi, 2006.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

based on the regulation of the production of 'controlled substances'[180] by the freezing of their consumption[181] at 1986 levels followed by a progressive reduction, so that by mid-1998 consumption was to be reduced by 20 per cent in comparison with the 1986 figure. From mid-1998 onwards consumption was to be reduced to 50 per cent of the 1986 level.[182] However, this was subsequently felt to have been insufficient and, in 1989, the parties to the Convention and Protocol adopted the Helsinki Declaration on the Protection of the Ozone Layer in which the parties agreed to phase out the production and consumption of CFCs controlled by the Protocol as soon as possible, but not later than the year 2000, and to phase out halons and control and reduce other substances which contribute significantly to ozone depletion as soon as feasible. An Implementation Committee was established under the Montreal Protocol together with a non-compliance procedure, whereby a party querying the carrying out of obligations by another party can submit its concerns in writing to the secretariat. The secretariat with the party complained against will examine the complaint and the matter will then be passed to the Implementation Committee, which will try and secure a friendly settlement and make a report to the meeting of the parties, which can take further measures to ensure compliance with the Protocol.

The parties to the Protocol made a series of Adjustments and Amendments to the Protocol in June 1990,[183] the main ones being that 1992 consumption and production levels were not to exceed 1986 levels, while 1995 levels were not to exceed 50 per cent with 10 per cent exception to satisfy basic domestic needs; 1997 levels were not to exceed 15 per cent, with 10 per cent exception permitted, and 2000 levels were not to exceed 0 per cent with 15 per cent exception permitted. Broadly similar consumption and production targets have also been laid down with regard to halons. The 1990 Amendments made specific reference to the requirement to take into account the developmental needs of developing countries and the need for the transfer of alternative technologies, and a Multilateral Fund was established. Further Adjustments were made in Copenhagen

[180] I.e. ozone-depleting substances listed in Annex A.

[181] This is defined to constitute production plus imports minus exports of controlled substances: see articles 1(5) and (6) and 3.

[182] There are two exceptions, however, first for the purposes of 'industrial rationalisation between parties' and secondly with regard to certain developing countries: see article 5.

[183] See 30 ILM, 1991, p. 537.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

in 1992,[184] introducing changes to the timetable for the phasing out of various substances, listing new controlled substances and adopting new reporting requirements. The Implementation Committee was enlarged and the Multilateral Fund adopted on a permanent basis.[185]

Action with regard to the phenomenon of global warming has been a lot slower. General Assembly resolutions 43/53 (1988) and 44/207 (1989) recognised that climate change was a common concern of mankind and determined that necessary and timely action should be taken to deal with this issue. The General Assembly also called for the convening of a conference on world climate change, as did the UNEP Governing Council Decision on Global Climate Change of 25 May 1989. In addition, the Hague Declaration on the Environment 1989, signed by twenty-four states, called for the establishment of new institutional authority under the auspices of the UN to combat any further global warming and for the negotiation of the necessary legal instruments. The UN Framework Convention on Climate Change was adopted in 1992.[186]

The objective of the Convention is to achieve stabilisation of greenhouse gases in the atmosphere at a level that would prevent dangerous anthropogenic interference with the climate system and such level should be achieved within a time-frame sufficient to allow ecosystems to adapt naturally to climate change, to ensure food production is not threatened and to enable economic development to proceed in a sustainable manner.[187] The states parties undertake inter alia to develop, update and publish national inventories of anthropogenic emissions by sources and removals by sinks[188] of all greenhouse gases not covered by the Montreal Protocol; to formulate, implement and update national and, where appropriate, regional programmes containing measures to mitigate climate [184] See 32 ILM, 1993, p. 874. Further amendments were made in Montreal, 1997, and Beijing, 1999, increasing the substances covered: see www.unep.ch/ozone/treaties.shtml. See also the Montreal Adjustment on the Production and Consumption of HCFCs 2007.

[185] See also EC Regulation 91/594 of 4 March 1991, providing that after 30 June 1997 there should be no production of CFCs unless the European Commission had determined that such production was essential.

[186] 31 ILM, 1992, p. 849. See e.g. J. Werksman, 'Designing a Compliance System for the UN Framework Convention on Climate Change' in Improving Compliance with International Environmental Agreements (eds. J. Cameron, J. Werksman, P. Rodinck et al.), London, 1996, p. 85. See also Birnie and Boyle, International Law and the Environment, p. 523, and Sands, Principles, pp. 357 ff. See also http://unfccc.int/.

[187] Article 2.

[188] Defined as any process, activity or mechanism which removes a greenhouse gas, an aerosol or a precursor of a greenhouse gas from the atmosphere, article 1(8).

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

changes; to promote and co-operate in the development, application and transfer of technologies and processes to control, reduce or prevent such anthropogenic emissions; to promote sustainable management and conservation of sinks and reservoirs of all greenhouse gases not controlled by the Montreal Protocol; to take climate change considerations into account to the extent feasible in their relevant social, economic and environmental policies; and to promote and co-operate in research, exchange of information and education in the field of climate change.[189] Developed country parties, and certain other parties listed in Annex I,[190] commit themselves to take the lead in modifying longer-term trends in anthropogenic emissions and particularly to adopt national policies and take corresponding measures on the mitigation of climate change by limiting anthropogenic emissions of greenhouse gases and protecting and enhancing greenhouse gas sinks and reservoirs.[191] Developed country and other Annex I parties must submit within six months of the Convention coming into force and periodically thereafter, detailed information on such matters with the aim of returning anthropogenic emissions to their 1990 levels. This information provided is to be reviewed by the Conference of the parties on a periodic basis.[192] In addition, developed country parties and other developed parties included in Annex II[193] are to provide the financial resources to enable the developing country parties to meet their obligations under the Convention and generally to assist them in coping with the adverse effects of climate change. The parties agree to give full consideration to actions necessary to assist developing country parties that may be, for example, small island countries, countries with low-lying coastal areas, countries prone to natural disasters, drought and desertification and landlocked and transit states.[194]

The Conference of the parties is established as the supreme body of the Convention and has the function inter alia to review the implementation of the Convention, periodically examine the obligations of the parties and the institutional arrangements established, promote the exchange of information, facilitate at the request of two or more parties the co-ordination of measures taken to address climate change, promote and

[189] Article 4(1).

[190] For example, former European Soviet Republics such as Belarus, the Ukraine and the Baltic states.

[191] Article 4(2)a. [192] Article 4(2)b.

[193] Essentially European Union countries, the US, Australia, Canada, New Zealand, Iceland, Japan, Switzerland and Turkey.

[194] Article 4(8).

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

guide the development of comparable methodologies for the preparation of inventories, assess the implementation of the Convention by the parties, consider and adopt regular reports on implementation and make recommendations on any matters necessary for the implementation of the Convention.[195] In addition, the Convention provides for a secretariat to be established, together with a subsidiary body for scientific and technological advice and a subsidiary body for implementation.[196] The Convention as a whole is a complex document and the range of commitments entered into, particularly by developed country parties, is not wholly clear.

The Convention entered into force in 1994 and the following year the first session of the Conference was held in Berlin.[197] It was agreed that the pledges by the developed country parties to reduce emissions by 2000 to 1990 levels were not adequate and preparations were commenced to draft a further legal instrument by 1997. It was also agreed not to establish new commitments for developing country parties, but rather to assist the implementation of existing commitments. The parties decided to initiate a pilot phase for joint implementation projects, providing for investment from one party in greenhouse gas emissions reduction opportunities in another party. In addition, it was decided to establish a permanent secretariat in Bonn and two subsidiary advisory bodies.

The 1997 Kyoto Protocol[198] commits developed country parties to individual, legally binding targets to limit or reduce their greenhouse gas emissions, adding up to a total cut of at least 5 per cent from 1990 levels in the 'commitment period' of 2008–2012. Developing countries are obliged simply to meet existing commitments. Certain activities since 1990 which have the effect of removing greenhouse gases, such as forestry schemes (so-called 'carbon sinks'), may be offset against emission targets. The Protocol also allows states to aggregate their emissions, thus allowing, for example, European Union members if they wish to be counted together permitting less developed members to increase emissions on the account of other members. In addition, states may receive credits for supporting emission-reducing projects in other developed states ('joint implementation') and in certain circumstances in developing states ('the clean development mechanism'), and the possibility has been provided for trading emission permits, so that some countries

[195] Article 7. [196] Articles 8–10. [197] See 34 ILM, 1995, p. 1671.
[198] This came into force on 16 February 2005. See D. Freestone and C. Streck, Legal Aspects of Implementing the Kyoto Protocol Mechanisms: Making Kyoto Work, Oxford, 2005.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

may purchase the unused emission quotas of other countries ('emissions trading').[199]

The Conference of the Parties meets regularly to review the Convention and Protocol. There are two supplementary bodies, one on scientific and technological advice and one on implementation. The financial mechanism of the Convention is operated by the Global Environment Facility, established by the World Bank, UN Environment Programme and UN Development Programme in 1991, while advice is received from the Intergovernmental Panel on Climate Change, established by the World Meteorological Organisation and the UN Environmental Programme.[200] Annex 1 countries (essentially the developed states) must provide annual inventory reports on greenhouse gas emissions to the secretariat, which are subject to in-depth and technical review.[201] Developing countries are subject to weaker reporting requirements. There is a Compliance Committee with facilitative and enforcement branches for parties to the Kyoto Protocol (as amended by the Marrakesh Accords 2001).[202]

Outer space[203]

The Outer Space Treaty, 1967 provides that the exploration and use of outer space is to be carried out for the benefit and in the interests of all states.[204] The harmful contamination of space or celestial bodies is to be avoided, as are adverse changes in the environment of the earth resulting from the introduction of extraterrestrial matter.[205] Nuclear weapons and other weapons of mass destruction are not to be placed in orbit around the earth, installed on celestial bodies or stationed in outer space, and the moon and other celestial bodies are to be used exclusively for peaceful purposes.[206] The Agreement Governing the Activities of States on the [199] Further advances were made at meetings in Buenos Aires 1998, Bonn 2001 and Marrakesh 2001: see unfccc.int/issues/mechanisms.html.

[200] See www.ipcc.ch/.

[201] The requirements are more stringent with regard to the Kyoto Protocol parties.

[202] Note the Fourth Assessment Report of the Intergovernmental Panel on Climate Change, 2007, which analysed the dangers of human-induced climate change. It was endorsed by governments by consensus: see www.ipcc.ch.

[203] See further above, chapter 10, p. 541. See also Birnie and Boyle, International Law and the Enviroment, p. 534, and Sands, Principles, pp. 382 ff.

[204] Article 1. [205] Article 9.

[206] Article 4. See also the Principles Relevant to the Use of Nuclear Power Sources in Outer Space, adopted by the UN General Assembly in resolution 47/68 (1992). Goals for radioactive protection and safety are stipulated.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

Moon and Other Celestial Bodies, 1979 provides that the moon and its natural resources are the 'common heritage of mankind' and are to be used exclusively for peaceful purposes.[207] Article VII stipulates that in exploring and using the moon, states parties are to take measures to prevent the disruption of the existing balance of its environment whether by introducing adverse changes in that environment or by its harmful contamination through the introduction of extra-environmental matter or otherwise.

There is, in particular, a growing problem with regard to debris located in outer space. Such debris, consisting of millions of objects of varying size in space,[208] constitutes a major hazard to spacecraft. While liability for damage caused by objects launched into space is absolute,[209] the specific problem of space debris has been addressed in the Buenos Aires International Instrument on the Protection of the Environment from Damage Caused by Space Debris, adopted by the International Law Association at its 1994 Conference.[210] The draft emphasises the obligations to co-operate in the prevention of damage to the environment, in promoting the development and exchange of technology to prevent, reduce and control space debris and in the flow and exchange of information, and to hold consultations when there is reason to believe that activities may produce space debris likely to cause damage to the environment or to persons or objects or significant risks thereto. The principle proclaimed by the draft is that each state or international organisation party to the instrument that launches or procures the launching of a space object is internationally liable for damage arising therefrom to another party to the instrument as a consequence of space debris produced by any such object.[211]

[207] See articles III and XI.

[208] Such debris may result from pollution from spacecraft, abandoned satellites, orbital explosions and satellite break-ups or hardware released during space launches and other normal manoeuvres. See e.g. L. Roberts, 'Addressing the Problem of Orbital Space Debris: Combining International Regulatory and Liability Regimes', 15 Boston College International and Comparative Law Review, 1992, p. 53. See also S. Gorove, 'Towards a Clarification of the Term "Space Objects" – An International Legal and Policy Imperative?', 21 Journal of Space Law, 1993, p. 10.

[209] See e.g. B. Hurwitz, Space Liability for Outer Space Activities, Dordrecht, 1992, and see further above, chapter 10, p. 546.

[210] Report of the Sixty-sixth Conference, Buenos Aires, 1994, pp. 317 ff. This, of course, is not a binding treaty, but a suggested draft from an influential private organisation.

[211] Article 8 of the draft.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

International watercourses[212]

International watercourses are systems of surface waters and ground waters which are situated in more than one state.[213] Such watercourses form a unitary whole and normally flow into a common terminus. While there has historically been some disagreement as to the extent of the watercourse system covered, particularly whether it includes the complete river basin with all associated tributaries and groundwater systems, a broader definition is the approach adopted in recent years. Customary law has developed rules with regard to equal riparian rights to international rivers,[214] but these were not extensive.[215] The International Law Association, a

[212] See e.g. Sands, Principles, chapter 10, and Birnie and Boyle, International Law and the Environment, chapter 6. See also S. McCaffrey, The Law of International Watercourses, 2nd edn, Oxford, 2007; O. McIntyre, Environmental Protection of International Watercourses in International Law, Aldershot, 2007; A. Rieu-Clarke, A Fresh Approach to International Law in the Field of Sustainable Development: Lessons from the Law of International Watercourses, London, 2007; R. Baxter, The Law of International Waterways, Cambridge, MA, 1964; C. Bourne, 'International Law and Pollution of International Rivers and Lakes', 21 University of Toronto Law Journal, 1971, p. 193; F. Florio, 'Water Pollution and Related Principles of International Law', 17 Canadian YIL, 1979, p. 134; J. Lammers, Pollution of International Watercourses: A Search for Substantive Rules and Principles, The Hague, 1984; S. McCaffrey, 'The Law of International Watercourses: Some Recent Developments and Unanswered Questions', 17 Denver Journal of International Law and Policy, 1989, p. 505; J. G. Polakiewicz, 'La Responsabilité de l'État en Matière de Pollution des Eaux Fluviales ou Souterraines Internationales', Journal de Droit International, 1991, p. 283; H. Ruiz Fabri, 'Règles Coutumières Générales et Droit International Fluvial', AFDI, 1990, p. 818; J. Sette-Camara, 'Pollution of International Rivers', 186 HR, 1984, p. 117, and P. Wouters, 'The Legal Response to Water Conflicts: The UN Watercourses Convention and Beyond', 42 German YIL, 1999, p. 293.

[213] See e.g. article 1(1) of the UN Convention on the Protection and Use of Transboundary Watercourses and International Lakes, 1992 and article 2 of the Convention on the Law of the Non-Navigational Uses of International Watercourses, 1997. See also Report of the International Law Commission on its 46th Session, 1994, p. 197.

[214] See the Territorial Jurisdiction of the International Commission of the Oder case, PCIJ, Series A, No. 23, p. 27; 5 AD, p. 83. The Permanent Court noted here that, 'the community of interest in a navigable river becomes the basis of a common legal right, the essential features of which are the perfect equality of all riparian states in the user of the whole course of the river and the exclusion of any preferential privilege of any one riparian state in relation to the others'. This was reaffirmed in the case concerning the Auditing of Accounts between the Netherlands and France, arbitral award of 12 March 2004, para. 97. The International Court has noted that, 'Modern development of international law has strengthened this principle for non-navigational uses of international watercourses', the Gabčíkovo–Nagymaros Project case, ICJ Reports, 1997, pp. 7, 56; 116 ILR, p. 1.

[215] See the Lac Lanoux case, 24 ILR, p. 101. The tribunal noted, for example, that while the interests of riparian states had to be taken into account by a riparian state proposing changes to the river system, there was no rule precluding the use of hydraulic power of private organisation of international lawyers, proposed the Helsinki Rules on the Uses of the Waters of International Rivers in 1966,[216] in which it was noted that each basin state was entitled to a reasonable and equitable share in the beneficial use of the waters and that all states were obliged to prevent new forms of water pollution that would cause substantial injury in the territory of other basin states.[217]

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

In 1992, the Convention on the Protection and Use of Transboundary Watercourses and International Lakes was adopted in Helsinki within the framework of the UN Economic Commission for Europe.[218] Under this Convention, all parties must take all appropriate measures to prevent, control and reduce any significant adverse effect on the environment resulting from a change in the conditions of transboundary waters caused by a human activity. Such effects on the environment include effects on human health and safety, flora, fauna, soil, air, water, climate, landscape and also effects on the cultural heritage.[219] In taking such measures, states parties are to be guided by the precautionary principle[220] and by the polluter-pays principle, by which the costs of pollution prevention, control and reduction measures are to be borne by the polluter.[221] Each party undertakes to set emission limits for discharges from point sources into surface waters based on best available technology[222] and to define, where appropriate, water-quality objectives and adopt water-quality criteria[223] for the purpose of preventing, controlling and reducing transboundary impact. The measures to be taken must ensure, for example, the application of low- and non-waste technology; the prior licensing of waste-water discharge; the application of biological or equivalent processes to municipal waste water; the use of environmental impact assessments and sustainable water-resources management.[224]

The Convention also calls for the parties to establish monitoring programmes, to co-operate in research and development projects and to international watercourses without a prior agreement between the interested states, ibid., p. 130.

[216] Report of the Fifty-second Conference, 1966, p. 484.

[217] See also the Rules on Water Pollution in an International Drainage Basin adopted by the ILA in 1982, Report of the Sixtieth Conference, 1982, p. 535, and the Rules on International Groundwaters adopted in 1986, Report of the Sixty-second Conference, 1986. See also the work of the Institut de Droit International, Annuaire de l'Institut de Droit International, 1979, p. 193.

[218] See also the Protocol on Civil Liability and Compensation for Damage Caused by the Transboundary Effects of Industrial Accidents on Transboundary Waters, 2003.

[219] Articles 1(2) and 2(1). [220] See above, p. 867. [221] See above, p. 870.

[222] This is defined in Annex I. [223] See Annex III. [224] Article 3.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

exchange relevant information as early as possible.[225] Riparian parties are to enter into bilateral or multilateral agreements or arrangements in order to co-ordinate their activities and to consult together at the request of any one riparian party.[226] Article 7 provides that the parties 'shall support appropriate international efforts to elaborate rules, criteria and procedures in the field of responsibility and liability'.

The Convention on the Law of the Non-Navigational Uses of International Watercourses, 1997 provides that watercourse states shall in their respective territories utilise an international watercourse in an 'equitable and reasonable manner'. In particular, optimal utilisation must be consistent with adequate protection of the watercourse.[227] Factors relevant to equitable and reasonable utilisation include, in addition to physical factors of a natural character and the social and economic needs of the watercourse states concerned, the 'conservation, protection, development and economy of use of the water resources of the watercourse and the costs of measures taken to that effect'.[228] Article 7 provides that watercourse states shall take all appropriate measures to prevent the causing of significant harm to other watercourse states. Where such harm is caused, consultations are to take place in order to eliminate or mitigate such harm and with regard to compensation where appropriate. Articles 9 and 11 provide for regular exchanges of data and information, while watercourse states are to exchange information and consult in particular on the possible effects of planned measures on the condition of an international watercourse. Before a watercourse state implements or permits the implementation of planned measures which may have a significant adverse effect upon other watercourse states, it is to provide such states with timely notification and sufficient technical data and information for the evaluation of the possible effects of the planned measures.[229] Unless otherwise agreed, the notified states have a period of six months for such evaluation during which exchanges of data and information are to take place and the planned measures are not to be implemented without the consent of the notified states. If no reply to the notification is received, the notifying state may [225] Articles 4–6 and 11–13. Provisions regarding notification about critical situations and mutual asssistance appear in articles 14 and 15.

[226] Articles 9 and 10.

[227] Article 5. This provision was expressly referred to by the International Court in the Gabčíkovo–Nagymaros Project case, ICJ Reports, 1997, pp. 7, 80; 116 ILR, p. 1. See also article 8 which emphasises that watercourse states shall co-operate in order to attain optimal utilisation and adequate protection of an international watercourse.

[228] Article 6. [229] Article 12.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

proceed to implement the planned measures. If a reply is received, the states are to consult and negotiate with a view to arriving at an equitable resolution of the situation.[230] Where a watercourse state has serious reason to believe that measures that may have a significant adverse impact are being planned, it may itself set in motion the above procedures.[231]

Article 20 stipulates that watercourse states shall protect and preserve the ecosystems of international watercourses[232] and shall act to prevent, reduce and control pollution[233] of an international watercourse that may cause significant harm to other watercourse states or to their environment. Watercourse states are to take all necessary measures to prevent the introduction of species, alien or new, into an international watercourse which may have effects detrimental to the ecosystem of the watercourse resulting in significant harm to other watercourse states.[234]

It is thus clear that the international community is coming to terms with the need to protect the environment of international watercourses.[235] How evolving international environmental rules relate to the more traditional principles of international law was one of the issues before the International Court in the Gabčíkovo–Nagymaros Project case.[236] Hungary and Czechoslovakia entered into a treaty in 1977 by which there would be created on the Danube between the two states a barrage system, a dam, a reservoir, hydro-electric power stations and a 25-kilometre canal for diverting the Danube from its original course through a system of locks. A dispute developed in the light of Hungary's growing environmental concerns. Hungary suspended work on the project in 1989, while Czechoslovakia (now the Czech and Slovak Federal Republic) proceeded with a 'provisional solution' as from 1991, which involved damming the [231] Article 18. Article 19 provides for an expedited procedure where there is the utmost urgency in the implementation of planned measures.

[230] Articles 11–17.

[232] See also article 23 with regard to measures necessary to protect and preserve the marine environment.

[233] Pollution is here defined as 'any detrimental alteration in the composition or quality of the waters of an international watercourse which results directly or indirectly from human conduct', article 21(1).

[234] Article 22.

[235] Note that a variety of regional and bilateral agreements and arrangements exist with regard to international watercourses: see e.g. the agreements concerning the International Commission of the Rhine, the US–Canadian International Joint Commission and provisions concerning the Zambezi River System and the Niger Basin. See Sands, Principles, pp. 459 ff., and Birnie and Boyle, International Law and the Environment, pp. 323 ff.

[236] ICJ Reports, 1997, p. 7; 116 ILR, p. 1.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

Danube at a point on Czechoslovakian territory. In 1992, Hungary announced the termination of the treaty of 1977 and related instruments. The case came before the International Court ultimately by way of a Special Agreement in 1993 between Hungary and Slovakia (the successor to the former Czech and Slovak Federal Republic in so far as the project was concerned). The case essentially revolved around the relationship between the treaty and subsequent environmental concerns. The Court emphasised that newly developed norms of environmental law were relevant for the implementation of the treaty,[237] while 'The awareness of the vulnerability of the environment and the recognition that environmental risks have to be assessed on a continuous basis have become much stronger in the years since the treaty's conclusion.'[238] However, the Court found that the treaty was still in force and Hungary was not entitled to terminate it.[239]

Ultra-hazardous activities[240]

It has been argued that ultra-hazardous activities form a distinct category in the field of international environmental law and one in which the principle of strict or absolute liability operates. The definition of what constitutes such activity, of course, is somewhat uncertain, but the characterisation can be taken to revolve around the serious consequences that are likely to flow from any damage that results, rather than upon the likelihood of pollution occurring from the activity in question. The focus therefore is upon the significant or exceptional risk of severe transnational damage.[241] The effect of categorising a particular activity as ultra-hazardous would, it appears, be to accept the strict liability principle rather than the due diligence standard commonly regarded as the general rule in pollution

[237] ICJ Reports, 1997, p. 67. [238] Ibid., p. 68.

[239] Ibid., pp. 76 and 82. Note that in March 2003, the establishment of a Water Co-operation Facility to mediate in disputes between countries sharing a single river basin was announced: see http://news.bbc.co.uk/1/hi/sci/tech/2872427.stm.

[240] See e.g. Sands, Principles, chapter 12, and Birnie and Boyle, International Law and the Environment, chapters 8 and 9. See also D. A. Bagwell, 'Hazardous and Noxious Substances', 62 Tulane Law Review, 1988, p. 433; L. F. Goldie, 'Concepts of Strict and Absolute Liability and the Ranking of Liability in Terms of Relative Exposure to Risk', 16 Netherlands YIL, 1985, p. 247; Barboza, 'International Liability', pp. 331 ff.; W. Jenks, 'The Scope and Nature of Ultra-Hazardous Liability in International Law', 117 HR, 1966, p. 99; Handl, 'State Liability', pp. 553 ff., and R. J. Dupuy, La Responsabilité des États pour les Dommages d'Origine Technologique et Industrielle, Paris, 1976, pp. 206–9.

[241] Handl, 'State Liability', p. 554.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

situations.[242] In other words, the state under whose territory or jurisdiction the activity took place would be liable irrespective of fault. This exception to the general principle can be justified as a method of moving the burden of proof and shifting the loss clearly from the victim to the state. It would also operate as a further incentive to states to take action in areas of exceptional potential harm.

In determining what areas of activity could be characterised as ultra-hazardous, some caution needs to be exercised. There can be little doubt that nuclear activities fall within this category as a general rule, but beyond this there appears to be no agreement. The Convention on International Liability for Damage caused by Space Objects, 1972 specifically provides that a launching state shall be absolutely liable to pay compensation for damage caused by its space objects on the surface of the earth,[243] but this is the only clear example of its kind.

Nuclear activities[244]

The use of nuclear technology brings with it risks as well as benefits and the accident at the Chernobyl nuclear reactor in 1986[245] brought home to international opinion just how devastating the consequences of a nuclear mishap could be. Concern in this area had hitherto focused upon the issue of nuclear weapons. In 1963 the Treaty Banning Nuclear Weapons Testing in the Atmosphere, Outer Space and Under Water was signed.[246] However, France and China did not become parties to this treaty and continued atmospheric nuclear testing. Australia and New Zealand sought a declaration from the International Court that French atmospheric nuclear testing was contrary to international law, but the Court decided the case on the basis that a subsequent French decision to end such testing was

[242] See above, p. 853. [243] See above, p. 546.

[244] See e.g. Sands, Chernobyl: Law and Communication; Boyle, 'Nuclear Energy' and 'Chernobyl'; J. C. Woodliffe, 'Tackling Transboundary Environmental Hazards in Cases of Emergency: The Emerging Legal Framework' in Current Issues in European and International Law (eds. R. White and B. Smythe), London, 1990, and Woodliffe, 'Chernobyl: Four Years On', 39 ICLQ, 1990, p. 461.

[245] See Sands, Chernobyl: Law and Communication, pp. 1–2. See also IAEA, Summary Report on the Post Accident Review Meeting on the Chernobyl Accident, Vienna, 1986.

[246] See also the Treaty on the Prohibition of the Emplacement of Nuclear Weapons and other Weapons of Mass Destruction on the Sea-Bed, 1971; the Treaty for the Prohibition of Nuclear Weapons in Latin America, 1967 and the South Pacific Nuclear Free Zone Treaty, 1985.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

binding and thus the issue was moot.[247] In response to renewed French nuclear testing in the South Pacific in 1995, albeit underground rather than atmospheric, New Zealand asked the International Court to review the situation pursuant to the 1974 judgment and declare that France was acting illegally as being likely to cause the introduction into the marine environment of radioactive material and in failing to conduct an environmental impact assessment. While the Court referred to 'the obligations of states to respect and protect the natural environment', it declared that the request had to be dismissed as not falling within the relevant paragraph of the 1974 judgment permitting a re-examination of the situation since the latter judgment had concerned atmospheric tests alone.[248] Measures to prevent the spread of nuclear weapons were adopted in the Nuclear Non-Proliferation Treaty of 1968, although the possession itself of nuclear weapons does not contravene international law.[249]

A variety of international organisations are now involved to some extent in the process of developing rules and principles concerning nuclear activities and environmental protection. The International Atomic Energy Agency, to take the prime example, was established in 1956 in order to encourage the development of nuclear power, but particularly since the Chernobyl accident its nuclear safety role has been emphasised. The Convention on Assistance in Cases of Nuclear Emergency, 1986, for example, gave it a co-ordinating function and an obligation to provide appropriate resources where so requested.[250] The IAEA has established a series of standards and guidelines including, for example, in the context of the design, construction and operation of nuclear power plants, although such standards do not have the force of law.[251] Other international organisations also have a role to play in the sphere of nuclear activities.[252]

[247] See the Nuclear Tests cases, ICJ Reports, 1974, p. 253; 57 ILR, p. 398.

[248] Request for an Examination of the Situation in Accordance with Paragraph 63 of the Court's Judgment of 1974 in the Nuclear Tests Case, ICJ Reports, 1995, pp. 288, 305–6; 106 ILR, pp. 1, 27–8.

[249] See e.g. M. N. Shaw, 'Nuclear Weapons and International Law' in Nuclear Weapons and International Law (ed. I. Pogany), London, 1987, p. 1. See also below, chapter 21, p. 1187.

[250] See further below, p. 891.

[251] Note, however, that under the Geneva Convention on the High Seas, 1958, states are to take account of IAEA standards in preventing pollution of the seas from the dumping of nuclear waste.

[252] E.g. EURATOM (established in 1957), the Nuclear Energy Agency of the OECD (established in 1957) and the ILO (International Labour Organisation). See Boyle, 'Nuclear Energy', pp. 266–8.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

The provision of information

There appears to be a general principle requiring that information be provided in certain situations[253] and several bilateral agreements have expressed this in the context of nuclear accidents.[254] In general, such agreements provide that each state is to inform the other without delay of any emergency resulting from civil nuclear activities and any other incident that could have radiological consequences for the second state. Reciprocal information systems are set up and warning notification centres established. Such agreements, however, do not cover exchange of military information.[255]

Following the Chernobyl accident and the failure of the USSR to provide immediate information, the Vienna Convention on Early Notification of a Nuclear Accident, 1986 was rapidly adopted, under the auspices of the IAEA. This provides that in the event of a nuclear accident, the relevant state shall 'forthwith notify, directly or through the International Atomic Energy Agency . . . those states which are or may be physically affected . . . of the nuclear accident, its nature, the time of its occurrence and its exact location'. Additionally, such states must be promptly provided with information relevant to minimising the radiological consequences.[256] States are to respond promptly to a request for further information or consultations sought by an affected state.[257]

It is also to be noted that although the Convention does not apply to military nuclear accidents, the five nuclear weapons states made Statements of Voluntary Application indicating that they would apply the Convention to all nuclear accidents, including those not specified in that agreement.[258]

Since this Convention was adopted, a variety of bilateral agreements have been signed which have been more wide-ranging than those signed beforehand and which in some cases have gone beyond the provisions specified in the Notification Convention. The agreements signed by the [253] See above, p. 865. See also Principle 20 of the Stockholm Declaration and Principle 9 of the Rio Declaration.

[254] The first was concluded between France and Belgium in 1966 concerning the Ardennes Nuclear Power Station. Other examples include Switzerland–Federal Republic of Germany, 1978 and France–UK, 1983. The latter agreement was supplemented by a formal arrangement between the UK Nuclear Installations Inspectorate and the French equivalent for the continuous exchange of information on safety issues.

[255] See Woodliffe, 'Tackling Transboundary Environmental Hazards', at pp. 117–20.

[256] Article 2. See also article 5. [257] Article 6.

[258] See text in 25 ILM, 1986, p. 1394.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

UK with Norway, the Netherlands and Denmark during 1987–8, for example, specify that there is an obligation to notify the other parties if there is an accident or activity in the territory of the notifying state from which a transboundary effect of radiological safety significance is likely and additionally where abnormal levels of radiation are registered that are not caused by release from facilities or activities in the notifying state's territory. Extensive provisions dealing with exchanges of information are also included.[259]

The provision of assistance[260]

The earliest treaty providing for assistance in the event of radiation accidents was the Nordic Mutual Assistance Agreement, 1963. This dealt with the general terms of assistance, the advisory and co-ordinating role of the IAEA, financing, liability and privileges and immunities. The United Nations established the UN Disaster Relief Office (UNDRO) in 1972[261] and this provides assistance in pre-disaster planning. In 1977 the IAEA concluded an agreement with UNDRO with the purpose of co-ordinating their assistance activities in the nuclear accident field and in 1984 published a series of guidelines[262] setting out the mechanics of co-operation between states, including references to the problems of costs, liability, privileges and immunities.

In 1986, following the Chernobyl accident and at the same time as the Notification Convention, the Vienna Convention on Assistance in the Case of a Nuclear Accident or Radiological Emergency was adopted. This provides that a state in need of assistance in the event of a nuclear accident or radiological emergency may call for such assistance from any other state party either directly or through the IAEA.[263] This applies whether or not [259] See e.g. Woodliffe, 'Chernobyl', p. 464. See the European Community Council Directive 87/600 of December 1987, which provides for the early exchange of information in the event of a radiological emergency. See also the EC Environmental Information Directive 1990 providing for a right of access to environmental information; article 9 of the Convention for the Protection of the Marine Environment of the North-East Atlantic, 1992 and Chapter III of the Convention on Civil Liability for Damage Resulting from Activities Dangerous to the Environment, 1993.

[260] See e.g. A. O. Adede, The IAEA Notification and Assistance Conventions in Case of a Nuclear Accident: Landmarks in the History of Multilateral Treaty-Making, London, 1987.

[261] A Disaster Relief Coordinator was provided for in General Assembly resolution 2816 (XXVI). See Sands, Chernobyl: Law and Communication, p. 45.

[262] Guidelines for Mutual Emergency Assistance Arrangements in Connection with a Nuclear Accident or Radiological Emergency, Sands, Chernobyl: Law and Communication, p. 199.

[263] Article 2(1).

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

such accident or emergency originated within its territory, jurisdiction or control. States requesting assistance (which may include medical assistance and help with regard to the temporary relocation of displaced persons[264]) must provide details of the type of assistance required and other necessary information.[265] The IAEA must respond to a request for assistance by making available appropriate resources allocated for this purpose and by transmitting promptly the request to other states and international organisations possessing the necessary resources. In addition, if requested by the state seeking assistance, the IAEA will co-ordinate the assistance at the international level. The IAEA is also required to collect and disseminate to the states parties information concerning the availability of experts, equipment and materials and with regard to methodologies, techniques and available research data relating to the response to such situations.[266] The general range of assistance that can be provided by the Agency is laid down in some detail.[267]

In general terms, the Assistance Convention seeks to balance considerations relating to the sovereignty of the requesting state,[268] the legitimate rights of the assisting state or states[269] and the interests of the international community in rendering rapid assistance to affected states. Whether the balance achieved is a fair one is open to discussion.[270]

Nuclear safety

The Convention on Nuclear Safety was adopted by the IAEA in 1994. This emphasises that responsibility for nuclear safety rests with the state having jurisdiction over a nuclear installation[271] and obliges states parties to take legislative and administrative measures to implement Convention obligations[272] via a regulatory body[273] and to submit reports to periodic [264] Article 2(5). [265] Article 2(2). [266] Article 5. [267] Ibid.

[268] Under article 3(a), and unless otherwise agreed, the requesting state has the overall direction, control, co-ordination and supervision of the assistance within its territory.

[269] Under article 7, the assisting state is entitled, unless it offers its assistance without costs, to be reimbursed for all the costs incurred by it, which are to be provided promptly, and under article 10(2), unless otherwise agreed, a requesting state is liable to compensate the assisting state for all loss of or damage to equipment or materials and for the death of or injury to personnel of the assisting party or persons acting on its behalf. There is no provision dealing with liability for damage caused by the assisting state. See also article 8 dealing with privileges and immunities.

[270] See e.g. Sands, Chernobyl: Law and Communication, p. 47, and Woodliffe, 'Tackling Transboundary Environmental Hazards', p. 127.

[271] Defined as 'a land-based civil nuclear power plant', article 2(1).

[272] Articles 4 and 7. [273] Article 8.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

review meetings of all parties.[274] The Convention provides that operators of nuclear installations must be licensed[275] and it is the operators that remain primarily responsible for the safety of the installations.[276] The Convention specifies a number of safety considerations, but these are not in the form of binding obligations upon the parties.[277]

Civil liability[278]

In addition to the issue of the responsibility or liability of the state for the activity under consideration, the question of the proceedings that may be taken by the individual victims is also raised. One possible approach is to permit the victim to have access to the legal system of the foreign polluter and thus to all remedies available on a non-discriminatory basis. This would have the effect of transforming the transboundary pollution into a national matter.[279] This approach is evident in some treaties.[280] The problem is that while placing the foreign victim on a par with nationals within the domestic legal system of the offender, it depends for its value upon the legal system possessing internal legislation of appropriate substantive content. This is not always the case. There are, however, several international agreements dealing specifically with the question of civil liability in the sphere of nuclear activities which operate on the basis of certain common general principles.

The OECD Paris Convention on Third Party Liability in the Field of Nuclear Energy, 1960[281] provides that the operator of a nuclear installation shall be liable for damage to or loss of life of any person and damage to or loss of any property (other than the nuclear installation and associated property or means of transport). The IAEA Vienna Convention on Civil Liability for Nuclear Damage, 1963 has similar provisions, but is aimed at [274] Articles 5 and 20–5. The IAEA is to provide the secretariat for the meetings of the parties, article 28.

[275] Article 7(2)ii. [276] Article 9.

[277] Articles 10–19. See also the Joint Convention on the Safety of Spent Fuel and Radioactive Waste Management, 1997, which is based upon the IAEA's Principles of Radioactive Waste Management, 1995 and the Code of Practice on the International Transboundary Movement of Radioactive Waste, 1990. Its main provisions are similar to those of the Nuclear Safety Convention.

[278] See e.g. Birnie and Boyle, International Law and the Environment, pp. 476 ff., and Sands, Principles, pp. 904 ff.

[279] See e.g. Boyle, 'Nuclear Energy', pp. 297–8.

[280] See e.g. the Nordic Convention on the Protection of the Environment, 1974. See also OECD Recommendations C(74)224, C(76)55 and C(77)28.

[281] Together with Protocols of 1964 and 1982.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

global participation. However, both the Paris Convention and the Vienna Convention systems have suffered from relatively limited participation and a Joint Protocol was adopted in 1988 linking the Paris and Vienna Convention regimes, so that parties under each of these conventions may benefit from both of them. In 1997 a Protocol to Amend the 1963 Vienna Convention and a Convention on Supplementary Compensation for Nuclear Damage were adopted by over eighty states. These instruments increased the scope of liability of operators to a limit of not less than 300 million Special Drawing Rights (approx 400 million US dollars) and the geographical scope of the Convention. In addition, an improved definition of nuclear damage, to include, for example, environmental damage, was provided.[282]

These conventions operate upon similar principles. It is the actual operator of the nuclear installation or ship that is to bear the loss[283] and this is on the basis of absolute or strict liability. Accordingly, no proof of fault or negligence is required. The conventions require operators to possess appropriate liability insurance or other financial security under the conditions laid down by the competent public authorities, unless the operator is itself a state,[284] and the relevant states are to ensure that claims up to the liability limits are met.[285] This recognition of the residual responsibility of the state is unique.[286] The amount of liability of the operator may, however, be limited.[287] The relevant conventions also determine [282] See e.g. 36 ILM, 1997, p. 1454, and ibid., p. 1473. See also www.iaea.or.at/worldatom/Documents/Legal/protamend.shtm and www.iaea.or.at/worldatom/Documents/Legal/supcomp.shtml. Note also the Brussels Convention on the Liability of Operators of Nuclear Ships, 1962, which provides that the operator of a nuclear ship shall be absolutely liable for any nuclear damage upon proof that such damage has been caused by a nuclear incident involving the nuclear fuel of, or radioactive products or waste produced in, such ship, and the Convention Relating to Civil Liability in the Field of Maritime Carriage of Nuclear Material, 1971, which provides that a person held liable for damage caused by a nuclear incident shall be exonerated from such liability if the operator of a nuclear installation is liable for such damage under either the Paris or Vienna Conventions.

[283] A carrier or handler of nuclear material may be regarded as such an operator where the latter consents and the necessary legislative framework so provides: see e.g. article 4(d) of the Paris Convention.

[284] See e.g. article 10 of the Paris Convention, article VII of the Vienna Convention and article III of the Brussels Convention on Nuclear Ships.

[285] Ibid.

[286] Cf. the Convention on Civil Liability for Oil Pollution Damage, 1969.

[287] See articles V and VI of the Vienna Convention as amended in 1997, articles 7 and 8 of the Paris Convention and articles III and V of the Brussels Convention on Nuclear Ships.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

which state has jurisdiction over claims against operators or their insurers. In general, jurisdiction lies with the state where the nuclear incident occurred, although where a nuclear incident takes place outside the territory of a contracting party or where the place of the nuclear incident cannot be determined with certainty, jurisdiction will lie with the courts of the contracting party in whose territory the nuclear installation of the operator liable is situated.[288] Judgments given by the competent courts are enforceable in the territory of any contracting party.

The issue of inter-state claims is more difficult, as was demonstrated by the aftermath of the Chernobyl accident. Many states have paid compensation to persons affected within their jurisdiction by the fallout from that accident, but while positions have been reserved with regard to claims directly against the former USSR, it seems that problems relating to the obligations actually owed by states and the doubt over the requisite standard of care have prevented such claims from actually being made.[289]

Hazardous wastes [290]

The increasing problem of the disposal of toxic and hazardous wastes and the practice of dumping in the Third World, with its attendant severe health risks, has prompted international action.[291] The Oslo Convention for the Prevention of Marine Pollution by Dumping from Ships and Aircraft, 1972[292] provides for a ban on the dumping of certain substances[293] and for controls to be placed on the dumping of others.[294] The London Convention on the Prevention of Marine Pollution by Dumping of Wastes and Other Matter, 1972[295] prohibits the dumping of wastes except as provided in the Convention itself, and this is strictly controlled.

[288] Article 13 of the Paris Convention, article XI of the Vienna Convention and article X of the Brussels Convention on Nuclear Ships.

[289] See e.g. Sands, Chernobyl: Law and Communication, pp. 26–8.

[290] See e.g. Sands, Principles, chapter 12, and Birnie and Boyle, International Law and the Environment, chapter 8.

[291] See Keesing's Record of World Events, pp. 36788–9 (1989). See also Principle 6 of the Stockholm Declaration 1972 and Principle 14 of the Rio Declaration 1992.

[292] This is limited essentially to the North-East Atlantic area.

[293] Listed in Annex I. [294] Listed in Annex II. [295] This is a global instrument.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

In 1988, the Organisation of African Unity adopted a resolution proclaiming the dumping of nuclear and industrial wastes in Africa to be a crime against Africa and its people. In 1991, the OAU adopted the Bamako Convention on the Ban of the Import into Africa and the Control of Transboundary Movement and Management of Hazardous Wastes within Africa,[296] under which parties are to prohibit the import of all hazardous wastes for any reason into Africa by non-parties and to prohibit the dumping at sea of such wastes. The OECD has adopted a number of Decisions and Recommendations concerning the transfrontier movements and exports of hazardous wastes.[297] In 1989 the OECD adopted a Recommendation[298] noting that the polluter-pays principle should apply to accidents involving hazardous substances. The Basle Convention on the Control of Transboundary Movements of Hazardous Wastes and Their Disposal, 1989 provides that parties shall prohibit the export of hazardous and other wastes to parties which have prohibited the import of such wastes and have so informed the other parties. In the absence of prohibition by the importing state, export to that state of such wastes is only permissible where consent in writing to the specific import is obtained.[299] The Convention also provides that any proposed transboundary movement of hazardous wastes must be notified to the competent authorities of the states concerned by the state of export. The latter shall not allow the generator or exporter of hazardous wastes to commence the transboundary movement without the written consent of the state of import and any state of transit.[300]

In 1990, the IAEA adopted a Code of Practice on the International Transboundary Movement of Radioactive Waste,[301] emphasising that every state should ensure that such movements take place only with the prior notification and consent of the sending, receiving and transit states in accordance with their respective laws and regulations. Appropriate regulatory authorities were called for, as well as the necessary administrative

[296] 30 ILM, 1991, p. 773.
[297] See e.g. 23 ILM, 1984, p. 214; 25 ILM, 1986, p. 1010 and 28 ILM, 1989, pp. 277 and 259.
[298] C(89)88.
[299] Article 4. Note also the Convention on the Prior Informed Consent Procedure for Certain Hazardous Chemicals and Pesticides in International Trade, 1998.
[300] Article 6. [301] 30 ILM, 1991, p. 556.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

and technical capacity to manage and dispose of such waste in a manner consistent with international safety standards.[302]

The Convention on the Transboundary Effects of Industrial Accidents adopted in 1992 applies to industrial accidents in an installation or during transportation resulting from activities involving hazardous substances (identified in Annex I). It does not apply to nuclear accidents, accidents at military installations, dam failures, land-based transport accidents, accidental release of genetically modified organisms, accidents caused by activities in the marine environment or spills of oil or other harmful substances at sea.[303] The Convention provides that parties of origin[304] should identify hazardous activities within the jurisdiction and ensure that affected parties are notified of any such proposed or existing activity. Consultations are to take place on the identification of those hazardous activities that may have transboundary effects.[305] A variety of preventive measures are posited.[306] In particular, the party of origin shall require the operator in charge of such hazardous activity to demonstrate the safe performance of that activity by the provision of information.[307] Parties are to develop policies on the siting of new hazardous activities and on significant modifications to existing hazardous activities, while adequate emergency preparedness to respond to industrial accidents is to be established and maintained.[308] An industrial accident notification system is established,[309] while by article 13 the parties 'shall support appropriate international efforts to elaborate rules, criteria and procedures in the field of responsibility and liability'.[310]

[302] See now also the Principles of Radioactive Waste Management, 1995 and the Joint Convention on the Safety of Spent Fuel and Radioactive Waste Management, 1997.

[303] Article 2(2).

[304] I.e. parties under whose jurisdiction an industrial accident occurs or is capable of occurring, article 1(g).

[305] Article 4. See also Annexes II and III.

[306] See article 6 and Annex IV.

[307] Article 6(2) and Annex V.

[308] Articles 7 and 8 and Annex V.

[309] Article 10 and Annex IX.

[310] See also the Memorandum of Understanding Concerning Establishment of the Inter-Organisation Programme for the Sound Management of Chemicals, 1995 signed by the Food and Agriculture Organisation, the International Labour Organisation, the Organisation for Economic Co-operation and Development, the UN Industrial Development Programme, the UN Environment Programme and the World Health Organisation. The areas for co-ordination include the international assessment of chemical risks, information exchange and the prevention of illegal international traffic in toxic and dangerous products: see 34 ILM, 1995, p. 1311.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

Marine pollution[311]

Marine pollution can arise from a variety of sources, including the operation of shipping, dumping at sea,[312] activities on the seabed[313] and the effects of pollution originating on the land and entering the seas.[314] There are a large number of treaties, bilateral, regional and multilateral, dealing with such issues and some of the more significant of them in the field of pollution from ships will be briefly noted.

Pollution from ships

The International Convention for the Prevention of Pollution of the Sea by Oil, 1954 basically prohibits the discharge of oil within 50 miles of land and has been essentially superseded by the International Convention for 311 See e.g. Sands, Principles, chapter 9; Birnie and Boyle, International Law and the Environment, chapter 7; R. Churchill and A. V. Lowe, The Law of the Sea, 3rd edn, Manchester, 1999, chapter 15; A. E. Boyle, 'Marine Pollution under the Law of the Sea Convention', 79 AJIL, 1985, p. 347; L. Caflisch, 'International Law and Ocean Pollution: The Present and the Future', 8 Revue Belge de Droit International, 1972, p. 7, and O. Schachter, 'The Value of the 1982 UN Convention on the Law of the Sea: Preserving our Freedoms and Protecting the Environment', 23 Ocean Development and International Law, 1992, p. 55.

312 See above, p. 620, and Churchill and Lowe, Law of the Sea, p. 363. See also D. Bodansky, 'Protecting the Marine Environment from Vessel-Source Pollution: UNCLOS III and Beyond', 18 Ecology Law Quarterly, 1991, p. 719, and Y. Sasamura, 'Prevention and Control of Marine Pollution from Ships', 25 Law of the Sea Institute Proceedings, 1993, p. 306.

313 See Churchill and Lowe, Law of the Sea, p. 370.

314 Articles 194 and 207 of the Convention on the Law of the Sea, 1982 provide in general terms for states to reduce marine pollution from land-based sources. Note that the Montreal Guidelines on the Protection of the Environment Against Pollution from Land-Based Sources, 1985 built upon article 207. A number of regional conventions (many of them UN Environment Programme Regional Seas Conventions) lay down specific rules dealing with the control of particular substances: see e.g. the Barcelona Convention for the Protection of the Mediterranean Sea Against Pollution, 1976 and its two Protocols of 1980 and 1982; the Kuwait Regional Convention for Co-operation on Protection of the Marine Environment from Pollution, 1978 and Protocols of 1978, 1989 and 1990; the Abidjan Convention for Co-operation in the Protection and Development of the Marine and Coastal Environment of the West and Central Africa Region, 1981 and Protocol of 1981; the Lima Convention for the Protection of the Marine Environment and Coastal Areas of the South-East Pacific, 1981 and Protocols; the Cartagena Convention for the Protection and Development of the Marine Environment of the Wider Caribbean Region, 1983 and two Protocols of 1983 and 1990; the Convention on the Protection of the Black Sea Against Pollution, 1992; the Convention for the Protection of the Marine Environment of the North-East Atlantic, 1992 and the Convention on the Protection of the Marine Environment of the Baltic Sea Area, 1992.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

the Prevention of Pollution from Ships, 1973,[315] which is concerned with all forms of non-accidental pollution from ships apart from dumping. In Annexes and other amendments and Protocols to the Convention,[316] detailed standards are laid down covering oil, noxious liquid substances in bulk, harmful substances carried by sea in packaged form, sewage and garbage. The Convention covers ships flying the flag of, or operated under the authority of, a state party, but does not apply to warships or state-owned ships used only on governmental non-commercial service.

Article 211(2) of the Convention on the Law of the Sea, 1982 provides that states are to legislate for the prevention, reduction and control of pollution of the marine environment from vessels flying their flag or of their registry. Such rules are to have the same effect at least as that of generally accepted international rules and standards established through the competent international organisation[317] or general diplomatic conference. States are also to ensure that the ships of their nationality or of their registry comply with 'applicable international rules and standards' and with domestic rules governing the prevention, reduction and control of pollution.[318] In addition, coastal states have jurisdiction physically to inspect, and, where the evidence so warrants, commence proceedings against ships in their territorial waters, where there are clear grounds for believing that the ship concerned has violated domestic or international pollution regulations.[319] It should also be noted that a state in whose port a vessel is may take legal proceedings against that vessel not only where it is alleged to have violated that state's pollution laws or applicable international rules in its territorial sea or economic zone,[320] but also in respect of any discharge outside its internal waters, territorial sea or exclusive economic zone in violation of applicable international rules and standards.[321]

[315] Known as the MARPOL Convention. This was modified by Protocols of 1978 and 1997 and has been further amended: see www.imo.org/Conventions/contents.asp?doc_id=678&topic_id=258.

[316] Note e.g. that Annexes I and II are fully binding, while Annexes III, IV and V are options which a state may declare it does not accept when first becoming a party to the Convention, article 14.

[317] The International Maritime Organisation: see www.imo.org.

[318] Article 217. [319] Article 220(2). [320] Article 220(1).

[321] Article 218, a provision characterised as 'truly innovatory' by Churchill and Lowe, Law of the Sea, p. 350.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

Where an accident takes place, the Convention Relating to Intervention on the High Seas in Cases of Oil Pollution Casualties, 1969[322] permits states parties to take such measures on the high seas as may be necessary to prevent, mitigate or eliminate grave and imminent danger to their coastline or related interests from pollution or threat of pollution of the sea by oil.[323] An International Convention on Oil Pollution Preparedness, Response and Co-operation was signed in London in November 1990, with the purpose of ensuring prompt and effective action in the event of a pollution incident. It requires ships to carry detailed plans for dealing with pollution emergencies. Pollution incidents must be reported without delay and, in the event of a serious incident, other states likely to be affected must be informed and details given to the International Maritime Organisation. National and regional systems for dealing with such incidents are encouraged and the contracting parties agree to co-operate and provide advisory services, technical support and equipment at the request of other parties.[324]

As far as liability is concerned, the Convention on Civil Liability for Oil Pollution Damage, 1969 provides that where oil escaping from a ship causes damage on the territory or territorial sea of a contracting party, the shipowner is strictly liable for such damage, which includes the costs of both preventive measures and further loss or damage caused by such measures.[325] This liability is limited, however, unless the pollution is the [322] The adoption of this Convention followed the Torrey Canyon incident in 1967 in which a ship aground, although on the high seas, was bombed in order to reduce the risk of oil pollution: see Churchill and Lowe, Law of the Sea, p. 354. See also the Report of the Home Office, Cmnd 3246 (1967).

[323] This was extended by a Protocol of 1973 to cover pollution from substances other than oil. Note that the International Convention on Salvage, 1989 seeks to integrate environmental factors into the salvage rewards system.

[324] See e.g. the Bonn Agreement for Co-operation in Dealing with Pollution of the North Sea by Oil, 1969 and the Agreement for Co-operation in Dealing with Pollution of the North Sea by Oil and Other Harmful Substances, 1983. Many of the UN Environment Programme Regional Seas Conventions have Protocols dealing with emergency situations: see e.g. Sands, Principles, pp. 399 ff.

[325] Except where the damage results from war or acts of God; is wholly caused by an act or omission done by a third party with intent to cause damage; or where the damage is wholly caused by the negligent or other wrongful act of any government or other authority responsible for the maintenance of navigational aids: see articles II and III. See also the Convention on Civil Liability for Oil Pollution Damage Resulting from Exploration and Exploitation of Seabed Mineral Resources, 1977, which establishes the liability of the operator of an installation under the jurisdiction of a party for pollution damage resulting from incidents taking place beyond the coastal low-water line.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

result of the fault of the shipowner.[326] The shipowner must maintain insurance or other financial security to cover its liability. Claims may be brought in the courts of the party in which loss or damage has occurred or preventive measures taken and the judgments of such courts are generally recognisable and enforceable in the courts of all parties. The 1969 Convention was amended by the Protocol on Liability, 1992,[327] which includes in the definition of damage compensation for impairment of the environment provided that this is limited to costs of reasonable measures of reinstatement actually undertaken or to be undertaken.[328] The Convention on the Establishment of an International Fund for Compensation for Oil Pollution Damage was adopted in 1971 and enables compensation to be paid in certain cases not covered by the Civil Liability Convention. The Convention and Protocols of 1976 and 1984 were superseded by a Protocol of 1992 and the Convention ceased to be in force as from 24 May 2002. The 1992 Protocol established a separate, 1992 International Oil Pollution Compensation Fund, known as the 1992 Fund.[329]

Suggestions for further reading

P. Birnie and A. Boyle, International Law and the Environment, 2nd edn, Oxford, 2002

R. Churchill and A. V. Lowe, The Law of the Sea, 3rd edn, Manchester, 1999

P. Okowa, State Responsibility for Transboundary Air Pollution, Oxford, 2000

The Oxford Handbook of International Environmental Law (eds. D. Bodansky, J. Brunee and E. Hay), Oxford, 2007

P. Sands, Principles of International Environmental Law, 2nd edn, Manchester, 2003

[326] Article V.

[327] When this entered into force on 30 May 1996, the 1969 Convention became known as the International Convention on Civil Liability for Oil Pollution Damage, 1992.

[328] Article 2(3).

[329] Amendments adopted in 2000 raised the amounts of compensation: see generally Sands, Principles, pp. 912 ff. See also www.imo.org/Conventions/contents.asp?topic_id=256&doc_id=661.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

16

The law of treaties

Compared with municipal law the various methods by which rights and duties may be created in international law are relatively unsophisticated.[1] Within a state, legal interests may be established by contracts between two or more persons, or by agreements under seal, or under the developed system for transferring property, or indeed by virtue of legislation or judicial decisions. International law is more limited as far as the mechanisms for the creation of new rules are concerned. Custom relies upon a measure of state practice supported by opinio juris and is usually, although not invariably, an evolving and timely process. Treaties, on the other hand, are a more direct and formal method of international law creation.

States transact a vast amount of work by using the device of the treaty, in circumstances which underline the paucity of international law procedures when compared with the many ways in which a person within a state's internal order may set up binding rights and obligations. For instance, wars will be terminated, disputes settled, territory acquired,

[1] See generally A. D. McNair, The Law of Treaties, Oxford, 1961; J. Klabbers, The Concept of Treaty in International Law, Dordrecht, 1996; A. Aust, Modern Treaty Law and Practice, 2nd edn, Cambridge, 2007; M. Fitzmaurice and O. Elias, Contemporary Issues in the Law of Treaties, Utrecht, 2005; Les Conventions de Vienne de 1969 et de 1986 sur le Droit des Traités: Commentaire Article par Article (eds. O. Corten and P. Klein), Brussels, 3 vols., 2006; Developments of International Law in Treaty Making (eds. R. Wolfrum and V. Röben), Berlin, 2005; Multilateral Treaty Calendar (ed. C. Wiktor), The Hague, 1998; Multilateral Treaty-Making (ed. V. Gowlland-Debas), The Hague, 2000; I. Detter, Essays on the Law of Treaties, Stockholm, 1967; T. O. Elias, The Modern Law of Treaties, London, 1974; D. P. O'Connell, International Law, 2nd edn, London, 1970, vol. I, pp. 195 ff.; I. Sinclair, The Vienna Convention on the Law of Treaties, 2nd edn, Manchester, 1984; P. Reuter, Introduction to the Law of Treaties, 2nd edn, Geneva, 1995; S. Bastid, Les Traités dans la Vie Internationale, Paris, 1985, and S. Rosenne, Developments in the Law of Treaties 1945–1986, Cambridge, 1989. See also Oppenheim's International Law (eds. R. Y. Jennings and A. D. Watts), 9th edn, London, 1992, p. 1197; Nguyen Quoc Dinh, P. Daillier and A. Pellet, Droit International Public, 7th edn, Paris, 2002, p. 117; I. Brownlie, Principles of Public International Law, 6th edn, Oxford, 2003, chapter 27, and M. Fitzmaurice, 'Actors and Factors in the Evolution of Treaty Norms (An Empirical Study)', 4 Austrian Review of International and European Law, 1999, p. 1.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

special interests determined, alliances established and international organisations created, all by means of treaties. No simpler method of reflecting the agreed objectives of states really exists and the international convention has to suffice both for straightforward bilateral agreements and complicated multilateral expressions of opinions. Thus, the concept of the treaty and how it operates becomes of paramount importance to the evolution of international law.

A treaty is basically an agreement between parties on the international scene. Although treaties may be concluded, or made, between states and international organisations, they are primarily concerned with relations between states. An International Convention on the Law of Treaties was signed in 1969 and came into force in 1980, while a Convention on Treaties between States and International Organisations was signed in 1986.[2] The emphasis, however, will be on the appropriate rules which have emerged as between states. The 1969 Vienna Convention on the Law of Treaties partly reflects customary law[3] and constitutes the basic framework for any discussion of the nature and characteristics of treaties. Certain provisions of the Convention may be regarded as reflective of customary international law, such as the rules on interpretation,[4] material breach[5] and fundamental change of circumstances.[6] Others may not be so regarded, and constitute principles binding only upon state parties.

The fundamental principle of treaty law is undoubtedly the proposition that treaties are binding upon the parties to them and must be performed in good faith.[7] This rule is termed pacta sunt servanda and is arguably

[2] This was based upon the International Law Commission's Draft Articles on the Law of Treaties between States and International Organisations or between International Organisations, Yearbook of the ILC, 1982, vol. II, part 2, pp. 9 ff. These articles were approved by the General Assembly and governmental views solicited and received. A plenipotentiary conference was held between 18 February and 21 March 1986 to produce a Convention based on those draft articles. See Assembly resolutions 37/112, 38/139 and 39/86.

[3] See e.g. the Namibia case, ICJ Reports, 1971, pp. 16, 47; 49 ILR, pp. 2, 37 and the Fisheries Jurisdiction case, ICJ Reports, 1973, pp. 3, 18; 55 ILR, pp. 183, 198. See also Rosenne, Developments, p. 121.

[4] See e.g. the Beagle Channel case, HMSO, 1977, p. 7; 52 ILR, p. 93; the La Bretagne case, 82 ILR, pp. 590, 612; the Golder case, European Court of Human Rights, Series A, No. 18, p. 14; 57 ILR, pp. 201, 213–14 and the Lithgow case, European Court of Human Rights, Series A, No. 102, para. 114; 75 ILR, pp. 438, 482–3.

[5] See e.g. the Namibia case, ICJ Reports, 1971, pp. 16, 47; 49 ILR, pp. 2, 37.

[6] See e.g. the Fisheries Jurisdiction cases (jurisdictional phase), ICJ Reports, 1973, pp. 3, 21; 55 ILR, pp. 183, 201.

[7] Note also the references to good faith in articles 31, 46 and 69 of the 1969 Convention. See the Nuclear Tests cases, ICJ Reports, 1974, pp. 253, 268; 57 ILR, pp. 398, 413; the Nicaragua

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

the oldest principle of international law. It was reaffirmed in article 26 of the 1969 Convention,[8] and underlies every international agreement for, in the absence of a certain minimum belief that states will perform their treaty obligations in good faith, there is no reason for countries to enter into such obligations with each other.

The term 'treaty' itself is the one most used in the context of international agreements but there are a variety of names which can be, and sometimes are, used to express the same concept, such as protocol, act, charter, covenant, pact and concordat. They each refer to the same basic activity and the use of one term rather than another often signifies little more than a desire for variety of expression.

A treaty is defined, for the purposes of the Convention, in article 2 as:

> an international agreement concluded between states in written form and governed by international law, whether embodied in a single instrument or in two or more related instruments and whatever its particular designation.[9]

In addition to excluding agreements involving international organisations, the Convention does not cover agreements between states which are to be governed by municipal law, such as a large number of commercial accords. This does not mean that such arrangements cannot be characterised as international agreements, or that they are invalid, merely that they are not within the purview of the 1969 Convention. Indeed, article 3 stresses that international agreements between states and other subjects of international law or between two or more subjects of international law, or oral agreements, do not lose their validity by being excluded from the framework of the Convention.

case, ICJ Reports, 1986, pp. 392, 418; 76 ILR, pp. 104, 129 and the Legality of the Threat or Use of Nuclear Weapons case, ICJ Reports, 1996, para. 102; 110 ILR, pp. 163, 214. See also J. F. O'Connor, Good Faith in International Law, Aldershot, 1991; E. Zoller, La Bonne Foi en Droit International Public, Paris, 1977, and H. Thirlway, 'The Law and Procedure of the International Court of Justice, 1960–89 (Part One)', 60 BYIL, 1989, pp. 4, 7.

[8] See e.g. the Gabčíkovo–Nagymaros Project case, ICJ Reports, 1997, pp. 7, 78–9; 116 ILR, p. 1.

[9] The same definition is given (substituting states and international organisations for states alone) in the 1986 Convention on Treaties between States and International Organisations and in draft article 2(1) of the ILC Draft Articles on the Effects of Armed Conflicts on Treaties, A/CN.4/178, 2007, p. 5. See also H. Thirlway, 'The Law and Procedure of the International Court of Justice 1960–1989: Supplement, 2006, Part Three', 77 BYIL, 2006, pp. 1, 3; M. Fitzmaurice, 'The Identification and Character of Treaties and Treaty Obligations between States in International Law', 73 BYIL, 2002, p. 141, and P. Gautier, 'Article 2' in Corten and Klein, Conventions de Vienne, p. 45.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

There are no specific requirements of form in international law for the existence of a treaty,[10] although it is essential that the parties intend to create legal relations as between themselves by means of their agreement.[11] This is logical since many agreements between states are merely statements of commonly held principles or objectives and are not intended to establish binding obligations. For instance, a declaration by a number of states in support of a particular political aim may in many cases be without legal (though not political) significance, as the states may regard it as a policy matter and not as setting up juridical relations between themselves. To see whether a particular agreement is intended to create legal relations, all the facts of the situation have to be examined carefully.[12] Examples of non-binding international agreements would include the Final Act of the Conference on Security and Co-operation in Europe, 1975.[13]

The International Court regarded a mandate agreement as having the character of a treaty,[14] while in the Anglo-Iranian Oil Co. case[15] doubts were expressed about whether a concession agreement between a private company and a state constituted an international agreement in the sense of a treaty.[16] Optional declarations with regard to the compulsory jurisdiction of the International Court itself under article 36(2) of the Statute of the Court have been regarded as treaty provisions,[17] while declarations made by way of unilateral acts concerning legal or factual situations may have the effect of creating legal obligations.[18] In the latter instance, of course, a treaty as such is not involved.

Where the parties to an agreement do not intend to create legal relations or binding obligations or rights thereby under international law, [10] See e.g. the Newfoundland/Nova Scotia arbitration, 2001, para. 3.15. See also the Aegean Sea Continental Shelf case, ICJ Reports, 1978, pp. 3, 39; 60 ILR, p. 511. See K. Raustiala, 'Form and Substance in International Agreements', 99 AJIL, 2005, p. 581.

[11] See e.g. Third US Restatement of Foreign Relations Law, Washington, 1987, vol. I, p. 149.

[12] Registration of the agreement with the United Nations under article 102 of the UN Charter is one useful indication. However, as the International Court pointed out in the Qatar v. Bahrain case, non-registration does not affect the actual validity of an international agreement nor its binding quality, ICJ Reports, 1994, pp. 115, 121; 102 ILR, pp. 1, 18.

[13] See further above, chapter 7, p. 372.

[14] South-West Africa cases, ICJ Reports, 1962, pp. 319, 330; 37 ILR, pp. 3, 12.

[15] ICJ Reports, 1952, pp. 93, 112; 19 ILR, pp. 507, 517.

[16] But see Texaco v. Libya, 53 ILR, p. 389.

[17] The Fisheries Jurisdiction cases, ICJ Reports, 1973, pp. 3, 16; 55 ILR, pp. 183, 196.

[18] The Nuclear Tests case, ICJ Reports, 1974, pp. 253, 267; 57 ILR, pp. 398, 412. See also the Ihlen Declaration, held to constitute a binding statement, in the Eastern Greenland case, PCIJ, Series A/B, No. 53, 1933; 6 AD, p. 95 and Burkina Faso v. Mali, ICJ Reports, 1986, pp. 554, 573–4; 80 ILR, pp. 459, 477. See further above, chapter 3, p. 121.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

the agreement will not be a treaty, although, of course, its political effect may still be considerable.[19] Of particular interest are memoranda of understanding, which are not as such legally binding,[20] but may be of legal consequence.[21] In fact a large role is played in the normal course of interstate dealings by informal non-treaty instruments precisely because they are intended to be non-binding and are thus flexible, confidential and relatively speedy in comparison with treaties.[22] They may be amended with ease and without delay and may be terminated by reasonable notice (subject to provision to the contrary). It is this intention not to create a binding arrangement governed by international law which marks the difference between treaties and informal international instruments.[23] The [19] The test will focus upon the intent of the parties as seen in the language and context of the document concerned, the circumstances of its conclusion and the explanations given by the parties: see the view of the US Assistant Legal Adviser for Treaty Affairs, 88 AJIL, 1994, p. 515. See also O. Schachter, 'The Twilight Existence of Nonbinding International Agreements', 71 AJIL, 1977, p. 296, and Rosenne, Developments, p. 91. See e.g. the Helsinki Final Act of 1975, which was understood to be non-binding and thus not a treaty by the parties involved, DUSPIL, 1975, pp. 326–7.

[20] The UK Foreign Office has noted that a memorandum of understanding is 'a form frequently used to record informal arrangements between states on matters which are inappropriate for inclusion in treaties or where the form is more convenient than a treaty (e.g. for confidentiality). They may be drawn up as a single document using non-treaty terms, signed on behalf of two or more governments, or consist of an exchange of notes or letters recording an understanding between two governments', UKMIL, 71 BYIL, 2000, p. 534, and see FCO, Treaties and MOUs: Guidance on Practice and Procedures, 2nd edn, 2004, www.fco.gov.uk/resources/en/pdf/pdf8/fco_pdf_treatymous. See also Aust, Modern Treaty Law, chapter 3.

[21] See e.g. the dispute between the USA and the UK as to the legal status of a memorandum of understanding relating to the US–UK Air Services Agreement, 1977 (Bermuda II) in the context of Heathrow Airport User Charges Arbitration, UKMIL, 63 BYIL, 1992, pp. 712 ff. and 88 AJIL, 1994, pp. 738 ff. The Tribunal noted that the memorandum of understanding was not a source of independent legal rights and duties but 'consensual subsequent practice of the parties' and an aid to the interpretation of the Bermuda II Agreement, 102 ILR, pp. 215, 353. In the Iron Rhine (Belgium/Netherlands) case, arbitral award of 24 May 2005, paras. 156 ff., the Tribunal noted that the memorandum in question, while not as such binding, in the circumstances of the case was not legally irrelevant.

[22] See e.g. Rosenne, Developments, pp. 107 ff.; A. Aust, 'The Theory and Practice of Informal International Instruments', 35 ICLQ, 1986, p. 787; R. Baxter, 'International Law in "Her Infinite Variety"', 29 ICLQ, 1980, p. 549, and Roessler, 'Law, De Facto Agreements and Declarations of Principles in International Economic Relations', 21 German YIL, 1978, p. 41.

[23] Aust provides as examples the UK memoranda of understanding on deportations with Jordan, Libya and Lebanon in 2005, Modern Treaty Law, p. 21. See also AS & DD (Libya) v. Secretary of State for the Home Department [2008] EWCA Civ 289 and Othman (Jordan) v. Secretary of State for the Home Department [2008] EWCA Civ 290.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

International Court addressed this issue in the Qatar v. Bahrain case,[24] with regard to Minutes dated 25 December 1990 signed by the parties and Saudi Arabia. The Court emphasised that whether an agreement constituted a binding agreement would depend upon 'all its actual terms' and the circumstances in which it had been drawn up,[25] and in the situation involved in the case, the Minutes were to be construed as an international agreement creating rights and obligations for the parties since on the facts they enumerated the commitments to which the parties had consented.[26] In addition, a treaty may contain a variety of provisions, not all of which constitute legal obligations.[27]

The 1969 Convention also concerns treaties which are the constituent instruments of international organisations, such as the United Nations Charter, and internal treaties adopted within international organisations.[28]

The making of treaties[29]

Formalities

Treaties may be made or concluded by the parties in virtually any manner they wish. There is no prescribed form or procedure, and how a treaty is formulated and by whom it is actually signed will depend upon the intention and agreement of the states concerned. Treaties may be drafted as between states, or governments, or heads of states, or governmental departments, whichever appears the most expedient. For instance, many

[24] ICJ Reports, 1994, p. 112; 102 ILR, p. 1.

[25] ICJ Reports, 1994, p. 121; 102 ILR, p. 18, citing the Aegean Sea Continental Shelf case, ICJ Reports, 1978, p. 39; 60 ILR, p. 511.

[26] ICJ Reports, 1994, pp. 121–2; 102 ILR, pp. 18–19. See also K. Widdows, 'What is an International Agreement in International Law?', 50 BYIL, 1979, p. 117, and J. A. Barberis, 'Le Concept de "Traité International" et ses Limites', AFDI, 1984, p. 239.

[27] See the Oil Platforms (Preliminary Objections) case, ICJ Reports, 1996, pp. 803, 820; 130 ILR, pp. 174, 201. Note that the use of the word 'treaty' may not necessarily be determinative of its legal status, for example 'treaties' signed with representatives of indigenous peoples during the colonial period giving protectorate or territorial or sovereignty rights to the colonial power: see Cameroon v. Nigeria, ICJ Reports, 2002, pp. 303, 404 ff. and the Island of Palmas case, UNRIAA, vol. II, pp. 858–9. See also I. Brownlie, Treaties with Indigenous Peoples, Oxford, 1992.

[28] Article 5. See further Rosenne, Developments, chapter 4.

[29] See e.g. H. Blix, Treaty-Making Power, New York, 1960, and E. W. Vierdag, 'The Time of the Conclusion of a Multilateral Treaty: Article 30 of the Vienna Convention on the Law of Treaties and Related Provisions', 59 BYIL, 1988, p. 75. See also Oppenheim's International Law, p. 1222, and Nguyen Quoc Dinh et al., Droit International Public, p. 125.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

of the most important treaties are concluded as between heads of state, and many of the more mundane agreements are expressed to be as between government departments, such as minor trading arrangements.

Where precisely in the domestic constitutional establishment the power to make treaties is to be found depends upon each country's municipal regulations and varies from state to state. In the United Kingdom, the treaty-making power is within the prerogative of the Crown,[30] whereas in the United States it resides with the President 'with the advice and consent of the Senate' and the concurrence of two-thirds of the Senators.[31] International law leaves such matters to domestic law.[32]

Nevertheless, there are certain rules that apply in the formation of international conventions. In international law, states have the capacity to make agreements, but since states are not identifiable human persons, particular principles have evolved to ensure that persons representing states indeed have the power so to do for the purpose of concluding the treaty in question. Such persons must produce what is termed 'full powers' according to article 7 of the Convention, before being accepted as capable of representing their countries.[33] 'Full powers' refers to documents certifying status from the competent authorities of the state in question. This provision provides security to the other parties to the treaty that they are making agreements with persons competent to do so.[34] However, certain persons do not need to produce such full powers, by virtue of their position and functions. This exception refers to heads of state and government, and foreign ministers for the purpose of performing all acts relating to the conclusion of the treaty; heads of diplomatic missions for the purpose of adopting the text of the treaty between their country and the country to which they are accredited; and representatives accredited to international conferences or organisations for the purpose of adopting the text of the treaty in that particular conference or organisation. The International Court noted in the preliminary objections to jurisdiction phase of the Genocide

[30] See e.g. S. de Smith and R. Brazier, Constitutional and Administrative Law, 6th edn, London, 1989, p. 140.

[31] See e.g. Third US Restatement of Foreign Relations Law, p. 159. See, with regard to the Presidential power to terminate a treaty, DUSPIL, 1979, pp. 724 ff., and Goldwater v. Carter 617 F.2d 697 and 100 S. Ct. 533 (1979). See also L. Henkin, 'Restatement of the Foreign Relations Law of the United States (Revised)', 74 AJIL, 1980, p. 954.

[32] See e.g. Cameroon v. Nigeria, ICJ Reports, 2002, pp. 303, 429.

[33] See Sinclair, Vienna Convention, pp. 29 ff.; Aust, Modern Treaty Law, chapter 5, and M. Jones, Full Powers and Ratification, Cambridge, 1946.

[34] See Yearbook of the ILC, 1966, vol. II, p. 193.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

Convention (Bosnia v. Serbia) case that, 'According to international law, there is no doubt that every head of state is presumed to be able to act on behalf of the state in its international relations.'[35]

Sinclair notes that UK practice distinguishes between 'general full powers' held by the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs, Ministers of State and Parliamentary Under-Secretaries in the Foreign and Commonwealth Office and UK Permanent Representatives to the UN, European Communities and General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade, which enable any treaty to be negotiated and signed, and 'special full powers' granted to a particular person to negotiate and sign a specific treaty.[36]

Any act relating to the making of a treaty by a person not authorised as required will be without any legal effect, unless the state involved afterwards confirms the act.[37] One example of this kind of situation arose in 1951 with regard to a convention relating to the naming of cheeses. It was signed by a delegate on behalf of both Sweden and Norway, but it appeared that he had authority only from Norway. However, the agreement was subsequently ratified by both parties and entered into effect.[38]

Consent

Once a treaty has been drafted and agreed by authorised representatives, a number of stages are then necessary before it becomes a binding legal obligation upon the parties involved. The text of the agreement drawn up by the negotiators of the parties has to be adopted and article 9 provides that adoption in international conferences takes place by the vote of two-thirds of the states present and voting, unless by the same majority it is decided to apply a different rule. This procedure follows basically the practices recognised in the United Nations General Assembly[39] and carried out in the majority of contemporary conferences. An increasing number of conventions are now adopted and opened for signature by means of UN General Assembly resolutions, such as the 1966 International Covenants on Human Rights and the 1984 Convention against Torture, using normal Assembly voting procedures. Another significant point is the tendency in [35] ICJ Reports, 1996, pp. 595, 622; 115 ILR, p. 1 and see also Cameroon v. Nigeria, ICJ Reports, 2002, pp. 303, 430.

[36] Sinclair, Vienna Convention, p. 32. See also Satow's Guide to Diplomatic Practice, 5th edn, London, 1979, p. 62.

[37] Article 8. [38] See Yearbook of the ILC, 1966, vol. II, p. 195.

[39] See article 18 of the UN Charter.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

recent conferences to operate by way of consensus so that there would be no voting until all efforts to reach agreement by consensus have been exhausted.[40] In cases other than international conferences, adoption will take place by the consent of all the states involved in drawing up the text of the agreement.[41]

The consent of the states parties to the treaty in question is a vital factor, since states may (in the absence of a rule being also one of customary law) be bound only by their consent. Treaties are in this sense contracts between states and if they do not receive the consent of the various states, their provisions will not be binding upon them. There are, however, a number of ways in which a state may express its consent to an international agreement. It may be signalled, according to article 11, by signature, exchange of instruments constituting a treaty, ratification, acceptance, approval or accession. In addition, it may be accomplished by any other means, if so agreed.

Consent by signature[42]

A state may regard itself as having given its consent to the text of the treaty by signature in defined circumstances noted by article 12, that is, where the treaty provides that signature shall have that effect, or where it is otherwise established that the negotiating states were agreed that signature should have that effect, or where the intention of the state to give that effect to the signature appears from the full powers of its representative or was expressed during the negotiations.

Although consent by ratification is probably the most popular of the methods adopted in practice, consent by signature does retain some significance, especially in light of the fact that to insist upon ratification in each case before a treaty becomes binding is likely to burden the administrative machinery of government and result in long delays. Accordingly, provision is made for consent to be expressed by signature.[43] This would be appropriate for the more routine and less politicised of treaties. The [40] See e.g. the Third UN Conference on the Law of the Sea, Sinclair, Vienna Convention, pp. 37–9. See also the UN Juridical Yearbook, 1974, pp. 163–4, where the Director of the General Legal Division, Office of Legal Affairs, declared that the term 'consensus' in UN organs, 'was used to describe a practice under which every effort is made to achieve unanimous agreement; and if that could not be done, those dissenting from the general trend were prepared simply to make their position and reservations known and placed on the record'. See also Aust, Modern Treaty Law, pp. 86 ff.

[41] Article 9(1). This reflects the classic rule, Sinclair, Vienna Convention, p. 33.

[42] See Yearbook of the ILC, 1966, vol. II, p. 196.

[43] See, for example, the Maroua Declaration, Cameroon v. Nigeria, ICJ Reports, 2002, pp. 303, 429–30.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

act of signature is usually a formal affair. Often in the more important treaties, the head of state will formally add his signature in an elaborate ceremony. In multilateral conventions, a special closing session will be held at which authorised representatives will sign the treaty. However, where the convention is subject to acceptance, approval or ratification, signature will in principle be a formality and will mean no more than that state representatives have agreed upon an acceptable text, which will be forwarded to their particular governments for the necessary decision as to acceptance or rejection.[44] However, signature has additional meaning in that in such cases and pending ratification, acceptance or approval, a state must refrain from acts which would defeat the object and purpose of the treaty until such time as its intentions with regard to the treaty have been made clear.[45]

Consent by exchange of instruments

Article 13 provides that the consent of states to be bound by a treaty constituted by instruments exchanged between them may be expressed by that exchange when the instruments declare that their exchange shall have that effect or it is otherwise established that those states had agreed that the exchange of instruments should have that effect.

Consent by ratification[46]

The device of ratification by the competent authorities of the state is historically well established and was originally devised to ensure that the representative did not exceed his powers or instructions with regard to the making of a particular agreement. Although ratification (or approval) was originally a function of the sovereign, it has in modern times been made subject to constitutional control.

[44] The International Court has stated that, 'signed but unratified treaties may constitute an accurate expression of the understanding of the parties at the time of signature', Qatar v. Bahrain, ICJ Reports, 2001, pp. 40, 68.

[45] Article 18. See Sinclair, Vienna Convention, pp. 42–4, and Certain German Interests in Polish Upper Silesia, PCIJ, Series A, No. 7, 1926, p. 30. See also H. Thirlway, 'The Law and Procedure of the International Court of Justice 1960–1989 (Part Four)', 63 BYIL, 1992, pp. 1, 48 ff., and J. Klabbers, 'How to Defeat a Treaty's Object and Purpose Pending Entry into Force: Towards Manifest Intent', 34 Vanderbilt Journal of Transnational Law, 2001, p. 283. Note that having signed the Rome Statute for the International Criminal Court in December 2000, the US withdrew its signature in May 2002: see www.state.gov/r/pa/prs/ps/2002/9968.htm.

[46] Defined in article 2(1)b as 'the international act . . . whereby a state establishes on the international plane its consent to be bound by a treaty'. It is thus to be distinguished as a concept from ratification in the internal constitutional sense, although clearly there is an important link: see Yearbook of the ILC, 1966, vol. II, pp. 197–8. See also Brownlie, Principles, pp. 582–3.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

The advantages of waiting until a state ratifies a treaty before it becomes a binding document are basically twofold, internal and external. In the latter case, the delay between signature and ratification may often be advantageous in allowing extra time for consideration, once the negotiating process has been completed. But it is the internal aspects that are the most important, for they reflect the change in political atmosphere that has occurred in the last 150 years and has led to a much greater participation by a state's population in public affairs. By providing for ratification, the feelings of public opinion have an opportunity to be expressed with the possibility that a strong negative reaction may result in the state deciding not to ratify the treaty under consideration.

The rules relating to ratification vary from country to country. In the United Kingdom, although the power of ratification comes within the prerogative of the Crown, it has become accepted that treaties involving any change in municipal law, or adding to the financial burdens of the government or having an impact upon the private rights of British subjects will be first submitted to Parliament and subsequently ratified. There is, in fact, a procedure known as the Ponsonby Rule which provides that all treaties subject to ratification are laid before Parliament at least twenty-one days before the actual ratification takes place.[47] Different considerations apply in the case of the United States.[48] However, the question of how a state effects ratification is a matter for internal law alone and outside international law.

Article 14 of the 1969 Vienna Convention notes that ratification will express a state's consent to be bound by a treaty where the treaty so provides; it is otherwise established that the negotiating states were agreed that ratification should be required; the representative of the state has signed the treaty subject to ratification or the intention of the state to sign the treaty subject to ratification appears from the full powers of its representative or was expressed during negotiations.

Within this framework, there is a controversy as to which treaties need to be ratified. Some writers maintain that ratification is only necessary if it is clearly contemplated by the parties to the treaty,[49] and this approach has been adopted by the United Kingdom.[50] On the other hand, it has been suggested that ratification should be required unless the treaty clearly

[47] See above, chapter 4, p. 152. [48] Ibid., p. 161.

[49] See e.g. G. Fitzmaurice, 'Do Treaties Need Ratification?', 15 BYIL, 1934, p. 129, and O'Connell, International Law, p. 222. See also H. Blix, 'The Requirement of Ratification', 30 BYIL, 1953, p. 380.

[50] See e.g. Sinclair, Vienna Convention, p. 40, and O'Connell, International Law, p. 222.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

reveals a contrary intention.[51] The United States, in general, will dispense with ratification only in the case of executive agreements.[52] Ratification in the case of bilateral treaties is usually accomplished by exchanging the requisite instruments, but in the case of multilateral treaties the usual procedure is for one party to collect the ratifications of all states, keeping all parties informed of the situation. It is becoming more accepted that in such instances, the Secretary-General of the United Nations will act as the depositary for ratifications.[53] In some cases, signatures to treaties may be declared subject to 'acceptance' or 'approval'. The terms, as noted in articles 11 and 14(2), are very similar to ratification and similar provisions apply. Such variation in terminology is not of any real significance and only refers to a somewhat simpler form of ratification.

Consent by accession[54]

This is the normal method by which a state becomes a party to a treaty it has not signed either because the treaty provides that signature is limited to certain states, and it is not such a state, or because a particular deadline for signature has passed. Article 15 notes that consent by accession is possible where the treaty so provides, or the negotiating states were agreed or subsequently agree that consent by accession could occur in the case of the state in question. Important multilateral treaties often declare that states or, in certain situations, other specific entities may accede to the treaty at a later date, that is after the date after which it is possible to signify acceptance by signature.[55]

Reservations to treaties[56]

A reservation is defined in article 2 of the Convention as:

> a unilateral statement, however phrased or named, made by a state, when signing, ratifying, accepting, approving or acceding to a treaty, whereby it

[51] See e.g. McNair, Law of Treaties, p. 133.

[52] O'Connell, International Law, p. 222. See also DUSPIL, 1974, pp. 216–17 and ibid., 1979, pp. 678 ff.

[53] See P. T. B. Kohona, 'Some Notable Developments in the Practice of the UN Secretary-General as a Depositary of Multilateral Treaties: Reservations and Declarations', 99 AJIL, 2005, p. 433.

[54] See Yearbook of the ILC, 1966, vol. II, p. 199.

[55] See e.g. articles 26 and 28 of the Convention on the Territorial Sea and the Contiguous Zone.

[56] See e.g. Aust, Modern Treaty Law, chapter 8; A. Pellet, 'Article 19' in Corten and Klein, Conventions de Vienne, p. 641; C. Redgwell, 'Universality or Integrity? Some Reflections on Reservations to General Multilateral Treaties', 64 BYIL, 1993, p. 245; G. Gaja, 'Unruly

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

> purports to exclude or to modify the legal effect of certain provisions of the treaty in their application to that state.[57]

Where a state is satisfied with most of the terms of a treaty, but is unhappy about particular provisions, it may, in certain circumstances, wish to refuse to accept or be bound by such provisions, while consenting to the rest of the agreement. By the device of excluding certain provisions, states may agree to be bound by a treaty which otherwise they might reject entirely. This may have beneficial results in the cases of multilateral conventions, by inducing as many states as possible to adhere to the proposed treaty. To some extent it is a means of encouraging harmony amongst states of widely differing social, economic and political systems, by concentrating upon agreed, basic issues and accepting disagreement on certain other matters.

The capacity of a state to make reservations to an international treaty illustrates the principle of sovereignty of states, whereby a state may refuse its consent to particular provisions so that they do not become binding upon it. On the other hand, of course, to permit a treaty to become honeycombed with reservations by a series of countries could well jeopardise the Treaty Reservations', Le Droit International à l'Heure de sa Codifications, Milan, 1987, p. 313; J. K. Gamble, 'Reservations to Multilateral Treaties: A Macroscopic View of State Practice', 74 AJIL, 1980, p. 372; G. Fitzmaurice, 'Reservations to Multilateral Treaties', 2 ICLQ, 1953, p. 1; D. W. Bowett, 'Reservations to Non-restricted Multilateral Treaties', 48 BYIL, 1976–7, p. 67; P. H. Imbert, Les Réserves aux Traités Multilatéraux, Paris, 1979; Sinclair, Vienna Convention, chapter 3; D. W. Greig, 'Reservations: Equity as a Balancing Force?', 16 Australian YIL, 1995, p. 21; O'Connell, International Law, pp. 229 ff.; J. M. Ruda, 'Reservations to Treaties', 146 HR, 1975, p. 95; G. Horn, Reservations and Interpretative Declarations to Multilateral Treaties, Leiden, 1988; Oppenheim's International Law, p. 1241, and Nguyen Quoc Dinh et al., Droit International Public, p. 178. See also A. Pellet, Reports on the Law and Practice Relating to Reservations to Treaties, e.g. Report of the International Law Commission, 2007, A/62/10, pp. 15 ff. The intention is to draw up a Guide to Practice consisting of guidelines which, while not binding in themselves, might guide the practice of states and international organisations with regard to reservations and interpretative declarations on the basis of the Commission's fundamental decision not to call into question the work of the Vienna Conventions. The Draft Guidelines adopted to date may be found at A/62/10, pp. 46 ff.

[57] Article 2(1)d of the Vienna Convention on the Law of Treaties between States and International Organisations, 1986 provides that a reservation means 'a unilateral statement, however phrased or named, made by a state or by an international organisation when signing, ratifying, formally confirming, accepting, approving or acceding to a treaty, whereby it purports to exclude or to modify the legal effect of certain provisions of the treaty in their application to that state or to that organisation'. See also the definition contained in draft guideline 1.1 of the ILC Guide to Practice, Report of the ILC on its 54th Session, 2002, p. 50.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

whole exercise. It could seriously dislocate the whole purpose of the agreement and lead to some complicated inter-relationships amongst states. This problem does not arise in the case of bilateral treaties, since a reservation by one party to a proposed term of the agreement would necessitate a renegotiation.[58] An agreement between two parties cannot exist where one party refuses to accept some of the provisions of the treaty.[59] This is not the case with respect to multilateral treaties, and here it is possible for individual states to dissent from particular provisions, by announcing their intention either to omit them altogether, or understand them in a certain way. Accordingly, the effect of a reservation is simply to exclude the treaty provision to which the reservation has been made from the terms of the treaty in force between the parties.[60]

Reservations must be distinguished from other statements made with regard to a treaty that are not intended to have the legal effect of a reservation, such as understandings, political statements or interpretative declarations. In the latter instance, no binding consequence is intended with regard to the treaty in question. What is involved is a political manifestation for primarily internal effect that is not binding upon the other parties.[61] A distinction has been drawn between 'mere' interpretative declarations and 'qualified' interpretative declarations,[62] with the latter category

[58] See the statement of British practice to this effect, UKMIL, 68 BYIL, 1997, p. 482.

[59] See Yearbook of the ILC, 1966, vol. II, p. 203. See also draft guideline 1.5.1 of the ILC Guide to Practice, Report of the ILC on its 54th Session, 2002, p. 55.

[60] See e.g. Legality of the Use of Force (Yugoslavia v. USA), Provisional Measures Order, ICJ Reports, 1999, pp. 916, 924 and the Fisheries Jurisdiction (Spain v. Canada) case, ICJ Reports, 1998, p. 432.

[61] See e.g. the Temeltasch case, 5 European Human Rights Reports, 1983, p. 417 on the difference between reservations and interpretative declarations generally and in the context of the European Human Rights Convention. Cf. the Ette case, European Court of Human Rights, Series A, No. 117. See, for examples of UK practice, UKMIL, 68 BYIL, 1997, p. 483. See also L. D. M. Nelson, 'Declarations, Statements and "Disguised Reservations" with respect to the Convention on the Law of the Sea', 50 ICLQ, 2001, p. 767; R. Sapienza, 'Les Déclarations Interprétatives Unilatérales et l'Interprétation des Traités', 103 RGDIP, 1999, p. 601, and P. H. Imbert, 'Reservations to the European Convention on Human Rights before the Strasbourg Commission', 33 ICLQ, 1984, p. 558 and UN Juridical Yearbook, 1976, pp. 220–1. Draft guideline 1.2 of the ILC Guide to Practice provides that an interpretative declaration means 'a unilateral statement, however phrased or named, made by a state or an international organisation whereby that state or international organisation purports to specify or clarify the meaning or scope attributed by the declarant to a treaty or to certain of its provisions', Report of the ILC on its 54th Session, 2002, p. 52.

[62] See D. McRae, 'The Legal Effect of Interpretative Declarations', 49 BYIL, 1978, p. 155. See also the Temeltasch case, pp. 432–3 and the First Pellet Report, pp. 58 ff.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

capable in certain circumstances of constituting reservations.[63] Another way of describing this is to draw a distinction between 'simple interpretative declarations' and 'conditional interpretative declarations'.[64] The latter is described in the ILC Guide to Practice as referring to a situation where the state subjects its consent to be bound by the treaty to a specific interpretation of the treaty, or specific provisions of it.[65]

In the Anglo-French Continental Shelf case,[66] the Arbitral Tribunal emphasised that French reservations to article 6 of the Geneva Convention on the Continental Shelf, 1958, challenged by the UK, had to be construed in accordance with the natural meaning of their terms.[67] The UK contended that the third French reservation to article 6 (which concerned the non-applicability of the principle of equidistance in areas of 'special circumstances' as defined by the French government, naming specifically inter alia the Bay of Granville) was in reality only an interpretative declaration. The Tribunal, however, held that although this reservation contained elements of interpretation, it also constituted a specific condition imposed by France on its acceptance of the article 6 delimitation regime. This went beyond mere interpretation as it made the application of that regime dependent upon acceptance by other states of France's designation of the named areas as involving 'special circumstances'. It therefore had the purpose of seeking to exclude or modify the legal effect of certain treaty provisions with regard to their application by the reserving state and thus constituted a reservation.[68]

In the Belilos case[69] in 1988, the European Court of Human Rights considered the effect of one particular interpretative declaration made by Switzerland upon ratification.[70] The Court held that one had to look [63] Quite what the effect might be of the former is unclear: see e.g. the First Pellet Report, p. 60.

[64] See e.g. Nelson, 'Declarations', p. 776.

[65] Draft guideline 1.2.1, Report of the ILC on its 54th Session, 2002, p. 52.

[66] Cmnd 7438 (1979); 54 ILR, p. 6.

[67] Cmnd 7438, pp. 41–2; 54 ILR, pp. 48–9. It was also stressed that reservations have to be appreciated in the light of the law in force at the time that the reservations (and any objections to them) are made, Cmnd 7438, p. 35; 54 ILR, p. 42.

[68] Cmnd 7438, p. 43; 54 ILR, p. 50.

[69] European Court of Human Rights, Series A, No. 132. See also S. Marks, 'Reservations Unhinged: The Belilos Case Before the European Court of Human Rights', 39 ICLQ, 1990, p. 300.

[70] Switzerland made in total two interpretative declarations and two reservations upon ratification of the European Convention on Human Rights. The declaration in question concerned article 6, paragraph 1 of the Convention dealing with the right to fair trial and

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

behind the title given to the declaration in question and to seek to determine its substantive content. It was necessary to ascertain the original intention of those drafting the declaration and thus recourse to the travaux préparatoires was required. In the light of these, the Court felt that Switzerland had indeed intended to 'avoid the consequences which a broad view of the right of access to the courts . . . would have for the system of public administration and of justice in the cantons and consequently . . . put forward the declaration as qualifying [its] consent to be bound by the Convention'.[71] Having so decided, the Court held that the declaration in question, taking effect as a reservation, did not in fact comply with article 64 of the Convention, which prohibited reservations of a general character[72] and required a brief statement of the law in force necessitating the reservation.[73] Accordingly, the declaration was invalid. It is hard to escape the conclusion that the Court has accepted a test favourable to states as to the situations under which a declaration may be regarded as a reservation, only to emphasise the requirements of article 64 concerning the validity of reservations to the European Convention. One should therefore be rather cautious before applying the easier test regarding interpretative declarations generally. Nevertheless, there remains a problem of states making interpretative declarations that seek to act as reservations to treaties that prohibit reservations. In such situations, it is likely that the effect of such declarations would be ineffective as against other parties who would therefore be entitled to regard the treaty as in force fully between all the parties, taking no account of the declaration.[74]

In order to determine whether a unilateral statement made constitutes a reservation or an interpretative declaration, the statement will have to be interpreted in good faith in accordance with the ordinary meaning to be given to its terms and within the context of the treaty in question. The intention of the state making the statement at that time will also need to provided that Switzerland considered that that right was intended solely to ensure ultimate control by the judiciary over the acts or decisions of the public authorities. The issue concerned the right of appeal from the Lausanne Police Board to the Criminal Cassation Division of the Vaud Cantonal Court, which could not in fact hear fresh argument, receive witnesses or give a new ruling on the merits, and whether the declaration prevented the applicant from relying on article 6 in the circumstances.

[71] At pp. 18–19. [72] Ibid., pp. 20–1. [73] Ibid., pp. 21–2.

[74] See e.g. Nelson, 'Declarations', p. 781. See also below, p. 920.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

be considered.[75] In the special case of a bilateral treaty, an interpretative declaration made by one party which is accepted by the other party will constitute an authoritative interpretation of that treaty.[76]

The general rule that became established was that reservations could only be made with the consent of all the other states involved in the process. This was to preserve as much unity of approach as possible to ensure the success of an international agreement and to minimise deviations from the text of the treaty. This reflected the contractual view of the nature of a treaty,[77] and the League of Nations supported this concept.[78] The effect of this was that a state wishing to make a reservation had to obtain the consent of all the other parties to the treaty. If this was not possible, that state could either become a party to the original treaty (minus the reservation, of course) or not become a party at all. However, this restrictive approach to reservations was not accepted by the International Court of Justice in the Reservations to the Genocide Convention case.[79] This was an advisory opinion by the Court, requested by the General Assembly after some states had made reservations to the 1948 Genocide Convention, which contained no clause permitting such reservations, and a number of objections were made.

The Court held that:

> a state which has made and maintained a reservation which has been objected to by one or more parties to the Convention but not by others, can be regarded as being a party to the Convention if the reservation is compatible with the object and purpose of the Convention.

Compatibility, in the Court's opinion, could be decided by states individually since it was noted that:

> if a party to the Convention objects to a reservation which it considers incompatible with the object and purpose of the Convention, it can . . . consider that the reserving state is not a party to the Convention.[80]

[75] See draft guideline 1.3.1 of the ILC Guide to Practice, Report of the ILC on its 54th Session, 2002, p. 53. Draft guideline 1.3.2 also states that the phrasing or name used provides an indication of the purported legal effect, ibid.

[76] Ibid., p. 56.

[77] See Sinclair, Vienna Convention, pp. 54–5, and Ruda, 'Reservations', p. 112. See also Redgwell, 'Universality or Integrity', p. 246.

[78] Report of the Committee of Experts for the Progressive Codification of International Law, 8 LNOJ, pp. 880–1 (1927).

[79] ICJ Reports, 1951, p. 15; 18 ILR, p. 364.

[80] ICJ Reports, 1951, pp. 29–30.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

The Court did emphasise the principle of the integrity of a convention, but pointed to a variety of special circumstances with regard to the Genocide Convention in question, which called for a more flexible interpretation of the principle. These circumstances included the universal character of the UN under whose auspices the Convention had been concluded; the extensive participation envisaged under the Convention; the fact that the Convention had been the product of a series of majority votes; the fact that the principles underlying the Convention were general principles already binding upon states; that the Convention was clearly intended by the UN and the parties to be definitely universal in scope and that it had been adopted for a purely humanitarian purpose so that state parties did not have interests of their own but a common interest. All these factors militated for a flexible approach in this case.

The Court's approach, although having some potential disadvantages,[81] was in keeping with the move to increase the acceptability and scope of treaties and with the trend in international organisations away from the unanimity rule in decision-making and towards majority voting.[82] The 1969 Convention on the Law of Treaties accepted the Court's views.[83]

By article 19, reservations may be made when signing, ratifying, accepting, approving or acceding to a treaty, but they cannot be made where the reservation is prohibited by the treaty, or where the treaty provides that only specified reservations may be made and these do not include the reservation in question, or where the reservation is not compatible with the object and purpose of the treaty.[84]

In the instances where a reservation is possible, the traditional rule requiring acceptance by all parties will apply where, by article 20(2), 'it appears from the limited number of the negotiating states and the object and purpose of a treaty that the application of the treaty in its entirety between all the parties is an essential condition of the consent of each one to be bound by the treaty'.

[81] See e.g. Fitzmaurice, 'Reservations'.

[82] Although the International Law Commission was initially critical, it later changed its mind: see Yearbook of the ILC, 1951, vol. II, pp. 130–1, cf. ibid., 1962, vol. II, pp. 62–5 and 178–9. Note also that the UN General Assembly in 1959 resolved that the Secretary-General as a depositary was to apply the Court's approach to all conventions concluded under UN auspices unless they contained provisions to the contrary.

[83] See Redgwell, 'Universality or Integrity', pp. 253 ff.

[84] See also draft guideline 1.3.1 of the ILC Guide to Practice, A/61/10, 2006, pp. 327 ff.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

Article 20(4) then outlines the general rules to be followed with regard to treaties not within article 20(2) and not constituent instruments of international organisations. These are that:

> (a) acceptance by another contracting state of a reservation constitutes the reserving state a party to the treaty in relation to that other state if or when the treaty is in force for those states;
> (b) an objection by another contracting state to a reservation does not preclude the entry into force of the treaty as between the objecting and reserving states unless a contrary intention is definitely expressed by the objecting state;
> (c) an act expressing a state's consent to be bound by the treaty and containing a reservation is effective as soon as at least one other contracting state has accepted the reservation.

The effect of reservations is outlined in article 21. This declares that a reservation established with regard to another party modifies, for the reserving state in its relations with the other party, the provisions of the treaty to which the reservation relates, to the extent of the reservation. The other party is similarly affected in its relations with the reserving state. An example of this was provided by the Libyan reservation to the 1961 Vienna Convention on Diplomatic Relations with regard to the diplomatic bag, permitting Libya to search the bag with the consent of the state whose bag it was, and insist that it be returned to its state of origin. Since the UK did not object to the reservation, it could have acted similarly with regard to Libya's diplomatic bags.[85] However, the reservation does not modify the provisions of the treaty for the other parties to the treaty as between themselves.

Article 21(3) provides that where a state objects to a reservation, but not to the entry into force of the treaty between itself and the reserving state, then 'the provisions to which the reservation relates do not apply as between the two states to the extent of the reservation'. This provision was applied by the arbitration tribunal in the Anglo-French Continental Shelf case, where it was noted that:

> the combined effect of the French reservations and their rejection by the United Kingdom is neither to render article 6 [of the Geneva Convention on the Continental Shelf, 1958] inapplicable in toto, as the French Republic contends, nor to render it applicable in toto, as the United Kingdom [85] See Foreign Affairs Committee, Report on the Abuse of Diplomatic Immunities and Privileges, 1984, pp. 23–4, and above, chapter 13, p. 760.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

primarily contends. It is to render the article inapplicable as between the two countries to the extent of the reservations.[86]

A number of important issues, however, remain unresolved. In particular, it is unclear what effect an impermissible reservation has.[87] One school of thought takes the view that such reservations are invalid,[88] another that the validity of any reservation is dependent upon acceptance by other states.[89] While there is a presumption in favour of the permissibility of reservations, this may be displaced if the reservation is prohibited explicitly or implicitly by the treaty or it is contrary to the object and purpose of the treaty.[90] A further problem is to determine when these conditions under which reservations may be deemed to be impermissible have been met. This is especially difficult where it is contended that the object and purpose of a treaty have been offended. The meaning of the term is not free from uncertainty,[91] although it has been accepted that a reservation to a particular method of dispute settlement laid down in a treaty would not normally be seen as contrary to the object and purpose of a treaty.[92]

[86] Cmnd 7438 (1979), p. 45; 54 ILR, p. 52. See also A. E. Boyle, 'The Law of Treaties and the Anglo-French Continental Shelf Arbitration', 29 ICLQ, 1980, p. 498, and Sinclair, Vienna Convention, pp. 70–6.

[87] See e.g. J. K. Koh, 'Reservations to Multilateral Treaties: How International Legal Doctrine Reflects World Vision', 23 Harvard International Law Journal, 1982, p. 71, and Redgwell, 'Universality or Integrity', p. 263. See also above, p. 915, concerning interpretative declarations being used as 'disguised' reservations where no reservations are permitted under the treaty in question.

[88] See e.g. Bowett, 'Reservations', pp. 77 and 84. Impermissible reservations are divided into those that may be severed from ratification of or accession to the convention in question and those that are contrary to the object and purpose of the treaty. In the latter case, both the reservation and the whole acceptance of the treaty by the reserving state are to be regarded as nullities. This question of permissibility is the preliminary issue; the question of opposability, or the reaction of other states, is a secondary issue, presupposing the permissibility of the reservation, ibid., p. 88. See also Oppenheim's International Law, p. 1247, note 1.

[89] See e.g. Ruda, 'Reservations', p. 190.

[90] See the First Pellet Report, p. 50.

[91] Note that draft guideline 3.1.5 of the ILC Guide to Practice provides that, 'A reservation is incompatible with the object and purpose of the treaty if it affects an essential element of the treaty that is necessary to its general thrust, in such a way that the reservation impairs the raison d'être of the treaty': see A/62/10, 2007, pp. 66 ff. Draft guideline 3.1.6 states that, 'The object and purpose of the treaty is to be determined in good faith, taking account of the terms of the treaty in their context. Recourse may also be had in particular to the title of the treaty, the preparatory work of the treaty and the circumstances of its conclusion and, where appropriate, the subsequent practice agreed upon by the parties', ibid., pp. 77 ff.

[92] See e.g. Yugoslavia v. Spain, ICJ Reports, 1999, pp. 761, 772; Yugoslavia v. USA, ICJ Reports, 1999, pp. 916, 924 and Democratic Republic of the Congo v. Rwanda, ICJ Reports,

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

The question is also raised as to the authority able to make such a determination. At the moment, unless the particular treaty otherwise provides,[93] whether a reservation is impermissible is a determination to be made by states parties to the treaty themselves. In other words, it is a subjective application of objective criteria.[94] Once the impermissibility of a reservation has been demonstrated, there are two fundamental possibilities. Either the treaty provision to which the reservation has been attached applies in full to the state that made the impermissible reservation or the consent of the state to the treaty as a whole is vitiated so that the state is no longer a party to the treaty. A further question is whether the other parties to the treaty may accept and thus legitimate an impermissible reservation or whether a determination of impermissibility is conclusive. All that can be said is that state practice on the whole is somewhat inconclusive.

There is a trend with regard to human rights treaties to regard impermissible reservations as severing that reservation so that the provision in question applies in full to the reserving state.[95] In the Belilos case,[96] the European Court of Human Rights laid particular emphasis upon Switzerland's commitment to the European Convention on Human Rights,[97] so that the effect of defining the Swiss declaration as a reservation which was then held to be invalid was that Switzerland was bound by the provision (article 6) in full. This view was reaffirmed in the Loizidou (Preliminary Objections) case.[98] The Court analysed the validity of the territorial restrictions attached to Turkey's declarations under former articles 25 and 2006, pp. 6, 32. In a joint separate opinion, five judges suggested that the principle is not necessarily absolute in scope, ICJ Reports, 2006, pp. 6, 70 ff. See also draft guideline 3.1.13 of the ILC Guide to Practice, A/62/10, 2007, pp. 116 ff.

93 Note e.g. that article 20(2) of the International Convention on the Elimination of All Forms of Racial Discrimination, 1965 provides that a reservation will be regarded as contrary to the object and purpose of the treaty if at least two-thirds of the states parties to the convention object to the reservation.

94 See e.g. Ago, Yearbook of the ILC, 1965, vol. I, p. 161.

95 See e.g. Y. Tyagi, 'The Conflict of Law and Policy on Reservations to Human Rights Treaties', 71 BYIL, 2000, p. 181; Aust, Modern Treaty Law, pp. 146 ff.; Human Rights as General Norms and a State's Right to Opt Out: Reservations and Objections to Human Rights Conventions (ed. J. P. Gardner), London, 1997, and K. Korkelia, 'New Challenges to the Regime of Reservations under the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights', 13 EJIL, 2002, p. 437. See also the Second Pellet Report, 1996, A/CN.4/4777.Add.1.

96 European Court of Human Rights, Series A, No. 132. See also above, p. 916.

97 The Court noted that 'it is beyond doubt that Switzerland is, and regards itself as, bound by the Convention irrespective of the validity of the declaration', ibid., p. 22.

98 European Court of Human Rights, Series A, No. 310 (1995); 103 ILR, p. 621.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

46 recognising the competence of the Commission and the Court[99] and held that they were impermissible under the terms of the Convention. The Court then concluded that the effect of this in the light of the special nature of the Convention as a human rights treaty was that the reservations were severable so that Turkey's acceptance of the jurisdiction of the Commission and the Court remained in place, unrestricted by the terms of the invalid limitations attached to the declarations.[100]

The UN Human Rights Committee in its controversial General Comment 24/52 of 2 November 1994[101] emphasised the special nature of human rights treaties and expressed its belief that the provisions of the Vienna Convention on the Law of Treaties were 'inappropriate to address the problems of reservations to human rights treaties'. The Committee took the view that provisions contained in the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights, 1966, which represented customary international law could not be the subject of reservations, while in the case of reservations to non-derogable provisions not falling into this category, states had 'a heavy onus' to justify such reservations. The Committee also emphasised that the effect of an unacceptable reservation would normally be that the provision operated in full with regard to the party making such a reservation and not that the Covenant would not be in force at all for such a state party. The Committee also regarded itself as the only body able to determine whether a specific reservation was or was not compatible with the object and purpose of the Covenant.[102]

The controversy with regard to this included the issue as to the powers of the Committee and other such monitoring organs as distinct from courts which under their constituent treaties had the competence to

[99] These were held to constitute 'a disguised reservation', ECHR, Series A, No. 310, p. 22.

[100] Ibid., pp. 22–9.

[101] CCPR/C/21/Rev.1/Add. 6. See also 15 Human Rights Law Journal, 1994, p. 464, and M. Nowak, 'The Activities of the UN Human Rights Committee: Developments from 1 August 1992 to 31 July 1995', 16 Human Rights Law Journal, 1995, pp. 377, 380.

[102] See the critical observations made by the governments of the US and the UK with regard to this General Comment, 16 Human Rights Law Journal, 1995, pp. 422 ff. Note in particular the US view that 'reservations contained in the United States instruments of ratification are integral parts of its consent to be bound by the Covenant and are not severable. If it were to be determined that any one or more of them were ineffective, the ratification as a whole could thereby be nullified', ibid., p. 423. The UK government took the view that while 'severability of a kind may well offer a solution in appropriate cases', severability would involve excising both the reservation and the parts of the treaty to which it related, ibid., p. 426. It was noted that a state which sought to ratify a human rights treaty subject to a reservation 'which is fundamentally incompatible with participation in the treaty regime' could not be regarded as a party to that treaty, ibid.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

interpret the same in a binding manner.[103] The International Law Commission adopted Preliminary Conclusions on Reservations to Normative Multilateral Treaties Including Human Rights Treaties in 1997, in which it reaffirmed the applicability of the Vienna Convention on the Law of Treaties reservations regime to all treaties, including human rights treaties. The ILC accepted that human rights monitoring bodies were competent to comment and express recommendations upon inter alia the admissibility of reservations, but declared that this did not affect 'the traditional modalities of control' by contracting parties in accordance with the two Vienna Conventions of 1969 and 1986, nor did it mean that such bodies could exceed the powers given to them for the performance of their general monitoring role. It was particularly emphasised that 'it is the reserving state that has the responsibility of taking action' in the event of inadmissibility and such state could modify or withdraw the reservation or withdraw from the treaty.[104]

There is, however, apart from this controversy, the question as to the large number of reservations to human rights treaties, many of which have been criticised as being contrary to the object and purpose of the treaties.[105]

In general, reservations are deemed to have been accepted by states that have raised no objections to them at the end of a period of twelve months

[103] See also e.g. C. Redgwell, 'Reservations to Treaties and Human Rights General Comment No. 24 (52)', 46 ICLQ, 1997, p. 390.

[104] Report of the ILC on its 49th Session, A/52/10, pp. 126–7. See also the working group on reservations established by the UN human rights treaty organs, A/60/278; HRI/MC/2005/5/Add.1; and HRI/MC/2006/5. Draft guideline 3.1.12 of the ILC Guide to Practice notes that, 'To assess the compatibility of a reservation with the object and purpose of a general treaty for the protection of human rights, account shall be taken of the indivisibility, interdependence and interrelatedness of the rights set out in the treaty as well as the importance that the right or provision which is the subject of the reservation has within the general thrust of the treaty, and the gravity of the impact the reservation has upon it': see A/62/10, 2007, pp. 113 ff.

[105] See e.g. the Convention on the Elimination of Discrimination Against Women, 1979, General Recommendations No. 4 (1987), No. 20 (1992) and No. 21 (1994) of the Committee on the Elimination of Discrimination Against Women. See generally B. Clark, 'The Vienna Conventions Reservations Regime and the Convention on Discrimination against Women', 85 AJIL, 1991, p. 281, and R. J. Cook, 'Reservations to the Convention on the Elimination of All Forms of Discrimination against Women', 30 Va. JIL, 1990, p. 643. See also Council of Europe Parliamentary Assembly Recommendation 1223 (1993) on Reservations Made by Member States to Council of Europe Conventions; W. A. Schabas, 'Reservations to Human Rights Treaties: Time for Innovation and Reform', 32 Canadian YIL, 1994, p. 39, and I. Ziemele, Reservations to Human Rights Treaties and the Vienna Convention Regime: Conflict, Harmony or Reconciliation, Leiden, 2004.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

after notification of the reservation, or by the date on which consent to be bound by the treaty was expressed, whichever is the later.[106] Reservations must be in writing and communicated to the contracting states and other states entitled to become parties to the treaty, as must acceptances of, and objections to, reservations.

Most multilateral conventions today will in fact specifically declare their position as regards reservations. Some, however, for example the Geneva Convention on the High Seas, 1958, make no mention at all of reservations, while others may specify that reservations are possible with regard to certain provisions only.[107] Still others may prohibit altogether any reservations.[108]

Reservations to a multilateral treaty may be withdrawn, subject to agreement to the contrary, only when the other states to the treaty have received notification of that withdrawal.[109]

Entry into force of treaties

Basically treaties will become operative when and how the negotiating states decide, but in the absence of any provision or agreement regarding this, a treaty will enter into force as soon as consent to be bound by the treaty has been established for all the negotiating states.[110] In many cases, treaties will specify that they will come into effect upon a certain date or after a determined period following the last ratification. It is usual where multilateral conventions are involved to provide for entry into force upon ratification by a fixed number of states, since otherwise large multilateral treaties may be prejudiced. The Geneva Convention on the High Seas, 1958, for example, provides for entry into force on the thirtieth day following the deposit of the twenty-second instrument of ratification with the United Nations Secretary-General, while the Convention on the [106] Article 20(5) of the Vienna Convention on the Law of Treaties. See the Inter-American Court of Human Rights, Advisory Opinion on The Effect of Reservations on the Entry into Force of the American Convention on Human Rights, 22 ILM, 1983, p. 37; 67 ILR, p. 559.

[107] E.g. the 1958 Geneva Convention on the Continental Shelf, article 12(1). See also above, p. 917, regarding article 64 of the European Convention on Human Rights, 1950.

[108] See e.g. article 37 of the Convention on Damage Caused by Foreign Aircraft to Third Parties on the Surface, 1952.

[109] See article 22(3)a of the Vienna Convention on the Law of Treaties and Democratic Republic of the Congo v. Rwanda, ICJ Reports, 2006, paras. 41–2. See also draft guideline 2.5.2 and 2.5.8 of the ILC Guide, A/58/10, 2003, pp. 201 ff. and 231 ff.

[110] Article 24. See Sinclair, Vienna Convention, pp. 44–7. See also Thirlway, 'Law and Procedure (Part four)', pp. 32 ff., and Aust, Modern Treaty Law, chapter 9.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

Law of Treaties, 1969 itself came into effect thirty days after the deposit of the thirty-fifth ratification and the Rome Statute for the International Criminal Court required sixty ratifications. Of course, even though the necessary number of ratifications has been received for the treaty to come into operation, only those states that have actually ratified the treaty will be bound. It will not bind those that have merely signed it, unless of course, signature is in the particular circumstances regarded as sufficient to express the consent of the state to be bound.

Article 80 of the 1969 Convention (following article 102 of the United Nations Charter) provides that after their entry into force, treaties should be transmitted to the United Nations Secretariat for registration and publication. These provisions are intended to end the practice of secret treaties, which was regarded as contributing to the outbreak of the First World War, as well as enabling the United Nations Treaty Series, which contains all registered treaties, to be as comprehensive as possible.[111]

The application of treaties[112]

Once treaties enter into force, a number of questions can arise as to the way in which they apply in particular situations. In the absence of contrary intention, the treaty will not operate retroactively so that its provisions will not bind a party as regards any facts, acts or situations prior to that state's acceptance of the treaty.[113] Unless a different intention appears from the treaty or is otherwise established, article 29 provides that a treaty is binding upon each party in respect of its entire territory. This is the general rule, but it is possible for a state to stipulate that an international agreement will apply only to part of its territory. In the past, so-called 'colonial application clauses' were included in some treaties by the European colonial powers, which declared whether or not the terms of the particular agreement would extend to the various colonies.[114]

[111] Article 102 of the UN Charter also provides that states may not invoke an unregistered treaty before any UN organ. See also above, p. 905, and http://untreaty.un.org/.

[112] See e.g. Nguyen Quoc Dinh et al., Droit International Public, p. 217, and Oppenheim's International Law, p. 1248.

[113] Article 28. See Yearbook of the ILC, 1966, vol. II, pp. 212–13 and the Mavrommatis Palestine Concessions case, PCIJ, Series A, No. 2, 1924. Note article 4 of the Convention, which provides that, without prejudice to the application of customary law, the Convention will apply only to treaties concluded by states after the entry into force of the Convention with regard to such states.

[114] See Sinclair, Vienna Convention, pp. 87–92. See also e.g. article 63 of the European Convention on Human Rights, 1950. Practice would appear to suggest that, in the absence of

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

With regard to the problem of successive treaties on the same subject matter, article 30 provides that:

1. Subject to article 103 of the Charter of the United Nations,[115] the rights and obligations of states parties to successive treaties relating to the same subject-matter shall be determined in accordance with the following paragraphs.
2. When a treaty specifies that it is subject to, or that it is not to be considered as incompatible with, an earlier or later treaty, the provisions of that other treaty prevail.
3. When all the parties to the earlier treaty are parties also to the later treaty but the earlier treaty is not terminated or suspended in operation under article 59,[116] the earlier treaty applies only to the extent that its provisions are compatible with those of the later treaty.
4. When the parties to the later treaty do not include all the parties to the earlier one:
   (a) as between states parties to both treaties the same rule applies as in paragraph 3;
   (b) as between a state party to both treaties and a state party to only one of the treaties, the treaty to which both states are parties governs their mutual rights and obligations.
5. Paragraph 4 is without prejudice to article 41,[117] or to any question of the termination or suspension of the operation of a treaty under article 60[118] or to any question of responsibility which may arise for a state from the conclusion or application of a treaty, the provisions of which are incompatible with its obligations towards another state under another treaty.

The problem raised by successive treaties is becoming a serious one with the growth in the number of states and the increasing number of treaties entered into, and the added complication of enhanced activity at the evidence to the contrary, a treaty would under customary law apply to all the territory of a party, including colonies: see e.g. McNair, Law of Treaties, pp. 116–17.

[115] This stipulates that in the event of a conflict between the obligations of a member state of the UN under the Charter and their obligations under any other international agreement, the former shall prevail. See also the Lockerbie (Libya v. UK; Libya v. US) case, ICJ Reports, 1992, pp. 3, 15; 94 ILR, pp. 478, 498.

[116] This deals with termination or suspension of a treaty by a later treaty: see further below, p. 947.

[117] This deals with agreements to modify multilateral treaties between certain of the parties only: see further below, p. 931.

[118] This deals with material breach of a treaty: see further below, p. 947.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com regional level.[119] The rules laid down in article 30 provide a general guide and in many cases the problem will be resolved by the parties themselves expressly.

Third states

A point of considerable interest with regard to the creation of binding rules of law for the international community centres on the application and effects of treaties upon third states, i.e. states which are not parties to the treaty in question.[120] The general rule is that international agreements bind only the parties to them. The reasons for this rule can be found in the fundamental principles of the sovereignty and independence of states, which posit that states must consent to rules before they can be bound by them. This, of course, is a general proposition and is not necessarily true in all cases. However, it does remain as a basic line of approach in international law. Article 34 of the Convention echoes the general rule in specifying that 'a treaty does not create either obligations or rights for a third state without its consent'.[121]

It is quite clear that a treaty cannot impose obligations upon third states and this was emphasised by the International Law Commission during its deliberations prior to the Vienna Conferences and Convention.[122] There is, however, one major exception to this and that is where the provisions of the treaty in question have entered into customary law.[123] In such a case, all states would be bound, regardless of whether they had been parties to the original treaty or not. One example of this would be the laws relating to warfare adopted by the Hague Conventions earlier this century and now regarded as part of customary international law.[124]

This point arises with regard to article 2(6) of the United Nations Charter which states that:

[119] See Sinclair, Vienna Convention, pp. 93–8, and Aust, Modern Treaty Law, chapter 12. See also McNair, Law of Treaties, pp. 219 ff.

[120] See e.g. Sinclair, Vienna Convention, pp. 98–106; Aust, Modern Treaty Law, chapter 14, and Oppenheim's International Law, p. 1260. The rule is sometimes referred to by the maxim pacta tertiis nec nocent nec prosunt. See also Thirlway, 'Law and Procedure (Part One)', p. 63.

[121] See also below, chapter 17, p. 970, on succession of states in respect of treaties.

[122] Yearbook of the ILC, 1966, vol. II, p. 227.

[123] Article 38. See above, chapter 3, p. 95 and the North Sea Continental Shelf cases, ICJ Reports, 1969, p. 3; 41 ILR, p. 29. See also Yearbook of the ILC, 1966, vol. II, p. 230.

[124] See below, chapter 21, p. 1168.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

> the organisation shall ensure that states which are not members of the United Nations act in accordance with these principles so far as may be necessary for the maintenance of international peace and security.

It is sometimes maintained that this provision creates binding obligations rather than being merely a statement of attitude with regard to non-members of the United Nations.[125] This may be the correct approach since the principles enumerated in article 2 of the Charter can be regarded as part of customary international law, and in view of the fact that an agreement may legitimately provide for enforcement sanctions to be implemented against a state guilty of aggression. Article 75 of the Convention provides:

> the provisions of the Convention are without prejudice to any obligation in relation to a treaty which may arise for an aggressor state in consequence of measures taken in conformity with the Charter of the United Nations with reference to that state's aggression.

Article 35 notes that an obligation may arise for a third state from a term of a treaty if the parties to the treaty so intend and if the third state expressly accepts that obligation in writing.[126]

As far as rights allocated to third states by a treaty are concerned, the matter is a little different. The Permanent Court of International Justice declared in the Free Zones case[127] that:

> the question of the existence of a right acquired under an instrument drawn between other states is . . . one to be decided in each particular case: it must be ascertained whether the states which have stipulated in favour of a third state meant to create for that state an actual right which the latter has accepted as such.

Article 36 of the Vienna Convention provides that:

> a right arises for a third state from a provision of a treaty if the parties to the treaty intend the provision to accord that right either to the third state, or to a group of states to which it belongs, or to all states, and the third state assents thereto. Its assent shall be presumed so long as the contrary is not indicated, unless the treaty otherwise provides.

[125] See e.g. H. Kelsen, The Law of the United Nations, London, 1950, pp. 106–10. See also McNair, Law of Treaties, pp. 216–18.

[126] See, as to the creation here of a collateral agreement forming the basis of the obligation, Yearbook of the ILC, 1966, vol. II, p. 227.

[127] PCIJ, Series A/B, No. 46, 1932, pp. 147–8; 6 AD, pp. 362, 364.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

Further, particular kinds of treaties may create obligations or rights erga omnes and in such cases, all states would presumptively be bound by them and would also benefit. Examples might include multilateral treaties establishing a particular territorial regime, such as the Suez and Kiel Canals or the Black Sea Straits.[128] In the Wimbledon case,[129] the Permanent Court noted that 'an international waterway . . . for the benefit of all nations of the world' had been established. In other words, for an obligation to be imposed by a treaty upon a third state, the express agreement of that state in writing is required, whereas in the case of benefits granted to third states, their assent is presumed in the absence of contrary intention. This is because the general tenor of customary international law has leaned in favour of the validity of rights granted to third states, but against that of obligations imposed upon them, in the light of basic principles relating to state sovereignty, equality and non-interference.

The amendment and modification of treaties

Although the two processes of amending and modifying international agreements share a common aim in that they both involve the revision of treaties, they are separate activities and may be accomplished in different manners. Amendments refer to the formal alteration of treaty provisions, affecting all the parties to the particular agreement, while modifications relate to variations of certain treaty terms as between particular parties only. Where it is deemed desirable, a treaty may be amended by agreement between the parties, but in such a case all the formalities as to the conclusion and coming into effect of treaties as described so far in this chapter will have to be observed except in so far as the treaty may otherwise provide.[130] It is understandable that as conditions change, the need may arise to alter some of the provisions stipulated in the international agreement in question. There is nothing unusual in this and it is a normal facet of international relations. The fact that such alterations must be effected with [128] See e.g. Aust, Modern Treaty Law, pp. 258–9; Nguyen Quoc Dinh et al., Droit International Public, p. 248, and N. Ragazzi, The Concept of International Obligations Erga Omnes, Oxford, 1997. See further, as to erga omnes obligations, above, chapter 14, p. 807.

[129] PCIJ, Series A, No. 1, 1923, p. 22; 2 AD, p. 99. See also Yearbook of the ILC, 1966, vol. II, pp. 228–9, and E. Jiménez de Aréchaga, 'International Law in the Past Third of a Century', 159 HR, 1978, pp. 1, 54, and de Aréchaga, 'Treaty Stipulations in Favour of Third States', 50 AJIL, 1956, pp. 338, 355–6.

[130] Article 39. See also Sinclair, Vienna Convention, pp. 106–9; Aust, Modern Treaty Law, chapter 15, and Yearbook of the ILC, 1966, vol. II, p. 232.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

the same formalities that attended the original formation of the treaty is only logical since legal rights and obligations may be involved and any variation of them involves considerations of state sovereignty and consent which necessitate careful interpretation and attention. It is possible, however, for oral or tacit agreement to amend, providing it is unambiguous and clearly evidenced. Many multilateral treaties lay down specific conditions as regards amendment. For example, the United Nations Charter in article 108 provides that amendments will come into force for all member states upon adoption and ratification by two-thirds of the members of the organisation, including all the permanent members of the Security Council.

Problems can occur where, in the absence of specific amendment processes, some of the parties oppose the amendments proposed by others. Article 40 of the Vienna Convention specifies the procedure to be adopted in amending multilateral treaties, in the absence of contrary provisions in the treaty itself. Any proposed amendment has to be notified to all contracting states, each one of which is entitled to participate in the decision as to action to be taken and in the negotiation and conclusion of any agreements. Every state which has the right to be a party to the treaty possesses also the right to become a party to the amendment, but such amendments will not bind any state which is a party to the original agreement and which does not become a party to the amended agreement,[131] subject to any provisions to the contrary in the treaty itself.

The situation can become a little more complex where a state becomes a party to the treaty after the amendments have come into effect. That state will be a party to the amended agreement, except as regards parties to the treaty that are not bound by the amendments. In this case the state will be considered as a party to the unamended treaty in relation to those states.

Two or more parties to a multilateral treaty may decide to change that agreement as between themselves in certain ways, quite irrespective of any amendment by all the parties. This technique, known as modification, is possible provided it has not been prohibited by the treaty in question and provided it does not affect the rights or obligations of the other parties. Modification, however, is not possible where the provision it is intended to alter is one 'derogation from which is incompatible with the effective execution of the object and purpose of the treaty as a whole'.[132] A treaty

[131] See article 30(4)b. [132] Article 41.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

may also be modified by the terms of another later agreement[133] or by the establishment subsequently of a rule of jus cogens.[134]

Treaty interpretation[135]

One of the enduring problems facing courts and tribunals and lawyers, both in the municipal and international law spheres, relates to the question of interpretation.[136] Accordingly, rules and techniques have been put forward to aid judicial bodies in resolving such problems.[137] As far as international law is concerned, there are three basic approaches to treaty interpretation.[138] The first centres on the actual text of the agreement and emphasises the analysis of the words used.[139] The second looks to the intention of the parties adopting the agreement as the solution to ambiguous provisions and can be termed the subjective approach in contradistinction to the objective approach of the previous school.[140] The third approach adopts a wider perspective than the other two and emphasises the object and purpose of the treaty as the most important backcloth against which

[133] See article 30, and above, p. 927.

[134] See above, chapter 3, p. 123, and below, p. 944.

[135] See e.g. Sinclair, Vienna Convention, chapter 5; J. M. Sorel, 'Article 31' in Corten and Klein, Conventions de Vienne, p. 1289; Y. Le Bouthillier, 'Article 32' in ibid., p. 1339; A. Papaux, 'Article 33' in ibid., p. 1373; G. Fitzmaurice, 'The Law and Procedure of the International Court of Justice, 1951–4', 33 BYIL, 1957, p. 203 and 28 BYIL, 1951, p. 1; H. Lauterpacht, 'Restrictive Interpretation and the Principle of Effectiveness in the Interpretation of Treaties', 26 BYIL, 1949, p. 48; M. S. McDougal, H. Lasswell and J. C. Miller, The Interpretation of Agreements and World Public Order, Yale, 1967; E. Gordon, 'The World Court and the Interpretation of Constitutive Treaties', 59 AJIL, 1965, p. 794; O'Connell, International Law, pp. 251 ff., and Brownlie, Principles, pp. 602 ff. See also S. Sur, L'Interprétation en Droit International Public, Paris, 1974; M. K. Yasseen, 'L'Interprétation des Traités d'après la Convention de Vienne', 151 HR, 1976 III, p. 1; H. Thirlway, 'The Law and Practice of the International Court of Justice 1960–1989 (Part Three)', 62 BYIL, 1991, pp. 2, 16 ff. and '(Part Four)', 62 BYIL, 1992, p. 3, and Thirlway, 'The Law and Procedure of the International Court of Justice 1960–1989; Supplement, 2006: Part Three', 77 BYIL, 2006, p. 1; Aust, Modern Treaty Law, chapter 13; Nguyen Quoc Dinh et al., Droit International Public, p. 252, and Oppenheim's International Law, p. 1266.

[136] Note that a unilateral interpretation of a treaty by the organs of one state would not be binding upon the other parties: see McNair, Law of Treaties, pp. 345–50, and the David J. Adams claim, 6 RIAA, p. 85 (1921); 1 AD, p. 331.

[137] But see J. Stone, 'Fictional Elements in Treaty Interpretation', 1 Sydney Law Review, 1955, p. 344.

[138] See Sinclair, Vienna Convention, pp. 114–15, and Fitzmaurice, 'Reservations'.

[139] See Fitzmaurice, 'Law and Procedure', pp. 204–7.

[140] See e.g. H. Lauterpacht, 'De l'Interprétation des Traités: Rapport et Projet de Résolutions', 43 Annuaire de l'Institut de Droit International, 1950, p. 366.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

the meaning of any particular treaty provision should be measured.[141] This teleological school of thought has the effect of underlining the role of the judge or arbitrator, since he will be called upon to define the object and purpose of the treaty, and it has been criticised for encouraging judicial law-making. Nevertheless, any true interpretation of a treaty in international law will have to take into account all aspects of the agreement, from the words employed to the intention of the parties and the aims of the particular document. It is not possible to exclude completely any one of these components.

Articles 31 to 33 of the Vienna Convention comprise in some measure aspects of all three doctrines. Article 31 lays down the fundamental rules of interpretation and can be taken as reflecting customary international law.[142] Article 31(1) declares that a treaty shall be interpreted 'in good faith in accordance with the ordinary meaning to be given to the terms of the treaty in their context and in the light of its object and purpose'.[143] The International Court noted in the Competence of the General Assembly for the Admission of a State to the United Nations case[144] that 'the first duty of a tribunal which is called upon to interpret and apply the provisions of a treaty is to endeavour to give effect to them in their natural and ordinary meaning in the context in which they occur'.[145] On the basis of this provision, for example, the European Court of Human Rights held in the Lithgow case[146] that the use of the phrase 'subject to the conditions provided for . . . by the general principles of international law' in article 1 of [141] See e.g. Fitzmaurice, 'Reservations', pp. 7–8 and 13–14, and 'Law and Procedure', pp. 207–9.

[142] The International Court has on a number of occasions reaffirmed that articles 31 and 32 of the Vienna Convention reflect customary law: see e.g. the Genocide Convention (Bosnia v. Serbia) case, ICJ Reports, 2007, paras. 160 ff.; Indonesia/Malaysia case, ICJ Reports, 2002, pp. 625, 645–6; the Botswana/Namibia case, ICJ Reports, 1999, p. 1045; the Libya/Chad case, ICJ Reports, 1994, pp. 6, 21–2; 100 ILR, pp. 1, 20–1, and the Qatar v. Bahrain case, ICJ Reports, 1995, pp. 6, 18; 102 ILR, pp. 47, 59. Other courts and tribunals have done likewise: see e.g. the GATT Dispute Settlement Panel Report on United States Restrictions on Imports of Tuna in 1994, 33 ILM, 1994, pp. 839, 892; the case concerning the Auditing of Accounts between the Netherlands and France, arbitral award of 12 March 2004, para. 59 and the Iron Rhine (Belgium/Netherlands), arbitral award of 24 May 2005, para. 45. See also Oppenheim's International Law, p. 1271.

[143] See e.g. the German External Debts arbitration, 19 ILM, 1980, pp. 1357, 1377. See also Judge Ajibola's Separate Opinion in the Libya/Chad case, ICJ Reports, 1994, pp. 6, 71; 100 ILR, pp. 1, 69. As to 'object and purpose', see e.g. the LaGrand case, ICJ Reports, 2001, para. 102; 134 ILR, p. 41.

[144] ICJ Reports, 1950, pp. 4, 8; 17 ILR, pp. 326, 328.

[145] See also the La Bretagne arbitration (Canada v. France), 82 ILR, pp. 590, 620.

[146] European Court of Human Rights, Series A, No. 102, para. 114; 75 ILR, pp. 438, 482.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

Protocol I of the European Convention in the context of compensation for interference with property rights, could not be interpreted as extending the general principles of international law in this field to establish standards of compensation for the nationalisation of property of nationals (as distinct from aliens).[147] The word 'context' is held to include the preamble and annexes of the treaty as well as any agreement or instrument made by the parties in connection with the conclusion of the treaty.[148]

The Eritrea–Ethiopia Boundary Commission in its boundary delimitation decision emphasised that the elements contained in article 31(1) were guides to establishing what the parties actually intended or their 'common will'[149] and in this process the principle of 'contemporaneity' is relevant. This means that a treaty should be interpreted by reference to the circumstances prevailing when the treaty was concluded,[150] so that, for instance, expressions and geographical names used in the instrument should be given the meaning that they would have possessed at that time.[151] However, as the International Court has noted, this does not prevent it from taking into account in interpreting a treaty, 'the present-day state of scientific knowledge, as reflected in the documentary material submitted to it by the parties'.[152]

It has also been noted that the process of interpretation 'is a judicial function, whose purpose is to determine the precise meaning of a provision, but which cannot change it'.[153]

In addition, any subsequent agreement or practice relating to the treaty must be considered together with the context.[154] Subsequent practice may indeed have a dual role: it may act as an instrument of interpretation and 147 See also the James case, European Court of Human Rights, Series A, No. 98, para. 61; 75 ILR, pp. 397, 423, and the Advisory Opinions of the Inter-American Court of Human Rights in the Enforceability of the Right to Reply case, 79 ILR, pp. 335, 343, and the Meaning of the Word 'Laws' case, 79 ILR, pp. 325, 329.

148 Article 31(2). See also the US Nationals in Morocco case, ICJ Reports, 1952, pp. 176, 196; 19 ILR, pp. 255, 272; the Beagle Channel case, HMSO, 1977, p. 12; 52 ILR, p. 93, and the Young Loan arbitration, 59 ILR, pp. 495, 530.

149 130 ILR, pp. 1, 34. See also Lord McNair in the Argentina/Chile Frontier case, 38 ILR, pp. 10, 89.

150 See Cameroon v. Nigeria, ICJ Reports, 2002, pp. 303, 346. See also D. W. Greig, Intertemporality and the Law of Treaties, London, 2001, and, as to the doctrine of intertemporal law, above, chapter 10, p. 508.

151 Eritrea–Ethiopia, 130 ILR, pp. 1, 34–5.

152 Botswana/Namibia, ICJ Reports, 1999, pp. 1045, 1060.

153 See e.g. the Laguna del Desierto case, 113 ILR, pp. 1, 44.

154 Article 31(3)a and b.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

it may also mark an alteration in the legal relations between the parties established by the treaty in question.[155]

The provision whereby any relevant rules of international law applicable in the relations between the parties shall be taken into account in interpreting a treaty[156] was used somewhat controversially in the Oil Platforms (Iran v. USA) case to justify recourse to the rules concerning the use of force in the context of the Treaty of Amity, Economic Relations and Consular Rights, 1955.[157]

Where the interpretation according to the provisions of article 31 needs confirmation, or determination since the meaning is ambiguous or obscure, or leads to a manifestly absurd or unreasonable result, recourse may be had to supplementary means of interpretation under article 32. These means include the preparatory works (travaux préparatoires) of the treaty and the circumstances of its conclusion and may be employed in the above circumstances to aid the process of interpreting the treaty in question.[158] Nevertheless, the International Court has

[155] As to the latter, see e.g. the Temple case, ICJ Reports, 1962, p. 6; 33 ILR, p. 48, the Namibia case, ICJ Reports, 1971, pp. 16, 22; 49 ILR, p. 2, the Taba case, 80 ILR, p. 226 and Eritrea–Ethiopia, 130 ILR, pp. 1, 34 ff.

[156] Article 31(3)c.

[157] ICJ Reports, 2003, pp. 161, 182; 130 ILR, pp. 323, 341–2. Judge Higgins in her Separate Opinion noted that, 'The Court reads this provision as incorporating the totality of the substantive international law (which in paragraph 42 of the Judgment is defined as comprising Charter law) on the use of force. But this is to ignore that Article 31, paragraph 3, requires "the context" to be taken into account: and "the context" is clearly that of an economic and commercial treaty', ibid., pp. 225, 237; 130 ILR, pp. 383, 395. See also Iran v. USA, Case No. A/18, 5 Iran–US CTR, p. 251; 75 ILR, pp. 175, 188, where the Full Tribunal held, citing article 31(3)c, that jurisdiction existed over claims against Iran by dual Iran–US nationals when the dominant and effective nationality of the claimant at the relevant period was that of the US, and Loizidou v. Turkey (Preliminary Objections), European Court of Human Rights, Series A, No. 310, p. 25; 103 ILR, p. 621.

[158] See Yearbook of the ILC, 1966, vol. II, p. 223, doubting the rule in the River Oder case, PCIJ, Series A, No. 23, 1929; 5 AD, pp. 381, 383, that the travaux préparatoires of certain provisions of the Treaty of Versailles could not be taken into account since three of the states before the Court had not participated in the preparatory conference. See also the Young Loan case, 59 ILR, pp. 495, 544–5; Sinclair, Vienna Convention, pp. 141–7, and the Lithgow case, European Court of Human Rights, Series A, No. 102, para. 117; 75 ILR, pp. 438, 484. Note that in both the Libya/Chad case, ICJ Reports, 1994, pp. 6, 27; 100 ILR, pp. 1, 26, and Qatar v. Bahrain case, ICJ Reports, 1995, pp. 6, 21; 102 ILR, pp. 47, 62, the International Court held that while it was not necessary to have recourse to the travaux préparatoires to elucidate the content of the instruments in question, it could turn to them to confirm its reading of the text. See also the Construction of a Wall advisory opinion, ICJ Reports, 2004, pp. 136, 174 ff.; 129 ILR, pp. 37, 92 ff.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

underlined that 'interpretation must be based above all upon the text of the treaty'.[159]

Case-law provides some interesting guidelines to the above-stated rules. In the Interpretation of Peace Treaties case,[160] the Court was asked whether the UN Secretary-General could appoint the third member of a Treaty Commission upon the request of one side to the dispute where the other side (Bulgaria, Hungary and Romania) refused to appoint its own representative. It was emphasised that the natural and ordinary meaning of the terms of the Peace Treaties with the three states concerned envisaged the appointment of the third member after the other two had been nominated. The breach of a treaty obligation could not be remedied by creating a Commission which was not the kind of Commission envisaged by the Treaties. The principle of effectiveness could not be used by the Court to attribute to the provisions for the settlement of disputes in the Peace Treaties a meaning which would be contrary to their letter and spirit. The Court also stressed the nature of the disputes clause as being one that had to be strictly construed. Thus, the character of the provisions to be interpreted is significant in the context of utilising the relevant rules of interpretation. The principle of effectiveness[161] will be used, however, in order to give effect to provisions in accordance with the intentions of the parties[162] and in accordance with the rules of international law.[163]

In two areas, it should be noted, the principle of effectiveness allied with the broader purposes approach has been used in an especially dynamic manner. In the case of treaties that also operate as the constitutional documents of an international organisation, a more flexible method of interpretation would seem to be justified, since one is dealing with an instrument that is being used in order to accomplish the stated aims

[159] The Libya/Chad case, ICJ Reports, 1994, pp. 6, 22; 100 ILR, pp. 1, 21.

[160] ICJ Reports, 1950, pp. 221, 226–30; 17 ILR, pp. 318, 320–2. See also Yearbook of the ILC, 1966, vol. II, p. 220.

[161] The International Court in the Fisheries Jurisdiction (Spain v. Canada) case declared that the principle of effectiveness 'has an important role in the law of treaties', ICJ Reports, 1999, pp. 432, 455.

[162] See e.g. the Ambatielos case, ICJ Reports, 1952, p. 28; 19 ILR, p. 416. See also the Corfu Channel case, ICJ Reports, 1949, pp. 4, 24; 16 AD, pp. 155, 169 and Yearbook of the ILC, 1966, vol. II, p. 219.

[163] See e.g. the Fisheries Jurisdiction (Spain v. Canada) case, ICJ Reports, 1999, pp. 432, 455, the Right of Passage (Preliminary Objections) case, ICJ Reports, 1957, p. 142 and the Laguna del Desierto case, 113 ILR, pp. 1, 45.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

of that organisation. In addition, of course, the concept and nature of subsequent practice possesses in such cases an added relevance.[164] This approach has been used as a way of inferring powers, not expressly provided for in the relevant instruments, which are deemed necessary in the context of the purposes of the organisation.[165] This programmatic interpretation doctrine in such cases is now well established and especially relevant to the United Nations, where over sixty years of practice related to the principles of the organisation by over 190 states is manifest.

The more dynamic approach to interpretation is also evident in the context of human rights treaties, such as the European Convention on Human Rights, which created a system of implementation.[166] It has been held that a particular legal order was thereby established involving objective obligations to protect human rights rather than subjective, reciprocal rights.[167] Accordingly, a more flexible and programmatic or [164] Note that by article 5, the Vienna Convention is deemed to apply to any treaty which is the constituent instrument of an international organisation. See also C. F. Amerasinghe, Principles of the Institutional Law of International Organisations, Cambridge, 1996, chapter 2, and Amerasinghe, 'Interpretation of Texts in Open International Organisations', 65 BYIL, 1994, p. 175; M. N. Shaw, Title to Territory in Africa: International Legal Issues, Oxford, 1986, pp. 64–73; S. Rosenne, 'Is the Constitution of an International Organisation an International Treaty?', 12 Communicazioni e Studi, 1966, p. 21, and G. Distefano, 'La Pratique Subséquente des Etats Parties à un Traité', AFDI, 1994, p. 41.

[165] See e.g. the Reparations case, ICJ Reports, 1949, p. 174; 16 AD, p. 318; the Certain Expenses of the UN case, ICJ Reports, 1962, p. 151; 34 ILR, p. 281; the Competence of the General Assembly for the Admission of a State case, ICJ Reports, 1950, p. 4; 17 ILR, p. 326, and the Namibia case, ICJ Reports, 1971, p. 16; 49 ILR, p. 2. See also Shaw, Title to Territory; R. Higgins, 'The Development of International Law by the Political Organs of the United Nations', PASIL, 1965, p. 119, and H. G. Schermers and N. M. Blokker, International Institutional Law, 3rd edn, The Hague, 1995, chapter 9. See further below, chapter 23, pp. 1305 ff.

[166] See further above, chapter 7, p. 347. See also J. G. Merrills, The Development of International Law by the European Court of Human Rights, 2nd edn, Manchester, 1993, chapter 4. Note that the European Court of Human Rights in Loizidou v. Turkey (Preliminary Objections), Series A, No. 310, p. 26 (1995); 103 ILR, p. 621, emphasised the fundamental differences as between the role and purposes of the International Court of Justice and the European Court. See also the Genocide Convention (Bosnia v. Serbia) case, ICJ Reports, 2007, paras. 403 ff.

[167] See e.g. Austria v. Italy, 4 European Yearbook of Human Rights, 1960, pp. 116, 140 and Ireland v. UK, Series A, No. 25, p. 90 (1978). See also the Advisory Opinion of the Inter-American Court of Human Rights on the Effect of Reservations on the Entry into Force of the American Convention on Human Rights, 22 ILM, 1983, pp. 37, 47; 67 ILR, pp. 559, 568, which adopted a similar approach.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

purpose-oriented method of interpretation was adopted, emphasising that the Convention constituted a living instrument that had to be interpreted 'in the light of present-day conditions'.[168] In addition, the object and purpose of the Convention requires that its provisions be interpreted so as to make its safeguards practical and effective.[169]

Indeed, in this context, it was noted in the Licensing of Journalists case[170] that while it was useful to compare the Inter-American Convention on Human Rights with other relevant international instruments, this approach could not be utilised to read into the Convention restrictions existing in other treaties. In this situation, 'the rule most favourable to the individual must prevail'.

Article 31(4) provides that a special meaning shall be given to a term if it is established that the parties so intended. It would appear that the standard of proof is fairly high, since a derogation from the ordinary meaning of the term is involved. It is not enough that one party only uses the particular term in a particular way.[171]

Where a treaty is authenticated in more than one language, as often happens with multilateral agreements, article 33 provides that, in the absence of agreement, in the event of a difference of meaning that the normal processes of interpretation cannot resolve, the meaning which best reconciles the texts, having regard to the object and purpose of the treaty, shall be adopted.[172]

[168] See e.g. the Tyrer case, European Court of Human Rights, Series A, No. 26, at p. 15 (1978); 58 ILR, pp. 339, 553; the Marckx case, ECHR, Series A, No. 32, at p. 14 (1979); 58 ILR, pp. 561, 583; the Wemhoff case, ECHR, Series A, No. 7 (1968); 41 ILR, p. 281, and the Loizidou case, ECHR, Series A, No. 310, p. 23; 103 ILR, p. 621. See also H. Waldock, 'The Evolution of Human Rights Concepts and the Application of the European Convention on Human Rights' in Mélanges Offerts à Paul Reuter, Paris, 1981, p. 535. Note also the approach taken by the UN Human Rights Committee in its General Comment 24/52 of 2 November 1994 on Reservations: see 15 Human Rights Law Journal, 1994, p. 464, and above, p. 923.

[169] See e.g. Soering v. UK, European Court of Human Rights, Series A, No. 161, p. 34 (1989); 98 ILR, p. 270; Artico v. Italy, ECHR, Series A, No. 37 (1980) and Loizidou v. Turkey, ECHR, Series A, No. 310, p. 23 (1995); 103 ILR, p. 621.

[170] Advisory Opinion of the Inter-American Court of Human Rights, 1985, 75 ILR, pp. 30, 47–8.

[171] See the Eastern Greenland case, PCIJ, Series A/B, No. 53, 1933, p. 49; 6 AD, p. 95, and the Anglo-French Continental Shelf case, Cmnd 7438, p. 50; 54 ILR, p. 6.

[172] See the LaGrand case, ICJ Reports, 2001, para. 101; 134 ILR, pp. 1, 40–1, the Mavrommatis Palestine Concessions case, PCIJ, Series A, No. 2, p. 19; 2 AD, p. 27, which called for the more restrictive interpretation in such cases, and the Young Loan case, 59 ILR, p. 495. See also Aust, Modern Treaty Law, pp. 250 ff.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

Invalidity, termination and suspension of the operation of treaties[173]

General provisions

Article 42 states that the validity and continuance in force of a treaty may only be questioned on the basis of the provisions in the Vienna Convention. Article 44 provides that a state may only withdraw from or suspend the operation of a treaty in respect of the treaty as a whole and not particular parts of it, unless the treaty otherwise stipulates or the parties otherwise agree. If the appropriate ground for invalidating, terminating, withdrawing from or suspending the operation of a treaty relates solely to particular clauses, it may only be invoked in relation to those clauses where:

(a) the said clauses are separable from the remainder of the treaty with regard to their application;
(b) it appears from the treaty or is otherwise established that acceptance of those clauses was not an essential basis of consent of the other party or parties to be bound by the treaty as a whole; and
(c) continued performance of the remainder of the treaty would not be unjust.

Thus the Convention adopts a cautious approach to the general issue of separability of treaty provisions in this context.[174]

Article 45 in essence provides that a ground for invalidity, termination, withdrawal or suspension may no longer be invoked by the state where, after becoming aware of the facts, it expressly agreed that the treaty is valid or remains in force or by reason of its conduct may be deemed to have acquiesced in the validity of the treaty or its continuance in force.[175]

[173] Nguyen Quoc Dinh et al., Droit International Public, p. 302, and Oppenheim's International Law, p. 1284. See also N. Kontou, The Termination and Revision of Treaties in the Light of New Customary International Law, Oxford, 1995, and Aust, Modern Treaty Law, chapters 16 and 17.

[174] See Judge Lauterpacht, the Norwegian Loans case, ICJ Reports, 1957, pp. 9, 55–9; 24 ILR, pp. 782, 809, and Sinclair, Vienna Convention, pp. 165–7.

[175] See e.g. the Arbitral Award by the King of Spain case, ICJ Reports, 1960, pp. 192, 213–14; 30 ILR, pp. 457, 473, and the Temple case, ICJ Reports, 1962, pp. 6, 23–32; 33 ILR, pp. 48, 62. See also the Argentina–Chile case, 38 ILR, p. 10 and above, chapter 10.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

Invalidity of treaties

Municipal law

A state cannot plead a breach of its constitutional provisions as to the making of treaties as a valid excuse for condemning an agreement. There has been for some years disagreement amongst international lawyers as to whether the failure to abide by a domestic legal limitation by, for example, a head of state in entering into a treaty, will result in rendering the agreement invalid or not.[176] The Convention took the view that in general it would not, but that it could in certain circumstances.

Article 46(1) provides that:

> state may not invoke the fact that its consent to be bound by a treaty has been expressed in violation of a provision of its internal law regarding competence to conclude treaties as invalidating its consent unless that violation was manifest and concerned a rule of its internal law of fundamental importance.

Violation will be regarded as manifest if it would be 'objectively evident' to any state conducting itself in the matter in accordance with normal practice, and in good faith.[177] For example, where the representative of the state has had his authority to consent on behalf of the state made subject to a specific restriction which is ignored, the state will still be bound by that consent save where the other negotiating states were aware of the restriction placed upon his authority to consent prior to the expression of that consent.[178] This particular provision applies as regards a person authorised to represent a state and such persons are defined in article 7 to include heads of state and government and foreign ministers in addition to persons possessing full powers.[179]

The International Court dealt with this question in Cameroon v. Nigeria, where it had been argued by Nigeria that the Maroua Declaration of 1975 between the two states was not valid as its constitutional rules had not been complied with. The Court noted that the Nigerian head of state had signed the Declaration and that a limitation of his [176] See Sinclair, Vienna Convention, pp. 169–71, distinguishing between the constitutionalist and internationalist schools, and K. Holloway, Modern Trends in Treaty Law, London, 1967, pp. 123–33. See also Yearbook of the ILC, 1966, vol. II, pp. 240–1.

[177] Article 46(2).

[178] Article 47. See e.g. the Eastern Greenland case, PCIJ, Series A/B, No. 53, 1933; 6 AD, p. 95, and Qatar v. Bahrain, ICJ Reports, 1994, pp. 112, 121–2; 102 ILR, pp. 1, 18–19.

[179] See above, p. 908.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

capacity would not be 'manifest' unless at least properly publicised. This was especially so since heads of state are deemed to represent their states for the purpose of performing acts relating to the conclusion of treaties.[180] The Court also noted that 'there is no general legal obligation for states to keep themselves informed of legislative and constitutional developments in other states which are or may become important for the international relations of these states'.[181]

It should, of course, also be noted that a state may not invoke a provision of its internal law as a justification for its failure to carry out an international obligation. This is a general principle of international law[182] and finds its application in the law of treaties by virtue of article 27 of the 1969 Vienna Convention.

Error

Unlike the role of mistake in municipal laws of contract, the scope in international law of error as invalidating a state's consent is rather limited. In view of the character of states and the multiplicity of persons actually dealing with the negotiation and conclusion of treaties, errors are not very likely to happen, whether they be unilateral or mutual.

Article 48 declares that a state may only invoke an error in a treaty as invalidating its consent to be bound by the treaty, if the error relates to a fact or situation which was assumed by that state to exist at the time when the treaty was concluded and formed an essential basis of its consent to be bound by the treaty. But if the state knew or ought to have known of the error, or if it contributed to that error, then it cannot afterwards free itself from the obligation of observing the treaty by pointing to that error.

This restrictive approach is in harmony with the comments made in a number of cases, including the Temple case,[183] where the International Court of Justice rejected Thailand's argument that a particular map contained a basic error and therefore it was not bound to observe it, since 'the plea of error cannot be allowed as an element vitiating consent if the party advancing it contributed by its own conduct to the error, or could have avoided it, or if the circumstances were such as to put that party on

[180] ICJ Reports, 2002, pp. 303, 430. [181] Ibid., pp. 430–1.

[182] See e.g. the Alabama Claims arbitration, J. B. Moore, International Arbitrations, New York, 1898, vol. I, p. 495, and the Greco-Bulgarian Communities case, PCIJ, Series B, No. 17, p. 32; 5 AD, p. 4. See also the Applicability of the Obligation to Arbitrate under Section 21 of the United Nations Headquarters Agreement case, ICJ Reports, 1988, pp. 12, 34–5; 82 ILR, pp. 225, 252.

[183] ICJ Reports, 1960, p. 6; 33 ILR, p. 48.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

notice of a possible error'.[184] The Court felt that in view of the character and qualifications of the persons who were involved on the Thai side in examining the map, Thailand could not put forward a claim of error.

Fraud and corruption

Where a state consents to be bound by a treaty as a result of the fraudulent conduct of another negotiating state, that state may under article 49 invoke the fraud as invalidating its consent to be bound. Where a negotiating state directly or indirectly corrupts the representative of another state in order to obtain the consent of the latter to the treaty, that corruption may under article 50 be invoked as invalidating the consent to be bound.[185]

Coercion

Of more importance than error, fraud or corruption in the law of treaties is the issue of coercion as invalidating consent. Where consent has been obtained by coercing the representative of a state, whether by acts or threats directed against him, it shall, according to article 51 of the Convention, be without any legal effect.[186]

The problem of consent obtained by the application of coercion against the state itself is a slightly different one. Prior to the League of Nations, it was clear that international law did not provide for the invalidation of treaties on the grounds of the use or threat of force by one party against the other and this was a consequence of the lack of rules in customary law prohibiting recourse to war. With the signing of the Covenant of the League in 1919, and the Kellogg–Briand Pact in 1928 forbidding the resort to war to resolve international disputes, a new approach began to be taken with regard to the illegality of the use of force in international relations.

With the elucidation of the Nuremberg principles and the coming into effect of the Charter of the United Nations after the Second World War, it became clear that international law condemned coercive activities by states.

Article 2(4) of the United Nations Charter provides that:

> [a]ll members shall refrain in their international relations from the threat or use of force against the territorial integrity or political independence of any state, or in any other measure inconsistent with the purposes of the United Nations.

[184] ICJ Reports, 1960, p. 26; 33 ILR, p. 65.

[185] Such instances are very rare in practice: see Yearbook of the ILC, 1966, vol. II, pp. 244–5 and Sinclair, Vienna Convention, pp. 173–6.

[186] See e.g. First Fidelity Bank NA v. Government of Antigua and Barbuda Permanent Mission 877 F. 2d 189, 192 (1989); 99 ILR, pp. 126, 130.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

It followed that treaties based on coercion of a state should be regarded as invalid.[187]

Accordingly, article 52 of the Convention provides that '[a] treaty is void if its conclusion has been procured by the threat or use of force in violation of the principles of international law embodied in the Charter of the United Nations'. This article was the subject of much debate in the Vienna Conference preceding the adoption of the Convention. Communist and certain Third World countries argued that coercion comprised not only the threat or use of force but also economic and political pressures.[188] The International Law Commission did not take a firm stand on the issue, but noted that the precise scope of the acts covered by the definition should be left to be determined in practice by interpretation of the relevant Charter provisions.[189]

The Vienna Conference, however, issued a Declaration on the Prohibition of Military, Political or Economic Coercion in the Conclusion of Treaties, which condemned the exercise of such coercion to procure the formation of a treaty. These points were not included in the Convention itself, which leaves one to conclude that the application of political or economic pressure to secure the consent of a state to a treaty may not be contrary to international law, but clearly a lot will depend upon the relevant circumstances.

In international relations, the variety of influences which may be brought to bear by a powerful state against a weaker one to induce it to adopt a particular line of policy is wide-ranging and may cover not only coercive threats but also subtle expressions of displeasure. The precise nuances of any particular situation will depend on a number of factors, and it will be misleading to suggest that all forms of pressure are as such violations of international law.

The problem was noted by Judge Padilla Nervo in the International Court in the Fisheries Jurisdiction case[190] when he stated that:

> there are moral and political pressures which cannot be proved by the so-called documentary evidence, but which are in fact indisputably real and which have, in history, given rise to treaties and conventions claimed to be freely concluded and subjected to the principle of pacta sunt servanda.[191]

[187] See Yearbook of the ILC, 1966, vol. II, pp. 246–7. See also the Fisheries Jurisdiction case, ICJ Reports, 1973, pp. 3, 14; 55 ILR, pp. 183, 194.
[188] See Sinclair, Vienna Convention, pp. 177–9.
[189] Yearbook of the ILC, 1966, vol. II, pp. 246–7.
[190] ICJ Reports, 1973, p. 3; 55 ILR, p. 183.
[191] ICJ Reports, 1973, p. 47; 55 ILR, p. 227.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

It should also be noted that the phrase 'in violation of the principles of international law embodied in the Charter' was used so that article 52 should by no means be construed as applying solely to members of the United Nations but should be treated as a universal rule.

Jus cogens[192]

Article 53 of the Convention provides that:

> [a] treaty is void if, at the time of its conclusion, it conflicts with a peremptory norm of general international law. For the purposes of the present Convention, a peremptory norm of general international law is a norm accepted and recognised by the international community of states as a whole as a norm from which no derogation is permitted, and which can be modified only by a subsequent norm of general international law having the same character.

Article 64 declares that '[i]f a new peremptory norm of general international law emerges, any existing treaty which is in conflict with that norm becomes void and terminates'.[193]

As noted in chapter 3,[194] the concept of jus cogens, of fundamental and entrenched rules of international law, is well established in doctrine now, but controversial as to content and method of creation. The insertion of articles dealing with jus cogens in the 1969 Convention underlines the basic principles with regard to treaties.

Consequences of invalidity

Article 69 provides that an invalid treaty is void and without legal force. If acts have nevertheless been performed in reliance on such a treaty, each party may require any other party to establish as far as possible in their [192] See e.g. J. Sztucki, Jus Cogens and the Vienna Convention on the Law of Treaties, New York, 1974; C. Rozakis, The Concept of Jus Cogens in the Law of Treaties, Leiden, 1976; L. Hannikainen, Peremptory Norms (Jus Cogens) in International Law, Helsinki, 1988; E. Suy, 'Article 53' in Corten and Klein, Conventions de Vienne, p. 1905; A. Gomez Robledo, 'Le Jus Cogens International: Sa Genèse, Sa Nature, Ses Fonctions', 172 HR, 1981, p. 9; L. Alexidze, 'Legal Nature of Jus Cogens in Contemporary International Law', 172 HR, p. 219; G. Gaja, 'Jus Cogens Beyond the Vienna Convention', 172 HR, 1981, p. 271; Nguyen Quoc Dinh et al., Droit International Public, p. 202, and Oppenheim's International Law, p. 1292. See also Yearbook of the ILC, 1966, vol. II, pp. 247–8, and Sinclair, Vienna Convention, chapter 7.

[193] See also article 71 and below, p. 945. See also A. Lagerwall, 'Article 64' in Corten and Klein, Conventions de Vienne, p. 2299.

[194] See above, p. 123.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

mutual relations the position that would have existed if the acts had not been performed. Acts performed in good faith before the invalidity was invoked are not rendered unlawful by reason only of the invalidity of the treaty.

Where a treaty is void under article 53, article 71 provides that the parties are to eliminate as far as possible the consequences of any act performed in reliance on any provision which conflicts with jus cogens and bring their mutual relations into conformity with the peremptory norm. Where a treaty terminates under article 64, the parties are released from any obligation further to perform the treaty, but this does not affect any right, obligation or legal situation of the parties created through the execution of the treaty prior to its termination, provided that the rights, obligations or situations may be maintained thereafter in conformity with the new peremptory norm.

The termination of treaties[195]

There are a number of methods available by which treaties may be terminated or suspended.

Termination by treaty provision or consent

A treaty may be terminated or suspended in accordance with a specific provision in that treaty, or otherwise at any time by consent of all the parties after consultation.[196] Where, however, a treaty contains no provision regarding termination and does not provide for denunciation or withdrawal specifically, a state may only denounce or withdraw from that treaty where the parties intended to admit such a possibility or where the right may be implied by the nature of the treaty.[197] In General Comment No. 26 of 1997, the UN Human Rights Committee, noting that the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights had no provision for termination or denunciation, concluded on the basis of the Vienna Convention provisions, that the parties had not intended to admit of such [195] See e.g. E. David, The Strategy of Treaty Termination, New Haven, 1975; A. Vamvoukis, Termination of Treaties in International Law, Oxford, 1985, and R. Plender, 'The Role of Consent in the Termination of Treaties', 57 BYIL, 1986, p. 133. See also Thirlway, 'Law and Procedure (Part Four)', pp. 63 ff., and Aust, Modern Treaty Law, chapter 16.

[196] Articles 54 and 57.

[197] Article 56. Examples given by J. Brierly, The Law of Nations, 6th edn, Oxford, 1963, p. 331, include treaties of alliance and commerce. See also Nicaragua v. US, ICJ Reports, 1984, pp. 392, 420; 76 ILR, pp. 1, 131.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

a possibility. The Committee based itself on the fact that states parties were able to withdraw their acceptance of the right of inter-state complaint, while the First Optional Protocol, concerning the right of individual communication, provided in terms for denunciation. The Committee also emphasised that the Covenant, as an instrument codifying universal human rights, was not the type of treaty which, by its nature, implies a right of denunciation.[198]

A treaty may, of course, come to an end if its purposes and objects have been fulfilled or if it is clear from its provisions that it is limited in time and the requisite period has elapsed. The Tribunal in the Rainbow Warrior case[199] held that the breach of the New Zealand–France Agreement, 1986, concerning the two captured French agents that had sunk the vessel in question,[200] had commenced on 22 July 1986 and had run continuously for the three years' period of confinement of the agents stipulated in the agreement. Accordingly, the period concerned had expired on 22 July 1989, so that France could not be said to be in breach of its international obligations after that date. However, this did not exempt France from responsibility for its previous breaches of its obligations, committed while these obligations were in force. Claims arising out of a previous infringement of a treaty which has since expired acquire an existence independent of that treaty.[201] The termination of a treaty does not affect any right, obligation or legal situation of the parties created through the execution of the treaty prior to its termination.[202]

Just as two or more parties to a multilateral treaty may modify as between themselves particular provisions of the agreement,[203] so they may under article 58 agree to suspend the operation of treaty provisions

[198] A/53/40, annex VII. [199] 82 ILR, pp. 499, 567–8. [200] See above, p. 779.

[201] See the Dissenting Opinion of Judge McNair in the Ambatielos case, ICJ Reports, 1952, pp. 28, 63; 19 ILR, pp. 416, 433.

[202] Article 70(1)b of the 1969 Vienna Convention. See below, p. 952. Note that in draft article 3 of the ILC Draft Articles on the Effects of Armed Conflicts on Treaties, A/CN.4/178, 2007, p. 7, it is provided that the outbreak of an armed conflict does not necessarily terminate or suspend the operation of treaties as (a) between the parties to the armed conflict and (b) between one or more parties to the armed conflict and a third state. Draft article 10 provides that a state exercising its rights of individual or collective self-defence in accordance with the Charter of the United Nations is entitled to suspend in whole or in part the operation of a treaty incompatible with the exercise of that right, subject to any consequences resulting from a later determination by the Security Council of that state as an aggressor. This formulation is based upon article 7 of the resolution on the effects of armed conflicts on treaties adopted by the Institut de Droit International in 1985, ibid., p. 18.

[203] Article 41 and above, p. 931.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

temporarily and as between themselves alone if such a possibility is provided for by the treaty. Such suspension may also be possible under that article, where not prohibited by the treaty in question, provided it does not affect the rights or obligations of the other parties under the particular agreement and provided it is not incompatible with the object and purpose of the treaty.

Where all the parties to a treaty later conclude another agreement relating to the same subject matter, the earlier treaty will be regarded as terminated where it appears that the matter is to be governed by the later agreement or where the provisions of the later treaty are so incompatible with those of the earlier one that the two treaties are not capable of being applied at the same time.[204]

Material breach[205]

There are two approaches to be considered. First, if one state violates an important provision in an agreement, it is not unnatural for the other states concerned to regard that agreement as ended by it. It is in effect a reprisal or countermeasure,[206] a rather unsubtle but effective means of ensuring the enforcement of a treaty. The fact that an agreement may be terminated where it is breached by one party may act as a discouragement to any party that might contemplate a breach of one provision but would be unwilling to forgo the benefits prescribed in others. On the other hand, to render treaties revocable because one party has acted contrary to what might very well be only a minor provision in the agreement taken as a whole, would be to place the states participating in a treaty in rather a vulnerable position. There is a need for flexibility as well as certainty in such situations. Customary law supports the view that something more than a mere breach itself of a term in an agreement would be necessary to give the other party or parties the right to abrogate that agreement. In the Tacna-Arica arbitration,[207] between Chile and Peru, the arbitrator noted, in referring to an agreement about a plebiscite in former Peruvian territory occupied by Chile, that:

[204] Article 59.

[205] See e.g. S. Rosenne, Breach of Treaty, Cambridge, 1985. See also D. N. Hutchinson, 'Solidarity and Breaches of Multilateral Treaties', 59 BYIL, 1988, p. 151, and M. M. Gomaa, Suspension or Termination of Treaties on Grounds of Breach, The Hague, 1996.

[206] See above, chapter 14, p. 794.

[207] 2 RIAA, p. 921 (1925).

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

> [i]t is manifest that if abuses of administration could have the effect of terminating such an agreement, it would be necessary to establish such serious conditions as the consequence of administrative wrongs as would operate to frustrate the purpose of the agreement.[208]

The relevant provision of the Vienna Convention is contained in article 60, which codifies existing customary law.[209] Article 60(3) declares that a material breach of a treaty consists in either a repudiation of the treaty not permitted by the Vienna Convention or the violation of a provision essential to the accomplishment of the object or purpose of the treaty.[210] The second part of article 60(3) was applied in the Rainbow Warrior case,[211] where the obligation to confine the two French agents in question on a Pacific Island for a minimum period of three years was held to have constituted the object or purpose of the New Zealand–France Agreement, 1986 so that France committed a material breach of this treaty by permitting the agents to leave the island before the expiry of the three-year period.

Where such a breach occurs in a bilateral treaty, then under article 60(1) the innocent party may invoke that breach as a ground for terminating the treaty or suspending its operation in whole or in part. The International Court has made clear that it is only a material breach of the treaty itself, by a state party to it, which entitles the other party to rely on it for grounds of termination.[212] Further, termination on the basis of a breach which has not yet occurred, such as Hungary's purported termination of a bilateral treaty on the basis of works done by Czechoslovakia which had not at the time resulted in a diversion of the Danube River, would be deemed premature and would not be lawful.[213]

There is a rather different situation in the case of a multilateral treaty since a number of innocent parties are involved that might not wish the treaty to be denounced by one of them because of a breach by another state. To cover such situations, article 60(2) prescribes that a material breach of a multilateral treaty by one of the parties entitles:

[208] Ibid., pp. 943–4.
[209] See the Gabčíkovo–Nagymaros Project case, ICJ Reports, 1997, pp. 7, 38; 116 ILR, p. 1. See also B. Simma and C. J. Tams, 'Article 60' in Corten and Klein, Conventions de Vienne, p. 2131.
[210] See the Namibia case, ICJ Reports, 1971, pp. 16, 46–7; 49 ILR, pp. 2, 37.
[211] 82 ILR, pp. 499, 564–6.
[212] The Gabčíkovo–Nagymaros Project case, ICJ Reports, 1997, pp. 7, 65; 116 ILR, p. 1.
[213] ICJ Reports, 1997, p. 66.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

(a) the other parties by unanimous agreement to suspend the operation of the treaty in whole or in part or to terminate it either:
  (i) in the relations between themselves and the defaulting state, or
  (ii) as between all the parties;
(b) a party specially affected by the breach to invoke it as a ground for suspending the operation of the treaty in whole or in part in the relations between itself and the defaulting state;
(c) any party other than the defaulting state to invoke the breach as a ground for suspending the operation of the treaty in whole or in part with respect to itself if the treaty is of such a character that a material breach of its provisions by one party radically changes the position of every party with respect to the further performance of its obligations under the treaty.[214]

It is interesting to note that the provisions of article 60 regarding the definition and consequences of a material breach do not apply, by article 60(5), to provisions relating to the 'protection of the human person contained in treaties of a humanitarian character, in particular to provisions prohibiting any form of reprisals against persons protected by such treaties'. This is because objective and absolute principles are involved and not just reciprocal rights and duties.[215]

Supervening impossibility of performance[216]

Article 61 of the Convention[217] is intended to cover such situations as the submergence of an island, or the drying up of a river where the consequence of such events is to render the performance of the treaty impossible. Where the carrying out of the terms of the agreement becomes impossible because of the 'permanent disappearance or destruction of an object indispensable for the execution of the treaty', a party may validly terminate or withdraw from it. However, where the impossibility is only temporary, it may be invoked solely to suspend the operation of the treaty. Impossibility cannot be used in this way where it arises from the breach [214] See Yearbook of the ILC, 1966, vol. II, pp. 253–5. See also the Namibia case, ICJ Reports, 1971, pp. 16, 47; 49 ILR, p. 37, and the US–France Air Services Agreement case, 54 ILR, pp. 304, 331.

[215] See e.g. G. Fitzmaurice, 'General Principles of International Law Considered from the Standpoint of the Rule of Law', 92 HR, 1957, pp. 1, 125–6, and above, chapter 7, p. 348.

[216] See e.g. McNair, Law of Treaties, pp. 685–8, and Sinclair, Vienna Convention, pp. 190–2.

[217] This is also a codification of customary law: see the Gabčíkovo–Nagymaros Project case, ICJ Reports, 1997, pp. 7, 38; 116 ILR, p. 1.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

by the party attempting to terminate or suspend the agreement of a treaty or other international obligation owed to any other party to the treaty.[218]

Fundamental change of circumstances[219]

The doctrine of rebus sic stantibus is a principle in customary international law providing that where there has been a fundamental change of circumstances since an agreement was concluded, a party to that agreement may withdraw from or terminate it. It is justified by the fact that some treaties may remain in force for long periods of time, during which fundamental changes might have occurred. Such changes might encourage one of the parties to adopt drastic measures in the face of a general refusal to accept an alteration in the terms of the treaty. However, this doctrine has been criticised on the grounds that, having regard to the absence of any system for compulsory jurisdiction in the international order, it could operate as a disrupting influence upon the binding force of obligations undertaken by states. It might be used to justify withdrawal from treaties on rather tenuous grounds.[220]

The modern approach is to admit the existence of the doctrine, but severely restrict its scope.[221] The International Court in the Fisheries Jurisdiction case declared that:

> [i]nternational law admits that a fundamental change in the circumstances which determined the parties to accept a treaty, if it has resulted in a radical transformation of the extent of the obligations imposed by it, may, under

[218] See Yearbook of the ILC, 1966, vol. II, p. 256. See also the Gabčíkovo–Nagymaros Project case, ICJ Reports, 1997, pp. 7, 63–4; 116 ILR, p. 1.

[219] See e.g. M. N. Shaw and C. Fournet, 'Article 62' in Corten and Klein, Conventions de Vienne, p. 2229; D. F. Vagts, 'Rebus Revisited: Changed Circumstances in Treaty Law', 43 Columbia Journal of Transnational Law, 2004–5, p. 459; M. Bennett and N. Roughan, 'Rebus Sic Stantibus and the Treaty of Waitangi', 37 Victoria University Wellington Law Review 2006, 505; C. Hill, The Doctrine of Rebus Sic Stantibus in International Law, Leiden, 1934; O. Lissitzyn, 'Treaties and Changed Circumstances (Rebus Sic Stantibus)', 61 AJIL, 1967, p. 895; P. Cahier, 'Le Changement Fondamental de Circonstances et la Convention de Vienne de 1969 sur le Droit des Traités' in Mélanges Ago, Milan, 1987, vol. I, p. 163, and Vamvoukis, Termination, part 1. See also Yearbook of the ILC, 1966, vol. II, pp. 257 ff. Note the decision in TWA Inc. v. Franklin Mint Corporation 23 ILM, 1984, pp. 814, 820, that a private person could not plead the rebus rule.

[220] This was apparently occurring in the immediate pre-1914 period: see J. Garner, 'The Doctrine of Rebus Sic Stantibus and the Termination of Treaties', 21 AJIL, 1927, p. 409, and Sinclair, Vienna Convention, p. 193. See also G. Harastzi, 'Treaties and the Fundamental Change of Circumstances', 146 HR, 1975, p. 1.

[221] See e.g. the Free Zones case, PCIJ, Series A/B, No. 46, pp. 156–8; 6 AD, pp. 362, 365.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

> certain conditions, afford the party affected a ground for invoking the termination or suspension of the treaty.[222]

Before the doctrine may be applied, the Court continued, it is necessary that such changes 'must have increased the burden of the obligations to be executed to the extent of rendering the performance something essentially different from that originally undertaken'.[223]

Article 62 of the Vienna Convention, which the International Court of Justice regarded in many respects as a codification of existing customary law,[224] declares that:

> 1. A fundamental change of circumstances which has occurred with regard to those existing at the time of the conclusion of a treaty, and which was not foreseen by the parties, may not be invoked as a ground for terminating or withdrawing from the treaty unless:
>   (a) the existence of those circumstances constituted an essential basis of the consent of the parties to be bound by the treaty; and
>   (b) the effect of the change is radically to transform the extent of obligations still to be performed under the treaty.
> 2. A fundamental change of circumstances may not be invoked as a ground for terminating or withdrawing from a treaty:
>   (a) if the treaty establishes a boundary; or >   (b) if the fundamental change is the result of a breach by the party invoking it either of an obligation under the treaty or of any other international obligation owed to any other party to the treaty.

The article also notes that instead of terminating or withdrawing from a treaty in the above circumstances, a party might suspend the operation of the treaty.

The doctrine was examined in the Gabčíkovo–Nagymaros Project case, where the International Court concluded that:

> The changed circumstances advanced by Hungary are, in the Court's view, not of such a nature, either individually or collectively, that their effect would radically transform the extent of the obligations still to be performed in order to accomplish the Project. A fundamental change of circumstances must have been unforeseen; the existence of the circumstances at the time of the Treaty's conclusion must have constituted an essential basis of the consent of the parties to be bound by the Treaty. The negative and conditional

[222] ICJ Reports, 1973, pp. 3, 20–1; 55 ILR, p. 183. [223] Ibid.
[224] ICJ Reports, 1973, p. 18. See also the Gabčíkovo–Nagymaros Project case, ICJ Reports, 1997, pp. 7, 38; 116 ILR, p. 1.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

wording of article 62 of the Vienna Convention on the Law of Treaties is a clear indication moreover that the stability of treaty relations requires that the plea of fundamental change of circumstances should be applied only in exceptional cases.[225]

Consequences of the termination or suspension of a treaty

Article 70 provides that:

1. Unless the treaty otherwise provides or the parties otherwise agree, the termination of a treaty under its provisions or in accordance with the present Convention:
   (a) releases the parties from any obligation further to perform the treaty;
   (b) does not affect any right, obligation or legal situation of the parties created through the execution of the treaty prior to its termination.
2. If a state denounces or withdraws from a multilateral treaty, paragraph 1 applies in the relations between that state and each of the other parties to the treaty from the date when such denunciation or withdrawal takes effect.

Article 72 provides that:

1. Unless the treaty otherwise provides or the parties otherwise agree, the suspension of the operation of a treaty under its provisions or in accordance with the present Convention:
   (a) releases the parties between which the operation of the treaty is suspended from the obligation to perform the treaty in their mutual relations during the period of the suspension;
   (b) does not otherwise affect the legal relations between the parties established by the treaty.
2. During the period of the suspension the parties shall refrain from acts tending to obstruct the resumption of the operation of the treaty.[226]

Dispute settlement[227]

Article 66 provides that if a dispute has not been resolved within twelve months by the means specified in article 33 of the UN Charter then further [225] ICJ Reports, 1997, p. 65. This was followed by the European Court of Justice in Racke v. Hauptzollamt Mainz [1998] ECR I-3655, 3705–7. Draft article 3 of the ILC Draft Articles on the Effects of Armed Conflicts on Treaties, A/CN.4/178, 2007, p. 7, provides that the outbreak of an armed conflict does not necessarily terminate or suspend the operation of treaties as (a) between the parties to the armed conflict and (b) between one or more parties to the armed conflict and a third state.

[226] See also article 65 with regard to the relevant procedures to be followed.

[227] See e.g. Aust, Modern Treaty Law, chapter 20; H. Ruiz Fabri, 'Article 66' in Corten and Klein, Conventions de Vienne, p. 2391, and J. G. Merrills, International Dispute Settlement, 4th edn, Cambridge, 2004. See also below, chapter 18.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

procedures will be followed. If the dispute concerns article 53 or 64 (jus cogens), any one of the parties may by a written application submit it to the International Court of Justice for a decision unless the parties by common consent agree to submit the dispute to arbitration. If the dispute concerns other issues in the Convention, any one of the parties may by request to the UN Secretary-General set in motion the conciliation procedure laid down in the Annex to the Convention.

Treaties between states and international organisations[228]

The International Law Commission completed Draft Articles on the Law of Treaties between States and International Organisations or between International Organisations in 1982 and the Vienna Convention on the Law of Treaties between States and International Organisations was adopted in 1986.[229] Its provisions closely follow the provisions of the 1969 Vienna Convention mutatis mutandis. However, article 73 of the 1986 Convention notes that 'as between states parties to the Vienna Convention on the Law of Treaties of 1969, the relations of those states under a treaty between two or more states and one or more international organisations shall be governed by that Convention'. Whether this provision affirming the superiority of the 1969 Convention for states will in practice prejudice the interests of international organisations is an open question. In any event, there is no doubt that the strong wish of the Conference adopting the 1986 Convention was for uniformity, despite arguments that the position of international organisations in certain areas of treaty law was difficult to assimilate to that of states.[230]

Special concern in the International Law Commission focused on the effects that a treaty concluded by an international organisation has upon the member states of the organisation. Article 36 bis of the ILC Draft[231] provided that:

> Obligations and rights arise for states members of an international organization from the provisions of a treaty to which that organization is a party when the parties to the treaty intend those provisions to be the means of [228] See e.g. G. Gaja, 'A "New" Vienna Convention on Treaties Between States and International Organisations or Between International Organisations: A Critical Commentary', 58 BYIL, 1987, p. 253, and F. Morgenstern, 'The Convention on the Law of Treaties Between States and International Organisations or Between International Organisations' in International Law at a Time of Perplexity (ed. Y. Dinstein), Dordrecht, 1989, p. 435.

[229] See above, footnote 2.

[230] See Morgenstern, 'Convention', pp. 438–41.

[231] Described in the ILC Commentary as the article arousing the most controversy, Yearbook of the ILC, 1982, vol. II, part 2, p. 43.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

> establishing such obligations and according such rights and have defined their conditions and effects in the treaty or have otherwise agreed thereon, and if:
>
> (a) the states members of the organization, by virtue of the constituent instrument of that organization or otherwise, have unanimously agreed to be bound by the said provisions of the treaty; and
> (b) the assent of the states members of the organization to be bound by the relevant provisions of the treaty has been duly brought to the knowledge of the negotiating states and negotiating organizations.

Such a situation would arise, for example, in the case of a customs union, which was an international organisation, normally concluding tariff agreements to which its members are not parties. Such agreements would be of little value if they were not to be immediately binding on member states.[232]

However, despite the fact that the European Community was particularly interested in the adoption of this draft article, it was rejected at the Conference.[233] It was replaced by article 74(3) of the Convention, which provides:

> The provisions of the present Convention shall not prejudge any question that may arise in regard to the establishment of obligations and rights for states members of an international organisation under a treaty to which that organisation is a party.

Accordingly, the situation in question would fall to be resolved on the basis of the consent of the states concerned in the specific circumstances and on a case-by-case basis.

The other area of difference between the 1986 and 1969 Conventions concerns the provisions for dispute settlement. Since international organisations cannot be parties to contentious proceedings before the International Court, draft article 66 provided for the compulsory arbitration of disputes concerning issues relating to the principles of jus cogens, with the details of the proposed arbitral tribunal contained in the Annex. The provisions of the 1969 Convention relating to the compulsory conciliation of disputes concerning the other articles were incorporated in the draft with little change. The 1986 Convention itself, however, adopted a different approach. Under article 66(2), where an international organisation authorised under article 96 of the UN Charter to request advisory [232] Ibid., pp. 43–4. [233] See e.g. Gaja, '"New" Vienna Convention', p. 264.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

opinions is a party to a dispute concerning jus cogens, it may apply for an advisory opinion to the International Court, which 'shall be accepted as decisive by all the parties to the dispute concerned'. If the organisation is not so authorised under article 96, it may follow the same procedure acting through a member state. If no advisory opinion is requested or the Court itself does not comply with the request, then compulsory arbitration is provided for.[234]

Suggestions for further reading

A. Aust, Modern Treaty Law and Practice, 2nd edn, Cambridge, 2007

M. Fitzmaurice and O. Elias, Contemporary Issues in the Law of Treaties, Utrecht, 2005

I. Sinclair, The Vienna Convention on the Law of Treaties, 2nd edn, Manchester, 1984

[234] See also above, chapter 14, p. 778, regarding the relationship between treaties and state responsibility. The issue of state succession to treaties is covered in chapter 17, p. 966.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

17

State succession

Political entities are not immutable. They are subject to change. New states appear and old states disappear.[1] Federations, mergers, dissolutions and secessions take place. International law has to incorporate such events into its general framework with the minimum of disruption and instability. Such changes have come to the fore since the end of the Second World War and the establishment of over 100 new, independent countries.

Difficulties may result from the change in the political sovereignty over a particular territorial entity for the purposes of international law and the world community. For instance, how far is a new state bound by

[1] See generally D. P. O'Connell, State Succession in Municipal Law and International Law, Cambridge, 2 vols., 1967; O'Connell, 'Recent Problems of State Succession in Relation to New States', 130 HR, 1970, p. 95; K. Zemanek, 'State Succession after Decolonisation', 116 HR, 1965, p. 180; O. Udokang, Succession of New States to International Treaties, New York, 1972; J. H. W. Verzijl, International Law in Historical Perspective, Leiden, 1974, vol. VII; I. Brownlie, Principles of Public International Law, 6th edn, Oxford, 2003, chapter 29; UN, Materials on Succession of States, New York, 1967 and supplement A/CN.4/263, 1972, and UN, Materials on Succession of States in Matters Other than Treaties, New York, 1978; International Law Association, The Effect of Independence on Treaties, London, 1965; Z. Mériboute, La Codification de la Succession d'États aux Traités, Paris, 1984; S. Torres Bernardez, 'Succession of States' in International Law: Achievements and Prospects (ed. M. Bedjaoui), Paris, 1991, p. 381; D. Bardonnet, La Succession d'États à Madagascar, Paris, 1970; R. Müllerson, 'The Continuity and Succession of States by Reference to the Former USSR and Yugoslavia', 42 ICLQ, 1993, p. 473; M. Koskenniemi and M. Lehto, 'La Succession d'États dans l'ex-URSS', AFDI, 1992, p. 179; M. Bedjaoui, 'Problèmes Récents de Succession d'États dans les États Nouveaux', 130 HR, 1970, p. 455; Oppenheim's International Law (eds. R. Y. Jennings and A. D. Watts), 9th edn, London, 1992, p. 208; J. Crawford, The Creation of States in International Law, 2nd edn, Oxford, 2006; P. Radan, The Break-up of Yugoslavia and International Law, London, 2002; Nguyen Quoc Dinh, P. Daillier and A. Pellet, Droit International Public, 7th edn, Paris, 2002, p. 538; M. N. Shaw, 'State Succession Revisited', 5 Finnish YIL, 1994, p. 34; Succession of States (ed. M. Mrak), The Hague, 1999; B. Stern, 'La Succession d'États', 262 HR, 1996, p. 9; State Succession: Codification Tested against Facts (eds. P. M. Eisemann and M. Koskenniemi), Dordrecht, 2000, and State Practice Regarding State Succession and Issues of Recognition (eds. J. Klabbers et al.), The Hague, 1999.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

the treaties and contracts entered into by the previous sovereign of the territory? Does nationality automatically devolve upon the inhabitants to replace that of the predecessor? What happens to the public property of the previous sovereign, and to what extent is the new authority liable for the debts of the old?

State succession in international law cannot be confused with succession in municipal law and the transmission of property and so forth to the relevant heir. Other interests and concerns are involved and the principles of state sovereignty, equality of states and non-interference prevent a universal succession principle similar to domestic law from being adopted. Despite attempts to assimilate Roman law views regarding the continuity of the legal personality in the estate which falls by inheritance,[2] this approach could not be sustained in the light of state interests and practice. The opposing doctrine, which basically denied any transmission of rights, obligations and property interests between the predecessor and successor sovereigns, arose in the heyday of positivism in the nineteenth century. It manifested itself again with the rise of the decolonisation process in the form of the 'clean slate' principle, under which new states acquired sovereignty free from encumbrances created by the predecessor sovereign.

The issue of state succession can arise in a number of defined circumstances, which mirror the ways in which political sovereignty may be acquired by, for example, decolonisation of all or part of an existing territorial unit, dismemberment of an existing state, secession, annexation and merger. In each of these cases a once-recognised entity disappears in whole or in part to be succeeded by some other authority, thus precipitating problems of transmission of rights and obligations. However, the question of state succession does not infringe upon the normal rights and duties of states under international law. These exist by virtue of the fundamental principles of international law and as a consequence of sovereignty and not as a result of transference from the previous sovereign. The issue of state succession should also be distinguished from questions of succession of governments, particularly revolutionary succession, and consequential patterns of recognition and responsibility.[3]

In many cases, such problems will be dealt with by treaties, whether multilateral treaties dealing with primarily territorial dispositions as, for example, the Treaty of St Germain, 1919, which resolved some succession questions relating to the dissolution of the Austro-Hungarian

[2] See O'Connell, State Succession, vol. I, pp. 9 ff.

[3] See above, chapters 9 and 14.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

Empire,[4] or bilateral agreements as between, for instance, colonial power and new state, which, however, would not bind third states. The system of devolution agreements signed by the colonial power with the successor, newly decolonised state, was used by, for example, the UK, France and the Netherlands. Such agreements provided in general that all the rights and benefits, obligations and responsibilities devolving upon the colonial power in respect of the territory in question arising from valid international instruments, would therefore devolve upon the new state.[5] This system, however, was not seen as satisfactory by many new states and several of them resorted to unilateral declarations, providing for a transitional period during which treaties entered into by the predecessor state would continue in force and be subject to review as to which should be accepted and which rejected.[6] In the case of bilateral treaties, those not surviving under customary law would be regarded as having terminated at the end of the period.

However, the issue of state succession in international law is particularly complex. Many of the rules have developed in specific response to particular political changes and such changes have not always been treated in a consistent manner by the international community.[7] The Arbitration Commission established by the Conference on Yugoslavia, for instance, emphasised that 'there are few well-established principles of international law that apply to state succession. Application of these principles is largely to be determined case by case, though the 1978 and 1983 Vienna Conventions do offer some guidance',[8] while the German Federal Supreme Court noted in the Espionage Prosecution case that 'the problem of state succession is one of the most disputed areas of [4] See O'Connell, State Succession, vol. II, pp. 178–82. This treaty provided for the responsibility of the successor states of the Austro-Hungarian Empire for the latter's public debts. See also the Italian Peace Treaty, 1947.

[5] See e.g. the UK–Burma Agreement of 1947. See also N. Mugerwa, 'Subjects of International Law' in Manual of Public International Law (ed. M. Sørensen), London, 1968, pp. 247, 300–1, and Yearbook of the ILC, 1974, vol. II, p. 186. See also O'Connell, State Succession, vol. II, pp. 352–73, and Brownlie, Principles, p. 633.

[6] See e.g. the Tanganyika statement of December 1961, quoted in Mugerwa, 'Subjects', p. 302, subsequently followed by similar declarations by, for example, Uganda, Kenya and Burundi. See also Yearbook of the ILC, 1974, vol. II, p. 192. In Zambia's case, it was stated that the question would be governed by customary international law: see O'Connell, State Succession, vol. II, p. 115.

[7] See Shaw, 'State Succession Revisited'.

[8] Opinion No. 13, 96 ILR, pp. 726, 728. See also Oppenheim's International Law, p. 236, and Third US Restatement of Foreign Relations Law, Washington, 1987, p. 100.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

international law'.[9] The international aspects of succession are governed through the rules of customary international law. There are two relevant Conventions, the Vienna Convention on Succession of States in Respect of Treaties, 1978, which entered into force in 1996, and the Vienna Convention on Succession of States in Respect of State Property, Archives and Debts, 1983, which is not yet in force. However, many of the provisions contained in these Conventions reflect existing international law.

State succession itself may be briefly defined as the replacement of one state by another in the responsibility for the international relations of territory.[10] However, this formulation conceals a host of problems since there is a complex range of situations that stretches from continuity of statehood through succession to non-succession. State succession is essentially an umbrella term for a phenomenon occurring upon a factual change in sovereign authority over a particular territory. In many circumstances it is unclear as to which rights and duties will flow from one authority to the other and upon which precise basis. Much will depend upon the circumstances of the particular case, for example whether what has occurred is a merger of two states to form a new state; the absorption of one state into another, continuing state; a cession of territory from one state to another; secession of part of a state to form a new state; the dissolution or dismemberment of a state to form two or more states, or the establishment of a new state as a result of decolonisation. The role of recognition and acquiescence in this process is especially important.

The relevant date of succession is the date at which the successor state replaces the predecessor state in the responsibility for the international relations of the territory to which the succession relates.[11] This is invariably the date of independence. However, problems may arise where successive dates of independence arise with regard to a state that is slowly disintegrating, such as Yugoslavia. The Yugoslav Arbitration Commission noted

[9] Case No. 2 BGz 38/91, 94 ILR, pp. 68, 77–8.

[10] See article 2 of the Vienna Conventions of both 1978 and 1983 and Opinion No. 1 of the Yugoslav Arbitration Commission, 92 ILR, pp. 162, 165. See also Guinea-Bissau v. Senegal, 83 ILR, pp. 1, 22 and the El Salvador/Honduras case, ICJ Reports, 1992, pp. 351, 598; 97 ILR, pp. 266, 514.

[11] See article 2(1)e of the Vienna Convention on Succession of States to Treaties, 1978 and article 11 of the Vienna Convention on Succession of States in respect of State Property, Archives and Debts, 1983. See also Opinion No. 11 of the Yugoslav Arbitration Commission, 96 ILR, p. 719.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

that the date of succession was a question of fact to be assessed in the light of all the relevant circumstances.[12]

Continuity and succession

Questions relating to continuity and succession may be particularly difficult.[13] Where a new entity emerges, one has to decide whether it is a totally separate creature from its predecessor, or whether it is a continuation of it in a slightly different form. For example, it seems to be accepted that India is the same legal entity as British India and Pakistan is a totally new state.[14] Yugoslavia was generally regarded as the successor state to Serbia,[15] and Israel as a completely different being from British mandated Palestine.[16] Cession or secession of territory from an existing state will not affect the continuity of the latter state, even though its territorial dimensions and population have been diminished. Pakistan after the independence of Bangladesh is a good example of this. In such a case, the existing state remains in being, complete with the rights and duties incumbent upon it, save for those specifically tied to the ceded or seceded territory. Where, however, a state is dismembered so that all of its territory falls within the territory of two or more states, these rights and duties will be allocated as between the successor states. In deciding whether continuity or succession has occurred with regard to one of the parties to the process, one has to consider the classical criteria of the creation of statehood,[17] together with assertions as to status made by the parties directly concerned and the attitudes adopted by third states and international organisations.

This issue has arisen recently with regard to events concerning the Soviet Union and Yugoslavia. In the former case, upon the demise of the USSR, the Russian Federation took the position that it was the continuation of that state.[18] This was asserted particularly with regard to membership of the UN.[19] Of great importance was the Decision of the Council of Heads of State of the Commonwealth of Independent States [12] See Opinion No. 11, 96 ILR, p. 719. However, see also the Yugoslav Agreement on Succession Issues of June 2001, 41 ILM, 2002, p. 3. See further below, p. 989.

[13] See e.g. M. Craven, 'The Problem of State Succession and the Identity of States under International Law', 9 EJIL, 1998, p. 142.

[14] See e.g. Yearbook of the ILC, 1962, vol. II, pp. 101–3.

[15] See e.g. O'Connell, State Succession, vol. II, pp. 378–9. See also Artukovic v. Rison 784 F.2d 1354 (1986).

[16] O'Connell, State Succession, vol. II, pp. 155–7.

[17] See above, chapter 5, p. 197.

[18] See e.g. R. Müllerson, International Law, Rights and Politics, London, 1994, pp. 140–5, and Y. Blum, 'Russia Takes over the Soviet Union's Seat at the United Nations', 3 EJIL, 1992, p. 354.

[19] See 31 ILM, 1992, p. 138.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

on 21 December 1991 supporting Russia's continuance of the membership of the USSR in the UN, including permanent membership of the Security Council, and other international organisations.[20] Although not all of the instruments produced by the Commonwealth of Independent States at the end of 1991 were strictly consistent with the continuity principle,[21] it is clear that Russia's claim to be the continuation of the USSR (albeit within different borders of course) was supported by the other former Republics and was accepted by international practice.[22] A rather special situation arose with respect to the Baltic states (Estonia, Latvia and Lithuania), which became independent after the First World War, but were annexed by the Soviet Union in 1940. This annexation had been refused recognition by some states[23] and accepted de facto but not de jure by some others.[24] The Baltic states declared their independence in August 1991.[25] The European Community adopted a Declaration on 27 August 1991 welcoming 'the restoration of the sovereignty and independence of the Baltic states which they lost in 1941'.[26] The United States recognised the restoration of the independence of the Baltic states on 4 September 1991.[27] The implication of this internationally accepted restoration of independence would appear to be that these states do not constitute successor states to the former USSR and would therefore be

[20] Ibid., p. 151.

[21] For example, the Minsk Agreement signed by Russia, Belarus and Ukraine stated that the USSR 'as a subject of international law no longer existed', while the Alma Ata Declaration, signed by all of the former Soviet Republics except for Georgia (which acceded in 1993) and the Baltic states, stated that 'with the establishment of the Commonwealth of Independent States, the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics ceases to exist', ibid., pp. 147–9.

[22] See e.g. the views expressed by the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs, UKMIL, 63 BYIL, 1992, pp. 639 and 652–5, and the comments by an official of the FCO submitted to the Outer House of the Court of Session in Scotland in Coreck Maritime GmbH v. Sevrybokholodflot, UKMIL, 64 BYIL, 1993, p. 636. As to French practice recognising Russia as the continuation of the USSR, see AFDI, 1993, p. 1038. See also L. Henkin, R. C. Pugh, O. Schachter and H. Smit, International Law: Cases and Materials, 3rd edn, St Paul, 1993, p. 539. Note that there is a distinction between the issue of continuity or succession to membership of international organisations and continuity or succession generally. However, the nature and importance of the UN is such that the question of membership of that organisation is strong evidence of continuity generally.

[23] For example the USA: see Oppenheim's International Law, p. 193. As to French practice, see AFDI, 1993, p. 1038 and Gerbaud v. Meden 18 ILR, p. 288.

[24] See, for example, the UK: see A/S Tallinna Laevauhisus v. Tallinna Shipping Co. (The Vapper) (1946) 79 LL. R 245 and the statement of the Secretary of State for the Foreign and Commonwealth Office on 16 January 1991, 183 HC Deb., col. 853.

[25] See Müllerson, International Law, pp. 119–20.

[26] See UKMIL, 62 BYIL, 1991, p. 558.

[27] See Müllerson, International Law, p. 121.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

free of such rights and obligations as would be consequential upon such succession.[28]

In contrast to this situation, the issue of Yugoslavia has been more complicated and tragic. The collapse of the Socialist Federal Republic of Yugoslavia (the SFRY) took place over several months[29] as the various constituent republics proclaimed independence.[30] The process was regarded as having been completed in the view of the Arbitration Commission on Yugoslavia[31] by the time of its Opinion No. 8 issued on 4 July 1992.[32] The Commission noted that a referendum had been held in Bosnia and Herzegovina in February and March 1992 producing a majority in favour of independence, while Serbia and Montenegro had a established 'a new state, the "Federal Republic of Yugoslavia"' on 27 April 1992. The Commission noted that the common federal bodies of the SFRY had ceased to function, while Slovenia, Croatia and Bosnia had been recognised by the member states of the European Community and other states and had been admitted to membership of the UN.[33] The conclusion was that the former SFRY had ceased to exist.[34] This was particularly reaffirmed in Opinion No. 10.[35]

Nevertheless, the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia (Serbia and Montenegro) continued to maintain that it constituted not a new state, but the continuation of the former SFRY. This claim was opposed by the other former republics of the SFRY[36] and by the international community.[37]

[28] See Shaw, 'State Succession Revisited', pp. 56 ff.

[29] See generally M. Weller, 'The International Response to the Dissolution of the Socialist Federal Republic of Yugoslavia', 86 AJIL, 1992, p. 569; Y. Blum, 'UN Membership of the "New" Yugoslavia: Continuity or Break ?', 86 AJIL, 1992, p. 830, and Müllerson, International Law, pp. 125 ff.

[30] Slovenia and Croatia on 25 June 1991 (postponed for three months) and Macedonia on 17 September 1991. Bosnia and Herzegovina adopted a resolution on sovereignty on 14 October 1991. The view taken at this point by Opinion No. 1 issued by the Arbitration Commission, established by the Conference on Yugoslavia convened by the European Community on 17 August 1991, was that 'the Socialist Federal Republic of Yugoslavia was in process of dissolution', 92 ILR, p. 166. See also M. Craven, 'The EC Arbitration Commission on Yugoslavia', 66 BYIL, 1995, p. 333.

[31] Which consisted of five of the Presidents of Constitutional Courts in EC countries, chaired by M. Badinter.

[32] 92 ILR, p. 199.

[33] On 22 May 1992: see General Assembly resolutions, 46/236; 46/237 and 46/238. Note that the 'Former Yugoslav Republic of Macedonia' was admitted to the UN on 8 April 1993: see Security Council resolution 817 (1993).

[34] 92 ILR, p. 202. See also Opinion No. 9, ibid., p. 203.

[35] Ibid., p. 206.

[36] See e.g. E/CN.4/1995/121 and E/CN.4/1995/122.

[37] Note, for example, that both the International Monetary Fund (on 15 December 1992) and the World Bank (on 25 February 1993) found that the former Yugoslavia had ceased

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

The Security Council, for example, in resolution 777 (1992) declared that 'the state formerly known as the Socialist Federal Republic of Yugoslavia has ceased to exist' and that 'the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia (Serbia and Montenegro) cannot continue automatically the membership of the former Socialist Federal Republic of Yugoslavia in the United Nations'.[38] However, the Yugoslav position changed in 2000 and it requested admission to the UN as a new member.[39] The question as to the legal status of Yugoslavia as between 1992 and 2000 remained a source of some controversy, since its admission to the UN in 2000 could not operate retroactively. The International Court in 2003 described this situation as sui generis and fraught with legal difficulties,[40] but in its judgment in the series of cases brought by Yugoslavia against NATO members following the Kosovo conflict in 1999, the Court concluded that Yugoslavia had been a a member of the UN (and thus a party to the Statute of the Court) from 1 November 2000 and that the sui generis status of that state could not have amounted to membership of the UN.[41] Accordingly, while in 1996 the Court decided that Yugoslavia could appear before it in the Genocide Convention (Bosnia v. Serbia) case, it held in 2003 that the situation as to Yugoslavia's status was sui generis and not without legal difficulty but finally decided in 2004 that Yugoslavia could not bring an action against NATO states as it had not been a member of the UN and thus a party to the Statute in 1999.[42] In its decision on the merits in the Genocide Convention case in 2007, the Court noted that its decision of 1996 constituted res judicata and could not be re-opened in the light of its subsequent rulings.[43]

State succession also covers the situation of unification. One method of unification is by the creation of a totally new state, such as the merger of the Yemen Arab Republic and the People's Democratic Republic of to exist: see P. R. Williams, 'State Succession and the International Financial Institutions', 43 ICLQ, 1994, pp. 776, 802–3.

[38] See also Security Council resolution 757 (1992) and General Assembly resolution 47/1. See also the letter dated 29 September 1992 from the UN Legal Counsel carefully analysing the legal situation in terms of representation, A/47/485, Annex and the Genocide Convention case, ICJ Reports, 1993, pp. 3, 13–14; 95 ILR, pp. 1, 28–9.

[39] It was so admitted on 1 November 2000: see General Assembly resolution 55/12. On 4 February 2003, the name of the country was officially changed from the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia to Serbia and Montenegro and thence to Serbia upon the secession of Montenegro on 28 June 2006: see General Assembly resolution 60/264. See also Crawford, Creation of States, pp. 707 ff.

[40] See Application for Revision of the Judgment of 11 July 1996, ICJ Reports, 2003, pp. 7, 31.

[41] Serbia and Montenegro v. UK, ICJ Reports, 2004, pp. 1307, 1335 ff.

[42] See the critical comments on this 'change of position' by the Court by seven judges in their joint declaration, ibid, pp. 1353, 1355–7.

[43] ICJ Reports, 2007, paras. 105 ff.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

Yemen. Under the agreement between the two states of 22 April 1990 the establishment of the Republic of Yemen was accomplished by way of a merger of the two existing states into a new entity with a new name.[44] Unification may also be achieved by the absorption of one state by another in circumstances where the former simply disappears and the latter continues, albeit with increased territory and population. Such was the case with Germany.

Following the conclusion of the Second World War, Germany was divided into the US, USSR, UK and French zones of occupation and a special Berlin area not forming part of any zone.[45] Supreme authority was exercised initially by the Commanders-in-Chief of the Armed Forces of the Four Allied Powers[46] and subsequently by the three Allied High Commissioners in Bonn, with parallel developments occurring in the Soviet zone. The Convention on Relations between the Three Powers and the Federal Republic of Germany (FRG), which came into force in 1955, terminated the occupation regime and abolished the Allied High Commission. The Three Allied Powers retained, however, their rights and obligations with regard to Berlin[47] and relating to 'Germany as a whole, including the reunification of Germany and a peace settlement'.[48] Recognition of the German Democratic Republic (GDR) was on the same basis, i.e. as a sovereign state having full authority over internal and external affairs subject to the rights and responsibilities of the Four Powers in respect of Berlin and Germany as a whole.[49] Accordingly, it was accepted that in some sense Germany as a whole continued to exist as a state in international law.[50] The question of the relationship of the two German states to each other and with respect to the pre-1945 German state has occasioned considerable interest [44] Article 1 of the Agreement declared that 'there shall be established between the State of the Yemen Arab Republic and the State of the People's Democratic Republic of Yemen . . . a full and complete union, based on a merger, in which the international personality of each of them shall be integrated in a single international person called "the Republic of Yemen"': see 30 ILM, 1991, p. 820.

[45] See e.g. the Fourth Report of the Foreign Affairs Committee, Session 1989–90, June 1990. Note that part of the Soviet zone was placed under Soviet administration (the city of Königsberg, now Kaliningrad and the surrounding area) and the territory of Germany east of the Oder–Neisse line was placed under Polish administration.

[46] Article 2 of the Agreement on Control Machinery in Germany of 14 November 1944, as amended by the Agreement of 1 May 1945.

[47] See, in particular, I. Hendry and M. Wood, The Legal Status of Berlin, Cambridge, 1987. See also Cmd 8571, 1952 and the Quadripartite Agreement on Berlin, Cmnd 5135, 1971.

[48] Article 2 of the Relations Convention. Parallel developments took place in the Soviet zone. Note the USSR–German Democratic Republic Treaty of 1955.

[49] See the Fourth Report, p. 2. [50] Ibid., p. 3.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

and generated no little complexity, not least because the Federal German Republic always claimed to be the successor of the pre-1945 Germany.[51]

On 18 May 1990 a treaty between the two German states was signed establishing a Monetary, Economic and Social Union. In essence this integrated the GDR into the FRG economic system, with the Deutsche Mark becoming legal tender in the GDR and with the Bundesbank becoming the central bank for the GDR as well as for the FRG.[52] On 31 August 1990, a second treaty was signed between the two German states which provided for unification on 3 October 1990 by the accession of the GDR under article 23 of the Basic Law of the Federal Republic. On 12 September 1990 the Treaty on the Final Settlement With Respect to Germany was signed by the two German states and the Four Allied Powers.[53] This latter agreement settled definitively matters arising out of the Second World War. It confirmed the borders of unified Germany as those of the FRG and the GDR (i.e. the post-war Oder–Neisse frontier with Poland), provided for a reduction in the armed forces of Germany and for the withdrawal of Soviet forces from the territory of the GDR. The Four Allied Powers terminated their rights and responsibilities regarding Berlin and Germany as a whole so that the united Germany has full sovereignty over its internal and external affairs.[54]

The Treaty between the Federal Republic of Germany and the German Democratic Republic of 31 August 1990 clearly provided that the latter was simply assimilated into the former. Article 1 of the Treaty stipulated that, 'upon the accession of the German Democratic Republic to the Federal Republic of Germany in accordance with article 23 of the Basic Law[55] taking effect on 3 October 1990, the Länder of Brandenburg, Mecklenburg-Western Pomerania, Saxony, Saxony-Anhalt and Thuringia[56] shall become Länder of the Federal Republic of Germany'. This approach, whereby [51] See e.g. Brownlie, Principles, pp. 78–9; M. Whiteman, Digest of International Law, Washington, 1963, vol. I, pp. 332–8, and F. A. Mann, 'Germany's Present Legal Status Revisited', 16 ICLQ, 1967, p. 760. See also the decision of the Federal Constitutional Court of the Federal Republic of Germany in Re Treaty on the Basis of Relations Between the Federal Republic of Germany and the German Democratic Republic 1972, 78 ILR, p. 149.

[52] See 29 ILM, 1990, p. 1108. [53] See 29 ILM, 1990, p. 1186.

[54] Note that by the Declaration of 1 October 1990, the Allied Powers suspended all rights and responsibilities relating to Berlin and to Germany as a whole upon the unification of Germany, pending the entry into force of the Treaty on the Final Settlement: see Annex 2 of the Observations by the Government to the Fourth Report, October 1990, Cm 1246.

[55] This provided that the Basic Law was to apply in Greater Berlin and specified Länder (forming the Federal Republic of Germany), while 'in other parts of Germany it shall be put into force on their accession'. This method had been used to achieve the accession of the Saarland in 1956.

[56] I.e. the constituent provinces of the German Democratic Republic.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

unified Germany came about by a process of absorption of the constituent provinces of the former German Democratic Republic into the existing Federal Republic of Germany by way of the extension of the constitution of the latter, is reinforced by other provisions in the Unification Treaty. Article 7, for example, provided that the financial system of the FRG 'shall be extended to the territory specified in article 3' (i.e. the Länder of the former GDR), while article 8 declared that 'upon the accession taking effect, federal law shall enter into force in the territory specified in article 3'.[57] International practice also demonstrates acceptance of this approach.[58] No state objected to this characterisation of the process.[59] In other words, the view taken by the parties directly concerned and accepted by the international community demonstrates acceptance of the unification as one of the continuity of the Federal Republic of Germany and the disappearance or extinction of the German Democratic Republic.

Succession to treaties[60]

The importance of treaties within the international legal system requires no repetition.[61] They constitute the means by which a variety of legal obligations are imposed or rights conferred upon states in a wide range of matters from the significant to the mundane. Treaties are founded upon the pre-existing and indispensable norm of pacta sunt servanda or the [57] Note also that under article 11, treaties entered into by the Federal Republic of Germany would continue and extend to the Länder of the former German Democratic Republic, while under article 12, the question of the continuation, amendment or expiry of treaties entered into by the former German Democratic Republic was to be discussed individually with contracting parties: see below, p. 971.

[58] Such as the European Community. See, for example, GATT document L/6759 of 31 October 1990 in which the Commission of the European Community stated that Germany had become united by way of the accession of the GDR to the FRG. See generally T. Oeter, 'German Unification and State Succession', 51 ZaöRV, 1991, p. 349; J. Frowein, 'Germany Reunited', ibid., p. 333, and R. W. Piotrowicz and S. K. N. Blay, The Unification of Germany in International and Domestic Law, Amsterdam, 1997. See also UK Foreign Office affidavit, UKMIL, 68 BYIL, 1997, p. 520.

[59] See also Oppenheim's International Law, p. 210.

[60] Note particularly the work of the International Law Commission on this topic: see Yearbook of the International Law Commission, 1974, vol. II, part 1, pp. 157 ff., and the five Reports of Sir Humphrey Waldock (ibid., 1968, vol. II, p. 88; 1969, vol. II, p. 45; 1970, vol. II, p. 25; 1971, vol. II, part 1, p. 143 and 1972, vol. II, p. 1) and the Report of Sir Francis Vallat (ibid., 1974, vol. II, part 1, p. 1). See also the International Law Association, The Effect of Independence on Treaties, London, 1965; A. Aust, Modern Treaty Law and Practice, 2nd edn, Cambridge, 2007, chapter 21, and M. Craven, The Decolonisation of International Law: State Succession and the Law of Treaties, Oxford, 2007.

[61] See above, chapter 16.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

acceptance of treaty commitments as binding. Treaties may fall within the following categories: multilateral treaties, including the specific category of treaties concerning international human rights; treaties concerned with territorial definition and regimes; bilateral treaties; and treaties that are treated as 'political' in the circumstances.

The rules concerning succession to treaties are those of customary international law together with the Vienna Convention on Succession of States in Respect of Treaties, 1978, which came into force in 1996 and which applies with regard to a succession taking place after that date.[62]

As far as devolution agreements are concerned, article 8 of the Convention provides that such agreements of themselves cannot affect third states and this reaffirms an accepted principle, while article 9, dealing with unilateral declarations, emphasises that such a declaration by the successor state alone cannot of itself affect the rights and obligations of the state and third states. In other words, it would appear, the consent of the other parties to the treaties in question or an agreement with the predecessor state with regard to bilateral issues is required.

Categories of treaties: territorial, political and other treaties

Treaties may for succession purposes be generally divided into three categories. The first relates to territorially grounded treaties, under which rights or obligations are imposed directly upon identifiable territorial units. The prime example of these are agreements relating to territorial definition. Waldock, in his first Report on Succession of States and Governments in Respect of Treaties in 1968, declared that 'the weight both of opinion and practice seems clearly to be in favour of the view that boundaries established by treaties remain untouched by the mere fact of a succession. The opinion of jurists seems, indeed, to be unanimous on the point . . . [and] State practice in favour of the continuance in force of boundaries established by treaty appears to be such as to justify the conclusion that a general rule of international law exists to that effect',[63] while Bedjaoui has noted that 'in principle the territory devolves upon the successor State on the basis of the pre-existing boundaries'.[64]

For reasons relating to the maintenance of international stability, this approach has been clearly supported by state practice. The Latin American concept of uti possidetis juris, whereby the administrative divisions of the

[62] See article 7.
[63] Yearbook of the International Law Commission, 1968, vol. II, pp. 92–3.
[64] Ibid., p. 112.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

former Spanish empire were to constitute the boundaries of the newly independent states in South America in the first third of the nineteenth century was the first internationally accepted expression of this approach.[65] It was echoed in US practice[66] and explicitly laid down in resolution 16 of the meeting of Heads of State and Government of the Organisation of African Unity in 1964, by which all member states pledged themselves to respect colonial borders.[67] The principle of succession to colonial borders was underlined by the International Court in the Burkina Faso/Mali case.[68] The extension of the principle of uti possidetis from decolonisation to the creation of new states out of existing independent states is supported by international practice, taking effect as the transformation of administrative boundaries into international boundaries generally.[69] Of course, much will depend upon the particular situation, including the claims of the states concerned and the attitude adopted by third states and international organisations, particularly the United Nations. This principle regarding the continuity of borders in the absence of consent to the contrary is reinforced by other principles of international law, such as the provision enshrined in article 62(2) of the Vienna Convention on the Law

[65] See, for example, the Colombia–Venezuela arbitral award, 1 RIAA, pp. 223, 228 and the Beagle Channel award, 52 ILR, p. 93. See also A. O. Cukwurah, The Settlement of Boundary Disputes in International Law, Manchester, 1967, p. 114; O'Connell, State Succession, vol. II, pp. 273 ff., and P. De La Pradelle, La Frontière, Paris, 1928, pp. 86–7.

[66] See the view of the US Secretary of State in 1856 that the US regarded it 'as an established principle of the public law and of international right that when a European colony in America becomes independent it succeeds to the territorial limits of the colony as it stood in the hands of the present country', Manning's Diplomatic Correspondence, vol. III (Great Britain), doc. 2767, cited in Cukwurah, Settlement, p. 106.

[67] See, for example, M. N. Shaw, Title to Territory in Africa: International Legal Issues, Oxford, 1986, pp. 185–7, and other works cited in chapter 10, p. 525.

[68] ICJ Reports, 1986, pp. 554, 565; 80 ILR, pp. 440, 469–70. See also the Arbitration Commission on Yugoslavia, which noted in Opinion No. 3 with respect to the status of the former internal boundaries between Serbia on the one hand and Croatia and Bosnia and Herzegovina on the other, that 'except where otherwise agreed, the former boundaries become frontiers protected by international law. This conclusion follows from the principle of respect for the territorial status quo and in particular, from the principle of uti possidetis. Uti possidetis . . . is today recognised as a general principle', 92 ILR, pp. 170, 171.

[69] See also article 5 of the Minsk Agreement establishing the Commonwealth of Independent States of 8 December 1991 and the Alma Ata Declaration of 21 December 1991, which reaffirmed the territorial integrity of the former Republics of the USSR. Note also that under the Treaty on the General Delimitation of the Common State Frontiers of 29 October 1992, the boundary between the two new states of the Czech Republic and Slovakia, emerging out of Czechoslovakia on 1 January 1993, was to be that of the administrative border existing between the Czech and Slovak parts of the former state. See further above, chapter 10, p. 528.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

of Treaties, which stipulates that a fundamental change in circumstances may not be invoked as a ground for terminating or withdrawing from a treaty that establishes a boundary.[70] In addition, article 11 of the Vienna Convention on Succession to Treaties, although in terminology which is cautious and negative, specifies that

> A succession of States does not as such affect:
>
> (a) a boundary established by treaty; or > (b) obligations and rights established by a treaty and relating to the regime of a boundary.

The International Court dealt with succession to boundary treaties generally in the Libya/Chad case, where it was declared that 'once agreed, the boundary stands, for any other approach would vitiate the fundamental principle of the stability of boundaries, the importance of which has been repeatedly emphasised by the Court'.[71] More particularly, the Court emphasised that 'a boundary established by treaty thus achieves a permanence which the treaty itself does not necessarily enjoy. The treaty can cease to be in force without in any way affecting the continuance of the boundary . . . when a boundary has been the subject of agreement, the continued existence of that boundary is not dependent upon the continuing life of the treaty under which the boundary is agreed.'[72] It is particularly important to underline that the succession takes place, therefore, not as such to the boundary treaty but rather to the boundary as established by the treaty. The Tribunal in the Eritrea/Yemen case emphasised that boundary and territorial treaties made between two parties constituted a special category of treaties representing a 'legal reality which necessarily impinges upon third states, because they have effect erga omnes'.[73]

Territorially grounded treaties extend somewhat beyond the establishment of boundaries into the more controversial area of agreements creating other territorial regimes, such agreements being termed 'localised' or 'real' or 'dispositive'.[74] Examples of such arrangements might include demilitarised zones, rights of transit, port facilities and other servitudes generally.[75] Despite some reservations by members of the [70] See above, chapter 16, p. 950. [71] ICJ Reports, 1994, pp. 6, 37; 100 ILR, pp. 1, 36.

[72] Ibid. [73] 114 ILR, pp. 1, 48.
[74] See O'Connell, State Succession, vol. II, pp. 231 ff. See also Udokang, Succession, pp. 327 ff.
[75] See Shaw, Title to Territory, pp. 244–8. See also the Free Zones case, PCIJ, Series A/B, No. 46, 1932, p. 145; 6 AD, pp. 362, 364 and the Aaland Islands case, LNOJ, Sp. Supp. No. 3, 1920, p. 18. See above, chapter 10, p. 538, and Yearbook of the ILC, 1974, vol. II, pp. 157 and 196 ff. Note that, by article 12(3), the provisions of article 12 do not apply to treaties

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

International Law Commission[76] and governments,[77] article 12 of the Vienna Convention provides that a succession of states does not as such affect obligations or rights relating to the use of any territory or to restrictions upon its use established by a treaty for the benefit of any foreign state, group of states or all states and considered as attaching to the territory in question. The International Court declared that article 12 reflected a rule of customary law in addressing the issue of territorial regimes in the Gabčíkovo–Nagymaros Project case and confirmed that treaties concerning water rights or navigation on rivers constituted territorial treaties.[78] It also noted that since the 1977 treaty in question in that case between Hungary and Czechoslovakia established inter alia the navigational regime for an important section of an international waterway, a territorial regime within the meaning of article 12 was created.[79]

Political or 'personal' treaties establish rights or obligations deemed to be particularly linked to the regime in power in the territory in question and to its political orientation. Examples of such treaties would include treaties of alliance or friendship or neutrality.[80] Such treaties do not bind successor states for they are seen as exceptionally closely tied to the nature of the state which has ceased to exist. However, it is not at all clear what the outer limits are to the concept of political treaties and difficulties over definitional problems do exist. Apart from the categories of territorial and political treaties, where succession rules in general are clear, other treaties cannot be so easily defined or categorised for succession purposes and must be analysed separately.

Succession to treaties generally

Practice seems to suggest 'a tendency'[81] or 'a general inclination'[82] to succession to 'some categories of multilateral treaties'[83] or to 'certain providing for the establishment of foreign military bases on the territory concerned. See further Brownlie, Principles, pp. 633 ff., and O'Connell, State Succession, vol. II, pp. 12–23 and 231 ff.

[76] See, for example, Yearbook of the ILC, 1974, vol. I, pp. 206–7.

[77] See, for example, UN Conference on Succession of States in Respect of Treaties, 1977, Comments of Governments (A/Conf.80/5), pp. 145, 153, 161, 167, 170, 171 and 173.

[78] ICJ Reports, 1997, pp. 7, 72; 116 ILR, p. 1.

[79] Ibid., pp. 71–2. See also J. Klabbers, 'Cat on a Hot Tin Roof: The World Court, State Succession and the Gabčíkovo–Nagymaros case', 11 Leiden Journal of International Law, 1998, p. 345.

[80] See, for example, O'Connell, State Succession, vol. II, pp. 2, 80 and 136, and Oppenheim's International Law, p. 211.

[81] O'Connell, State Succession, vol. II, p. 212.

[82] Udokang, Succession, p. 225.

[83] O'Connell, State Succession, vol. II, p. 213.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

multilateral conventions'.[84] However, this 'modern-classical' approach is difficult to sustain as a general rule of comprehensive applicability.[85] One simply has to examine particular factual situations, take note of the claims made by the relevant states and mark the reactions of third states. In the case of bilateral treaties, the starting-point is from a rather different perspective. In such cases, the importance of the individual contractual party is more evident, since only two states are involved and the treaty is thus more clearly reciprocal in nature. Accordingly, the presumption is one of non-succession, depending upon all the particular circumstances of the case. Practice with regard to the US, Panama, Belgium and Finland supports the 'clean slate' approach.[86]

Absorption and merger

Where one state is absorbed by another and no new state is created (such as the 1990 accession to the Federal Republic of Germany of the Länder of the German Democratic Republic), the former becomes extinct whereas the latter simply continues albeit in an enlarged form. The basic situation is that the treaties of the former, certainly in so far as they may be deemed 'political',[87] die with the state concerned,[88] although territorial treaties defining the boundaries of the entity absorbed will continue to define such boundaries. Other treaties are also likely to be regarded as at an end.[89] However, treaties of the absorbing state continue and will extend to the territory of the extinguished state. These principles are, of course, subject to contrary intention expressed by the parties in question. For example, in the case of German unification, article 11 coupled with Annex I of the Unification Treaty, 1990 excluded from the extension of treaties of the Federal Republic of Germany to the territory of the former German Democratic Republic a series of treaties dealing primarily with NATO matters.

Article 31(1) of the Vienna Convention on Succession to Treaties provides that where two or more states unite and form one successor state, treaties continue in force unless the successor state and the other state party or states parties otherwise agree or it appears that this would be incompatible with the object and purpose of the treaty or would radically

[84] Udokang, Succession, p. 225.

[85] But see Jenks' view that multilateral law-making treaties devolve upon successor states, 'State Succession in Respect of Law-making Treaties', 29 BYIL, 1952, pp. 105, 108–10.

[86] See, for example, Udokang, Succession, pp. 412–15.

[87] See here, for example, Oppenheim's International Law, p. 211; Oeter, 'German Unification', p. 363, and Koskenniemi and Lehto, 'La Succession', p. 203.

[88] Oppenheim's International Law, p. 211.

[89] Ibid., pp. 212–13.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

change the conditions for its operation. Article 31(2) provides that such treaties would apply only in respect of the part of the territory of the successor state in respect of which the treaty was in force at the date of the succession of states. This is so unless the successor state makes a notification that the multilateral treaty in question shall apply in respect of its entire territory[90] or, if the multilateral treaty in question is one in which by virtue either of its terms or by reason of the limited number of participants and its object and purpose the participation of any other state must be considered as requiring the consent of all the parties,[91] the successor state and the other states parties otherwise agree. This general principle would apply also in the case of a bilateral treaty, unless the successor state and the other state party otherwise agree.[92]

While these provisions bear some logic with regard to the situation where two states unite to form a new third state,[93] they do not really take into account the special circumstances of unification where one state simply takes over another state in circumstances where the latter is extinguished. In these situations, the model provided by German unification appears to be fully consistent with international law and of value as a precedent. Article 11 of the Unification Treaty of 31 August 1990 provided that all international treaties and agreements to which the FRG was a contracting party were to retain their validity and that the rights and obligations arising therefrom would apply also to the territory of the GDR.[94] Article 12 provided that international treaties of the GDR were to be discussed with the parties concerned with a view to regulating or confirming their continued application, adjustment or expiry, taking into account protection of confidence, the interests of the state concerned, the [90] Unless it appears from the treaty or is otherwise established that the application of the treaty in respect of the entire territory of the successor state would be incompatible with the object and purpose of the treaty or would radically change the conditions for its operation (article 31(3)).

[91] Article 17(3).

[92] See the examples of the union of Egypt and Syria to form the United Arab Republic between 1958 and 1961 and the union of Tanganyika and Zanzibar in 1964, where the treaties of the component territories continued in force within those territorial limits: see O'Connell, State Succession, vol. II, pp. 71–8. The article 31 situation has to be distinguished from the situation involving a 'newly independent state', see article 29 and below, p. 977, and from the article 15 situation, where part of the territory of one state is transferred to another state, below, p. 973.

[93] But see above, pp. 967 ff., with regard to boundary treaties and below, p. 981, regarding human rights treaties.

[94] However, as noted, Annex I to the Treaty provided that certain listed treaties are not to apply to the territory of the former GDR. These treaties relate in essence to NATO activities.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

treaty obligations of the FRG as well as the principles of a free, democratic order governed by the rule of law, and respecting the competence of the European Communities. The united Germany would then determine its position after such consultations. It was also stipulated that should the united Germany intend to accede to international organisations or other multilateral treaties of which the GDR, but not the FRG, was a member, agreement was to be reached with the respective contracting parties and the European Communities, where the competence of the latter was affected. The situation thus differs from the scenario envisaged in article 31 of the 1978 treaty.[95]

In the case of mergers to form a new third state, the formulation in article 31 is more relevant and acceptable. Practice appears to support that approach. For example, in the cases of both the Egypt–Syria merger to form the United Arab Republic in 1958[96] and the union of Tanganyika and Zanzibar to form Tanzania in 1964,[97] the continuation of treaties in the territories to which they had applied before the respective mergers was stipulated.[98]

Cession of territory from one state to another

When part of the territory of one state becomes part of the territory of another state, the general rule is that the treaties of the former cease to apply to the territory while the treaties of the latter extend to the territory. Article 15 of the Vienna Convention on Succession of States to Treaties, dealing with this 'moving-frontiers' rule,[99] provides for this, with the proviso that where it appears from the treaty concerned or is otherwise established that the application of the treaty to the territory would be incompatible with the object and purpose of the treaty or would radically change the condition for its operation, this extension should not happen. This is basically consistent with state practice. When, for example, the US annexed Hawaii in 1898, its treaties were extended to the islands and [95] It should also be noted that the Third US Restatement of Foreign Relations Law, Washington, 1987, p. 108, provides that 'when a state is absorbed by another state, the international agreements of the absorbed state are terminated and the international agreements of the absorbing state become applicable to the territory of the absorbed state'.

[96] See O'Connell, State Succession, vol. II, pp. 71 ff., and D. Cottran, 'Some Legal Aspects of the Formation of the United Arab Republic and the United Arab States', 8 ICLQ, 1959, p. 346.

[97] See O'Connell, State Succession, vol. II, pp. 77 ff.

[98] See also Ltd Partnership Z v. High Court (Obergericht) of the Canton of Thurgau, Federal Supreme Court, Insolvency Chamber, 15 June 2005, partly published as BGE 131 III 448.

[99] Yearbook of the ILC, 1974, vol. II, p. 208.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

Belgium was informed that US–Belgium commercial agreements were thenceforth to be applied to Hawaii also.[100] Similarly it was held that after 1919, German treaties would not apply to Alsace-Lorraine, while French treaties would thereafter be extended to that territory.[101] Article 15 would therefore seem to reiterate existing custom,[102] although there have been indications to the contrary in the past.[103]

Secession from an existing state to form a new state or states

The factual situations out of which a separation or dismemberment takes place are many and varied. They range from a break-up of a previously created entity into its previous constituent elements, as in the 1961 dissolution of the United Arab Republic into the pre-1958 states of Egypt and Syria or the dissolution of the Federation of Mali, to the complete fragmenting of a state into a variety of successors not being co-terminous with previous territorial units, such as the demise of Austria-Hungary in 1919.[104] Where there is a separation or secession from an independent state which continues, in order to create a new state, the former continues as a state, albeit territorially reduced, with its international rights and obligations intact.[105] With regard to the seceding territory itself, the leading view appears to be that the newly created state will commence international life free from the treaty rights and obligations applicable to its former sovereign.[106] Reasons for this include the important point that it is difficult to maintain as a rule of general application that states that have not signed particular treaties are bound by them.

State practice has essentially reinforced the basic proposition. When Belgium seceded from the Netherlands in 1830, it was deemed to start [100] See e.g. O'Connell, State Succession, vol. II, pp. 377–8.

[101] Ibid., p. 379.
[102] The exception to the 'moving treaty-frontiers' rule reflects the concept that 'political treaties' would not pass, ibid., p. 25. See further above, p. 964, with regard to the reunification of Germany in 1990. See also article IX of Annex 1 of the Anglo-Chinese Agreement, 1984 on Hong Kong, below, p. 1008.
[103] See, for example, O'Connell, State Succession, vol. II, pp. 374 ff.
[104] Ibid., chapter 10.
[105] Save, of course, with regard to those that relate solely to the seceding territory.
[106] See O'Connell, State Succession, vol. II, pp. 88 ff., and Oppenheim's International Law, p. 222. See also the Third US Restatement of Foreign Relations Law, p. 108, which provides that 'When part of a state becomes a new state, the new state does not succeed to the international agreements to which the predecessor state was party, unless, expressly or by implication, it accepts such agreements and the other party or parties thereto agree or acquiesce.'

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

international life with 'a clean slate' and the same approach was adopted with regard to the secession of Cuba from Spain in 1898 and that of Panama from Colombia in 1903. Similarly, when Finland seceded from the Russian Empire after the First World War, the view taken by the UK and the US was that Finland was not bound by the existing Russian treaties dealing with the territory.[107]

While essentially this is the position taken by the Vienna Convention on Succession to Treaties with regard to decolonised territories (discussed in the following subsection), article 34 provides that 'any treaty in force at the date of the succession of states in respect of the entire territory of the predecessor state continues in force in respect of each successor state so formed'. Any treaty which applied only to part of the territory of the predecessor state which has become a successor state will continue in force in respect of the latter only. These provisions will not apply if the states concerned otherwise agree or if it appears from the treaty or is otherwise established that the application of the treaty in respect of the successor state would be incompatible with the object and purpose of the treaty or would radically change the conditions for its operation.[108]

As far as the predecessor state is concerned in such a situation (assuming the predecessor state remains in existence), article 35 provides that existing treaties remain in force after the succession in respect of the remaining territory, unless the parties otherwise agree or it is established that the treaty related only to the territory which has separated from the predecessor state or it appears from the treaty or is otherwise established that the application of the treaty in respect of the predecessor state would be incompatible with the object and purpose of the treaty or would radically change the conditions for its operation.

The approach in the Vienna Convention was adopted on the basis of the International Law Commission draft which had taken the position that 'in modern international law having regard to the need for the maintenance of the system of multilateral treaties and of the stability of treaty relationships, as a general rule the principle of de jure continuity should apply'.[109] This may have been an attempt to distinguish decolonised territories (termed 'newly independent states' in the Convention) from other [107] Yearbook of the International Law Commission, 1974, vol. II, part 1, p. 263. See also O'Connell, State Succession, vol. II, pp. 96–100, and Oppenheim's International Law, p. 222. See also Yearbook of the ILC, 1974, vol. II, part 1, pp. 265–6.

[108] See Yearbook of the ILC, 1974, vol. II, pp. 260 ff.

[109] Yearbook of the ILC, 1974, vol. II, part 1, p. 169. See also UKMIL, 69 BYIL, 1998, p. 482.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

examples of independence, but it constitutes a rather different approach from the traditional one and the formulation in article 34 cannot be taken as necessarily reflective of customary law. Much will depend upon the views of the states concerned.

What can be said is that the requirements of international stability in certain areas in particular will stimulate states generally to encourage an approach of succession to multilateral obligations by the newly independent secessionist states. The Guidelines on Recognition of New States in Eastern Europe and the Soviet Union adopted by the European Community on 16 December 1991 certainly noted that the common position of EC member states on recognition required inter alia 'acceptance of all relevant commitments with regard to disarmament and nuclear non-proliferation as well as to security and regional stability'.[110] But, of course, conditions attached to the essentially political process of recognition are not the same as accepting consequences arising out of succession itself. However, there were certainly indications that the United States was taking the position that Russia and the non-Baltic successor states to the USSR should be regarded as bound by some at least of the Soviet treaties.[111] This approach was clearly developed in view of the political need to ensure continuity with regard to arms control agreements and mechanisms.[112] Of course, the impact of Russia constituting the continuance of the Soviet Union is to maintain in force for the former the obligations of the latter, but there was concern about the control of the nuclear and other weapons subject to treaty regulation which were now situated in the successor states to the USSR. The signing of agreements with the major successor states appears to have mitigated the strength of this particular approach. Indeed, it should be noted that separate agreements with the nuclear successor states of Ukraine, Belarus and Kazakhstan were apparently required in order to ensure the compliance of those states with regard to the arms control treaties binding upon the Soviet Union,[113] although these states

[110] See 92 ILR, pp. 173–4.

[111] See Müllerson, 'Continuity'. See also T. Love, 'International Agreement Obligations after the Soviet Union's Break-up: Current United States Practice and its Consistency with International Law', 26 Vanderbilt Journal of Transnational Law, 1993, pp. 373, 396, who notes that the US practice of arguing that treaties are binding upon the republics (apart from the special case of Russia) is inconsistent with the views expressed in the US Restatement, ibid., p. 410. The views of the US Restatement are referred to above, p. 974, note 106.

[112] Müllerson, 'Continuity', at pp. 398–401.

[113] See 'US–CIS Protocol to START Treaty', 86 AJIL, 1992, p. 799. See also the Agreement on Joint Measures with Respect to Nuclear Weapons, 31 ILM, 1992, p. 152, and Müllerson, International Law, pp. 150–2.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

had agreed generally to be bound by international obligations deriving from treaties signed by the USSR.[114] The US and Ukraine agreed by an exchange of notes on 10 May 1995 that in so far as bilateral treaties between them were concerned, article 34 of the Convention would be taken as 'a point of departure'. A treaty-by-treaty review by the two states was conducted, as a result of which it was decided that some treaties had become obsolete, others would not be applied and others, specifically listed in the Annex to the note, were to be regarded as still in force.[115]

Whether in view of the greatly increased network of multilateral treaties and the vastly enhanced interdependence of states founded and manifested upon such agreement, it is possible to say that the international community is moving towards a position of a presumption of continuity, is in reality difficult to establish. Certainly the potentially disruptive effect of the creation of new states needs to be minimised, but it is far too early to be able to declare that continuity or a presumption of continuity is now the established norm.

'Newly independent states'

The post-Second World War period saw the dismantling of the overseas European empires. Based in international legal terms upon the principle of self-determination, which was founded upon a distinction between such territories and the metropolitan authority, decolonisation produced a number of changes in the international legal system.[116] The Vienna Convention on Succession to Treaties sought to establish a special category relating to decolonised territories. These were termed 'newly independent states' and defined in article 2(1)f as successor states 'the territory of which immediately before the date of the succession of states was a dependent territory for the international relations of which the predecessor state was responsible'.[117] Article 16 laid down the general rule that such states were not bound to maintain in force or to become a party to any treaty by reason only of the fact that the treaty had been in force regarding the territory in question at the date of succession. This approach was deemed to build upon the traditional 'clean slate' principle applying to new states [114] Alma Ata Declaration, 21 December 1991, 21 ILM, 1992, pp. 148, 149.

[115] See 89 AJIL, 1995, p. 761. The note specifically excluded matters concerning succession to USA–USSR bilateral arms limitation and related agreements, with regard to which special mechanisms had been established.

[116] See above, chapter 5, p. 251.

[117] See also the Vienna Convention on Succession to State Property, Archives and Debt, 1983, article 2(1)e.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

created out of existing states, such as the United States and the Spanish American Republics when they had obtained independence.[118] This was also consistent with the view taken by the UN Secretariat in 1947 when discussing Pakistan's position in relation to the organisation, where it was noted that 'the territory which breaks off, Pakistan, will be a new state; it will not have the treaty rights and obligations of the old state'.[119]

It should be noted that the provision dealing with bilateral treaties was more vigorously worded, no doubt because the personal and reciprocal nature of such treaties is that more obvious, or in the words of the International Law Commission 'dominant', and also because, unlike the case of multilateral treaties, there is no question of the treaty coming into force between the new state and the predecessor state.[120] While state practice demonstrates some continuity in areas such as air services agreements and trade agreements, the Commission felt that this did not reflect a customary rule, as distinct from the will of the states concerned, and that the fundamental rule with regard to bilateral treaties was that their continuance in force after independence was a matter for agreement, express or tacit, between the newly independent state and the other state party which had contracted with the predecessor state.[121] Article 24 notes that a bilateral treaty in force for the territory in question is considered to be in force for the newly independent state and the other state party where they expressly so agree or by reason of their conduct they are to be considered as having so agreed.[122]

There is, of course, a distinction between a new state being obliged to become a party to a treaty binding the predecessor state and having the facility or perhaps even the right to become a party to that treaty. Practice shows that new states may benefit from a 'fast track' method of participating in treaties. For example, new states are not required to adhere to the formal mechanism of accession as if they were existing [118] See Yearbook of the ILC, 1974, vol. II, part 1, p. 211. See also, as to the theoretical basis of the 'clean slate' principle, the Separate Opinion of Judge Weeramantry, Application of the Genocide Convention (Bosnia and Herzegovina v. Yugoslavia), ICJ Reports, 1996, pp. 595, 644; 115 ILR, p. 10.

[119] Yearbook of the ILC, 1974, vol. II, part 1, p. 211.

[120] Ibid., p. 237. [121] Ibid., pp. 237–9.

[122] The above rules also apply to newly independent states (as defined in the Convention) formed from two or more territories: see article 30 (referring to articles 16–29). Where a treaty affects one or more but not all of the territories in question, there is a presumption that on succession it will apply to the newly independent state, ibid. See also Re Bottali 78 ILR, p. 105 and M v. Federal Department of Justice and Police 75 ILR, p. 107.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

non-party states[123] and article 17 of the Vienna Convention provides that a 'newly independent state' may by a notification of succession establish its status as a party to a multilateral treaty which at the date of succession was in force in respect of the territory to which the succession relates, unless it appears from the treaty or is otherwise established that the application of the treaty in respect of the newly independent state would be incompatible with the object and purpose of the treaty or would radically change the conditions of its operation. In addition, where it appears from the nature of the treaty itself that the participation of any other state would require the consent of all the parties, such consent must be forthcoming for the new state to participate.[124]

The 'clean slate' principle has also in practice been mitigated by the terms of the process by which many colonies achieved independence. A number of colonial powers, particularly the United Kingdom, adopted the practice of concluding devolution agreements by which certain treaties signed on behalf of the territory becoming independent continued to apply to the newly independent state.[125] While such agreements would be considered res inter alios with regard to third states, they were of value in establishing the appropriate framework for relations between the former colonial power and the new state. Other newly independent states adopted the practice of making unilateral declarations by which they made known their views as to treaty succession. Such unilateral declarations often took the form of specifying that treaties would continue in force for an interim period during which time they would be reviewed,[126] but they could not in themselves, of course, alter treaty relationships with third states.[127] Devices such as devolution agreements and unilateral declarations were of value, however, in mitigating the effects that an absolute 'clean slate' approach might otherwise have had.

Dissolution of states

Where an existing state comes to an end as an international person and is replaced by two or more other states, it is accepted that political treaties will not continue but that territorially grounded treaties will continue to attach

[123] See Oppenheim's International Law, p. 229.
[124] Article 17(3). See also article 27(2).
[125] See, for example, O'Connell, State Succession, vol. II, pp. 352 ff., and Yearbook of the ILC, 1974, vol. II, part 1, pp. 182–7. See also article 8 of the Vienna Convention.
[126] See, for a survey of practice, Yearbook of the ILC, 1974, vol. II, part 1, pp. 187–93.
[127] See article 9 of the Vienna Convention.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

to the territories in question now subject to new sovereign arrangements. The situation with regard to other treaties is more uncertain.[128]

State practice concerning dissolution has centred to all intents and purposes upon the dismemberment of 'unions of state', that is the ending of what had originally been a union of two international persons. Examples would include Colombia in 1829–31; Norway/Sweden in 1905; the United Arab Republic in 1960; the Mali Federation in 1960; the Federation of Rhodesia and Nyasaland in 1963[129] and the Czech and Slovak Federal Republic in 1992.[130] It is difficult to deduce clear rules of state succession from these episodes since much depended upon the expressed intentions of the states concerned. Perhaps a presumption in favour of continuity of treaties with regard to each component part may be suggested, but this is subject to expressed intention to the contrary.[131]

Article 34 of the Vienna Convention provides for treaties in force for all or part of the predecessor state to continue in force with regard to the specific territory unless the states concerned otherwise agree or it appears from the treaty or is otherwise established that the application of the treaty would be incompatible with the object and purpose of the treaty or would radically change the conditions of its operation. Whether this constitutes a rule of customary law also is unclear, but in the vast majority of situations the matter is likely to be regulated by specific agreements. Upon the dissolution of the Czech and Slovak Federal Republic, for example, on 1 January 1993, the UK took the position that, as appropriate, treaties and agreements in force to which the UK and that state were parties remained [128] See, for example, O'Connell, State Succession, vol. II, pp. 219–20.

[129] See Yearbook of the ILC, 1974, vol. II, part 1, pp. 260–3, and O'Connell, State Succession, vol. II, pp. 164 ff.

[130] This state consisted of two distinct units, the Czech Republic and the Slovak Republic, each with their own parliament. The Constitutional Law on the Dissolution of the Czech and Slovak Republic of 25 November 1992 provided for the dissolution of that state and for the establishment of the successor states of the Czech Republic and Slovakia. At the same time, the two republics issued a joint declaration informing the international community that the two successor states would succeed to all international treaties to which the predecessor state had been a party and that where necessary negotiations would take place, particularly where the impact upon the two republics differed: see J. Malenovsky, 'Problèmes Juridiques Liées à la Partition de la Tchécoslovaquie, y compris Tracé de la Frontière', AFDI, 1993, p. 305.

[131] The case of the dissolution of the Austro-Hungarian Empire in 1918 was a special case, since it could be regarded as a dissolution of the union of Austria and Hungary (where the latter, unlike the former, asserted continuity) coupled with the secession of territories that either joined other states, such as Romania, or were merged into new states, such as Poland or Czechoslovakia.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

in force as between the UK and the successor states.[132] The question of Yugoslavia was more complicated in that until 2000, the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia maintained that it was a continuation of the former Socialist Federal Republic of Yugoslavia, while the other former republics maintained that the former SFRY had come to an end to be replaced by a series of new states.

The issue of article 34 and automatic succession arose in the Application of the Genocide Convention (Bosnia and Herzegovina v. Yugoslavia) case, where Bosnia argued that the rule applied with regard to the Genocide Convention and Yugoslavia denied this. The Court, however, did not make a determination on this point.[133] The issue arose again in the Gabčíkovo–Nagymaros Project case, where the parties argued as to whether the rule of automatic succession applied or not. The Court similarly declined to make a determination and focused instead on the significance of article 12.[134]

International human rights treaties

A territorial treaty binds successor states by virtue of attaching to the territory itself and establishing a particular regime that transcends the treaty. Can it be maintained that international human rights treaties are analogous and thus 'attach' to the inhabitants concerned within the territory of the predecessor state and thus continue to bind successor states? There is no doubt that human rights treaties constitute a rather specific category of treaties. They establish that obligations are owed directly to individuals and often provide for direct access for individuals to international mechanisms.[135] The very nature of international human rights treaties varies somewhat from that of traditional international agreements. The International Court in the Reservations to the Genocide Convention case emphasised that 'in such a Convention the contracting states do not have any interests of their own; they merely have, one and all, a common interest, namely, the accomplishment of those high purposes which are [132] See the letters sent by the UK Prime Minister to the Prime Ministers of the Czech Republic and Slovakia on 1 January 1993, UKMIL, 65 BYIL, 1994, pp. 586 ff.

[133] ICJ Reports, 1996, pp. 595, 611–12; 115 ILR, p. 1. See also M. Craven, 'The Genocide Case, the Law of Treaties and State Succession', 68 BYIL, 1997, p. 127.

[134] ICJ Reports, 1997, pp. 7, 71; 116 ILR, p. 1. As to article 12, see above, p. 970.

[135] See R. Higgins, Problems and Process, Oxford, 1994, p. 95.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

the raison d'être of the Convention'.[136] In the Barcelona Traction case,[137] the Court differentiated between obligations of a state towards the international community as a whole and those arising vis-à-vis another state. The former are obligations that derive 'from the outlawing of aggression and of genocide, as also from the principles and rules concerning the basic rights of the human person, including protection from slavery and racial discrimination'. In view of the importance of such rights, 'all States can be held to have a legal interest in their protection; they are obligations erga omnes'. It is also the case that the process of interpretation of international human rights treaties is more dynamic than is the case with regard to other international agreements. Human rights treaties create not merely subjective, reciprocal rights but rather particular legal orders involving objective obligations to protect human rights.[138]

Where a state party to human rights treaties either disintegrates completely or from which another state or states are created, and the classical rules of succession were followed, there is a danger that this might result in a situation where people formerly protected by such treaties are deprived of such protection as a consequence or by-product of state succession.[139] The practice of the UN Human Rights Committee[140] with regard to the Yugoslav tragedy is particularly interesting here. After the conclusion of its 45th session, the UN Human Rights Committee requested special reports with regard to specific issues (for example, the policy of 'ethnic cleansing', arbitrary detention, torture and advocacy of hatred) from Bosnia and Herzegovina, Croatia and the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia (Serbia and Montenegro), noting 'that all the peoples within the territory of the former Yugoslavia are entitled to the guarantees of the Covenant'.[141] Representatives of all three states appeared before the Committee to discuss the relevant issues, no objection being made to the competence of the Committee, even though only Croatia had actually notified the Secretary-General of

[136] ICJ Reports, 1951, pp. 15, 23; 18 ILR, p. 364.

[137] ICJ Reports, 1970, pp. 4, 32; 46 ILR, pp. 178, 206.

[138] See, for example, Austria v. Italy, 4 European Yearbook of Human Rights, 1960, pp. 116, 140; Ireland v. UK, European Court of Human Rights, Series A, vol. 20, 1978, pp. 90–1, and Effect of Reservations on the Entry into Force of the American Convention on Human Rights, 67 ILR, pp. 559, 568. See also above, chapter 16, p. 937.

[139] Note that the editors of Oppenheim's International Law take the view that in cases of the separation resulting in the creation of a new state, the latter 'is bound by – or at least entitled to accede to – general treaties of a "law-making" nature, especially those of a humanitarian character, previously binding on it as part of the state from which it has separated', p. 222.

[140] See above, chapter 6, p. 314.

[141] CCPR/C/SR.1178/Add.1, pp. 2–3.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

its succession to the human rights treaties of the former Yugoslavia.[142] In the formal Comments of the Human Rights Committee upon the initial short reports submitted by the three states,[143] the Committee emphasised clearly and unambiguously that 'all the peoples within the territory of the former Yugoslavia are entitled to the guarantees of the Covenant'.[144] In its General Comment No. 26 of October 1997, the Committee took the view that 'once the people are accorded the protection of the rights under the Covenant, such protection devolves with territory and continues to belong to them, notwithstanding change in government . . . or State succession'.[145]

The Commission on Human Rights adopted resolution 1994/16 on 25 February 1994 in which it 'reiterates its call to successor states which have not yet done so to confirm to appropriate depositories that they continue to be bound by obligations under international human rights treaties' and 'emphasises the special nature of the human rights treaties aimed at the protection of human rights and fundamental freedoms'. In addition, the Commission requested the human rights treaty bodies to continue further the 'continuing applicability of the respective international human rights treaties to successor states' and the Secretary-General 'to encourage successor states to confirm their obligations under the international human [142] See Müllerson, International Law, p. 157. In the ensuing discussion in the Committee, Müllerson (at the time a member) noted that human rights treaties besides being interstate instruments also conferred rights upon individuals 'who could not be deprived of those rights in the event of state succession', while Serrano Caldera emphasised that 'state succession should be viewed as a matter of the acquired rights of the population of the state that had ratified the Covenant, which were not diluted when a state was divided'. CCPR/C/SR.1178/Add.1, pp. 2, 4 and 9.

[143] These reports were supplemented by Special Reports from each of the three states in April 1993: see that of Croatia, CCPR/C/87; that of the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia (Serbia and Montenegro), CCPR/C/88, and that of Bosnia and Herzegovina, CCPR/C/89.

[144] See CCPR/C/79/Add. 14–16, 28 December 1992. Note that at its 49th session, the UN Commission on Human Rights adopted resolution 1993/23 of 5 March 1993 in which it encouraged successor states to confirm to appropriate depositaries that they continued to be bound by obligations under relevant international human rights treaties. See also the Report of the UN Secretary-General, E/CN.4/1994/68. On 25 May 1994, the Committee on the Elimination of Racial Discrimination sent a communication to those successor states of the USSR that had not yet declared their adherence or succession to the Convention, inviting them to confirm the applicability of compliance with the Convention's provisions: see E/CN.4/1995/80, p. 3.

[145] A/53/40, annex VII. Cf. Aust, Modern Treaty Law, pp. 371–2. See also M. Kamminga, 'State Succession in respect of Human Rights Treaties', 6 EJIL, 1995, p. 469, and A. Rasulov, 'Revisiting State Succession to Humanitarian Treaties: Is There a Case for Automaticity?', 14 EJIL, 2003, p. 141.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

rights treaties to which their predecessors were a party as from the date of their independence'.[146] In addition, the fifth meeting of persons chairing the human rights treaty bodies in September 1994 took the view that successor states were automatically bound by obligations under international human rights instruments from the respective date of independence and that observance of the obligations should not depend on a declaration of confirmation made by the government of the successor state.[147]

The issue of succession to the Genocide Convention in the Yugoslav situation was raised before the International Court specifically in the Preliminary Objections phase of the Application of the Genocide Convention (Bosnia-Herzegovina v. Yugoslavia) case. The Court held that it was unnecessary to determine this question in the circumstances since both Bosnia and Yugoslavia were clearly parties to the Convention by one means or another by the date of the filing of the Application.[148] The issue was, however, addressed particularly in two Separate Opinions. Judge Shahabuddeen declared that 'to effectuate its object and purpose, the [Genocide] Convention would fall to be construed as implying the expression of a unilateral undertaking by each party to the Convention to treat successor states as continuing as from independence any status which the predecessor state had as a party to the Convention'. It was suggested that it might be possible to extend this object and purpose argument to human rights treaties generally.[149] Judge Weeramantry in his Separate Opinion undertook a close analysis of the underlying principles and concluded by pointing to 'a principle of contemporary international law that there is automatic state succession to so vital a human rights convention as the Genocide Convention'.[150] One of the main reasons for this was the danger of gaps appearing in the system of human rights protection as between the dissolution of the predecessor state and the acceptance of human rights treaty obligations by the successor state or states.

Accordingly, the question of continued application of human rights treaties within the territory of a predecessor state irrespective of a succession is clearly under consideration. Whether such a principle has been clearly established is at the present moment unclear. However, with regard to those human rights which are established as a matter of customary international law, the new state will be bound by these as such.

[146] See also Commission on Human Rights Resolution 1995/18 adopted on 24 February 1995.
[147] E/CN.4/1995/80, pp. 3–4. [148] ICJ Reports, 1996, pp. 595, 612.
[149] Ibid., p. 636. [150] Ibid., pp. 645 ff.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

Succession with respect to matters other than treaties

Membership of international organisations[151]

Succession to membership of international organisations will proceed (depending upon the terms of the organisation's constitution) according to whether a new state is formed or an old state continues in a slightly different form. In the case of the partition of British India in 1947, India was considered by the UN General Assembly as a continuation of the previous entity, while Pakistan was regarded as a new state, which had then to apply for admission to the organisation.[152] Upon the merger of Egypt and Syria in 1958 to form the United Arab Republic, the latter was treated as a single member of the United Nations, while upon the dissolution of the merger in 1961, Syria simply resumed its separate membership of the organisation.[153] In the case of the merger of North and South Yemen in 1990, the new state simply replaced the predecessor states as a member of the relevant international organisations. Where the predecessor state is dissolved and new states are created, such states will have to apply anew for membership to international organisations. For example, the new states of the Czech Republic and Slovakia were admitted as new members of the UN on 19 January 1993.[154]

The Sixth (Legal) Committee of the General Assembly considered the situation of new states being formed through division of a member state and the membership problem and produced the following principles:[155]

> 1. That, as a general rule, it is in conformity with legal principles to presume that a state which is a member of the Organization of the United Nations does not cease to be a member simply because its Constitution or frontier

[151] See O'Connell, State Succession, vol. II, pp. 183 ff., and H. G. Schermers and N. M. Blokker, International Institutional Law, 3rd edn, The Hague, 1995, pp. 73 ff.

[152] This issue, of a separation of part of an existing state to form a new state, was considered by the UN to be on a par with the separation from the UK of the Irish Free State and from the Netherlands of Belgium, where the remaining portions continued as existing states: see O'Connell, State Succession, vol. I, pp. 184–7.

[153] Ibid., pp. 197–8. This situation, which differed from the India–Pakistan precedent of 1947, has been criticised: see e.g. C. Rousseau, 'Sécession de la Syrie et de la RUA', 66 RGDIP, 1962, p. 413. See also E. Cotran, 'Some Legal Aspects of the Formation of the United Arab Republic and the United Arab States', 8 ICLQ, 1959, p. 346.

[154] See Schermers and Blokker, International Institutional Law, pp. 73 and 77. See above, p. 960, with regard to the position of the Russian Federation and the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia and membership of the UN.

[155] A/CN.4/149, p. 8, quoted in O'Connell, State Succession, vol. I, p. 187.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

has been subjected to changes, and that the extinction of the state as a legal personality recognised in the international order must be shown before its rights and obligations can be considered thereby to have ceased to exist.

2. That when a new state is created, whatever may be the territory and the populations which it comprises and whether or not they formed part of a state member of the United Nations, it cannot under the system of the Charter claim the status of a member of the United Nations unless it has been formally admitted as such in conformity with the provisions of the Charter.

3. Beyond that, each case must be judged according to its merits.

Succession to assets and debts[156]

The relevant international law in this area is based upon customary law. The Vienna Convention on Succession to State Property, Archives and Debts, 1983 is not currently in force, although most of its provisions (apart from those concerning 'newly independent states') are reflective of custom. The primary rule with regard to the allocation of assets (including archives) and debts in succession situations is that the relevant parties should settle such issues by agreement. Virtually all of the rules that are formulated, for example in the Vienna Convention, 1983, are deemed to operate only where such agreement has not taken place.[157] In addition, the Arbitration Commission on Yugoslavia declared in Opinion No. 9 that 'the successor states to the SFRY must together settle all aspects of the succession by agreement'[158] and reinforced this approach in Opinion No. 14, declaring that 'the first principle applicable to state succession is that [156] See generally, O'Connell, State Succession, vol. I, pp. 199 ff.; E. H. Feilchenfeld, Public Debts and State Succession, New York, 1931; UN, Materials on Succession of States in Matters Other than Treaties, New York, 1978; International Law Association Reports on Aspects of the Law of State Succession 2004 (preliminary) and 2006 (final); A. Stanič, 'Financial Aspects of State Succession: The Case of Yugoslavia', 12 EJIL, 2001, p. 751; C. Rousseau, Droit International Public, Paris, 1977, vol. III, p. 374; M. Streinz, 'Succession of States in Assets and Liabilities – A New Regime?', 26 German YIL, 1983, p. 198; P. Monnier, 'La Convention de Vienne sur la Succession d'États en Matière de Biens, Archives et Dettes d'État', AFDI, 1984, p. 221; V. D. Degan, 'State Succession Especially in Respect of State Property and Debts', 4 Finnish YIL, 1993, p. 130; Mrak, Succession of States, and E. Nathan, 'The Vienna Convention on Succession of States in Respect of State Property, Archives and Debts' in International Law at a Time of Perplexity (ed. Y. Dinstein), Dordrecht, 1989, p. 489. See also Yearbook of the ILC, 1981, vol. II, part 2.

[157] See, for example, articles 14, 17, 18, 22, 23, 27, 28, 30, 31, 37, 38, 40 and 41.

[158] 92 ILR, p. 205.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

the successor states should consult with each other and agree a settlement of all questions relating to the succession'.[159]

State property[160]

The classic rule postulates that only the public property of the predecessor state passes automatically to the successor state,[161] but this, of course, raises the question of the definition of public property. The distinction between public and private property is to some extent based upon the conceptual differences between public and private law, a distinction unknown to common law countries. Although in many cases there will be a relevant agreement to define what is meant by public property in this context,[162] this does not always occur and recourse to municipal law is often required. This indeed may be necessitated to a large extent also because international law itself simply does not provide many of the required definitions with regard to, for example, public companies or public utility undertakings.[163]

The relevant municipal law for such purposes is that of the predecessor state. It is that law which will define the nature of the property in question and thus in essence decide its destination in the event of a succession.[164] Article 8 of the Vienna Convention, 1983 provides that state property for the purposes of the Convention means 'property, rights and interests which, at the date of the succession of states, were, according to the internal law of the predecessor state owned by that state'[165] and this can be taken as reflective of customary law. The Arbitration Commission on Yugoslavia reiterated this position by declaring that 'to determine whether the property, debts and archives belonged to the SFRY, reference should

[159] 96 ILR, p. 731.

[160] Note that private rights are unaffected as such by a succession: see, for example, Oppenheim's International Law, p. 216, and below, p. 1001.

[161] See, for example, the United Nations Tribunal for Libya, 22 ILR, p. 103. See also International Law Association, Final Report, p. 1.

[162] See, for example, the treaties concerned with the establishment of Cyprus in 1960, 382 UNTS, pp. 3 ff., and the Treaty of Peace with Italy, 1947, 49 UNTS, annex XIV, p. 225.

[163] For an example, see the dispute concerning property belonging to the Order of St Mauritz and St Lazarus, AFDI, 1965, p. 323. See also Stern, 'Succession', p. 329.

[164] See the Chorzów Factory case, PCIJ, Series A, No. 7, p. 30 and the German Settlers in Upper Silesia case, PCIJ, Series B, No. 6, p. 6, but cf. the Peter Pazmany University case, PCIJ, Series A/B, No. 61, p. 236.

[165] See also Yearbook of the ILC, 1970, vol. II, pp. 136–43 and ibid., 1981, vol. II, p. 23; cf. O'Connell, State Succession, vol. I, pp. 202–3.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

be had to the domestic law of the SFRY in operation at the date of succession'.[166] The relevant date for the passing of the property is the date of succession[167] and this is the date of independence, although difficulties may arise in the context of the allocation of assets and debts where different dates of succession occur for different successor states.[168] Such problems would need to be resolved on the basis of agreement between the relevant parties.[169]

The Arbitration Commission was faced with two particular problems. First, the 1974 SFRY Constitution had transferred to the constituent republics ownership of many items of property. This, held the Commission, led to the conclusion that such property could not be held to have belonged to the SFRY whatever their origin or initial financing.[170] Secondly, the Commission was faced with the concept of 'social ownership', a concept regarded as particularly highly developed in the SFRY. In the event, the Commission resolved the dilemma by adopting a mixture of the territorial principle and a functional approach. It was noted that 'social ownership' was 'held for the most part by "associated labour organisations" – bodies with their own legal personality, operating in a single republic and coming within its exclusive jurisdiction. Their property, debts and archives are not to be divided for purposes of state succession: each successor state exercises its sovereign powers in respect of them.'[171] However, where other organisations operated 'social ownership' either at the federal level or in two or more republics, 'their property, debts and archives should be divided between the successor states in question if they exercised public prerogatives on behalf of the SFRY of individual republics'. Where such public prerogatives were not being exercised, the organisations should be [167] Note that article 10 of the Vienna Convention, 1983 provides that the date of the passing of state property of the predecessor state is that of the date of succession of states 'unless otherwise agreed by the states concerned or decided by an appropriate international body'. Article 21 repeats this principle in the context of state archives and article 35 with regard to state debts.

[166] Opinion No. 14, 96 ILR, p. 732.

[168] See e.g. Arbitration Commission Opinion No. 11, 96 ILR, p. 719. Cf. the Yugoslav Agreement on Succession Issues of June 2001, 41 ILM, 2002, p. 3. See also AY Bank Ltd v. Bosnia and Herzegovina and Others [2006] EWHC 830 (Ch) and C. Stahn, 'The Agreement on Succession Issues of the Former Socialist Federal Republic of Yugoslavia', 96 AJIL, 2002, p. 379.

[169] See the Yugoslav Agreement on Succession Issues, 2001, articles 3 and 7 of Annex A and article 4(3) of Annex B.

[170] Opinion No. 14, 96 ILR, p. 732.

[171] Ibid.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

regarded as private-sector enterprises to which state succession does not apply.[172]

The Yugoslav Agreement on Succession Issues, 2001, however, provides that, 'It shall be for the successor state on whose territory immovable and tangible movable property is situated to determine, for the purposes of this Annex, whether that property was state property of the SFRY in accordance with international law.'[173]

It is a recognised principle of customary international law that the public property of a predecessor state with respect to the territory in question passes to the successor state.[174] Thus, as a general rule, the test of succession of public, or state, property as so characterised under the laws of the predecessor state is a territorial one.

However, one needs to distinguish here between immovable and movable property. State immovable property situated in the territory to which the succession relates passes to the successor state.[175] This is provided for in the Vienna Convention, 1983.[176] It is also evident in state practice,[177] most recently being reaffirmed by the Arbitration Commission on Yugoslavia[178] and in the Yugoslav Agreement on Succession Issues, 2001.[179]

In the case of immovable property situated outside the successor state or states, traditional state practice posits that where the predecessor state continues in existence this property should remain with the predecessor state (subject to agreement to the contrary by the states concerned, of

[172] Ibid.

[173] Article 6 of Annex A. This is to be contrasted with the more usual reference to domestic law at the relevant time.

[174] See, for example, the Third US Restatement of Foreign Relations Law, pp. 102 ff.; Brownlie, Principles, pp. 624–5, and O'Connell, State Succession, vol. I, pp. 199–200. See also the Peter Pazmany University case, PCIJ, Series A/B, No. 61, 1933, p. 237 and Haile Selassie v. Cable and Wireless Ltd (No. 2) [1939] Ch. 182; 9 AD, p. 94. See also Kunstsammlungen zu Weimar v. Elicofon 536 F.Supp. 829, 855 (1981); 94 ILR, pp. 133, 180. Note that under article 11, which basically reflects practice, no compensation is payable for the passing of state property unless otherwise agreed, and article 12 provides that third states' property in the territory of the predecessor state remains unaffected by the succession.

[175] E.g. fixed military installations, prisons, airports, government offices, state hospitals and universities: see Yearbook of the ILC, 1981, vol. II, part 2, p. 33.

[176] In article 14 (with regard to the transfer of part of a state to another state); article 15(i)a (with regard to 'newly independent states'); article 16 (upon a uniting of states to form one successor state); article 17 (with regard to separation of part of a state to form a new state) and article 18 (with regard to the dissolution of a state).

[177] See, for example, O'Connell, State Succession, vol. I, pp. 220–1. See also Yearbook of the ILC, 1981, vol. II, part 2, p. 29.

[178] Opinion No. 14, 96 ILR, p. 731.

[179] Article 2(1) of Annex A.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

course). Only special circumstances might modify this principle.[180] Where the predecessor state ceases to exist, it would appear that its property abroad should be divided proportionately between the successor states.[181]

Article 15(1)b of the Convention makes out a special, and highly controversial, case for 'newly independent states'. This provides that 'immovable property, having belonged to the territory to which the succession of states relates, situated outside it and having become state property of the predecessor state during the period of dependence, shall pass to the successor state', while other immovable state property situated outside the territory 'shall pass to the successor state in proportion to the contribution of the dependent territory'. Neither of these propositions can be regarded as part of customary international law and their force would thus be dependent upon the coming into effect of the Convention, should this happen.[182]

As far as movable property connected with the territory in question is concerned,[183] the territorial principle continues to predominate. O'Connell notes that 'such property as is destined specifically for local use is acquired by the successor state',[184] while the formulation in the Vienna Convention, 1983 is more flexible. This provides that 'movable state property of the predecessor state connected with the activity of the [180] See, for example, Oppenheim's International Law, p. 223, note 6.

[181] Ibid., at p. 221. Article 18(1)b of the Vienna Convention, 1983 provides that 'immovable state property of the predecessor state situated outside its territory shall pass to the successor states in equitable proportions'. Note that the Yugoslav Agreement on Succession Issues, 2001 deals specifically with the allocation of diplomatic and consular premises: see Annex B.

[182] It is to be noted that article 15 does not, unlike other succession situations, refer to agreements between the predecessor and successor states. This was deliberate as the International Law Commission, which drafted the articles upon which the Convention is based, felt that this was required as a recognition of the special circumstances of decolonisation and the fact that many such agreements are unfavourable to the newly independent state: see Yearbook of the ILC, 1981, vol. II, part 2, p. 38. The article is also unusual in that it provides that immovable state property situated outside the territory and movable state property other than that already covered in the article 'to the creation of which the dependent territory has contributed' shall pass to the successor state in proportion to the contribution of the dependent territory. This was intended to introduce the application of equity to the situation and was designed to preserve inter alia, 'the patrimony and the historical and cultural heritage of the people inhabiting the dependent territory concerned', ibid. It is unclear how far this extends. It may cover contributions to international institutions made where the territory is a dependent territory, but beyond this one can only speculate.

[183] E.g. currency and state public funds, Yearbook of the ILC, 1981, vol. II, part 2, pp. 35–6.

[184] O'Connell, State Succession, vol. I, p. 204.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

predecessor state in respect of the territory to which the succession of states applies shall pass to the successor state'.[185] There are, however, likely to be difficulties of precision in specific cases with regard to borderline instances of what may be accepted as either property 'destined specifically for local use' or property 'connected with the activity of the predecessor State in . . . the territory'. The view taken by the Arbitration Commission in Opinion No. 14 appears to be even more flexible for it simply notes that 'public property passes to the successor state on whose territory it is situated'.[186] However, particular kinds of property may be dealt with differently. For example, the Yugoslav Agreement on Succession Issues provides that the rule is not to apply to tangible state property of great importance to the cultural heritage of one of the successor states and which originated there, even though situated elsewhere at the date of independence. Such property is to go to the state whose cultural heritage it is.[187] Secondly, military property is to be made the subject of special arrangements.[188]

The situation with regard to movable property outside of the territory in question is more complicated. Article 17(1)c of the Vienna Convention, 1983 provides that such property (in the case of separation of part of a state) 'shall pass to the successor state in an equitable proportion'. This must be regarded as a controversial proposition since it appears to modify the dominant territorial approach to the succession of state property.[189] However, in the case of the dissolution of the predecessor state, the argument in favour of an equitable division of movable property not linked to the territory in respect of which the succession occurs is much stronger.[190] The Arbitration Commission on Yugoslavia limited itself to noting the general principle that state property, debts and archives of the SFRY (other than immovable property within each of the successor states) should be divided between the successor states[191] and that while each category of [185] Article 17. See also articles 14(2)b, 15(1)d and 18(1)c.

[186] 96 ILR, p. 731. See also article 3(1) of Annex A of the Yugoslav Agreement on Succession Issues, 2001.

[187] Article 3(2) of Annex A. [188] Article 4(1).

[189] See O'Connell, State Succession, vol. I, p. 204. Cf. Yearbook of the ILC, 1981, vol. II, part 1, pp. 46–7.

[190] See article 18(1)d of the Vienna Convention, 1983. See also the decision of the Austrian Supreme Court in Republic of Croatia et al. v. Girocredit Bank AG der Sparkassen 36 ILM, 1997, p. 1520.

[191] Opinion No. 14, 96 ILR, pp. 731–2. See now the Yugoslav Agreement on Succession Issues, 2001 as discussed.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

assets and liabilities need not be divided equitably, the overall outcome had to be an equitable division.[192]

The state succession situation which in general poses the least problem is that of absorption or merger, since the absorbing or newly created state respectively will simply take over the assets and debts of the extinguished state. The issues were, however, discussed in detail in the context of German unification. Article 21 of the Unification Treaty provides that the assets of the German Democratic Republic which served directly specified administrative tasks were to become Federal assets[193] and were to be used to discharge public tasks in the territory of the former GDR. Article 22 dealt with public assets of legal entities in that territory, including the land and assets in the agricultural sectors which did not serve directly specified administrative tasks.[194] Such financial assets were to be administered in trust by the Federal Government and be appointed by federal law equally between the Federal Government on the one hand and the Länder of the former GDR on the other, with the local authorities receiving an appropriate share of the Länder allocation. The Federal Government was to use its share to discharge public tasks in the territory of the former GDR, while the distribution of the Länder share to the individual Länder was to take place upon the basis of population ratio. Publicly owned assets used for the housing supply became the property of the local authorities together with the assumption by the latter of a proportionate share of the debts, with the ultimate aim of privatisation.

In fact, state practice demonstrates that with the exception of some clear and basic rules, all will depend upon the particular agreement reached in the particular circumstances. In the case of the former Czech and Slovak Federal Republic, the two successor states agreed to divide the assets [192] Opinion No. 13, ibid., p. 728. The Yugoslav Agreement on Succession Issues, 2001 provides that where the allocation of property results in a 'significantly unequal distribution' of SFRY state property, then the matter may be raised with the Joint Committee established under article 5 of the Annex.

[193] Unless they were earmarked on 1 October 1989 predominantly for administrative tasks which under the Basic Law of the FRG are to be discharged by the Länder, local authorities or other public administrative bodies, in which case they will accrue to the appropriate institution of public administration. Administrative assets used predominantly for tasks of the former Ministry of State Security/Office for National Security are to accrue to the Trust Agency established under the Law on the Privatisation and Reorganisation of Publicly Owned Assets (Trust Law) of 17 June 1990 for the purpose of privatising former publicly owned companies.

[194] These were termed 'financial assets' and deliberately exclude social insurance assets.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

and liabilities of the predecessor state[195] in the ratio of two to one (the approximate population ratio of the two new states).[196] In the case of the former Soviet Union, Russia and the successor states signed agreements in 1991 and 1992 apportioning assets and liabilities of the predecessor state with the share of Russia being 61.34 per cent and the Ukraine being 16.37 per cent.[197] In the case of the former Yugoslavia, the Agreement on Succession Issues of 2001, in addition to the provisions referred to above,[198] provided for the distribution of assets on the basis of agreed proportions.[199] Financial assets in the International Monetary Fund (IMF) and World Bank were distributed on a slightly different proportional basis (that became known as the IMF key).[200] The IMF key was also used with regard to the distribution of assets in the Bank of International Settlements in an arrangement dated 10 April 2001.[201]

State archives

Archives are state property with special characteristics. Many are difficult by their nature to divide up, but they may be relatively easily reproduced [195] Apart from immovable property located within each republic which went to the republic concerned in accordance with the territorial principle.

[196] See, for example, Degan, 'State Succession', p. 144.

[197] See Müllerson, International Law, p. 144, and Stern, 'Succession', pp. 379 ff. The proportions were reached using four criteria: the participation of the republics concerned in the imports and exports respectively of the former USSR, the proportion of GNP, and the proportion of populations: see W. Czaplinski, 'Equity and Equitable Principles in the Law of State Succession' in Mark, Succession of States, pp. 61, 71. However, several successor states refused to accept this and the arrangement never came into being, and in 1993 Russia claimed all of the assets and liabilities of the former USSR, see Stern, 'Succession', p. 405, and a number of bilateral agreements were signed to reflect this, see International Law Association, Final Report, pp. 7 ff. A special agreement was reached in 1997 with regard to the division of the Black Sea fleet based in the Crimea in Ukraine, following a number of unsuccessful efforts: Stern 'Succession', p. 386.

[198] See above, pp. 989–91.

[199] These were Bosnia and Herzegovina 15.5 per cent; Croatia 23 per cent; Macedonia 7.5 per cent: Slovenia 16 per cent and Yugoslavia 38 per cent: see article 4 of Annex C. This proportion was also used for all other rights and interests of the SFRY not otherwise covered in the Agreements (such as patents, trade marks, copyrights and royalties), Annex F.

[200] This was as follows: Bosnia and Herzegovina 13.20 per cent; Croatia 28.49 per cent; Macedonia 5.40 per cent; Slovenia 16.39 per cent and FRY 36.52 per cent: see IMF Press Release No. 92/92, 15 December 1992. See also P. Williams, 'State Succession and the International Financial Institutions', 43 ICLQ, 1994, pp. 776, 802, n. 168, and I. Shihata, 'Matters of State Succession in the World Bank's Practice' in Mark, Succession of States, pp. 75, 87.

[201] See Appendix to the Yugoslav Agreement on Succession Issues, 2001.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

and duplicated. Archives are a crucial part of the heritage of a community and may consist of documents, numismatic collections, iconographic documents, photographs and films. The issue has been of great concern to UNESCO, which has called for the restitution of archives as part of the reconstitution and protection of the national cultural heritage and has appealed for the return of an irreplaceable cultural heritage to those that created it.[202] In this general context, one should also note articles 149 and 303 of the 1982 Convention on the Law of the Sea. The former provides that all objects of an archaeological and historical nature found in the International Seabed Area are to be preserved or disposed of for the benefit of mankind as a whole, 'particular regard being paid to the preferential rights of the state or country of origin, or the state of historical and archaeological origin', while the latter stipulates that states have the duty to protect objects of an archaeological and historical nature found at sea and shall co-operate for this purpose.

In general, treaties between European states dealing with cessions of territory included archival clauses providing for the treatment of archives, while such clauses are very rare in cases of decolonisation.[203]

Article 20 of the 1983 Vienna Convention provides that state archives in the present context means:

> all documents of whatever date and kind, produced or received by the predecessor state in the exercise of its functions which, at the date of the succession of states, belonged to the predecessor state according to its internal law and were preserved by it directly or under its control as archives for whatever purpose.

Generally, such archives will pass as at the date of succession and without compensation, without as such affecting archives in the territory owned by a third state.[204]

Where part of the territory of a state is transferred by that state to another state, in the absence of agreement, the part of the state archives of the predecessor state which, for normal administration of the territory

[202] UNESCO, Records of the General Conference, 18th Session, Resolutions, 1974, pp. 68 ff., 20 C/102, 1978, paras. 18–19; and UNESCO Records of the General Conference, 20th Session, Resolutions, 1978, pp. 92–3. See also Yearbook of the ILC, 1979, vol. II, part 1, pp. 78–80. Note in addition the call for a New International Cultural Order: see e.g. M. Bedjaoui, Towards a New International Economic Order, Paris, 1979, pp. 75 ff. and 245 ff., and General Assembly Resolutions 3026A (XXVII); 3148 (XXVIII); 3187 (XXVIII); 3391 (XXX) and 31/40.

[203] Yearbook of the ILC, 1979, vol. II, part 1, p. 93.

[204] Articles 21–4.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

concerned, should be at the disposal of the state to which the territory is transferred, shall pass to the successor state, as shall any part of the state archives that relates exclusively or principally to the territory.[205] In the case of 'newly independent states', the same general provisions apply,[206] but with some alterations. Archives having belonged to the territory in question and having become state archives of the predecessor state during the period of dependence are to pass to the successor state. The reference here to archives that became state archives is to pre-colonial material, whether kept by central government, local governments or tribes, religious ministers, private enterprises or individuals.[207] One may mention here the Treaty of Peace with Italy of 1947, which provided that Italy was to restore all archives and objects of historical value belonging to Ethiopia or its natives and removed from Ethiopia to Italy since October 1935.[208] In the case of Vietnam, the 1950 Franco-Vietnamese agreement provided for the return as of right of all historical archives,[209] while a dispute between France and Algeria has been in existence since the latter's independence over pre-colonial material removed to France.[210]

Article 28(2) provides that the passing or the appropriate reproduction of parts of the state archives of the predecessor state (other than those already discussed above) of interest to the territory concerned is to be determined by agreement, 'in such a manner that each of these states [i.e. predecessor and successor] can benefit as widely and equitably as possible from those parts of the state archives of the predecessor state'. The reference here is primarily to material relating to colonisation and the colonial period, and in an arrangement of 1975, the French specifically noted the practice of microfilming in the context of France's acquisition of Algeria.[211] Article 28(3) emphasises that the predecessor state is to provide the newly independent state with the best available evidence from its state archives relating to territorial title and boundary issues. This is important as many post-colonial territorial disputes will invariably revolve around the interpretation of colonial treaties delimiting frontiers and colonial administrative practice concerning the area in contention.[212]

[205] Article 27. [206] Article 28(1)b and c.
[207] Yearbook of the ILC, 1981, vol. II, part 2, p. 62. [208] 49 UNTS, p. 142.
[209] See Yearbook of the ILC, 1979, vol. II, part 1, p. 113. [210] Ibid., pp. 113–14.
[211] Yearbook of the ILC, 1981, vol. II, part 2, p. 64.
[212] See, for example, the Mali–Upper Volta (Burkina Faso) border dispute, Shaw, Title to Territory, pp. 257–8, and the Burkina Faso/Mali case, ICJ Reports, 1986, p. 554; 80 ILR, p. 459.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

Where two or more states unite to form one successor state, the state archives of the former will pass to the latter.[213] Where part of a state secedes to form another state, unless the states otherwise agree the part of the state archives of the predecessor state, which for normal administration of the territory concerned should be in that territory, will pass, as will those parts of the state archives that relate directly to the territory that is the subject of the succession.[214]

The same provisions apply in the case of a dissolution of a state, which is replaced by two or more successor states, in the absence of agreement, with the addition that other state archives are to pass to the successor states in an equitable manner, taking into account all relevant circumstances.[215] These principles were confirmed in the Yugoslav Agreement on Succession Issues, 2001,[216] while it was additionally provided that archives other than those falling within these categories are to be the subject of an agreement between the successor states as to their equitable distribution.[217]

Articles 28, 30 and 31 also contain a paragraph explaining that the relevant agreements over state archives 'shall not infringe the right of the peoples of those states to development, to information about their history and to their cultural heritage'. Despite the controversy over whether such a right does indeed exist in law as a right and precisely how such a provision might be interpreted in practice in concrete situations, the general concept of encouraging awareness and knowledge of a people's heritage is to be supported.[218]

Public debt[219]

This is an area of particular uncertainty and doubt has been expressed as to whether there is a rule of succession in such circumstances.[220] As in other parts of state succession, political and economic imperatives play

[213] Article 29. [214] Article 30.

[215] Article 31. Note in particular the dispute between Denmark and Iceland, after the dissolution of their Union, over valuable parchments: see Verzijl, International Law, vol. VII, 1974, p. 153, and Yearbook of the ILC, 1981, vol. II, part 1, pp. 68–9, and the Treaty of St Germain of 1919 with Austria which contained provisions relating to the succession to archives of various new or reconstituted states.

[216] See Annex D. [217] Ibid., article 6.

[218] See further, with regard to article 3(2) of Annex A of the Yugoslav Agreement on Succession Issues, 2001, above, p. 991.

[219] See generally, O'Connell, State Succession, vol. I, chapters 15–17; Yearbook of the ILC, 1977, vol. II, part 1, pp. 49 ff., and Zemanek, 'State Succession'.

[220] See e.g. Brownlie, Principles, pp. 625–6.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

a large role and much practice centres upon agreements made between relevant parties.

The public debt (or national debt) is that debt assumed by the central government in the interests of the state as a whole. It constitutes a particularly sensitive issue since third parties are involved who are often reluctant to accept a change in the identity of the debtor. This encourages an approach based on the continuing liability for the debt in question and in situations where a division of debt has taken place for that situation to continue with the successor state being responsible to the predecessor state (where this continues, of course) for its share rather than to the creditor directly. And as article 36 of the Vienna Convention, 1983 notes, a succession of states does not as such affect the rights and obligations of creditors.[221]

Public debts[222] may be divided into national debts, being debts owned by the state as a whole; local debts, being debts contracted by a subgovernmental territorial unit or other form of local authority, and localised debts, being debts incurred by the central government for the purpose of local projects or areas.[223]

Local debts clearly pass under customary international law to the successor state, since they constitute arrangements entered into by subgovernmental territorial authorities now transferred to the jurisdiction of the successor state and a succession does not directly affect them. In effect, they continue to constitute debts borne by the specific territory in question.[224] Similarly, localised debts, being closely attached to the territory to which the succession relates, also pass to the successor state in conformity with the same territorial principle.[225]

There appears to be no definitive answer to the question as to the allocation of the national debt as such. In the case of absorption or merger, the expanding or newly created state respectively will simply take over [221] Note that the Convention does not deal with private creditors, a point which is criticised in the Third US Restatement on Foreign Relations Law, p. 106, but article 6 of the Convention constitutes in effect a savings clause here.

[222] Note that the Convention is concerned with state debts which are defined in article 33 as 'any financial obligation of a predecessor state arising in conformity with international law with another state, an international organisation or any other subject of international law'.

[223] See O'Connell, State Succession, vol. I, chapters 15–17, and Yearbook of the ILC, 1981, vol. II, part 1, p. 76. A variety of other distinctions have also been drawn, ibid.

[224] See, for example, O'Connell, State Succession, vol. I, pp. 416 ff.

[225] Ibid. See also Yearbook of the ILC, 1981, vol. II, part 1, p. 90, and the Ottoman Public Debt case, 1 RIAA, p. 529 (1925).

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

the national debt of the extinguished state.[226] The German unification example is instructive. Article 23 of the Unification Treaty provided that the total national budget debt of the German Democratic Republic was to be assumed by a special Federal fund administered by the Federal Minister of Finance. The Federal Government was to be liable for the obligations of the special fund which was to service the debt and might raise loans inter alia to redeem debts and to cover interest and borrowing costs. Until 31 December 1993, the Federal Government and the Trust Agency were each to reimburse one half of the interest payments made by the special fund. As from 1 January 1994, the Federal Government, the Trust Agency and the Länder of the former GDR assumed the total debt accrued at that date by the special fund, which was dissolved. The sureties, warranties and guarantees assumed by the GDR were taken over by the Federal Republic, while the interests of the GDR in the Berlin State Bank were transferred to the Länder of the former GDR. The liabilities arising from the GDR's responsibility for the Berlin State Bank were assumed by the Federal Government.

In the case of secession or separation where the predecessor state continues to exist, it would appear that the presumption is that the responsibility for the general public debt of the predecessor state remains with the predecessor state after the succession.[227] This would certainly appear to be the case where part of a state is transferred to another state.[228] Generally the paucity of practice leads one to be reluctant to claim that a new rule of international law has been established with regard to such situations, so that the general principle of non-division of the public debt is not displaced. However, successor states may be keen to establish their international creditworthiness by becoming involved in a debt allocation arrangement in circumstances where in strict international law this may not be necessary.[229] Further, the increasing pertinence of the notion of equitable distribution might have an impact upon this question.

A brief review of some practice may serve to illustrate the complexity of the area. When Texas seceded from Mexico in 1840, for example, it denied any liability for the latter's debts, although an ex gratia payment was in the circumstances made. However, no part of Colombia's debt was assumed [226] Article 39 of the Convention provides that where two or more states unite to form a successor state, the state debts of the former states will pass to the successor state.

[227] See the Ottoman Public Debt case, 1 RIAA, p. 529.

[228] See Yearbook of the ILC, 1977, vol. II, part 1, p. 81.

[229] See Williams, 'State Succession', pp. 786 and 802–3.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

by Panama upon its independence in 1903. The arrangements made in the peace treaties of 1919 and 1923 were complex, but it can be noted that while no division of the public debt occurred with regard to some territories emerging from the collapsed empires, in most cases there was a negotiated and invariably complicated settlement. The successor states of the Austro-Hungarian Empire, for example, assumed responsibility for such portions of the pre-war bonded debt as were determined by the Reparations Committee, while Turkey took over a share of the Ottoman public debt on a revenue proportionality basis.[230] When in 1921, the Irish Free State separated from the United Kingdom, it was provided that the public debt of the UK would be apportioned 'as may be fair and equitable', having regard to any claims by way of set-off or counter-claim.

The agreement between India (the continuation of British India) and Pakistan (the new state) provided for the responsibility of the former with regard to all the financial obligations, including loans and guarantees, of British India. India thus remained as the sole debtor of the national debt, while Pakistan's share of this, as established upon the basis of proportionality relating to its share of the assets of British India that it received, became a debt to India.[231]

With regard to secured debts, the general view appears to be that debts secured by mortgage of assets located in the territory in question survive the transfer of that territory. The Treaties of St Germain and Trianon in 1919, for example (articles 203 and 186 respectively), provided that assets thus pledged would remain so pledged with regard to that part of the national debt that it had been agreed would pass to the particular successor state. Such debts had to be specifically secured and the securities had to be 'railways, salt mines or other property'.[232] However, where debts have been charged to local revenue, the presumption lies the other way.

Much will depend upon the circumstances and it may well be that where the seceding territory constituted a substantial or meaningful part of the predecessor state, considerations of equity would suggest some form of apportionment of the national debt. It was with this in mind, together with the example of the UK–Irish Free State Treaty of 1921, that led the International Law Commission to propose the draft that led to article 40 of the Vienna Convention, 1983.

[230] See, for example, O'Connell, State Succession, vol. I, pp. 397–401, and Feilchenfeld, Public Debts, pp. 431 ff.

[231] O'Connell, State Succession, vol. I, pp. 404–6.

[232] Ibid., p. 411.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

Article 40 provides that where part of a state separates to form another state, unless otherwise agreed, the state debt of the predecessor state passes to the successor state 'in an equitable proportion' taking into account in particular the property, rights and interests which pass to the successor state in relation to that debt.[233] It is doubtful that this proposition constitutes a codification of customary law as such in view of the confused and disparate practice of states to date, but it does reflect a viable approach.

However, in the case of separation where the predecessor state ceases to exist, some form of apportionment of the public debt is required and the provision in article 41 for an equitable division taking into account in particular the property, rights and interests which pass to the successor states in relation to that debt, is reasonable and can be taken to reflect international practice.[234] The basis for any equitable apportionment of debts would clearly depend upon the parties concerned and would have to be regulated by agreement. A variety of possibilities exists, including taxation ratio, extent of territory, population, nationality of creditors, taxable value as distinct from actual revenue contributions, value of assets and contributions of the territory in question to the central administration.[235] The Yugoslav Agreement on Succession Issues, 2001 provides that 'allocated debts', that is external debts where the final beneficiary of the debt is located on the territory of a specific successor state or group of successor states, are to be accepted by the successor state on the territory of which the final beneficiary is located.[236]

In common with the other parts of the 1983 Convention, a specific article is devoted to the situation of the 'newly independent state'. Article 38 provides that 'no state debt of the predecessor state shall pass to the newly independent state' in the absence of an agreement between the [233] The same rule applies in the case of the transfer of part of a state to another state: see article 37.

[234] See, for example, Oppenheim's International Law, p. 221.

[235] In the 1919 peace treaties, the principle of distribution proportional to the future paying capacity of the ceded territories was utilised, measured by reference to revenues contributed in the pre-war years, while in the Treaty of Lausanne, 1923, concerning the consequences of the demise of the Ottoman Empire, the principle considered was that of proportional distribution based solely upon actual past contributions to the amortisation of debts: see O'Connell, State Succession, vol. I, pp. 454–6. Cf. Yearbook of the ILC, 1981, vol. II, part 2, p. 113. The phrase ultimately adopted in the Vienna Convention was: 'taking into account, in particular, the property, rights and interests which pass to the successor state in relation to that state debt'. In other words, stress was laid upon the factor of proportionality of assets to debts.

[236] Article 2(1)b of Annex C.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

parties providing otherwise, 'in view of the link between the state debt of the predecessor state connected with its activity in the territory to which the succession of states relates and the property, rights and interests which pass to the newly independent state'. State practice generally in the decolonisation process dating back to the independence of the United States appears to show that there would be no succession to part of the general state debt of the predecessor state, but that this would differ where the debt related specifically to the territory in question.[237] It is unlikely that this provision reflects customary law.

Private rights

The question also arises as to how far a succession of states will affect, if at all, private rights. Principles of state sovereignty and respect for acquired or subsisting rights are relevant here and often questions of expropriation provide the context. As far as those inhabitants who become nationals of the successor state are concerned, they are fully subject to its laws and regulations, and apart from the application of international human rights rules, they have little direct recourse to international law in these circumstances. Accordingly what does become open to discussion is the protection afforded to aliens by international provisions relating to the succession of rights and duties upon a change of sovereignty.

It is within this context that the doctrine of acquired rights[238] has been formulated. This relates to rights obtained by foreign nationals and has been held by some to include virtually all types of legal interests. Its import is that such rights continue after the succession and can be enforced against the new sovereign. Some writers declare this proposition to be a fundamental principle of international law,[239] while others describe it merely as a source of confusion.[240] There is a certain amount of disagreement as to its extent. On the one hand, it has been held to mean that the passing of sovereignty has no effect upon such rights, and on the other that [237] See Yearbook of the ILC, 1981, vol. II, part 1, pp. 91–105 and ibid., 1977, vol. II, part 1, pp. 86–107. Note the varied practice of succession to public debts in the colonisation process, ibid., pp. 87–8, and with regard to annexations, ibid., pp. 93–4. See also West Rand Gold Mining Co. v. R [1905] 2 KB 391, and O'Connell, State Succession, vol. I, pp. 373–83.

[238] See, in particular, O'Connell, State Succession, chapter 10; Oppenheim's International Law, pp. 215 ff., and Brownlie, Principles, pp. 626 ff. See also T. H. Cheng, State Succession and Commercial Obligations, New York, 2006.

[239] See e.g. O'Connell, State Succession, vol. I, pp. 239–40.

[240] See e.g. Brownlie, Principles, p. 627.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

it implies no more than that aliens should be, as far as possible, insulated from the changes consequent upon succession.

The principle of acquired rights was discussed in a number of cases that came before the Permanent Court of International Justice between the two world wars, dealing with the creation of an independent Poland out of the former German, Russian and Austrian Empires. Problems arose specifically with regard to rights obtained under German rule, which were challenged by the new Polish authorities. In the German Settlers' case,[241] Poland had attempted to evict German settlers from its lands, arguing that since many of them had not taken transfer of title before the Armistice they could be legitimately ejected. According to the German system, such settlers could acquire title either by means of leases, or by means of an arrangement whereby they paid parts of the purchase price at regular intervals and upon payment of the final instalment the land would become theirs. The Court held that German law would apply in the circumstances until the final transfer of the territory and that the titles to land acquired in this fashion would be protected under the terms of the 1919 Minorities Treaty. More importantly, the Court declared that even in the absence of such a treaty:

> private rights acquired under existing law do not cease on a change of sovereignty . . . even those who contest the existence in international law of a general principle of state succession do not go so far as to maintain that private rights, including those acquired from the state as the owner of the property, are invalid as against a successor in sovereignty.[242]

The fact that there was a political purpose behind the colonisation scheme would not affect the private rights thus secured, which could be enforced against the new sovereign. It is very doubtful that this would be accepted today. The principles emerging from such inter-war cases affirming the continuation of acquired rights have modified the views expressed in the West Rand Central Gold Mining Company case[243] to the [241] PCIJ, Series B, No. 6, 1923; 2 AD, p. 71. The proposition was reaffirmed in the Certain German Interests in Polish Upper Silesia case, PCIJ, Series A, No. 7, 1926; 3 AD, p. 429 and the Chorzów Factory case, PCIJ, Series A, No. 17, 1928; 4 AD, p. 268. See also the Mavrommatis Palestine Concessions case, PCIJ, Series A, No. 5, 1924 and US v. Percheman 7 Pet. 51 (1830).

[242] See also El Salvador/Honduras, ICJ Reports, 1992, pp. 351, 400, referring to 'full respect for acquired rights', the German–Poland Border Treaty Constitutionality case, 108 ILR, p. 656, and cf. Gosalia v. Agarwal 118 ILR, p. 429.

[243] [1905] 2 KB 391.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

effect that, upon annexation, the new sovereign may choose which of the contractual rights and duties adopted by the previous sovereign it wishes to respect.

The inter-war cases mark the high-water mark of the concept of the continuation of private rights upon succession, but they should not be interpreted to mean that the new sovereign cannot alter such rights. The expropriation of alien property is possible under international law subject to certain conditions.[244] What the doctrine does indicate is that there is a presumption of the continuation of foreign acquired rights, though the matter is best regulated by treaty. Only private rights that have become vested or acquired would be covered by the doctrine. Thus, where rights are to come into operation in the future, they will not be binding upon the new sovereign. Similarly, claims to unliquidated damages will not continue beyond the succession. Claims to unliquidated damages occur where the matter in dispute has not come before the judicial authorities and the issue of compensation has yet to be determined by a competent court or tribunal. In the Robert E. Brown claim,[245] an American citizen's prospecting licence had been unjustifiably cancelled by the Boer republic of South Africa in the 1890s and Brown's claim had been dismissed in the Boer courts. In 1900 the United Kingdom annexed the republic and Brown sought (through the US government) to hold it responsible. This contention was rejected by the arbitration tribunal, which said that Brown's claim did not represent an acquired right since the denial of justice that had taken place by the Boer court's wrongful rejection of his case had prevented the claim from becoming liquidated. The tribunal also noted that liability for a wrongful act committed by a state did not pass to the new sovereign after succession.

The fact that the disappearance of the former sovereign automatically ends liability for any wrong it may have committed is recognised as a rule of international law, although where the new state adopts the illegal actions of the predecessor, it may inherit liability since it itself is in effect committing a wrong. This was brought out in the Lighthouses arbitration[246] in 1956 between France and Greece, which concerned the latter's liability to respect concessions granted by Turkey to a French company

[244] See above, chapter 14, p. 827.

[245] 6 RIAA, p. 120 (1923); 2 AD, p. 66. See also the Hawaiian Claims case, 6 RIAA, p. 157 (1925); 3 AD, p. 80.

[246] 12 RIAA, p. 155 (1956); 23 ILR, p. 659. Cf. the decision of the Namibian Supreme Court in Minister of Defence, Namibia v. Mwandinghi 91 ILR, p. 341, taking into account the provisions of the Namibian Constitution.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

regarding territory subsequently acquired by Greece. The problem of the survival of foreign nationals' rights upon succession is inevitably closely bound up with ideological differences and economic pressures.[247]

State succession and nationality[248]

The issue of state succession and nationality links together not only those two distinct areas, but also the question of human rights. The terms under which a state may award nationality are solely within its control[249] but problems may arise in the context of a succession. In principle, the issue of nationality will depend upon the municipal regulations of the predecessor and successor states. The laws of the former will determine the extent to which the inhabitants of an area to be ceded to another authority will retain their nationality after the change in sovereignty, while the laws of the successor state will prescribe the conditions under which the new nationality will be granted. The general rule would appear to be that nationality will change with sovereignty, although it will be incumbent upon the new sovereign to declare the pertinent rules with regard to people born in the territory or resident there, or born abroad of parents who are nationals of the former regime. Similarly, the ceding state may well provide for its former citizens in the territory in question to retain [247] As to state succession to wrongful acts, see e.g. P. Dumberry, State Succession to International Responsibility, The Hague, 2007; W. Czaplinski, 'State Succession and State Responsibility', 28 Canadian YIL, 1990, p. 339 and M. J. Volkovitsch, 'Righting Wrongs: Towards a New Theory of State Succession to Responsibility for International Delicts', 92 Columbia Law Review, 1992, p. 2162. See also Minister of Defence v. Mwandinghi (SA 5/91) [1991] NASC 5; 1992 (2) SA 355 (NmS) (25 October 1991).

[248] See O'Connell, State Succession, vol. I, chapters 20 and 21; P. Weis, Nationality and Statelessness in International Law, 2nd edn, Alphen aan den Rijn, 1979; I. Ziemele, State Continuity and Nationality: Past, Present and Future as Defined by International Law, The Hague, 2005; P. Dumberry, 'Obsolete and Unjust: The Rule of Continuous Nationality in the Context of State Succession', 76 Nordic Journal of International Law, 2007, p. 153; C. Economidès, 'Les Effets de la Succession d'États sur la Nationalité', 103 RGDIP, 1999, p. 577; Nationalité, Minorités et Succession d'États en Europe de l'Est (eds. E. Decaux and A. Pellet), Paris, 1996; European Commission for Democracy Through Law, Citizenship and State Succession, Strasbourg, 1997; Oppenheim's International Law, p. 218, and Reports of the International Law Commission, A/50/10, 1995, p. 68; A/51/10, 1996, p. 171; A/52/10, 1997, p. 11; A/53/10, 1998, p. 189 and A/54/10, 1999, p. 12. See also above, chapters 12, p. 659, and 14, p. 808.

[249] See e.g. article 1 of the Hague Convention on Certain Questions relating to the Conflict of Nationality Laws, 1930, the Nationality Decrees in Tunis and Morocco case, PCIJ, Series B, No. 4, p. 24 (1923); 2 AD, p. 349, the Acquisition of Polish Nationality case, PCIJ, Series B, No. 7, p. 16; 2 AD, p. 292, and the Nottebohm case, ICJ Reports, 1955, p. 23; 22 ILR, p. 349.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

their nationality, thus creating a situation of dual nationality. This would not arise, of course, where the former state completely disappears.

Some states acquiring territory may provide for the inhabitants to obtain the new nationality automatically while others may give the inhabitants an option to depart and retain their original nationality. Actual practice is varied and much depends on the circumstances, but it should be noted that the 1961 Convention on the Reduction of Statelessness provides that states involved in the cession of territory should ensure that no person becomes stateless as a result of the particular change in sovereignty. There may indeed be a principle in international law to the effect that the successor state should provide for the possibility of nationals of the predecessor state living in or having a substantial connection with the territory taken over by the successor state.[250] It may indeed be, on the other hand, that such nationals have the right to choose their nationality in such situations, although this is unclear. The Arbitration Commission on Yugoslavia referred in this context to the principle of self-determination as proclaimed in article 1 of the two International Covenants on Human Rights, 1966. The Commission stated that, 'by virtue of that right every individual may choose to belong to whatever ethnic, religious or language community he wishes'. Further, it was noted that:

> In the Commission's view one possible consequence of this principle might be for the members of the Serbian population in Bosnia and Herzegovina and Croatia to be recognised under agreements between the Republics as having the nationality of their choice, with all the rights and obligations which that entails with respect to the states concerned.[251]

In 1997 the European Convention on Nationality was adopted.[252] Article 19 provides that states parties should seek to resolve issues

[250] See Oppenheim's International Law, p. 219.

[251] Opinion No. 2, 92 ILR, pp. 167, 168–9. The Commission concluded by stating that the Republics 'must afford the members of those minorities and ethnic groups [i.e. the Serbian population in Bosnia-Herzegovina and Croatia] all the human rights and fundamental freedoms recognised in international law, including, where appropriate, the right to choose their nationality', ibid., p. 169.

[252] See also the Declaration on the Consequences of State Succession for the Nationality of Natural Persons, European Commission for Democracy Through Law, 1996, CDL-NAT (1996)007e-rev-restr. and the Council of Europe Convention on the Avoidance of Statelessness in Relation to State Succession, 2006, which provides that any person with the nationality of the predecessor state who has or would become stateless as a result of state succession has the right to nationality of a state concerned in accordance with the Convention.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

concerning nationality and state succession by agreement between themselves. Article 18 stipulates that in deciding on the granting or the retention of nationality in cases of state succession, each state party concerned shall take account, in particular, of the genuine and effective link of the person concerned with the state; the habitual residence of the person concerned at the time of state succession; the will of the person concerned and the territorial origin of the person concerned. In the case of non-nationals, article 20 provides for respect for the principle that nationals of a predecessor state habitually resident in the territory over which sovereignty is transferred to a successor state and who have not acquired its nationality shall have the right to remain in that state.

In 1999, the International Law Commission adopted Draft Articles on Nationality of Natural Persons in Relation to a Succession of States.[253] Article 1 (defined as the 'very foundation' of the draft articles[254]), reaffirming the right to a nationality, provides that individuals who on the date of succession had the nationality of the predecessor state, irrespective of the mode of acquisition of that nationality, have the right to the nationality of at least one of the states concerned. States are to take all appropriate measures to prevent persons who had the nationality of the predecessor state on the date of succession from becoming stateless as a result of the succession,[255] while persons having their habitual residence in the territory concerned are presumed to acquire the nationality of the successor state.[256] The intention of the latter provision is to avoid a gap arising between the date of succession and the date of any agreement or legislation granting nationality.[257] Article 11 stipulates that each state concerned shall grant a right to opt for its nationality to persons concerned who have appropriate connection with that state if those persons would otherwise become stateless as a result of the succession of states, and that when this right has been exercised, the state whose nationality they have opted for shall attribute its nationality to such persons. Conversely, the state whose nationality they have renounced shall withdraw its nationality from such persons, unless they would thereby become stateless.

[253] See Report of the International Law Commission on its 51st Session, A/54/10, 1999, p. 12.

[254] Ibid., p. 29.

[255] Article 4. Article 16 provides that persons concerned shall not be arbitrarily deprived of the nationality of the predecessor state nor arbitrarily denied the right to acquire the nationality of the successor state.

[256] Article 5. Article 12 states that the status of persons concerned as habitual residents shall not be affected by the succession of states.

[257] Report of the International Law Commission on its 51st Session, p. 40.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

Article 12 provides that where the acquisition or loss of nationality in relation to the succession of states would impair the unity of a family, the states concerned shall take all appropriate measures to allow that family to remain together or to be reunited.[258]

The second part of the set of draft articles concerns specific succession situations and their implications for nationality. Article 20 concerns the situation where one state transfers part of its territory to another state. Here the successor state shall attribute its nationality to the persons concerned who have their habitual residence in the transferred territory and the predecessor state shall withdraw its nationality from such persons, unless otherwise indicated by the exercise of the right of option which such persons shall be granted. The predecessor state shall not, however, withdraw its nationality before such persons acquire the nationality of the successor state. Where two or more states unite to form one successor state, the successor state shall attribute its nationality to all persons who on the date of succession held the nationality of the predecessor state.[259]

In the case both of the dissolution of the predecessor state to form two or more successor states and the separation of parts of a territory to form one or more successor states while the predecessor state continues to exist, the same fundamental rules apply. Articles 22 and 24 respectively provide that each successor state shall, unless otherwise indicated by the exercise of a right of option,[260] attribute its nationality to (a) persons concerned having their habitual residence in its territory; and (b) other persons concerned having an appropriate legal connection with a constituent unit of the predecessor state that has become part of that successor state; and to (c) persons not otherwise entitled to a nationality of any state concerned having their habitual residence in a third state, who were born in or, before leaving the predecessor state, had their last habitual residence in what has become the territory of that successor state or having any other [258] A child born after the date of succession who has not acquired any nationality has the right to the nationality of the state concerned on whose territory he/she was born, article 13.

[259] Article 21. This the Commission concluded was a rule of customary law: see Report of the International Law Commission on its 51st Session, p. 80.

[260] Article 23 provides that successor states shall grant a right of option to persons concerned covered by the provisions of article 22 who are qualified to acquire the nationality of two or more successor states, while each successor state shall grant a right to opt for its nationality to persons concerned who are not covered by the provisions of article 22. Where the predecessor state continues, article 26 provides that both the predecessor and successor states shall grant a right of option to all persons concerned who are qualified to have the nationality of both the predecessor and successor states or of two or more successor states.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

appropriate connection with that successor state.[261] These provisions are meant to prevent a situation, such as occurred with regard to some successor states of the former Yugoslavia and Czechoslovakia, where the test of nationality of the successor state centred upon the possession of the citizenship of the former constituent republics rather than upon habitual residence, thus having the effect of depriving certain persons of the nationality of the successor state.[262]

Hong Kong[263]

Of particular interest in the context of state succession and the decolonisation process has been the situation with regard to Hong Kong. While Hong Kong island and the southern tip of the Kowloon peninsula (with Stonecutters island) were ceded to Britain in perpetuity,[264] the New Territories (comprising some 92 per cent of the total land area of the territory) were leased to Britain for ninety-nine years commencing 1 July 1898.[265] Accordingly, the British and Chinese governments opened negotiations and in 1984 reached an agreement. This Agreement took the form of a Joint Declaration and Three Annexes[266] and lays down the system under which Hong Kong has been governed as from 1 July 1997. A Hong Kong

[261] In the case of categories (b) and (c), the provision does not apply to persons who have their habitual residence in a third state and also have the nationality of that other or any other state: see article 8.

[262] See Report of the International Law Commission on its 51st Session, pp. 83–5, and J. F. Rezek, 'Le Droit International de la Nationalité', 198 HR, 1986, pp. 342–3. Article 25 provides that in the case where the predecessor state continues, then it shall withdraw its nationality from persons concerned who are qualified to acquire the nationality of the successor state in accordance with article 24. It shall not, however, withdraw its nationality before such persons acquire the nationality of the successor state. Unless otherwise indicated by the exercise of a right of option, the predecessor state shall not, however, withdraw its nationality from such persons who: (a) have their habitual residence in its territory; (b) are not covered by subparagraph (a) and have an appropriate legal connection with a constituent unit of the predecessor state that has remained part of the predecessor state; (c) have their habitual residence in a third state, and were born in or, before leaving the predecessor state, had their last habitual residence in what has remained part of the territory of the predecessor state or have any other appropriate connection with that state.

[263] See e.g. R. Mushkat, One Country, Two International Legal Personalities, Hong Kong, 1997, and Mushkat, 'Hong Kong and Succession of Treaties', 46 ICLQ, 1997, p. 181.

[264] See the Treaty of Nanking, 1842, 30 BFSP, p. 389 and the Convention of Peking, 1860, 50 BFSP, p. 10.

[265] 90 BFSP, p. 17. All three treaties were denounced by China as 'unequal treaties'.

[266] See 23 ILM, 1984, p. 1366.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

Special Administrative Region (SAR) was established, which enjoys a high degree of autonomy, except in foreign and defence affairs. It is vested with executive, legislative and independent judicial power, including that of final adjudication. The laws of Hong Kong remain basically unaffected. The government of the SAR is composed of local inhabitants and the current social and economic systems continue unchanged. The SAR retains the status of a free port and a separate customs territory and remains an international financial centre with a freely convertible currency. Using the name of 'Hong Kong, China', the SAR may on its own maintain and develop economic and cultural relations and conclude relevant agreements with states, regions and relevant international organisations. Existing systems of shipping management continue and shipping certificates relating to the shipping register are issued under the name of 'Hong Kong, China'.

These policies are enshrined in a Basic Law of the SAR to remain unchanged for fifty years. Annex I of the Agreement also provides that public servants in Hong Kong, including members of the police and judiciary, will remain in employment and upon retirement will receive their pension and other benefits due to them on terms no less favourable than before and irrespective of their nationality or place of residence. Airlines incorporated and having their principal place of business in Hong Kong continue to operate and the system of civil aviation management continues. The SAR has extensive authority to conclude agreements in this field. Rights and freedoms in Hong Kong are maintained, including freedoms of the person, of speech, of the press, of assembly, of belief, of movement, to strike and to form and join trade unions. In an important provision, article XIII of Annex I stipulates that the provisions of the International Covenants on Human Rights, 1966 are to continue in force. Accordingly, a high level of succession is provided for, but it is as well to recognise that the Hong Kong situation is unusual.

Suggestions for further reading

M. Craven, 'The Problem of State Succession and the Identity of States under International Law', 9 EJIL, 1998, p. 142

D. P. O'Connell, State Succession in Municipal Law and International Law, Cambridge, 2 vols., 1967

M. N. Shaw, 'State Succession Revisited', 5 Finnish YIL, 1994, p. 34

Succession of States (ed. M. Mrak), The Hague, 1999

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

18

The settlement of disputes by peaceful means

It is fair to say that international law has always considered its fundamental purpose to be the maintenance of peace.[1] Although ethical preoccupations stimulated its development and inform its growth, international law has historically been regarded by the international community primarily as a means to ensure the establishment and preservation of world peace and security. This chapter is concerned with the procedures available within the international order for the peaceful resolution of disputes and conflicts, except for judicial procedures covered elsewhere.[2]

[1] See generally J. G. Merrills, International Dispute Settlement, 4th edn, Cambridge, 2005, and Merrills, 'The Mosaic of International Dispute Settlement Procedures: Complementary or Contradictory?', 54 NILR, 2007, p. 361; F. Orrego Vicuña, International Dispute Settlement in an Evolving Global Society: Constitutionalization, Accessibility, Privatization, Cambridge, 2004; J. Collier and V. Lowe, The Settlement of Disputes in International Law, Cambridge, 1999; United Nations, Handbook on the Peaceful Settlement of Disputes Between States, New York, 1992; L. Henkin, R. C. Pugh, O. Schachter and H. Smit, International Law: Cases and Materials, 3rd edn, St Paul, 1993, chapter 10; David Davies Memorial Institute, International Disputes: The Legal Aspects, London, 1972; K. V. Raman, Dispute Settlement Through the UN, Dobbs Ferry, 1977; O. R. Young, The Intermediaries, Princeton, 1967; D. W. Bowett, 'Contemporary Developments in Legal Techniques in the Settlement of Disputes', 180 HR, 1983, p. 171, and B. S. Murty, 'Settlement of Disputes' in Manual of Public International Law (ed. M. Sørensen), London, 1968, p. 673. See also Nguyen Quoc Dinh, P. Daillier and A. Pellet, Droit International Public, 7th edn, Paris, 2002, p. 821; K. Oellers-Frahm and A. Zimmermann, Dispute Settlement in Public International Law, Berlin, 2001; C. P. Economides, 'L'Obligation de Règlement Pacifique des Différends Internationaux' in Mélanges Boutros-Ghali, Brussels, 1999, p. 405; A. Peters, 'International Dispute Settlement: A Network of Cooperational Duties', 14 EJIL, 2003, p. 1; P. Pazartzis, Les Engagements Internationaux en Matière de Règlement Pacifique des Différends entre États, Paris, 1992, and The UN Decade of International Law: Reflections on International Dispute Settlement (eds. M. Brus, S. Muller and S. Wiemers), Dordrecht, 1991.

[2] See above, chapter 6 with regard to regional human rights courts; chapter 8 with regard to international criminal courts and tribunals; chapter 11 with regard to dispute settlement under the Convention on the Law of the Sea and chapter 19 with regard to the International Court of Justice.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

Basically the techniques of conflict management fall into two categories: diplomatic procedures and adjudication. The former involves an attempt to resolve differences either by the contending parties themselves or with the aid of other entities by the use of the discussion and fact-finding methods. Adjudication procedures involve the determination by a disinterested third party of the legal and factual issues involved, either by arbitration or by the decision of judicial organs.

The political approach to conflict settlement is divided into two sections, with the measures applicable by the United Nations being separately examined (in chapter 22) as they possess a distinctive character. Although for the sake of convenience each method of dispute settlement is separately examined, it should be noted that in any given situation a range of mechanisms may well be utilised. A good example of this is afforded by the successful settlement of the Chad–Libya boundary dispute. Following a long period of conflict and armed hostilities since the dispute erupted in 1973, the two states signed a Framework Agreement on the Peaceful Settlement of the Territorial Dispute on 31 August 1989 in which they undertook to seek a peaceful solution within one year. In the absence of a political settlement, the parties undertook to take the matter to the International Court.[3] After inconclusive negotiations, the dispute was submitted to the International Court by notification of the Framework Agreement by the two parties.[4] The decision of the Court was delivered on 3 February 1994. The Court accepted the argument of Chad that the boundary between the two states was defined by the Franco-Libyan Treaty of 10 August 1955.[5] Following this decision, the two states concluded an agreement providing for Libyan withdrawal from the Aouzou Strip by 30 May 1994. The agreement provided for monitoring of this withdrawal by United Nations observers.[6] The two parties also agreed to establish a joint team of experts to undertake the delimitation of the common frontier in accordance with the decision of the International Court.[7] On 4 May 1994, the Security Council adopted resolution 915 (1994) establishing [3] See Report of the UN Secretary-General, S/1994/512, 27 April 1994, 33 ILM, 1994, p. 786, and generally M. M. Ricciardi, 'Title to the Aouzou Strip: A Legal and Historical Analysis', 17 Yale Journal of International Law, 1992, p. 301.

[4] Libya on 31 August 1990 and Chad on 3 September 1990: see the Libya/Chad case, ICJ Reports, 1994, pp. 6, 14; 100 ILR, pp. 1, 13.

[5] ICJ Reports, 1994, p. 40; 100 ILR, p. 39.

[6] 100 ILR, p. 102, article 1. See also 33 ILM, 1994, p. 619.

[7] 100 ILR, p. 103, article 6. See also the letter of the UN Secretary-General to the Security Council, S/1994/432, 13 April 1994, ibid., pp. 103–4.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

the UN Aouzou Strip Observer Group (UNASOG) and authorising the deployment of observers and support staff for a period up to forty days.[8] On 30 May, Libya and Chad signed a Joint Declaration stating that the withdrawal of the Libyan administration and forces had been effected as of that date to the satisfaction of both parties as monitored by UNASOG.[9] The Security Council terminated the mandate of UNASOG upon the successful conclusion of the mission by resolution 926 (1994) on 13 June that year.[10]

However, states are not obliged to resolve their differences at all, and this applies in the case of serious legal conflicts as well as peripheral political disagreements. All the methods available to settle disputes are operative only upon the consent of the particular states.[11] This, of course, can be contrasted with the situation within municipal systems. It is reflected in the different functions performed by the courts in the international and domestic legal orders respectively, and it is one aspect of the absence of a stable, central focus within the world community.

The mechanisms dealing with the peaceful settlement of disputes require in the first instance the existence of a dispute. The definition of a dispute has been the subject of some consideration by the International Court,[12] but the reference by the Permanent Court in the Mavrommatis Palestine Concessions (Jurisdiction) case[13] to 'a disagreement over a point of law or fact, a conflict of legal views or of interests between two persons' constitutes an authoritative indication. A distinction is sometimes made between legal and political disputes, or justiciable and non-justiciable disputes.[14] Although maintained in some international treaties, it is to some extent unsound, in view of the fact that any dispute will involve some political considerations and many overtly political disagreements may be resolved by judicial means. Whether any dispute is to be termed legal or political may well hinge upon the particular circumstances of [8] Note that on 14 April, the Security Council adopted resolution 910 (1994) by which the initial UN reconnaissance team was exempted from sanctions operating against Libya by virtue of resolution 748 (1992). The observer group received a similar exemption by virtue of resolution 915 B.

[9] See Report of the UN Secretary-General, S/1994/672, 6 June 1994, 100 ILR, pp. 111 ff. The Joint Declaration was countersigned by the Chief Military Observer of UNASOG as a witness.

[10] Ibid., p. 114.

[11] With the exception of binding Security Council resolutions: see further below, chapter 22, p. 1241.

[12] See further below, chapter 19, p. 1067.

[13] PCIJ, Series A, No. 2, 1924, p. 11.

[14] See H. Lauterpacht, The Function of Law in the International Community, London, 1933, especially pp. 19–20.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

the case, the views adopted by the relevant parties and the way in which they choose to characterise their differences. It is in reality extremely difficult to point to objective general criteria clearly differentiating the two.[15] This does not, however, imply that there are not significant differences between the legal and political procedures available for resolving problems. For one thing, the strictly legal approach is dependent upon the provisions of the law as they stand at that point, irrespective of any reforming tendencies the particular court may have, while the political techniques of settlement are not so restricted. It is also not unusual for political and legal organs to deal with aspects of the same basic situation.[16]

The role of political influences and considerations in inter-state disputes is obviously a vital one, and many settlements can only be properly understood within the wider international political context. In addition, how a state proceeds in a dispute will be conditioned by political factors. If the dispute is perceived to be one affecting vital interests, for example, the state would be less willing to submit the matter to binding third party settlement than if it were a more technical issue, while the existence of regional mechanisms will often be of political significance.

Article 2(3) of the United Nations Charter provides that:

> [a]ll members shall settle their international disputes by peaceful means in such a manner that international peace and security and justice are not endangered.

The 1970 Declaration on Principles of International Law Concerning Friendly Relations and Co-operation among States[17] develops this principle and notes that:

> states shall accordingly seek early and just settlement of their international disputes by negotiation, inquiry, mediation, conciliation, arbitration, judicial settlement, resort to regional agencies or arrangements or other peaceful means of their choice.

The same methods of dispute settlement are stipulated in article 33(1) of the UN Charter, although in the context of disputes the continuance of [15] See further below, p. 1067.

[16] See the Iranian Hostages case, ICJ Reports, 1980, pp. 3, 22–3; 61 ILR, pp. 530, 548–9 and the Nicaragua case, ICJ Reports, 1984, pp. 392, 435–6; 76 ILR, pp. 104, 146–7.

[17] General Assembly resolution 2625 (XXV). See also the Manila Declaration on the Peaceful Settlement of International Disputes, General Assembly resolution 37/590; resolutions 2627 (XXV); 2734 (XXV); 40/9; the Declaration on the Prevention and Removal of Disputes and Situations which may Threaten International Peace and Security, resolution 43/51 and the Declaration on Fact-finding, resolution 46/59.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

which are likely to endanger international peace and security. The 1970 Declaration, which is not so limited, asserts that in seeking an early and just settlement, the parties are to agree upon such peaceful means as they see appropriate to the circumstances and nature of the dispute.

There would appear, therefore, to be no inherent hierarchy with respect to the methods specified and no specific method required in any given situation. States have a free choice as to the mechanisms adopted for settling their disputes.[18] This approach is also taken in a number of regional instruments, including the American Treaty on Pacific Settlement (the Pact of Bogotá), 1948 of the Organisation of American States, the European Convention for the Peaceful Settlement of Disputes, 1957 and the Helsinki Final Act of the Conference on Security and Co-operation in Europe, 1975. In addition, it is to be noted that the parties to a dispute have the duty to continue to seek a settlement by other peaceful means agreed by them, in the event of the failure of one particular method. Should the means elaborated fail to resolve a dispute, the continuance of which is likely to endanger the maintenance of international peace and security, the parties under article 37(1) of the Charter, 'shall refer it to the Security Council'.[19]

Diplomatic methods of dispute settlement

Negotiation[20]

Of all the procedures used to resolve differences, the simplest and most utilised form is understandably negotiation. It consists basically of discussions between the interested parties with a view to reconciling divergent [18] See article 33(1) of the UN Charter and section I(3) and (10) of the Manila Declaration.

[19] Emphasis added.

[20] See UN Handbook, chapter II; Collier and Lowe, Settlement, chapter 2; Merrills, International Dispute Settlement, chapter 1, and Merrills, 'Mosaic'; and H. Lachs, 'The Law and Settlement of International Disputes' in Brus et al., Dispute Settlement, pp. 287–9. See also Murty, 'Settlement', pp. 678–9; A. Watson, Diplomacy, London, 1982; F. Kirgis, Prior Consultation in International Law, Charlottesville, 1983; P. J. De Waart, The Element of Negotiation in the Pacific Settlement of Disputes between States, The Hague, 1973; A. Lall, Modern International Negotiation, New York, 1966; G. Geamanu, 'Théorie et Pratique des Négociations en Droit International', 166 HR, 1980 I, p. 365; B. Y. Diallo, Introduction à l'Étude et à la Pratique de la Négociation, Paris, 1998; N. E. Ghozali, 'La Négociation Diplomatique dans la Jurisprudence Internationale', Revue Belge de Droit International, 1992, p. 323, and D. Anderson, 'Negotiations and Dispute Settlement' in Remedies in International Law (ed. M. Evans), Oxford, 1998, p. 111. Note also that operative paragraph 10 of the Manila Declaration emphasises that direct negotiations are a 'flexible and effective means of peaceful settlement'.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

opinions, or at least understanding the different positions maintained. It does not involve any third party, at least at that stage, and so differs from the other forms of dispute management. In addition to being an extremely active method of settlement itself, negotiation is normally the precursor to other settlement procedures as the parties decide amongst themselves how best to resolve their differences.[21] It is eminently suited to the clarification, if not always resolution, of complicated disagreements. It is by mutual discussions that the essence of the differences will be revealed and the opposing contentions elucidated. Negotiations are the most satisfactory means to resolve disputes since the parties are so directly engaged. Negotiations, of course, do not always succeed, since they do depend on a certain degree of mutual goodwill, flexibility and sensitivity. Hostile public opinion in one state may prevent the concession of certain points and mutual distrust may fatally complicate the process, while opposing political attitudes may be such as to preclude any acceptable negotiated agreement.[22]

In certain circumstances there may exist a duty to enter into negotiations arising out of particular bilateral or multilateral agreements.[23] Article 283(1) of the Convention on the Law of the Sea, 1982 provides, for example, that when a dispute arises between states parties concerning the interpretation or application of the Convention, 'the parties to the dispute shall proceed expeditiously to an exchange of views regarding its settlement by negotiation or other peaceful means'.[24] Other treaties may [21] See Judge Nervo, Fisheries Jurisdiction case, ICJ Reports, 1973, pp. 3, 45; 55 ILR, pp. 183, 225. See also the Mavrommatis Palestine Concessions case, PCIJ, Series A, No. 2, 1924, p. 15, noting that 'Before a dispute can be made the subject of an action at law, its subject matter should have been clearly defined by diplomatic negotiations', and the Right of Passage (Preliminary Objections) case, ICJ Reports, 1957, pp. 105, 148; 24 ILR, pp. 840, 848–9. The Court noted in the Free Zones of Upper Savoy and the District of Gex case, PCIJ, Series A, No. 22, p. 13; 5 AD, pp. 461, 463, that the judicial settlement of disputes was 'simply an alternative to the direct and friendly settlement of such disputes between the parties'.

[22] Note that certain treaties provide for consultations in certain circumstances: see article 84 of the Vienna Convention on the Representation of States in their Relations with International Organisations, 1975; article 41 of the Convention on Succession of States in Respect of Treaties, 1978 and article 42 of the Convention on Succession of States in Respect of Property, Archives and Debts, 1983.

[23] See the Fisheries Jurisdiction case, ICJ Reports, 1974, p. 3; 55 ILR, p. 238. See also article 8(2) of the Antarctic Treaty, 1959; article 15 of the Moon Treaty, 1979; article 41 of the Vienna Convention on Succession of States in Respect of Treaties, 1978; article 84 of the Vienna Convention on the Representation of States in their Relations with International Organisations, 1975 and article 283 of the Convention on the Law of the Sea, 1982.

[24] This provision has been discussed by the International Tribunal for the Law of the Sea. See e.g. the Southern Bluefin Tuna cases, 28 ILM, 1999, p. 1624 and the Mox case, 41 ILM, 2002,

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

predicate resort to third-party mechanisms upon the failure of negotiations.[25] In addition, although it has been emphasised that: 'Neither in the Charter or otherwise in international law is any general rule to be found to the effect that the exhaustion of diplomatic negotiations constitutes a precondition for a matter to be referred to the Court',[26] it is possible that tribunals may direct the parties to engage in negotiations in good faith and may indicate the factors to be taken into account in the course of negotiations between the parties.[27] Where there is an obligation to negotiate, this would imply also an obligation to pursue such negotiations as far as possible with a view to concluding agreements.[28] The Court held in the North Sea Continental Shelf cases that:

> the parties are under an obligation to enter into negotiations with a view to arriving at an agreement, and not merely to go through a formal process of negotiation as a sort of prior condition . . . they are under an obligation so to conduct themselves that the negotiations are meaningful, which will not be the case when either of them insists upon its own position without contemplating any modification of it.[29]

p. 405. In the Land Reclamation case, 126 ILR, p. 487, it was held that there was no need to continue the exchange of views where it was clear that the exchange could yield no positive result, ibid., para. 48. In Barbados v. Trinidad and Tobago, arbitral award of 11 April 2006, paras. 201–3, it was held that article 283(1) could not reasonably be interpreted to require that, when several years of negotiations had already failed to resolve the dispute, further and separate exchanges of views would be required. It was noted that the requirement of article 283(1) for settlement by negotiation is in relation to the obligation to agree upon a delimitation under articles 74 and 83, subsumed within the negotiations which those articles require already to have taken place.

[25] See e.g. the Revised General Act for the Settlement of Disputes 1949; the International Maritime Organisation Treaty, 1948 and the Convention on the Law of the Sea, 1982.

[26] Cameroon v. Nigeria (Preliminary Objections), ICJ Reports, 1998, pp. 275, 303.

[27] See the North Sea Continental Shelf cases, ICJ Reports, 1969, pp. 3, 53–4; 41 ILR, pp. 29, 83. See also the Fisheries Jurisdiction case, ICJ Reports, 1974, pp. 3, 32; 55 ILR, pp. 238, 267.

[28] See the Railway Traffic between Lithuania and Poland case, PCIJ, Series A/B, No. 42, p. 116; 6 AD, pp. 403, 405. Section I, paragraph 10 of the Manila Declaration declares that when states resort to negotiations, they should 'negotiate meaningfully, in order to arrive at an early settlement acceptable to the parties'. Article 4(e) of the International Law Association's draft International Instrument on the Protection of the Environment from Damage Caused by Space Debris provides that 'to negotiate in good faith . . . means inter alia not only to hold consultations or talks but also to pursue them with a view of reaching a solution': see Report of the Sixty-sixth Conference, Buenos Aires, 1994, p. 319.

[29] ICJ Reports, 1969, pp. 3, 47; 41 ILR, pp. 29, 76. The Court has noted that, 'like all similar obligations to negotiate in international law, the negotiations have to be conducted in good faith', Cameroon v. Nigeria, ICJ Reports, 2002, pp. 303, 423. Questions as to the meaning

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

The Court in the German External Debts case emphasised that although an agreement to negotiate did not necessarily imply an obligation to reach an agreement, 'it does imply that serious efforts towards that end will be made'.[30] In the Lac Lanoux arbitration, it was stated that 'consultations and negotiations between the two states must be genuine, must comply with the rules of good faith and must not be mere formalities'.[31] Examples of infringement of the rules of good faith were held to include the unjustified breaking off of conversations, unusual delays and systematic refusal to give consideration to proposals or adverse interests.[32]

The point was also emphasised by the International Court in the Legality of the Threat or Use of Nuclear Weapons, where it noted the reference in article VI of the Treaty on the Non-Proliferation of Nuclear Weapons to 'pursue negotiations in good faith on effective measures relating to cessation of the nuclear arms race at an early date and to nuclear disarmament, and on a treaty on general and complete disarmament under strict and effective international control'. The Court then declared that:

> The legal import of that obligation goes beyond that of a mere obligation of conduct: the obligation involved here is an obligation to achieve a precise result – nuclear disarmament in all it aspects – by adopting a particular course of conduct, namely, the pursuit of negotiations on the matter in good faith.[33]

Where disputes are by their continuance likely to endanger the maintenance of international peace and security, article 33 of the UN Charter provides that the parties to such disputes shall first of all seek a solution by negotiation, inquiry or mediation, and then resort, if the efforts have not borne fruit, to more complex forms of resolution.[34] of 'negotiations' arose in both Nicaragua v. Honduras, ICJ Reports, 1988, pp. 69, 99 and Democratic Republic of the Congo v. Rwanda, ICJ Reports, 2006, pp. 6, 46 ff.

[30] 47 ILR, pp. 418, 454. [31] 24 ILR, pp. 101, 119.

[32] Ibid., p. 128. See also the Tacna–Arica Arbitration, 2 RIAA, pp. 921 ff.

[33] ICJ Reports, 1996, pp. 226, 263–4; 110 ILR, pp. 163, 213–14. The Court usually urges the parties to negotiate when making an order granting (or indeed declining) provisional measures: see e.g. the Great Belt case, ICJ Reports, 1991, p. 12 and the Pulp Mills on the River Uruguay orders of 13 July 2006 and 23 January 2007. See further as to provisional measures, below, chapter 19, p. 1093.

[34] See the North Sea Continental Shelf cases, ICJ Reports, 1969, pp. 3, 47; 41 ILR, pp. 29, 77 and the Fisheries Jurisdiction cases, ICJ Reports, 1974, pp. 3, 32; 55 ILR, p. 267.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

Good offices and mediation[35]

The employment of the procedures of good offices and mediation involves the use of a third party, whether an individual or individuals, a state or group of states or an international organisation, to encourage the contending parties to come to a settlement. Unlike the techniques of arbitration and adjudication, the process aims at persuading the parties to a dispute to reach satisfactory terms for its termination by themselves. Provisions for settling the dispute are not prescribed.

Technically, good offices are involved where a third party attempts to influence the opposing sides to enter into negotiations, whereas mediation implies the active participation in the negotiating process of the third party itself. In fact, the dividing line between the two approaches is often difficult to maintain as they tend to merge into one another, depending upon the circumstances. One example of the good offices method is the role played by the US President in 1906 in concluding the Russian–Japanese War,[36] or the function performed by the USSR in assisting in the peaceful settlement of the India–Pakistan dispute in 1965.[37] Another might be the part played by France in encouraging US–North Vietnamese negotiations to begin in Paris in the early 1970s.[38] A mediator, such as the US Secretary of State in the Middle East in 1973–4,[39] has an active and vital function to perform in seeking to cajole the disputing parties into accepting what are often his own proposals. It is his responsibility to reconcile the different claims and improve the atmosphere pervading the discussions. The UN Secretary-General can sometimes play an important role [35] See UN Handbook, p. 33; Collier and Lowe, Settlement, p. 27; Merrills, International Dispute Settlement, chapter 2; R. R. Probst, 'Good Offices' In the Light of Swiss International Practice and Experience, Dordrecht, 1989; New Approaches to International Mediation (eds. C. R. Mitchell and K. Webb), New York, 1988; J. Brierly, The Law of Nations, 6th edn, Oxford, 1963, pp. 373–6, and Murty, 'Settlement', pp. 680–1. See also International Mediation in Theory and Practice (eds. S. Touval and I. W. Zartman), Boulder, 1985, and Mediation in International Relations (eds. J. Bercovitch and J. Z. Rubin), London, 1992.

[36] Murty, 'Settlement', p. 681. Note also the exercise of US good offices in relation to a territorial dispute between France in regard to its protectorate of Cambodia and Thailand, SCOR, First Year, 81st meeting, pp. 505–7.

[37] See GAOR, 21st session, supp. no. 2, part I, chapter III.

[38] See AFDI, 1972, pp. 995–6. Note also the role played by Cardinal Samoré, a Papal mediator in the Beagle Channel dispute between Argentina and Chile, between 1978 and 1985: see Merrills, International Dispute Settlement, p. 30, and 24 ILM, 1985, pp. 1 ff. See also below, p. 1054.

[39] See DUSPIL, 1974, pp. 656–8 and ibid., pp. 759–62.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

by the exercise of his good offices.[40] An example of this was provided in the situation relating to Afghanistan in 1988. The Geneva Agreements of that year specifically noted that a representative of the Secretary-General would lend his good offices to the parties.[41] Good offices may also be undertaken by the Secretary-General jointly with office-holders of regional organisations.[42]

The Hague Conventions of 1899 and 1907 laid down many of the rules governing these two processes. It was stipulated that the signatories to the treaties had a right to offer good offices or mediation, even during hostilities, and that the exercise of the right was never to be regarded by either of the contending sides as an unfriendly act.[43] It was also explained that such procedures were not binding. The Conventions laid a duty upon the parties to a serious dispute or conflict to resort to good offices or mediation as far as circumstances allow, before having recourse to arms.[44] This, of course, has to be seen in the light of the relevant Charter provisions regarding the use of force, but it does point to the part that should be played by these diplomatic procedures.

Inquiry[45]

Where differences of opinion on factual matters underlie a dispute between parties, the logical solution is often to institute a commission of [40] See Security Council resolution 367 (1975) requesting the UN Secretary-General to undertake a good offices mission to Cyprus. See the statement by the Secretary-General of the functions of good offices cited in UN Handbook, pp. 35–6. See also B. G. Ramcharan, 'The Good Offices of the United Nations Secretary-General in the Field of Human Rights', 76 AJIL, 1982, p. 130. Note also paragraph 12 of the Declaration on the Prevention and Removal of Disputes and Situations Which May Threaten International Peace and Security, 1988, General Assembly resolution 43/51. See also below, chapter 22, p. 1222.

[41] S/19835, annex. See also Security Council resolution 622 (1988).

[42] For example with the Chairman of the Organisation of African Unity with regard to the Western Sahara and Mayotte situations, UN Handbook, p. 39, and with the Secretary-General of the Organisation of American States with regard to Central America, ibid.

[43] Article 3 of Hague Convention No. I, 1899 and Convention No. I, 1907.

[44] Ibid., article 2.

[45] See Collier and Lowe, Settlement, p. 24; Merrills, International Dispute Settlement, chapter 3, and N. Bar-Yaacov, The Handling of International Disputes by Means of Inquiry, London, 1974. See also UN Handbook, pp. 24 ff.; T. Bensalah, L'Enquête Internationale dans le Règlement des Conflits, Paris, 1976; P. Ruegger, 'Quelques Réflexions sur le Rôle Actuel et Futur des Commissions Internationales d'Enquête' in Mélanges Bindschedler, Paris, 1980, p. 427, and Ruegger, 'Nouvelles Réflexions sur le Rôle des Procédures Internationales d'Enquête dans la Solution des Conflits Internationaux' in Études en l'Honneur de Robert Ago, Milan, 1987, p. 327.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

inquiry to be conducted by reputable observers to ascertain precisely the facts in contention.[46] Provisions for such inquiries were first elaborated in the 1899 Hague Conference as a possible alternative to the use of arbitration.[47] However, the technique is limited in that it can only have relevance in the case of international disputes, involving neither the honour nor the vital interests of the parties, where the conflict centres around a genuine disagreement as to particular facts which can be resolved by recourse to an impartial and conscientious investigation.[48]

Inquiry was most successfully used in the Dogger Bank incident of 1904 where Russian naval ships fired on British fishing boats in the belief that they were hostile Japanese torpedo craft.[49] The Hague provisions were put into effect[50] and the report of the international inquiry commission contributed to a peaceful settlement of the issue.[51] This encouraged an elaboration of the technique by the 1907 Hague Conference,[52] and a wave of support for the procedure.[53] The United States, for instance, concluded forty-eight bilateral treaties between 1913 and 1940 with provisions in each one of them for the creation of a permanent inquiry commission. These agreements were known as the 'Bryan treaties'.[54]

[46] Inquiry as a specific procedure under consideration here is to be distinguished from the general process of inquiry or fact-finding as part of other mechanisms for dispute settlement, such as through the UN or other institutions. See Fact-Finding Before International Tribunals (ed. R. B. Lillich), Charlottesville, 1992.

[47] See Bar-Yaacov, International Disputes, chapter 2. The incident of the destruction of the US battleship Maine in 1898, which precipitated the American–Spanish War, was particularly noted as an impetus to the evolution of inquiry as an important 'safety valve' mechanism, ibid., pp. 33–4. This was particularly in the light of the rival national inquiries that came to opposing conclusions in that episode: see the inquiry commission in that case, Annual Register, 1898, p. 362.

[48] Article 9, 1899 Hague Convention for the Pacific Settlement of International Disputes.

[49] Bar-Yaacov, International Disputes, chapter 3. See also Merrills, International Dispute Settlement, pp. 47 ff., and J. B. Scott, The Hague Court Reports, New York, 1916, p. 403.

[50] The Commission of Inquiry consisted of four naval officers of the UK, Russian, French and American fleets, plus a fifth member chosen by the other four (in the event an Austro-Hungarian). It was required to examine all the circumstances, particularly with regard to responsibility and blame.

[51] It was found that there was no justification for the Russian attack. In the event, both sides accepted the report and the sum of £65,000 was paid by Russia to the UK, Bar-Yaacov, International Disputes, p. 70.

[52] Ibid., chapter 4. Note also the Tavignano inquiry, Scott, Hague Court Reports, New York, 1916, p. 413; the Tiger inquiry, Bar-Yaacov, International Disputes, p. 156, and the Tubantia inquiry, Scott, Hague Court Reports, New York, 1932, p. 135. See also Merrills, International Dispute Settlement, pp. 49 ff., and Bar-Yaacov, International Disputes, pp. 141–79.

[53] Bar-Yaacov, International Disputes, chapter 5.

[54] These were prefigured by the Taft or Knox Treaties of 1911 (which did not come into operation), ibid., pp. 113–17. The USSR also signed a number of treaties which provide for joint inquiries with regard to frontier incidents, ibid., pp. 117–19.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

However, the use of commissions of inquiry in accordance with the Hague Convention of 1907 proved in practice to be extremely rare. The Red Crusader inquiry of 1962[55] followed an interval of some forty years since the previous inquiry. This concerned an incident between a British trawler and a Danish fisheries protection vessel, which subsequently involved a British frigate. Although instituted as a fact-finding exercise, it did incorporate judicial aspects. A majority of the Commission were lawyers and the procedures followed a judicial pattern. In addition, aspects of the report reflected legal findings, such as the declaration that the firing on the trawler by the Danish vessel in an attempt to stop it escaping arrest for alleged illegal fishing, 'exceeded legitimate use of armed force'.[56] In the Letelier and Moffitt case, the only decision to date under one of the Bryan treaties, a US–Chile Commission was established in order to determine the amount of compensation that would be paid by Chile to the US in respect of an assassination alleged to have been carried out by it in Washington DC.[57] As in the Red Crusader inquiry, the Commission in its decision in January 1992 made a number of judicial determinations and the proceedings were conducted less as a fact-finding inquiry and more as an arbitration.[58]

The value of inquiry within specified institutional frameworks, nevertheless, has been evident. Its use has increased within the United Nations generally[59] and in the specialised agencies.[60] Inquiry is also part of other [55] Ibid., pp. 179–95, and Merrills, International Dispute Settlement, pp. 53 ff. See also 35 ILR, p. 485; Cmnd 776, and E. Lauterpacht, The Contemporary Practice of the UK in the Field of International Law, London, 1962, vol. I, pp. 50–3.

[56] Lauterpacht, Contemporary Practice, p. 53; Merrills, International Dispute Settlement, p. 55, and Bar-Yaacov, International Disputes, p. 192.

[57] Chile denied liability but agreed to make an ex gratia payment equal to the amount of compensation that would be payable upon a finding of liability, such amount to be determined by the Commission.

[58] 88 ILR, p. 727, and see Merrills, International Dispute Settlement, pp. 56 ff.

[59] See the announcement by the UN Secretary-General of a mission in 1988 to Iran and Iraq to investigate the situation of prisoners of war at the request of those states, S/20147. See also Security Council resolution 384 (1975) concerning East Timor. The General Assembly adopted a Declaration on Fact-Finding in resolution 46/59 (1991). See also the operation of the UN Compensation Commission established to resolve claims against Iraq resulting from its invasion of Kuwait in 1990 and described by the UN Secretary-General as performing an 'essentially fact-finding function', S/2259, 1991, para. 20: see Collier and Lowe, Settlement, p. 42, and Merrills, International Dispute Settlement, p. 61, and the work of the World Bank Inspection Panel. See further below, pp. 1040 and 1042.

[60] See article 26 of the Constitution of the International Labour Organisation. See also the inquiry by the International Civil Aviation Organisation in 1983 into the shooting down of a Korean airliner, Collier and Lowe, Settlement, p. 26.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

processes of dispute settlement in the context of general fact-finding.[61] But inquiry as a separate mechanism in accordance with the Hague Convention of 1907 has fallen out of favour.[62] In many disputes, of course, the determination of the relevant circumstances would simply not aid a settlement, whilst its nature as a third-party involvement in a situation would discourage some states.

Conciliation[63]

The process of conciliation involves a third-party investigation of the basis of the dispute and the submission of a report embodying suggestions for a settlement. As such it involves elements of both inquiry and mediation, and in fact the process of conciliation emerged from treaties providing for permanent inquiry commissions.[64] Conciliation reports are only proposals and as such do not constitute binding decisions.[65] They are thus different from arbitration awards. The period between the world wars was the heyday for conciliation commissions and many treaties made provision for them as a method for resolving disputes. But the process

[61] Note, for example, article 90 of Protocol I to the Geneva Red Cross Conventions, 1949 providing for the establishment of an International Fact-Finding Commission, and Security Council resolution 780 (1992) establishing a Commission of Experts to investigate violations of international humanitarian law in the Former Yugoslavia: see M. C. Bassiouni, 'The United Nations Commission of Experts Established Pursuant to Security Council Resolution 780 (1992)', 88 AJIL, 1994, p. 784.

[62] Note, however, the Permanent Court of Arbitration's Optional Rules for Fact-Finding Commissions of Inquiry, effective December 1997: see http://pca-cpa.org/ENGLISH/BD/inquiryenglish.htm.

[63] See UN Handbook, pp. 45 ff.; Lauterpacht, Function of Law, pp. 260–9; Merrills, International Dispute Settlement, chapter 4; Collier and Lowe, Settlement, p. 29; Murty, 'Settlement', pp. 682–3; H. Fox, 'Conciliation' in David Davies Memorial Institute, International Disputes, p. 93; J. P. Cot, La Conciliation Internationale, Paris, 1968; Bowett, 'Contemporary Developments', chapter 2; V. Degan, 'International Conciliation: Its Past and Future', Völkerrecht und Rechtsphilosophie, 1980, p. 261; and R. Donner, 'The Procedure of International Conciliation: Some Historical Aspects', 1 Journal of the History of International Law, 1999, p. 103.

[64] See Murty, 'Settlement'. Merrills notes that by 1940, nearly 200 conciliation treaties had been concluded, International Dispute Settlement, p. 66.

[65] See paragraph 6 of the annex to the Vienna Convention on the Law of Treaties, 1969. The Vienna Convention for the Protection of the Ozone Layer, 1985 provides that conciliation awards should be considered in good faith, while article 85(7) of the Vienna Convention on the Representation of States in their Relations with International Organisations provides that any party to the dispute may declare unilaterally that it will abide by the recommendations in the report as far as it is concerned. Note that article 14(3) of the Treaty Establishing the Organisation of Eastern Caribbean States, 1981 stipulates that member states undertake to accept the conciliation procedure as compulsory.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

has not been widely employed and certainly has not justified the faith evinced in it by states between 1920 and 1938.[66]

Nevertheless, conciliation processes do have a role to play. They are extremely flexible and by clarifying the facts and discussing proposals may stimulate negotiations between the parties. The rules dealing with conciliation were elaborated in the 1928 General Act on the Pacific Settlement of International Disputes (revised in 1949). The function of the commissions was defined to include inquiries and mediation techniques. Such commissions were to be composed of five persons, one appointed by each opposing side and the other three to be appointed by agreement from amongst the citizens of third states. The proceedings were to be concluded within six months and were not to be held in public. The conciliation procedure was intended to deal with mixed legal–factual situations and to operate quickly and informally.[67]

There have of late been a number of proposals to reactivate the conciliation technique, but how far they will succeed in their aim remains to be seen.[68] A number of multilateral treaties do, however, provide for conciliation as a means of resolving disputes. The 1948 American Treaty of Pacific Settlement; 1957 European Convention for the Peaceful Settlement of Disputes; the 1964 Protocol on the Commission of Mediation, Conciliation and Arbitration to the Charter of the Organisation of African Unity (now the African Union); the 1969 Vienna Convention on the Law of Treaties; the 1981 Treaty Establishing the Organisation of Eastern Caribbean States; the 1975 Convention on the Representation of States in their Relations with International Organisations; the 1978 Vienna

[66] But note the Chaco Commission, 1929, the Franco-Siamese Conciliation Commission, 1947 and the Franco-Swiss Commission, 1955: see Merrills, International Dispute Settlement, pp. 67 ff. See also Bar-Yaacov, International Disputes, chapter 7.

[67] Article 15(1) of the Geneva General Act as amended provides that 'The task of the Conciliation Commission shall be to elucidate the questions in dispute, to collect with that object all necessary information by means of enquiry or otherwise, and to endeavour to bring the parties to an agreement. It may, after the case has been examined, inform the parties of the terms of settlement which seem suitable to it, and lay down the period within which they are to make their decision.'

[68] See the Regulations on the Procedure of Conciliation adopted by the Institut de Droit International, Annuaire de l'Institut de Droit International, 1961, pp. 374 ff. See also the UN Model Rules for the Conciliation of Disputes Between States, 1995, General Assembly resolution 50/50, and the Optional Conciliation Rules adopted by the Permanent Court of Arbitration in 1996: see Basic Documents: Conventions, Rules, Model Clauses and Guidelines, The Hague, 1998. Note also the Optional Rules for Conciliation of Disputes Relating to Natural Resources and the Environment adopted by the Permanent Court of Arbitration in April 2002.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

Convention on Succession of States in respect of Treaties; the 1982 Convention on the Law of the Sea and the 1985 Vienna Convention on the Protection of the Ozone Layer, for example, all contain provisions concerning conciliation.

The conciliation procedure was used in the Iceland–Norway dispute over the continental shelf delimitation between Iceland and Jan Mayen island.[69] The agreement establishing the Conciliation Commission stressed that the question was the subject of continuing negotiations and that the Commission report would not be binding, both elements characteristic of the conciliation method. The Commission had also to take into account Iceland's strong economic interests in the area as well as other factors. The role of the concept of natural prolongation within continental shelf delimitation was examined as well as the legal status of islands and relevant state practice and court decisions. The solution proposed by the Commission was for a joint development zone, an idea that would have been unlikely to come from a judicial body reaching a decision solely on the basis of the legal rights of the parties. In other words, the flexibility of the conciliation process seen in the context of continued negotiations between the parties was demonstrated.[70]

Such commissions have also been established outside the framework of specific treaties, for example by the United Nations. Instances would include the Conciliation Commission for Palestine under General Assembly resolution 194 (III), 1948, and the Conciliation Commission for the Congo under resolution 1474 (ES-IV) of 1960.

International institutions and dispute settlement[71]

Regional organisations[72]

Article 52(1) of Chapter VIII of the UN Charter provides that nothing in the Charter precludes the existence of regional arrangements or agencies

[69] 20 ILM, 1981, p. 797; 62 ILR, p. 108. The Commission Report was accepted by the parties, 21 ILM, 1982, p. 1222.

[70] See also the 1929 Chaco Conciliation Commission; the 1947 Franco-Siamese Commission; the 1952 Belgian–Danish Commission; the 1954–5 Franco-Swiss Commission and the 1958 Franco-Mexican Commission. See UN Handbook, p. 48 and Nguyen Quoc Dinh et al., Droit International Public, p. 838.

[71] See below, chapter 22 for peaceful settlement of disputes through the United Nations and chapter 23 generally with regard to international institutions.

[72] See Bowett's Law of International Institutions (eds. P. Sands and P. Klein), 5th edn, London, 2001; Merrills, International Dispute Settlement, chapter 11; Murty, 'Settlement', pp. 725–8; K. Oellers-Frahm and N. Wühler, Dispute Settlement in Public International Law, New York, 1984, pp. 92 ff., and Nguyen Quoc Dinh et al., Droit International Public, pp. 838 ff.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

for dealing with such matters relating to the maintenance of international peace and security as are appropriate for regional action, provided that such arrangements or agencies and their activities are consistent with the purposes and principles of the UN.[73] Article 52(2) stipulates that members of the UN entering into such arrangements or agencies are to make every effort to settle local disputes peacefully through such regional arrangements or by such regional agencies before referring them to the Security Council, and that the Security Council encourages the development of the peaceful settlement of local disputes through such regional arrangements. That having been said, article 52(4) stresses that the application of articles 34 and 35 of the UN Charter relating to the roles of the Security Council and General Assembly remains unaffected.[74] The supremacy of the Security Council is reinforced by article 53(1) which provides that while the Council may, where appropriate, utilise such regional arrangements or agencies for enforcement action under its authority, 'no enforcement action shall be taken under regional arrangements or by regional agencies without the authorisation of the Security Council'. It should also be noted that by article 24 the Security Council possesses 'primary responsibility for the maintenance of international peace and security', while article 103 of the Charter emphasises that, in the event of a conflict between the obligations of a UN member under the Charter and obligations under any other international agreement, the former are to prevail.[75] In addition, under article 36, the Security Council may 'at any stage of a dispute . . . recommend appropriate procedures or methods of adjustment',[76] while article 37 provides that should the parties to a dispute fail to settle it, they 'shall refer it to the Security Council'. Furthermore, should the Council itself deem that the continuance of a dispute is likely to endanger the maintenance of international peace and security, 'it shall decide whether to take action under article 36 or to recommend such terms of settlement as it may consider appropriate'.[77] Thus, although reference where appropriate to regional organisations or arrangements should take place, this [73] See The Charter of the United Nations (ed. B. Simma), 2nd edn, Oxford, 2002, pp. 807 ff. See also H. Saba, 'Les Accords Régionaux dans la Charte des Nations Unies', 80 HR, 1952 I, p. 635; D. E. Acevedo, 'Disputes under Consideration by the UN Security Council or Regional Bodies' in The International Court of Justice at a Crossroads (ed. L. F. Damrosch), Dobbs Ferry, 1987; B. Andemicael, Regionalism and the United Nations, Dobbs Ferry, 1979; J. M. Yepes, 'Les Accords Régionaux et le Droit International', 71 HR, 1947 II, p. 235.

[74] See further below, chapter 22, p. 1273.

[75] See the Nicaragua case, ICJ Reports, 1984, pp. 392, 440; 76 ILR, pp. 104, 151.

[76] This refers to disputes the continuance of which is likely to endanger the maintenance of international peace and security, article 33.

[77] Article 37(2).

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

does not affect the comprehensive role of the UN through the Security Council or General Assembly in dealing in various ways with disputes between states.[78] While provisions contained in regional instruments may prevent or restrict resort to mechanisms outside those instruments,[79] this does not constrain in any way the authority or competence of the UN.[80] In many cases, a matter may be simultaneously before both the UN and a regional organisation and such concurrent jurisdiction does not constitute a jurisdictional problem for the UN.[81] In practice and in relation to the adoption of active measures, the UN is likely to defer to appropriate regional mechanisms while realistic chances exist for a regional settlement.[82]

Various regional organisations have created machinery for the settlement of disputes.

The African Union (Organisation of African Unity)[83]

The Organisation of African Unity was established in 1963. Article XIX of its Charter referred to the principle of 'the peaceful settlement of disputes [78] Note that section I, paragraph 6 of the Manila Declaration on the Pacific Settlement of International Disputes adopted in General Assembly resolution 37/10, 1982, provides that states parties to relevant regional arrangements or agencies shall make every effort to settle disputes through such mechanisms, but that this 'does not preclude states from bringing any dispute to the attention of the Security Council or of the General Assembly in accordance with the Charter of the United Nations'.

[79] See below, p. 1273.

[80] See M. Bartos, 'L'ONU et la Co-opération Régionale', 27 RGDIP, 1956, p. 7.

[81] The International Court noted in the Nicaragua case, ICJ Reports, 1984, pp. 392, 440; 76 ILR, pp. 104, 151, in the context of contended regional discussions, that 'even the existence of active negotiations in which both parties might be involved should not prevent both the Security Council and the Court from exercising their separate functions under the Charter and the Statute of the Court'.

[82] In such cases, the Security Council is likely to inscribe the dispute on its agenda and, providing the dispute is not one actually endangering international peace and security, refer the matter to the appropriate regional agency under article 52(2) and (3), keeping it under review on the agenda: see UN Handbook, p. 96.

[83] See e.g. K. D. Magliveras and G. J. Naldi, The African Union and the Predecessor Organisation of African Unity, The Hague, 2004. The Organisation of African Unity was established in 1963 and replaced by the African Union with the coming into force of the Constitutive Act in May 2001. As to the OAU, see generally T. Maluwa, 'The Peaceful Settlement of Disputes among African States, 1963–1983: Some Conceptual Issues and Practical Trends', 38 ICLQ, 1989, p. 299; S. G. Amoo and I. W. Zartman, 'Mediation by Regional Organisations: The Organisation of African Unity (OAU) in Chad' in Bercovitch and Rubin, Mediation in International Relations, p. 131; B. Boutros Ghali, L'Organisation de l'Unité Africaine, Paris, 1968; M. Bedjaoui, 'Le Règlement Pacifique des Différends Africains', AFDI, 1972, p. 85; B. Andemicael, Le Règlement Pacifique des Différends Survenant entre États Africains, New York, 1973; E. Jouve, L'Organisation de l'Unité Africaine, Paris, 1984; T. O. Elias,

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

by negotiation, mediation, conciliation or arbitration' and to assist in achieving this a Commission of Mediation, Conciliation and Arbitration was established by the Protocol of 21 July 1964.[84] The jurisdiction of the Commission was not, however, compulsory and it was not utilised. African states were historically unwilling to resort to judicial or arbitral methods of dispute settlement and in general preferred informal third-party involvement through the medium of the OAU. In the Algeria–Morocco boundary dispute,[85] for example, the OAU established an ad hoc commission consisting of the representatives of seven African states to seek to achieve a settlement of issues arising out of the 1963 clashes.[86] Similarly in the Somali–Ethiopian conflict,[87] a commission was set up by the OAU in an attempt to mediate.[88] This commission failed to resolve the dispute, although it did reaffirm the principle of the inviolability of frontiers of member states as attained at the time of independence.[89] In a third case, the Western Sahara dispute,[90] an OAU committee was established in July 1978, which sought unsuccessfully to reach a settlement in the conflict,[91] while the OAU also established committees to try to mediate in the Chad civil war, again with little success.[92] Despite mixed success, it became fairly established practice that in a dispute involving African states, initial recourse will be made to OAU mechanisms, primarily ad hoc commissions or committees.

In an attempt to improve the mechanisms available, the OAU approved a Mechanism for Conflict Prevention, Management and Resolution in 1993 (termed the Cairo Declaration).[93] It was intended to anticipate and Africa and the Development of International Law, Leiden, 1972; Z. Cervenka, The Organisation of African Unity and its Charter, London, 1968, and M. N. Shaw, 'Dispute Settlement in Africa', 37 YBWA, 1983, p. 149.

84 Elias, Africa, chapter 9.

85 See I. Brownlie, African Boundaries, London, 1979, p. 55, and M. N. Shaw, Title to Territory in Africa: International Legal Issues, Oxford, 1986, pp. 196–7.

86 See Keesing's Contemporary Archives, pp. 19939–40, and Shaw, 'Dispute Settlement', p. 153.

87 See Brownlie, African Boundaries, p. 826. See also Shaw, Title to Territory, pp. 197–201.

88 Africa Research Bulletin, May 1973, p. 2845 and ibid., June 1973, pp. 2883–4 and 2850.

89 Ibid., August 1980, pp. 5763–4. This is the principle of uti possidetis: see further above, chapter 10, p. 525.

90 See Shaw, Title to Territory, pp. 123 ff.

91 Ibid., and Shaw, 'Dispute Settlement', pp. 160–2.

92 Shaw, 'Dispute Settlement', pp. 158–60.

93 AHG/Dec. 1 (XXVIII) and see the Report of the OAU Secretary-General, Doc. CM/1747 (LVIII) and AHG/Dec. 3 (XXIX), 1993. See also M. C. Djiena-Wembon, 'A Propos du Nouveau Mécanisme de l'OUA sur les Conflits', 98 RGDIP, 1994, p. 377, and R. Ranjeva, 'Reflections on the Proposals for the Establishment of a Pan-African Mechanism for the Prevention and Settlement of Conflicts' in Towards More Effective Supervision by International Organisations (eds. N. Blokker and S. Muller), Dordrecht, 1994, vol. I, p. 93.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

prevent situations of potential conflict from developing further; however, it was not successful and in 2001 the OAU Assembly decided to incorporate the Central Organ of the Mechanism as one of the organs of the African Union (which had come into force in May that year).[94] The Protocol Relating to the Establishment of the Peace and Security Council of the African Union was adopted by the First Ordinary Session of the Assembly of the African Union on 9 July 2002.[95] This instrument creates the Peace and Security Council as a 'standing decision-making organ for the prevention, management and resolution of conflicts', to be supported by the Commission of the African Union,[96] a Panel of the Wise,[97] a Continental Early Warning System,[98] an African Standby Force[99] and a Special Fund.[100] A series of guiding principles are laid down, including early response to crises, respect for the rule of law and human rights, respect for the sovereignty and territorial integrity of member states and respect for borders inherited on the achievement of independence.[101] The Council is composed of fifteen members based on equitable regional representation and rotation[102] and its functions include the promotion of peace, security and stability in Africa; early warning and preventive diplomacy; peacemaking including the use of good offices, mediation, conciliation and inquiry; peace-support operations and intervention; peace-building; and humanitarian action.[103] Article 9 provides that the Council 'shall take initiatives and action it deems appropriate' with regard to situations of potential and full-blown conflicts and shall use its discretion to effect

[94] See e.g. C. A. A. Packer and D. Rukare, 'The New African Union and its Constitutive Act', 96 AJIL, 2002, p. 365.

[95] This is stated to replace the Cairo Declaration 1993 and to supersede the resolution and decisions of the OAU relating to the Mechanism for Conflict Prevention, Management and Resolution in Africa which are in conflict with the Protocol: see article 22(1) and (2).

[96] See further article 10.

[97] This is to be composed of five highly respected African personalities selected by the chairperson of the Commission after consultation with the member states concerned and shall undertake such action at the request of the Council or chairperson of the Commission or at its own initiative as deemed appropriate for the prevention of conflicts: see article 11.

[98] This is to include an observation and monitoring centre to be known as 'the situation room' located at the Conflict Management Directorate of the African Union, together with observation and monitoring units of the Regional Mechanisms: see article 12.

[99] This is to consist of standby multidisciplinary contingents and shall perform functions such as observation missions, peace support missions, interventions, preventive deployment, peace-building and humanitarian assistance: see articles 13–15.

[100] Article 2. [101] Article 4. [102] Article 5.

[103] Article 6. See also the list of powers in article 7.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

entry, whether through the collective intervention of the Council itself or through its chairperson and/or the chairperson of the Commission, the Panel of the Wise, and/or in collaboration with the regional mechanisms.[104] The Protocol came into force on 26 December 2003.

There are in addition a number of subregional organisations in Africa which are playing an increasing role in conflict resolution. First and foremost is the Economic Community of West African States (ECOWAS) created in 1975. The constituent instrument was revised in 1993[105] and article 58 of the revised treaty refers to the responsibility of ECOWAS to prevent and settle regional conflicts, with the ECOWAS Cease-fire Monitoring Group (ECOMOG) as the adopted regional intervention force. The mission of ECOWAS is to promote economic integration and its institutions include the Authority of Heads of State and Government; the Council of Ministers; the Community Parliament; the Economic and Social Council; the Community Court of Justice; a secretariat and a co-operation fund. ECOWAS intervened in the Liberian civil war in 1990 via a Cease-Fire Monitoring Group (ECOMOG)[106] and has been concerned with the conflicts in Sierra Leone and Guinea-Bissau.[107] An ECOWAS Mechanism for Conflict Prevention, Management and Resolution, Peacekeeping and Security was established in 1999 and a Protocol on Democracy and Good Governance adopted in 2001.[108]

The Southern African Development Community (SADC) was established in 1992.[109] In 1996 it decided to establish an Organ on Politics, Defence and Security Co-operation and in 2001 it adopted a Protocol on Politics, Defence and Security Co-operation.[110] Under this Protocol, [104] See further article 16.

[105] There was a further revision in the Protocol of 2001 adopted at Dakar.

[106] See e.g. Regional Peace-Keeping and International Enforcement: The Liberian Crisis (ed. M. Weller), Cambridge, 1994, and see further below, chapter 22, p. 1276.

[107] See e.g. Security Council resolutions 1132 (1997) and 1233 (1999).

[108] The Mechanism's highest decision-making body is the Authority, consisting of the heads of state, with powers to act on all matters concerning conflict prevention, management and resolution, peace-keeping, security, humanitarian support, peace-building, control of cross-border crime and proliferation of small arms, see article 6, while a nine-person Mediation and Security Council is mandated to take appropriate decisions under the Protocol on behalf of the Authority, see articles 7–10. See also Security Council resolution 1197 (1998).

[109] See e.g. B. Chigora, 'The SAD Community', 11 African Journal of International and Comparative Law, 2000, p. 522. It evolved out of the Southern African Development Co-ordination Conference established in 1979.

[110] See www.sadc.int/index.php?lang=english&path=legal/protocols/&page=p_politics_defence_and_security_co-operation.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

the objective of the Organ is to promote peace and security in the region and in particular to 'consider enforcement action in accordance with international law and as a matter of last resort where peaceful means have failed'.[111] A number of structures of the Organ were set up,[112] including a chairperson,[113] the troika (the chairperson together with the incoming and outgoing chairpersons), a ministerial committee,[114] an Inter-State Politics and Diplomacy Committee[115] and an Inter-State Defence and Security Committee.[116] The Organ has jurisdiction to seek to resolve any 'significant inter-state conflict'[117] or any 'significant intra-state conflict'.[118] It may employ a variety of peaceful means, including diplomacy, negotiations, mediation, arbitration and adjudication by an international tribunal and shall establish an early warning system to prevent the outbreak or escalation of a conflict. Where peaceful means fail, the chairperson acting on the advice of the Ministerial Committee may recommend to the Summit of the Community that enforcement action be taken, but such action may only be taken as a matter of last resort and only with the authorisation of the UN Security Council.[119]

The Organisation of American States[120]

Article 23 of the Charter of the OAS, signed at Bogotá in 1948 and as amended by the Protocol of Cartagena de Indias, 1985, provides that international disputes between member states must be submitted to the Organisation for peaceful settlement, although this is not to be interpreted as an impairment of the rights and obligations of member states under [111] Article 2(f). [112] Article 3. [113] See further article 4. [114] See further article 5. [115] See further article 6. [116] See further article 7.

[117] I.e. one concerning territorial boundaries or natural resources or in which aggression or military force has occurred or where peace and security of the region or of another state party who is not a party to the conflict is threatened: see article 11(2)a.

[118] I.e. one involving large-scale violence, including genocide and gross violation of human rights or a military coup or a civil war or a conflict threatening the peace and security of the region or of another state party, article 11(2)b.

[119] Article 11(3).

[120] See Merrills, International Dispute Settlement, pp. 282 ff., and Bowett's International Institutions, pp. 205 ff. See also E. Jiménez de Aréchaga, 'La Co-ordination des Systèmes de l'ONU et de l'Organisation des États Américains pour le Règlement Pacifique des Différends et la Sécurité Collective', 111 HR, 1964 I, p. 423, and A. Cançado Trindade, 'Mécanismes de Règlement Pacifiques des Différends en Amérique Centrale: De Contadora à Esquipulas II', AFDI, 1987, p. 798.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

articles 34 and 35 of the UN Charter.[121] The 1948 American Treaty of Pacific Settlement (the Pact of Bogotá, to be distinguished from the Charter) sets out the procedures in detail, ranging from good offices, mediation and conciliation to arbitration and judicial settlement by the International Court of Justice. This treaty, however, has not been successful[122] and in practice the OAS has utilised the Inter-American Peace Committee created in 1940 for peaceful resolution of disputes. This was replaced in 1970 by the Inter-American Committee on Peaceful Settlement, a subsidiary organ of the Council. Since the late 1950s the Permanent Council of the OAS, a plenary body at ambassadorial level, has played an increasingly important role.[123] One example concerned the frontier incidents that took place on the border between Costa Rica and Nicaragua in 1985. The Council set up a fact-finding committee and, after hearing its report, adopted a resolution calling for talks to take place within the Contadora negotiating process.[124] The Esquipulas II agreement of 14 November 1987 established an International Verification and Follow-up Commission to be composed of the Foreign Ministers of the Contadora and Support Group States together with the secretaries-general of the UN and OAS.[125]

The Arab League[126]

The Arab League, established in 1945, aims at increasing co-operation between the Arab states. Its facilities for peaceful settlement of disputes amongst its members are not, however, very well developed, and in [121] Note that as originally drafted in the 1948 Charter, article 20 (as it then was) provided that submission to the OAS procedures had to occur prior to referral to the Security Council of the UN.

[122] Although note the Nicaragua v. Honduras case, ICJ Reports, 1988, pp. 69, 88; 84 ILR, pp. 218, 243, where the Court held that it had jurisdiction by virtue of article XXXI of the Pact of Bogotá.

[123] See articles 82–90 of the OAS Charter.

[124] OAS Permanent Council resolutions CP/Res. 427 (618/85); CP/doc. 1592/85 and A/40/737-S/17549, annex IV.

[125] The countries involved in the Contadora negotiating process were Colombia, Mexico, Panama and Venezuela, while the Support Group consisted of Argentina, Brazil, Peru and Uruguay. See A/43/729-S/20234.

[126] See H. A. Hassouna, The League of Arab States and Regional Disputes, Leiden, 1975; Bowett, 'Contemporary Development', p. 229; M. Abdennabi, La Ligue des États Arabes et les Conflits Inter-Arabes (1962–1980), 1985; B. Boutros Ghali, 'The Arab League 1945–1970', 25 Revue Égyptienne de Droit International, 1969, p. 67; and S. Al-Kadhem, 'The Role of the League of Arab States in Settling Inter-Arab Disputes', 32 Revue Égyptienne de Droit International, 1976, p. 1. See also www.al-bab.com/arab/docs/league.htm.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

practice consist primarily of informal conciliation attempts. One notable exception was the creation in 1961 of an Inter-Arab Force to keep the peace between Iraq and Kuwait.[127] An Arab Security Force was sent to Lebanon in 1976 to be succeeded by the Arab Deterrent Force between 1976 and 1983. The Arab League was not able to play a significant part in either the Kuwait crisis of 1990–1 or the Iraq crisis of 2002–3.

Europe[128]

The European Convention for the Peaceful Settlement of Disputes adopted by the Council of Europe in 1957 provides that legal disputes (as defined in article 36(2) of the Statute of the International Court of Justice) are to be sent to the International Court, although conciliation may be tried before this step is taken.[129] Other disputes are to go to arbitration, unless the parties have agreed to accept conciliation.

Within the NATO alliance,[130] there exist good offices facilities, and inquiry, mediation, conciliation and arbitration procedures may be instituted. In fact, the Organisation proved of some use, for instance in the longstanding 'cod war' between Britain and Iceland, two NATO partners.[131] The Organisation on Security and Co-operation in Europe (OSCE) has gradually been establishing dispute resolution mechanisms.[132] Under the key documents of this organisation,[133] the participating states are to endeavour in good faith to reach a rapid and equitable solution of their disputes by using a variety of means. Under the Valletta Report 1991, as amended by the Stockholm Decision of 1992, any party to a dispute may request the establishment of a Dispute Settlement Mechanism, which [127] Note also the pan-Arab 'peacekeeping force' in the Lebanon between 1976 and 1982: see Keesing's Contemporary Archives, pp. 28117 ff. See also I. Pogany, The Arab League and Peacekeeping in Lebanon, London, 1987. The Council also appointed committees to deal with the 1963 Algerian–Moroccan and Democratic People's Republic of Yemen–Yemen Arab Republic boundary disputes, H. A. Hassouna, 'The League of Arab States and the United Nations: Relations in the Peaceful Settlement of Disputes', New York, 1979, p. 312. See also Simma, Charter of the United Nations, p. 852.

[128] See L. Caflisch, 'Vers des Mécanismes Pan-Européennes de Règlement Pacifique des Différends', 97 Revue Générale de Droit International Public, 1993, p. 1.

[129] Note that some states have entered reservations to this provision.

[130] See Bowett's International Institutions, p. 191, and Merrills, International Dispute Settlement, p. 280. See also www.nato.int/.

[131] Merrills, International Dispute Settlement, p. 287. Such procedures were also proposed following the Suez crisis in 1956 and with regard to the Cyprus crisis in 1963: see Nguyen Quoc Dinh et al., Droit International Public, pp. 855–6.

[132] See generally above, chapter 7, p. 372, and below, chapter 23, p. 1289.

[133] See the Helsinki Final Act 1975; the Charter of Paris 1990 and the Valletta Report of the Meeting of Experts on Peaceful Settlement of Disputes 1991.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

once established may offer comments or advice with regard to negotiations between the parties in dispute, or any other appropriate dispute settlement process, and may engage in fact-finding and other conciliation functions. The Convention on Conciliation and Arbitration was signed in 1992 and came into force two years later. Under this Convention, a Court of Conciliation and Arbitration[134] has been established in Geneva. Conciliation may be undertaken by a Conciliation Commission constituted for each dispute and drawn from a list established under the Convention.[135] The Commission will draw up a report containing its proposals for the peaceful settlement of the dispute and the parties will then have a period of thirty days during which to examine the proposals. If the parties do not accept the proposed settlement, the report will be forwarded to the OSCE Council through the Senior Council (formerly the Committee of Senior Officials).[136] The Convention also provided for the establishment of Arbitral Tribunals, similarly constituted for each dispute and drawn from a list.[137] Such a tribunal would be set up by express agreement between the parties in dispute[138] or where the state brought to arbitration has agreed in advance to accept the jurisdiction of the Tribunal.[139] The award of the Tribunal would be final and binding as between the parties.[140]

In addition, the OSCE is able to send Missions to various participating states, with their consent, as part of its early warning, conflict prevention and crisis management responsibilities. Such Missions have been sent to Yugoslavia to promote dialogue between the populations of Kosovo, Sanjak and Vojvodina and the authorities of the state; to the Former Yugoslav Republic of Macedonia; to Georgia; Moldova; Tajikistan; Estonia; Ukraine and Chechnya. Additional Missions have operated in Albania and Kosovo,[141] Moldova and Georgia.[142] Under the General Framework [134] This consists of the conciliators and arbitrators appointed under articles 3 and 4.

[135] See articles 1 and 2. Each state party is to appoint two conciliators, article 3.

[136] Article 25.

[137] Articles 2 and 4. Each state party is to appoint one arbitrator and one alternate.

[138] Either between two or more states parties to the Convention or between one or more states parties to the Convention and one or more OSCE participating states, article 26(1).

[139] Article 26.

[140] Article 31. See also UN Handbook, p. 87, and OSCE Handbook 2000, Vienna, p. 37 and see www.osce.org/publications/handbook/.

[141] See OSCE Handbook 1996, pp. 16 ff., and Annual Report for 2001. A series of Sanctions Assistance Missions, operating under the guidance of the OSCE/EU Sanctions Co-ordinator, was sent to various countries in order to assist them in maintaining sanctions imposed by the Security Council in the Yugoslav crisis, ibid., p. 36.

[142] See Annual Report for 2007, pp. 54 and 60. Note also the Minsk Process established by the OSCE in 1995 in order to resolve the dispute between Armenia and Azerbaijan concerning Nagorno-Karabakh: see www.osce.org/item/21979.html.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

Agreement for Peace in Bosnia and Herzegovina, initialled at Dayton on 21 November 1995 and signed in Paris on 14 December 1995, the OSCE was made responsible for the supervision of elections,[143] for providing the framework for the conduct of discussions between the Bosnian parties on confidence and security-building measures and for measures of subregional arms control,[144] and for assisting in the creation of a Bosnian Commission on Human Rights.[145]

International organisations and facilities of limited competence[146]

The various specialised agencies[147] which encourage international co-operation in functional spheres have their own procedures for settling disputes between their members relating to the interpretation of their constitutional instruments. Such procedures vary from organisation to organisation, although the general pattern involves recourse to one of the main organs of the institution upon the failure of negotiations. If this fails to result in a settlement, the matter may be referred to the International Court of Justice or to arbitration unless otherwise agreed.[148] In such cases, recourse to the Court is by way of a request for an Advisory Opinion, although by virtue of constitutional provisions, the judgment of the Court would be accepted as binding and not as advisory.[149] In other cases, the [143] See Annex 3 of the Agreement.

[144] Annex 1-B of the Agreement. The subregional arms control involves Yugoslavia, Croatia and Bosnia.

[145] Annex 6 of the Agreement. See also article 22 of the ASEAN Charter, 2007, which calls for the maintenance and establishment of dispute settlement mechanisms to resolve disputes between ASEAN members: see below, chapter 23, p. 1294.

[146] See generally C. A. Colliard, 'Le Règlement des Différends dans les Organisations Intergouvernementales de Caractère Non Politique' in Mélanges Basdevant, Paris, 1960, p. 152, and G. Malinverni, Le Règlement des Différends dans les Organisations Internationales Économiques, Leiden, 1974. It should also be noted that several international treaties expressly provide mechanisms and methods for the peaceful resolution of disputes arising therefrom: see e.g. with regard to the Convention on the Law of the Sea, above, chapter 11, p. 635, and with regard to the Convention on the Law of Treaties, above, chapter 16, p. 952.

[147] See Murty, 'Settlement', pp. 729–32. See further below, chapter 23, p. 1285.

[148] See article 37 of the International Labour Organisation Constitution; article 14(2) of the UNESCO Constitution; article 75 of the World Health Organisation Constitution; article 17 of the Constitution of the Food and Agriculture Organisation; article XVII of the International Atomic Energy Agency Statute and articles 50 and 82 of the Convention of the International Telecommunications Union.

[149] See C. F. Amerasinghe, Principles of the Institutional Law of International Organisations, 2nd edn, Cambridge, 2005, pp. 199 ff.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

opinions to be given by the International Court or by an arbitral tribunal are to be non-binding.[150] A number of organisations provide for other mechanisms of inquiry and dispute settlement.[151]

There are a number of procedures and mechanisms which seek to resolve disputes in particular areas, usually economic and involving mixed disputes, that is between states and non-state entities. These processes are becoming of considerable significance and many of them are having a meaningful impact upon general international law. This section will briefly survey some of these.

The dispute settlement procedures established under the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade[152] commenced with bilateral consultations under article XXII.[153] From this point, article XXIII provided for a party to refer a dispute for conciliation[154] where it was felt that 'any benefit accruing to it directly or indirectly' under GATT was being 'nullified or impaired'. A Panel, composed of experts chosen by the Director-General of GATT, then would seek to ascertain the relevant facts and reach a settlement.[155] The approach was pragmatic and focused on achieving a settlement between the parties. The report of the Panel would be sent to the GATT Council, which would usually adopt it by consensus. Where the disputing parties had not implemented the recommendations within a reasonable time, the complaining party was able to take retaliatory action with the authorisation of the Council. Such instances were in fact very rare.[156] In 1989, a series of improvements was adopted pending the conclusion of the Uruguay Round of negotiations. These [150] See article 22(1) of the UN Industrial Development Organisation (UNIDO) Constitution and article 65 of the International Maritime Organisation Constitution.

[151] See the 1962 Special Protocol to the UNESCO Convention against Discrimination in Education which provides for a Conciliation and Good Offices Commission and the 1962 Special Protocol to the ILO Convention against Discrimination in Education which provides for a Conciliation and Good Offices Commission: see Murty, 'Settlement', pp. 729–30, and Bowett's International Institutions, chapter 3. See also the World Intellectual Property Organisation Mediation, Arbitration and Expedited Arbitration Rules 1994, 34 ILM, 1995, p. 559.

[152] See further below, chapter 23, p. 1286.

[153] See UN Handbook, pp. 136 ff.; J. H. Jackson, The World Trading System, 2nd edn, Cambridge, MA, 1997, chapter 4, and T. Flory, 'Les Accords du Tokyo Round du GATT et la Réforme des Procédures de Règlement des Différends dans la Système Commercial Interétatique', 86 RGDIP, 1982, p. 235.

[154] Before this stage, a party could seek the good offices of the Director-General of GATT to facilitate a confidential conciliation: see the 1982 GATT Ministerial Declaration.

[155] See in particular the 1979 Understanding on Dispute Settlement.

[156] See Henkin et al., International Law: Cases and Materials, p. 1414.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

improvements included the provision that the Council would normally accept the report of the Panel within fifteen months of the complaint and provisions relating to mediation, conciliation and arbitration were added.[157]

The GATT process was absorbed within the World Trade Organisation, which came into being on 1 January 1995. Annex 2 of the Marrakesh Agreement Establishing the World Trade Organisation, 1994 is entitled 'Understanding on Rules and Procedures Governing the Settlement of Disputes'.[158] Under the WTO scheme, disputes arising out of the agreements contained in the Final Act of the Uruguay Round are dealt with by the WTO General Council acting as the Dispute Settlement Body. Where a member state considers that a measure adopted by another member state has deprived it of a benefit accruing to it directly or indirectly under the GATT or other covered agreements, it may call for consultations with the other party and the latter must reply within ten days and enter into consultations within thirty days of receiving the request. If bilateral consultations have failed to resolve the dispute, the parties may agree to bring the dispute to the WTO Director-General, who may offer good offices, conciliation or mediation assistance. Where consultations fail to produce a settlement after sixty days, the complaining state may turn to the Dispute Settlement Body. This Body may establish a three-member panel, whose report should be produced within six months. Detailed procedures are laid down in the Understanding. The panel report is adopted by the [157] See E. Canal-Forgues and R. Ostrihansky, 'New Developments in GATT Dispute Settlement Procedures', 24 Journal of World Trade, 1990, and J.-G. Castel, 'The Uruguay Round and the Improvements to the GATT Dispute Settlement Rules and Procedures', 38 ICLQ, 1989, p. 834.

[158] See e.g. A. F. Lowenfeld, International Economic Law, 2nd edn, Oxford, 2008, part III; J. H. Jackson, Sovereignty, the WTO, and Changing Fundamentals of International Law, Cambridge, 2006, chapter 5; Dispute Settlement in the WTO (eds. J. Cameron and K. Campbell), London, 1998; Collier and Lowe, Settlement, p. 99; R. Yerxa and B. Wilson, Key Issues in WTO Dispute Settlement – The First Ten Years, Cambridge, 2005; M. Matsushita, T. J. Schoenbaum and P. C. Mavroidis, The World Trade Organization: Law, Practice, and Policy, 2nd edn, Oxford, 2006; T. Broude, International Governance in the WTO: Judicial Boundaries and Political Capitulation, London, 2004; D. Z. Cass, The Constitutionalization of the World Trade Organization: Legitimacy, Democracy, and Community in the International Trading System, Oxford, 2005; Bowett's International Institutions, p. 379; A. H. Qureshi, International Economic Law, London, 1999, p. 287; J. Pauwelyn, 'Enforcement and Countermeasures in the WTO', 94 AJIL, 2000, p. 335, and J. Cameron and K. R. Gray, 'Principles of International Law in the WTO Dispute Settlement Body', 50 ICLQ, 2001, p. 248. See also WTO Secretariat, The WTO Dispute Settlement Procedures, 2nd edn, Cambridge, 2001 and www.wto.org/english/tratop_e/dispu_e/dispu_e.htm.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

Dispute Settlement Body within sixty days, unless there is a consensus against adoption or one of the parties notifies an intention to appeal on grounds of law. The standing Appellate Body established by the Dispute Settlement Body consists of seven experts, three of whom may sit to hear appeals at any one time. Appeal proceedings generally are to last no more than sixty (or at most ninety) days. Unless there is a consensus against adoption within thirty days, the Dispute Settlement Body will accept the Appellate Body report.

Within thirty days of the adoption of the report, the parties must agree to comply with the recommendations and if this does not happen within a reasonable period, the party concerned must offer mutually acceptable compensation. If after twenty days, no satisfactory compensation is agreed, the complaining state may request authorisation from the Dispute Settlement Body to suspend concessions or obligations against the other party and this should be granted within thirty days of the end of the reasonable period. In any event, the Dispute Settlement Body will monitor the implementation of rulings or recommendations.[159]

There are two particular points to make. First, there have been a significant number of cases initiated before the Dispute Settlement Body[160] and, secondly, the establishment of an Appellate Body, composed of trade law experts, is having an important impact upon the development of international trade law.[161] As a reflection of the latter, a number of issues of general international law interest have been dealt with, ranging from consideration of the Vienna Convention on the Law of Treaties and treaty [159] Rules of Conduct were adopted in December 1996: see WT/DSB/RC/1 and www.wto.org/english/tratop_e/dispu_e/rc_e.htm. See also the Working Procedures for Appellate Review, WT/AB/WP/4 and www.wto.org/english/tratop_e/dispu_e/ab_e.htm. The Doha Ministerial Declaration of November 2001 stated that negotiations on improvements and clarifications of the Dispute Settlement Understanding would take place with a view to agreement by May 2003. However, negotiations are continuing: see e.g. Hong Kong Ministerial Declaration of December 2005, WT/MIN(05)/DEC.

[160] Over 200 by mid-2000: see Cameron and Gray, 'WTO Dispute Settlement', p. 250, and 373 by early March 2008: see www.wto.org/english/tratop_e/dispu_e/dispu_status_e.htm.

[161] See e.g. D. M. McRae, 'The Emerging Appellate Jurisdiction in International Trade Law' in Campbell and Cameron, Dispute Settlement, p. 1, and Jackson, Sovereignty, the WTO, pp. 163 ff. There have been eighty-six notices of appeal as of the end of 2007: see Annual Report of the Appellate Body, 2007, Annex III. Lowenfeld, International Economic Law, p. 211, concludes that the WTO Dispute Settlement Mechanism 'is a great success – more so than any other arrangement for resolving international legal disputes at government level'.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

interpretation[162] to questions relating to procedural issues such as burden of proof.[163]

A number of regional dispute mechanisms concerning economic questions have been established. The most developed is the European Union, which has a fully functioning judicial system with the Court of Justice in Luxembourg with wide-ranging jurisdiction.[164] Other relevant, but modest regional economic mechanisms include Mercosur (Argentina, Brazil, Paraguay and Uruguay),[165] Comesa[166] and ECOWAS.[167]

The North American Free Trade Agreement (NAFTA), 1992, linking the US, Mexico and Canada, aims at the free movement and liberalisation of goods, services, people and investment, and also contains dispute settlement provisions.[168] The principal mechanisms are contained in Chapters 11, 14, 19 and 20 of the Agreement. Under Chapter 11[169] investment disputes may be raised by individual investors of one state party against another state party and, if not resolved by negotiations, may be submitted to arbitration either under the World Bank's International Centre for the Settlement of Investment Disputes (ICSID) or the ICSID Additional Facility or the rules of the United Nations Commission for International [162] See e.g. the Standards for Reformulated and Conventional Gasoline case, 1996, WT/DS2/AB/R and the Import Prohibition of Certain Shrimp and Shrimp Products case, 1998, WT/DS58/AB/R. See also D. Palmeter and P. C. Mavroidis, 'The WTO Legal System: Sources of Law', 92 AJIL, 1998, p. 398, and Jackson, Sovereignty, the WTO, pp. 182 ff.

[163] See e.g. Imports of Agricultural, Textile and Industrial Products, 1999, WT/DS90/AB/R.

[164] As to which see e.g. D. Chalmers, C. Hadjiemmanuil, G. Monti and A. Tomkins, European Union Law: Text and Materials, Cambridge, 2006; S. Weatherill and P. Beaumont, EU Law, 3rd edn, London, 1999, and Weatherill, Cases and Materials on EU Law, 8th edn, Oxford, 2007; and A. Arnull, The European Court of Justice, 2nd edn, Oxford, 2006.

[165] See the Mercosur Treaty, 1991. The Protocol of Brasilia, 1991 (complemented by Decision 17 1998) establishes a rudimentary dispute settlement system for states parties based upon diplomatic negotiations with arbitration as a last resort. Arbitration was not used until 1999 and the first arbitral award was the Siscomex case: see D. Ventura, 'First Arbitration Award in Mercosur – A Community Law in Evolution?', 14 Leiden Journal of International Law, 2000, p. 447. See also www.mercosur.int/msweb/.

[166] See the Treaty Establishing the Common Market for Eastern and Southern Africa, 1993.

[167] The Economic Community of West African States: see the treaty of 1975 and revisions of 1993 and 2001 and Protocol 1 on the Community Court of Justice, 1999.

[168] See 32 ILM, 1993, pp. 682 ff. See also Bowett's International Institutions, p. 222; D. S. Huntington, 'Settling Disputes under the North American Free Trade Agreement', 34 Harvard International Law Journal, 1993, p. 407; Collier and Lowe, Settlement, p. 111; N. Kinnear, A. Bjorkland and J. Hannaford, Investment Disputes under NAFTA, The Hague, 2006, and NAFTA Investment Law and Arbitration: Past Issues, Current Practice, Future Prospects (ed. T. Weiler), Ardsley, 2004. See also www.nafta-sec-alena.org/DefaultSite/index_e.aspx.

[169] Articles 1101–14 of the Agreement.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

Trade Law (UNCITRAL).[170] Tribunals established under NAFTA must apply both the NAFTA Treaty and applicable rules of international law.[171] Interim measures of protection may be ordered and the award of the tribunal is final and binding.[172] Questions relating to interpretation of the Treaty must be remitted to the Free Trade Commission,[173] whose interpretations are binding.[174] Chapter 19 provides for bi-national panel reviews of anti-dumping, countervailing duty and injury final determinations. These panels may also review amendments made by any of the state parties to their anti-dumping or countervailing duty law.[175]

The dispute settlement provisions of Chapter 20 are applicable primarily to inter-state disputes concerning the interpretation or application of the NAFTA, including disputes relating to the financial services provisions of Chapter 14. Should attempts to resolve the particular dispute by consultation within certain time limits, and good offices, mediation and conciliation by the Free Trade Commission within certain time limits fail, the parties may request that the Commission establish a five-person Arbitral Panel.[176]

A neutral chairperson is chosen within fifteen days by the parties in dispute (or by one of the parties chosen by lot if there is no agreement) and within a further fifteen days, two panellists of the nationality of the opposing party are chosen by each party.[177] The panel may obtain expert advice and a Scientific Review Board may be created to provide assistance on technical factual questions raised by the parties. The panel provides an Initial Report, within ninety days of the appointment of the last panellist, as to its findings and recommendations. Comments may then be received from the parties and the panel may reconsider its report. Within thirty days of the Initial Report, the panel will send its Final Report to the [173] Established under article 2001 of Chapter 20 and consisting of cabinet-level representation of the states parties with a general remit to supervise implementation of the agreement and to resolve disputes concerning its interpretation and application. The Commission also established and oversees the NAFTA secretariat comprising national sections, article 2002.

[170] See below, p. 1043. [171] See article 1131. [172] Articles 1134 and 1136.

[174] See articles 1131 and 1132. See also e.g. with regard to the terms 'fair and equitable treatment' and 'full protection and security' under article 1105, Mondev International Ltd v. USA 6 ICSID Reports, 2002, p. 192, paras. 100 ff.; United Parcel Service of America v. Canada 7 ICSID Reports, 2002, p. 288, para. 97; Loewen Group v. USA 7 ICSID Reports, 2003, p. 442, paras. 124 ff. and Methanex v. USA, award of 3 August 2005, Part II, Chapter H, para. 23.

[175] See articles 1903–5. [176] See articles 2003–8. [177] See article 2011.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

Commission.[178] The parties must then agree to a settlement of the dispute in the light of the panel's recommendations within thirty days.[179] If this does not happen, the complaining party may suspend the application to the party complained against of benefits of equivalent effect until such time as they have reached agreement on a resolution of the dispute.[180]

The World Bank (i.e. the International Bank for Reconstruction and Development and the International Development Association) established in 1993 an Inspection Panel system providing an independent forum for private citizens who believe that their interests have been or may be harmed by a project financed by the World Bank.[181] Upon receipt of a request by such private persons, the three-person Panel decides whether it is within its mandate and, if so, sends it to Bank Management who prepare a response for the Panel. A preliminary review is undertaken by the Panel that includes an independent assessment of the merits of Bank Management's response. A recommendation is then submitted to the Board of the Bank as to whether the claims should be investigated. If the Board approves a recommendation to investigate, the Panel proceeds with the investigation and its findings are then sent to the Board and to Bank Management. The management must then within six weeks submit its recommendations to the Board on what actions the Bank should take in response to the Panel's findings. The Board will then make a final decision as to future action based upon the Panel's findings and the recommendations of Bank Management.[182]

The International Centre for Settlement of Investment Disputes was established under the auspices of the World Bank by the Convention on the Settlement of Investment Disputes Between States and the Nationals of Other States, 1965 and administers ad hoc arbitrations.[183] It constitutes [178] See articles 2014–17. [179] Article 2018. [180] Article 2019.

[181] See e.g. I. Shihata, The World Bank Inspection Panel, Oxford, 1994; D. L. Clark, A Citizen's Guide to the World Bank Inspection Panel, 2nd edn, Washington, 1999; D. Clark, Demanding Accountability: Civil Society and the World Bank Inspection Panel, Lanham, 2003; G. Alfredsson, R. Ring and G. Melander, The Inspection Panel of the World Bank: A Different Complaints Procedure, The Hague, 2001; 'Conclusions of the Second Review of the World Bank Inspection Panel', 39 ILM, 2000, p. 243, and A. Gowland Gualtieri, 'The Environmental Accountability of the World Bank to Non-State Actors', 72 BYIL, 2002, p. 213. See also the Inspection Panel's Annual Report, 2006/7.

[182] As of June 2007, forty-six requests had been sent to the Panel, of these thirty-five resulted in Board approval of the Panel's recommendations: see http://siteresources.worldbank.org/EXTINSPECTIONPANEL/Resources/Summany_of_Inpection_Panel_Cases_%5updated%5D.pdf.

[183] See Lowenfeld, International Economic Law, pp. 536 ff.; R. Dolzer and C. Schreuer, Principles of International Investment Law, Oxford, 2008, pp. 222 ff.; C. Schreuer, The ICSID

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

a framework within which conciliation and arbitration takes place and provides an autonomous system free from municipal law in which states and non-state investors (from member states) may settle disputes. States parties to the Convention[184] undertake to recognise awards made by arbitration tribunals acting under the auspices of the Centre as final and binding in their territories and to enforce them as if they were final judgments of national courts.[185] The jurisdiction of the Centre extends to 'any legal dispute arising directly out of an investment, between a contracting state . . . and a national of another contracting state, which the parties to the dispute consent in writing to submit to the Centre'.[186] Accordingly, states must not only become parties to the Convention, but also agree in writing to the submission of the particular dispute to the settlement procedure, although this may be achieved in a concession agreement between the investor and the state concerned. In fact, bilateral investment treaties between states parties to the Convention frequently provide for recourse to arbitration under the auspices of the Centre in the event of an investment dispute.[187] Further, a number of multilateral treaties now provide for the submission to ICSID of disputes arising.[188] In 1978, the Centre introduced the ICSID Additional Facility which extends its jurisdiction to include disputes where only one of the parties is a contracting state or a national of a contracting state and disputes not arising directly out of an investment, provided the dispute relates to a transaction which has 'features that distinguish it from an ordinary commercial transaction' and further provides for fact-finding proceedings.

Convention: A Commentary, Cambridge, 2001; Broches, 'The Convention on the Settlement of Investment Disputes', 3 Columbia Journal of Transnational Law, 1966, p. 263, and Broches, 'The Convention on the Settlement of Investment Disputes Between States and Nationals of Other States', 136 HR, 1972, p. 350; D. O'Keefe, 'The International Centre for the Settlement of Investment Disputes', 34 YBWA, 1980, p. 286; The International Arbitral Process: Public and Private (ed. J. G. Wetter), Dobbs Ferry, 1979, vol. II, p. 139; Collier and Lowe, Settlement, p. 59, and P. Muchlinski, Multinational Enterprises and the Law, Oxford, 1995, pp. 540 ff. See also www.worldbank.org/icsid/.

184 In becoming parties, states may expressly include or exclude certain kinds of disputes: see article 25(4). As of 2007, there were 144 contracting states (Bolivia denounced the convention in that year), Annual Report, 2007: see www.worldbank.org/icsid.

185 Wetter, Arbitral Process, vol. II, p. 139.

186 Article 25(1) of the Convention.

187 See I. Pogany, 'The Regulation of Foreign Investment in Hungary', 4 ICSID Review – Foreign Investment Law Journal, 1989, pp. 39, 51. See also the case of Asian Agricultural Products v. Sri Lanka 30 ILM, 1991, p. 577.

188 See e.g. article 1120 of the NAFTA Treaty, 1992 and Metalclad Corporation v. United Mexican States 119 ILR, p. 615. See also article 26(4) of the European Energy Charter, 1995.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

The Convention requires individuals to be nationals of a state other than the one complained against and article 25(2) specifically excludes dual nationals. Nationality is determined according to the rules of the state of nationality claimed and must exist both at the date on which the parties consented to submit such dispute to conciliation or arbitration as well as on the date on which the request was registered. The same principles apply to companies, except that article 25(2)b includes also juridical persons which had the nationality of the contracting state party to the dispute on the date on which consent to submission of the dispute occurred and which 'because of foreign control, the parties agreed should be treated as a national of another contracting state for the purposes of this Convention'. This may be achieved in a bilateral investment treaty and may be implied in the circumstances.[189]

Disputes are referred to conciliation commissions or arbitral tribunals constituted under ICSID's auspices. Conciliation has been rare, but arbitration more frequent.[190] The Secretary-General may be asked to establish an Arbitral Tribunal by either party to a dispute that falls within the jurisdiction of ICSID. The parties nominate an uneven number of arbitrators with the chosen arbitrators deciding upon a neutral president of the tribunal. The applicable law is as agreed by the parties and otherwise the law of the contracting state party to the dispute together with such rules of international law as may be applicable.[191] Awards are binding and not subject to any appeal or other remedy other than those provided within the Convention system itself.[192] Each contracting state is obliged to recognise ICSID awards and enforce pecuniary obligations imposed as if they were final judgments in its own courts.[193] A number of significant awards have now been made.[194]

[189] See e.g. AMCO v. Indonesia 1 ICSID Reports, p. 377.

[190] As of May 2008, 139 cases had been concluded with 125 pending: see www.worldbank.org/icsid/cases/cases.htm.

[191] See Chapter IV of the Convention.

[192] Article 53.

[193] Article 54. However, this is subject to domestic legislation as regards sovereign immunity: see article 55.

[194] See P. Lalive, 'The First "World Bank" Arbitration (Holiday Inns v. Morocco) – Some Legal Problems', 51 BYIL, 1980, p. 123. See also AGIP Spa v. Government of the Popular Republic of the Congo 67 ILR, p. 318; Benvenuti and Bonfant v. Government of the Popular Republic of the Congo, ibid., p. 345, dealing with questions of state responsibility and damages, and LETCO v. Government of Liberia 89 ILR, p. 313 and Tradex Hellas SA v. Albania, 1999, ARB/94/2 concerning expropriation. See also Metalclad Corporation v. United Mexican States 119 ILR, p. 615, concerning state responsibility, expropriation and compensation

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

Another procedure of growing importance is the Court of Arbitration of the International Chamber of Commerce.[195] A number of agreements provide for the settlement of disputes by arbitration under the Rules of the International Chamber of Commerce and several cases have been heard.[196] Also to be noted is the set of rules adopted by the UN Commission on International Trade Law (UNCITRAL) in 1966.[197]

An institution which constitutes a mixed model, combining elements of inter-state arbitration with elements of state–individual arbitration is the Iran–United States Claims Tribunal which was established in The Hague by the Claims Settlement Declaration in 1981.[198] The Tribunal is an international arbitral body set up to adjudicate claims of US nationals against Iran and of Iranian nationals against the United States arising out of alleged violations of property rights as a result of the circumstances surrounding the hostage crisis. The Tribunal also has jurisdiction to hear certain official claims between the US and Iran arising out of contractual arrangements for the purchase and sale of goods and services, and disputes relating to the interpretation and implementation of the Claims Settlement Agreement itself. As another indication of its mixed character, article V of the Claims Settlement Declaration provides that the Tribunal shall apply 'such choice of law rules and principles of commercial and and SGS Société de Surveillance SA v. Pakistan 129 ILR, p. 360, concerning e.g. relations between domestic courts and ICSID tribunals and the definition of investment.

195 See Wetter, Arbitral Process, vol. II, p. 145. See also www.iccwbo.org/index_court.asp.

196 See Dalmia Cement v. National Bank of Pakistan 67 ILR, p. 611 and the Westland Helicopters case, 80 ILR, p. 595.

197 See e.g. I. Dore, The UNCITRAL Framework for Arbitration in Contemporary Perspective, London, 1993, and www.uncitral.org/en-index.htm.

198 See 1 Iran–US CTR, pp. 3–56; 20 ILM, 1981, pp. 223 ff. See also The Jurisprudence of the Iran–United States Claims Tribunal (ed. G. H. Aldrich), Oxford, 1996; Lowenfeld, International Economic Law, pp. 541 ff.; Stewart and Sherman, 'Development at the Iran–United States Claims Tribunal: 1981–1983', 24 Va. JIL, 1983, p. 1; D. Lloyd Jones, 'The Iran–United States Claims Tribunal: Private Rights and State Responsibility', 24 Va. JIL, 1984, p. 259; The Iran–US Claims Tribunal 1981–83 (ed. R. Lillich), Charlottesville, 1984; The Iran–United States Claims Tribunal: Its Contribution to the Law of State Responsibility (eds. R. Lillich and D. B. Magraw), New York, 1998; S. J. Toope, Mixed International Arbitration, Cambridge, 1990, chapter 9; D. D. Caron, 'The Nature of the Iran–United States Claims Tribunal and the Evolving Structure of International Dispute Resolution', 84 AJIL, 1990, p. 104; A. Avanessian, Iran–United States Claims Tribunal in Action, The Hague, 1993; R. Khan, The Iran–United States Claims Tribunal, Dordrecht, 1990; W. Mapp, The Iran–United States Claims Tribunal: The First Ten Years 1981–1991, Manchester, 1993, and the Iran–United States Claims Tribunal Reports, 1981 to date. See also www.iusct.org/index-english.html.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

international law as the Tribunal determines to be applicable, taking into account relevant usages of the trade, contract provisions and changed circumstances'.

In order to ensure payment of awards to US nationals, a Security Account was established with one billion dollars capital from Iranian assets frozen in the US as a result of the hostages crisis. Once the sum falls below $500 million, Iran is under an obligation to replenish the Account.[199] Under the terms of the Agreement, all claims had to be filed by 19 January 1982.[200] The Tribunal has nine judges, three each chosen by Iran and the US and three by the remaining six. It sits in three chambers of three persons each and in important cases in plenary session. It operates under UNCITRAL Rules, save as modified by the parties or the Tribunal.[201] Awards are final and binding and enforceable in any foreign court in accordance with domestic law.[202]

A variety of important issues have been addressed by the Tribunal, including the treatment of dual nationality in claims[203] and in particular issues relating to expropriation.[204] Although claims of under $250,000 are to be represented by the government of the national concerned, claims in excess of this are presented by the individual claimants themselves, while the agents of the two states are present during the hearing with the right of audience.[205] Nevertheless, the Tribunal has emphasised on several occasions that the claim remains that of the individual and is not that of the state, as would be normal in classical state responsibility situations.[206]

Whether this model will be used in other similar situations is an open question, particularly since the trend in the post-war era has tended towards the lump-sum settlement of such disputes.[207] But the value of [199] By early 1989, this had taken place on twenty-six occasions: see 83 AJIL, 1989, p. 915.

[200] Approximately 1,000 claims for amounts of $250,000 or more, and 2,800 claims for amounts of less than $250,000 were filed within the time limit, which does not apply to disputes between the two Governments concerning the interpretation of the Algiers Declarations. By the end of March 2008, there had been 600 awards and 83 interim and interlocutory awards filed and 133 decisions filed. Altogether 3,936 cases had been finalised by award, decision or order: see Communiqué of 25 April 2008.

[201] Article III of the Claims Settlement Declaration.

[202] Article IV of the Claims Settlement Declaration.

[203] See above, chapter 14, p. 815.

[204] See above, chapter 14, p. 827.

[205] See H. Fox, 'States and the Undertaking to Arbitrate', 37 ICLQ, 1988, pp. 1, 21.

[206] See State Party Responsibility for Awards Rendered Against Its Nationals, Case A/21, 14 Iran–US CTR, pp. 324, 330.

[207] See above, chapter 14, p. 840.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

the Tribunal in general terms in resolving the large number of claims in question and in addressing significant issues of international law cannot be denied.

The establishment of the UN Compensation Commission constitutes an interesting and significant development.[208] It was created by Security Council resolution 692 (1991) to process claims for compensation for 'any direct loss, damage, including environmental damage and the depletion of natural resources, or injury to foreign Governments, nationals and corporations, as a result of Iraq's unlawful invasion and occupation of Kuwait'.[209] It constitutes a subsidiary organ of the Security Council and comprises a Governing Council (being the fifteen members at any given time of the Security Council), a secretariat and Commissioners appointed to review and resolve claims.[210] In resolution 705 (1991), the Security Council, acting under Chapter VII, decided that compensation to be paid by Iraq should not exceed 30 per cent of the annual value of the exports of petroleum and petroleum products from Iraq.[211] In resolution 706 (1991), the Council authorised states to import a certain amount of Iraqi petroleum and petroleum products in order to pay for essential food and humanitarian purchases by Iraq and provide payments for the UN Compensation Commission via the Compensation Fund.[212]

[208] See e.g. D. Campanelli, 'The United Nations Compensation Commission (UNCC): Reflections on its Judicial Character', 4 The Law and Practice of International Courts and Tribunals, 2005, p. 107; V. Heiskanen, 'The United Nations Compensation Commission', 296 HR, 2002, p. 314; Collier and Lowe, Settlement, p. 41; The United Nations Compensation Commission: A Handbook (eds. M. Frigessi di Ratalma and T. Treves), The Hague, 1999; A. Kolliopoulos, La Commission d'Indemnisation des Nations Unies et le Droit de la Responsabilité Internationale, Paris, 2001; A. Grattini, 'The UN Compensation Commission: Old Rules, New Procedures on War Reparations', 13 EJIL, 2002, p. 161; D. Caron and B. Morris, 'The United Nations Compensation Commission: Practical Justice, Not Retribution', 13 EJIL, 2002, p. 183, and M. B. Fox, 'Imposing Liability for Losses from Aggressive War: An Economic Analysis of the UN Compensation Commission', 13 EJIL, 2002, p. 201.

[209] Paragraph 16 of resolution 687 (1991) established that 'Iraq . . . is liable under international law for any direct loss, damage, including environmental damage and the depletion of natural resources, or injury to foreign Governments, nationals and corporations, as a result of Iraq's unlawful invasion and occupation of Kuwait' and paragraph 18 of the resolution established a fund to pay compensation for such claims together with a Commission to administer it.

[210] See Report of the Secretary-General of 2 May 1991, S/22559.

[211] See also Report of the Secretary-General, S/22661, May 1991.

[212] See also the Report of the Secretary-General, S/23006, 1991 and Security Council resolution 712 (1991).

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

Iraq at first refused to co-operate,[213] but in 1996, the 'oil for food' scheme put forward in resolution 986 (1995) began to function. This resolution provided also that 30 per cent of the proceeds of such oil sales were to be allocated to the Compensation Fund. This percentage was reduced to 25 per cent in resolution 1330 (2000). The Compensation Commission has received an overwhelming number of claims. Some 2.6 million claims from around 100 states were received.[214] The claims were divided into six categories.[215] The deadline of 1 January 1995 was set for the filing of category A to D claims; 1 January 1996 for the filing of category E and F claims and 1 February 1997 for category F environmental claims. Provisional Rules were adopted by the Commission in 1992.[216] Claims are subject to a preliminary assessment by the secretariat and then sent to panels of commissioners sitting in private. Recommendations are then sent to the Governing Council for decision from which there is no appeal. The first compensation awards were made in spring 1995.[217] By March 2003, 2,597,527 claims had been resolved and $16,708,302,236 compensation paid.[218] The Commission has awarded compensation with regard [213] In resolution 778 (1992) the Council called upon states which held frozen assets representing the proceeds of sales of Iraqi petroleum to transfer these to a special escrow account, from which 30 per cent would be transferred to the Compensation Fund.

[214] See 35 ILM, 1996, p. 942, and Collier and Lowe, Settlement, p. 43 (the claims included those from some 1 million Egyptian workers). See also www.unog.ch/uncc/theclaims.htm. The claims amounted to over $300 billion.

[215] Category 'A' claims cover claims of individuals arising from their departure from Iraq or Kuwait between the date of Iraq's invasion of Kuwait on 2 August 1990 and the date of the ceasefire, 2 March 1991, with compensation for successful claims being set by the Governing Council at the fixed sum of US $2,500 for individual claimants and US $5,000 for families. Category 'B' claims cover individual claims for serious personal injury or death of spouse, children or parents, with compensation set at US $2,500 for individual claimants and up to US $10,000 for families. Category 'C' claims cover individual claims for damages up to $100,000. Category 'D' claims cover individual claims for damages above $100,000. Category 'E' claims cover claims of corporations, other private legal entities and public sector enterprises. Category 'F' claims cover claims made by governments and international organisations for various losses. See e.g. Decision 1, S/22885, annex II, paras. 14–16 and S/23765, annex. In Decision 11, it was decided that members of the Allied Coalition Forces were not eligible for compensation unless in accordance with the adopted criteria, the claimants were prisoners-of-war and the loss or injury arose from mistreatment in violation of international humanitarian law, S/24363, annex II, ibid. See also A/AC.26/1994/2, reproduced in 34 ILM, 1995, p. 307.

[216] See S/AC.26/1992/10 and 31 ILM, 1992, p. 1053.

[217] S/AC.26/1995/2–5. See also 35 ILM, 1996, p. 956. For examples of claims, see e.g. 109 ILR, p. 1 and the Egyptian Workers' Claims 117 ILR, p. 195.

[218] See www.unog.ch/uncc/status.htm.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

to damage caused within Saudi Arabia, Israel, Jordan and Gulf states by Iraqi Scud missiles fired during the conflict.[219]

The Commission constitutes an interesting hybrid between a fact-finding political organ and a quasi-judicial mechanism.[220] It has been noted that panels are required, in the absence of specific guidance by the Security Council or the Governing Council, to apply international law.[221] It has had to deal with a remarkable number of claims with great success and has proceeded upon an expedited basis by relying upon computerised handling of smaller claims and without a judicial hearing stage.[222]

Binding methods of dispute settlement

As has been seen, there is a considerable variety of means, mechanisms and institutions established to resolve disputes in the field of international law. However, a special place is accorded to the creation of judicial bodies. Such courts and tribunals may be purely inter-state or permit individuals to appear as applicants or respondents.[223] They may be permanent or temporary, being established to resolve one particular dispute. In resolving disputes, a variety of techniques is likely to be used and references to judicial bodies should be seen as part of a larger process of peaceful settlement. As Jennings has written, 'the adjudicative process can serve, not only to resolve classical legal disputes, but it can also serve as an important tool of preventive diplomacy in more complex situations'.[224] The following section will deal with arbitration and the following chapter with the International Court of Justice.

[219] See the Report and Recommendations Concerning the Third Instalment of 'E2' Claims, S/AC.26/1999/R.40, para. 77.

[220] See the Report of the UN Secretary-General of 2 May 1991, S/22559. This Report in particular emphasised that the Compensation Commission was neither a Court nor an Arbitral Tribunal, but 'a political organ that performs an essentially fact-finding function of examining the claims, verifying their validity, evaluating losses, assessing payments and resolving disputed claims'. It was recognised, however, that 'some elements of due process should be built into the procedure', ibid., para. 20: see Collier and Lowe, Settlement, p. 42, and Merrills, International Dispute Settlement, p. 61. See also the Guidelines adopted by the Governing Council on 2 August 1991, S/22885. Both documents are reproduced in 30 ILM, 1991, pp. 1703 ff. Note that Collier and Lowe refer to the UNCC as prominent amongst 'the most notable recent innovations', Settlement, p. 41.

[221] See article 31 of the Rules and the Egyptian Workers' Claims 117 ILR, pp. 195, 247.

[222] See Collier and Lowe, Settlement, p. 43.

[223] See above, note 2.

[224] R. Y. Jennings, 'Presentation' in Increasing the Effectiveness of the International Court of Justice (eds. C. Peck and R. S. Lee), The Hague, 1997, p. 79.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

Arbitration[225]

In determining whether a body established by states to settle a dispute is of a judicial, administrative or political nature, the Tribunal in the Laguna del Desierto case emphasised that 'the practice of international law is to look at the nature of the procedure followed by those states before the body in question'.[226]

The procedure of arbitration grew to some extent out of the processes of diplomatic settlement and represented an advance towards a developed international legal system. In its modern form, it emerged with the Jay Treaty of 1794 between Britain and America, which provided for the establishment of mixed commissions to solve legal disputes between the parties.[227] The procedure was successfully used in the Alabama Claims arbitration[228] of 1872 between the two countries, which resulted in the UK having to pay compensation for the damage caused by a Confederate warship built in the UK. This success stimulated further arbitrations, for example the Behring Sea[229] and British Guiana and Venezuela Boundary[230] arbitrations at the close of the nineteenth century.[231]

The 1899 Hague Convention for the Pacific Settlement of Disputes included a number of provisions on international arbitration, the object of [225] See e.g. Merrills, International Dispute Settlement, chapter 5; Wetter, Arbitral Process; L. Simpson and H. Fox, International Arbitration, London, 1959; L. Malintoppi, 'Methods of Dispute Resolution in Inter-State Litigation: When States Go To Arbitration Rather Than Adjudication', 5 The Law and Practice of International Courts and Tribunals, 2006, p. 133; L. Caflisch, 'L'Avenir de l'Arbitrage Interétatique', AFDI, 1979, p. 9; B. S. Murty, 'Settlement'. See also Nguyen Quoc Dinh et al., Droit International Public, p. 866; Oellers-Frahm and Zimmermann, Dispute Settlement; Economides, 'L'Obligation de Règlement Pacifique'; S. Schwebel, International Arbitration: Three Salient Problems, Cambridge, 1987; A. M. Stuyt, Survey of International Arbitrations (1794–1984), Dordrecht, 1990; V. Coussirat-Coustere and P. M. Eisemann, Repertory of International Arbitral Jurisprudence, Dordrecht, 4 vols., 1989–91; C. Gray and B. Kingsbury, 'Developments in Dispute Settlement: International Arbitration since 1945', 63 BYIL, 1992, p. 97; L. Sohn, 'International Arbitration Today', 108 HR, 1976, p. 1; International Arbitration (ed. F. Soons), Dordrecht, 1990, and H. Fox, 'States and the Undertaking to Arbitrate', 37 ICLQ, 1988, p. 1.

[226] 113 ILR, pp. 1, 42.

[227] See Simpson and Fox, International Arbitration, pp. 1–4, and R. C. Morris, International Arbitration and Procedure, New Haven, 1911. Note also the Treaty of Ghent, 1814, which incorporated the concept of a neutral element within the commission, ibid. See also G. Schwarzenberger, 'Present-Day Relevance of the Jay Treaty Arbitrations', 53 Notre Dame Lawyer, 1978, p. 715.

[228] J. B. Moore, International Arbitrations, Washington, DC, 1898, vol. I, p. 495.

[229] Ibid., p. 755.

[230] 92 BFSP, p. 970.

[231] See also 'Projet de Règlement pour la Procédure Arbitrale Internationale', Annuaire de l'Institut de Droit International, 1877, p. 126.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

which was deemed to be under article 15, 'the settlement of differences between states by judges of their own choice and on the basis of respect for law'. This became the accepted definition of arbitration in international law. It was repeated in article 37 of the 1907 Hague Conventions and adopted by the Permanent Court of International Justice in the case concerning the Interpretation of Article 3, paragraph 2, of the Treaty of Lausanne[232] and by the International Court.[233]

International arbitration was held to be the most effective and equitable manner of dispute settlement, where diplomacy had failed. An agreement to arbitrate under article 18 implied the legal obligation to accept the terms of the award. In addition, a Permanent Court of Arbitration was established.[234] It is not really a court since it is not composed of a fixed body of judges. It consists of a panel of persons, nominated by the contracting states[235] (each one nominating a maximum of four), comprising individuals 'of known competency in questions of international law, of the highest moral reputation and disposed to accept the duties of an arbitrator'.[236] Where contracting states wish to go to arbitration, they are entitled to choose the members of the tribunal from the panel. Thus, it is in essence machinery facilitating the establishment of arbitral tribunals. The PCA also consists of an International Bureau, which acts as the registry of the Court and keeps its records, and a Permanent Administrative Council, exercising administrative control over the Bureau. Administrative support was provided in this context by the Bureau in the Heathrow Airport User Charges arbitration.[237] The PCA has been used in a variety of cases from an early date.[238]

[232] PCIJ, Series B, No. 12, p. 26.

[233] See Qatar v. Bahrain, ICJ Reports, 2001, para. 113. See also the Dubai/Sharjah Border Arbitration 91 ILR, pp. 543, 574 and 575.

[234] See Murty, 'Settlement', p. 685; M. Hudson, The Permanent Court of International Justice 1920–1942, New York, 1943, p. 11; The Permanent Court of Arbitration: International Arbitration and Dispute Settlement (eds. P. Hamilton, H. C. Requena, L. van Scheltinga and B. Shifman), The Hague, 1999; J. Allain, A Century of International Adjudication: The Rule of Law and its Limits, The Hague, 2000, chapter 1, and J. Jonkman, 'The Role of the Permanent Court of Arbitration in International Dispute Resolution', 279 HR, 1999, p. 9. See also www.pca-cpa.org/.

[235] There are currently 107.

[236] Article 44 of the Convention as revised in 1907.

[237] See 88 AJIL, 1994, p. 739, note 4.

[238] See e.g. the UK–France Agreement of 1903, providing for referral of differences of a legal nature to the Permanent Court of Arbitration, so long as the 'vital interests' of the parties were not involved, Cd 1837.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

Between 1900 and 1932 some twenty disputes went through the PCA procedure, but from that point the numbers began to fall drastically. However, more recently the PCA has started to play an increasingly important role, so much so that an element of 'institutionalisation' of arbitration has been detected by some writers.[239] It has served as the registry in, for example, the two phases of the Eritrea–Yemen arbitration[240] and for the Eritrea–Ethiopia Boundary Commission[241] and Claims Commission[242] and in the Larsen v. Hawaiian Kingdom arbitration.[243] It also provided facilities in cases such as the Mox arbitration between the UK and Ireland[244] and Saluka Investments v. Czech Republic.[245] The PCA has also adopted, for example, Optional Rules for Arbitrating Disputes between Two States,[246] Optional Rules for Arbitrating Disputes between Two Parties of Which Only One is a State,[247] Optional Rules of Arbitration Involving International Organisations and States,[248] and Optional Rules for Arbitration of Disputes Relating to Natural Resources and/or the Environment in 2001.[249] The International Law Commission itself formulated a set of Model Rules on Arbitral Procedure, which was adopted by the General Assembly in 1958.[250]

Arbitration tribunals may be composed in different ways.[251] There may be a single arbitrator or a collegiate body. In the latter case, each party will appoint an equal number of arbitrators with the chairman or umpire [239] See Malintoppi, 'Methods of Dispute Resolution', p. 135. See generally H. Von Mangoldt, 'Arbitration and Conciliation' in Wetter, Arbitral Process, vol. V, pp. 243 ff., and D. Johnson, 'International Arbitration Back in Favour?', 34 YBWA, 1980, p. 305.

[240] See 114 ILR, p. 1 (Phase One: Territorial Sovereignty) and 119 ILR, p. 417 (Phase Two: Maritime Delimitation).

[241] Decision of 13 April 2002: see 129 ILR, p. 1.

[242] See S/2001/608. As to some Eritrea–Ethiopia Claims Commission decisions, see above, chapter 13, p. 756, note 319.

[243] See 119 ILR, p. 566. [244] See 126 ILR, p. 310. [245] Partial Award of 17 March 2006.

[246] In 1992: see 32 ILM, 1993, p. 572. These are based upon the UNCITRAL (United Nations Commission on International Trade Law) Arbitration Rules, adopted by the UN General Assembly on 15 December 1976 in resolution 31/98.

[247] With effect from 1993: see http://pca-cpa.org/ENGLISH/BD/1stateeng.htm.

[248] With effect from 1996: see http://pca-cpa.org/ENGLISH/BD/2igoenglish.htm.

[249] See www.pca-cpa.org/ENGLISH/EDR/ENRrules.htm.

[250] Resolution 1262 (XI). These are, however, merely optional. See also Report of the ILC, 1958, A/3859. Note also the 1928 General Act, the 1929 General Treaty of Inter-American Arbitration and the 1949 Revised General Act. See also Yearbook of the ILC, 1953, vol. II, p. 208.

[251] See e.g. Merrills, International Dispute Settlement, pp. 95 ff. It is, of course, an issue for the parties to decide.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

being appointed by either the parties or the arbitrators already nominated. In many cases, a head of state will be suggested as a single arbitrator and he will then nominate an expert or experts in the field of international law or other relevant disciplines to act for him.[252] Under the PCA system, and in the absence of agreement to the contrary, each party selects two arbitrators from the panel, only one of whom may be a national of the state. These arbitrators then choose an umpire, but if they fail to do so, this task will be left to a third party, nominated by agreement. If this also fails to produce a result, a complicated process then ensues culminating in the drawing of lots.

States are not obliged to submit a dispute to the procedure of arbitration, in the absence of their consent.[253] This consent may be expressed in arbitration treaties, in which the contracting states agree to submit certain kinds of disputes that may arise between them to arbitration, or in specific provisions of general treaties, which provide for disputes with regard to the treaty itself to be submitted to arbitration,[254] although the number of treaties dealing primarily with the peaceful settlement of disputes has declined since 1945.[255] Consent to the reference of a dispute to arbitration with regard to matters that have already arisen is usually expressed by means of a compromis, or special agreement, and the terms in which it is couched are of extreme importance. This is because the jurisdiction of the tribunal is defined in relation to the provisions of the treaty or compromis, whichever happens to be the relevant document in the particular case. However, in general, the tribunal may determine its competence in interpreting the compromis and other documents concerned in the case.[256]

[252] E.g. the Argentina–Chile case, 38 ILR, p. 10 and the Beagle Channel case, HMSO, 1977; 52 ILR, p. 93. Note also the Interpretation of Peace Treaties case, ICJ Reports, 1950, p. 221; 17 ILR, p. 318.

[253] See e.g. the Eastern Carelia case, PCIJ, Series B, No. 5, 1923, p. 27; 2 AD, p. 394 and the Ambatielos case, ICJ Reports, 1953, p. 19; 20 ILR, p. 547.

[254] See Arbitration and Security: The Systematic Survey of the Arbitration Conventions and Treaties of Mutual Security Deposited with the League of Nations, Geneva, 1927, and Systematic Survey of Treaties for the Pacific Settlement of International Disputes 1928–1948, New York, 1949.

[255] See L. Sohn, 'Report on the Changing Role of Arbitration in the Settlement of International Disputes', International Law Association, 1966, pp. 325, 334.

[256] In the absence of agreement to the contrary. See e.g. the Nottebohm case, ICJ Reports, 1953, pp. 111, 119; 20 ILR, pp. 567, 572. See also article 48 of the Hague Convention, 1899, and article 73 of the Hague Convention, 1907.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

The law to be applied in arbitration proceedings is international law,[257] but the parties may agree upon certain principles to be taken into account by the tribunal and specify this in the compromis. In this case, the tribunal must apply the rules specified. For example, in the British Guiana and Venezuela Boundary dispute,[258] it was stated that occupation for fifty years should be accepted as constituting a prescriptive title to territory. And in the Trail Smelter case,[259] the law to be applied was declared to be US law and practice with regard to such questions as well as international law.[260]

Agreements sometimes specify that the decisions should be reached in accordance with 'law and equity' and this means that the general principles of justice common to legal systems should be taken into account as well as the provisions of international law. Such general principles may also be considered where there are no specific rules covering the situation under discussion.[261] The rules of procedure of the tribunal are often specified in the compromis and decided by the parties by agreement as the process commences. Hague Convention I of 1899 as revised in 1907 contains agreed procedure principles, which would apply in the absence of express stipulation. It is characteristic of arbitration that the tribunal is competent to determine its own jurisdiction and therefore interpret the relevant [257] See e.g. the Norwegian Shipowners' Claims case, 1 RIAA, 1921, p. 309 and the Dubai/Sharjah case, 91 ILR, pp. 543, 585–8. Note that article 28 of the 1928 General Act for the Pacific Settlement of International Disputes, as revised in 1949, provides that where nothing is laid down in the arbitration agreement as to the law applicable to the merits of the case, the tribunal should apply the substantive rules as laid down in article 38 of the Statute of the International Court of Justice (i.e. international treaties, custom and general principles of law). See further above, chapter 3, p. 70.

[258] 92 BFSP, p. 970. [259] 3 RIAA, 1938, p. 1908; 9 AD, p. 315.

[260] Note that in international commercial arbitrations, the reference often incorporates municipal law: see e.g. the BP case, 53 ILR, p. 297, where the basic reference was to 'the principles of the Law of Libya common to the principles of international law'. See also the wide reference to the Iran–United States Claims Tribunal to decide all cases 'on the basis of respect for law, applying such choice of law rules and principles of commercial and international law as the Tribunal determines to be applicable, taking into account relevant usages of the trade, contract provisions and changed circumstances', above, p. 1043. By way of contrast, the tribunal in the OSPAR (Ireland v. UK) case, operating on the basis of article 32 of the OSPAR Convention, held that the only applicable law was the Convention itself, 126 ILR, p. 334.

[261] See e.g. Re Competence of the Conciliation Commission 22 ILR, p. 867 and above, chapter 3, p. 98. See also article 28 of the 1928 General Act as revised in 1949, article 10 of the ILC Model Articles and articles 26 and 28 of the European Convention for the Peaceful Settlement of Disputes. Note in addition the Rann of Kutch case, 50 ILR, p. 520.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

instruments determining that jurisdiction.[262] Once an arbitral award has been made, it is final and binding upon the parties,[263] but in certain circumstances the award itself may be regarded as a nullity.[264] There is disagreement amongst lawyers as to the grounds on which such a decision may be taken. It is, however, fairly generally accepted that where a tribunal exceeds its powers under the compromis, its award may be treated as a nullity, although this is not a common occurrence. Such excess of power (excès de pouvoir) may be involved where the tribunal decides a question not submitted to it, or applies rules it is not authorised to apply. The main example of the former is the North-Eastern Boundary case[265] between Canada and the United States, where the arbitrator, after being asked to decide which of two lines constituted the frontier, in fact chose a third line.

It is sometimes argued that invalidity of the compromis is a ground of nullity,[266] while the corruption of a member of the tribunal or a serious departure from a fundamental rule of procedure are further possibilities as grounds of nullity.[267] Article 35 of the Model Rules on Arbitral Procedure drawn up by the International Law Commission, for example, provides for a successful plea of nullity in three cases: excess of power, corruption of a tribunal member or serious departure from a fundamental rule of procedure, including failure to state the reasons for the award.[268] 'Essential [262] See the Nottebohm (Preliminary Objections) case, ICJ Reports, 1953, pp. 111, 119; 20 ILR, pp. 567, 571–3. See also Arbitration Commission on Yugoslavia, Interlocutory Decision of 4 July 1992, 92 ILR, pp. 194, 197.

[263] Articles 81 and 84, Hague Convention I, 1907. The principle of res judicata also applies to arbitration awards: see e.g. the Trail Smelter case, 3 RIAA, 1938, p. 1905; 9 AD, p. 324 and the Orinoco Steamship Co. case, 11 RIAA, 1910, p. 227.

[264] See e.g. W. M. Reisman, Nullity and Revision, New Haven, 1971; E. K. Nantwi, The Enforcement of International Judicial Decisions and Arbitral Awards in Public International Law, Leiden, 1967, and O. Schachter, 'The Enforcement of International Judicial and Arbitral Decisions', 54 AJIL, 1960, p. 1.

[265] See C. C. Hyde, International Law, 2nd edn, Boston, 1945, vol. III, p. 1636. See also the Pelletier case, ibid., p. 1640; the Panama–Costa Rica Boundary case, 11 RIAA, 1900, p. 519 and US Foreign Relations, 1914, p. 994; the Chamizal case, 11 RIAA, p. 309, and the Cerruti arbitrations, 6 AJIL, 1912, p. 965.

[266] See e.g. Murty, 'Settlement', pp. 693–4, and A. D. McNair, The Law of Treaties, Oxford, 1961, pp. 66–77.

[267] See Schachter, 'Enforcement', p. 3. See also, as regards corruption, Moore, International Arbitrations, vol. II, pp. 1660–4, and the Buraimi arbitration, Wetter, Arbitral Process, vol. III, p. 357 and 545 HC Deb., col. 199, 1955.

[268] See the British Guiana and Venezuela Boundary case, 92 BFSP, p. 160, and Wetter, Arbitral Process, vol. III, pp. 81 ff. See also the Arbitral Award by the King of Spain case, ICJ Reports, 1960, pp. 188, 216; 30 ILR, pp. 457, 476.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

error' has also been suggested as a ground of nullity, but the definition of this is far from unambiguous.[269] It would appear not to cover the evaluation of documents and evidence,[270] but may cover manifest errors[271] such as not taking into account a relevant treaty or a clear mistake as to the appropriate municipal law.[272] Of course, once a party recognises the award as valid and binding, it will not be able to challenge the validity of the award at a later stage.[273] In certain circumstances, it may be open to a party to request a revision or re-opening of the award in order to provide for rectification of an error or consideration of a fact unknown at the time to the tribunal and the requesting party which is of such a nature as to have a decisive influence on the award.[274]

Arbitration as a method of settling disputes combines elements of both diplomatic and judicial procedures. It depends for its success on a certain amount of goodwill between the parties in drawing up the compromis and constituting the tribunal, as well as actually enforcing the award subsequently made. A large part depends upon negotiating processes. On the other hand, arbitration is an adjudicative technique in that the award is final and binding and the arbitrators are required to base their decision on law.[275] It will be seen in the following section just how close arbitration is to judicial settlement of disputes by the International Court of Justice, and it is no coincidence that the procedure of arbitration through the PCA began to decline with the establishment and consolidation of the Permanent Court of International Justice in the 1920s.

In recent years, there has been a rise in the number of inter-state arbitrations. The Rann of Kutch case,[276] the Anglo-French Continental Shelf case,[277] the Beagle Channel case[278] and the Taba case[279] were all the subject of [269] See e.g. Murty, 'Settlement', p. 696, and Merrills, International Dispute Settlement, pp. 113 ff.

[270] Arbitral Award by the King of Spain, ICJ Reports, 1960, pp. 188, 215–16; 30 ILR, pp. 457, 475. See also, as regards the Argentinian claim of nullity of the Beagle Channel award, 17 ILM, 1978, p. 738; 52 ILR, pp. 267–85.

[271] See the Trail Smelter case, 3 RIAA, 1938, pp. 1905, 1957; 9 AD, p. 331.

[272] See e.g. the Schreck case, Moore, International Arbitrations, vol. II, p. 1357.

[273] Arbitral Award by the King of Spain, ICJ Reports, 1960, pp. 188, 213; 30 ILR, p. 473.

[274] See e.g. Wetter, Arbitral Process, vol. II, pp. 539 ff. See also article 29 of the ILC Model Rules.

[275] See the definition of arbitration in Yearbook of the ILC, 1953, vol. II, p. 202.

[276] 50 ILR, p. 2. See also J. G. Wetter, 'The Rann of Kutch Arbitration', 65 AJIL, 1971, p. 346.

[277] Cmnd 7438, 1978; 54 ILR, p. 6. See further above, chapter 11, p. 593.

[278] HMSO, 1977; 52 ILR, p. 93. See M. N. Shaw, 'The Beagle Channel Arbitration Award', 6 International Relations, 1978, p. 415.

[279] 80 ILR, p. 244. See also D. W. Bowett, 'The Taba Award of 29 September 1988', 23 Israel Law Review, 1989, p. 429; G. Lagergren, 'The Taba Tribunal 1986–89', 1 African Journal

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

arbitral awards, usually successfully.[280] More recent examples include the Eritrea–Yemen arbitration,[281] the Eritrea–Ethiopia boundary delimitation case[282] and the Barbados v. Trinidad and Tobago maritime delimitation case.[283] It may be that further such issues may be resolved in this fashion, although a lot depends on the evaluation of the parties as to the most satisfactory method of dispute settlement in the light of their own particular interests and requirements.

Arbitration is an extremely useful process where some technical expertise is required, or where greater flexibility and speed than is available before the International Court is desired.[284] The states themselves choose the arbitrators, lay down the applicable law and rules of procedure, as well as set the timetable. In addition, the states involved may wish for the proceedings to be confidential, something which is not achievable in the International Court with its public oral hearings and publication of written proceedings. However, the parties pay all the costs of the arbitration, including the fees due to the registrar and arbitrators, while in the International Court, the judges and members of the registry are paid by the UN.[285]

Arbitration may be the appropriate mechanism to utilise as between states and international institutions, since only states may appear before the ICJ in contentious proceedings. The establishment of arbitral tribunals of International and Comparative Law, 1989, p. 525, and P. Weil, 'Some Observations on the Arbitral Award in the Taba Case', 23 Israel Law Review, 1989, p. 1.

[280] Argentina initially rejected the award in the Beagle Channel case, but later mediation and negotiations resolved the issue: see 17 ILM, 1978, p. 738 and 24 ILM, 1985, p. 1.

[281] 114 ILR, p. 1 and 119 ILR, p. 417.

[282] See 129 ILR, p. 1. See also M. N. Shaw, 'Title, Control and Closure? The Experience of the Eritrea–Ethiopia Boundary Commission', 56 ICLQ, 2007, p. 755.

[283] Award of 11 April 2006. See also the Guyana v. Suriname maritime delimitation case, award of 17 September 2007, see further on maritime delimitations, above, chapter 11, p. 590.

[284] For example in the Argentina–Chile case of 1966, the tribunal consisted of a lawyer and two geographical experts, 38 ILR, p. 10. See Malintoppi, 'Methods of Dispute Resolution', and R. Y. Jennings, 'The Differences Between Conducting a Case in the ICJ and in an Ad Hoc Tribunal – An Insider's View', Liber Amicorum Judge Shigeru Oda (eds. N. Ando, E. McWhinney and R. Wolfrum), The Hague, 2002, p. 893.

[285] Note that article 287 of the Convention on the Law of the Sea, 1982 provides that where a state has not chosen by a written declaration one of the dispute settlement methods laid down, it will be deemed to have opted for arbitration under Annex VII of the Convention. In the case of such arbitrations, the parties nominate one each of the five-member tribunal, with the remaining members being chosen by agreement. In the absence of such agreement, the President of the International Tribunal for the Law of the Sea will make the necessary appointments: see e.g. the Barbados v. Trinidad and Tobago arbitration of 11 April 2006 and the Guyana v. Suriname arbitration of 17 September 2007.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

has often been undertaken in order to deal relatively quietly and cheaply with a series of problems within certain categories, for example, the mixed tribunals established after the First World War to settle territorial questions, or the Mexican Claims commissions which handled various claims against Mexico.[286] An attempt was made to tackle issues raised by the situation in the Former Yugoslavia by the establishment of an Arbitration Commission.[287] However, the Commission, while issuing a number of Opinions on issues concerning, for example, statehood, recognition, human rights and boundary matters, was not able to act as an arbitration tribunal as between the parties to the conflict.

Like arbitration, judicial settlement is a binding method of dispute settlement, but by means of an established and permanent body. There are a number of international and regional courts deciding disputes between subjects of international law, in accordance with the rules and principles of international law.[288] However, by far the most important, both by prestige and jurisdiction, is the International Court of Justice, and this is the subject of the following chapter.

Suggestions for further reading

J. Collier and V. Lowe, The Settlement of Disputes in International Law, Cambridge, 1999

J. G. Merrills, International Dispute Settlement, 4th edn, Cambridge, 2005

F. Orrego Vicuña, International Dispute Settlement in an Evolving Global Society: Constitutionalization, Accessibility, Privatization, Cambridge, 2004

United Nations, Handbook on the Peaceful Settlement of Disputes Between States, New York, 1992

[286] See e.g. A. H. Feller, Mexican Claims Commissions 1923–1934, New York, 1935.

[287] Established pursuant to the Declaration of 27 August 1991 of the European Community: see Bull. EC, 7/8 (1991). See generally, M. Craven, 'The EC Arbitration Commission on Yugoslavia', 66 BYIL, 1995, p. 333.

[288] See above, note 2.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

19

The International Court of Justice[1]

The impetus to create a world court for the international community developed as a result of the atmosphere engendered by the Hague Conferences of 1897 and 1907. The establishment of the Permanent Court of Arbitration, although neither permanent nor, in fact, a court, marked

[1] See e.g. S. Rosenne, The Law and Practice of the International Court, 1920–2005, 4th edn, Leiden, 4 vols., 2006, and Rosenne, The World Court, 6th edn, Dordrecht, 2005; The Statute of the International Court of Justice: A Commentary (eds. A. Zimmermann, C. Tomuschat and K. Oellers-Frahm), Oxford, 2006; M. S. M. Amr, The Role of the International Court of Justice as the Principal Judicial Organ of the United Nations, The Hague, 2003; G. Guillaume, La Cour Internationale de Justice à l'Aube du XXIe Siècle: Le Regard d'un Juge, Paris, 2003; Fifty Years of the International Court of Justice (eds. A. V. Lowe and M. Fitzmaurice), Cambridge, 1996; G. G. Fitzmaurice, The Law and Procedure of the International Court of Justice, Cambridge, 2 vols., 1986; H. Thirlway, 'The Law and Procedure of the International Court of Justice (1960–1989)' series of articles in the British Year Book of International Law from volume 60, 1989 to volume 70, 2003, and Thirlway, 'The Law and Procedure of the International Court of Justice 1960–1989, Supplement 2005: Parts One and Two', 76 BYIL, 2005, p. 1, and Thirlway, 'The Law and Procedure of the International Court of Justice 1960–1989, Supplement 2006: Part Three', 77 BYIL, 2006, p. 1; R. Y. Jennings, 'The International Court of Justice after Fifty Years', 89 AJIL, 1995, p. 493, and Jennings, 'The Role of the International Court of Justice', 68 BYIL, 1997, p. 1; G. Guyomar, Commentaire du Règlement de la CIJ, Paris, 1983; E. McWhinney, The World Court and the Contemporary Law-Making Process, Alphen aan den Rijn, 1979; T. O. Elias, The International Court of Justice and Some Contemporary Problems, Alphen aan den Rijn, 1983; J. G. Merrills, International Dispute Settlement, Cambridge, 4th edn, 2005, chapters 6 and 7; The Future of the International Court of Justice (ed. L. Gross), Dobbs Ferry, 2 vols., 1976; The International Court of Justice at a Crossroads (ed. L. Damrosch), Dobbs Ferry, 1987; E. Lauterpacht, Aspects of the Administration of International Justice, Cambridge, 1991; T. M. Franck, 'Fairness in the International Legal and Institutional System', 240 HR, 1993 III, pp. 13, 302; R. Higgins, Problems and Process, Oxford, 1994, chapter 11; Increasing the Effectiveness of the International Court of Justice (eds. C. Peck and R. S. Lee), The Hague, 1997; The International Court of Justice: Its Future Role after Fifty Years (eds. A. S. Muller, D. Raič and J. M. Thuránszky), The Hague, 1997; Nguyen Quoc Dinh, P. Daillier and A. Pellet, Droit International Public, 7th edn, Paris, 2002, p. 889; B. S. Murty, 'Settlement of Disputes' in Manual of Public International Law (ed. M. Sørensen), London, 1968, p. 673; K. H. Kaikobad, The International Court of Justice and Judicial Review, The Hague, 2000, and E. McWhinney, Judicial Settlement of International Disputes, Alphen aan den Rijn, 1991.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

an important step forward in the consolidation of an international legal system.[2] However, no lasting concrete steps were taken until after the conclusion of the First World War. The Covenant of the League of Nations called for the formulation of proposals for the creation of a world court and in 1920 the Permanent Court of International Justice (PCIJ) was created. It stimulated efforts to develop international arbitral mechanisms. Together with arbitration, the Permanent Court was intended to provide a reasonably comprehensive system serving the international community. It was intended as a way to prevent outbreaks of violence by enabling easily accessible methods of dispute settlement in the context of a legal and organisational framework to be made available.[3]

The PCIJ was superseded after the Second World War by the International Court of Justice (ICJ), described in article 92 of the Charter as the 'principal judicial organ' of the United Nations. In essence, it is a continuation of the Permanent Court, with virtually the same statute and jurisdiction, and with a continuing line of cases, no distinction being made between those decided by the PCIJ and those by the ICJ.[4]

The organisation of the Court[5]

The ICJ is composed of fifteen members:

> elected regardless of their nationality, from among persons of high moral character, who possess the qualifications required in their respective countries for appointment to the highest judicial offices, or are jurisconsults of recognised competence in international law.[6]

The procedure for the appointment of judges is interesting in that it combines both legal and political elements, while seeking to exclude as far as possible the influence of national states over them. The system established by the Root–Phillimore plan in 1920 is in essence followed. This plan played a large part in the actual creation of the PCIJ and

[2] See above, chapter 18, p. 1049.
[3] For an assessment of its work, see e.g. Rosenne, Law and Practice, vol. I, pp. 16 ff.
[4] See e.g. M. Shahabuddeen, Precedent in the World Court, Cambridge, 1996, pp. 22 ff.
[5] See e.g. Rosenne, Law and Practice, vol. I, chapter 6 and vol. III, chapter 17. See also H. Thirlway, 'Procedural Law and the International Court of Justice' in Lowe and Fitzmaurice, Fifty Years of the International Court of Justice, p. 389.
[6] Article 2, Statute of the ICJ.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

succeeded in allaying many suspicions regarding the composition of the proposed Court.[7]

The members of the Court are elected by the General Assembly and Security Council (voting separately) from a list of qualified persons drawn up by the national groups of the Permanent Court of Arbitration, or by specially appointed national groups in the case of UN members that are not represented in the PCA.[8] This provision was inserted to restrict political pressures in the selection of judges. The elections are staggered and take place once every three years, with respect to five judges each time. In this way some element of continuity amongst the Court is maintained.

In practice, there is close co-ordination between the Assembly and Security Council in electing judges and political factors do obtrude, especially in view of the requirement contained in article 9 of the Statute that the > electors should bear in mind not only that the persons to be elected should individually possess the qualifications required, but also that in the body as a whole the representation of the main forms of civilisation and of the principal legal systems of the world should be assured.

This process has attracted much criticism on the grounds of attendant politicisation but in the circumstances it is difficult to see a way to avoid this completely.[9] The opinions of individual judges can be crucial, particularly in sensitive cases, and the alteration in the stance adopted by the Court with regard to the Namibia case between 1966[10] and 1971[11] can be attributed in large measure to changes in the composition of the Court that took place in the intervening period. Candidates must obtain an absolute majority of votes in both the Assembly and the Council,[12] and no two successful applicants may be of the same nationality.[13]

The members of the Court are elected for nine years and may be re-elected.[14] They enjoy diplomatic privileges and immunities when on [7] See e.g. Murty, 'Settlement', p. 700. See also L. Lloyd, Peace Through Law, London, 1997.

[8] Articles 4 and 5 of the ICJ Statute. In practice, governments exercise a major influence upon the nominations process of the national groups: see Merrills, International Dispute Settlement, pp. 147 ff.

[9] See e.g. Rosenne, Law and Practice, vol. I, pp. 382 ff., and Rosenne, 'The Composition of the Court' in Gross, Future of the International Court of Justice, vol. I, pp. 377, 381–6. See also G. Abi-Saab, 'The International Court as a World Court' in Lowe and Fitzmaurice, Fifty Years of the International Court of Justice, p. 3.

[10] ICJ Reports, 1966, p. 6; 37 ILR, p. 243.

[11] ICJ Reports, 1971, p. 16; 49 ILR, p. 2.

[12] Article 10, Statute of the ICJ.

[13] Article 3, Statute of the ICJ.

[14] Article 13, Statute of the ICJ.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

official business,[15] and a judge cannot be dismissed unless it is the unanimous opinion of the other members of the Court that he or she has ceased to fulfil the required conditions.[16] These include the requirement that no member may exercise any political or administrative function or engage in any other professional occupation. No member may act as agent, advocate, or counsel in any case and no member may participate in the decision of any case in which he has previously taken part as agent, advocate or counsel for one of the parties, or as a member of a national or international court, or of a commission of inquiry, or in any other capacity.[17] The Court elects a president and vice-president for a three-year term which can be renewed,[18] and it is situated at The Hague.[19]

Since the aim of the election procedures relating to the composition of the Court is to produce a judicial body of independent members rather than state representatives, the Statute provides in article 31 that judges of the nationality of each of the parties in a case before the Court shall retain their right to sit in that case. However, the effect of this is somewhat reduced by the provision in that article that the parties to a dispute before the ICJ are entitled to choose a person to sit as judge for the duration of that case, where they do not have a judge of their nationality there [15] Article 19, Statute of the ICJ. [16] Article 18, Statute of the ICJ.

[17] Articles 16 and 17, Statute of the ICJ. Note the problem raised particularly in the Namibia case, ICJ Reports, 1971, pp. 3, 6 and 9, of judges who had previously been involved in the dispute albeit in another capacity. The Court did not accept the need to remove the judges in question. Practice, however, has been variable and, for example, Judges Fleischhauer (former UN Legal Counsel) and Higgins (former member of the Human Rights Committee) felt unable to take part in the Application of the Genocide Convention case: see CR 96/5, 29 April 1996, p. 6. In the Construction of a Wall case, ICJ Reports, 2004, pp. 136, 142; 129 ILR, pp. 37, 58–9, and the Court's Order of 30 January 2004, objections made to the participation of Judge Elaraby for playing a 'leading role in recent years in the very Emergency Special Session from which the advisory opinion request has now emerged' and other diplomatic and political involvement in the Middle East question prior to election to the Court were dismissed by the Court, citing the Namibia opinion. See also Rosenne, 'Composition', pp. 388–90, and Law and Practice, vol. I, pp. 400 ff. and vol. III, pp. 1056 ff.; P. Couvreur, 'Article 17' in Zimmermann et al., Statute of the International Court, p. 337; H. Thirlway, 'The Law and Procedure of the International Court of Justice 1960–1989', 72 BYIL, 2001, p. 38, and M. N. Shaw, 'The International Court of Justice: A Practical Perspective', 46 ICLQ, 1997, pp. 831, 845–6.

[18] Article 21, Statute of the ICJ.

[19] Article 22, Statute of the ICJ. Note that article 31(5) of the Statute provides that where there are several parties 'in the same interest' they shall be treated inter alia for the purposes of appointing ad hoc judges as one party only: see Rosenne, Law and Practice, vol. III, p. 1093, and Serbia and Montenegro v. Belgium, ICJ Reports, 2004, pp. 279, 287.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

already.[20] This procedure of appointing ad hoc judges may be criticised as possibly adversely affecting the character of the Court as an independent organ of legal experts.[21] The reason for the establishment and maintenance of the provision may be found within the realm of international politics and the need for political legitimacy and can only be understood as such.[22] Nevertheless, it may be argued that the procedure increases the judicial resources available to the Court in enabling the appointing state's arguments to be fully appreciated.[23] Judge ad hoc Lauterpacht in the Application of the Genocide (Provisional Measures) case in a discussion of the nature of the ad hoc judge, declared that together with the duty of impartiality, the ad hoc judge has the special obligation to ensure that so far as is reasonable, every relevant argument in favour of the party appointing him has been fully appreciated in the course of collegial reflection.[24] In practice the institution has not resulted in any disruption of the functioning of the ICJ.[25] While it is overwhelmingly the case that ad hoc judges [20] It is possible for states in this position not to appoint ad hoc judges: see e.g. the Temple of Preah Vihear case, ICJ Reports, 1962, p. 6; 33 ILR, p. 48. Note that in Djibouti v. France, ICJ Reports, 2008, para. 6, an ad hoc judge was appointed for France as the French judge on the Court recused himself.

[21] See e.g. H. Lauterpacht, The Function of Law in the International Community, Oxford, 1933, pp. 215 ff. This provision should be distinguished from article 27(2) of the European Convention on Human Rights, which similarly provides for the appointment of an ad hoc judge to the Court. In this case, the Court deals with the provisions of municipal law of the member states of the Council of Europe and measures their conformity with the Convention. It is thus necessary to retain some expertise as to the domestic system in the case in question. Note that it is possible for an ad hoc judge to be of the same nationality as that of one of the permanent judges: see e.g. Liechtenstein v. Germany, ICJ Reports, 2005, p. 6, and Rosenne, Law and Practice, vol. III, p. 1092, note 68.

[22] See e.g. S. Schwebel, 'National Judges and Judges Ad Hoc of the International Court of Justice', 48 ICLQ, 1998, p. 889; N. Valticos, 'L'Évolution de la Notion de Judge Ad Hoc', 50 Revue Hellénique de Droit International, 1997, pp. 11–12; H. Thierry, 'Au Sujet du Juge Ad Hoc', in Liber Amicorum Judge Ruda (eds. C. A. Armas Barea et al.), The Hague, 2000, p. 285; P. Kooijmans, 'Article 31' in Zimmermann et al., Statute of the International Court, p. 495; Rosenne, Law and Practice, vol. III, pp. 1085 ff., and L. V. Prott, The Latent Power of Culture and the International Judge, Abingdon, 1979.

[23] See Franck, 'Fairness', p. 312. See also N. Singh, The Role and Record of the International Court of Justice, Dordrecht, 1989, pp. 193–4.

[24] ICJ Reports, 1993, pp. 325, 408–9; 95 ILR, pp. 43, 126–7, and see also at the Counter-Claims Order phase of the case, ICJ Reports, 1997, pp. 243, 278; 115 ILR, p. 206. Judge Lauterpacht's views were cited with approval by Judge ad hoc Franck in his Dissenting Opinion in Indonesia/Malaysia, ICJ Reports, 2002, pp. 625, 693.

[25] Note that Practice Direction VII of the Court now requires that 'parties, when choosing a judge ad hoc pursuant to Article 31 of the Statute and Article 35 of the Rules of Court, should refrain from nominating persons who are acting as agent, counsel or advocate in another case before the Court or have acted in that capacity in the three years preceding

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

support the state that has so nominated them, this is not invariably so.[26] The Court has also permitted the use of ad hoc judges in advisory proceedings, although only where it has found that an opinion is requested 'upon a legal question' actually pending between two or more states.[27]

Article 29 of the Statute of the ICJ provides for the establishment of a Chamber of Summary Procedure for the speedy dispatch of business by five judges. It has not as yet been called upon. More controversially, a seven-member Chamber for Environmental Matters was established in July 1993.[28] Article 26 permits the creation of Chambers composed of three or more members as the Court may determine for dealing with particular categories of cases[29] or to deal with a particular case. This procedure was revised in the 1978 Rules of Court[30] and used for the first time in the Gulf of Maine case.[31] The question of the composition of the Chamber is decided by the Court after the parties have been consulted, and in such cases the identity of the judges to comprise the Chamber is clearly of critical value. In the Gulf of Maine case it was alleged that Canada and the US threatened to withdraw the case if their wishes as to composition were not carried out.[32] Judge Oda has underlined that 'in practical terms, therefore, it is inevitable, if a chamber is to be viable, that its composition must result from a consensus between the parties and the Court', although the

the date of the nomination. Furthermore, parties should likewise refrain from designating as agent, counsel or advocate in a case before the Court a person who sits as judge ad hoc in another case before the Court.' Practice Direction VIII provides in addition that 'parties should refrain from designating as agent, counsel or advocate in a case before the Court a person who in the three years preceding the date of the designation was a Member of the Court, judge ad hoc, Registrar, Deputy-Registrar or higher official of the Court'.

[26] See e.g. the Application for Revision and Interpretation of the Judgment made in the Tunisia/Libya case, ICJ Reports, 1985, p. 192; 81 ILR, p. 419, and the Great Belt (Finland v. Denmark) case, ICJ Reports, 1991, p. 12; 94 ILR, p. 446.

[27] See article 102(3) of the Rules of Court 1978. See the Western Sahara case, ICJ Reports, 1975, p. 12; 59 ILR, p. 30. Cf. the Namibia case, ICJ Reports, 1971, p. 16; 49 ILR, p. 2. See also L. Gross, 'The International Court of Justice: Consideration of Requirements for Enhancing its Roles in the International Legal Order' in Gross, Future of the International Court of Justice, vol. I, p. 61.

[28] See International Court of Justice, Yearbook 1993–1994, The Hague, 1994, p. 18. It has not yet been called upon, no doubt partly because whether or not an issue is an environmental one may indeed be very much in dispute between the parties: see R. Higgins, 'Respecting Sovereign States and Running a Tight Ship', 50 ICLQ, 2001, pp. 121, 122.

[29] Labour cases and cases relating to transit and communications are specifically mentioned.

[30] See articles 15–18 and 90–3 of the Rules of Court.

[31] ICJ Reports, 1982, p. 3 and ibid., 1984, p. 246; 71 ILR, p. 58. The Chamber consisted of Judge Ago (President) and Judges Gros, Mosler and Schwebel and Judge ad hoc Cohen.

[32] See e.g. Merrills, International Dispute Settlement, p. 150, and Brauer, 'International Conflict Resolution: The ICJ Chambers and the Gulf of Maine Dispute', 23 Va. JIL, 1982–3, p. 463. See also Singh, Role and Record, p. 110.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

Chamber is a component of the Court and 'the process of election whereby it comes into being should be as judicially impartial as its subsequent functioning'.[33]

Recourse to a Chamber provides the parties with flexibility in the choice of judges to hear the case and to that extent parallels arbitration.[34] Of the first two matters before Chambers of the Court, perhaps the more interesting from the perspective of the future development of the ICJ was the Burkina Faso–Mali case,[35] since African states had hitherto been most reluctant in permitting third-party binding settlement of their disputes. Chambers of the Court have also been utilised in the Elettronica Sicula case,[36] the Land, Island and Maritime Frontier Dispute between El Salvador and Honduras (Nicaragua intervening),[37] the Application for Revision of the Judgment in El Salvador/Honduras (Nicaragua intervening)[38] and Benin/Niger.[39]

The Rules of the Court, which govern its procedure and operations, were adopted in 1946 and revised in 1972 and 1978.[40] Articles 79 and 80 of the 1978 Rules were amended in 2000 and 2005.[41] The internal judicial practice of the Court has been the source of discussion in recent years[42] and some changes have taken place.[43] The Court, for example,

[33] ICJ Reports, 1987, pp. 10, 13; 97 ILR, pp. 139, 142.

[34] Although concern was expressed about the unity of the jurisprudence of the Court by frequent use of ad hoc Chambers: see H. Mosler, 'The Ad Hoc Chambers of the International Court of Justice' in International Law at a Time of Perplexity (ed. Y. Dinstein), Dordrecht, 1989, p. 449. See also S. Schwebel, 'Chambers of the International Court of Justice formed for Particular Cases', ibid., p. 739; E. Valencia-Ospina, 'The Use of Chambers of the International Court of Justice' in Lowe and Fitzmaurice, Fifty Years of the International Court of Justice, p. 503; Rosenne, Law and Practice, vol. III, pp. 1068 ff.; P. Palchetti, 'Article 26' in Zimmermann et al., Statute of the International Court, p. 439, and Franck, 'Fairness', pp. 314 ff. As to the precedential value of decisions of Chambers, see Shahabuddeen, Precedent, pp. 171 ff. See also Thirlway, 'Law and Procedure', 2001, pp. 38, 46.

[35] See 22 ILM, 1983, p. 1252 and Communiqué of the ICJ No. 85/8, 1 May 1985. The Chamber consisted of Judge Bedjaoui (President) and Judges Lachs and Ruda, with Judges ad hoc Luchaire and Abi-Saab: see ICJ Reports, 1986, p. 554; 80 ILR, p. 441.

[36] ICJ Reports, 1989, p. 15; 84 ILR, p. 311.

[37] See ICJ Reports, 1987, p. 10; 97 ILR, pp. 112 and 139 and ICJ Reports, 1992, p. 351.

[38] ICJ Reports, 2003, p. 392; 129 ILR, p. 1 [39] ICJ Reports, 2005, p. 90.

[40] See Rosenne, Law and Practice, vol. III, p. 1074. [41] See below, pp. 1074 and 1096.

[42] See e.g. D. Bowett et al., The International Court of Justice: Process, Practice and Procedures, London, 1997. See also e.g. Jennings, 'Role', pp. 8 ff.; M. Bedjaoui, 'La "Fabrication" des Arrêts de la Cour Internationale de Justice' in Mélanges Virally, Paris, 1991, p. 87, and S. Oda, 'The International Court of Justice Viewed from the Bench', 244 HR, 1993 VII, p. 13. See also Shaw, 'International Court', pp. 862 ff.

[43] See the 1976 Resolution on Practice, International Court of Justice, Acts and Documents Concerning the Organisation of the Court, The Hague, 1989, p. 165. See also Higgins, 'Respecting Sovereign States'.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

now adopts Practice Directions.[44] The Court has the power to regulate its own procedure.[45] Written pleadings are governed by articles 44 to 53 of the Rules of Court, which in fact allow the parties considerable latitude. While it is for the Court itself to determine the number, order and timing of filings of pleadings, this is done in consultation with the parties and the Court is ready to allow parties to extend time limits or determine whether, for example, there should be further rounds of pleadings.[46]

The jurisdiction of the Court[47]

General

The International Court is a judicial institution that decides cases on the basis of international law as it exists at the date of the decision. It cannot formally create law as it is not a legislative organ.[48] The Court has emphasised that, 'it states the existing law and does not legislate. This is so even if, in stating and applying the law, the Court necessarily [44] There are currently twelve, the majority seeking essentially to ensure that the parties keep strictly to the Rules concerning pleadings and to restrict the tendency to produce large numbers of annexes. Practice Direction XII provides that written statements and documents submitted by international non-governmental organisations in advisory proceedings shall not be considered as part of the case file, but rather as publications in the public domain and available for consultation.

[45] See e.g. Judge Weeramantry's Dissenting Opinion in the Request for an Examination of the Situation in Accordance with Paragraph 63 of the Nuclear Tests Case, ICJ Reports, 1995, pp. 288, 320; 106 ILR, pp. 1, 42, where he noted that this power enabled it to devise a procedure sui generis.

[46] The memorial is to contain a statement of relevant facts, a statement of law and the submissions. The counter-memorial is to contain an admission or denial of the facts stated in the memorial, any additional facts if necessary, observations upon the statement of law in the memorial and a statement of law in answer thereto and the submissions: see articles 49(1) and (2) of the Rules. The reply and rejoinder, if authorised by the Court, are to be directed at bringing out the issues still dividing the parties, article 49(3).

[47] See e.g. Rosenne, Law and Practice, vol. II, and C. Tomuschat, 'Article 36' in Zimmermann et al., Statute of the International Court, p. 589. See also M. N. Shaw, 'The Security Council and the International Court of Justice: Judicial Drift and Judicial Function' in Muller et al., International Court of Justice: Future Role, p. 219; W. M. Reisman, 'The Supervisory Jurisdiction of the International Court of Justice: International Arbitration and International Adjudication', 258 HR, 1996, p. 9, and S. A. Alexander, 'Accepting the Compulsory Jurisdiction of the International Court of Justice with Reservations', 14 Leiden Journal of International Law, 2001, p. 89. See also the series of articles by Thirlway on 'The Law and Procedure of the International Court of Justice' in the British Year Book of International Law from 1989 to date.

[48] See the Fisheries Jurisdiction case, ICJ Reports, 1974, pp. 3, 19; 55 ILR, pp. 238, 254.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

has to specify its scope and sometimes note its general trend.'[49] Its views as to what the law is are of the highest authority. However, the matters that come before it are invariably intertwined with political factors. On occasions, such matters are also the subject of consideration before the political organs of the UN or other international organisations or indeed the subject of bilateral negotiations between the parties. This raises issues as to the proper function and role of the Court. The International Court of Justice is by virtue of article 92 of the Charter the 'principal judicial organ of the United Nations'. It is also, as Judge Lachs put it, 'the guardian of legality for the international community as a whole, both within and without the United Nations'.[50] It has been emphasised that the 'function of the Court is to state the law'[51] and it can only decide on the basis of law.[52] The issue of judicial function was examined in an important joint declaration by seven judges in Serbia and Montenegro v. UK,[53] one of the cases brought by what was originally the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia against NATO countries arising out of the Kosovo conflict in 1999. It was noted that when choosing between various grounds upon which to accept or reject jurisdiction, there were three criteria to guide the Court. These were, first, consistency with previous case-law in order to provide predictability as 'consistency is the essence of judicial reasoning'; secondly, certitude, whereby the Court should choose the ground most secure in law, and, thirdly, as the principal judicial organ of the United Nations, the Court should be 'mindful of the possible implications and consequences for the other pending cases'.[54]

Nevertheless, political factors cannot but be entwined with questions of law. The Court has noted that while political aspects may be present in any legal dispute brought before it, the Court was only concerned to establish that the dispute in question was a legal dispute 'in the sense of a dispute capable of being settled by the application of principles and rules of international law'.[55] The fact that other elements are present cannot detract

[49] Legality of the Threat or Use of Nuclear Weapons, ICJ Reports, 1996, pp. 226, 237.

[50] The Lockerbie case, ICJ Reports, 1992, pp. 3, 26; 94 ILR, pp. 478, 509.

[51] The Northern Cameroons case, ICJ Reports, 1963, pp. 15, 33; 35 ILR, pp. 353, 369.

[52] See the Haya de la Torre case, ICJ Reports, 1951, pp. 71, 79; 18 ILR, p. 349. See also Judge Weeramantry's Dissenting Opinion in the Lockerbie case, ICJ Reports, 1992, pp. 3, 56; 94 ILR, pp. 478, 539.

[53] ICJ Reports, 2004, p. 1307. [54] Ibid., pp. 1353–4.

[55] The Armed Actions (Nicaragua v. Honduras) case, ICJ Reports, 1988, pp. 16, 91; 84 ILR, pp. 218, 246. See also the Certain Expenses of the United Nations case, ICJ Reports, 1962, pp. 151, 155; 34 ILR, pp. 281, 285, and the Tadić case before the Appeals Chamber of the International Criminal Tribunal for the Former Yugoslavia, IT-94-1-AR72, p. 11. See also

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

from the characterisation of a dispute as a legal dispute.[56] The Court has also referred to the assessment of the legality of the possible conduct of states with regard to international legal obligations as an 'essentially judicial task'.[57] Accordingly, 'the task of the Court must be to respond, on the basis of international law, to the particular legal dispute brought before it. As it interprets and applies the law, it will be mindful of context, but its task cannot go beyond that.'[58]

The fact that the same general political situation may come before different organs of the UN has raised the problem of concurrent jurisdiction. The Court, however, has been consistently clear that the fact that the issue before the Court is also the subject of active negotiations between the parties,[59] or the subject of good offices activity by the UN Secretary-General[60] or the subject of consideration by the Security Council[61] or regional organisations,[62] will not detract from the competence of the Court or the exercise of its judicial function. The Court has noted that the Security Council has functions of a political nature, while the Court itself has functions of a legal nature, and that therefore both organs could perform their separate but complementary functions with respect to the same events.[63] The Court may also indicate provisional measures of protection at the same time as the UN Secretary-General is organising a fact-finding mission to investigate the same events.[64] The Court's

R. Higgins, 'Policy Considerations and the International Judicial Process', 17 ICLQ, 1968, pp. 58, 74.

[56] ICJ Reports, 1988, p. 92; 84 ILR, p. 247. See also the Iranian Hostages case, ICJ Reports, 1980, pp. 7, 19–20; 61 ILR, pp. 530, 545–6 and Legality of the Threat or Use of Nuclear Weapons, ICJ Reports, 1996, pp. 226, 234; 110 ILR, pp. 163, 184. See, for the view that rather than concentrate upon definitions of legal and political questions, one should focus upon the distinctions between political and legal methods of dispute settlement, R. Y. Jennings, 'Gerald Gray Fitzmaurice', 55 BYIL, 1984, pp. 1, 18, and R. Higgins, 'Policy Considerations', p. 74.

[57] See the Advisory Opinion on the Legality of the Use by a State of Nuclear Weapons in Armed Conflict, ICJ Reports, 1996, pp. 66, 73; 110 ILR pp. 1, 13. See also e.g. the Certain Expenses case, ICJ Reports, 1962, pp. 151, 155; 34 ILR, pp. 281, 284–5.

[58] Democratic Republic of the Congo v. Uganda, ICJ Reports, 2005, pp. 168, 190. See also the Separate Opinion of Judge Simma, ibid., p. 335.

[59] See the Aegean Sea Continental Shelf case, ICJ Reports, 1976, pp. 3, 12; 60 ILR, pp. 562, 571.

[60] See the Iranian Hostages case, ICJ Reports, 1980, pp. 7, 21–2; 61 ILR, pp. 530, 547–8.

[61] See the Nicaragua case, ICJ Reports, 1984, pp. 392, 431–4; 76 ILR, pp. 104, 142–5.

[62] ICJ Reports, 1984, p. 440 and Cameroon v. Nigeria (Preliminary Objections), ICJ Reports, 1998, pp. 275, 307.

[63] ICJ Reports, 1984, p. 435; 76 ILR, p. 146.

[64] Cameroon v. Nigeria (Provisional Measures), ICJ Reports, 1996, pp. 13, 22.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

essential function is to resolve in accordance with international law disputes placed before it[65] and to refrain from deciding points not included in the final submissions of the parties.[66] The provision as to international law relates to the sources of law available for application by the Court and is considered subsequently.[67] The obligation to decide was referred to by the Court in the Libya/Malta (Application for Permission to Intervene) case,[68] where it was noted that it was the duty of the Court 'to give the fullest decision it may in the circumstances of each case'.[69] However, this obligation is subject, for example, to jurisdictional limitations (for example, with regard to the rights of third states)[70] and questions related to judicial propriety.[71]

The nature of a legal dispute

Article 36(2) of the Statute of the Court requires that a matter brought before it should be a legal dispute.[72] Although it is not possible to point to a specific definition, the approach adopted by the Permanent Court in the Mavrommatis Palestine Concessions (Jurisdiction) case[73] constitutes [65] See e.g. Democratic Republic of the Congo v. Uganda, ICJ Reports, 2005, pp. 168, 190. See also Judge Weeramantry's Dissenting Opinion in the Lockerbie case, ICJ Reports, 1992, pp. 3, 56; 94 ILR, pp. 478, 539.

[66] This rule (known as the non ultra petita rule) has been termed by Judge Buergenthal in his Separate Opinion in the Oil Platforms (Iran v. USA) case, ICJ Reports, 2003, pp. 161, 271; 130 ILR, pp. 323, 426, 'a cardinal rule which does not allow the Court to deal with a subject in the dispositif [operative paragraphs] of its judgment that the parties to the case have not, in their final submissions, asked it to adjudicate'. See the Request for the Interpretation of the Judgment in the Asylum Case, ICJ Reports, 1950, pp. 395, 402; the Qatar v. Bahrain case, ICJ Reports, 2001, pp. 40, 96–7 and the Democratic Republic of the Congo v. Belgium case, ICJ Reports, 2002, pp. 3, 18–19; 128 ILR, pp. 60, 73–5. See also Rosenne, Law and Practice, vol. II, p. 576.

[67] See below, p. 1086.

[68] ICJ Reports, 1984, pp. 3, 25; 70 ILR, pp. 527, 554.

[69] See also Judge Weeramantry's Dissenting Opinion in the East Timor case, ICJ Reports, 1995, pp. 90, 158; 105 ILR, pp. 226, 299. See also generally M. Bedjaoui, 'Expediency in the Decisions of the International Court of Justice', 71 BYIL, 2000, p. 1.

[70] See e.g. the Monetary Gold case, ICJ Reports, 1954, p. 32; 21 ILR, p. 399, and the East Timor case, ICJ Reports, 1995, pp. 90, 105; 105 ILR, pp. 226, 246.

[71] See further below, p. 1086.

[72] The Court noted in the Nuclear Tests case, ICJ Reports, 1974, pp. 253, 270–1; 57 ILR, pp. 398, 415–16, that 'the existence of a dispute is the primary condition for the Court to exercise its judicial function'. It is also a question which is 'essentially preliminary', ICJ Reports, 1974, p. 260; 57 ILR, p. 405.

[73] PCIJ, Series A, No. 2, 1924, p. 11. See also the South-West Africa cases, ICJ Reports, 1962, pp. 319, 328; 37 ILR, pp. 3, 10; the Nuclear Tests case, ICJ Reports, 1974, p. 253; 57 ILR, p. 398; Liechtenstein v. Germany, ICJ Reports, 2005, pp. 6, 18 and Democratic Republic of the Congo v. Rwanda, ICJ Reports, 2006, pp. 6, 40.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

the appropriate starting point. The Court declared that a dispute could be regarded as 'a disagreement over a point of law or fact, a conflict of legal views or of interests between two persons'. It is to be distinguished from a situation which might lead to international friction or give rise to a dispute. This is a subtle but important difference since, for the process of settlement to operate successfully, there has to be a specific issue or issues readily identifiable to be resolved.

In the Interpretation of Peace Treaties case[74] the Court noted that 'whether there exists an international dispute is a matter for objective determination' and pointed out that in the instant case 'the two sides hold clearly opposite views concerning the question of the performance or the non-performance of certain treaty obligations' so that 'international disputes have arisen'. A mere assertion is not sufficient; it must be shown that the claim of one party is positively opposed by the other.[75] This approach was reaffirmed in the Applicability of the Obligation to Arbitrate under Section 21 of the United Nations Headquarters Agreement case,[76] where the Court in an advisory opinion noted that the consistent challenge by the UN Secretary-General to the decisions contemplated and then taken by the US Congress and Administration with regard to the closing of the PLO offices in the US (which of necessity included the PLO Mission to the United Nations in New York) demonstrated the existence of a dispute between the US and the UN relating to the Headquarters Agreement. In the East Timor case[77] the Court again reaffirmed its earlier case-law and went on to note that 'Portugal has rightly or wrongly, formulated complaints of fact and law against Australia, which the latter has denied. By virtue of this denial, there is a legal dispute.' This acceptance of a relatively low threshold was underlined in the Application of the Genocide Convention (Bosnia

[74] ICJ Reports, 1950, pp. 65, 74; 17 ILR, pp. 331, 336.

[75] South-West Africa cases, ICJ Reports, 1962, pp. 319, 328; 37 ILR, pp. 3, 10 and the Nicaragua case, ICJ Reports, 1984, pp. 392, 429–41; 76 ILR, pp. 104, 140. See also Larsen v. Hawaiian Kingdom 119 ILR, pp. 566, 587. Note also that Kelsen wrote that 'a dispute is a legal dispute if it is to be settled by the application of legal norms, that is to say, by the application of existing law', Principles of International Law (ed. R. W. Tucker), 2nd edn, New York, 1966, p. 526. See also Rosenne, Law and Practice, vol. II, pp. 517 ff. Higgins has made the point that generally the Court has taken a robust attitude as to what is a 'legal' matter, Problems and Process, p. 195. See also V. Gowland-Debbas, 'The Relationship between the International Court of Justice and the Security Council in the Light of the Lockerbie Case', 88 AJIL, 1994, p. 643.

[76] ICJ Reports, 1988, pp. 12, 30; 82 ILR, pp. 225, 248.

[77] ICJ Reports, 1995, pp. 90, 99–100.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

and Herzegovina v. Yugoslavia) case,[78] where the Court stated that 'by reason of the rejection by Yugoslavia of the complaints formulated against it by Bosnia-Herzegovina, "there is a legal dispute" between them'. Such denial of the allegations made against Yugoslavia had occurred 'whether at the stage of proceedings relating to the requests for the indication of provisional measures, or at the stage of the present proceedings relating to those objections'.[79] In other words, in order for a matter to constitute a legal dispute, it is sufficient for the respondent to an application before the Court merely to deny the allegations made even if the jurisdiction of the Court is challenged.[80]

While it is for the parties to put forward their views, and particularly for the applicant, in its application, to present to the Court the dispute with which it wishes to seize the Court,[81] it is for the Court itself to determine the subject-matter of the dispute before it.[82] This will be done by taking into account not only the submission but the application as a whole, the arguments of the applicant before the Court and other documents referred to, including the public statements of the applicant.[83] Should the Court conclude that the dispute in question has disappeared by the time the Court makes its decision, because, for example, the object of the claim has been achieved by other means, then the 'necessary consequences' will be drawn and no decision may be given.[84] In all events, the determination on an objective basis of the existence of a dispute is for the Court itself.[85]

[78] ICJ Reports, 1996, pp. 595, 615. See also Liechtenstein v. Germany, ICJ Reports, 2005, pp. 6, 19.

[79] ICJ Reports, 1996, pp. 595, 614.

[80] See also El Salvador/Honduras, ICJ Reports, 1992, pp. 351, 555; 97 ILR, p. 112.

[81] Note that article 40(1) of the Statute requires that the application indicate the subject of the dispute and that article 38(2) of the Rules requires that the 'precise nature of the claim' be specified in the application.

[82] See e.g. Spain v. Canada, ICJ Reports, 1998, pp. 432, 449; 123 ILR, pp. 189, 209–10 and Nicaragua v. Colombia, ICJ Reports, 2007, para. 38.

[83] The Nuclear Tests case, ICJ Reports, 1974, pp. 253, 263; 57 ILR, pp. 398, 408. Note that new claims formulated during the course of proceedings will be declared inadmissible where such claims would, if admitted, transform the subject of the dispute originally brought before the Court in the application: see e.g. Nicaragua v. Honduras, ICJ Reports, 2007, para. 108.

[84] The Nuclear Tests case, ICJ Reports, 1974, pp. 253, 271; 57 ILR, p. 416. See also the Northern Cameroons case, ICJ Reports, 1963, pp. 15, 38; 35 ILR, p. 353 and Democratic Republic of the Congo v. Belgium, ICJ Reports, 2002, pp. 3, 14–15; 128 ILR, pp. 60, 69–71.

[85] Spain v. Canada, ICJ Reports, 1998, pp. 432, 448; 123 ILR, pp. 189, 208–9.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

It is also clear that the exhaustion of diplomatic negotiations is not a prerequisite to going to the Court.[86]

Contentious jurisdiction[87]

The jurisdiction of the International Court falls into two distinct parts: its capacity to decide disputes between states, and its capacity to give advisory opinions when requested so to do by particular qualified entities. The latter will be noted in the following section.

The Court has underlined that the question as to the establishment of jurisdiction is a matter for the Court itself. Although a party seeking to assert a fact must prove it, the issue of jurisdiction is a question of law to be resolved by the Court in the light of the relevant facts.[88] Further, jurisdiction must be determined at the time that the act instituting proceedings was filed, so that if the Court had jurisdiction at that date, it will continue to have jurisdiction irrespective of subsequent events.[89] Subsequent events may lead to a finding that an application has become moot, but cannot deprive the Court of jurisdiction.[90] It should also be noted that in dealing with issues of jurisdiction, the Court will not attach as much importance to matters of form as would be the case in domestic law.[91] The Court possesses an inherent jurisdiction to take such action as may be required in order to ensure that the exercise of its jurisdiction over [86] Cameroon v. Nigeria (Preliminary Objections), ICJ Reports, 1998, pp. 275, 303. The question of non-exhaustion of domestic remedies is an admissibility issue: see below, p. 1071.

[87] See e.g. Rosenne, Law and Practice, vol. II, and R. Szafarz, The Compulsory Jurisdiction of the International Court of Justice, Dordrecht, 1993.

[88] See the Fisheries Jurisdiction (Spain v. Canada) case, ICJ Reports, 1998, pp. 432, 450; 123 ILR, pp. 189, 210–11. See also the Armed Actions (Nicaragua v. Honduras) case, ICJ Reports, 1988, p. 76; 84 ILR, p. 231 and Serbia and Montenegro v. UK, ICJ Reports, 2004, pp. 1307, 1322.

[89] See e.g. Democratic Republic of the Congo v. Rwanda, ICJ Reports, 2006, pp. 6, 29. However, the Court has held that it would not penalise a defect in procedure which the applicant could easily remedy, ibid.

[90] Democratic Republic of the Congo v. Belgium, ICJ Reports, 2002, pp. 3, 12–13; 128 ILR, pp. 60, 67–8.

[91] See the Application of the Genocide Convention (Preliminary Objections) case, ICJ Reports, 1996, pp. 595, 613; 115 ILR, pp. 10, 26. See also the Mavrommatis Palestine Concessions case, PCIJ, Series A, No. 2, p. 34; 2 AD, p. 27, and the Northern Cameroons case, ICJ Reports, 1963, pp. 15, 28; 35 ILR, pp. 353, 363. The Court in Cameroon v. Nigeria (Provisional Measures), ICJ Reports, 1994, p. 105; 106 ILR, p. 144, in fixing relevant time limits for the parties, noted that Cameroon had submitted an additional application after its original application, by which it sought to extend the object of the dispute. It was intended as an amendment to the first application. There is no provision in the Statute and Rules of the

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

the merits, once established, is not frustrated, and to ensure the orderly settlement of all matters in dispute, to ensure the 'inherent limitations on the exercise of the judicial function' of the Court and to 'maintain its judicial character'.[92] The Court has also held that where jurisdiction exists over a dispute on a particular matter, no separate basis for jurisdiction is required in order to consider the question of remedies.[93]

It has been emphasised that the function of a decision on jurisdiction is solely to determine whether the case on the merits may proceed 'and not to engage in a clarification of a controverted issue of a general nature', while a case will not be declined simply on the basis of the alleged motives of one of the parties or because the judgment may have implications in another case.[94] The Court has freedom to select the ground upon which it will base its judgment and when its jurisdiction is challenged on diverse grounds, it is free to base its decision on one or more grounds of its own choosing, in particular 'the ground which in its judgment is more direct and conclusive'.[95] Once the Court has reached a decision on jurisdiction, that decision assumes the character of res judicata,[96] that is it becomes final and binding upon the parties. Subject only to the possibility of revision under article 61 of the Statute,[97] the findings of a judgment are, for the purposes of the case and between the parties, to be taken as correct, and may not be reopened on the basis of claims that doubt has been thrown on them by subsequent events.[98]

As well as the question of the jurisdiction of the Court, which essentially concerns issues as to the consent of the parties, it is necessary that the application be admissible.[99] Admissibility refers to the application of relevant general rules of international law, such as exhaustion of local remedies in cases concerning diplomatic protection.[100] Objections to Court for amendment of applications as such, although in this case Nigeria consented to the request and the Court accepted it.

92 The Nuclear Tests case, ICJ Reports, 1974, pp. 253, 259; 57 ILR, pp. 398, 404, citing the Northern Cameroons case, ICJ Reports, 1963, pp. 15, 29; 35 ILR, pp. 353, 365. See also below, p. 1074.

93 The LaGrand case, ICJ Reports, 2001, pp. 466, 485; 134 ILR, pp. 1, 24.

94 Serbia and Montenegro v. UK, ICJ Reports, 2004, pp. 1307, 1323.

95 Ibid., p. 1325.

96 See the Genocide Convention (Bosnia v. Serbia) case, ICJ Reports, 2007, paras. 117 ff. See further as to res judicata, above, chapter 3, p. 101.

97 See below, p. 1105.

98 The Genocide Convention (Bosnia v. Serbia) case, ICJ Reports, 2007, para. 120.

99 See e.g. Serbia and Montenegro v. UK, ICJ Reports, 2004, pp. 1307, 1322.

100 See e.g. Democratic Republic of the Congo v. Uganda, ICJ Reports, 2005, pp. 168, 276 and the Diallo (Guinea v. Democratic Republic of the Congo) case, ICJ Reports, 2007, paras.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

admissibility normally take the form of an assertion that, even if the Court has jurisdiction and the facts stated by the applicant state are assumed to be correct, nonetheless there are reasons why the Court should not proceed to an examination of the merits.[101] Together they form the necessary prerequisite to the Court proceeding to address the merits of a case. Also of relevance in the pre-merits consideration of an application to the Court is the question of standing or jurisdiction ratione personae, a matter which logically arises before a consideration of jurisdiction and admissibility. It refers to the question of the receivability of the request, sometimes termed the process of seisin, which constitutes 'a procedural step independent of the basis of jurisdiction invoked', although the question as to whether the Court has been validly seized is a question of jurisdiction.[102]

Article 34 of the Statute of the Court declares that only states may be parties in cases before the Court. This is of far-reaching importance since it prohibits recourse to the Court by private persons and international organisations, save in so far as some of the latter may be able to obtain advisory opinions. The Court is open to all states that are parties to the Statute. Article 93 of the UN Charter provides that all UN members are ipso facto parties to the Statute of the ICJ, and that non-members of the UN may become a party to the Statute on conditions determined by the General Assembly upon the recommendation of the Security Council. In the case of Switzerland, for example, the Assembly and Security Council declared that it could become a party to the Statute of the ICJ provided it accepted the provisions of that Statute, accepted all the obligations of a UN member under Article 94 of the Charter (i.e. undertaking to comply with the decision of the Court), and agreed to pay a certain amount towards the expenses of the Court.[103] The Security Council has in fact resolved that access to the ICJ for a state not party to the Statute is possible provided that such state has previously deposited with the registrar of the Court a declaration (either general or particular) accepting the jurisdiction of the Court and undertaking to comply in good faith with the decision or decisions of 33 ff. See also Rosenne, Law and Practice, vol. II, pp. 817 ff.; Tomuschat, 'Article 36', p. 646 and article 79 of the Rules of Court.

[101] See the Oil Platforms (Iran v. USA) case, ICJ Reports, 2003, pp. 161, 177; 130 ILR, pp. 323, 337.

[102] Qatar/Bahrain, ICJ Reports, 1995, pp. 6, 23–4: 102 ILR, pp. 1, 64–5.

[103] General Assembly resolution 91 (I). Switzerland became a member of the UN in September 2002. See also Rosenne, Law and Practice, vol. II, p. 598. Japan, Liechtenstein, Nauru and San Marino were also in the same position until 1956, 1990, 1999 and 1992 respectively.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

the Court.[104] West Germany filed a general declaration with the ICJ on this basis before it joined the UN,[105] while Albania[106] and Italy[107] filed particular declarations with respect to cases with which they were involved.

Article 35(2) of the Statute further provides that the conditions under which the Court shall be open to states other than those parties to the Statute shall be laid down by the Security Council[108] 'subject to the special provisions contained in treaties in force'. The Court has rather restrictively interpreted this condition to refer to treaties in force as at the date of the entry into force of the Statute and providing for the jurisdiction of what was then the new Court.[109] Although only states may be parties before the Court, the Court may request information relevant to cases before it from public international organisations and may receive information presented by these organisations on their own initiative.[110]

The question as to whether a party has the right to appear before the Court under the Statute is not dependent upon consent and is an issue which the Court itself must enquire into and determine prior to considering any objections to jurisdiction and admissibility.[111] Article 35(1) of the Statute provides that the Court shall be open to the states parties to the Statute, or as the Court itself has stated, 'The Court can exercise its judicial function only in respect of those states which have access to it under article 35.' Only states which have access to the Court, therefore, are in a position to confer jurisdiction upon it.[112] In Serbia and Montenegro v. UK,[113] the Court concluded that Serbia and Montenegro

[104] Security Council resolution 9 (1946).

[105] The North Sea Continental Shelf case, ICJ Reports, Pleadings, vol. I, pp. 6, 8.

[106] The Corfu Channel case, ICJ Reports, 1949, p. 4; 16 AD, p. 155.

[107] The Monetary Gold case, ICJ Reports, 1954, p. 19; 21 ILR, p. 399.

[108] Such conditions were laid down in Security Council resolution 9 (1946).

[109] ICJ Reports, 2004, pp. 1307, 1350. The Court accepted that no such prior treaties referring to the jurisdiction of the Court had been brought to its attention, ibid.

[110] Article 34(2), Statute of the ICJ. See also Rosenne, Law and Practice, vol. II, pp. 620 ff. Individuals, groups and corporations have no right of access to the Court: see here also H. Lauterpacht, International Law and Human Rights, London, 1950, p. 48. Note that Judge Higgins has written that, 'There is some flexibility I think for possible amicus briefs by NGOs in advisory opinion cases, and I think that a useful possibility for the Court to explore', 'Respecting Sovereign States', p. 123. See now Practice Direction XII with regard to the provision of written information by international non-governmental organisations in advisory proceedings.

[111] Serbia and Montenegro v. UK, ICJ Reports, 2004, pp. 1307, 1322 and 1326.

[112] Ibid., p. 1326.

[113] ICJ Reports, 2004, p. 1307. This was one of a series of cases brought by the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia (the precursor to Serbia and Montenegro) against NATO countries in 1999, so that the point in question applied to other respondent states.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

could not be regarded as a party to the Statute at the time of the application.[114]

The Court has certain inherent powers flowing from its role as a judicial organ.[115] These would include in certain circumstances the right of its own motion to put an end to proceedings in a case.[116] However, this would appear to be restricted to two circumstances: first, in cases before the adoption of article 38(5) of the Rules, where an application is made without a basis of jurisdiction in the hope that the other state would accept it,[117] and, secondly, where the Court accedes to the request of respondent states to remove cases from the list on the grounds of being manifestly lacking in jurisdiction.[118] This approach by the Court in the Serbia and Montenegro v. UK case was criticised by Judge Kooijmans[119] and by Judge Higgins, who noted that there was nothing in the case-law to suggest that the exercise of the Court's inherent powers in the absence of discontinuance was limited to the two circumstances referred to by the Court.[120] Judge Higgins emphasised that, 'The Court's inherent jurisdiction derives from its judicial character and the need for powers to regulate matters connected with the administration of justice, not every aspect of which may have been foreseen in the Rules.' The 'very occasional need' to exercise such inherent powers might arise at any stage, from summary dismissal of a case to jurisdictional questions to merits issues.[121]

Under article 79(9) of the Rules, there are three ways in which the Court may dispose of a preliminary objection to jurisdiction. It may uphold the challenge, reject the challenge or declare that the objection does not possess, in the circumstances of the case, an exclusively preliminary character, in which case the matter will be dealt with together with a [114] Ibid., pp. 1336–7. As to the relevant details of the case, see above, chapter 17, p. 963.

[115] See e.g. C. Brown, 'The Inherent Powers of International Courts and Tribunals', 76 BYIL, 2005, p. 195.

[116] Serbia and Montenegro v. UK, ICJ Reports, 2004, pp. 1307, 1321. The Rules do not provide for such a procedure.

[117] See below, p. 1076, note 131.

[118] See e.g. Yugoslavia v. Spain, ICJ Reports, 1999, pp. 761, 773–4 and Yugoslavia v. USA, ICJ Reports, 1999, pp. 916, 925–6.

[119] ICJ Reports, 2004, pp. 1307, 1370 ff. [120] Ibid., p. 1361.

[121] Ibid., pp. 1361–2. The question, therefore, that Judge Higgins believed that the Court should have addressed was whether it was possible to say that in the case, 'the circumstances are such that it is reasonable, necessary and appropriate for the Court to strike the case off the List as an exercise of inherent power to protect the integrity of the judicial process', ibid., p. 1362.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

consideration of the merits.[122] The Court has stated that in principle, a party raising preliminary objections to its jurisdiction is entitled to have those objections answered in the preliminary stage of the proceedings, unless the Court does not have before it all facts necessary to decide the question raised or if answering the preliminary objection would determine the dispute, or some elements thereof, on the merits.[123]

Article 36(1)

The Court has jurisdiction under article 36(1) of its Statute in all cases referred to it by parties, and regarding all matters specially provided for in the UN Charter or in treaties or conventions in force.[124] As in the case of arbitration, parties may refer a particular dispute to the ICJ by means of a special agreement, or compromis, which will specify the terms of the dispute and the framework within which the Court is to operate.[125] This method was used in the Minquiers and Ecrehos case,[126] and in a number of others.[127]

The jurisdiction of the Court is founded upon the consent of the parties,[128] which need not be in any particular form and in certain [122] See e.g. Nicaragua v. Colombia, ICJ Reports, 2007, para. 48. See also the preliminary objections judgment in Cameroon v. Nigeria, ICJ Reports, 1998, p. 275.

[123] Nicaragua v. Columbia, ICJ Reports, 2007, para. 51. It is possible, however, for the determination by the Court of its jurisdiction to 'touch upon certain aspects of the merits of the case', ibid.

[124] See also article 40 of the ICJ Statute and article 39 of the Rules of Court.

[125] See e.g. L. C. Marion, 'La Saisine de la CIJ par Voie de Compromis', 99 RGDIP, 1995, p. 258.

[126] ICJ Reports, 1953, p. 47; 20 ILR, p. 94.

[127] See e.g. the Belgium/Netherlands Frontier Land case, ICJ Reports, 1959, p. 209; 27 ILR, p. 62, the Tunisia/Libya Continental Shelf case, ICJ Reports, 1982, p. 18; 67 ILR, p. 4 and the Libya/Chad case, ICJ Reports, 1974, p. 6; 100 ILR, p. 1.

[128] See the Nicaragua case, ICJ Reports, 1986, pp. 3, 32; 76 ILR, pp. 349, 366. The Court noted in the Application for the Interpretation and Revision of the Judgment in the Tunisia/Libya Case, ICJ Reports, 1985, pp. 192, 216; 81 ILR, pp. 419, 449, that it was 'a fundamental principle' that 'the consent of states parties to a dispute, is the basis of the Court's jurisdiction in contentious cases', citing here the Interpretation of Peace Treaties case, ICJ Reports, 1950, p. 71; 17 ILR, pp. 331, 335. See also Cameroon v. Nigeria, ICJ Reports, 2002, pp. 303, 421 and Democratic Republic of the Congo v. Rwanda, ICJ Reports, 2006, pp. 6, 18. The Court further noted that, 'its jurisdiction is based on the consent of the parties and is confined to the extent accepted by them' and that 'the conditions to which such consent is subject must be regarded as constituting the limits thereon . . . The examination of such conditions relates to its jurisdiction and not to the admissibility of the application', ibid., p. 39. See also Djibouti v. France, ICL Reports, 2008, para. 48.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

circumstances the Court will infer it from the conduct of the parties. In the Corfu Channel (Preliminary Objections) case,[129] the Court inferred consent from the unilateral application of the plaintiff state (the United Kingdom) coupled with subsequent letters from the other party involved (Albania) intimating acceptance of the Court's jurisdiction. The idea whereby the consent of a state to the Court's jurisdiction may be established by means of acts subsequent to the initiation of proceedings is referred to as the doctrine of forum prorogatum.[130] It will usually arise where one party files an application with the Court unilaterally inviting another state to accept jurisdiction with regard to the particular dispute where jurisdiction would not otherwise exist with regard to the matter at issue. If the other state accedes to this, then the Court will have jurisdiction.[131]

The doctrine has been carefully interpreted to avoid giving the impression of a creeping extension by the Court of its own jurisdiction by means of fictions. Consent has to be clearly present, if sometimes inferred, and not merely a technical creation.[132] The Court has emphasised that such consent has to be 'voluntary and indisputable'.[133] In the [131] See article 38(5) of the Rules. The Republic of the Congo filed an application against France on 9 December 2002 with regard to which the former gave its consent on 11 April 2003: see ICJ Press Release 2003/14 and the Court's Order of 17 June 2003, while France consented to jurisdiction with regard to an application dated 9 January 2006 brought by Djibouti: see the Court's judgment of 4 June 2008, noting that, 'For the Court to exercise jurisdiction on the basis of forum prorogatum, the element of consent must be either explicit or clearly to be deduced from the relevant conduct of a State' (para. 62) and that the extent of consent (and thus the jurisdiction of the Court) depended upon the matching of the application made with the expression by the other party of its consent, para. 65. It was emphasised that, 'Where jurisdiction is based on forum prorogatum, great care must be taken regarding the scope of the consent as circumscribed by the respondent State', para. 87. On 18 April 2007, Rwanda filed an application against France, but as of the date of writing, France has not given its consent to jurisdiction: see ICJ Press Release 2007/11.

[129] ICJ Reports, 1948, p. 15; 15 AD, p. 349.

[130] See e.g. Rosenne, Law and Practice, vol. II, pp. 672 ff., and S. Yee, 'Forum Prorogatum in the International Court', 42 German YIL, 1999, p. 147.

[132] See e.g. the Monetary Gold case, ICJ Reports, 1954, pp. 19, 31; 21 ILR, pp. 399, 406. But cf. the Treatment in Hungary of Aircraft of the USA case, ICJ Reports, 1964, pp. 99, 103; the Aerial Incident (USA v. USSR) case, ICJ Reports, 1956, pp. 6, 9, 12, 15 and the two Antarctic cases, ICJ Reports, 1958, p. 158 and ibid., 1959, p. 276. Note that article 38(2) of the 1978 Rules of the Court stipulates that the application shall specify as far as possible the legal grounds upon which the jurisdiction of the Court is said to be based. See also Djibouti v. France, ICJ Reports, 2008, para. 163.

[133] Corfu Channel (Preliminary Objection), ICJ Reports, 1948, p. 27. See also Application of the Genocide Convention, ICJ Reports, 1996, pp. 595, 621.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

Corfu Channel case the UK sought to found the Court's jurisdiction inter alia on the recommendation of the Security Council that the dispute be referred to the Court, which it was agreed was a 'decision' binding upon member states of the UN in accordance with article 25 of the Charter.[134] Accordingly it was maintained by the UK that Albania was obliged to accept the Court's jurisdiction irrespective of its consent. The ICJ did not deal with this point, since it actually inferred consent, but in a joint separate opinion, seven judges of the Court rejected the argument, which was regarded as an attempt to introduce a new meaning of compulsory jurisdiction.[135] A particularly difficult case with regard to the question as to whether relevant events demonstrated an agreement between the parties to submit a case to the Court is that of Qatar v. Bahrain.[136] The issue centred upon minutes of a meeting signed by the Foreign Ministers of both states (the Doha Minutes) in December 1990. The status of such Minutes was controverted,[137] but the Court held that they constituted an agreement under international law.[138] There was also disagreement over the substance of the Minutes and thus the subject matter of the dispute to be placed before the Court. Bahrain defined the issue as including the question of 'sovereignty' over Zubarah, while Qatar merely accepted that that was how Bahrain characterised the issue.[139] The Court concluded that this was sufficient to lay the whole dispute, including this element, before it.[140] Questions do therefore remain with regard to the extent of the consensual principle after this decision.[141]

[134] Although not a member of the UN, Albania had agreed to assume the obligations of a member with regard to the dispute. This application was on the basis of that part of article 36(1) which specifies that the Court's jurisdiction also comprised 'all matters specifically provided for in the Charter' of the UN.

[135] ICJ Reports, 1948, pp. 15, 31–2; 15 AD, pp. 349, 354.

[136] ICJ Reports, 1994, p. 112 and ICJ Reports, 1995, p. 6; 102 ILR, pp. 1 and 47. See M. Evans, 'Case Concerning Maritime Delimitation and Territorial Questions Between Qatar and Bahrain (Qatar v. Bahrain), Jurisdiction and Admissibility', 44 ICLQ, 1995, p. 691.

[137] The argument revolving around whether any application to the Court had to be by both parties or whether unilateral application was provided for.

[138] ICJ Reports, 1994, p. 121; 102 ILR, p. 18.

[139] ICJ Reports, 1995, pp. 9–11; 102 ILR, pp. 50–2.

[140] ICJ Reports, 1995, pp. 17 and 25; 102 ILR, pp. 58 and 66. This was disputed by four of the five dissenting judges, who argued that the Zubarah sovereignty issue had not been properly laid before it, ICJ Reports, 1995, pp. 49, 55 ff., 72 and 74–5; 102 ILR, pp. 90, 96 ff., 113 and 115–16.

[141] See also E. Lauterpacht, '"Partial" Judgements and the Inherent Jurisdiction of the International Court of Justice' in Lowe and Fitzmaurice, Fifty Years of the International Court of Justice, p. 465.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

It is a well-established principle that the Court will only exercise jurisdiction over a state with its consent[142] and it 'cannot therefore decide upon legal rights of third states not parties to the proceedings'.[143] As a consequence of this principle, the Court will not entertain actions between states that in reality implead a third state without its consent. This rule was underlined in the Monetary Gold case,[144] where it was noted that where the legal interests of the third party 'would form the very subject-matter of the decision', the Court could not entertain proceedings in the absence of that state. In the Nicaragua case, the Court noted that the circumstances of the Monetary Gold case 'probably represent the limit of the power of the Court to refuse to exercise its jurisdiction'.[145] This approach was underlined in the Nauru case, where the Court emphasised that the absence of a request from a third party to intervene 'in no way precludes the Court from adjudicating upon claims submitted to it, provided that the legal interests of the third state which may possibly be affected do not form the very subject-matter of the decision that is applied for'.[146] The test referred to was whether the determination of the third state's responsibility was a pre-requisite for the claims raised before the Court by one party against the other.[147] In the East Timor case,[148] the Court held that it could not rule on the lawfulness of the conduct of another state which was not a party to the case, whatever the nature of the obligations in question (i.e. even if they were erga omnes obligations as was the case with regard to the right to self-determination).[149] It was felt that in view of the situation, the Court would have to rule on the lawfulness of Indonesia's conduct with regard to East Timor as a pre-requisite for deciding upon Portugal's claims against Australia[150] and that such a determination would constitute [142] See e.g. the Libya/Malta case, ICJ Reports, 1984, pp. 3, 24; 70 ILR, pp. 527, 553, the Nicaragua case, ICJ Reports, 1984, pp. 392, 431; 76 ILR, pp. 104, 142, the El Salvador/Honduras case, ICJ Reports, 1990, pp. 92, 114–16; 97 ILR, pp. 214, 235–7, and the Nauru case, ICJ Reports, 1992, pp. 240, 259–62; 97 ILR, pp. 1, 26–9.

[143] Cameroon v. Nigeria, ICJ Reports, 2002, pp. 303, 421.

[144] ICJ Reports, 1954, pp. 19, 54; 21 ILR, pp. 399, 406. In this case, Italy asked that the governments of the UK, US and France should deliver to it any share of the monetary gold that might be due to Albania under Part III of the Paris Act of 14 January 1946, as satisfaction for alleged damage to Italy by Albania. Albania chose not to intervene in the case.

[145] ICJ Reports, 1984, pp. 392, 431; 76 ILR, pp. 104, 142.

[146] ICJ Reports, 1992, pp. 240, 261; 97 ILR, p. 28.

[147] Ibid. See also Democratic Republic of the Congo v. Uganda, ICJ Reports, 2005, pp. 168, 237–8.

[148] ICJ Reports, 1995, pp. 90, 101 ff. [149] Ibid., p. 102. [150] Ibid., p. 104.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

the very subject matter of the judgment requested and thus infringe the Monetary Gold principle.[151]

Apart from those instances where states specifically refer a dispute to it, the Court may also be granted jurisdiction over disputes arising from international treaties where such treaties contain a 'compromissory clause' providing for this.[152] In fact, quite a large number of international treaties, both bilateral and multilateral, do include a clause awarding the ICJ jurisdiction with respect to questions that might arise from the interpretation and application of the agreements.[153] Examples of the more important of such conventions include the 1948 Genocide Convention, 1965 Convention on Investment Disputes, the 1965 International Convention on the Elimination of all Forms of Racial Discrimination and the 1970 Hague Convention on Hijacking. In the Application of the Genocide Convention (Bosnia v. Yugoslavia) case,[154] the Court founded its jurisdiction upon article IX of the Genocide Convention. In the US Diplomatic and Consular Staff in Tehran case (the Iranian Hostages case),[155] the Court founded jurisdiction upon article 1 of the Optional Protocols concerning the Compulsory Settlement of Disputes (to which both Iran and the US were parties), which accompany both the Vienna Convention on Diplomatic Relations, 1961 and the Vienna Convention on Consular Relations, 1963. Common article 1 of the Protocol provides that disputes arising out of the interpretation or application of the Conventions lie within the compulsory jurisdiction of the International Court of Justice. The Court also founded jurisdiction in the Nicaragua[156] case inter alia upon a treaty provision, article XXIV(2) of the 1956 US–Nicaragua Treaty of Friendship, Commerce and Navigation providing for submission of disputes over the interpretation or application of the treaty to the ICJ unless the parties agree to settlement by some other specific means.

[151] Ibid., p. 105. See also Larsen v. Hawaiian Kingdom 119 ILR, pp. 566, 588–92.

[152] See also article 40 of the ICJ Statute and article 38 of the Court's Rules.

[153] See Rosenne, Law and Practice, vol. II, chapter 11. There are almost 300 such treaties, bilateral and multilateral, currently listed on the Court's website: see www.icj-cij.org/icjwww/ibasicdocuments/ibasictext/ibasictreatiesandotherdocs.htm. To these need to be added treaties giving such jurisdiction to the Permanent Court of International Justice: see article 37 of the Court's Statute. See also J. Charney, 'Compromisory Clauses and the Jurisdiction of the International Court of Justice', 81 AJIL, 1989, p. 85.

[154] ICJ Reports, 1996, pp. 595, 615–17 on preliminary objections. See also ICJ Reports, 1993, pp. 3 and 325; 95 ILR, pp. 18 and 43 (the two Orders on Provisional Measures).

[155] ICJ Reports, 1980, pp. 3, 24; 61 ILR, pp. 530, 550.

[156] ICJ Reports, 1984, pp. 392, 426–9; 76 ILR, pp. 104, 137. See Briggs, 'Nicaragua v. United States: Jurisdiction and Admissibility', 79 AJIL, 1985, p. 373.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

In its judgment on jurisdiction and admissibility in the Case Concerning Border and Transborder Armed Actions (Nicaragua v. Honduras),[157] the International Court emphasised that the existence of jurisdiction was a question of law and dependent upon the intention of the parties. The issue of jurisdiction in the case centred, in the view of the Court, upon article 31 of the Pact of Bogotá, 1948, which declared that the parties '[i]n conformity with article 36(2) of the Statute of the International Court of Justice . . . recognise, in relation to any other American state, the jurisdiction of the Court as compulsory ipso facto . . . in all disputes of a juridical nature that arise among them' concerning the interpretation of a treaty, any question of international law, the existence of a fact which if established would constitute the breach of an international obligation or the nature or extent of the reparation to be made for the breach of an international obligation. Objections to jurisdiction put forward by Honduras on the grounds that article 31 was not intended to have independent force, and was merely an encouragement to the parties to deposit unilateral declarations of acceptance of the Court's compulsory jurisdiction, and that article 31 would only operate after the exhaustion of conciliation procedures referred to in article 32, were rejected on the basis of interpretation.[158]

Article 31 nowhere envisaged that the undertaking contained therein might be amended subsequently by unilateral declaration and the reference to article 36(2) of the Statute was insufficient to have that effect,[159] while the reference in article 32 of the Pact to a right of recourse to the International Court upon the failure of conciliation provided a second basis for the jurisdiction of the Court and not a limitation upon the first.[160] In other words, the commitment contained in article 31 of the Pact was sufficient to enable the Court to exercise jurisdiction.[161]

Where a treaty in force provides for reference of a matter to the PCIJ or to a tribunal established by the League of Nations, article 37 of the Statute declares that such matter shall be referred to the ICJ, provided the parties

[157] ICJ Reports, 1988, pp. 69, 76; 84 ILR, pp. 218, 231.

[158] ICJ Reports, 1988, pp. 78–90. The decision to affirm jurisdiction and admissibility was unanimous.

[159] Ibid., pp. 85–8. [160] Ibid., pp. 88–90.

[161] By article 6 of the Pact, article 31 would not apply to matters already settled by arrangement between the parties, or by arbitral award or by decision of an international court, or which are governed by agreements or treaties in force on the date of the conclusion of the Pact. See Nicaragua v. Colombia, ICJ Reports, 2007, paras. 53 ff. and 120, where the Court rejected Colombia's objection to jurisdiction on the basis of article 31.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

to the dispute are parties to the Statute. It is basically a bridging provision and provides some measure of continuity between the old Permanent Court and the new International Court.[162] Under article 36(6) of the Statute, the Court has the competence to decide its own jurisdiction in the event of a dispute.[163]

Article 36(2)[164]

This article has been of great importance in extending the jurisdiction of the International Court. Article 36(2), the so-called 'optional clause', stipulates that:

> The states parties to the present Statute may at any time declare that they recognise as compulsory ipso facto and without special agreement, in relation to any other state accepting the same obligation, the jurisdiction of the Court in all legal disputes concerning:
>
> (a) the interpretation of a treaty;
> (b) any question of international law;
> (c) the existence of any fact which, if established, would constitute a breach of an international obligation;
> (d) the nature or extent of the reparation to be made for the breach of an international obligation.

This provision was intended to operate as a method of increasing the Court's jurisdiction, by the gradual increase in its acceptance by more and more states. By the end of 1984, forty-seven declarations were in force and [162] See e.g. the Ambatielos case (Preliminary Objections), ICJ Reports, 1952, p. 28; 19 ILR, p. 416 and the Barcelona Traction case (Preliminary Objections), ICJ Reports, 1964, p. 6; 46 ILR, p. 18. Cf. the Aerial Incident case, ICJ Reports, 1959, p. 127; 27 ILR, p. 557.

[163] See I. Shihata, The Power of the International Court to Determine Its Own Jurisdiction, The Hague, 1965. This is a characteristic of the judicial function generally: see e.g. the Effect of Awards case, ICJ Reports, 1954, pp. 47, 51–2; 21 ILR, pp. 310, 312, and the Nottebohm case, ICJ Reports, 1953, pp. 111, 119; 20 ILR, pp. 567, 572. See also the Tadić case before the Appeals Chamber of the International Criminal Tribunal for the Former Yugoslavia, IT-94-1-AR72, pp. 7–9.

[164] See e.g. Rosenne, Law and Practice, vol. II, chapter 12. See also J. G. Merrills, 'The Optional Clause Today', 50 BYIL, 1979, p. 87, and Merrills, 'The Optional Clause Revisited', 64 BYIL, 1993, p. 197; L. Gross, 'Compulsory Jurisdiction under the Optional Protocol: History and Practice' in Damrosch, International Court of Justice at a Crossroads, p. 19; E. Gordon, '"Legal Disputes" Under Article 36(2) of the Statute', ibid., p. 183; M. Vogiatzi, 'The Historical Evolution of the Optional Clause', 2 Non-State Actors and International Law, 2002, p. 41, and M. Fitzmaurice, 'The Optional Clause System and the Law of Treaties', 20 Australian YIL, 2000, p. 127.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

deposited with the UN Secretary-General, comprising less than one-third of the parties to the ICJ Statute. By 15 May 2008, this number had risen to sixty-five.[165]

The Court discussed the nature of such declarations in the Cameroon v. Nigeria (Preliminary Objections) case and stated that,

> Any state party to the Statute, in adhering to the jurisdiction of the Court in accordance with article 36, paragraph 2, accepts jurisdiction in its relations with states previously having adhered to that clause. At the same time, it makes a standing offer to the other states parties to the Statute which have not yet deposited a declaration of acceptance. The day one of those states accepts that offer by depositing in its turn its declaration of acceptance, the consensual bond is established and no further condition needs to be met.[166]

Declarations pursuant to article 36(2) are in the majority of cases conditional and, as noted, are dependent upon reciprocity for operation. This means that the Court will only have jurisdiction under article 36(2) to the extent that both the declarations of the two parties in dispute cover the same issue or issues. The doctrine of the lowest common denominator thus operates since the acceptance, by means of the optional clause, by one state of the jurisdiction of the Court is in relation to any other state accepting the same obligation. It is not that declarations in identical terms from the parties are necessary, but both declarations must grant jurisdiction to the Court regarding the dispute in question.

In practice, this can lead to the situation where one party may rely on a condition, or reservation, expressed in the declaration of the other party. This occurred in the Norwegian Loans case,[167] between France and Norway. The Court noted that:

> since two unilateral declarations are involved, such jurisdiction is conferred upon the Court only to the extent to which the declarations coincide in conferring it. A comparison between the two declarations shows that the French declaration accepts the Court's jurisdiction within narrower limits than the Norwegian declaration; consequently, the common will of the parties, which is the basis of the Court's jurisdiction, exists within these narrower limits indicated by the French reservation.[168]

[165] See www.icj-cij.org/icjwww/ibasicdocuments/ibasictext/ibasicdeclarations.htm.
[166] ICJ Reports, 1998, pp. 275, 291. [167] ICJ Reports, 1957, p. 9; 24 ILR, p. 782.
[168] ICJ Reports, 1957, p. 23; 24 ILR, p. 786. But note Judge Lauterpacht's individual opinion, ICJ Reports, 1957, p. 34; 24 ILR, p. 793. See also the Right of Passage case, ICJ Reports,

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

Accordingly, Norway was entitled to invoke the French reservation to defeat the jurisdiction of the Court. However, much will depend upon the precise terms of the declarations. Declarations made under the optional clause in the Statute of the PCIJ and still in force are deemed to continue with respect to the ICJ,[169] but in the Aerial Incident case[170] between Israel and Bulgaria, the Court declared that this in fact only applied to states signing the ICJ Statute in 1945 and did not relate to states, like Bulgaria, which became a party to the Statute many years later as a result of admission to the United Nations.

The issue also arose in the jurisdictional phase of the Nicaragua case.[171] Nicaragua had declared that it would accept the compulsory jurisdiction of the Permanent Court in 1929 but had not ratified this. The US argued that accordingly Nicaragua never became a party to the Statute of the Permanent Court and could not therefore rely on article 36(5). The Court, in an interesting judgment, noted that the Nicaraguan declaration, unconditional and unlimited as to time, had 'a certain potential effect' and that the phrase in article 36(5) 'still in force' could be so interpreted as to cover declarations which had only potential and not binding effect. Ratification of the Statute of the ICJ in 1945 by Nicaragua had the effect, argued the Court, of transforming this potential commitment into an effective one.[172] Since this was so, Nicaragua could rely on the US declaration of 1946 accepting the Court's compulsory jurisdiction as the necessary reciprocal element.[173]

The reservations that have been made in declarations by states under the optional clause, restricting the jurisdiction of the ICJ, vary a great deal from state to state, and are usually an attempt to prevent the Court becoming involved in a dispute which is felt to concern vital interests. One condition made by a number of states, particularly the United States

1957, pp. 125, 145; 24 ILR, pp. 840, 845 and the Interhandel case, ICJ Reports, 1959, pp. 6, 23; 27 ILR, pp. 475, 487.

169 Article 36(5), Statute of the ICJ.

170 ICJ Reports, 1959, p. 127; 27 ILR, p. 557.

171 ICJ Reports, 1984, pp. 392, 403–12; 76 ILR, pp. 104, 114.

172 The Court also noted that since Court publications had placed Nicaragua on the list of states accepting the compulsory jurisdiction of the ICJ by virtue of article 36(5) and that no states had objected, one could conclude that the above interpretation had been confirmed, ibid. The Court also regarded the conduct of the parties as reflecting acquiescence in Nicaragua's obligations when article 36(5) was argued, ICJ Reports, 1984, pp. 411–15; 76 ILR, p. 122.

173 But see the Separate Opinions of Judges Mosler, ICJ Reports, 1984, pp. 461–3; Oda, ibid., pp. 473–89; Ago, ibid., pp. 517–27 and Jennings, ibid., pp. 533–45, and the Dissenting Opinion of Judge Schwebel, ibid., pp. 562–600; 76 ILR, pp. 172, 184, 228, 244 and 273.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

of America, stipulates that matters within the domestic jurisdiction 'as determined by' that particular state are automatically excluded from the purview of the Court.[174] The validity of this type of reservation (known as the 'Connally amendment' from the American initiator of the relevant legislation) has been widely questioned,[175] particularly since it appears to contradict the power of the Court under article 36(6) to determine its own jurisdiction, and in reality it withdraws from the Court the jurisdiction conferred under the declaration itself. Indeed, it is a well-established principle of international law that the definition of domestic jurisdiction is an issue of international and not domestic law.[176]

Many reservations relate to requirements of time (ratione temporis),[177] according to which acceptances of jurisdiction are deemed to expire automatically after a certain period or within a particular time after notice of termination has been given to the UN Secretary-General. Some states exclude the jurisdiction of the ICJ with respect to disputes arising before or after a certain date in their declarations.[178] Reservations ratione personae may also be made, for example the UK reservation concerning disputes between member states of the British Commonwealth.[179] Reservations may also be made ratione materiae, excluding disputes where other means of dispute settlement have been agreed.[180] Other restrictive grounds exist.[181] However, once the Court is dealing with a dispute, any subsequent [174] See Rosenne, Law and Practice, vol. II, pp. 748 ff.

[175] See e.g. L. Henkin, 'The Connally Reservation Revisited and, Hopefully, Contained', 65 AJIL, 1971, p. 374, and Preuss, 'The International Court of Justice, the Senate and Matters of Domestic Jurisdiction', 40 AJIL, 1946, p. 720. See also Judge Lauterpacht, Norwegian Loans case, ICJ Reports, 1957, pp. 9, 43–66; 24 ILR, pp. 782, 800; the Interhandel case, ICJ Reports, 1959, pp. 6, 77–8 and 93; 27 ILR, pp. 475, 524, 534, and A. D'Amato, 'Modifying US Acceptance of the Compulsory Jurisdiction of the World Court', 79 AJIL, 1985, p. 385.

[176] See above, chapter 12, p. 647.

[177] See Rosenne, Law and Practice, vol. II, pp. 751 ff., and Merrills, 'Revisited', pp. 213 ff.

[178] Rosenne, Law and Practice, vol. II, pp. 753 ff. The UK, for example, excluded disputes arising out of events occurring between 3 September 1939 and 2 September 1945 in its 1963 declaration, Cmnd 2248. This was altered in the 1969 declaration, which is expressed to apply only to disputes arising after 24 October 1945, Cmnd 3872.

[179] See Merrills, 'Revisited', pp. 219 ff.

[180] Ibid., pp. 224 ff. See the Nauru case, ICJ Reports, 1992, pp. 240, 245–7; 97 ILR, pp. 1, 12–14. The Court emphasised that declarations made under article 36(2) related only to disputes between states and did not therefore cover disputes arising out of a trusteeship agreement between the Administering Authority and the indigenous population, ibid. See also the Guinea-Bissau/Senegal case, ICJ Reports, 1990, p. 64 and ibid., 1991, p. 54; 92 ILR, pp. 1 and 30.

[181] See e.g. reservations relating to territorial matters, Merrills, 'Revisited', pp. 234 ff.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

expiry or termination of a party's declaration will not modify the jurisdiction of the case.[182]

A state may withdraw or modify its declaration.[183] The US declaration of 1946 provided for termination after a six-month period of notice. What the Court in the jurisdictional phase of the Nicaragua case[184] had to decide was whether a modifying notification[185] expressly deemed to apply immediately could have effect over the original declaration. It decided that the six-month notice provision remained valid and could be invoked by Nicaragua against the US, since it was an undertaking that constituted an integral part of the instrument that contained it.

Article 36(2) declarations constitute unilateral acts and the Court will interpret them in order to establish whether or not mutual consent has been given to its jurisdiction and 'in a natural and reasonable way, having due regard to the intention of the state concerned at the time when it accepted the compulsory jurisdiction of the Court'.[186]

The Court has emphasised that there is a 'fundamental distinction between the existence of the Court's jurisdiction over a dispute, and the compatibility with international law of the particular acts which are the subject of the dispute'.[187] This is so even with regard to rights and obligations erga omnes or peremptory norms of general international law (jus cogens). The mere fact that a principle has this elevated character in the international legal system is not enough of itself to confer jurisdiction, for this is dependent upon the consent of the parties.[188] However, the Court has also emphasised that whether or not it finds that it has [182] See e.g. the Nottebohm case, ICJ Reports, 1953, p. 111; 20 ILR, p. 567. See also Judge Shahabuddeen's Separate Opinion, the Request for an Examination of the Situation in the Nuclear Tests Case, ICJ Reports, 1995, pp. 288, 315.

[183] See e.g. Rosenne, Law and Practice, vol. II, pp. 783 ff. A state may waive its jurisdictional reservation, but this must be done unequivocally, Application for Revision and Interpretation of the Judgment in the Tunisia/Libya Case, ICJ Reports, 1985, pp. 192, 216; 81 ILR, pp. 419, 449, and the Nicaragua case, ICJ Reports, 1986, pp. 14, 33; 76 ILR, pp. 349, 367.

[184] ICJ Reports, 1984, pp. 392, 415–21; 76 ILR, p. 126.

[185] Excluding disputes related to Central America for a two-year period. See e.g. A. Chayes, 'Nicaragua, the United States and the World Court', 85 Columbia Law Review, 1985, p. 1445; K. Highet, 'Litigation Implications of the US Withdrawal from the Nicaragua case', 79 AJIL, 1985, p. 992, and US Department of State Statement on the US Withdrawal from the Proceedings Initiated by Nicaragua in the International Court of Justice, 22 ILM, 1985, p. 246.

[186] Spain v. Canada, ICJ Reports, 1998, pp. 432, 454; 123 ILR, pp. 189, 214.

[187] Serbia and Montenegro v. UK, ICJ Reports, 2004, pp. 1307, 1351.

[188] Democratic Republic of the Congo v. Rwanda, ICJ Reports, 2006, pp. 6, 32 and 52. As to obligations erga omnes and jus cogens, see above, chapter 3, p. 123.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

jurisdiction with regard to a particular dispute, the parties 'remain in all cases responsible for acts attributable to them that violate the rights of other states'.[189]

Once the Court has established jurisdiction, its treatment of the substance of the dispute will be framed by the terms of the jurisdiction it has found exists, for the Court as a matter of principle cannot deal with issues that lie outside of the consensual ambit it has determined subsists with regard to the dispute in question.[190] However, the Court has the competence to determine the meaning of its own jurisdiction and may interpret the terms of the relevant compromis, or treaty or declaration as it deems appropriate in the circumstances.[191] In the Oil Platforms (Iran v. USA) case, for example, the Court founded its jurisdiction upon article XXI(2) of the 1955 US–Iran Treaty of Amity, Economic Relations and Consular Rights concerning disputes as to the interpretation or application of that treaty. Article XX(1)d of that treaty provided that the treaty 'shall not preclude the application of measures . . . necessary to fulfill the obligations of a High Contracting Party for the maintenance or restoration of international peace and security, or necessary to protect its essential security interests'. The Court noted, in what may be seen as an expansive approach, that 'the interpretation and application of that article will necessarily entail an assessment of the conditions of legitimate self-defence under international law' and further held that the question of the application of that article 'involves the principle of the prohibition in international law of the use of force, and the qualification to it constituted by the right of self-defence'.[192]

Sources of law, propriety and legal interest

In its deliberations, the Court will apply the rules of international law as laid down in article 38 (treaties, custom, general principles of law).[193]

[189] Serbia and Montenegro v. UK, ICJ Reports, 2004, pp. 1307, 1351.

[190] See e.g. the Oil Platforms (Iran v. USA) case, ICJ Reports, 2003, pp. 161, 183; 130 ILR, pp. 323, 342.

[191] See article 36(6) of the Statute and Rosenne, Law and Practice, vol. II, pp. 812 ff.

[192] ICJ Reports, 2003, pp. 161, 182–3. Note that at the preliminary objections to jurisdiction phase, the Court regarded that provision as 'confined to affording the Parties a possible defence on the merits to be used should the occasion arise', ICJ Reports, 1996, pp. 803, 811.

[193] See further above, chapter 3. Note that the Court may be specifically requested by the parties to consider particular factors. In the Tunisia/Libya case, ICJ Reports, 1982, pp. 18,

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

However, the Court may decide a case ex aequo et bono, i.e. on the basis of justice and equity untrammelled by technical legal rules where the parties agree.[194] This has not yet occurred, although it should not be confused with the ability of the ICJ to apply certain equitable considerations in a case within the framework of international law.[195] The question of gaps in international law in addressing a case arose in the Advisory Opinion concerning The Legality of the Threat or Use of Nuclear Weapons.[196] Although not a contentious case and therefore not as such binding, the fact that the Court was unable to give its view on a crucial issue in international law may have ramifications. The Court took the view that it could not 'conclude definitively whether the threat or use of nuclear weapons would be lawful or unlawful in an extreme circumstance of self-defence, in which the very survival of a state would be at stake'.[197] This appearance of a non-liquet is of some concern as a matter of principle, unconnected with the substance of the legal principle in question.[198]

Before dealing with the merits of a case, the Court may have to deal with preliminary objections as to its jurisdiction or as to the admissibility of the application.[199] Preliminary objections must be made within three months after the delivery of the Memorial of the applicant state.[200] The Court has emphasised that objections to jurisdiction require decision at the preliminary stage of the proceedings.[201] A decision on preliminary objections to jurisdiction cannot determine merits issues, even where dealt with in connection with preliminary objections. Such reference can only 21; 67 ILR, pp. 3, 14, the compromis specifically asked the Court to take into account 'the recent trends admitted at the Third Conference on the Law of the Sea'.

194 Article 38(2) of the Statute. See also A. Pellet, 'Article 38' in Zimmermann et al., Statute of the International Court, p. 677 and see above, chapter 3, p. 105.

195 See e.g. above, chapter 11, p. 590.

196 ICJ Reports, 1966, p. 226; 110 ILR, 163.

197 ICJ Reports, 1966, pp. 226, 263 and 266. This is the subject of a strong rebuttal by Judge Higgins in her Dissenting Opinion, ibid., pp. 583, 584 ff.

198 See above, chapter 3, p. 98.

199 'Or other objection', with regard to which a decision is requested before consideration of the merits: see article 79 of the Rules of Court 1978 and the previous sections of this chapter.

200 Prior to the amendment of article 79 adopted in December 2000, such objections could have been made within the time limit fixed for the delivery of the Counter-Memorial (usually six or nine months). See e.g. Cameroon v. Nigeria (Preliminary Objections), ICJ Reports, 1998, p. 275. See also S. Rosenne, 'The International Court of Justice: Revision of Articles 79 and 80 of the Rules of Court', 14 Leiden Journal of International Law, 2001, p. 77.

201 The Nicaragua case, ICJ Reports, 1986, pp. 3, 30–1; 76 ILR, pp. 349, 364–5.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

be provisional.[202] Where it has established its right to exercise jurisdiction, the Court may well decline to exercise that right on grounds of propriety. In the Northern Cameroons case,[203] the Court declared that:

> it may pronounce judgment only in connection with concrete cases where there exists, at the time of adjudication, an actual controversy involving a conflict of legal interests between the parties. The Court's judgment must have some practical consequence in the sense that it can affect existing legal rights or obligations of the parties, thus removing uncertainty from their legal relations.

Further, events subsequent to the filing of the application may render the application without object, so that the Court is not required to give a decision.[204]

In addition, and following the South-West Africa cases (Second Phase) in 1966,[205] it may be necessary for the Court to establish that the claimant state has a legal interest in the subject matter of the dispute. The fact that political considerations may have motivated the application is not relevant, so long as a legal dispute is in evidence. Similarly, the fact that a particular dispute has other important aspects is not of itself sufficient to render the application inadmissible.[206]

Evidence

Unlike domestic courts, the International Court is flexible with regard to the introduction of evidence.[207] Strict rules of admissibility common [202] See the South-West Africa cases, ICJ Reports, 1966, pp. 3, 37; 37 ILR, pp. 243, 270. It is to be noted that admissibility issues may be discussed at the merits stage: see e.g. the East Timor case, ICJ Reports, 1995, p. 90; 105 ILR, p. 226. See also C. M. Chinkin, 'East Timor Moves into the World Court', 4 EJIL, 1993, p. 206.

[203] ICJ Reports, 1963, pp. 15, 33–4; 35 ILR, pp. 353, 369.

[204] See e.g. the Armed Actions (Nicaragua v. Honduras) case, ICJ Reports, 1988, pp. 69, 95; 84 ILR, p. 218; the Nuclear Tests case, ICJ Reports, 1974, pp. 253, 272; 57 ILR, p. 348; the Lockerbie (Preliminary Objections) case, ICJ Reports, 1998, pp. 9, 26; 117 ILR, pp. 1, 24; and Democratic Republic of the Congo v. Belgium, ICJ Reports, 2002, pp. 3, 14–15; 128 ILR, pp. 60, 69–70.

[205] ICJ Reports, 1966, p. 6; 37 ILR, p. 243.

[206] See above, p. 1065.

[207] See e.g. K. Highet, 'Evidence and Proof of Facts' in Damrosch, International Court of Justice at a Crossroads, pp. 355, 357, and C. F. Amerasinghe, 'Presumptions and Inferences in Evidence in International Litigation', 3 The Law and Practice of International Courts and Tribunals, 2004, p. 394. See also D. V. Sandifer, Evidence before International Tribunals, Charlottesville, 1975; S. Schwebel, Justice in International Law, Cambridge, 1994, p. 125; K. Highet, 'Evidence, the Court and the Nicaragua Case', 81 AJIL, 1987, p. 1;

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

in domestic legal systems do not exist here.[208] The Court has the competence inter alia to determine the existence of any fact which if established would constitute a breach of an international obligation.[209] It may make all arrangements with regard to the taking of evidence,[210] call upon the agents to produce any document or to supply any explanations as may be required,[211] or at any time establish an inquiry mechanism or obtain expert opinion.[212] The Court may indeed make on-site visits.[213] However, it has no power to compel production of evidence generally, nor may witnesses be subpoenaed, nor is there is any equivalent to proceedings for contempt of court.[214] The use of experts has been comparatively rare[215] as has been recourse to witnesses.[216] Agents are rarely asked to produce documents or supply explanations and there have been only two on-site visits to date.[217] This has meant that the Court has sought to evaluate claims primarily upon an assessment of the documentary evidence provided, utilising also legal techniques such as inferences and admissions against interest.[218]

The Court will make its own determination of the facts and then apply the relevant rules of international law to those facts it has found to exist and which are necessary in order to respond to the submissions of the

M. Kazazi, Burden of Proof and Related Issues, The Hague, 1996, and T. M. Franck, Fairness in International Law and Institutions, Oxford, 1995, pp. 335 ff.

208 President Schwebel in his address to the UN General Assembly on 27 October 1997 noted that the Court's 'attitude to evidence is demonstrably flexible': see www.icj-cij.org/icjwww/ipresscom/SPEECHES/Ga1997e.htm. See e.g. the introduction of illegally obtained evidence in the Corfu Channel case, ICJ Reports, 1949, pp. 4, 32–6; 16 AD, p. 155.

209 Article 36 of the Statute. 210 Article 48 of the Statute. 211 Article 49 of the Statute.

212 Article 50 of the Statute. By article 43(5), the Court may hear witnesses and experts, as well as agents, counsel and advocates.

213 Article 44(2) of the Statute and article 66 of the Rules of Court.

214 See K. Highet, 'Evidence, the Court and the Nicaragua Case', p. 10.

215 But see the Corfu Channel case, ICJ Reports, 1949, p. 4; 16 AD, p. 155.

216 But see ibid., and the Tunisia/Libya case, ICJ Reports, 1989, p. 18; 67 ILR, p. 4; the Libya/Malta case, ICJ Reports, 1985, p. 13; 81 ILR, p. 238, and the Nicaragua case, ICJ Reports, 1986, p. 14; 76 ILR, p. 349.

217 First, in the Diversion of the River Meuse case, PCIJ, Series A/B, No. 70, and secondly in the Gabčíkovo–Nagymaros Project case, ICJ Communiqué No. 97/3, 17 February 1997 and see ICJ Reports, 1997, pp. 7, 14; 116 ILR, p. 1.

218 See e.g. the Iranian Hostages case, ICJ Reports, 1980, pp. 3, 9; 61 ILR, pp. 530, 535. See also F. A. Mann, 'Foreign Investment in the International Court of Justice: The ELSI Case', 86 AJIL, 1992, pp. 92, 94–5, and the El Salvador/Honduras case, ICJ Reports, 1992, pp. 351, 574; 97 ILR, pp. 112, 490. Note in particular the Nicaragua case, ICJ Reports, 1986, p. 14; 76 ILR, p. 349. The difficulties of proving facts in this case were exacerbated by the absence of the respondent state during the proceedings on the merits.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

parties, including defences and counter-claims. These findings of facts require an assessment of the evidence, which necessitates the Court deciding which of the material before it is relevant and of probative value with regard to the alleged facts. In so doing, the Court will make its own assessment of the weight, reliability and value of the evidence produced by the parties.[219] The Court has noted that it will treat with caution evidentiary materials specially prepared for the case in question[220] and also materials emanating from a single source, but would give particular attention to reliable evidence acknowledging facts or conduct unfavourable to the state represented by the person making them.[221] Weight would also be given to evidence that has not been challenged by impartial persons for the correctness of what it contains and special attention given to evidence obtained by skilled judicial examination and cross-examination of persons directly involved.[222] However, the evidence of government and military figures of a state involved in litigation before the Court would be treated with 'great reserve'.[223] The Court has also noted that witness statements produced in the form of affidavits should be treated with caution and in assessing such affidavits, a number of factors would have to be taken into account, including whether they had been made by state officials or private persons not interested in the outcome of the proceedings and whether a particular affidavit attests to the existence of facts or represents only an opinion with regard to certain events. Evidence which is contemporaneous with the period concerned may, however, be of special value. Further, a statement by a competent governmental official with regard to boundary lines is likely to have greater weight than sworn statements of a private person.[224]

[219] Democratic Republic of the Congo v. Uganda, ICJ Reports, 2005, pp. 168, 200.

[220] However, the Court has noted that affidavits prepared for litigation purposes may be received if they attest to personal knowledge of facts by a particular individual, Nicaragua v. Honduras, ICJ Reports, 2007, para. 244.

[221] Democratic Republic of the Congo v. Uganda, ICJ Reports, 2005, pp. 168, 200 and 206. See also Nicaragua v. USA, ICJ Reports, 1986, pp. 14, 41; 76 ILR, p. 349.

[222] Democratic Republic of the Congo v. Uganda, ICJ Reports, 2005, pp. 168, 201. See also the Genocide Convention (Bosnia v. Serbia) case, ICJ Reports, 2007, para. 213, where it was held that in principle the Court would accept as highly persuasive relevant findings of fact made by the International Criminal Tribunal for the Former Yugoslavia at trial, unless they had been upset on appeal. In addition, any evaluation by the Tribunal based on the facts was entitled to due weight. However, the procedural stages prior to a decision, which did not involve definitive rulings, should not be given weight, ibid., paras. 216 ff.

[223] Democratic Republic of the Congo v. Uganda, ICJ Reports, 2005, pp. 168, 203.

[224] Nicaragua v. Honduras, ICJ Reports, 2007, para. 244.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

The Court may also take judicial notice of facts which are public knowledge, primarily through media dissemination, provided that caution was shown and that the reports do not emanate from a single source.[225] In Democratic Republic of the Congo v. Uganda, the Court noted the particular importance of consistency and concordance in evaluating press information.[226]

The burden of proof lies upon the party seeking to assert a particular fact or facts,[227] although the Court has also stated that there was no burden of proof to be discharged in the matter of jurisdiction.[228] On the other hand, the burden of proof, and a relatively high one, lies upon the applicant state who wishes to intervene. Such state 'must demonstrate convincingly what it asserts, and thus . . . bear the burden of proof', although it need only show that its interest may be affected, not that it will or must be so affected. It must identify the interest of a legal nature in question and show how that interest may be affected.[229] The actual standard of proof required will vary with the character of the particular issue of fact.[230] In the Genocide Convention (Bosnia v. Serbia) case, the Court emphasised that it had long recognised that 'claims against a state involving charges of exceptional gravity must be proved by evidence that is fully conclusive'.

[225] See the Nicaragua case, ICJ Reports, 1986, pp. 14, 41; 76 ILR, p. 349.

[226] ICJ Reports, 2005, pp. 168, 204. As to the value of maps as evidence, see ibid., p. 206 and above, chapter 10, p. 519.

[227] See e.g. the Nicaragua (Jurisdiction and Admissibility) case, ICJ Reports, 1984, pp. 392, 437; 76 ILR, p. 1; the Fisheries Jurisdiction (Spain v. Canada) case, ICJ Reports, 1998, pp. 432, 450; the Avena (Mexico v. USA) case, ICJ Reports, 2004, pp. 12, 41; 134 ILR, pp. 120, 144, and the Genocide Convention (Bosnia v. Serbia) case, ICJ Reports, 2007, para. 204. Note also the view taken by the Arbitral Tribunal for Dispute over Inter-Entity Boundary in Brcko Area in its Award of 14 February 1997. The Appendix to the Order lays down the Principles Applicable to the Admissibility of Evidence and notes inter alia that each party bears the burden of proving its own case and, in particular, facts alleged by it. The party having the burden of proof must not only bring evidence in support of its allegations, but must also convince the Tribunal of their truth. The Tribunal is not bound to adhere to strict judicial rules of evidence, the probative force of evidence being for the Tribunal to determine. Where proof of a fact presents extreme difficulty, the Tribunal may be satisfied with less conclusive, i.e. prima facie, evidence: see 36 ILM, 1997, pp. 396, 402–3.

[228] See the Fisheries Jurisdiction (Spain v. Canada) case, ICJ Reports, 1998, pp. 432, 450.

[229] El Salvador/Honduras (Intervention), ICJ Reports, 1990, pp. 92, 117–18; 97 ILR, pp. 112, 238–9 and Indonesia/Malaysia (Intervention), ICJ Reports, 2001, para. 29. As to third-party intervention, see below, p. 1097.

[230] Judge Higgins in her Separate Opinion in the Oil Platforms (Iran v. USA) case, ICJ Reports, 2003, pp. 161, 233; 130 ILR, pp. 323, 392, noted that 'the Court's prime objective appears to have been to retain a freedom in evaluating the evidence, relying on the facts and circumstances of each case'. See also Judge Shahabuddeen's Dissenting Opinion in the Qatar v. Bahrain case, ICJ Reports, 1995, pp. 6, 63; 102 ILR, pp. 1, 104.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

The Court would need to 'be fully convinced that allegations made in the proceedings, that the crime of genocide or the other acts enumerated in Article III [of the Genocide Convention] have been committed, have been clearly established' and it has noted that the same standard of proof would apply to the proof of attribution for such acts.[231]

Evidence which has been illegally or improperly acquired may also be taken into account, although no doubt where this happens its probative value would be adjusted accordingly.[232] In the second provisional measures order in the Application of the Genocide Convention (Bosnia v. Yugoslavia) case, for example, the Court was prepared to admit a series of documents even though submitted on the eve of and during the oral hearings despite being 'difficult to reconcile with an orderly progress of the procedure before the Court, and with respect for the principle of equality of the parties'.[233] In dealing with questions of evidence, the Court proceeds upon the basis that its decision will be based upon the facts occurring up to the close of the oral proceedings on the merits of the case.[234]

In so far as the scope of the Court's decision is concerned, it was noted in the Nicaragua case that the Court 'is bound to confine its decision to those points of law which are essential to the settlement of the dispute before it'.[235] In so doing, the Court will seek to ascertain 'the true subject of the dispute' taking into consideration the submissions, the applications, oral arguments and other documents placed before it.[236]

[231] ICJ Reports, 2007, para. 209. See also Corfu Channel (United Kingdom v. Albania), ICJ Reports, 1949, p. 17. Judge Higgins in her Separate Opinion in the Oil Platforms (Iran v. USA) case, ICJ Reports, 2003, pp. 161, 234, noted that 'the graver the charge the more confidence there must be in the evidence relied on'.

[232] See e.g. the Corfu Channel case, ICJ Reports, 1949, pp. 4, 32–6; 16 AD, p. 155. See also H. Thirlway, 'Dilemma or Chimera? Admissibility of Illegally Obtained Evidence in International Adjudication', 78 AJIL, 1984, p. 622, and G. Marston, 'Falsification of Documentary Evidence Before International Tribunals: An Aspect of the Behring Sea Arbitration, 1892–3', 71 BYIL, 2000, p. 357. See also the difficulties in the Qatar v. Bahrain case, International Court of Justice, Order of 17 February 1999.

[233] ICJ Reports, 1993, pp. 325, 336–7. Article 56 of the Rules provides that after the closure of written proceedings, no further documents may be submitted to the Court by either party except with the consent of the other party or, in the absence of consent, where the Court, after hearing the parties, authorises production where it is felt that the documents are necessary.

[234] The Nicaragua case, ICJ Reports, 1986, pp. 3, 39; 76 ILR, pp. 349, 373. Although note that in the Lockerbie case, ICJ Reports, 1992, pp. 3, 13; 94 ILR, pp. 478, 496, the Court referred in detail to Security Council resolution 748 (1992) adopted three days after the close of the oral hearings.

[235] ICJ Reports, 1986, pp. 3, 110; 76 ILR, pp. 349, 444.

[236] The Nuclear Tests case, ICJ Reports, 1974, pp. 466–7.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

Provisional measures [237]

Under article 41 of the Statute, the Court has the power to indicate, if it considers that circumstances so require, any provisional (or interim) measures which ought to be taken to preserve the respective rights of either party. In deciding upon a request for provisional measures, the Court need not finally satisfy itself that it has jurisdiction on the merits of the case, although it has held that it ought not to indicate such measures unless the provisions invoked by the applicant appear prima facie to afford a basis upon which the jurisdiction of the Court might be founded,[238] whether the request for the indication of provisional measures is made by the applicant or by the respondent in the proceedings on the merits.[239] In establishing the Court's prima facie jurisdiction to deal with the merits of the case, the question of the nature and extent of the rights for which [237] See e.g. Rosenne, Law and Practice, vol. III, chapter 24, and Rosenne, Provisional Measures in International Law: The International Court of Justice and the Tribunal for the Law of the Sea, Oxford, 2005; K. Oellers-Frahm, 'Article 41' in Zimmermann et al., Statute of the International Court, p. 923; S. Oda, 'Provisional Measures' in Lowe and Fitzmaurice, Fifty Years of the International Court of Justice, p. 541; B. Oxman, 'Jurisdiction and the Power to Indicate Provisional Measures' in Damrosch, International Court of Justice at a Crossroads, p. 323; C. Gray, Judicial Remedies in International Law, Oxford, 1987, pp. 69–74; Elias, International Court, chapter 3; J. G. Merrills, 'Interim Measures of Protection and the Substantive Jurisdiction of the International Court', 36 Cambridge Law Journal, 1977, p. 86, and Merrills, 'Reflections on the Incidental Jurisdiction of the International Court of Justice' in Remedies in International Law (eds. M. Evans and S. V. Konstanidis), Oxford, 1998, p. 51; L. Gross, 'The Case Concerning United States Diplomatic and Consular Staff in Tehran: Phase of Provisional Measures', 74 AJIL, 1980, p. 395, and M. Mendelson, 'Interim Measures of Protection in Cases of Contested Jurisdiction', 46 BYIL, 1972–3, p. 259. See also articles 73–8 of the Rules of Court 1978.

[238] See e.g. the Avena (Mexico v. USA) case, ICJ Reports, 2003, pp. 77, 87; 134 ILR, pp. 104, 113; Democratic Republic of the Congo v. Rwanda, ICJ Reports, 2002, p. 241 and the two Pulp Mills (Argentina v. Uruguay) applications for provisional measures, ICJ Reports, 2006, pp. 113, 128–9 and ICJ Reports, 2007, para. 24. See also the request for the indication of provisional measures in the Legality of the Use of Force (Yugoslavia v. Belgium) case, ICJ Reports, 1999, pp. 124, 132; the Arbitral Award of 31 July 1989 (Guinea-Bissau v. Senegal) case, ICJ Reports, 1990, pp. 64, 68; 92 ILR, pp. 9, 13, the Great Belt case, ICJ Reports, 1991, pp. 12, 15; 94 ILR, pp. 446, 453, where jurisdiction was not at issue, and Cameroon v. Nigeria, ICJ Reports, 1996, pp. 13, 21, where it was. The Court in Application of the Genocide Convention (Bosnia v. Yugoslavia), ICJ Reports, 1993, pp. 3, 12; 95 ILR, pp. 1, 27, declared that jurisdiction included both jurisdiction ratione personae and jurisdiction ratione materiae. Note that Jiménez de Aréchega, a former President of the Court, has written that 'interim measures will not be granted unless a majority of judges believes at the time that there will be jurisdiction over the merits', 'International Law in the Past Third of a Century', 159 HR, 1978 I, pp. 1, 161.

[239] The Pulp Mills (Argentina v. Uruguay) case, Provisional Measures, Order of 23 January 2007, ICJ Reports, 2007, para. 24.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

protection is being sought in the request for the indication of provisional measures has no bearing, this being addressed once the Court's prima facie jurisdiction over the merits of the case has been established.[240]

The Court, when considering a request for the indication of provisional measures, 'must be concerned to preserve . . . the rights which may subsequently be adjudged by the Court to belong either to the Applicant or to the Respondent',[241] without being obliged at that stage of the proceedings to rule on those rights.[242] Thus, the purpose of exercising the power is to protect 'rights which are the subject of dispute in judicial proceedings'[243] and thus the measures must be such that once the dispute over those rights has been resolved by the Court's judgment on the merits, they would no longer be required.[244] These are awarded to assist the Court to ensure the integrity of the proceedings. Such interim measures were granted by the Court in the Fisheries Jurisdiction case,[245] to protect British fishing rights in Icelandic-claimed waters, and again in the Nuclear Tests case.[246] In the Fisheries Jurisdiction case, the Court emphasised that article 41 presupposes 'that irreparable prejudice should not be caused to rights which are the subject of dispute in judicial proceedings'.[247] However, it was noted in the Lockerbie case[248] that the measures requested by Libya 'would be likely to impair the rights which appear prima facie to be enjoyed by the United Kingdom by virtue of Security Council resolution 748 (1992)'. The Court has also stated that its power to indicate provisional measures can [240] Ibid., para. 25.

[241] Cameroon v. Nigeria, Provisional Measures, Order of 15 March 1996, ICJ Reports, 1996 (I), p. 22, para. 35.

[242] The Avena (Mexico v. USA) case, Provisional Measures, Order of 5 February 2003, ICJ Reports, 2003, pp. 77, 89; 134 ILR, pp. 104, 115.

[243] The Aegean Sea Continental Shelf case, ICJ Reports, 1976, pp. 3, 9; 60 ILR, pp. 524, 530 and the Iranian Hostages case, ICJ Reports, 1979, pp. 7, 19; 61 ILR, pp. 513, 525. See also the Arbitral Award of 31 July 1989 case, ICJ Reports, 1990, pp. 64, 69; 92 ILR, pp. 9, 14.

[244] Arbitral Award of 31 July 1989 case, ICJ Reports, 1990, p. 69; 92 ILR, pp. 9, 14.

[245] ICJ Reports, 1972, p. 12; 55 ILR, p. 160. See also the Anglo-Iranian Oil Co. case, ICJ Reports, 1951, p. 89; 19 ILR, p. 501.

[246] ICJ Reports, 1973, p. 99; 57 ILR, p. 360. They were also granted in the Iranian Hostages case, ICJ Reports, 1979, pp. 7, 19; 61 ILR, pp. 513, 525 and in the Nicaragua case, ICJ Reports, 1980, p. 169; 76 ILR, p. 35. See also the Great Belt case, ICJ Reports, 1991, p. 12; 94 ILR, p. 446, Application of the Genocide Convention (Bosnia v. Yugoslavia), ICJ Reports, 1993, pp. 3 and 325; 95 ILR, p. 1, and the Cameroon v. Nigeria case, ICJ Reports, 1996, p. 13. See also the LaGrand case, ICJ Reports, 1999, p. 9; 118 ILR, p. 37.

[247] ICJ Reports, 1972, pp. 12, 16, 30, 34; 55 ILR, pp. 160, 164; 56 ILR, pp. 76, 80. See also the Iranian Hostages case, ICJ Reports, 1979, pp. 7, 19; 61 ILR, p. 525, Application of the Genocide Convention (Bosnia v. Yugoslavia), ICJ Reports, 1993, pp. 3, 19; 95 ILR, pp. 1, 34 and Cameroon v. Nigeria, ICJ Reports, 1996, pp. 13, 21–2.

[248] ICJ Reports, 1992, pp. 3, 15; 95 ILR, pp. 478, 498.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

be exercised only if there is an 'urgent necessity to prevent irreparable prejudice to such rights, before the Court has given its final decision'[249] and that 'the sound administration of justice requires that a request for the indication of provisional measures founded on Article 73 of the Rules of Court be submitted in good time'.[250]

Provisional measures or recommendations or statements as to relevant international obligations may also be indicated or made by the Court, independently of requests by the parties, with a view to preventing 'the aggravation or extension of the dispute whenever it considers that circumstances so require'.[251] In Cameroon v. Nigeria, the Court referred explicitly not only to the rights of each party, but also by calling on the parties to observe an agreement reached for cessation of hostilities, to take all necessary steps to preserve relevant evidence in the disputed area and to co-operate with a proposed UN fact-finding mission.[252] The Court also took care to link with the rights of the parties that were being protected the danger to persons within the disputed area.[253]

The question of the legal effects of orders indicating provisional measures was discussed and decided by the Court for the first time in the LaGrand case. The Court addressed the issue in the light of the object and purpose of the Statute[254] which was to enable it to fulfil its functions and in particular to reach binding decisions. The Court declared that:

> The context in which article 41 has to be seen within the Statute is to prevent the Court from being hampered in the exercise of its functions because the respective rights of the parties to a dispute before the Court

[249] See e.g. the*Great Belt (Finland* v. Denmark) case, Provisional Measures, Order of 29 July 1991, ICJ Reports 1991, pp. 12, 17; Republic of the Congo v. France, Provisional Measures, Order of 17 June 2003, ICJ Reports 2003, p. 107, para. 22 and the Pulp Mills (Argentina v. Uruguay) case, Provisional Measures, Order of 23 January 2007, ICJ Reports, 2007, para. 32. See also Cameroon v. Nigeria, ICJ Reports, 1996, pp. 13, 22 and the Avena (Mexico v. USA) case, ICJ Reports, 2003, pp. 77, 90; 134 ILR, pp. 104, 116.

[250] The LaGrand (Germany v. USA) case, Provisional Measures, Order of 3 March 1999, ICJ Reports, 1999 (I), p. 14, para. 19; 118 ILR, p. 44.

[251] Cameroon v. Nigeria, ICJ Reports, 1996, pp. 13, 23. See also the Burkina Faso/Mali case, ICJ Reports, 1986, pp. 3, 9; 80 ILR, pp. 440, 456 and the Pulp Mills (Argentina v. Uruguay) case, Provisional Measures, Order of 23 January 2007, ICJ Reports, 2007, paras. 49 and 53.

[252] See the dispositif, ICJ Reports, 1996, pp. 13, 24–5.

[253] Ibid., p. 23. See also J. D'Aspremont, 'The Recommendations Made by the International Court of Justice', 56 ICLQ, 2007, p. 185. Note that the Court may make such recommendations even where it refuses to grant an order for provisional measures.

[254] Referring to article 33(4) of the Vienna Convention on the Law of Treaties, 1969, which the Court noted reflected customary law, ICJ Reports, 2001, pp. 466, 506.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

> are not preserved. It follows from the object and purpose of the Statute, as well as from the terms of article 41 when read in this context, that the power to indicate provisional measures entails that such measures should be binding, inasmuch as the power in question is based on the necessity, when the circumstances call for it, to safeguard, and to avoid prejudice to, the right of the parties as determined by the final judgment of the Court. The contention that provisional measures indicated under article 41 might not be binding would be contrary to the object and purpose of that article.[255]

This clear and unanimous decision that provisional measures orders are binding until judgment on the merits is likely to have a significant impact.[256]

Counter-claims[257]

Article 80 of the Rules of Court provides that the Court may entertain a counter-claim only if it comes within the jurisdiction of the Court and 'is directly connected with the subject-matter of the claim of the other party'.[258] A counter-claim constitutes a separate claim, or 'autonomous legal act', while requiring to be linked to the principal claim.[259] It goes beyond a mere defence on the merits to the principal claim, but cannot be used as a means of referring to a court claims which exceed the limits of its jurisdiction as recognised by the parties.[260] The Rule does not define what is meant by direct connection and this is a matter for the discretion of the [255] Ibid., pp. 502–3. The Court also referred to a related reason, the principle that parties to a case must abstain from any measure capable of exercising a prejudicial effect regarding the execution of the decision to be given and not to allow any step to be taken which might aggravate or extend the dispute, citing the Electricity Company of Sofia and Bulgaria, PCIJ, Series A/B, No. 79, p. 199, ibid., p. 503. The Court also noted that the preparatory work leading to the adoption of article 41 did not preclude the conclusion that orders under that article have binding force, ibid., pp. 503 ff.

[256] See Democratic Republic of the Congo v. Uganda, ICJ Reports, 2005, pp. 168, 258 and the Genocide Convention (Bosnia v. Serbia) case, ICJ Reports, 2007, paras. 452 and 468.

[257] See e.g. Rosenne, Law and Practice, vol. III, p. 1232, and Rosenne, 'Counter-Claims in the International Court of Justice Revisited' in Liber Amicorum Judge Ruda (eds. C. A. Armas et al.), The Hague, 2000, p. 457.

[258] As revised in 2000. One major difference from the text of the previous Rule 80 is to emphasise the role of the Court. See Rosenne, 'Revision', p. 83. The Rule also provides that 'a counter-claim shall be made in the Counter-Memorial and shall appear as part of the submissions contained therein. The right of the other party to present its views in writing on the counter-claim, in an additional pleading, shall be preserved, irrespective of any decision of the Court, in accordance with Article 45, paragraph 2, of these Rules, concerning the filing of further written pleadings.'

[259] Application of the Genocide Convention (Counter-Claims), ICJ Reports, 1997, pp. 243, 256.

[260] Ibid., p. 257.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

Court, which has noted that 'the degree of connection between the claims must be assessed both in fact and in law'.[261] The direct connection of facts has been referred to in terms of 'facts of the same nature . . . [that] form part of the same factual complex'[262] while in the Application of the Genocide Convention case the direct connection of law appeared in that both parties sought the same legal aim, being the establishment of legal responsibility for violations of the Genocide Convention.[263] In the Oil Platforms (Iran v. USA) case, the Court held that it was open to the parties to challenge the admissibility of counter-claims in general at the merits stage of the proceedings, even though the counter-claims had previously been found admissible. That was because the earlier incidental proceedings were concerned only with the question of whether the requirements of article 80 of the Rules had been complied with, i.e. that the counter-claim is directly connected with the subject-matter of the principal claim. A more general challenge, going beyond the terms of article 80, was therefore possible at the merits stage.[264]

Third-party intervention [265]

There is no general right of intervention in cases before the Court by third parties as such, nor any procedure for joinder of new parties by the [261] Ibid., p. 258. See also the Oil Platforms (Iran v. USA) (Counter-Claims), case, ICJ Reports, 1998, pp. 190, 204–5. The Court has also noted that counter-claims do not have to rely on identical instruments to meet the 'connection' test of article 80: see Democratic Republic of the Congo v. Uganda, ICJ Reports, 2005, pp. 168, 275.

[262] See Application of the Genocide Convention (Counter-Claims), ICJ Reports, 1997, pp. 243, 258 and Cameroon v. Nigeria, International Court of Justice, Order of 30 June 1999. See also the Oil Platforms (Iran v. USA) (Counter-Claims) case, ICJ Reports, 1998, pp. 190, 205; Democratic Republic of the Congo v. Uganda (Counter-Claims), Order of 29 November 2001, ICJ Reports, 2001, p. 664 and Democratic Republic of the Congo v. Uganda, ICJ Reports, 2005, pp. 168, 259 ff.

[263] Application of the Genocide Convention (Counter-Claims), ICJ Reports, 1997, pp. 243, 258. In Cameroon v. Nigeria, the 'same legal aim' was the establishment of legal responsibility for frontier incidents, International Court of Justice, Order of 30 June 1999. See also the Oil Platforms (Iran v. USA) (Counter-Claims) case, ICJ Reports, 1998, pp. 190, 205.

[264] ICJ Reports, 2003, pp. 161, 210. See also Democratic Republic of the Congo v. Uganda, ICJ Reports, 2005, pp. 168, 261.

[265] See e.g. Rosenne, Law and Practice, vol. III, chapter 26, and Rosenne, Intervention in the International Court of Justice, Dordrecht, 1993; J. M. Ruda, 'Intervention Before the International Court of Justice' in Lowe and Fitzmaurice, Fifty Years of the International Court of Justice, p. 487; C. M. Chinkin, 'Third Party Intervention Before the International Court of Justice', 80 AJIL, 1986, p. 495; Elias, International Court, chapter 4, and P. Jessup, 'Intervention in the International Court', 75 AJIL, 1981, p. 903. See also articles 81–6 of the Rules of Court 1978.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

Court itself, nor any power by which the Court can direct that third states be made a party to proceedings.[266] However, under article 62 of the Statute of the ICJ, any state which considers that it has an interest of a legal nature which may be affected by the decision in a case, may submit a request to be permitted to intervene,[267] while under article 63, where the construction of a convention to which states other than those concerned in the case are parties is in question,[268] the Registrar of the Court shall notify all such states forthwith. Every state so notified has the right to intervene in the proceedings.[269]

Essentially, the Court may permit an intervention by a third party even though it be opposed by one or both of the parties to the case. The purpose of such intervention is carefully circumscribed and closely defined in terms of the protection of a state's interest of a legal nature which may be affected by a decision in an existing case, and accordingly intervention cannot be used as a substitute for contentious proceedings, which are based upon consent. Thus the intervener does not as such become a party to the case.[270]

The Court appeared to have set a fairly high threshold of permitted intervention. In the Nuclear Tests case,[271] Fiji sought to intervene in the dispute between France on the one hand and New Zealand and Australia on the other, but the Court postponed consideration of this and, after its judgment that the issue was moot, it was clearly unnecessary to take any further steps regarding Fiji. Malta sought to intervene in the Tunisia/Libya Continental Shelf case[272] in the light of its shelf delimitation dispute with Libya in order to submit its views to the Court. The Court felt that the real purpose of Malta's intervention was unclear and [267] See C. Chinkin, 'Article 62' in Zimmermann et al., Statute of the International Court, p. 1331. See also article 81 of the Rules of Court. It is for the Court itself to decide upon any request for permission to intervene: see the Tunisia/Libya (Intervention) case, ICJ Reports, 1981, pp. 3, 12; 62 ILR, p. 608.

[266] See the Libya/Malta case, ICJ Reports, 1984, p. 25; 70 ILR, p. 527, and the Nicaragua case, ICJ Reports, 1984, p. 431; 76 ILR, p. 104.

[268] See here the SS Wimbledon case, PCIJ, Series A, No. 1 (1923); 2 AD, p. 4; the Haya de la Torre case, ICJ Reports, 1951, pp. 71, 76–7; 18 ILR, pp. 349, 356–7, and the Nicaragua case, ICJ Reports, 1984, pp. 215–16; 76 ILR, pp. 74–5. See also C. Chinkin, 'Article 63' in Zimmermann et al., Statute of the International Court, p. 1369.

[269] See the Wimbledon case, PCIJ, Series A, No. 1 (1923), pp. 9–13, and the Haya de la Torre case, ICJ Reports, 1951, p. 71; 18 ILR, p. 349.

[270] El Salvador/Honduras (Intervention), ICJ Reports, 1990, pp. 92, 134–5; 97 ILR, p. 112. See also E. Lauterpacht, Aspects, pp. 26 ff.

[271] ICJ Reports, 1974, p. 253; 57 ILR, p. 398.

[272] ICJ Reports, 1982, p. 18; 67 ILR, p. 4.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

did not relate to any legal interest of its own directly in issue as between Tunisia and Libya in the proceedings or as between itself and either one of those countries.[273] While Malta did have an interest similar to other states in the area in the case in question, the Court said[274] that in order to intervene under article 62 it had to have an interest of a legal nature which might be affected by the Court's decision in the instant case.

However, the Court granted permission for the very first time in the history of both the ICJ and its predecessor to a third state intervening under article 62 of the Statute to Nicaragua in the case concerning the Land, Island and Maritime Frontier Dispute (El Salvador/Honduras). The Court held unanimously that Nicaragua had demonstrated that it had an interest of a legal nature which might be affected by part[275] of the judgment of the Chamber on the merits of the case.[276] The intervening state does not need to demonstrate a basis of jurisdiction, since the competence of the Court is here not founded upon the consent of the parties as such but is rather derived from the consent given by the parties in becoming parties to the Court's Statute to the Court's exercise of its powers conferred by the Statute.[277] The purpose of intervention, it was emphasised, was to protect a state's 'interest of a legal nature' that might be affected by a decision in an existing case already established between other states, the parties to the case, and not to enable a third state to 'tack on a new case'.[278]

[273] ICJ Reports, 1981, pp. 3, 12; 62 ILR, pp. 612, 621.

[274] ICJ Reports, 1981, p. 19; 62 ILR, p. 628. The Court also refused Italy permission to intervene under article 62 in the Libya/Malta case: see ICJ Reports, 1984, p. 3; 70 ILR, p. 527. The Court also refused permission to El Salvador to intervene in the Nicaragua case under article 63: see ICJ Reports, 1984, p. 215; 76 ILR, p. 74, inasmuch as it related to the current phase of the proceedings. The Court here more controversially also refused to hold a hearing on the issue, ibid., but see Separate Opinion of five of the judges, ICJ Reports, 1984, p. 219; 76 ILR, p. 78.

[275] I.e. concerning the legal regime of the waters within the Gulf of Fonseca only and not the other issues in dispute, such as maritime delimitations and delimitation of the land frontier between El Salvador and Honduras.

[276] ICJ Reports, 1990, p. 92; 97 ILR, p. 112.

[277] ICJ Reports, 1990, p. 133; 97 ILR, p. 254. The Court noted that 'the procedure of intervention is to ensure that a state with possibly affected interests may be permitted to intervene even though there is no jurisdictional link and it therefore cannot become a party', ICJ Reports, 1990, p. 135, 97 ILR, p. 256. In the earlier cases it was not felt necessary to decide this issue: see e.g. the Tunisia/Libya case, ICJ Reports, 1981, pp. 3, 20; 62 ILR, pp. 612, 629, and the Libya/Malta case, ICJ Reports, 1984, pp. 3, 28; 70 ILR, pp. 527, 557.

[278] ICJ Reports, 1990, pp. 133–4.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

The Court in Cameroon v. Nigeria, repeating the formulation adopted in El Salvador/Honduras,[279] stated that it followed from the juridical nature and purpose of intervention that the existence of a valid link of jurisdiction between the intended intervener and the parties was not a requirement for the success of the application. Indeed, 'the procedure of intervention is to ensure that a state with possibly affected interests may be permitted to intervene even though there is no jurisdictional link and it therefore cannot become a party'.[280] A jurisdictional link between the intervening state and the parties to the case is, accordingly, only necessary where the former wishes actually to become a party to the case.[281]

In Indonesia/Malaysia (Philippines Intervening), the Court addressed the meaning of 'interest of a legal nature' and concluded that it referred not only to the dispositif, or the operative paragraphs, of the judgment but also to the reasons constituting the necessary steps to it.[282] In deciding whether to permit an intervention, the Court had to decide in relation to all the circumstances of the case, whether the legal claims which the proposed intervening state has outlined might indeed be affected by the decision in the case between the parties. The state seeking to intervene had to 'demonstrate convincingly what it asserts'[283] and where the state relies on an interest of a legal nature other than in the subject matter of the case itself, it 'necessarily bears the burden of showing with a particular clarity the existence of the interest of a legal nature which it claims to have'.[284]

The Court in the merits stage of the El Salvador/Honduras case,[285] noting that Nicaragua as the intervening state could not thereby as such become a party to the proceedings, concluded that that state could not therefore [279] Ibid., p. 135. [280] ICJ Reports, 1999, pp. 1034–5.

[281] El Salvador/Honduras (Intervention), ICJ Reports, 1990, pp. 92, 135; 97 ILR, p. 112.

[282] ICJ Reports, 2001, pp. 575, 596.

[283] El Salvador/Honduras (Intervention), ICJ Reports, 1990, pp. 92, 117–18; 97 ILR, p. 112. And, on the basis of documentary evidence, see Indonesia/Malaysia (Philippines Intervening), ICJ Reports, 2001, pp. 575, 603. As to the burden and scope of proof generally, see above, p. 1088.

[284] Indonesia/Malaysia (Philippines Intervening), ICJ Reports, 2001, pp. 575, 598. The Court concluded that the Philippines had shown in the instruments it had invoked 'no legal interest on its part that might be affected by reasoning or interpretations of the Court in the main proceedings, either because they form no part of the arguments of Indonesia and Malaysia or because their respective reliance on them does not bear on the issue of retention of sovereignty by the Sultanate of Sulu as described by the Philippines in respect of its claim in North Borneo', ibid., pp. 603–4.

[285] ICJ Reports, 1992, pp. 351, 609; 97 ILR, pp. 266, 525.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

become bound by the judgment.[286] The intervener upon obtaining permission from the Court to intervene acquires the right to be heard, but not the obligation of being bound by the decision.[287] Since neither of the parties had given any indication of consent to Nicaragua being recognised to have any status which would enable it to rely on the judgment,[288] it followed that the decision of the Court could not bind Nicaragua and thus was not res judicata for it.[289]

Applications to intervene have to be filed 'as soon as possible, and not later than the closure of the written proceedings'.[290]

Remedies[291]

There has been relatively little analysis of the full range of the remedial powers of the Court.[292] In the main, an applicant state will seek a declaratory judgment that the respondent has breached international law. Such declarations may extend to provision for future conduct as well as characterisation of past conduct. Requests for declaratory judgments may also be coupled with a request for reparation for losses suffered as a consequence of the illegal activities or damages for injury of various kinds, including non-material damage.[293] Such requests for damages may include not only direct injury to the state in question but also with regard to its citizens or their property.[294] The Court may also interpret a relevant international [286] This was partly because article 59 of the Statute of the Court refers to the binding effect of a judgment as between the parties only, ICJ Reports, 1992, p. 609; 97 ILR, p. 525.

[287] ICJ Reports, 1992, p. 610; 97 ILR, p. 526.

[288] Since the consent of the existing parties is required for an intervener to become itself a party to the case, ibid.

[289] Ibid.

[290] Rule 81(1). See also Indonesia/Malaysia (Philippines Intervening), ICJ Reports, 2001, pp. 575, 584 ff.

[291] See also above, chapter 14, p. 800.

[292] But see e.g. Gray, Judicial Remedies, and I. Brownlie, 'Remedies in the International Court of Justice' in Lowe and Fitzmaurice, Fifty Years of the International Court of Justice, p. 557. Note that the Court has stated that where jurisdiction exists over a dispute on a particular matter, no separate basis for jurisdiction is required by the Court to consider the remedies a party has requested for the breach of the obligation: see the LaGrand (Germany v. USA) case, ICJ Reports, 2001, pp. 466, 485; 134 ILR, pp. 1, 24, and the Avena (Mexico v. USA) case, ICJ Reports, 2004, pp. 12, 33; 134 ILR, pp. 120, 136–7.

[293] See e.g. the I'm Alone case, 3 RIAA, 1935, p. 1609 and the Rainbow Warrior case, 74 ILR, pp. 241, 274 and 82 ILR, pp. 499, 575. See also Democratic Republic of the Congo v. Uganda, ICJ Reports, 2005, pp. 168, 279.

[294] Note that the Bosnian application to the Court in the Application of the Genocide Convention (Bosnia v. Yugoslavia) case included a claim 'to pay Bosnia and Herzegovina, in

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

legal provision so that individual rights as well as state rights are recognised in a particular case, thus opening the door to a claim for damages on behalf of the former by the national state where there has been a breach of such rights.[295] Reparation may conceivably extend to full restitution, or restitutio in integrum.[296] The Court in the Great Belt case allowed for the possibility of an order for the modification or dismantling of disputed works.[297] The question of restitution also arose in the Democratic Republic of the Congo v. Belgium case, where the Court concluded that Belgium was under an obligation to cancel the arrest warrant concerned on the basis of the need for restitution.[298]

The issue of reparation was also raised in the Gabčíkovo–Nagymaros Project case,[299] where the Court concluded that both parties had committed internationally wrongful acts and that therefore both parties were entitled both to receive and to pay compensation. In the light of such 'intersecting wrongs', the Court declared that the issue of compensation could be satisfactorily resolved in the framework of an overall settlement by the mutual renunciation or cancellation of all financial claims and counter-claims.[300] The parties may also request the Court's assistance with regard to matters yet to be decided between the parties. Accordingly, in the Gabčíkovo–Nagymaros Project case, the Court, having reached its decision on the past conduct of the parties, proceeded in its judgment to exercise its prescriptive competence, that is 'to determine what the future conduct of the Parties should be'.[301] its own right and as parens patriae for its citizens, reparations for damages to persons and property as well as to the Bosnian economy and environment caused by the foregoing violations of international law in a sum to be determined by the Court', ICJ Reports, 1993, pp. 3, 7; 95 ILR, p. 1.

295 See the LaGrand case, ICJ Reports, 2001, pp. 466, 514 ff.; 134 ILR, pp. 1, 53, paras. 3 and 4 of the dispositif contained in paragraph 128 of the judgment.

296 See the Chorzów Factory case, PCIJ, Series A, No. 13, and the Iranian Hostages case, ICJ Reports, 1980, p. 4; 61 ILR, p. 502, for possible authority for such a power. See also Gray, Remedies, pp. 95–6.

297 ICJ Reports, 1991, pp. 12, 19; 94 ILR, p. 446.

298 ICJ Reports, 2002, pp. 3, 31–2; 128 ILR, pp. 60, 87–8. But see the Joint Separate Opinion of Judges Higgins, Kooijmans and Buergenthal, which expressed the view that 'As soon as he ceased to be Minister for Foreign Affairs, the illegal consequences attaching to the warrant also ceased', ibid., pp. 89–90. See also the Dissenting Opinion of Judge Van den Wyngaert, ibid., p. 183.

299 ICJ Reports, 1997, pp. 7, 81 ff.; 116 ILR, p. 1.

300 Ibid., pp. 7, 80–1

301 Ibid., pp. 75–6. The Court concluded that, 'It is for the Parties themselves to find an agreed solution that takes account of the objectives of the Treaty, which must be pursued in a joint and integrated way, as well as the norms of international environmental law and the principles of the law of international watercourses', ibid., p. 78.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

The Court may also refer to, and thus incorporate in its judgment, a statement of one of the parties, and in effect treat it as a binding unilateral statement. In the LaGrand case, the Court noted the 'substantial activities' that the US declared that it was carrying out in order to comply with the Convention in question and concluded that such behaviour 'expresses a commitment to follow through with the efforts in this regard' and must be regarded as meeting Germany's request for a general assurance of non-repetition.[302] In Cameroon v. Nigeria, the Court referred, both in the text of its judgment and in the dispositif, to a statement of the Cameroonian Agent as to the treatment of Nigerians living in his country and stated that it took note with satisfaction of the 'commitment thus undertaken'.[303]

The Court took a further step when, in the LaGrand case, it referred to the 'obligation . . . to review' of the US in cases of conviction and death sentence imposed upon a foreign national whose rights under the Vienna Convention on Consular Relations had not been respected,[304] while in operative paragraph (7) of the dispositif, the Court, by a majority of fourteen votes to one, concluded that in such situations, 'the United States of America, by means of its own choosing, shall allow the review and reconsideration of the conviction and sentence by taking account of the violation of the rights set forth in that Convention'.[305]

Where the Court reserves the question of reparation to a later stage of proceedings, neither party may call in question such findings of the Court in the earlier judgment as have become res judicata and seek to re-litigate these findings. Where the parties seek to negotiate a resolution by direct negotiations, the Court has emphasised that such negotiations have to be [302] ICJ Reports, 2001, pp. 466, 512–13 and 513–14; 134 ILR, pp. 1, 50–1 and 51–2. See also the Avena (Mexico v. USA) case, ICJ Reports, 2004, pp. 12, 69; 134 ILR, pp. 120, 172.

[303] ICJ Reports, 2002, pp. 303, 452 and 457, para. V(C) of the dispositif.

[304] ICJ Reports, 2001, pp. 466, 514; 134 ILR, pp. 1, 51–2. See also above, chapter 13, p. 773.

[305] ICJ Reports, 2001, pp. 466, 514 ff.; 134 ILR, pp. 1, 51 ff. But see R. Y. Jennings, 'The LaGrand Case', 1 The Law and Practice of International Courts and Tribunals, 2002, pp. 1, 40. See also the Avena (Mexico v. USA) case, ICJ Reports, 2004, pp. 12, 69–70, where the Court emphasised as an 'important point' that it had been addressing issues of principle with regard to the Vienna Convention on Consular Relations and that its comments with regard to Mexican nationals, the subject of the application, could not be taken to mean that the principles did not apply to all foreign nationals in the US in a similar position. The Court also concluded that it was for the United States to find an appropriate remedy with regard to the individuals in question having the nature of review and reconsideration according to the criteria indicated in the judgment, ibid., p. 70. See as to the response of the US and relevant US case-law, above, chapter 4, p. 164, n. 178. See also the Request for the Interpretation of the Avena judgment, Provisional Measures, ICJ Reports, Order of 16 July 2008.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

conducted in good faith and in order to find an agreed solution based on the findings of the judgment of the Court in question.[306]

Enforcement

Once given, the judgment of the Court under article 60 is final and without appeal. Although it has no binding force except between the parties and in respect of the particular case under article 59, such decisions are often very influential in the evolution of new rules of international law.[307] The Court itself is not concerned with compliance and takes the view that 'once the Court has found that a state has entered into a commitment concerning its future conduct it is not the Court's function to contemplate that it will not comply with it'.[308]

Under article 94 of the UN Charter, each member state undertakes to comply with the decision of the Court in any case to which it is a party and if this does not occur, the other party may have recourse to the Security Council which may make recommendations or take binding decisions. Examples of non-compliance would include Albania in the Corfu Channel case,[309] Iceland in the Fisheries Jurisdiction case[310] and Iran in the Iranian Hostages case.[311] However, since the 1990s the record of compliance has been generally good. For example, despite initial reservations, both Libya[312] and Nigeria[313] accepted the judgments of the Court in favour of their opponents in the litigation in question. The political costs of non-compliance have to be taken into account by potentially recalcitrant states.[314]

[306] Democratic Republic of the Congo v. Uganda, ICJ Reports, 2005, pp. 168, 257.

[307] See generally Shahabuddeen, Precedent.

[308] The Nuclear Tests case, ICJ Reports, 1974, p. 477.

[309] ICJ Reports, 1949, p. 4; 16 AD, p. 155.

[310] ICJ Reports, 1974, p. 3; 55 ILR, p. 238.

[311] ICJ Reports, 1980, p. 3; 61 ILR, p. 530. During the 1970s and part of the 1980s there was reluctance by some respondent states to appear before the Court at all: see e.g. the Fisheries Jurisdiction case, ICJ Reports, 1974, p. 3; 55 ILR, p. 238; the Nuclear Tests case, ICJ Reports, 1974, p. 253; 57 ILR, p. 350; the Iranian Hostages case, ICJ Reports, 1980, p. 3; 61 ILR, p. 530 and the Nicaragua case, ICJ Reports, 1986, p. 14. See also article 53 of the Statute and H. Thirlway, Non-Appearance before the International Court of Justice, Cambridge, 1985; G. G. Fitzmaurice, 'The Problem of the "Non-appearing" Defendant Government', 51 BYIL, 1980, p. 89, and J. Elkind, Non-Appearance before the ICJ, Functional and Comparative Analysis, Dordrecht, 1984.

[312] See the Libya/ Chad case, ICJ Reports, 1994, p. 40. See also above, chapter 18, p. 1011.

[313] Cameroon v. Nigeria, ICJ Reports, 2002, p. 303.

[314] See e.g. C. Paulson, 'Compliance with Final Judgments of the International Court of Justice since 1987', 98 AJIL, 2004, p. 434, and A. P. Llamzon, 'Jurisdiction and Compliance in Recent Decisions of the International Court of Justice', 18 EJIL, 2007, p. 815.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

Application for interpretation of a judgment [315]

Article 60 of the Statute provides that, 'The judgment is final and without appeal. In the event of dispute as to the meaning or scope of the judgment, the Court shall construe it upon the request of any party.' Rule 98(1) states that in the event of dispute as to the meaning or scope of a judgment any party may make a request for its interpretation. The object of the request must be solely to obtain clarification of the meaning and the scope of what the Court has decided with binding force and not to obtain an answer to questions not so decided.[316] Accordingly, a request for interpretation must relate to the operative part of the judgment and not the reasons for the judgment, unless these are inseparable from the operative part.[317] The need to avoid impairing the finality, and delaying the implementation, of judgments means that the question of the admissibility of the request needs 'particular attention'.[318]

In addition, it is necessary that there should exist a dispute as to the meaning or scope of the judgment as to which see the Request for the Interpretation of the Avena judgment, Provisional Measures, order of 16 July 2008, paras. 44 ff.).

Application for revision of a judgment [319]

Under article 61 of the Statute, an application for revision of a judgment may only be made when based upon the discovery of some fact of such a nature as to be a decisive factor, which fact was, when the judgment was given, unknown to the Court and also to the party claiming revision, [315] See e.g. Rosenne, Law and Practice, vol. III, pp. 1616 ff., and Rosenne, Interpretation, Revision and Other Recourse from International Judgments and Awards, Leiden, 2007, and K. H. Kaikobad, Interpretation and Revision of International Boundary Decisions, Cambridge, 2007, part III. See also A. Zimmermann and T. Thienel, 'Article 60' in Zimmermann et al., Statute of the International Court, p. 1275.

[316] See Request for Interpretation of the Judgment of 20 November 1950 in the Asylum case, ICJ Reports, 1950, p. 402; 17 ILR, p. 339 and Application for Revision and Interpretation of the Judgment of 24 February 1982 in the Case Concerning the Continental Shelf (Tunisia/Libya), ICJ Reports, 1985, pp. 191, 214–20; 81 ILR, pp. 420, 447.

[317] See Request for Interpretation of the Judgment of 11 June 1998 (Cameroon v. Nigeria), ICJ Reports, 1999, pp. 31, 35.

[318] Ibid., p. 36. The Court noted that, 'The language and structure of article 60 of the Statute reflect the primacy of the principle of res judicata. That principle must be maintained', ibid. As to res judicata, see above, p. 101.

[319] See e.g. Rosenne, Law and Practice, vol. III, pp. 1623 ff., and Rosenne, Interpretation, chapter 6, and Kaikobad, Interpretation and Revision, part IV. See also A. Zimmermann and R. Geiss, 'Article 61' in Zimmermann et al., Statute of the International Court, p. 1299.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

provided that such ignorance was not due to negligence. The application must be made within six months of the discovery of the new fact and within ten years of the date of the judgment. In the Application for Revision and Interpretation of the Judgment of 24 February 1982 in the Case Concerning the Continental Shelf (Tunisia/Libya),[320] the Court decided that the 'new fact' in question, namely the text of a resolution of the Libyan Council of Ministers of 28 March 1968 setting out the western boundary of the Libyan oil concessions in the first sector of the delimitation, was a fact that could have been discovered through the application of normal diligence. If Tunisia was ignorant of the facts, it was due to its own negligence.[321] In addition, it could not be said that the new facts alleged were of such a nature as to be a decisive factor as required by article 61.[322] In the Application for Revision of the Judgment of 11 July 1996 Concerning Application of the Genocide Convention (Preliminary Objections), the Court noted that the first stage of the procedure was to examine the question of admissibility of the request.[323] The Court emphasised that article 61 required that the application for revision be based upon the discovery of some fact which was unknown when the judgment was given. Thus the fact must have been in existence at the date of the judgment and discovered subsequently. A fact occurring several years after the judgment would not be regarded as 'new'.[324] Drawing legal consequences from post-judgment facts or reinterpreting a legal situation ex post facto would not fall within the terms of article 61. In the Application for Revision of the Judgment of 11 September 1992 Concerning the El Salvador/Honduras (Nicaragua Intervening) Case,[325] El Salvador sought revision of one sector of the land boundary between it and Honduras that had been determined by the Court in the earlier judgment. The Court detailed the requirements of article 61,[326]

[320] ICJ Reports, 1985, pp. 191, 198–214; 81 ILR, p. 431.

[321] ICJ Reports, 1985, pp. 206–7; 81 ILR, p. 439.

[322] ICJ Reports, 1985, pp. 213–14; 81 ILR, p. 446.

[323] ICJ Reports, 2003, pp. 7, 11. See also the Application for Revision of the Judgment of 11 September 1992 Concerning the El Salvador/Honduras (Nicaragua Intervening) Case, ICJ Reports, 2003, pp. 392, 398. The latter case is the first article 61 judgment by a chamber. See e.g. M. N. Shaw, 'Application for Revision of the Judgment of 11 September 1992', 54 ICLQ, 2005, p. 999.

[324] ICJ Reports, 2003, pp. 7, 30.

[325] ICJ Reports, 2003, pp. 392, 398–9.

[326] The application should be based upon the 'discovery' of a 'fact'; the fact the discovery of which is relied on must be 'of such a nature as to be a decisive factor'; the fact should have been 'unknown' to the Court and to the party claiming revision when the judgment was given; ignorance of this fact must not be 'due to negligence'; and the application for revision must be 'made at latest within six months of the discovery of the new fact' and before ten years have elapsed from the date of the judgment.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

and held that each of the conditions laid down in the provision had to be fulfilled, otherwise the application would be dismissed.[327]

Examination of a situation after the judgment

The Court may have the competence to re-examine a situation dealt with by a previous decision where the terms of that decision so provide. This is likely to be rare for it runs the risk of allowing the parties to re-litigate an issue already decided simply because some of the circumstances have changed. In the Request for an Examination of the Situation in Accordance with Paragraph 63 of the Court's Judgment of 20 December 1974 in the Nuclear Tests (New Zealand v. France) Case,[328] the Court was asked to act in accordance with paragraph 63 of its 1974 decision in the light of further proposed French nuclear tests in the South Pacific. Paragraph 63 had noted that 'if the basis of this Judgment were to be affected, the Applicant could request an examination of the situation in accordance with the provisions of the Statute'.[329] The 1974 judgment had concluded that there was no need for a decision on New Zealand's claims with regard to French nuclear testing as France had undertaken not to carry out any further atmospheric nuclear testing.

The Court implicitly accepted that 'a special procedure' in the sense of a re-examination of a situation in the light of changed circumstances could be established as a result of the terms of the original decision which did not amount to either an interpretation of the judgment under article 60 or a revision of the judgment under article 61.[330] Such a procedure would in fact have the aim not of seeking changes in the original judgment, but rather of preserving it intact faced with an apparent challenge to it by one of the parties at a later date. As Judge Weeramantry noted, '[t]he Court used its undoubted powers of regulating its own procedure to devise a procedure sui generis'.[331] However, in the instant case, the Court found that the basis of its 1974 judgment was a French undertaking not to conduct any further atmospheric nuclear tests and that therefore it was only a resumption of nuclear testing in the atmosphere that would affect the

[327] ICJ Reports, 2003, pp. 392, 399 and 404.

[328] ICJ Reports, 1995, p. 288; 106 ILR, p. 1. [329] ICJ Reports, 1974, p. 477.

[330] Ibid., pp. 303–4. Judge Weeramantry noted that the request for an examination of the situation was 'probably without precedent in the annals of the Court' and one that did not fit in with any of the standard applications recognised by the Rules of the Court for revision or interpretation of a judgment, ibid., p. 320.

[331] Ibid., p. 320.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

basis of that judgment and that had not occurred.[332] Accordingly, New Zealand's request for an examination of the situation was rejected.

The advisory jurisdiction of the Court[333]

In addition to having the capacity to decide disputes between states, the ICJ may give advisory opinions. Article 65 of the Statute declares that 'the Court may give an advisory opinion on any legal question at the request of whatever body may be authorised by or in accordance with the Charter of the United Nations to make such a request', while article 96 of the Charter notes that as well as the General Assembly and Security Council, other organs of the UN and specialised agencies where so authorised by the Assembly may request such opinions on legal questions arising within the scope of their activities.[334]

Unlike contentious cases, the purpose of the Court's advisory jurisdiction is not to settle, at least directly or as such, inter-state disputes, but rather to 'offer legal advice to the organs and institutions requesting the opinion'.[335] Accordingly, the fact that the question put to the Court does not relate to a specific dispute does not affect the competence of the [332] Ibid., pp. 305–6. France was proposing to undertake a series of underground nuclear tests. This it eventually did.

[333] See e.g. Rosenne, Law and Practice, vol. III, chapter 30; D. Negulesco, 'L'Évolution de la Procedure des Avis Consultatif de la Cour Permanente de Justice Internationale', 57 HR, 1936, p. 1; K. Keith, The Extent of the Advisory Jurisdiction of the International Court of Justice, Leiden, 1971; M. Pomerance, The Advisory Jurisdiction of the International Court in the League and UN Eras, Baltimore, 1973; D. Pratap, The Advisory Jurisdiction of the International Court, Oxford, 1972; D. Greig, 'The Advisory Jurisdiction of the International Court and the Settlement of Disputes Between States', 15 ICLQ, 1966, p. 325; R. Higgins, 'A Comment on the Current Health of Advisory Opinions' in Lowe and Fitzmaurice, Fifty Years of the International Court of Justice, p. 567; G. Abi-Saab, 'On Discretion: Reflections on the Nature of the Consultative Function of the International Court of Justice' in International Law, the International Court of Justice and Nuclear Weapons (eds. L. Boisson de Chazournes and P. Sands), Cambridge, 1999, p. 36, and Nguyen Quoc Dinh et al., Droit International Public, p. 907.

[334] See J. Frowein and K. Oellers-Frahm, 'Article 65' in Zimmermann et al., Statute of the International Court, p. 1401, and K. Oellers-Frahm, 'Article 96 UN Charter', ibid., p. 181. See further as to advisory opinions which are to be recognised as binding, below, chapter 23, p. 1304.

[335] The Legality of the Threat or Use of Nuclear Weapons case, ICJ Reports, 1996, pp. 226, 236; 110 ILR, p. 163. In the Construction of a Wall case, ICJ Reports, 2004, pp. 136, 162–3; 129 ILR, pp. 37, 80, the Court noted that 'advisory opinions have the purpose of furnishing to the requesting organs the elements of law necessary for them in their action'. It was then for the requesting organ to draw conclusions from the Court's findings.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

Court, nor does it matter that the question posed is abstract in nature.[336] Similarly, the fact that a legal question also has political aspects will not deprive the Court of its jurisdiction, nor of its function, which is to assess the legality of the possible conduct of states with regard to obligations imposed upon them by international law.[337] In addressing the question put to the Court by a political organ of the UN, the Court will not have regard to the origins or the political history of the request nor to the distribution of votes with regard to the relevant resolution. The fact that any answer given by the Court might become a factor in relation to the subject matter of the request in other fora is also irrelevant in determining the appropriate response of the Court to the request for the advisory opinion.[338] Further, the lack of clarity in the drafting of the question would not deprive the Court of jurisdiction. Such uncertainty could be clarified by the Court as a matter of interpretation. Indeed, the Court may 'broaden, interpret and even reformulate the questions put', seeing its role essentially as identifying the relevant principles and rules, interpreting them and applying them, 'thus offering a reply to the question posed based on law'.[339]

Originally, the Court took the broad view that it would not exercise its advisory jurisdiction in respect of a central issue in a dispute between the parties where one of these parties refused to take part in the proceedings.[340] However, the scope of this principle, which was intended to reflect the sovereignty and independence of states, has been reduced in a number of subsequent cases before the Court, so that the presumption is that the Court, subject to jurisdictional issues, would answer a request for an advisory opinion. In the Interpretation of Peace Treaties case,[341] for example, which concerned the interpretation of the 1947 peace agreements with [336] The Legality of the Threat or Use of Nuclear Weapons case, ICJ Reports, 1996, pp. 226, 236; 110 ILR, p. 163. See also the Construction of a Wall case, ICJ Reports, 2004, pp. 136, 154; 129 ILR, p. 37.

[337] The Legality of the Threat or Use of Nuclear Weapons case, ICJ Reports, 1996, pp. 226, 234 and the Construction of a Wall case, ICJ Reports, 2004, pp. 136, 155 and 159–60.

[338] The Legality of the Threat or Use of Nuclear Weapons case, ICJ Reports, 1996, pp. 226, 236.

[339] The Construction of a Wall case, ICJ Reports, 2004, pp. 136, 153–4 and 160. See also the Legality of the Threat or Use of Nuclear Weapons case, ICJ Reports, 1996, pp. 226, 234.

[340] See the Eastern Carelia case, PCIJ, Series B, No. 5, 1923; 2 AD, p. 394. Note that the Court dealt with the consent of an interested party as a matter not of the competence or jurisdiction of the Court, but of the judicial propriety of giving an opinion: see the Western Sahara case, ICJ Reports, 1975, p. 25 and the Construction of a Wall case, ICJ Reports, 2004, pp. 136, 157–8.

[341] ICJ Reports, 1950, pp. 65, 71; 17 ILR, pp. 331, 335.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

Bulgaria, Hungary and Romania, it was stressed that whereas the basis of the Court's jurisdiction in contentious proceedings rested upon the consent of the parties to the dispute, the same did not apply with respect to advisory opinions. Such opinions were not binding upon anyone and were given not to the particular states but to the organs which requested them. The Court declared that 'the reply of the Court, itself an "organ of the United Nations", represents its participation in the activities of the organisation, and in principle should not be refused'. Similarly, the Court emphasised in the Reservations to the Genocide Convention case, that the object of advisory opinions was 'to guide the United Nations in respect of its own action'. Thus, the Court would lean towards exercising its jurisdiction, despite the objections of a concerned party, where it would be providing guidance for an international body with respect to the application of an international treaty. In fact, the Court has said that only 'compelling reasons' should lead the Court to refuse to give an opinion on grounds of propriety as distinct from grounds of lack of jurisdiction.[342]

In the Western Sahara case,[343] the ICJ gave an advisory opinion as regards the nature of the territory and the legal ties therewith of Morocco and Mauritania at the time of colonisation, notwithstanding the objections of Spain, the administering power. The Court distinguished the case from the Eastern Carelia dispute on a number of grounds, the most important being that the dispute in the Western Sahara case had arisen within the framework of the General Assembly's decolonisation proceedings and the object of the request for the advisory opinion (by the Assembly) was to obtain from the Court an opinion which would aid the Assembly in the decolonisation of the territory.[344] Accordingly, the matter fell within the Peace Treaties/Reservations cases category of opinions to guide the UN.[345] The Court noted that it was the fact that inadequate material was available [342] See e.g. the Legality of the Threat or Use of Nuclear Weapons case, ICJ Reports, 1996, pp. 226, 235 and the Construction of a Wall case, ICJ Reports, 2004, pp. 136, 156 and 164.

[343] ICJ Reports, 1975, p. 12; 59 ILR, p. 14.

[344] ICJ Reports, 1975, pp. 24–5; 59 ILR, p. 42. It was also noted that in the Eastern Carelia case, Russia had objected to the Court's jurisdiction and was neither a member of the League (at that time) nor a party to the Statute of the PCIJ, whereas in the Western Sahara case, Spain was a UN member and thus a party to the Statute of the ICJ. It had therefore given its consent in general to the exercise by the Court of its advisory jurisdiction. Further, Spain's objection was to the restriction of the reference to the Court to the historical aspects of the Sahara question, ibid.

[345] The Court emphasised that the central core of the issue was not a dispute between Spain and Morocco, but rather the nature of Moroccan (and Mauritanian) rights at the time of colonisation, ICJ Reports, 1975, p. 27; 59 ILR, p. 44.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

for an opinion that impelled the PCIJ to refuse to consider the Eastern Carelia issue, notwithstanding that this arose because of a refusal of one of the parties to participate in the proceedings. In the Western Sahara case, an abundance of documentary material was available to the Court.[346] It is therefore evident that the general rule expressed in the Eastern Carelia case has been to a very large extent weakened.[347] However, it would not be correct to say that it has been entirely eroded. There may indeed be circumstances where the lack of consent of an interested party may render the giving of an advisory opinion incompatible with the judicial character of the Court.[348] Further, the need to have 'sufficient information and evidence' to enable the Court to reach a judicial conclusion still remains.[349] However, the primary criterion appears to be whether the request for an advisory opinion is made with the aim of obtaining assistance in the proper exercise of the functions of the requesting organ. This poses the question as to the proper exercise of functions.[350]

In examining the question posed by the requesting organ, the Court will operate on the same basis as in contentious cases with regard to the nature of evidence, as well as the burden and standard of proof,[351] regard being had to the different purposes of contentious and advisory proceedings. In addition, the Court has a certain latitude in advisory proceedings as distinct from contentious proceedings, since it is not as such determining the rights and duties of the parties to the case but providing advice to the requesting organ as to the legal issues comprised in the question asked. That would seem to import a responsibility to provide 'a balanced opinion', taking account of the relevant context, particularly [346] ICJ Reports, 1975, pp. 28–9; 59 ILR, p. 45. See also the Construction of a Wall case, ICJ Reports, 2004, pp. 136, 161–2, where the Court noted the detailed information available to it from UN and other sources.

[347] See also the Difference Relating to Immunity from Legal Process case, ICJ Reports, 1999, pp. 62, 78–9; 121 ILR, p. 405 and the Construction of a Wall case, ICJ Reports, 2004, pp. 136, 156–7, where the Court concluded that it had a duty to satisfy itself each time it was asked to give an advisory opinion as to the propriety of the exercise of its judicial function, by reference to the criterion of 'compelling reasons', ibid., p. 157.

[348] See the Western Sahara case, ICJ Reports, 1975, pp. 12, 25. See also e.g. the Separate Opinion of Judge Higgins in the Construction of a Wall case, ICJ Reports, 2004, pp. 136, 209–10.

[349] See the Western Sahara case, ICJ Reports, 1975, pp. 12, 28–9.

[350] Ibid., p. 210.

[351] See above, p. 1088. Note that in her Separate Opinion in the Construction of a Wall case, ICJ Reports, 2004, pp. 136, 211, 213 and 214, Judge Higgins declared inter alia that she found the history of the Arab–Israeli dispute as recounted by the Court 'neither balanced nor satisfactory'. See also the Separate Opinion of Judge Kooijmans, ibid., p. 220.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

where a dispute between states is apparent in the situation in the sense of referring to all relevant legal issues.[352]

With regard to the jurisdiction of the Court to given an opinion, article 96(2) of the Charter provides that, in addition to the Security Council and the General Assembly:

> [o]ther organs of the United Nations and specialised agencies which may at any time be so authorised by the General Assembly, may also request advisory opinions of the Court on legal questions arising within the scope of their activities.

The Court in the request for an advisory opinion by the World Health Organisation on the Legality of the Use by a State of Nuclear Weapons in Armed Conflict[353] found that three conditions were required in order to found the jurisdiction of the Court in such circumstances: first, that the specialised agency in question must be duly authorised by the General Assembly to request opinions from the Court; secondly, that the opinion requested was on a legal question, and thirdly, that the question must be one arising within the scope of activities of the requesting agency.[354] The Court examined the functions of the WHO in the light of its Constitution[355] and subsequent practice, and concluded that the organisation was authorised to deal with the effects on health of the use of nuclear weapons and of other hazardous activities and to take preventive measures with the aim of protecting the health of populations in the event of such weapons being used or such activities engaged in. However, the question put to the Court, it was emphasised, concerned not the effects of the use of nuclear weapons on health, but the legality of the use of such weapons in view of their health and environmental effects. Accordingly, the Court held that the question posed in the request for the advisory opinion did not arise within the scope of activities of the organisation as defined in its Constitution.[356]

[352] ICJ Reports, 2004, p. 136. See also the Separate Opinion of Judge Kooijmans, ibid., p. 223 and the Separate Opinion of Judge Owada, ibid., pp. 267 ff. See generally Agora, 99 AJIL, 2005, p. 1.

[353] ICJ Reports, 1996, p. 66.

[354] Ibid., pp. 71–2. See also the Application for Review of Judgment No. 273 (Mortished) case, ICJ Reports, 1982, pp. 325, 333–4; 69 ILR, pp. 330, 344–5.

[355] See article 2(a) to (v) of the WHO Constitution adopted on 22 July 1946 and amended in 1960, 1975, 1977, 1984 and 1994.

[356] ICJ Reports, 1996, pp. 66, 75 ff.; 110 ILR, p. 1.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

The advisory opinion in the Difference Relating to Immunity from Legal Process case was the first time the Court had received a request under article VIII, section 30, of the General Convention on the Privileges and Immunities of the UN, 1946, which allowed for recourse to the Court for an advisory opinion where a difference has arisen between the UN and a member state. The particular interest in this provision is that it stipulates that the opinion given by the Court 'shall be accepted as decisive by the parties'. The importance of advisory opinions delivered by the Court is therefore not to be underestimated.[357]

The role of the Court

There are a variety of other issues currently facing the Court. As far as access to it is concerned, it has, for example, been suggested that the power to request advisory opinions should be given to the UN Secretary-General[358] and to states and national courts,[359] while the possibility of permitting international organisations to become parties to contentious proceedings has been raised.[360] Perhaps more centrally, the issue of the relationship between the Court and the political organs of the UN, particularly the Security Council, has been raised anew as a consequence of the revitalisation of the latter in recent years and its increasing activity.[361] The Court possesses no express power of judicial review of UN activities, although it is the principal judicial organ of the organisation and has in that capacity dealt on a number of occasions with the meaning of UN [357] Among other influential Advisory Opinions delivered by the Court are the Reparations case, ICJ Reports, 1949, p. 174; 16 AD, p. 318; the Admissions case, ICJ Reports, 1948, p. 57; 15 AD, p. 333, and the Certain Expenses case, ICJ Reports, 1962, p. 151; 34 ILR, p. 281. See also the WHO–Egypt case, ICJ Reports, 1980, p. 73; 62 ILR, p. 451; the Administrative Tribunal cases, ICJ Reports, 1973, p. 166; 54 ILR, p. 381; ICJ Reports, 1982, p. 325; 69 ILR, p. 330; ICJ Reports, 1987, p. 18; 83 ILR, p. 296 and the Applicability of the Obligation to Arbitrate case, ICJ Reports, 1988, p. 12; 82 ILR, p. 225.

[358] See e.g. Higgins, 'Current Health', p. 569, and S. Schwebel, 'Authorising the Secretary-General of the United Nations to Request Advisory Opinions', 78 AJIL, 1984, p. 4. See also UN Secretary-General, Agenda for Peace, New York, 1992, A/47/277, para. 38.

[359] See e.g. S. Schwebel, 'Preliminary Rulings by the International Court of Justice at the Instance of National Courts', 28 Va. JIL, 1988, p. 495, and S. Rosenne, 'Preliminary Rulings by the International Court of Justice at the Instance of National Courts: A Reply', 29 Va. JIL, 1989, p. 40.

[360] See e.g. D. Bowett et al., The International Court of Justice: Process, Practice and Procedures, London, 1997.

[361] See e.g. M. Bedjaoui, The New World Order and the Security Council, Dordrecht, 1994. See also below, chapter 22, p. 1268.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

resolutions and organs.[362] In the Lockerbie case,[363] the Court was faced with a new issue, that of examining the relative status of treaty obligations and binding decisions adopted by the Security Council. In its decision on provisional measures, the Court accepted that by virtue of article 103 of the UN Charter obligations under the Charter (including decisions of the Security Council imposing sanctions) prevailed over obligations contained in other international agreements.[364]

The decisions and advisory opinions of the ICJ (and PCIJ before it) have played a vital part in the evolution of international law.[365] Further, the increasing number of applications in recent years have emphasised that the Court is now playing a more central role within the international legal system than thought possible two decades ago.[366] Of course, many of the most serious of international conflicts may never come before the Court, due to a large extent to the unwillingness of states to place their vital interests in the hands of binding third-party decision-making, while the growth of other means of regional and global resolution of disputes cannot be ignored.

[362] See e.g. the Reparation case, ICJ Reports, 1949, p. 174; 16 AD, p. 318, concerning the legal personality of the UN, the Certain Expenses case, ICJ Reports, 1962, p. 151; 34 ILR, p. 281, by virtue of which the UN was able to take action which did not amount to enforcement action outside of the framework of the Security Council, thus enabling the creation of peacekeeping missions, and the Namibia case, ICJ Reports, 1971, p. 56; 94 ILR, p. 2, recognising the succession of the UN to the League of Nations with regard to mandated territories and enshrining the principle of self-determination within international law. See also the East Timor case, ICJ Reports, 1995, pp. 90, 103–4; 105 ILR, p. 226.

[363] ICJ Reports, 1992, p. 3; 94 ILR, p. 478.

[364] ICJ Reports, 1992, p. 15; 94 ILR, p. 498.

[365] Indeed the importance of the pleadings in the evolution of international law has been noted: see e.g. P. Sands, 'Pleadings and the Pursuit of International Law' in Legal Visions of the 21st Century (eds. A. Anghie and G. Sturges), The Hague, 1998, while dissenting opinions may also be significant: see e.g. the Dissenting Opinion of Judge Franck in the Indonesia/Malaysia case, ICJ Reports, 2002, p. 3. See also, as to the international bar, Shaw, 'A Practical Look at the International Court of Justice' in Evans, Remedies, pp. 11, 12 ff.; A. Watts, 'Enhancing the Effectiveness of Procedures of International Dispute Settlement', 5 Max Planck Yearbook of United Nations Law, 2001, pp. 21, 24 ff., and the Declaration of Judge Ad Hoc Cot in the 'Grand Prince' case, International Tribunal for the Law of the Sea, 2001, p. 3; 125 ILR, p. 272.

[366] See e.g. K. Highet, 'The Peace Palace Hots Up: The World Court in Business Again?', 85 AJIL, 1991, p. 646. See also e.g. A. Pellet, 'Strengthening the Role of the International Court of Justice as the Principal Judicial Organ of the United Nations', 3 The Law and Practice of International Courts and Tribunals, 2004, p. 159; P. Kooijmans, 'The ICJ in the 21st Century: Judicial Restraint, Judicial Activism, or Proactive Judicial Policy', 56 ICLQ, 2007, p. 741, and R. Higgins, 'A Babel of Judicial Voices? Ruminations from the Bench', 55 ICLQ, 2006, p. 791.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

Proliferation of courts and tribunals

The proliferation of judicial organs on the international and regional level has been one characteristic of recent decades.[367] It has reflected the increasing scope and utilisation of international law on the one hand and an increasing sense of the value of resolving disputes by impartial third-party mechanisms on the other. It is now possible to identify an accepted international practice of turning to such mechanisms as a reasonably effective way of settling differences in a manner that is reflective of the rule of law and the growth of international co-operation. The importance of this practice to the evolution of international law is self-evident, as the development of legal rules and the creation of legal institutions with accompanying compulsory adjudication go hand in hand.

The European Court of Justice, the European Court of Human Rights, the new African Court of Human Rights and the Inter-American Court of Human Rights have been joined by the two Tribunals examining war crimes in Bosnia and Rwanda and by the new International Criminal Court.[368] In addition, the International Tribunal for the Law of the Sea is in operation[369] and a variety of other relevant mechanisms have arisen, ranging from the World Trade Organisation's Dispute Settlement provisions creating an Appellate Body[370] to administrative tribunals and economic courts.[371] Again, the work of arbitration tribunals, whether established to hear one case or a series of similar cases, is of direct relevance.

It is unclear how this may impinge upon the work of the International Court in the long run. Some take the view that proliferation will lead to inconsistency and confusion, others that it underlines the vigour and [367] See e.g. S. Rosenne, 'The Perplexities of Modern International Law', 291 HR, 2002, pp. 13, 125; J. I. Charney, 'The Implications of Expanding International Dispute Settlement Systems: The 1982 Convention on the Law of the Sea', 90 AJIL, 1996, p. 69, and Charney, 'The Multiplicity of International Tribunals and Universality of International Law', 271 HR, 1998, p. 101; Oda, 'The International Court of Justice from the Bench', 244 HR, 1993 VII, pp. 9, 139 ff.

[368] See further above, chapters 6, 7 and 8. See also with regard to the fragmentation of international law generally, above, chapter 2, p. 65.

[369] See above, chapter 11, p. 638.

[370] See above, chapter 18, p. 1036.

[371] See e.g. the Court of Justice of the European Communities, the Economic Court of the Commonwealth of Independent States, the Court of Justice of the Common Market of Eastern and Southern Africa, and the Court of Justice of the African Union: see Y. Shany, The Competing Jurisdictions of International Courts and Tribunals, Oxford, 2003, p. 5. See further as to economic courts and tribunals, above, chapter 18, p. 1034, and as to non-compliance mechanisms in the field of environmental law, above, chapter 15.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

relevance of international law in an era of globalisation.[372] Evidence to date suggests the latter rather than the former. Inconsistency may sometimes flow from the subject matter of the dispute or the different functions of the courts in question, but it is not necessarily fatal to the development of international law. Of particular note, and only partly because it is somewhat exceptional, has been the difference of view between the International Court on the one hand and the International Criminal Tribunal for the Former Yugoslavia and the European Court of Human Rights on the other as to the test of control for the responsibility of a state with regard to the activities of non-state organs over which influence is exercised.[373] The courts and tribunals are now regularly referring to each other's decisions,[374] and some issues of international law, such as treaty interpretation principles, are regularly discussed in a range of courts and tribunals.[375] It is also true that the same situation may arise before two or more dispute settlement mechanisms.[376]

[372] See e.g. G. Guillaume, 'The Future of International Judicial Institutions', 44 ICLQ, 1995, p. 848; S. Rosenne, 'Establishing the International Tribunal for the Law of the Sea', 89 AJIL, 1995, p. 806; T. Buergenthal, 'Proliferation of International Courts and Tribunals: Is it Good or Bad?', 14 Leiden Journal of International Law, 2001, p. 267; R. Higgins, 'The ICJ, ECJ, and the Integrity of International Law', 52 ICLQ, 2003, pp. 1, 12 ff., and Higgins, 'A Babel of Judicial Voices?'; Shany, Competing Jurisdictions; F. K. Tiba, 'What Caused the Multiplicity of International Courts and Tribunals?', 10 Gonzaga Journal of International Law, 2006, p. 202; B. Kingsbury, 'Is the Proliferation of International Courts and Tribunals a Systemic Problem?', 31 New York University Journal of International Law and Politics, 1999, p. 679; P. M. Dupuy, 'The Danger of Fragmentation or Unification of the International Legal System and the ICJ', 31 New York University Journal of International Law and Politics, 1999, p. 791, and J. Charney, 'Is International Law Threatened by Multiple International Tribunals?', 271 HR, 1998, p. 101. See also the speeches on proliferation, of ICJ Presidents Schwebel (1999), www.icj-cij.org/court/index.php?pr=87&pt=3&p1=1&p2=3&p3=1; Guillaume (2001), www.icj-cij.org/court/index.php?pr=82&pt=3&p1=1&p2=3&p3=1; and Higgins (2007), www.icj-cij.org/presscom/files/7/14097pdf.

[373] See above, chapter 14, p. 789.

[374] See e.g. the reference to the International Court's judgment in Democratic Republic of the Congo v. Uganda in the International Criminal Court's confirmation of charges in the Thomas Lubanga Dyilo case, ICC-01/04-01/06, 29 January 2007, paras. 212 ff., and the reference in Nicaragua v. Honduras, ICJ Reports, 2007, paras. 68 ff., to a decision of the Central American Court of Justice. See also the discussion by the International Court of judgments of the International Criminal Tribunal for the Former Yugoslavia, the Genocide Convention (Bosnia v. Serbia) case, ICJ Reports, 2007, e.g. at paras. 195 ff. The European and Inter-American Courts of Human Rights have long referred to each other's judgments: see generally above, chapter 7.

[375] See generally above, chapter 16.

[376] E.g. the Mox case: see Shany, Competing Jurisdictions, p. 9, and see above, chapter 11, p. 643.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

Of course, many of the other tribunals concern disputes between individuals and states rather than inter-state disputes and those in specialist areas, such as human rights, investment problems or employment issues. The International Tribunal for the Law of the Sea is beginning to deal with questions that have been before the International Court, such as jurisdiction and nationality and provisional measures issues, but it is also concerned with specific and limited matters, particularly the prompt release of arrested foreign vessels, and non-state parties may become parties to cases before it.[377] Nevertheless, all of these courts and tribunals and other organs relate in some way to international law and thus may contribute to its development and increasing scope. Together with a realisation of this increasing spread of institutions must come a developing sense of interest in and knowledge of the work of such courts and tribunals. The special position of the International Court as the principal judicial organ of the UN and as the pre-eminent inter-state forum has led some to suggest a referral or consultative role for it, enabling it to advise other courts and tribunals. While it is difficult to see this as a realistic or practical project, increasing co-operation between the International Court and other judicial bodies is taking place and all the relevant courts and tribunals are well aware of each other's work.[378]

Suggestions for further reading

D. Bowett et al., The International Court of Justice: Process, Practice and Procedures, London, 1997

R. Y. Jennings, 'The Role of the International Court of Justice', 68 BYIL, 1997, p. 1

J. G. Merrills, International Dispute Settlement, 4th edn, Cambridge, 2005

S. Rosenne, The Law and Practice of the International Court, 1920–2005, 4th edn, Leiden, 4 vols., 2006

[377] See generally above, chapter 11.

[378] See the speech by President Higgins to the Legal Advisers of the Ministries of Foreign Affairs, 29 October 2007, www.icj-cij.org/pressscom/files/7/14097.pdf.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

20

International law and the use of force by states

The rules governing resort to force form a central element within international law, and together with other principles such as territorial sovereignty and the independence and equality of states provide the framework for international order.[1] While domestic systems have, on the whole, managed to prescribe a virtual monopoly on the use of force for the governmental institutions, reinforcing the hierarchical structure of authority and control, international law is in a different situation. It must seek to minimise and regulate the resort to force by states, without itself being able to enforce its will. Reliance has to be placed on consent, consensus, reciprocity and good faith. The role and manifestation of force in the world community is, of course, dependent upon political and other non-legal factors as well as upon the current state of the law, but the law must seek to provide mechanisms to restrain and punish the resort to violence.

[1] See e.g. Y. Dinstein, War, Aggression and Self-Defence, 4th edn, Cambridge, 2005; C. Gray, International Law and the Use of Force, 2nd edn, Oxford, 2004; S. Neff, War and the Law of Nations: A General History, Cambridge, 2005; O. Corten, Le Droit Contre La Guerre, Paris, 2008; M. Byers, War Law, London, 2005; D. Kennedy, Of Law and War, Princeton, 2006; T. M. Franck, Recourse to Force, Cambridge, 2002; D. W. Bowett, Self-Defence in International Law, Manchester, 1958; I. Brownlie, International Law and the Use of Force by States, Oxford, 1963; J. Stone, Aggression and World Order, Berkeley, 1958; J. Stone, Legal Controls of International Conflict, 2nd edn, Berkeley, 1959, and Stone, Conflict Through Consensus, Berkeley, 1977; M. S. McDougal and F. Feliciano, Law and Minimum World Public Order, New Haven, 1961, and McDougal and Feliciano, The International Law of War, New Haven, 1994; H. Waldock, 'The Regulation of the Use of Force by Individual States in International Law', 81 HR, 1982, p. 415; J. Murphy, The United Nations and the Control of International Violence, Totowa, 1982; R. A. Falk, Legal Order in a Violent World, Princeton, 1968; A. Cassese, Violence and Law in the Modern Age, Cambridge, 1988; Law and Force in the New International Order (eds. L. Damrosch and D. J. Scheffer), Boulder, 1991, and Nguyen Quoc Dinh, P. Daillier and A. Pellet, Droit International Public, 7th edn, Paris, 2002, p. 933.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

Law and force from the 'just war' to the United Nations[2]

The doctrine of the just war arose as a consequence of the Christianisation of the Roman Empire and the ensuing abandonment by Christians of pacificism. Force could be used provided it complied with the divine will. The concept of the just war embodied elements of Greek and Roman philosophy and was employed as the ultimate sanction for the maintenance of an ordered society. St Augustine (354–430)[3] defined the just war in terms of avenging of injuries suffered where the guilty party has refused to make amends. War was to be embarked upon to punish wrongs and restore the peaceful status quo but no further. Aggression was unjust and the recourse to violence had to be strictly controlled. St Thomas Aquinas[4] in the thirteenth century took the definition of the just war a stage further by declaring that it was the subjective guilt of the wrongdoer that had to be punished rather than the objectively wrong activity. He wrote that war could be justified provided it was waged by the sovereign authority, it was accompanied by a just cause (i.e. the punishment of wrongdoers) and it was supported by the right intentions on the part of the belligerents.

With the rise of the European nation-states, the doctrine began to change.[5] It became linked with the sovereignty of states and faced the paradox of wars between Christian states, each side being convinced of the justice of its cause. This situation tended to modify the approach to the just war. The requirement that serious attempts at a peaceful resolution of the dispute were necessary before turning to force began to appear. This reflected the new state of international affairs, since there now existed a series of independent states, uneasily co-existing in Europe in a primitive balance of power system. The use of force against other states, far from

[2] See e.g. L. C. Green, The Contemporary Law of Armed Conflict, 2nd edn, Manchester, 2000; G. Best, War and Law Since 1945, Oxford, 1994; S. Bailey, Prohibitions and Restraints in War, Oxford, 1972; M. Walzer, Just and Unjust Wars, 2nd edn, New York, 1977, and T. M. Franck, Fairness in International Law and Institutions, Oxford, 1995, chapter 8. See also Brownlie, Use of Force, pp. 5 ff.; Dinstein, War, chapter 3, and C. Greenwood, 'The Concept of War in Modern International Law', 36 ICLQ, 1987, p. 283.

[3] See J. Eppstein, The Catholic Tradition of the Law of Nations, 1935, pp. 65 ff.; Bailey, Prohibitions, pp. 6–9, and Brownlie, Use of Force, p. 5.

[4] Summa Theologica, II, ii, 40. See Bailey, Prohibitions, p. 9. See also Von Elbe, 'The Evolution of the Concept of the Just War in International Law', 33 AJIL, 1939, p. 669, and C. Parry, 'The Function of Law in the International Community' in Manual of Public International Law (ed. M. Sørensen), London, 1968, pp. 1, 27.

[5] Brownlie, Use of Force, pp. 7 ff.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

strengthening the order, posed serious challenges to it and threatened to undermine it. Thus the emphasis in legal doctrine moved from the application of force to suppress wrongdoers to a concern (if hardly apparent at times) to maintain the order by peaceful means. The great Spanish writer of the sixteenth century, Vitoria,[6] emphasised that 'not every kind and degree of wrong can suffice for commencing war', while Suarez[7] noted that states were obliged to call the attention of the opposing side to the existence of a just cause and request reparation before action was taken. The just war was also implied in immunity of innocent persons from direct attack and the proportionate use of force to overcome the opposition.[8]

Gradually it began to be accepted that a certain degree of right might exist on both sides, although the situation was confused by references to subjective and objective justice. Ultimately, the legality of the recourse to war was seen to depend upon the formal processes of law. This approach presaged the rise of positivism with its concentration upon the sovereign state, which could only be bound by what it had consented to. Grotius,[9] in his systematising fashion, tried to exclude ideological considerations as the basis of a just war, in the light of the destructive seventeenth-century religious conflicts, and attempted to redefine the just war in terms of self-defence, the protection of property and the punishment for wrongs suffered by the citizens of the particular state.

But with positivism and the definitive establishment of the European balance of power system after the Peace of Westphalia, 1648, the concept of the just war disappeared from international law as such.[10] States were sovereign and equal, and therefore no one state could presume to judge whether another's cause was just or not. States were bound to honour agreements and respect the independence and integrity of other countries, and had to try and resolve differences by peaceful methods.

But where war did occur, it entailed a series of legal consequences. The laws of neutrality and war began to operate as between the parties and third states and a variety of legal situations at once arose. The fact that the war may have been regarded as unjust by any ethical standards

[6] De Indis et de Jure Belli Relectiones, ss. 14, 20–3, 29 and 60, cited in Bailey, Prohibitions, p. 11.

[7] See ibid., pp. 11–12. Suarez felt that the only just cause was a grave injustice that could not be avenged or repaired in any other way, ibid.

[8] Ibid., pp. 12–15.

[9] Ibid., chapter 2, and Brownlie, Use of Force, p. 13. See De Jure Belli ac Pacis, 1625.

[10] See e.g. Brownlie, Use of Force, pp. 14 ff. See also L. Gross, 'The Peace of Westphalia, 1648–1948', 42 AJIL, 1948, p. 20.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

did not in any way affect the legality of force as an instrument of the sovereign state nor alter in any way the various rules of war and neutrality that sprang into operation once the war commenced. Whether the cause was just or not became irrelevant in any legal way to the international community (though, of course, important in political terms) and the basic issue revolved around whether in fact a state of war existed.[11] The doctrine of the just war arose with the increasing power of Christianity and declined with the outbreak of the inter-Christian religious wars and the establishment of an order of secular sovereign states. Although war became a legal state of affairs which permitted force to be used and in which a series of regulatory conditions were recognised, there existed various other methods of employing force that fell short of war with all the legal consequences as regards neutrals and conduct that that entailed. Reprisals and pacific blockades[12] were examples of the use of force as 'hostile measures short of war'.

These activities were undertaken in order to assert or enforce rights or to punish wrongdoers. There were many instances in the nineteenth century in particular of force being used in this manner against the weaker states of Latin America and Asia.[13] There did exist limitations under international law of the right to resort to such measures but they are probably best understood in the context of the balance of power mechanism of international relations that to a large extent did help minimise the resort to force in the nineteenth century, or at least restrict its application.

The First World War marked the end of the balance of power system and raised anew the question of unjust war. It also resulted in efforts to rebuild international affairs upon the basis of a general international institution which would oversee the conduct of the world community to ensure that aggression could not happen again. The creation of the League of Nations reflected a completely different attitude to the problems of force in the international order.[14]

The Covenant of the League declared that members should submit disputes likely to lead to a rupture to arbitration or judicial settlement or inquiry by the Council of the League. In no circumstances were members to resort to war until three months after the arbitral award or judicial decision or report by the Council. This was intended to provide a [11] Brownlie, Use of Force, pp. 26–8. [12] Ibid. [13] Ibid., pp. 28 ff.

[14] Ibid., chapter 3. But note Hague Convention II of 1907, which provided that the parties would not have recourse to armed forces for the recovery of contract debts claimed from the government of one country by the government of another as being due to its nationals.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

cooling-off period for passions to subside and reflected the view that such a delay might well have broken the seemingly irreversible chain of tragedy that linked the assassination of the Austrian Archduke in Sarajevo with the outbreak of general war in Europe. League members agreed not to go to war with members complying with such an arbitral award or judicial decision or unanimous report by the Council.[15]

The League system did not, it should be noted, prohibit war or the use of force, but it did set up a procedure designed to restrict it to tolerable levels. It was a constant challenge of the inter-war years to close the gaps in the Covenant in an effort to achieve the total prohibition of war in international law and this resulted ultimately in the signing in 1928 of the General Treaty for the Renunciation of War (the Kellogg–Briand Pact).[16] The parties to this treaty condemned recourse to war and agreed to renounce it as an instrument of national policy in their relations with one another.[17]

In view of the fact that this treaty has never been terminated and in the light of its widespread acceptance,[18] it is clear that prohibition of the resort to war is now a valid principle of international law. It is no longer possible to set up the legal relationship of war in international society. Thus, for example, it is unnecessary to declare war in order to engage legitimately in armed conflict.[19]

However, the prohibition on the resort to war does not mean that the use of force in all circumstances is illegal. Reservations to the treaty by some states made it apparent that the right to resort to force in self-defence was still a recognised principle in international law.[20] Whether in fact measures short of war such as reprisals were also prohibited or were left untouched by the treaty's ban on war was unclear and subject to conflicting interpretations.[21]

[15] Brownlie, Use of Force, chapter 4. See especially articles 10–16 of the Covenant.

[16] See e.g. Dinstein, War, chapter 4; A. K. Skubiszewski, 'The Use of Force by States' in Sørensen, Manual of Public International Law, pp. 739, 742–4, and Brownlie, Use of Force, pp. 74–92.

[17] Article I.

[18] It came into force on 24 July 1929 and is still in effect. Many inter-war treaties reaffirmed the obligations imposed by the Pact: see e.g. Brownlie, Use of Force, pp. 75–6.

[19] See e.g. Yossi Beilin v. The Prime Minister of Israel HCJ 6204/06, 2006. See also C. Greenwood, 'Scope of Application of Humanitarian Law' in Handbook of Humanitarian Law in Armed Conflicts (ed. D. Fleck), Oxford, 1999, p. 43, and I. Detter, The Law of War, 2nd edn, Cambridge, 2004, pp. 9 ff.

[20] See e.g. Cmd 3153, p. 10.

[21] See Brownlie, Use of Force, p. 87. Cf. Bowett, Self-Defence, p. 136.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

The UN Charter[22]

Article 2(4) of the Charter declares that:

> [a]ll members shall refrain in their international relations from the threat or use of force against the territorial integrity or political independence of any state, or in any other manner inconsistent with the purposes of the United Nations.

This provision is regarded now as a principle of customary international law and as such is binding upon all states in the world community.[23] The reference to 'force' rather than war is beneficial and thus covers situations in which violence is employed which fall short of the technical requirements of the state of war.

Article 2(4) was elaborated as a principle of international law in the 1970 Declaration on Principles of International Law and analysed systematically. First, wars of aggression constitute a crime against peace for which there is responsibility under international law. Secondly, states must not threaten or use force to violate existing international frontiers (including demarcation or armistice lines) or to solve international disputes. Thirdly, states are under a duty to refrain from acts of reprisal involving the use of force. Fourthly, states must not use force to deprive peoples of their right to self-determination and independence. And fifthly, states must refrain from organising, instigating, assisting or participating in acts of civil strife or terrorist acts in another state and must not encourage the formation of armed bands for incursion into another state's territory. Many of these items are crucial, but ambiguous. Although the Declaration is not of itself a binding legal document, it is important as an interpretation of the relevant Charter provisions.[24] Important exceptions to article 2(4) exist in relation to collective measures taken by the United [22] See J. P. Cot, A. Pellet and M. Forteau, La Charte des Nations Unies: Commentaire Article par Article, 3rd edn, Paris, 2005, and The Charter of the United Nations (ed. B. Simma), 2nd edn, Oxford, 2002.

[23] See e.g. Skubiszewski, 'Use of Force', p. 745, and L. Henkin, R. C. Pugh, O. Schachter and H. Smit, International Law: Cases and Materials, 3rd edn, St Paul, 1993, p. 893. See also the Third US Restatement of Foreign Relations Law, St Paul, 1987, p. 27; Cot et al., Charte, p. 437 (N. Schrijver), and Simma, Charter, p. 112.

[24] See e.g. G. Arangio-Ruiz, The UN Declaration on Friendly Relations and the System of Sources of International Law, Alphen aan den Rijn, 1979, and R. Rosenstock, 'The Declaration on Principles of International Law Concerning Friendly Relations', 65 AJIL, 1971, p. 713. See also General Assembly resolution 42/22, the Declaration on the Enhancement of the Effectiveness of the Principle of Refraining from the Threat or Use of Force in International Relations, 1987.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

Nations[25] and with regard to the right of self-defence.[26] Whether such an exception exists with regard to humanitarian intervention is the subject of some controversy.[27]

Article 2(6) of the Charter provides that the UN 'shall ensure that states which are not members of the United Nations act in accordance with these Principles so far as may be necessary for the maintenance of international peace and security'. In fact, many of the resolutions adopted by the UN are addressed simply to 'all states'. In particular, for example, Security Council resolution 757 (1992) adopted under Chapter VII of the Charter, and therefore binding upon all member states, imposed comprehensive sanctions upon the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia (Serbia and Montenegro). However, the invocation in that decision was to 'all states' and not to 'member states'.

'Force'

One point that was considered in the past[28] and is now being reconsidered is whether the term 'force' in article 2(4) includes not only armed force[29] but, for example, economic force.[30] Does the imposition of boycotts or embargoes against particular states or groups of states come within article 2(4), so rendering them illegal?[31] Although that provision is not modified in any way, the preamble to the Charter does refer to the need to ensure that 'armed force' should not be used except in the common interest, while article 51, dealing with the right to self-defence, specifically refers to armed force, although that is not of itself conclusive as to the permissibility of other forms of coercion.

The 1970 Declaration on Principles of International Law recalled the 'duty of states to refrain . . . from military, political, economic or any other form of coercion aimed against the political independence or territorial integrity of any state' and the International Covenants on Human Rights

[25] See below, chapter 22, p. 1235. [26] See below, p. 1131. [27] See below, p. 1155.

[28] An attempt by Brazil to prohibit 'economic measures' in article 2(4) itself was rejected, 6 UNCIO, Documents, p. 335. See also L. M. Goodrich, E. Hambro and A. P. Simons, Charter of the United Nations, 3rd edn, New York, 1969, p. 49.

[29] See e.g. the mining of Nicaraguan harbours by the US, the Nicaragua case, ICJ Reports, 1986, pp. 14, 128; 76 ILR, p. 349.

[30] See Simma, Charter, p. 118.

[31] See e.g. Economic Coercion and the New International Economic Order (ed. R. B. Lillich), Charlottesville, 1976, and The Arab Oil Weapon (eds. J. Paust and A. Blaustein), Dobbs Ferry, 1977.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

adopted in 1966 emphasised the right of all peoples freely to pursue their economic, social and cultural development. This approach was underlined in the Charter of Economic Rights and Duties of States, approved by the General Assembly in 1974, which particularly specified that 'no state may use or encourage the use of economic, political or any other type of measures to coerce another state in order to obtain from it the subordination of the exercise of its sovereign rights'. The question of the legality of the open use of economic pressures to induce a change of policy by states was examined with renewed interest in the light of the Arab oil weapon used in 1973–4 against states deemed favourable to Israel.[32] It does seem that there is at least a case to be made out in support of the view that such actions are contrary to the United Nations Charter, as interpreted in numerous resolutions and declarations. But whether such action constitutes a violation of article 2(4) is dubious.[33]

It is to be noted that article 2(4) covers threats of force as well as use of force.[34] This issue was addressed by the International Court in its Advisory Opinion to the General Assembly on the Legality of the Threat or Use of Nuclear Weapons. The Court stated that a 'signalled intention to use force if certain events occur' could constitute a threat under article 2(4) where the envisaged use of force would itself be unlawful. Examples given included threats to secure territory from another state or causing it to 'follow or not follow certain political or economic paths'.[35] The Court appeared to accept that the mere possession of nuclear weapons did not of itself constitute a threat. However, noting that the policy of nuclear deterrence functioned on the basis of the credibility of the possibility of resorting to those weapons in certain circumstances, it was stated that whether this amounted to a threat would depend upon whether the particular use of force envisaged would be directed against the territorial integrity or political independence of a state or against the purposes of the UN. If [32] Paust and Blaustein, Arab Oil Weapon. [33] See e.g. Dinstein, War, p. 86.

[34] Brownlie, Use of Force, p. 364, notes that a threat of force consists 'in an express or implied promise by a government of a resort to force conditional on non-acceptance of certain demands of that government'. See also N. Stürchler, The Threat of Force in International Law, Cambridge, 2007; M. Roscini, 'Threats of Armed Force and Contemporary International Law', 54 NILR, 2007, p. 229; R. Sadurska, 'Threats of Force', 82 AJIL, 1988, p. 239, and N. White and R. Cryer, 'Unilateral Enforcement of Resolution 687: A Threat Too Far?', 29 California Western International Law Journal, 1999, p. 243.

[35] This was cited with approval by the arbitral tribunal in Guyana v. Suriname, award of 17 September 2007, paras. 439 and 445, where an order by Surinamese naval vessels to an oil rig to leave the area within twelve hours or face the consequences was deemed to constitute such a threat.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

the projected use of the weapons was intended as a means of defence and there would be a consequential and necessary breach of the principles of necessity and proportionality, this would suggest that a threat contrary to article 2(4) existed.[36] One key point here would be the definition of proportionality, in particular would it relate to the damage that might be caused or rather to the scope of the threat to which the response in self-defence is proposed? If the latter is the case, and logic suggests this, then the threat to use nuclear weapons in response to the prior use of nuclear or possibly chemical or bacteriological weapons becomes less problematic.[37]

The provisions governing the resort to force internationally do not affect the right of a state to take measures to maintain order within its jurisdiction. Accordingly, such a state may forcibly quell riots, suppress insurrections and punish rebels without contravening article 2(4). In the event of injury to alien persons or property, the state may be required to make reparation to the state of the alien concerned,[38] but apart from this the prohibition on force in international law is not in general applicable within domestic jurisdictions.[39] Accordingly, international law posits a general prohibition on the use of force. In order for force to be legitimate, it must fall within one of the accepted exceptions. These are essentially the right to self-defence[40] and enforcement action mandated by the United Nations Security Council.[41] Whether force may also be used in cases of extreme humanitarian need is discussed below.[42]

'Against the territorial integrity or political independence of any state'

Article 2(4) of the Charter prohibits the use of force 'against the territorial integrity or political independence of any state, or in any other manner

[36] ICJ Reports, 1996, pp. 226, 246–7; 110 ILR, p. 163.

[37] Note that article 2(b) of the Draft Articles on the Effects of Armed Conflicts on Treaties defines 'armed conflict' as 'a state of war or a conflict which involves armed operations which by their nature or extent are likely to affect the operation of treaties between States parties to the armed conflict or between State parties to the armed conflict and third States, regardless of a formal declaration of war or other declaration by any or all of the parties to the armed conflict': see I. Brownlie's Third Report on the Effects of Armed Conflicts on Treaties, A/CN.4/578, 2007, p. 5.

[38] See above, chapter 14, p. 823.

[39] But see below, p. 1148, regarding self-determination, and p. 1148, regarding civil wars, and see with regard to non-international armed conflicts, below, chapter 21, p. 1194.

[40] See below, p. 1131. [41] See below, chapter 22, p. 1251. [42] Below, p. 1155.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

inconsistent with the purposes of the United Nations'.[43] There is a debate as to whether these words should be interpreted restrictively,[44] so as to permit force that would not contravene the clause, or as reinforcing the primary prohibition,[45] but the weight of opinion probably suggests the latter position. The 1965 Declaration on the Inadmissibility of Intervention in the Domestic Affairs of States[46] emphasised that:

> [n]o state has the right to intervene, directly or indirectly, for any reason whatsoever, in the internal or external affairs of any other state. Consequently, armed intervention and all other forms of interference or attempted threats against the personality of the state or against its political, economic and cultural elements, are condemned.

This was reaffirmed in the 1970 Declaration on Principles in International Law,[47] with the proviso that not only were such manifestations condemned, but they were held to be in violation of international law. The International Court of Justice in the Corfu Channel case[48] declared specifically, in response to a British claim to be acting in accordance with a right of intervention in minesweeping the channel to secure evidence for judicial proceedings, that:

> the alleged right of intervention [was] the manifestation of a policy of force, such as has, in the past, given rise to most serious abuses and such as cannot . . . find a place in international law.

The Court noted that to allow such a right in the present case as a derogation from Albania's territorial sovereignty would be even less admissible:

> for, from the nature of things it would be reserved for the most powerful states, and might easily lead to perverting the administration of international justice itself.

[43] The International Court has described the prohibition against the use of force as a 'cornerstone of the United Nations Charter', Democratic Republic of the Congo v. Uganda, ICJ Reports, 2005, pp. 168, 223.

[44] See e.g. Bowett, Self-Defence, p. 152.

[45] See Brownlie, Use of Force, p. 268. See also Skubiszewski, 'Use of Force', pp. 745–6.

[46] General Assembly resolution 2131 (XX).

[47] General Assembly resolution 2625 (XXV).

[48] ICJ Reports, 1949, pp. 4, 35; 16 AD, pp. 155, 167. See also Brownlie, Use of Force, pp. 283–9, and H. Lauterpacht, The Development of International Law by the International Court, London, 1958, p. 90.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

The essence of international relations, concluded the Court, lay in the respect by independent states of each other's territorial sovereignty.[49] In addition, the Eritrea–Ethiopia Claims Commission took the position that recourse to force would violate international law even where some of the territory concerned was territory to which the state resorting to force had a valid claim. It noted that 'border disputes between states are so frequent that any exception to the threat or use of force for territory that is allegedly occupied unlawfully would create a large and dangerous hole in a fundamental rule of international law'.[50]

Categories of force

Various measures of self-help ranging from economic retaliation to the use of violence pursuant to the right of self-defence have historically been used. Since the establishment of the Charter regime there are basically three categories of compulsion open to states under international law. These are retorsion, reprisal and self-defence.[51]

Retorsion[52]

Retorsion is the adoption by one state of an unfriendly and harmful act, which is nevertheless lawful, as a method of retaliation against the injurious legal activities of another state. Examples include the severance of diplomatic relations and the expulsion or restrictive control of aliens, as well as various economic and travel restrictions. Retorsion is a legitimate method of showing displeasure in a way that hurts the other state while remaining within the bounds of legality. The Hickenlooper Amendments to the American Foreign Assistance Act are often quoted as an instance of [49] See the Nicaragua case, ICJ Reports, 1986, pp. 14, 109–10; 76 ILR, pp. 349, 443–4, and see further below, p. 1131.

[50] Partial Award, Jus Ad Bellum, Ethiopia's Claims 1–8, 2005, para. 10: see 45 ILM, 2006, pp. 430, 433. This statement was cited by the arbitral tribunal in Guyana v. Suriname, award of 17 September 2007, para. 423. See also C. Gray, 'The Eritrea/Ethiopia Claims Commission Oversteps Its Boundaries: A Partial Award?', 17 EJIL, 2006, p. 699.

[51] As to the use of force by the UN, see below, chapter 22, p. 1251.

[52] See e.g. Nguyen Quoc Dinh et al., Droit International Public, p. 957; Skubiszewski, 'Use of Force', p. 753, and G. von Glahn, Law Among Nations, 7th edn, Boston, 1996, pp. 533 ff.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

retorsion since they required the United States President to suspend foreign aid to any country nationalising American property without proper compensation. This procedure was applied only once, as against Ceylon (now Sri Lanka) in 1963, and has now been effectively repealed by the American Foreign Assistance Act of 1973.[53] Retorsion would also appear to cover the instance of a lawful act committed in retaliation to a prior unlawful activity.[54]

Reprisals[55]

Reprisals are acts which are in themselves illegal and have been adopted by one state in retaliation for the commission of an earlier illegal act by another state. They are thus distinguishable from acts of retorsion, which are in themselves lawful acts. The classic case dealing with the law of reprisals is the Naulilaa dispute[56] between Portugal and Germany in 1928. This concerned a German military raid on the colony of Angola, which destroyed property, in retaliation for the mistaken killing of three Germans lawfully in the Portuguese territory.

The tribunal, in discussing the Portuguese claim for compensation, emphasised that before reprisals could be undertaken, there had to be sufficient justification in the form of a previous act contrary to international law. If that was established, reprisals had to be preceded by an unsatisfied demand for reparation and accompanied by a sense of proportion between the offence and the reprisal. In fact, the German claim that it had acted lawfully was rejected on all three grounds. Those general rules are still applicable but have now to be interpreted in the light of the prohibition on the use of force posited by article 2(4) of the United Nations Charter. Thus, reprisals short of force (now usually termed countermeasures)[57] may still be undertaken legitimately, while reprisals involving armed force may be lawful where resorted to in conformity with the right [53] See e.g. R. B. Lillich, 'Requiem for Hickenlooper', 69 AJIL, 1975, p. 97, and C. F. Amerasinghe, 'The Ceylon Oil Expropriations', 58 AJIL, 1964, p. 445.

[54] See also, with regard to countermeasures, above, chapter 14, p. 794.

[55] See e.g. Skubiszewski, 'Use of Force', pp. 753–5; Brownlie, Use of Force, pp. 219–23 and 281–2; D. W. Bowett, 'Reprisals Including Recourse to Armed Force', 66 AJIL, 1972, p. 1, and R. W. Tucker, 'Reprisals and Self-Defence: The Customary Law', 66 AJIL, 1972, p. 581.

[56] 2 RIAA, p. 1011 (1928); 4 AD, p. 526. See also G. Hackworth, Digest of International Law, Washington, 1943, vol. VI, p. 154.

[57] See above, chapter 14, p. 794.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

of self-defence.[58] Reprisals as such undertaken during peacetime are thus unlawful, unless they fall within the framework of the principle of self-defence.[59] Sometimes regarded as an aspect of reprisal is the institution of pacific blockade.[60] This developed during the nineteenth century and was extensively used as a forceful application of pressure against weaker states. In the absence of war or armed hostilities, the vessels of third states were probably exempt from such blockade, although this was disputed by some writers.

Pacific blockades may be instituted by the United Nations Security Council,[61] but cannot now be resorted to by states since the coming into force of the Charter of the United Nations. The legality of the so-called 'quarantine' imposed by the United States upon Cuba in October 1962 to prevent certain weapons reaching the island appears questionable and should not be relied upon as an extension of the doctrine of pacific blockades.[62]

[58] See Dinstein, War, p. 222. But see Bowett, 'Reprisals'. See also SCOR, 19th Year, 111th meeting, 8 April 1964, in which the Security Council condemned reprisals as contrary to the UN Charter and deplored the UK bombing of Fort Harib, and R. B. Lillich, 'Forcible Self-Help under International Law', 62 US Naval War College International Law Studies, 1980, p. 129. Note that the US State Department has declared that, 'it is clear that the United States has taken the categorical position that reprisals involving the use of force are illegal under international law', 'Memorandum on US Practice with Respect to Reprisals', 73 AJIL, 1979, p. 489. As for episodes that appear to be on the borderline between self-defence and reprisals, see e.g. R. A. Falk, 'The Beirut Raid and the International Law of Retaliation', 63 AJIL, 1969, p. 415, and Y. Blum, 'The Beirut Raid and the International Double Standard', 64 AJIL, 1970, p. 73.

[59] The International Court declared in the Legality of the Threat or Use of Nuclear Weapons that, 'armed reprisals in time of peace . . . are considered to be unlawful . . . any right to [belligerent] reprisals would, like self-defence, be governed inter alia by the principle of proportionality', ICJ Reports, 1996, pp. 226, 246; 110 ILR, p. 163. Note that reprisals taking place within an armed conflict (belligerent reprisals) are permitted in response to prior violation of the laws of armed conflict by the opposing side: see Y. Dinstein, The Conduct of Hostilities under the Law of International Armed Conflict, Cambridge, 2004, pp. 220 ff., and C. Greenwood, 'The Twilight of the Law of Belligerent Reprisals', 20 Netherlands YIL, 1989, pp. 35, 38.

[60] See e.g. Skubiszewski, 'Use of Force', pp. 755–7, and Brownlie, Use of Force, pp. 223–4.

[61] See below, chapter 22, p. 1241.

[62] See e.g. Q. Wright, 'The Cuban Quarantine', 57 AJIL, 1963, p. 546, and M. S. McDougal, 'The Soviet–Cuban Quarantine and Self-Defence', ibid., p. 597. See also A. Chayes, The Cuban Missile Crisis, Oxford, 1974. But note the rather different declaration by the UK of a Total Exclusion Zone during the Falklands conflict, above, chapter 11, p. 584, note 139.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

The right of self-defence[63]

The traditional definition of the right of self-defence in customary international law arose out of the Caroline case.[64] This dispute revolved around an incident in 1837 in which British subjects seized and destroyed a vessel in an American port. This had taken place because the Caroline had been supplying groups of American nationals, who had been conducting raids into Canadian territory. In the correspondence with the British authorities which followed the incident, the US Secretary of State laid down the essentials of self-defence. There had to exist 'a necessity of self-defence, instant, overwhelming, leaving no choice of means, and no moment for deliberation'. Not only were such conditions necessary before self-defence became legitimate, but the action taken in pursuance of it must not be unreasonable or excessive, 'since the act, justified by the necessity of self-defence, must be limited by that necessity, and kept clearly within it'. These principles were accepted by the British government at that time and are accepted as part of customary international law.[65]

Article 51 of the Charter provides that:

> Nothing in the present Charter shall impair the inherent right of individual or collective self-defence if an armed attack occurs against a member of the United Nations, until the Security Council has taken the measures necessary to maintain international peace and security. Measures taken by members in the exercise of this right of self-defence shall be immediately reported [63] See Bowett, Self-Defence, and Brownlie, Use of Force, chapter 13. See also I. Brownlie, 'The Use of Force in Self-Defence', 37 BYIL, 1961, p. 183; Dinstein, War, chapters 7 and 8; Gray, Use of Force, chapter 4; Franck, Recourse, chapters 3–7; S. Alexandrov, Self-defence against the Use of Force in International Law, The Hague, 1996; J. Delivanis, La Légitime Défense en Droit International, Paris, 1971; Byers, War Law, Part Two; S. Schwebel, 'Aggression, Intervention and Self-Defence in Modern International Law', 136 HR, 1972, p. 411; O. Schachter, 'The Right of States to Use Armed Force', 82 Michigan Law Review, 1984, p. 1620, Schachter, 'Self-Defence and the Rule of Law', 83 AJIL, 1989, p. 259, and Schachter, International Law in Theory and Practice, Dordrecht, 1991, chapter 8; N. Ochoa-Ruiz and E. Salamanca-Aguado, 'Exploring the Limits of International Law relating to the Use of Force in Self-defence', 16 EJIL, 2005, p. 499; Cot et al., Charte, p. 506 (A. Cassese); Nguyen Quoc Dinh et al., Droit International Public, p. 941, and Simma, Charter, p. 788.

[64] 29 BFSP, p. 1137 and 30 BFSP, p. 195. See also R. Y. Jennings, 'The Caroline and McLeod Cases', 32 AJIL, 1938, p. 82.

[65] See e.g. the Legal Adviser to the US Department of State, who noted that 'the exercise of the inherent right of self-defence depends upon a prior delict, an illegal act that presents an immediate, overwhelming danger to an actual and essential right of the state. When these conditions are present, the means used must then be proportionate to the gravity of the threat or danger', DUSPIL, 1975, p. 17.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

> to the Security Council and shall not in any way affect the authority and responsibility of the Security Council under the present Charter to take at any time such action as it deems necessary in order to maintain or restore international peace and security.

There has been extensive controversy as to the precise extent of the right of self-defence[66] in the light of article 51, with some writers arguing that article 51 in conjunction with article 2(4) was exhaustive[67] and others maintaining that the opening phrase in article 51 specifying that 'nothing in the present Charter shall impair the inherent right of . . . self-defence' meant that there existed in customary international law a right of self-defence over and above the specific provisions of article 51, which referred only to the situation where an armed attack had occurred.[68]

The International Court of Justice in the Nicaragua case,[69] however, clearly established that the right of self-defence existed as an inherent right under customary international law as well as under the UN Charter. It was stressed that:

> Article 51 of the Charter is only meaningful on the basis that there is a 'natural' or 'inherent' right of self-defence and it is hard to see how this can be other than of a customary nature, even if its present content has been confirmed and influenced by the Charter . . . It cannot, therefore, be held that article 51 is a provision which 'subsumes and supervenes' customary international law.

Accordingly, customary law continued to exist alongside treaty law (i.e. the UN Charter) in this field. There was not an exact overlap and the rules did not have the same content. The Court also discussed the notion of an 'armed attack' and noted that this included not only action by regular

[66] Note that article 21 of the International Law Commission's Articles on State Responsibility, 2001, provides that, 'The wrongfulness of an act of a State is precluded if the act constitutes a lawful measure of self-defence taken in conformity with the Charter of the United Nations.'

[67] See e.g. Brownlie, Use of Force, pp. 112–13 and 264 ff., and E. Jiménez de Aréchaga, 'International Law in the Past Third of the Century', 159 HR, 1978, pp. 1, 87–98. See also Skubiszewski, 'Use of Force', pp. 765–8, and H. Kelsen, The Law of the United Nations, London, 1950, p. 914.

[68] See e.g. Bowett, Self Defence, pp. 185–6; Stone, Aggression and World Order, pp. 43, 95–6. See also H. Waldock, 'General Course on Public International Law', 166 HR, 1980, pp. 6, 231–7; Simma, Charter, pp. 790 ff.; Gray, Use of Force, pp. 98 ff.; J. Brierly, The Law of Nations, 6th edn, Oxford, 1963, pp. 417–18, and D. P. O'Connell, International Law, 2nd edn, London, 1970, vol. I, p. 317. See also e.g. 6 UNCIO, Documents, where it is noted that 'the use of arms in legitimate self-defence remains admitted and unimpaired'.

[69] ICJ Reports, 1986, pp. 14, 94; 76 ILR, pp. 349, 428.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

armed forces across an international border, but additionally the sending by or on behalf of a state of armed bands or groups which carry out acts of armed force of such gravity as to amount to an actual armed attack conducted by regular armed forces or its substantial involvement therein.[70] In this situation, the focus would then shift to a consideration of the involvement of the state in question so as to render it liable and to legitimate action in self-defence against it.[71]

In order to be able to resort to force in self-defence, a state has to be able to demonstrate that it has been the victim of an armed attack and it bears the burden of proof.[72] The Court has noted that it is possible that the mining of a single military vessel might suffice,[73] but an attack on a ship owned, but not flagged, by a state will not be equated with an attack on that state.[74] However, it is necessary to show that the state seeking to resort to force in self-defence has itself been intentionally attacked. In a series of incidents discussed by the Court in the Oil Platforms case, it was noted that none of them appeared to have been aimed specifically and deliberately at the US.[75] In seeking to determine how serious an attack must be in order to validate a self-defence response, the Court in the Nicaragua case[76] distinguished 'the most grave forms of the use of force (those constituting an armed attack) from other less grave forms' and this was reaffirmed in the Oil Platforms case.[77] It is, nevertheless, extremely difficult to define this more closely.

In many cases, however, it might be difficult to determine the moment when an armed attack had commenced in order to comply with the requirements of article 51 and the resort to force in self-defence. For example, it has been argued that with regard to actions against aircraft, [70] The Court noted that this provision, contained in article 3(g) of the Definition of Aggression annexed to General Assembly resolution 3314 (XXIX) of 1974, reflected customary international law, ICJ Reports, 1986, p. 103; 76 ILR, p. 437.

[71] See e.g. Gray, Use of Force, pp. 108 ff.

[72] The Oil Platforms (Iran v. US) case, ICJ Reports, 2003, pp. 161, 189 and 190; 130 ILR, pp. 323, 348–50.

[73] Ibid., p. 195. [74] Ibid., p. 191.

[75] Ibid. The incidents included missile attack from a distance that meant it could not have been aimed at a particular vessel (the US Sea Isle City) as distinct from 'some target in Kuwaiti waters'; an attack on a non-US flagged vessel; the alleged firing on US helicopters from Iranian gunboats that the Court found unproven; and mine-laying that could not be shown to have been aimed at the US, ibid., pp. 191–2. However, this requirement for a deliberate and intentional attack on the target state, rather than merely an indiscriminate attack, is controversial and open to question.

[76] ICJ Reports, 1986, pp. 14, 101.

[77] ICJ Reports, 2003, pp. 161, 187; 130 ILR, pp. 323, 346.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

an armed attack begins at the moment that the radar guiding the anti-aircraft missile has 'locked on'.[78] Further, one argument that has been made with regard to Israel's first strike in June 1967 is that the circumstances were such that an armed attack could be deemed to have commenced against it.[79]

Another aspect of the problem as to what constitutes an armed attack is the difficulty of categorising particular uses of force for these purposes. For example, would an attack upon an embassy or diplomats abroad constitute an armed attack legitimating action in self-defence? On 7 August 1998, the US embassies in Kenya and Tanzania were bombed, causing the loss of over 250 lives and appreciable damage to property. On 20 August, the US launched a series of cruise missile attacks upon installations in Afghanistan and Sudan associated with the organisation of Bin Laden deemed responsible for the attacks. In so doing, the US declared itself to be acting in accordance with article 51 of the Charter and in exercise of its right of self-defence.[80]

While it is clear that the right of self-defence applies to armed attacks by other states, the question has been raised whether the right of self-defence applies in response to attacks by non-state entities.[81] Where it is the state itself which has dispatched armed bands to carry out acts of armed force of such gravity as to amount to an actual armed attack conducted by regular armed forces, then force in self-defence can legitimately be used. The difficulties arise in more ambiguous circumstances. In the Nicaragua case, the Court did not accept that the right of self-defence extended to situations where a third state had provided assistance to rebels in the form of the provision of weapons or logistical or other support, although this form of assistance could constitute a threat or use of force, or amount to intervention in the internal or external affairs of the state.[82] This lays open the problem that in certain circumstances a state under attack from groups supported by another state may not be able under this definition to respond militarily if the support given by that other state does not reach the threshold laid down. Judge Jennings referred to this issue in his Dissenting Opinion, noting that, 'it seems dangerous to define unnecessarily strictly the conditions for lawful self-defence, so as to leave a large area where [80] See 'Contemporary Practice of the United States', 93 AJIL, 1999, p. 161. The US stated that the missile strikes 'were a necessary and proportionate response to the imminent threat of further terrorist attacks against US personnel and facilities', ibid., p. 162 and S/1998/780.

[78] See Gray, Use of Force, p. 108, footnote 48. [79] See below, p. 1138.

[81] See e.g. Dinstein, War, pp. 204 ff. [82] ICJ Reports, 1986, pp. 103–4; 76 ILR, pp. 437–8.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

both a forcible response to force is forbidden, and yet the United Nations employment of force, which was intended to fill that gap, is absent'.[83]

The line between assistance from a third state to groups (whether characterised as terrorists or rebels or freedom fighters) which would give rise to the legitimate use of force in self-defence against such state and assistance which fell below this is difficult to specify in practice. The International Court in its advisory opinion in the Construction of a Wall case[84] appeared to adopt what at first sight is a very restrictive approach by noting that article 51 recognised 'the existence of an inherent right of self-defence in the case of armed attack by one state against another state' and declaring that the provision did not apply with regard to Israel's actions since these were taken with regard to threats originating from within the occupied territories and not imputable to another state. However, this cannot be read to mean that self-defence does not exist with regard to an attack by a non-state entity emanating from a territory outside of the control of the target state. Further, the legal source of Israeli actions in the occupied territories, whether or not they legitimated the construction of the wall or security barrier in whole or in part, would appear to lie rather in the laws of armed conflict (international humanitarian law) and the competence of an occupying state to take action to maintain public order and protect its own forces.[85]

The Court failed to take the opportunity to revisit the ambiguities of the Nicaragua decision in Democratic Republic of the Congo v. Uganda.[86] In this case, the Court found that there was no satisfactory proof of involvement in attacks, direct or indirect, on Uganda by the Congo government and that such attacks did not emanate from armed bands or irregulars sent by or on behalf of the Congo. Such attacks were non-attributable, therefore, on the evidence to the Congo. Since the Court concluded that the legal and factual circumstances for the exercise of a right of self-defence by Uganda against the Congo were not present, 'accordingly' there was no need to address the issue as to whether and under which conditions contemporary international law provides for a right of self-defence against large-scale [83] ICJ Reports, 1986, pp. 543–4; 76 ILR, p. 877. Franck suggests that Security Council practice following the 11 September 2001 attack on the World Trade Center has followed Judge Jennings' approach: see Recourse, p. 63, and below, p. 1159.

[84] ICJ Reports, 2004, pp. 136, 194. Cf. the Separate Opinions of Judge Higgins, ibid., p. 215 and Judge Kooijmans, ibid., p. 230.

[85] See article 43 of the Hague Regulations 1907. See further below, chapter 21, p. 1181.

[86] ICJ Reports, 2005, p. 168.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

attacks by irregular forces.[87] Since the Court addressed itself only to actions that Uganda might or might not take against the Congo as such, it did not deal with the increasingly important question as to whether action might be taken in self-defence against an armed attack by a non-state actor as distinct from another state.[88]

This is perhaps surprising in view of evolving state practice with regard to international terrorism and, in particular, whether terrorist acts could constitute an 'armed attack' within the meaning of the Charter or indeed customary law.[89] The day after the 11 September 2001 attacks upon the World Trade Center in New York, the Security Council adopted resolution 1368 in which it specifically referred to 'the inherent right of individual or collective self-defence in accordance with the Charter'. Resolution 1373 (2001) reaffirmed this and, acting under Chapter VII, adopted a series of binding decisions, including a provision that all states shall 'take the necessary steps to prevent the commission of terrorist acts'. Such binding Security Council resolutions declaring international terrorism to be a threat to international peace and security with regard to which the right of self-defence is operative as such lead to the conclusion that large-scale attacks by non-state entities might amount to 'armed attacks' within the meaning of article 51 without the necessity to attribute them to another state and thus justify the use of force in self-defence by those states so attacked.[90]

Further recognition that particular hostile actions by non-state entities could amount to 'attacks' may be found in Security Council resolution 1701 (2006), in which both the 'attacks' by Hizbollah, an armed militia controlling parts of Lebanon, upon Israel (which precipitated the summer 2006 armed conflict) and Israeli 'offensive military operations' were condemned.

On 7 October 2001, the US notified the Security Council that it was exercising its right of self-defence in taking action in Afghanistan against the Al-Qaeda organisation deemed responsible for the 11 September attacks

[87] Ibid., pp. 222–3.

[88] See the Separate Opinions of Judge Kooijmans, ibid., p. 314 and Judge Simma, ibid., pp. 336 ff.

[89] See e.g. Dinstein, War, pp. 201 ff.; Franck, Recourse, chapter 4, and Gray, Use of Force, pp. 165 ff. See also M. Byers, 'Terrorism, the Use of Force and International Law after 11 September', 51 ICLQ, 2002, p. 401, and L. Condorelli, 'Les Attentats du 11 Septembre et Leur Suite', 105 RGDIP, 2001, p. 829. As to terrorism, see further below, p. 1159.

[90] See the Separate Opinions of Judge Kooijmans and Judge Simma in Democratic Republic of the Congo v. Uganda, ICJ Reports, 2005, pp. 168, 314 and 337 respectively.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

and the Taliban regime in that country which was accused of providing bases for the organisation.[91] The members of the NATO alliance invoked article 5 of the NATO Treaty[92] and the parties to the Inter-American Treaty of Reciprocal Assistance, 1947 invoked a comparable provision.[93] Both provisions refer specifically both to an 'armed attack' and to article 51 of the Charter. Accordingly, the members of both these alliances accepted that what had happened on 11 September constituted an armed attack within the meaning of article 51 of the Charter. In fact, neither treaty was activated as the US acted on its own initiative with specific allies (notably the UK), relying on the right of self-defence with the support or acquiescence of the international community.[94]

A further issue is whether a right to anticipatory or pre-emptive self-defence exists. This would appear unlikely if one adopted the notion that self-defence is restricted to responses to actual armed attacks. The concept

[91] See S/2001/946. See also 'Contemporary Practice of the United States', 96 AJIL, 2002, p. 237.

[92] See www.nato.int/terrorism/factsheet.htm. Article 5 provides that: 'The Parties agree that an armed attack against one or more of them in Europe or North America shall be considered an attack against them all and consequently they agree that, if such an armed attack occurs, each of them, in exercise of the right of individual or collective self-defence recognised by article 51 of the Charter of the United Nations, will assist the Party or Parties so attacked by taking forthwith, individually and in concert with the other Parties, such action as it deems necessary, including the use of armed force, to restore and maintain the security of the North Atlantic area.'

[93] Article 3(1) provides that, 'The High Contracting Parties agree that an armed attack by any State against an American State shall be considered as an attack against all the American States and, consequently, each one of the said Contracting Parties undertakes to assist in meeting the attack in the exercise of the inherent right of individual or collective self-defense recognized by Article 51 of the Charter of the United Nations.'

[94] See e.g. Byers, 'Terrorism', pp. 409–10; E. Cannizzaro, 'Entités Non-étatique et Régime Internationale de l'Emploi de la Force – une Étude sur le Cas de la Réaction Israélienne au Liban', 111 Revue Générale de Droit International Public, 2007, p. 333, and K. N. Trapp, 'Back to Basics: Necessity, Proportionality, and the Right of Self-Defence against Non-State Terrorist Actors', 56 ICLQ, 2007, p. 141. The resolution of the Institut de Droit International adopted on 27 October 2007 states in para. 10 that, 'In the event of an armed attack against a state by non-state actors, article 51 of the Charter as supplemented by customary international law applies as a matter of principle.' Note that the Chatham House Principles on International Law on the Use of Force in Self-Defence, 55 ICLQ, 2006, pp. 963, 969, provide that the right to self-defence may apply to attacks by non-state actors where the attack is large-scale; if the right to self-defence is exercised in the territory of another state, then that state is unable or unwilling to deal itself with the non-state actors and that it is necessary to use force from outside to deal with the threat in circumstances where the consent of the territorial state cannot be obtained; and the force used in self-defence may only be directed against the government of the state where the attacker is found in so far as is necessary to avert or end the attack.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

of anticipatory self-defence is of particular relevance in the light of modern weaponry that can launch an attack with tremendous speed, which may allow the target state little time to react to the armed assault before its successful conclusion, particularly if that state is geographically small.[95] States have employed pre-emptive strikes in self-defence. Israel, in 1967, launched a strike upon its Arab neighbours, following the blocking of its southern port of Eilat and the conclusion of a military pact between Jordan and Egypt. This completed a chain of events precipitated by the mobilisation of Egyptian forces on Israel's border and the eviction of the United Nations peacekeeping forces from the area by the Egyptian President.[96] It could, of course, also be argued that the Egyptian blockade itself constituted the use of force, thus legitimising Israeli actions without the need for 'anticipatory' conceptions of self-defence, especially when taken together with the other events.[97] It is noteworthy that the United Nations in its debates in the summer of 1967 apportioned no blame for the outbreak of fighting and did not condemn the exercise of self-defence by Israel.

The International Court in the Nicaragua case[98] expressed no view on the issue of the lawfulness of a response to an imminent threat of an armed attack since, on the facts of the case, that problem was not raised. The trouble, of course, with the concept of anticipatory self-defence is that it involves fine calculations of the various moves by the other party. A pre-emptive strike embarked upon too early might constitute an aggression. There is a difficult line to be drawn. The problem is that the nature of the international system is such as to leave such determinations to be made by the states themselves, and in the absence of an acceptable, institutional

[95] Contrast Bowett, Use of Force, pp. 118–92, who emphasises that 'no state can be expected to await an initial attack which, in the present state of armaments, may well destroy the state's capacity for further resistance and so jeopardise its very existence', and Franck, Fairness, p. 267, who notes that in such circumstances 'the notion of anticipatory self-defence is both rational and attractive', with Brownlie, Use of Force, p. 275, and L. Henkin, How Nations Behave, 2nd edn, New York, 1979, pp. 141–5. See also R. Higgins, The Development of International Law Through the Political Organs of the United Nations, Oxford, 1963, pp. 216–21; Franck, Recourse, chapter 7, and I. Brownlie, Principles of Public International Law, 6th edn, Oxford, 2003, pp. 701 ff.

[96] See generally, The Arab–Israeli Conflict (ed. J. N. Moore), Princeton, 3 vols., 1974.

[97] Note that Gray writes that Israel did not argue that it acted in anticipatory self-defence but rather in self-defence following the start of the conflict, Use of Force, pp. 130–1. See also Dinstein, War, p. 192.

[98] ICJ Reports, 1986, pp. 14, 103; 76 ILR, p. 437. See also Democratic Republic of the Congo v. Uganda, ICJ Reports, 2005, pp. 168, 222.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

alternative, it is difficult to foresee a modification of this. States generally are not at ease with the concept of anticipatory self-defence, however,[99] and one possibility would be to concentrate upon the notion of 'armed attack' so that this may be interpreted in a relatively flexible manner.[100] One suggestion has been to distinguish anticipatory self-defence, where an armed attack is foreseeable, from interceptive self-defence, where an armed attack is imminent and unavoidable so that the evidential problems and temptations of the former concept are avoided without dooming threatened states to making the choice between violating international law and suffering the actual assault.[101] According to this approach, self-defence is legitimate both under customary law and under article 51 of the Charter where an armed attack is imminent. It would then be a question of evidence as to whether that were an accurate assessment of the situation in the light of the information available at the relevant time. This would be rather easier to demonstrate than the looser concept of anticipatory self-defence and it has the merit of being consistent with the view that the right to self-defence in customary law exists as expounded in the Caroline case.[102] In any event, much will depend upon the characterisation of the threat and the nature of the response, for this has to be proportionate.[103]

[99] See e.g. the Security Council debate on, and condemnation of, Israel's bombing of the Iraqi nuclear reactor in 1981 on the basis of anticipatory self-defence, 20 ILM, 1981, pp. 965–7. See also A. Cassese, International Law in a Divided World, Oxford, 1986, pp. 230 ff., who concludes that a consensus is growing to the effect that anticipatory self-defence is allowed but under strict conditions relating to proof of the imminence of an armed attack that would jeopardise the life of the target state and the absence of peaceful means to prevent the attack, ibid., p. 233. However, in International Law, 2nd edn, Oxford, 2005, p. 362, Cassese states that, 'it is more judicious to consider such action [anticipatory self-defence] as legally prohibited, while admittedly knowing that there may be cases where breaches of the prohibition may be justified on moral and political grounds and the community will eventually condone them or mete out lenient condemnation' (emphasis in original).

[100] See e.g. the Dissenting Opinion of Judge Schwebel, Nicaragua case, ICJ Reports, 1986, pp. 14, 347–8; 76 ILR, pp. 349, 681. But see Dinstein, War, pp. 187 ff. Note also the suggestion that attacks on computer networks may also fall within the definition of armed attack if fatalities are caused, e.g. where the computer-controlled systems regulating waterworks and dams are disabled: see Y. Dinstein, 'Computer Network Attacks and Self-Defence', 76 International Law Studies, US Naval War College, 2001, p. 99.

[101] See Dinstein, War, pp. 191–2.

[102] See above, p. 1131.

[103] However, note that the Report of the UN High Level Panel on Threats, Challenges and Change, A/59/565, 2004, at para. 188, declared that 'a threatened state, according to long established international law, can take military action as long as the threatened attack is imminent, no other means would deflect it and the action is proportionate' (emphasis in original). The response of the UN Secretary-General, In Larger Freedom, A/59/2005, para. 124, also stated that imminent threats were covered by the right to self-defence. The

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

Nevertheless, it is safe to conclude that the concept of self-defence extends to a response to an attack that is reasonably and evidentially perceived to be imminent, however that is semantically achieved. The Caroline criteria remain critical.[104]

There have, however, been suggestions that the notion of anticipatory self-defence, controversial though that is, could be expanded to a right of 'pre-emptive self-defence' (sometimes termed 'preventive self-defence') that goes beyond the Caroline limits enabling the use of force in order to defend against, or prevent, possible attacks. The US note to the UN on 7 October 2001, concerning action in Afghanistan, included the sentence that, 'We may find that our self-defence requires further actions with respect to other organisations and other states.'[105] This approach was formally laid down in the 2002 National Security Strategy of the US[106] and reaffirmed in the 2006 National Security Strategy, which emphasised the role of pre-emption in national security strategy.[107] In so far as it goes beyond the Caroline criteria, this doctrine of pre-emption must be seen as going beyond what is currently acceptable in international law.[108]

The concepts of necessity and proportionality are at the heart of self-defence in international law.[109] The Court in the Nicaragua case stated that there was a 'specific rule whereby self-defence would warrant only resolution adopted by the Institut de Droit International on 27 October 2007, para. 3, notes that the right to self-defence arises 'in the case of an actual or manifestly imminent armed attack' and that it may be exercised 'only when there is no lawful alternative in practice in order to forestall, stop or repel the armed attack'.

104 See also the Chatham House Principles on International Law on the Use of Force in Self-Defence, 55 ICLQ, 2006, pp. 963, 964–5.

105 S/2001/946. See also Byers, 'Terrorism', p. 411.

106 41 ILM, 2002, p. 1478. See also M. E. O'Connell, 'The Myth of Preemptive Self-Defence', ASIL, Task Force on Terrorism, 2002, www.asil.org/taskforce/oconnell.pdf; M. Bothe, 'Terrorism and the Legality of Pre-emptive Force', 14 EJIL, 2003, p. 227, and W. M. Reisman and A. Armstrong, 'Past and Future of the Claim of Preemptive Self-Defense', 100 AJIL, 2006, p. 525.

107 See C. Gray, 'The Bush Doctrine Revisited: The 2006 National Security Strategy of the USA', 5 Chinese Journal of International Law, 2006, p. 555.

108 See e.g. the Report of the UN High Level Panel on Threats, Challenges and Change, A/59/565, 2004, at paras. 189 ff. and the UN Secretary-General's Report, In Larger Freedom, A/59/2005, para. 125, both essentially saying that where a threat is less than imminent, resort should be had to the Security Council. The resolution adopted by the Institut de Droit International on 27 October 2007 notes in para. 6 that, 'There is no basis in international law for the doctrine of "preventive" self-defence in the absence of an actual or manifestly imminent armed attack.' See also the Chatham House Principles on International Law on the Use of Force in Self-Defence, 55 ICLQ, 2006, pp. 963, 968.

109 See e.g. Brownlie, Use of Force, p. 279, footnote 2; J. Graham, Necessity, Proportionality and the Use of Force by States, Cambridge, 2004; Gray, Use of Force, pp. 120 ff., and Dinstein, War, pp. 237 ff.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

measures which are proportional to the armed attack and necessary to respond to it, a rule well established in customary international law',[110] and in the Advisory Opinion it gave to the General Assembly on the Legality of the Threat or Use of Nuclear Weapons it was emphasised that '[t]he submission of the exercise of the right of self-defence to the conditions of necessity and proportionality is a rule of customary international law'.[111] Quite what will be necessary[112] and proportionate[113] will depend on the circumstances of the case.[114] The necessity criterion raises important evidential as well as substantive issues. It is essential to demonstrate that, as a reasonable conclusion on the basis of facts reasonably known at the time, the armed attack that has occurred or is reasonably believed to be imminent requires the response that is proposed. In the Oil Platforms case,[115] the Court held that it was not satisfied that the US attacks on the oil platforms in question were necessary in order to respond to the attack on the Sea Isle City and the mining of the USS Samuel B Roberts, noting in particular that there was no evidence that the US had complained to Iran of the military activities of the platforms (contrary to its conduct with regard to other events such as minelaying and attacks on neutral shipping). Further, the US had admitted that one attack on an oil platform had been a 'target of opportunity'. It has been argued that, 'Necessity is a threshold, and the criterion of imminence can be seen to be an aspect of it, inasmuch as it requires that there be no time to pursue non-forcible measures with a reasonable chance of averting or stopping the attack.'[116]

[110] ICJ Reports, 1986, pp. 14, 94 and 103; 76 ILR, pp. 349, 428 and 437.

[111] ICJ Reports, 1996, pp. 226, 245; 110 ILR, p. 163. The Court affirmed that this 'dual condition' also applied to article 51, whatever the means of force used, ibid.

[112] See Judge Ago's Eighth Report on State Responsibility to the International Law Commission, where it was noted that the concept of necessity centred upon the availability of other means to halt the attack so that 'the state attacked . . . must not, in the particular circumstances, have had any means of halting the attack other than recourse to armed force', Yearbook of the ILC, 1980, vol. II, part 1, p. 69.

[113] Judge Ago noted that the correct relationship for proportionality was not between the conduct constituting the armed attack and the opposing conduct, but rather between the action taken in self-defence and the purpose of halting and repelling the armed attack, so that '[t]he action needed to halt and repulse the attack may well have to assume dimensions disproportionate to those of the attack suffered', ibid., p. 69. See also J. G. Gardam, 'Proportionality and Force in International Law', 87 AJIL, 1993, p. 391.

[114] Note that the UK declared that Turkish operations in northern Iraq in 1998 'must be proportionate to the threat', UKMIL, 69 BYIL, 1998, p. 586.

[115] ICJ Reports, 2003, pp. 161, 198.

[116] The Chatham House Principles on International Law on the Use of Force in Self-Defence, 55 ICLQ, 2006, pp. 963, 967.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

Quite what response would be regarded as proportionate is sometimes difficult to quantify. It raises the issue as to what exactly is the response to be proportionate to. Is it the actual attack or the threat or likelihood of further attacks? And what if the attack in question is but part of a continuing series of such attacks to which response has thus far been muted or non-existent? In the Oil Platforms case, the Court felt it necessary to consider the scale of the whole operation that constituted the US response, which included inter alia the destruction of two Iranian frigates and a number of other naval vessels and aircraft, to the mining by an unidentified agency of a single warship without loss of life.[117] In Democratic Republic of the Congo v. Uganda,[118] the Court, while finding that the preconditions for the exercise of self-defence did not exist in the circumstances, stated that 'the taking of airports and towns [by Ugandan forces] many hundreds of kilometers from Uganda's border would not seem proportionate to the series of transborder attacks it claimed had given rise to the right of self-defence, nor to be necessary to that end'.

Proportionality as a criterion of self-defence may also require consideration of the type of weaponry to be used, an investigation that necessitates an analysis of the principles of international humanitarian law. The International Court in the Legality of the Threat or Use of Nuclear Weapons case took the view that the proportionality principle may 'not in itself exclude the use of nuclear weapons in self-defence in all circumstances', but that 'a use of force that is proportionate under the law of self-defence, must, in order to be lawful, also meet the requirements of the law applicable in armed conflict'. In particular, the nature of such weapons and the profound risks associated with them would be a relevant consideration for states 'believing they can exercise a nuclear response in self-defence in accordance with the requirements of proportionality'.[119] One especial difficulty relates to whether in formulating the level of response a series of activities may be taken into account, rather than just the attack immediately preceding the act of self-defence. The more likely answer is that where such activities clearly form part of a sequence or chain of events, then the test of proportionality will be so interpreted as to incorporate this. It also appears inevitable that it will be the state contemplating such action that will first have to make that determination,[120] although

[117] ICJ Reports, 2003, pp. 161, 198; 130 ILR, pp. 323, 357–8.
[118] ICJ Reports, 2005, pp. 168, 223.
[119] ICJ Reports, 1996, pp. 226, 245; 110 ILR, p. 163. See further below, p. 1187.
[120] See e.g. H. Lauterpacht, The Function of Law in the International Community, London, 1933, p. 179.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

it will be subject to consideration by the international community as a whole and more specifically by the Security Council under the terms of article 51.[121]

It is also important to emphasise that article 51 requires that states report 'immediately' to the Security Council on measures taken in the exercise of their right to self-defence and that action so taken may continue 'until the Security Council has taken the measures necessary to maintain international peace and security'.[122]

The protection of nationals abroad[123]

In the nineteenth century, it was clearly regarded as lawful to use force to protect nationals and property situated abroad and many incidents occurred to demonstrate the acceptance of this position.[124] Since the adoption of the UN Charter, however, it has become rather more controversial since of necessity the 'territorial integrity and political independence' of the target state is infringed,[125] while one interpretation of article 51 would deny that 'an armed attack' could occur against individuals abroad within [121] See e.g. D. Grieg, 'Self-Defence and the Security Council: What Does Article 51 Require?', 40 ICLQ, 1991, p. 366.

[122] Note that the Court pointed out in Democratic Republic of the Congo v. Uganda, ICJ Reports, 2005, pp. 168, 222, that Uganda did not report to the Security Council events that it had regarded as requiring it to act in self-defence. See Dinstein, War, p. 218, who argues that failure to report measures taken in the exercise of the right of self-defence 'should not be fatal, provided that the substantive conditions for the exercise of this right are met'.

[123] See e.g. M. B. Akehurst, 'The Use of Force to Protect Nationals Abroad', 5 International Relations, 1977, p. 3, and Akehurst, 'Humanitarian Intervention' in Intervention in World Politics (ed. H. Bull), Oxford, 1984, p. 95; Dinstein, War, pp. 231 ff.; Gray, Use of Force, pp. 126 ff.; Franck, Recourse, chapter 6; Waldock, 'General Course', p. 467; L. C. Green, 'Rescue at Entebbe – Legal Aspects', 6 Israel Yearbook on Human Rights, 1976, p. 312, and M. N. Shaw, 'Some Legal Aspects of the Entebbe Incident', 1 Jewish Law Annual, 1978, p. 232. See also T. Schweisfurth, 'Operations to Rescue Nationals in Third States Involving the Use of Force in Relation to the Protection of Human Rights', German YIL, 1980, p. 159; J. R. d'Angelo, 'Resort to Force to Protect Nationals', 21 Va. JIL, 1981, p. 485; J. Paust, 'The Seizure and Recovery of the Mayaguez', 85 Yale Law Journal, 1976, p. 774; D. W. Bowett, 'The Use of Force for the Protection of Nationals Abroad' in The Current Legal Regulation of the Use of Force (ed. A. Cassese), Oxford, 1986, p. 39, and N. Ronzitti, Rescuing Nationals Abroad Through Military Coercion and Intervention on Grounds of Humanity, Oxford, 1985.

[124] See e.g. Brownlie, Use of Force, pp. 289 ff.

[125] There is, of course, a different situation where the state concerned has consented to the action or where nationals are evacuated from a state where law and order has broken down: see Gray, Use of Force, p. 129.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

the meaning of that provision since it is the state itself that must be under attack, not specific persons outside the jurisdiction.[126]

The issue has been raised in recent years in several cases. In 1964, Belgium and the United States sent forces to the Congo to rescue hostages (including nationals of the states in question) from the hands of rebels, with the permission of the Congolese government,[127] while in 1975 the US used force to rescue an American cargo boat and its crew captured by Cambodia.[128] The most famous incident, however, was the rescue by Israel of hostages held by Palestinian and other terrorists at Entebbe, following the hijack of an Air France airliner.[129] The Security Council debate in that case was inconclusive. Some states supported Israel's view that it was acting lawfully in protecting its nationals abroad, where the local state concerned was aiding the hijackers,[130] others adopted the approach that Israel had committed aggression against Uganda or used excessive force.[131]

The United States has in recent years justified armed action in other states on the grounds partly of the protection of American citizens abroad. It was one of the three grounds announced for the invasion of Grenada in 1984[132] and one of the four grounds put forward for the intervention in Panama in December 1989.[133] However, in both cases the level of threat against the US citizens was such as to raise serious questions concerning the satisfaction of the requirement of proportionality.[134] The US conducted a bombing raid on Libya on 15 April 1986 as a consequence of alleged Libyan involvement in an attack on US servicemen in West Berlin.

[126] See e.g. Brownlie, Use of Force, pp. 289 ff.

[127] See M. Whiteman, Digest of International Law, Washington, 1968, vol. V, p. 475. See also R. B. Lillich, 'Forcible Self-Help to Protect Human Rights', 53 Iowa Law Review, 1967, p. 325.

[128] Paust, 'Seizure and Recovery'. See also DUSPIL, 1975, pp. 777–83.

[129] See e.g. Akehurst, 'Use of Force'; Green, 'Rescue at Entebbe', and Shaw, 'Legal Aspects'.

[130] See e.g. S/PV.1939, pp. 51–5; S/PV.1940, p. 48 and S/PV.1941, p. 31.

[131] See e.g. S/PV.1943, pp. 47–50 and S/PV.1941, pp. 4–10, 57–61 and 67–72. Note that Egypt attempted without success a similar operation in Cyprus in 1978: see Keesing's Contemporary Archives, p. 29305. In 1980, the US attempted to rescue its nationals held hostage in Iran but failed: see S/13908 and the Iranian Hostages case, ICJ Reports, 1980, pp. 3, 43; 61 ILR, pp. 530, 569.

[132] See the statement of Deputy Secretary of State Dam, 78 AJIL, 1984, p. 200. See also W. Gilmore, The Grenada Intervention, London, 1984, and below, p. 1151.

[133] See the statements by the US President and the Department of State, 84 AJIL, 1990, p. 545.

[134] In the case of Grenada, it was alleged that some American students were under threat: see Gilmore, Grenada, pp. 55–64. In the Panama episode one American had been killed and several harassed: see V. Nanda, 'The Validity of United States Intervention in Panama Under International Law', 84 AJIL, 1990, pp. 494, 497.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

This was justified by the US as an act of self-defence.[135] On 26 June 1993, the US launched missiles at the headquarters of the Iraqi military intelligence in Baghdad as a consequence of an alleged Iraqi plot to assassinate former US President Bush in Kuwait. It was argued that the resort to force was justified as a means of protecting US nationals in the future.[136] It is difficult to extract from the contradictory views expressed in these incidents the apposite legal principles. While some states affirm the existence of a rule permitting the use of force in self-defence to protect nationals abroad, others deny that such a principle operates in international law. There are states whose views are not fully formed or coherent on this issue. The UK Foreign Minister concluded on 28 June 1993 that:[137]

> Force may be used in self-defence against threats to one's nationals if: (a) there is good evidence that the target attacked would otherwise continue to be used by the other state in support of terrorist attacks against one's nationals; (b) there is, effectively, no other way to forestall imminent further attacks on one's nationals; (c) the force employed is proportionate to the threat.

On balance, and considering the opposing principles of saving the threatened lives of nationals and the preservation of the territorial integrity of states, it would seem preferable to accept the validity of the rule in carefully restricted situations consistent with the conditions laid down in the Caroline case.[138] Whether force may be used to protect property abroad is less controversial. It is universally accepted today that it is not lawful to have resort to force merely to save material possessions abroad.

Conclusions

Despite controversy and disagreement over the scope of the right of self-defence, there is an indisputable core and that is the competence of states

[135] See President Reagan's statement, The Times, 16 April 1986, p. 6. The UK government supported this: see The Times, 17 April 1986, p. 4. However, there are problems with regard to proportionality in view of the injuries and damage apparently caused in the air raid. One US serviceman was killed in the West Berlin action. The role of the UK in consenting to the use of British bases for the purposes of the raid is also raised. See also UKMIL, 57 BYIL, 1986, pp. 639–42 and 80 AJIL, 1986, pp. 632–6, and C. J. Greenwood, 'International Law and the United States' Air Operation Against Libya', 89 West Virginia Law Review, 1987, p. 933.

[136] See Security Council Debates S/PV. 3245, 1993, and UKMIL, 64 BYIL, 1993, pp. 731 ff. See also D. Kritsiotis, 'The Legality of the 1993 US Missile Strike on Iraq and the Right of Self-Defence in International Law', 45 ICLQ, 1996, p. 162.

[137] 227 HC Deb., col. 658; 64 BYIL, 1993, p. 732.

[138] See above, p. 1131.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

to resort to force in order to repel an attack. A clear example of this was provided in the Falklands conflict. Whatever doubts may be entertained about the precise roots of British title to the islands, it is very clear that after the Argentinian invasion of the territory, the UK possessed in law the right to act to restore the status quo ante and remove the Argentinian troops.[139] Security Council resolution 502 (1982), in calling for an immediate withdrawal of Argentinian forces and determining that a breach of the peace existed, reinforced this. It should also be noted that it is accepted that a state is entitled to rely upon the right of self-defence even while its possession of the territory in question is the subject of controversy.[140]

Collective self-defence[141]

Historically the right of states to take up arms to defend themselves from external force is well established as a rule of customary international law. Article 51, however, also refers to 'the inherent right of . . . collective self-defence' and the question therefore arises as to how far one state may resort to force in the defence of another. The idea of collective self-defence, however, is rather ambiguous. It may be regarded merely as a pooling of a number of individual rights of self-defence within the framework of a particular treaty or institution, as some writers have suggested,[142] or it may form the basis of comprehensive regional security systems. If the former were the case, it might lead to legal difficulties should Iceland resort to force in defence of Turkish interests, since actions against Turkey would in no way justify an armed reaction by Iceland pursuant to its individual right of self-defence.

In fact, state practice has adopted the second approach. Organisations such as NATO and the Warsaw Pact were established after the Second World War, specifically based upon the right of collective self-defence under article 51. By such agreements, an attack upon one party is treated as an attack upon all,[143] thus necessitating the conclusion that collective

[139] See above, chapter 10, p. 532.
[140] See e.g. Brownlie, Use of Force, pp. 382–3. See also above, p. 1128.
[141] See e.g. Dinstein, War, chapter 9, and Gray, Use of Force, chapter 5.
[142] See e.g. Bowett, Self-Defence, p. 245, cf. Goodrich, Hambro and Simons, Charter, p. 348. See also Brownlie, Use of Force, pp. 328–9.
[143] See e.g. article 5 of the NATO Treaty, 1949.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

self-defence is something more than a collection of individual rights of self-defence, but another creature altogether.[144]

This approach finds support in the Nicaragua case.[145] The Court stressed that the right to collective self-defence was established in customary law but added that the exercise of that right depended upon both a prior declaration by the state concerned that it was the victim of an armed attack and a request by the victim state for assistance. In addition, the Court emphasised that 'for one state to use force against another, on the ground that that state has committed a wrongful act of force against a third state, is regarded as lawful, by way of exception, only when the wrongful act provoking the response was an armed attack'.[146]

The invasion of Kuwait by Iraq on 2 August 1990 raised the issue of collective self-defence in the context of the response of the states allied in the coalition to end that conquest and occupation. The Kuwaiti government in exile appealed for assistance from other states.[147] Although the armed action from 16 January 1991 was taken pursuant to UN Security Council resolutions,[148] it is indeed arguable that the right to collective self-defence is also relevant in this context.[149]

Intervention[150]

The principle of non-intervention is part of customary international law and founded upon the concept of respect for the territorial sovereignty

[144] Note article 52 of the UN Charter, which recognises the existence of regional arrangements and agencies, dealing with such matters relating to international peace and security as are appropriate for regional action, provided they are consistent with the purposes and principles of the UN: see further below, chapter 22, p. 1273.

[145] ICJ Reports, 1986, pp. 14, 103–5; 76 ILR, pp. 349, 437.

[146] ICJ Reports, 1986, p. 110. See also ibid., p. 127; 76 ILR, pp. 444 and 461. This was reaffirmed in the Oil Platforms (Iran v. USA) case, ICJ Reports, 2003, pp. 161, 186; 130 ILR, pp. 323, 346.

[147] See Keesing's Record of World Events, pp. 37631 ff. (1990).

[148] See below, chapter 22, p. 1253.

[149] Note that Security Council resolution 661 (1990) specifically referred in its preamble to 'the inherent right of individual or collective self-defence, in response to the armed attack by Iraq against Kuwait'. See also the Barcelona Traction case, ICJ Reports, 1970, pp. 3, 32; 46 ILR, pp. 178, 206.

[150] See e.g. Gray, Use of Force, chapter 3; Nguyen Quoc Dinh et al., Droit International Public, p. 947; T. Komarknicki, 'L'Intervention en Droit International Moderne', 62 RGDIP, 1956, p. 521; T. Farer, 'The Regulation of Foreign Armed Intervention in Civil Armed Conflict', 142 HR, 1974 II, p. 291, and J. E. S. Fawcett, 'Intervention in International Law', 103 HR, 1961 II, p. 347.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

of states.[151] Intervention is prohibited where it bears upon matters in which each state is permitted to decide freely by virtue of the principle of state sovereignty. This includes, as the International Court of Justice noted in the Nicaragua case,[152] the choice of political, economic, social and cultural systems and the formulation of foreign policy. Intervention becomes wrongful when it uses methods of coercion in regard to such choices, which must be free ones.[153] There was 'no general right of intervention in support of an opposition within another state' in international law. In addition, acts constituting a breach of the customary principle of non-intervention will also, if they directly or indirectly involve the use of force, constitute a breach of the principle of the non-use of force in international relations.[154] The principle of respect for the sovereignty of states was another principle closely allied to the principles of the prohibition of the use of force and of non-intervention.[155]

Civil wars[156]

International law treats civil wars as purely internal matters, with the possible exception of self-determination conflicts.[157] Article 2(4) of the UN

[151] See the Corfu Channel case, ICJ Reports, 1949, pp. 4, 35; 16 AD, pp. 155, 167 and the Nicaragua case, ICJ Reports, 1986, pp. 14, 106; 76 ILR, pp. 349, 440. See also the Declaration on the Inadmissibility of Intervention in the Domestic Affairs of States, 1965 and the Declaration on the Principles of International Law, 1970, above, p. 1127.

[152] ICJ Reports, 1986, pp. 14, 108; 76 ILR, p. 442. See also S. McCaffrey, 'The Forty-First Session of the International Law Commission', 83 AJIL, 1989, p. 937.

[153] ICJ Reports, 1986, p. 108. [154] ICJ Reports, 1986, pp. 109–10; 76 ILR, p. 443.

[155] ICJ Reports, 1986, p. 111; 76 ILR, p. 445.

[156] See e.g. Gray, Use of Force, pp. 60 ff.; Law and Civil War in the Modern World (ed. J. N. Moore), Princeton, 1974; The International Regulation of Civil Wars (ed. E. Luard), Oxford, 1972; The International Law of Civil Wars (ed. R. A. Falk), Princeton, 1971; T. Fraser, 'The Regulation of Foreign Intervention in Civil Armed Conflict', 142 HR, 1974, p. 291, and W. Friedmann, 'Intervention, Civil War and the Rule of International Law', PASIL, 1965, p. 67. See also R. Higgins, 'Intervention and International Law' in Bull, Intervention in World Politics, p. 29; C. C. Joyner and B. Grimaldi, 'The United States and Nicaragua: Reflections on the Lawfulness of Contemporary Intervention', 25 Va. JIL, 1985, p. 621, and Schachter, International Law, pp. 158 ff.

[157] Note that the Declaration on Principles of International Law concerning Friendly Relations, 1970 emphasised that all states were under a duty to refrain from any forcible action which deprives people of their right to self-determination and that 'in their actions against, and resistance to, such forcible action' such peoples could receive support in accordance with the purpose and principles of the UN Charter. Article 7 of the Consensus Definition of Aggression in 1974 referred ambiguously to the right of peoples entitled to but forcibly deprived of the right to self-determination, 'to struggle to that end and to seek and receive support, in accordance with the principles of the Charter and in conformity' with the 1970

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

Charter prohibits the threat or use of force in international relations, not in domestic situations. There is no rule against rebellion in international law. It is within the domestic jurisdiction of states and is left to be dealt with by internal law. Should the rebellion succeed, the resulting situation would be dealt with primarily in the context of recognition. As far as third parties are concerned, traditional international law developed the categories of rebellion, insurgency and belligerency.

Once a state has defined its attitude and characterised the situation, different international legal provisions would apply. If the rebels are regarded as criminals, the matter is purely within the hands of the authorities of the country concerned and no other state may legitimately interfere. If the rebels are treated as insurgents, then other states may or may not agree to grant them certain rights. It is at the discretion of the other states concerned, since an intermediate status is involved. The rebels are not mere criminals, but they are not recognised belligerents. Accordingly, the other states are at liberty to define their legal relationship with them. Insurgency is a purely provisional classification and would arise, for example, where a state needed to protect nationals or property in an area under the de facto control of the rebels.[158] On the other hand, belligerency is a formal status involving rights and duties. In the eyes of classical international law, other states may accord recognition of belligerency to rebels when certain conditions have been fulfilled. These were defined as the existence of an armed conflict of a general nature within a state, the occupation by the rebels of a substantial portion of the national territory, the conduct of hostilities in accordance with the rules of war and by organised groups operating under a responsible authority and the existence of circumstances rendering it necessary for the states contemplating recognition to define their attitude Declaration. Article 1(4) of Additional Protocol I to the Geneva 'Red Cross' Conventions of 1949, adopted in 1977, provided that international armed conflict situations 'include armed conflicts in which peoples are fighting against colonial domination and alien occupation and against racist regimes in the exercise of their right to self-determination' as enshrined in the Charter of the UN and the 1970 Declaration. Whether this means that articles 2(4) and 51 of the Charter now apply to self-determination conflicts so that the peoples in question have a valid right to use force in self-defence is controversial and difficult to maintain. However, the use of force to suppress self-determination is now clearly unacceptable, as is help by third parties given to that end, but the provision of armed assistance to peoples seeking self-determination would appear to remain unlawful: see Gray, Use of Force, pp. 52 ff.; A. Cassese, Self-Determination of Peoples, Cambridge, 1995, p. 193; and H. Wilson, International Law and the Use of Force by National Liberation Movements, Oxford, 1988. See as to the principle of self-determination, above, chapter 5, p. 251.

[158] See e.g. H. Lauterpacht, Recognition in International Law, Cambridge, 1947, pp. 275 ff.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

to the situation.[159] This would arise, for example, where the parties to the conflict are exercising belligerent rights on the high seas. Other maritime countries would feel compelled to decide upon the respective status of the warring sides, since the recognition of belligerency entails certain international legal consequences. Once the rebels have been accepted by other states as belligerents they become subjects of international law and responsible in international law for all their acts. In addition, the rules governing the conduct of hostilities become applicable to both sides, so that, for example, the recognising states must then adopt a position of neutrality.

However, these concepts of insurgency and belligerency are lacking in clarity and are extremely subjective. The absence of clear criteria, particularly with regard to the concept of insurgency, has led to a great deal of confusion. The issue is of importance since the majority of conflicts in the years since the conclusion of the Second World War have been in essence civil wars. The reasons for this are many and complex and ideological rivalry and decolonisation within colonially imposed boundaries are amongst them.[160] Intervention may be justified on a number of grounds, including response to earlier involvement by a third party. For instance, the USSR and Cuba justified their activities in the Angolan civil war of 1975–6 by reference to the prior South African intervention,[161] while the United States argued that its aid to South Vietnam grew in proportion to the involvement of North Vietnamese forces in the conflict.[162]

The international law rules dealing with civil wars depend upon the categorisation by third states of the relative status of the two sides to the conflict. In traditional terms, an insurgency means that the recognising state may, if it wishes, create legal rights and duties as between itself and the insurgents, while recognition of belligerency involves an acceptance of a position of neutrality (although there are some exceptions to this rule) by the recognising states. But in practice, states very rarely make an express acknowledgement as to the status of the parties to the conflict, precisely in order to retain as wide a room for manoeuvre as possible. This means that the relevant legal rules cannot really operate as intended [159] See e.g. N. Mugerwa, 'Subjects of International Law' in Sørensen, Manual of Public International Law, pp. 247, 286–8. See also R. Higgins, 'International Law and Civil Conflict' in Luard, International Regulation of Civil Wars, pp. 169, 170–1.

[160] See e.g. M. N. Shaw, Title to Territory in Africa: International Legal Issues, Oxford, 1986.

[161] See e.g. C. Legum and T. Hodges, After Angola, London, 1976.

[162] See e.g. Law and the Indo-China War (ed. J. N. Moore), Charlottesville, 1972. See also The Vietnam War and International Law (ed. R. A. Falk), Princeton, 4 vols., 1968–76.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

in classical law and that it becomes extremely difficult to decide whether a particular intervention is justified or not.[163]

Aid to the authorities of a state[164]

It would appear that in general outside aid to the government authorities to repress a revolt[165] is perfectly legitimate,[166] provided, of course, it was requested by the government. The problem of defining the governmental authority entitled to request assistance was raised in the Grenada episode. In that situation, the appeal for the US intervention was allegedly made by the Governor-General of the island,[167] but controversy exists as to whether this in fact did take place prior to the invasion and whether the Governor-General was the requisite authority to issue such an appeal.[168] The issue resurfaced in a rather different form regarding the Panama invasion of December 1989. One of the legal principles identified by the US Department of State as the basis for the US action was that of assistance to the 'lawful and democratically elected government in Panama'.[169] The problem with this was that this particular government had been prevented by General Noriega from actually taking office and the issue raised was therefore whether an elected head of state who is prevented from ever acting as such may be regarded as a governmental authority capable of requesting assistance including armed force from another state. This in fact runs counter to the test of acceptance in international law of governmental authority, which is firmly based upon effective control rather than upon the nature of the regime, whether democratic, socialist or otherwise.[170]

[163] But see below, chapter 22, p. 1257, with regard to the increasing involvement of the UN in internal conflicts and the increasing tendency to classify such conflicts as possessing an international dimension.

[164] See e.g. L. Doswald-Beck, 'The Legal Validity of Military Intervention by Invitation of the Government', 56 BYIL, 1985, p. 189, and Gray, Use of Force, pp. 68 ff.

[165] See Nicaragua v. USA, ICJ Reports, 1986, pp. 14, 126, where the Court noted that intervention is 'already allowable at the request of the government of a state'; however, apparently not where the recipient state is forcibly suppressing the right to self-determination of a people entitled to such rights: see above, p. 1148, note 157.

[166] Until a recognition of belligerency, of course, although this has been unknown in modern times: see e.g. Lauterpacht, Recognition, pp. 230–3.

[167] See the statement by Deputy Secretary of State Dam, 78 AJIL, 1984, p. 200.

[168] See e.g. J. N. Moore, Law and the Grenada Mission, Charlottesville, 1984, and Gilmore, Grenada. See also Higgins, Development of International Law, pp. 162–4 regarding the Congo crisis of 1960, where that state's President and Prime Minister sought to dismiss each other.

[169] 84 AJIL, 1990, p. 547.

[170] See above, chapter 9, p. 454.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

The general proposition, however, that aid to recognised governmental authorities is legitimate,[171] would be further reinforced where it could be shown that other states were encouraging or directing the subversive operations of the rebels. In such cases, it appears that the doctrine of collective self-defence would allow other states to intervene openly and lawfully on the side of the government authorities.[172] Some writers have suggested that the traditional rule of permitting third-party assistance to governments would not extend to aid where the outcome of the struggle has become uncertain or where the rebellion has become widespread and seriously aimed at overthrowing the government.[173] While this may be politically desirable for the third state, it may put at serious risk entirely deserving governments.[174] Practice, however, does suggest that many forms of aid, such as economic, technical and arms provision arrangements, to existing governments faced with civil strife, are acceptable.[175] There is an argument, on the other hand, for suggesting that substantial assistance to a government clearly in the throes of collapse might be questionable as intervention in a domestic situation that is on the point of resolution, but there are considerable definitional problems here.

Aid to rebels[176]

The reverse side of the proposition is that aid to rebels is contrary to international law. The 1970 Declaration on Principles of International Law emphasised that:

[171] Note that article 20 of the International Law Commission's Articles on State Responsibility, 2001, provides that 'Valid consent by a State to the commission of a given act by another State precludes the wrongfulness of that act in relation to the former State to the extent that the act remains within the limits of that consent.'

[172] But in the light of the principles propounded in the Nicaragua case, ICJ Reports, 1986, pp. 104, 120–3; 76 ILR, pp. 349, 438, 454–7.

[173] See e.g. Q. Wright, 'US Intervention in the Lebanon', 53 AJIL, 1959, pp. 112, 122. See also R. A. Falk, Legal Order in a Violent World, Princeton, 1968, pp. 227–8 and 273, and Doswald-Beck, 'Legal Validity', p. 251.

[174] However, where consent to the presence of foreign troops has been withdrawn by the government of the state concerned, the continuing presence of those troops may constitute (in the absence of any legitimate exercise of the right of self-defence) an unlawful use of force: see e.g. Democratic Republic of the Congo v. Uganda, ICJ Reports, 2005, pp. 168, 213 and 224. See also article 3(e) of the Consensus Definition of Aggression, 1974.

[175] See, with regard to the UK continuance of arms sales to Nigeria during its civil war, Higgins, 'International Law and Civil Conflict', p. 173. Note also the US policy of distinguishing between traditional suppliers of arms and non-traditional suppliers of arms in such circumstances. It would support aid provided by the former (as the UK in Nigeria), but not the latter: see DUSPIL, 1976, p. 7.

[176] See e.g. Gray, Use of Force, pp. 87 ff.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

> [n]o state shall organise, assist, foment, finance, incite or tolerate subversive, terrorist or armed activities directed towards the violent overthrow of the regime of another state, or interfere in civil strife in another state.[177]

The Declaration also provided that:

> [e]very state shall refrain from any action aimed at the partial or total disruption of the national unity and territorial integrity of any other state or country.

In the Nicaragua case,[178] the Court declared that the principle of non-intervention prohibits a state 'to intervene, directly or indirectly, with or without armed force, in support of an internal opposition in another state' and went on to say that acts which breach the principle of non-intervention 'will also, if they directly or indirectly involve the use of force, constitute a breach of the principle of the non-use of force in international relations'. Further, the Court emphasised in Democratic Republic of the Congo v. Uganda[179] that where such an unlawful military intervention reaches a certain magnitude and duration, it would amount to 'a grave violation of the prohibition on the use of force expressed in article 2, paragraph 4, of the Charter'.

In reality, state practice is far from clear.[180] Where a prior, illegal intervention on the government side has occurred, it may be argued that aid to the rebels is acceptable. This was argued by a number of states with regard to the Afghanistan situation, where it was argued that the Soviet intervention in that state amounted to an invasion.[181]

[177] See also in similar terms the Declaration on the Inadmissibility of Intervention in the Domestic Affairs of States, 1965, above, p. 1126. Article 3(g) of the General Assembly's Consensus Definition of Aggression, 1974, characterises as an act of aggression 'the sending by or on behalf of a state of armed bands, groups, irregulars or mercenaries, which carry out acts of armed force against another state'. See also, with regard to US aid to the Nicaraguan 'Contras', Chayes, Cuban Missile Crisis, and the Nicaragua case, ICJ Reports, 1986, p. 14; 76 ILR, p. 349.

[178] ICJ Reports, 1986, pp. 14, 108 and 109–10. These propositions were reaffirmed by the Court in Democratic Republic of the Congo v. Uganda, ICJ Reports, 2005, pp. 168, 227.

[179] ICJ Reports, 2005, p. 168.

[180] See e.g. Syrian intervention in the Jordanian civil war of 1970 and in the Lebanon in 1976 and see Gray, Use of Force, pp. 85 ff.

[181] See e.g. Keesing's Contemporary Archives, pp. 30339, 30364 and 30385. See also General Assembly resolutions ES–62; 35/37; 36/34; 37/37 and 38/29 condemning the USSR for its armed intervention in Afghanistan. See also Doswald-Beck, 'Legal Validity', pp. 230 ff.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

The situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo

The situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo in 1999 and after, with intervention against the government by Uganda and Rwanda (seeking initially to act against rebel movements operating against them from Congolese territory and then assisting rebels against the Congo government) and on behalf of the government by a number of states, including Zimbabwe, Angola and Namibia, is instructive.[182] In resolution 1234 (1999), the Security Council recalled the inherent right of individual and collective self-defence in accordance with article 51 and reaffirmed the need for all states to refrain from interfering in the internal affairs of other states. It called upon states to bring to an end the presence of uninvited forces of foreign states.[183] The Council in resolution 1291 (1999) called for the orderly withdrawal of all foreign forces from the Congo in accordance with the Lusaka Ceasefire Agreement.[184] Security Council resolution 1304 (2000) went further and, acting under Chapter VII, demanded that 'Uganda and Rwanda, which have violated the sovereignty and territorial integrity of the Democratic Republic of the Congo, withdraw all their forces from the territory of the Democratic Republic of the Congo without delay'. An end to all other foreign military presence and activity was also called for in conformity with the provisions of the Lusaka Agreement.[185] The UN also established a mission in the Congo (MONUC) in 1999, whose mandate was subsequently extended.[186] The situation demonstrates the UN approach, reflecting international law, to the effect that while aid by foreign states to the government was acceptable,[187] aid to rebels by foreign states was not. Side by side with this, the UN did recognise the problem posed by foreign militias based in the eastern region of the Democratic Republic of the Congo (particularly the Rwanda

[182] See Gray, Use of Force, pp. 60–4, 70–1, 247–50 and 258–9. See also P. N. Okowa, 'Congo's War: The Legal Dimension of a Protracted Conflict', 77 BYIL, 2006, p. 203.

[183] Gray, Use of Force, pp. 61–2, noting that the Security Council took a clear position that aid to the government was permissible, while intervention or force to overthrow the government was not. The Democratic Republic of the Congo had written to the Security Council accusing Rwanda and Uganda of aggression and justifying its invitation to Angola, Namibia and Zimbabwe as a response to foreign intervention: see UN Yearbook, 1998, pp. 82–8 and S/1998/827.

[184] See S/1999/815.

[185] See also Security Council resolutions 1341 (2001) and 1355 (2001). Security Council resolution 1376 (2001) welcomed the withdrawal of some forces, including the full Namibian contingent, from the Congo. See also resolutions 1417 (2002), 1457 (2003) and 1468 (2003). Essentially condemnation was reserved by name for Rwanda and Uganda.

[186] See further below, chapter 22, p. 1264.

[187] See Okowa, 'Congo', p. 224.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

Interahamwe who had been involved in the 1994 genocide and the Ugandan Lord's Resistance Army) and called for them to be disarmed.[188]

Humanitarian intervention[189]

This section concerns the question as to whether there can be said to be a right of humanitarian intervention by individual states. The issue of intervention by the UN in situations of humanitarian need and as a consequence of Security Council action is covered in the next chapter.

It has sometimes been argued that intervention in order to protect the lives of persons situated within a particular state and not necessarily nationals of the intervening state is permissible in strictly defined situations. This has some support in pre-Charter law and it may very well have been the case that in the nineteenth century such intervention was accepted under international law.[190] However, it is difficult to reconcile today with article 2(4) of the Charter[191] unless one either adopts a rather artificial

[188] See e.g. Security Council resolutions 1756 (2007) and 1794 (2007).

[189] See e.g. Gray, Use of Force, pp. 31 ff.; Dinstein, War, pp. 70 ff.; Franck, Recourse, chapter 9; Byers, War Law, Part Three; N. J. Wheeler, Saving Strangers: Humanitarian Intervention in International Society, Oxford, 2002; R. Goodman, 'Humanitarian Intervention and Pretexts for War', 100 AJIL, 2006, p. 107; D. Kennedy, The Dark Sides of Virtue, Princeton, 2004; Humanitarian Intervention (eds. J. L. Holzgrefe and R. O. Keohane), Cambridge, 2003; S. Chesterman, Just War or Just Peace: Humanitarian Intervention and International Law, Oxford, 2001; Humanitarian Intervention and the United Nations (ed. R. B. Lillich), Charlottesville, 1973; R. B. Lillich, 'Forcible Self-Help by States to Protect Human Rights', 53 Iowa Law Review, 1967, p. 325, and Lillich, 'Intervention to Protect Human Rights', 15 McGill Law Journal, 1969, p. 205, and Lillich, 'Humanitarian Intervention Through the United Nations: Towards the Development of Criteria', 53 ZaöRV, 1993, p. 557; T. M. Franck and N. S. Rodley, 'After Bangladesh: The Law of Humanitarian Intervention by Military Force', 67 AJIL, 1973, p. 275; J. P. Fonteyne, 'The Customary International Law Doctrine of Humanitarian Intervention', 4 California Western International Law Journal, 1974, p. 203; Chilstrom, 'Humanitarian Intervention under Contemporary International Law', 1 Yale Studies in World Public Order, 1974, p. 93; N. D. Arnison, 'The Law of Humanitarian Intervention' in Refugees in the 1990s: New Strategies for a Restless World (ed. H. Cleveland), 1993, p. 37; D. J. Scheffer, 'Towards a Modern Doctrine of Humanitarian Intervention', 23 University of Toledo Law Review, 1992, p. 253; D. Kritsiotis, 'Reappraising Policy Objections to Humanitarian Intervention', 19 Michigan Journal of International Law, 1998, p. 1005; N. Tsagourias, The Theory and Praxis of Humanitarian Intervention, Manchester, 1999, and F. Tesón, Humanitarian Intervention: An Inquiry into Law and Morality, 2nd edn, New York, 1997.

[190] See e.g. H. Ganji, International Protection of Human Rights, New York, 1962, chapter 1 and references cited in previous footnote.

[191] See, in particular, I. Brownlie, 'Humanitarian Intervention', in Moore, Law and Civil War, p. 217.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

definition of the 'territorial integrity' criterion in order to permit temporary violations or posits the establishment of the right in customary law. Practice has also been in general unfavourable to the concept, primarily because it might be used to justify interventions by more forceful states into the territories of weaker states.[192] Nevertheless, it is not inconceivable that in some situations the international community might refrain from adopting a condemnatory stand where large numbers of lives have been saved in circumstances of gross oppression by a state of its citizens due to an outside intervention. In addition, it is possible that such a right might evolve in cases of extreme humanitarian need. One argument used to justify the use of Western troops to secure a safe haven in northern Iraq after the Gulf War was that it was taken in pursuance of the customary international law principle of humanitarian intervention in an extreme situation. Security Council resolution 688 (1991) condemned the widespread repression by Iraq of its Kurd and Shia populations and, citing this, the US, UK and France proclaimed 'no-fly zones' in the north and south of the country.[193] There was no express authorisation from the UN. It was argued by the UK that the no-fly zones were 'justified under international law in response to a situation of overwhelming humanitarian necessity'.[194]

The Kosovo crisis of 1999 raised squarely the issue of humanitarian intervention.[195] The justification for the NATO bombing campaign, acting out of area and without UN authorisation, in support of the repressed ethnic Albanian population of that province of Yugoslavia, was that of humanitarian necessity. The UK Secretary of State for Defence stated that, [192] See e.g. M. B. Akehurst, 'Humanitarian Intervention' in Bull, Intervention in World Politics, p. 95.

[193] See the views expressed by a Foreign Office legal advisor to the House of Commons Foreign Affairs Committee, UKMIL, 63 BYIL, 1992, pp. 827–8. This is to be compared with the views of the Foreign Office several years earlier where it was stated that the best case that could be made was that it was not 'unambiguously illegal': see UKMIL, 57 BYIL, 1986, p. 619. See also Gray, Use of Force, pp. 33 ff., and below, chapter 22, p. 1254.

[194] UKMIL, 70 BYIL, 1999, p. 590. See also UKMIL, 75 BYIL, 2004, p. 857.

[195] See e.g. Gray, Use of Force, pp. 37 ff.; N. S. Rodley and B. Çali, 'Kosovo Revisited: Humanitarian Intervention on the Fault Lines of International Law', 7 Human Rights Law Review, 2007, p. 275; B. Simma, 'NATO, the UN and the Use of Force: Legal Aspects', 10 EJIL, 1999, p. 1; Kofi A. Annan, The Question of Intervention: Statements by the Secretary-General, New York, 1999; 'NATO's Kosovo Intervention', various writers, 93 AJIL, 1999, pp. 824–62; D. Kritsiotis, 'The Kosovo Crisis and NATO's Application of Armed Force Against the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia', 49 ICLQ, 2000, p. 330; P. Hilpod, 'Humanitarian Intervention: Is There a Need for a Legal Reappraisal?', 12 EJIL, 2001, p. 437, and 'Kosovo: House of Commons Foreign Affairs Committee 4th Report, June 2000', various memoranda, 49 ICLQ, 2000, pp. 876–943.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

'In international law, in exceptional circumstances and to avoid a humanitarian catastrophe, military action can be taken and it is on that legal basis that military action was taken.'[196] The Security Council by twelve votes to three rejected a resolution condemning NATO's use of force.[197] After the conflict, and after an agreement had been reached between NATO and Yugoslavia,[198] the Council adopted resolution 1244 (1999) which welcomed the withdrawal of Yugoslav forces from the territory and decided upon the deployment under UN auspices of international civil and military presences. Member states and international organisations were, in particular, authorised to establish the international security presence and the resolution laid down the main responsibilities of the civil presence. There was no formal endorsement of the NATO action, but no condemnation.[199] It can be concluded that the doctrine of humanitarian intervention in a crisis situation was invoked and not condemned by the UN, but it received meagre support.[200] It is not possible to characterise the legal situation as going beyond this.[201]

[196] UKMIL, 70 BYIL, 1999, p. 586. A Foreign Office Minister wrote that, 'a limited use of force was justifiable in support of the purposes laid down by the Security Council but without the Council's express authorisation when that was the only means to avert an immediate and overwhelming humanitarian catastrophe', ibid., p. 587 and see also ibid., p. 598. The UK Prime Minister wrote to Parliament in 2004 stating that force may be used by states 'In exceptional circumstances, when it is the only way to avert an overwhelming humanitarian catastrophe, as in Kosovo in 1999', HC Deb., 22 March 2004, vol. 419, col. 561W–562W, UKMIL, 75 BYIL, 2004, p. 853.

[197] SCOR, 3989th meeting, 26 March 1999.

[198] See 38 ILM, 1999, p. 1217.

[199] Note that Yugoslavia made an application in April 1999 to the International Court against ten of the nineteen NATO states, alleging that these states, by participating in the use of force, had violated international law. The Court rejected the application made for provisional measures in all ten cases: see e.g. Yugoslavia v. Belgium, ICJ Reports, 1999, p. 124, and upheld preliminary objections as to jurisdiction and admissibility: see e.g. Serbia and Montenegro v. UK, ICJ Reports, 2004, p. 1307.

[200] See also the Nicaragua case, ICJ Reports, 1986, pp. 14, 134–5; 76 ILR, p. 349, where the Court stated that the use of force could not be the appropriate method to monitor or ensure respect for human rights in Nicaragua.

[201] Note that the UK produced a set of Policy Guidelines on Humanitarian Crises in 2001. This provided inter alia that the Security Council should authorise action to halt or avert massive violations of humanitarian law and that, in response to such crises, force may be used in the face of overwhelming and immediate humanitarian catastrophe when the government cannot or will not avert it, when all non-violent methods have been exhausted, the scale of real or potential suffering justifies the risks of military action, if there is a clear objective to avert or end the catastrophe, there is clear evidence that such action would be welcomed by the people at risk and that the consequences for suffering of non-action would be worse than those of intervention. Further, the use of force should be collective, limited in scope and proportionate to achieving the humanitarian objective and consistent with international humanitarian law, UKMIL, 72 BYIL, 2001, p. 696.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

One variant of the principle of humanitarian intervention is the contention that intervention in order to restore democracy is permitted as such under international law.[202] One of the grounds given for the US intervention in Panama in December 1989 was the restoration of democracy,[203] but apart from the problems of defining democracy, such a proposition is not acceptable in international law in view of the clear provisions of the UN Charter. Nor is there anything to suggest that even if the principle of self-determination could be interpreted as applying beyond the strict colonial context[204] to cover 'democracy', it could constitute a norm superior to that of non-intervention.

More recently, there has been extensive consideration of the 'responsibility to protect' as a composite concept comprising the responsibilities to prevent catastrophic situations, to react immediately when they do occur and to rebuild afterwards.[205] Such an approach may be seen as an effort to redefine the principle of humanitarian intervention in a way that seeks to minimise the motives of the intervening powers and there is no doubt that it reflects an important trend in international society and one that is influential, particularly in the context of UN action. Such responsibilities are deemed to fall both upon states and the international community and notably include the commitment to reconstruction after intervention or initial involvement. As they have been broadly and flexibily proposed, emphasising, for example, the obligation of states to protect human rights on their territory and the primary focus upon the UN with regard to any military action, the sharp edges of the humanitarian intervention doctrine have been blunted, but it remains to be seen how influential this approach may be.[206]

[202] See e.g. J. Crawford, 'Democracy and International Law', 44 BYIL, 1993, p. 113; B. R. Roth, Governmental Illegitimacy in International Law, Oxford, 1999; Franck, Fairness, chapter 4, and Franck, The Empowered Self, Oxford, 1999; Gray, Use of Force, pp. 49 ff., and O. Schachter, 'The Legality of Pro-Democratic Invasion', 78 AJIL, 1984, p. 645.

[203] See e.g. Keesing's Record of World Events, p. 37112 (1989). See also Nanda, 'Validity', p. 498.

[204] See above, chapter 6, p. 289.

[205] See e.g. International Commission on Intervention and State Sovereignty, The Responsibility to Protect, Ottawa, 2001; Report of the UN High Level Panel on Threats, Challenges and Change, A/59/565, 2004, at paras. 201–3; UN Secretary-General, In Larger Freedom, A/59/2005, paras. 16–22; World Summit Outcome, General Assembly resolution 60/1, 2005, paras. 138–9, and C. Stahn, 'Responsibility to Protect: Political Rhetoric or Emerging Legal Norm?', 101 AJIL, 2007, p. 99.

[206] It should also be emphasised that the documents cited in the previous footnote are ambiguous as to the right of individual states to intervene by force in the territory of other states.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

Terrorism and international law[207]

The use of terror as a means to achieve political ends is not a new phenomenon, but it has recently acquired a new intensity. In many cases, terrorists deliberately choose targets in uninvolved third states as a means of pressurising the government of the state against which it is in conflict or its real or potential or assumed allies.[208] As far as international law is concerned, there are a number of problems that can be identified. The first major concern is that of definition.[209] For example, how widely should the offence be defined, for instance should attacks against property as well as attacks upon persons be covered? And to what extent should one take into account the motives and intentions of the perpetrators? Secondly, the relationship between terrorism and the use of force by states in response is posed.[210] Thirdly, the relationship between terrorism and human rights needs to be taken into account.

Despite political difficulties, increasing progress at an international and regional level has been made to establish rules of international law with regard to terrorism. A twin-track approach has been adopted, dealing both with particular manifestations of terrorist activity and with a general condemnation of the phenomenon.[211] In so far as the first is concerned, the UN has currently adopted thirteen international conventions concerning [207] See e.g. Gray, Use of Force, pp. 135 ff.; T. Becker, Terrorism and the State, Oxford, 2006; Legal Aspects of International Terrorism (eds. A. E. Evans and J. Murphy), Lexington, 1978; R. Friedlander, Terrorism, Dobbs Ferry, 1979; R. B. Lillich and T. Paxman, 'State Responsibility for Injuries to Aliens Caused by Terrorist Activity', 26 American Law Review, 1977, p. 217; International Terrorism and Political Crimes (ed. M. C. Bassiouni), 1975; E. McWhinney, Aerial Piracy and International Terrorism, 2nd edn, Dordrecht, 1987; A. Cassese, Terrorism, Politics and Law, Cambridge, 1989; V. Lowe, '"Clear and Present Danger": Responses to Terrorism', 54 ICLQ, 2005, p. 185; G. Guillaume, 'Terrorism and International Law', 53 ICLQ, 2004, p. 537; J. Pejic, 'Terrorist Acts and Groups: A Role for International Law', 75 BYIL, 2004, p. 71; J. Delbrück, 'The Fight Against Global Terrorism', German YIL, 2001, p. 9, and A. Cassese, 'Terrorism is Also Disrupting Some Crucial Legal Categories of International Law', 95 AJIL, 2001, p. 993. See also the UN website on terrorism, www.un.org/terrorism/.

[208] The hijack of TWA Flight 847 on 14 June 1985 by Lebanese Shi'ites is one example of this phenomenon: see e.g. The Economist, 22 June 1985, p. 34.

[209] See e.g. B. Saul, Defining Terrorism in International Law, Oxford, 2006 and articles on the Quest for a Legal Definition, 4 Journal of International Criminal Justice, 2006, pp. 894 ff.

[210] See above, p. 1134.

[211] See, with regard to the failed attempt by the League of Nations in the 1937 Convention for the Prevention and Punishment of Terrorism to establish a comprehensive code, e.g. Murphy, United Nations, p. 179. See also T. M. Franck and B. Lockwood, 'Preliminary Thoughts Towards an International Convention on Terrorism', 68 AJIL, 1974, p. 69.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

terrorism, dealing with issues such as hijacking, hostages and terrorist bombings.[212] Many of these conventions operate on a common model, establishing the basis of quasi-universal jurisdiction with an interlocking network of international obligations. The model comprises a definition of the offence in question and the automatic incorporation of such offences within all extradition agreements between states parties coupled with obligations on states parties to make this offence an offence in domestic law, to establish jurisdiction over this offence (usually where committed in the territory of the state or on board a ship or aircraft registered there, or by a national of that state or on a discretionary basis in some conventions where nationals of that state have been victims) and, where the alleged offender is present in the territory, either to prosecute or to extradite to another state that will.[213]

In addition, the UN has sought to tackle the question of terrorism in a comprehensive fashion. In December 1972, the General Assembly set up an ad hoc committee on terrorism[214] and in 1994 a Declaration on Measures to Eliminate International Terrorism was adopted.[215] This condemned 'all acts, methods and practices of terrorism, as criminal and unjustifiable, wherever and by whomever committed', noting that 'criminal acts intended or calculated to provoke a state of terror in the general public, a group or person or persons or particular persons for political purposes are in any circumstance unjustifiable, whatever the considerations of a political, philosophical, ideological, racial, ethnic, religious or any other nature that may be invoked to justify them'. States are also obliged to refrain from organising, instigating, facilitating, financing or tolerating terrorist activities and to take practical measures to ensure that their territories are not used for terrorist installations, training camps or for the [212] See the Conventions on Offences Committed on Board Aircraft, 1963; for the Suppression of Unlawful Seizure of Aircraft, 1970; for the Suppression of Unlawful Acts against the Safety of Civil Aviation, 1971; on the Prevention and Punishment of Crimes against Internationally Protected Persons including Diplomatic Agents, 1973; against the Taking of Hostages, 1979; on the Physical Protection of Nuclear Material, 1980; for the Suppression of Unlawful Acts of Violence at Airports, Protocol 1988; for the Suppression of Unlawful Acts against the Safety of Maritime Navigation, 1988; for the Suppression of Unlawful Acts against the Safety of Fixed Platforms on the Continental Shelf, Protocol 1988; on the Marking of Plastic Explosives for the Purpose of Identification, 1991; for the Suppression of Terrorist Bombing, 1997; for the Suppression of the Financing of Terrorism, 1999 and for the Suppression of Acts of Nuclear Terrorism, 2005.

[213] See further above, chapter 12, p. 673.

[214] See General Assembly resolution 3034 (XXVII).

[215] General Assembly resolution 49/60.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

preparation of terrorist acts against other states. States are further obliged to apprehend and prosecute or extradite perpetrators of terrorist acts and to co-operate with other states in exchanging information and combating terrorism.[216] The Assembly has also adopted a number of resolutions calling for ratification of the various conventions and for improvement in co-operation between states in this area.[217] In September 2006, the General Assembly adopted 'The United Nations Global Counter-Terrorism Strategy',[218] comprising a Plan of Action, including condemnation of terrorism in all its forms and manifestations as it constitutes 'one of the most serious threats to international peace and security'; international co-operation; addressing the conditions conducive to the spread of terrorism; adoption of a variety of measures to prevent and combat terrorism; adoption of measures to build states' capacity to prevent and combat terrorism; and, finally, measures to ensure respect for human rights for all and the rule of law as the fundamental basis of the fight against terrorism.

An Ad Hoc Committee was established in 1996[219] to elaborate international conventions on terrorism. The Conventions for the Suppression of Terrorist Bombing, 1997 and of the Financing of Terrorism, 1999 resulted, as did a Convention for the Suppression of Acts of Nuclear Terrorism, 2005. The Committee is currently working on drafting a comprehensive convention on international terrorism.[220]

The Security Council has also been active in dealing with the terrorism threat.[221] In particular, it has characterised international terrorism as a [216] A supplementary declaration was adopted in 1996, which emphasised in addition that acts of terrorism and assisting them are contrary to the purposes and principles of the UN. The question of asylum-seekers who had committed terrorist acts was also addressed, General Assembly resolution 51/210. See also resolution 55/158, 2001 and the 2005 World Summit Outcome, resolution 60/1.

[217] See e.g. resolutions 34/145, 35/168 and 36/33.

[218] Resolution 60/288.

[219] General Assembly resolution 51/210.

[220] See e.g. A/59/37, 2004; A/60/37, 2005; A/61/37, 2006; A/62/37, 2007, and A/63/37, 2008 and General Assembly resolutions 57/27, 2003 and 62/71, 2008. See also M. Hmoud, 'Negotiating the Draft Comprehensive Convention on International Terrorism', 4 Journal of International Criminal Justice, 2006, p. 1031. Major areas of contention have focused on the definition of terrorism, the scope of the proposed convention and the relationship between the proposed convention and the conventions dealing with specific terrorist crimes, ibid.

[221] For example, in resolution 579 (1985), it condemned unequivocally all acts of hostage-taking and abduction, and see also the statement made by the President of the Security Council on behalf of members condemning the hijacking of the Achille Lauro and generally 'terrorism in all its forms, whenever and by whomever committed', 9 October 1985, S/17554, 24 ILM, 1985, p. 1656.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

threat to international peace and security. This approach has evolved. In resolution 731 (1992), the Security Council, in the context of criticism of Libya for not complying with requests for the extradition of suspected bombers of an airplane, referred to 'acts of international terrorism that constitute threats to international peace and security', and in resolution 1070 (1996) adopted with regard to Sudan it reaffirmed that 'the suppression of acts of international terrorism, including those in which states are involved, is essential for the maintenance of international peace and security'.[222]

It was, however, the 11 September 2001 attack upon the World Trade Center that moved this process onto a higher level. In resolution 1368 (2001) adopted the following day, the Council, noting that it was 'Determined to combat by all means threats to international peace and security caused by terrorist attack', unequivocally condemned the attack and declared that it regarded such attacks 'like any act of international terrorism, as a threat to international peace and security'.[223] Resolution 1373 (2001) reaffirmed this proposition and the need to combat by all means in accordance with the Charter, threats to international peace and security caused by terrorist acts.[224] Acting under Chapter VII, the Council made a series of binding decisions demanding inter alia the prevention and suppression of the financing of terrorist acts, the criminalisation of wilful provision or collection of funds for such purposes and the freezing of financial assets and economic resources of persons and entities involved in terrorism. Further, states were called upon to refrain from any support to those involved in terrorism and take action against such persons, and to co-operate with other states in preventing and suppressing terrorist acts and acting against the perpetrators. The Council also declared that acts, methods and practices of terrorism were contrary to the purposes and principles of the UN and that knowingly financing, planning and inciting terrorist acts were also contrary to the purposes and principles of the UN. Crucially, the Council established a Counter-Terrorism Committee [222] See also resolution 1189 (1998), concerning the bombings of the US Embassies in East Africa, and resolution 1269 (1999), which reaffirms many of the points made in the 1994 General Assembly Declaration.

[223] See further above, p. 1134, with regard to recognition of the right to self-defence in this context.

[224] Note also the condemnation of the terrorist bombing in Bali in October 2002: see resolution 1438 (2002); of the taking of hostages in Moscow in October 2002 referred to as a terrorist act: see resolution 1440 (2002); and of the terrorist attacks in Kenya in November 2002: see resolution 1450 (2002).

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

to monitor implementation of the resolution. States were called upon to report to the Committee on measures they had taken to implement the resolution. The Committee was also mandated to maintain a dialogue with states on the implemention of resolution 1624 (2005) on prohibiting incitement to commit terrorist acts and promoting dialogue and understanding among civilisations.

In resolution 1377 (2001), the Council, in addition to reaffirming earlier propositions, declared that acts of international terrorism 'constitute one of the most serious threats to international peace and security in the twenty-first century' and requested the Counter-Terrorism Committee to assist in the promotion of best-practice in the areas covered by resolution 1373, including the preparation of model laws as appropriate, and to examine the availability of various technical, financial, legislative and other programmes to facilitate the implementation of resolution 1373.[225] The Counter-Terrorism Committee was strengthened in 2004 by the establishment of the Executive Directorate, comprising a number of experts and administrative and support staff.[226] A further committee was established by resolution 1540 (2004) to examine the implemention of the resolution, which requires all states to establish domestic controls to prevent access by non-state actors to nuclear, chemical and biological weapons, and their means of delivery, and to take effective measures to prevent proliferation of such items and establish appropriate controls over related materials.[227]

The Counter-Terrorism Committee has now received a large number of reports, and has reviewed and responded to many of them. The Committee has since 2005 been conducting visits to member states.[228]

[225] See also resolution 1456 (2003), which inter alia called upon the Counter-Terrorism Committee to intensify its work through reviewing states' reports and facilitating international assistance and co-operation. Note the establishment of a Security Council committee (the 1267 committee) to oversee sanctions imposed upon Al-Qaida and the Taliban and associated individuals and entities, resolution 1267 (1999). In resolution 1566 (2004), the Security Council established a working group to recommend practical measures against individuals and groups engaged in terrorist activities not subject to the 1267 committee's review. See also resolution 1822 (2008).

[226] See resolution 1535 (2004). The mandate of the Executive Directorate has been extended to the end of 2010: see resolution 1805 (2008).

[227] See also resolutions 1673 (2006) and 1810 (2008), extending the mandate of the committee to April 2011.

[228] See the website of the Committee, www.un.org/sc/ctc. Note also the case of Boudellaa et al. v. Bosnia and Herzegovina and the Federation of Bosnia and Herzegovina, Judgment of 11 October 2002, Human Rights Chamber of Bosnia and Herzegovina, paras. 93–8. See further above, chapter 7, p. 379.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

In addition to UN activities, a number of regional instruments condemning terrorism have been adopted. These include the European Convention on the Suppression of Terrorism, 1977;[229] the Council of Europe Convention on the Prevention of Terrorism, 2005; the European Union Framework Decision on Terrorism, 2002, the South Asian Association for Regional Co-operation Regional Convention on Suppression of Terrorism, 1987 and Additional Protocol of 2005; the Arab Convention for the Suppression of Terrorism, 1998; the Convention of the Organisation of the Islamic Conference on Combating International Terrorism, 1999; the Commonwealth of Independent States Treaty on Co-operation in Combating Terrorism, 1999; the African Union Convention on the Prevention and Combating of Terrorism, 1999 and Protocol of 2005; the ASEAN Convention on Counter Terrorism, 2007, and the Organisation of American States Inter-American Convention against Terrorism, 2002.[230] In addition, the Organisation on Security and Co-operation in Europe adopted a Ministerial Declaration and Plan of Action on Combating Terrorism in 2001.[231]

Coupled with the increase in international action to suppress international terrorism has been a concern that this should be accomplished in conformity with the principles of international human rights law and international humanitarian law.[232] This has been expressed by the UN Secretary-General[233] and UN human rights organs.[234] In 2005, the UN

[229] Note that a Protocol amending the Convention was adopted by the Committee of Ministers of the Council of Europe in February 2003. This incorporates new offences into the Convention, being those referred to in the international conventions adopted after 1977.

[230] Note also the establishment of the Inter-American Committee Against Terrorism in 1999, AF/Res. 1650 (XXIX-0/99).

[231] See www.osce.org/docs/english/1990–1999/mcs/9buch01e.htm.

[232] See e.g. H. J. Steiner, P. Alston and R. Goodman, International Human Rights in Context, 3rd edn, Oxford, 2008, chapter 5, and D. Pokempner, 'Terrorism and Human Rights: The Legal Framework', in Terrorism and International Law (eds. M. Schmitt and G. L. Beruto), San Remo, 2003, p. 39.

[233] See Report of the Secretary-General on the Work of the Organisation, A/57/1, 2002, p. 1, where the Secretary-General stated that, 'I firmly believe that the terrorist menace must be suppressed, but states must ensure that counter-terrorist measures do not violate human rights.'

[234] See e.g. the statement of the Committee on the Elimination of Racial Discrimination of 8 March 2002, A/57/18, pp. 106–7, and the statement by the Committee against Torture of 22 November 2001, CAT/C/XXVII/Misc.7. Note also that on 27 March 2003, the legal expert of the Counter-Terrorism Committee briefed the UN Human Rights Committee: see UN Press Release of that date. See also the report on Terrorism and Human Rights by Special Rapporteur K. K. Koufa to the UN Sub-Commission on the Promotion and Protection of Human Rights, 2004, E/CN.4/Sub.2/2004/40. Note that the Security

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

Commission on Human Rights, for example, appointed a Special Rapporteur on the 'promotion and protection of human rights and fundamental freedoms while countering terrorism'.[235] Particular concerns have focused on 'shoot to kill' policies in the context of combating suicide bombings reportedly adopted by some states[236] and the practice of secret detention and illegal transfer of detainees across international boundaries ('extraordinary rendition').[237] The situation of detainees in the US military base in Guantanamo Bay, Cuba, has been a matter of particular concern.[238] All of these issues have demonstrated the tension between Council's Counter-Terrorism Committee has emphasised that states in adopting measures to counter terrorism must comply with all their international law obligations, including those relating to human rights law, refugee law and humanitarian law, and issued policy guidance to the Executive Directorate noting that human rights should be incorporated into its communications strategy: see S/AC.40/2006/PG.2.

235 See resolution 2005/80. This mandate was assumed by the Human Rights Council: see General Assembly resolution 60/251 and see Council resolution 6/28. See further on the Human Rights Council, above, chapter 6, p. 306. The Special Rapporteur produced a report on terrorist-profiling practices and human rights in 2007: see A/HRC/4/26.

236 See e.g. A/HRC/4/26, pp. 21 ff. and the report of the Special Rapporteur on extrajudicial, summary or arbitrary executions, A/CN.4/2006/53, paras. 44 ff. In particular, the need for resort to force as a last resort and the requirement of proportionality were emphasised: see also the Code of Conduct for Law Enforcement Officers, General Assembly resolution 34/169.

237 See e.g. L. N. Sadat, 'Ghost Prisoners and Black Sites: Extraordinary Rendition under International Law', 37 Case Western Reserve Journal of International Law, 2005–6, p. 309, and J. T. Parry, 'The Shape of Modern Torture: Extraordinary Rendition and Ghost Detainees', 6 Melbourne Journal of International Law, 2005, p. 516.

238 See e.g. Lord Steyn, 'Guantanamo Bay: The Legal Black Hole', 53 ICLQ, 2004, p. 1; F. Johns, 'Guantanamo Bay and the Annihilation of the Exception', 16 EJIL, 2005, p. 613, and T. Gill and E. van Sliedregt, 'Guantanamo Bay: A Reflection on the Legal Status and Rights of "Unlawful Enemy Combatants"', 1 Utrecht Law Review, 2005, p. 28. Note in particular the joint report by the five UN Special Rapporteurs respectively on arbitrary detention, on the independence of judges and lawyers, on torture, on freedom of religion or belief and on the right of everyone to physical and mental health, 16 February 2006, and the reports by the Council of Europe's Committee on Legal Affairs and Human Rights on secret detentions and illegal transfer of detainees involving Council of Europe members of 22 January 2006, AS/Jur (2006) 03 rev. and of 7 June 2007, AS/Jur (2007) 36. The Inter-American Commission on Human Rights granted precautionary measures in favour of detainees in Guantanamo Bay requesting the US to take 'urgent measures necessary to have the legal status of the detainees at Guantanamo Bay determined by a competent tribunal': see Annual Report of the IACHR, 2002, chapter III(C)(1), para. 80, first precautionary measures reiterated and amplified in 2003, 2004 and 2005: see B. D. Tittemore, 'Guantanamo Bay and the Precautionary Measures of the Inter-American Commission on Human Rights: A Case for International Oversight in the Struggle Against Terrorism', 6 Human Rights Law Review, 2006, p. 378. See also with regard to US courts and Guantanamo Bay, above, chapter 4, p. 164, note 178.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

combating international terrorism and respecting human rights and the need to accomplish the former without jettisoning the latter.

Regional organisations have also been concerned by this dilemma. The Council of Europe adopted international guidelines on human rights and anti-terrorism measures in July 2002,[239] seeking to integrate condemnation of terrorism and efficient combating of the phenomenon with the need to respect human rights. In particular, guideline XVI provides that in the fight against terrorism, states may never act in breach of peremptory norms of international law (jus cogens) nor in breach of international humanitarian law. The Inter-American Commission on Human Rights adopted a Report on Terrorism and Human Rights in October 2002.[240]

Suggestions for further reading

I. Brownlie, International Law and the Use of Force by States, Oxford, 1963
Y. Dinstein, War, Aggression and Self-Defence, 4th edn, Cambridge, 2005
T. M. Franck, Recourse to Force, Cambridge, 2002
C. Gray, International Law and the Use of Force, 2nd edn, Oxford, 2004

[239] Supplemented in March 2005 by guidelines concerning the protection of victims of terrorist acts.
[240] OEA/Ser.L/V/II.116, Doc. 5 rev. 1 corr.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

21

International humanitarian law

In addition to prescribing laws governing resort to force (jus ad bellum), international law also seeks to regulate the conduct of hostilities (jus in bello). These principles cover, for example, the treatment of prisoners of war, civilians in occupied territory, sick and wounded personnel, prohibited methods of warfare and human rights in situations of conflict.[1] This subject was originally termed the laws of war and then the laws of armed conflict. More recently, it has been called international humanitarian law. Although international humanitarian law is primarily derived from a number of international conventions, some of these represent in whole or in part rules of customary international law, and it is possible to say that a number of customary international law principles exist over and above conventional rules,[2] although international humanitarian law

[1] See e.g. Y. Dinstein, The Conduct of Hostilities under the Law of International Armed Conflict, Cambridge, 2004; Les Nouvelles Frontières du Droit International Humanitaire (ed. J.-F. Flauss), Brussels, 2003; T. Meron, The Humanization of International Law, The Hague, 2006; UK Ministry of Defence, Manual on the Law of Armed Conflict, Oxford, 2004; L. Green, The Contemporary Law of Armed Conflict, 2nd edn, Manchester, 2000; I. Detter, The Law of War, 2nd edn, Cambridge, 2000; G. Best, Humanity in Warfare, London, 1980, and Best, War and Law Since 1945, Oxford, 1994; A. P. V. Rogers, Law on the Battlefield, Manchester, 1996; Handbook of Humanitarian Law in Armed Conflict (ed. D. Fleck), Oxford, 1995; Studies and Essays on International Humanitarian Law and Red Cross Principles (ed. C. Swinarski), Dordrecht, 1984; The New Humanitarian Law of Armed Conflict (ed. A. Cassese), Naples, 1979; G. I. A. D. Draper, 'The Geneva Conventions of 1949', 114 HR, p. 59, and Draper 'Implementation and Enforcement of the Geneva Conventions and of the two Additional Protocols', 164 HR, 1979, p. 1; F. Kalshoven, The Law of Warfare, Leiden, 1973; M. Bothe, K. Partsch and W. Solf, New Rules for Victims of Armed Conflict, The Hague, 1982, and J. Pictet, Humanitarian Law and the Protection of War Victims, Dordrecht, 1982. See also Documents on the Laws of War (ed. A. Roberts and R. Guelff), 3rd edn, Oxford, 2000; Nguyen Quoc Dinh, P. Daillier and A. Pellet, Droit International Public, 7th edn, Paris, 2002, p. 962; T. Meron, 'The Humanisation of Humanitarian Law', 94 AJIL, 2000, p. 239, and C. Rousseau, Le Droit des Conflits Armés, Paris, 1983.

[2] See e.g. T. Meron, 'Revival of Customary Humanitarian Law', 99 AJIL, 2005, p. 817, and Customary International Humanitarian Law (eds. J.-M. Henckaerts and L. Doswald-Beck), Cambridge, 2005. See also G. H. Aldrich, 'Customary International Humanitarian

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

is one of the most highly codified parts of international law. Reliance upon relevant customary international law rules is particularly important where one or more of the states involved in a particular conflict is not a party to a pertinent convention. A good example of this relates to the work of the Eritrea–Ethiopia Claims Commission, which noted that since Eritrea did not become a party to the four Geneva Conventions of 1949 until 14 August 2000, the applicable law before that date for relevant claims was customary international humanitarian law.[3] On the other hand, treaty provisions that cannot be said to be part of customary international law[4] will bind only those states that are parties to them. This is particularly important with regard to some provisions deemed controversial by some states contained in Additional Protocols I and II to the Geneva Conventions, 1949. One additional factor that has emerged recently has been the growing convergence between international humanitarian law and international human rights law. This is discussed below.[5]

Development

The law in this area developed from the middle of the nineteenth century. In 1864, as a result of the pioneering work of Henry Dunant,[6] who had been appalled by the brutality of the battle of Solferino five years earlier, the Geneva Convention for the Amelioration of the Condition of the Wounded in Armies in the Field was adopted. This brief instrument was revised in 1906. In 1868 the Declaration of St Petersburg prohibited the use of small explosive or incendiary projectiles. The laws of war were codified at the Hague Conferences of 1899 and 1907.[7]

Law – An Interpretation on Behalf of the International Committee of the Red Cross', 76 BYIL, 2005, p. 503, and J. M. Henckaerts, 'Customary International Humanitarian Law – A Rejoinder to Judge Aldrich', ibid., p. 525.

[3] See e.g. Eritrea–Ethiopia Claims Commission, Partial Award, Prisoners of War, Eritrea's Claim 17, 1 July 2003, paras. 38 ff. It was, however, accepted that the Conventions 'have largely become expressions of customary international law', ibid., para. 40. See also Eritrea–Ethiopia Claims Commission, Partial Award, Civilian Claims, Eritrea's Claims 15, 16, 23 and 27–32, 17 December 2004, para. 28.

[4] As to which, see above, chapter 3, p. 93. [5] See below, p. 1180.

[6] See e.g. C. Moorehead, Dunant's Dream, London, 1998.

[7] See e.g. Green, Contemporary Law, chapter 2, and The Centennial of the First International Peace Conference (ed. F. Kalshoven), The Hague, 2000. See also Symposium on the Hague Peace Conferences, 94 AJIL, 2000, p. 1. The Nuremberg Tribunal regarded Hague Convention IV and Regulations on the Laws and Customs of War on Land, 1907 as declaratory of customary law: see 41 AJIL, 1947, pp. 172, 248–9. See also the Report of the UN Secretary-General on the Statute for the International Criminal Tribunal for the Former Yugoslavia,

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

A series of conventions were adopted at these conferences concerning land and naval warfare, which still form the basis of the existing rules. It was emphasised that belligerents remained subject to the law of nations and the use of force against undefended villages and towns was forbidden. It defined those entitled to belligerent status and dealt with the measures to be taken as regards occupied territory. There were also provisions concerning the rights and duties of neutral states and persons in case of war,[8] and an emphatic prohibition on the employment of 'arms, projectiles or material calculated to cause unnecessary suffering'. However, there were inadequate means to implement and enforce such rules with the result that much appeared to depend on reciprocal behaviour, public opinion and the exigencies of morale.[9] A number of conventions in the inter-war period dealt with rules concerning the wounded and sick in armies in the field and prisoners of war.[10] Such agreements were replaced by the Four Geneva 'Red Cross' Conventions of 1949 which dealt respectively with the amelioration of the condition of the wounded and sick in armed forces in the field, the amelioration of the condition of wounded, sick and shipwrecked members of the armed forces at sea, the treatment of prisoners of war and the protection of civilian persons in time of war.[11] The Fourth Convention was an innovation and a significant attempt to protect civilians who, as a result of armed hostilities or occupation, were in the power of a state of which they were not nationals.

The foundation of the Geneva Conventions system is the principle that persons not actively engaged in warfare should be treated humanely.[12] A number of practices ranging from the taking of hostages to torture, illegal

Security Council resolutions 808 (1993) and 823 (1993), S/25704 and 32 ILM, 1993, pp. 1159, 1170, and the Advisory Opinion of the International Court of Justice in Legality of the Threat or Use of Nuclear Weapons, ICJ Reports, 1996, pp. 226, 258; 110 ILR, p. 163.

8 See S. C. Neff, The Rights and Duties of Neutrals, Manchester, 2000.

9 Note, however, the Martens Clause in the Preamble to the Hague Convention concerning the Laws and Customs of War on Land, which provided that 'in cases not included in the Regulations . . . the inhabitants and the belligerents remain under the protection and the rule of the principles of the law of nations, as they result from the usages established among civilised peoples from the laws of humanity and the dictates of the public conscience'.

10 See e.g. the 1929 Conventions, one revising the 1864 and 1906 instruments on wounded and sick soldiers, the other on the treatment of prisoners of war.

11 Note that as of May 2008, 194 states are parties to the Geneva Conventions.

12 See, for example, article 1(2) of Additional Protocol I, 1977, which provides that, 'In case not covered by this Protocol or by other international agreements, civilians and combatants remain under the protection and authority of the principles of international law derived from established custom, from the principles of humanity and from the dictates of public conscience.'

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

executions and reprisals against persons protected by the Conventions are prohibited, while a series of provisions relate to more detailed points, such as the standard of care of prisoners of war and the prohibition of deportations and indiscriminate destruction of property in occupied territory. In 1977, two Additional Protocols to the 1949 Conventions were adopted.[13] These built upon and developed the earlier Conventions. While many provisions may be seen as reflecting customary law, others do not and thus cannot constitute obligations upon states that are not parties to either or both of the Protocols.[14] Protocol III was adopted in 2005 and introduced a third emblem to the two previously recognised ones (the Red Cross and the Red Crescent) in the form of a red diamond within which either a Red Cross or Red Crescent, or another emblem which has been in effective use by a High Contracting Party and was the subject of a communication to the other High Contracting Parties and the International Committee of the Red Cross through the depositary prior to the adoption of this Protocol, may be inserted. This allows in particular for the use of the Israeli Red Magen David (Shield of David) symbol.[15]

The International Court of Justice has noted that the 'Law of the Hague', dealing primarily with inter-state rules governing the use of force or the 'laws and customs of war' as they were traditionally termed, and the 'Law of Geneva', concerning the protection of persons from the effects of armed conflicts, 'have become so closely interrelated that they are considered to have gradually formed one single complex system, known today as international humanitarian law'.[16]

The scope of protection under international humanitarian law

The rules of international humanitarian law seek to extend protection to a wide range of persons, but the basic distinction drawn has been between combatants and those who are not involved in actual hostilities. Common [13] See e.g. Swinarski, Studies and Essays, part B, and Draper, 'Implementation and Enforcement'. See also B. Wortley, 'Observations on the Revision of the 1949 Geneva "Red Cross" Conventions', 54 BYIL, 1983, p. 143, and G. Aldrich, 'Prospects for US Ratification of Additional Protocol I to the 1949 Geneva Conventions', 85 AJIL, 1991, p. 1.

[14] For example, article 44 of Protocol I: see below, p. 1173.

[15] The Red Lion and Sun that used to be used by Iran was also included as a Geneva Convention emblem: see e.g. Detter, Law of War, p. 293.

[16] See the Advisory Opinion on the Legality of the Threat or Use of Nuclear Weapons, ICJ Reports, 1996, pp. 226, 256; 110 ILR, p. 163. The Court also noted that '[t]he provisions of the Additional Protocols of 1977 give expression and attest to the unity and complexity of that law', ibid.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

article 2 of the Geneva Conventions provides that the Conventions 'shall apply to all cases of declared war or of any other armed conflict which may arise between two or more of the High Contracting Parties even if the state of war is not recognised by them . . . [and] to all cases of partial or total occupation of the territory of a High Contracting Party, even if the said occupation meets with no armed resistance'. The rules contained in these Conventions cannot be renounced by those intended to benefit from them, thus precluding the possibility that the power which has control over them may seek to influence the persons concerned to agree to a mitigation of protection.[17]

The wounded and sick

The First Geneva Convention concerns the Wounded and Sick on Land and emphasises that members of the armed forces and organised militias, including those accompanying them where duly authorised,[18] 'shall be respected and protected in all circumstances'. They are to be treated humanely by the party to the conflict into whose power they have fallen on a non-discriminatory basis and any attempts upon their lives or violence to their person is strictly prohibited. Torture or biological experimentation is forbidden, nor are such persons to be wilfully left without medical assistance and care.[19] The wounded and sick of a belligerent who fall into enemy hands are also to be treated as prisoners of war.[20] Further, the parties to a conflict shall take all possible measures to protect the wounded and sick and ensure their adequate care and to 'search for the dead and prevent their being despoiled'.[21] The parties to the conflict are to record as soon as possible the details of any wounded, sick or dead persons of the adversary party and to transmit them to the other side through particular means.[22] This Convention also includes provisions as to medical units and establishments, noting in particular that these should not be [17] See article 7 of the first three Conventions and article 8 of the fourth. Note that Security Council resolution 1472, adopted under Chapter VII on 28 March 2003, called on 'all parties concerned' to the Iraq conflict of March–April 2003 to abide strictly by their obligations under international law and particularly the Geneva Conventions and the Hague Regulations, 'including those relating to the essential civilian needs of the people of Iraq'.

[18] See article 13. See also UK, Manual, chapter 7.

[19] Article 12. See also Green, Armed Conflict, chapter 11.

[20] Article 14. Thus the provisions of the Third Geneva Convention will apply to them: see below, p. 1172.

[21] Article 15.

[22] Article 16 and see article 122 of the Third Geneva Convention.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

attacked,[23] and deals with the recognised emblems (i.e. the Red Cross, the Red Crescent and, after Protocol III, the Red Diamond).[24]

The Second Geneva Convention concerns the Condition of Wounded, Sick and Shipwrecked Members of Armed Forces at Sea and is very similar to the First Convention, for instance in its provisions that members of the armed forces and organised militias, including those accompanying them where duly authorised, and who are sick, wounded or shipwrecked are to be treated humanely and cared for on a non-discriminatory basis, and that attempts upon their lives and violence and torture are prohibited.[25] The Convention also provides that hospital ships may in no circumstances be attacked or captured but respected and protected.[26] The provisions in these Conventions were reaffirmed in and supplemented by Protocol I, 1977, Parts I and II. Article 1(4), for example, supplements common article 2 contained in the Conventions and provides that the Protocol is to apply in armed conflicts in which peoples are fighting against colonial domination and alien occupation and against racist regimes as enshrined in the UN Charter and the Declaration on Principles of International Law, 1970.

Prisoners of war[27]

The Third Geneva Convention of 1949 is concerned with prisoners of war, and consists of a comprehensive code centred upon the requirement of humane treatment in all circumstances.[28] The definition of prisoners of war in article 4, however, is of particular importance since it has been regarded as the elaboration of combatant status. It covers members of the armed forces of a party to the conflict (as well as members of militias and other volunteer corps forming part of such armed force) and members of [23] Article 19, even if the personnel of the unit or establishment are armed or otherwise protected, article 22. Chapter IV concerns the treatment of medical personnel.

[24] Chapter VII. [25] Articles 12 and 13. See also Green, Armed Conflict, chapter 11.

[26] Chapter III. See, with regard to the use of hospital ships in the Falklands conflict, H. Levie, 'The Falklands Crisis and the Laws of War' in The Falklands War (eds. A. R. Coll and A. C. Arend), Boston, 1985, pp. 64, 67–8. Chapter IV deals with medical personnel, Chapter V with medical transports and Chapter VI with the emblem: see above, p. 1170.

[27] See e.g. Dinstein, Conduct of Hostilities, pp. 29 ff., and UK, Manual, Chapter 8. Note that the Eritrea–Ethiopia Claims Commission in its Partial Award, Prisoners of War, Ethiopia's Claim 4, 1 July 2003, para. 32, has held that this Convention substantially reflected customary international law.

[28] See also the Regulations annexed to the Hague Convention IV on the Laws and Customs of War on Land, 1907, Section I, Chapter II.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

other militias and volunteer corps, including those of organised resistance movements, belonging to a party to the conflict providing the following conditions are fulfilled: (a) being commanded by a person responsible for his subordinates; (b) having a fixed distinctive sign recognisable at a distance; (c) carrying arms openly; (d) conducting operations in accordance with the laws and customs of war.[29] This article reflected the experience of the Second World War, although the extent to which resistance personnel were covered was constrained by the need to comply with the four conditions. Since 1949, the use of guerrillas spread to the Third World and the decolonisation experience. Accordingly, pressures grew to expand the definition of combatants entitled to prisoner of war status to such persons, who as practice demonstrated rarely complied with the four conditions. States facing guerrilla action, whether the colonial powers or others such as Israel, objected. Articles 43 and 44 of Protocol I, 1977, provide that combatants are members of the armed forces of a party to an international armed conflict.[30] Such armed forces consist of all organised armed units under an effective command structure which enforces compliance with the rules of international law applicable in armed conflict. Article 44(3) further notes that combatants are obliged to distinguish themselves from the civilian population while they are engaged in an attack or in a military operation preparatory to an attack. When an armed combatant cannot so distinguish himself, the status of combatant may be retained provided that arms are carried openly during each military engagement and during such time as the combatant is visible to the adversary while engaged in a military deployment preceding the launching of an attack. This formulation is clearly controversial and was the subject of many declarations in the vote at the conference producing the draft.[31]

[29] These conditions appear in article 1 of the Hague Regulations and have been regarded as part of customary law: see G. I. A. D. Draper, 'The Status of Combatants and the Question of Guerilla Warfare', 45 BYIL, 1971, pp. 173, 186. See also the Tadić case, Judgment of the Appeals Chamber of 15 July 1999, IT-94-1-A; 124 ILR, p. 61.

[30] Article 1(4) of Protocol I includes as international armed conflicts 'armed conflicts in which peoples are fighting against colonial domination and alien occupation and against racist regimes in the exercise of their right of self-determination'. Note that there is no provision for prisoner of war status in non-international armed conflicts: see below, p. 1194.

[31] See e.g. H. Verthy, Guérrilla et Droit Humanitaire, 2nd edn, Geneva, 1983, and P. Nahlik, 'L'Extension du Statut de Combattant à la Lumière de Protocol I de Genève de 1977', 164 HR, 1979, p. 171. Where a person is a mercenary, there is no right to combatant or prisoner of war status under article 47. See also the International Convention against the Recruitment, Use, Financing and Training of Mercenaries, 1989: Green, Armed Conflict,

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

Article 5 also provides that where there is any doubt as to the status of any person committing a belligerent act and falling into the hands of the enemy, 'such person shall enjoy the protection of the present Convention until such time as their status has been determined by a competent tribunal'.[32] This formulation was changed somewhat in article 45 of Protocol I. This provides that a person who takes part in hostilities and falls into the power of an adverse party 'shall be presumed to be a prisoner of war and therefore shall be protected by the Third Convention'. The term 'unlawful combatant', therefore, refers to a person who fails the tests laid down in articles 43 and 44, after due determination of status, and who would not be entitled to the status of prisoner of war under international humanitarian law. Such a person, who would thus be a civilian, would be protected by the basic humanitarian guarantees laid down in articles 45(3) and 75 of Protocol I and by the general principles of international human rights law in terms of his/her treatment upon capture. However, since such a person would not have the status of a prisoner of war, he would not benefit from the protections afforded by such status and would thus be liable to prosecution under the normal criminal law.[33]

pp. 114 ff. However, such persons remain entitled to the basic humanitarian guarantees provided by Protocol I: see articles 45(3) and 75. See also UK, Manual, p. 147.

[32] See also the British Manual of Military Law, Part III, The Law of Land Warfare, London, 1958, para. 132, note 3, and the US Department of Army, Law of Land Warfare, Field Manual 27–10, 1956, para. 71(c), (d) detailing what a competent tribunal might be. In the case of the UK, the competent tribunal would be a board of inquiry convened in accordance with the Prisoner of War Determination of Status Regulations 1958: see UK, Manual, p. 150. See as to the question of persons captured by the US in Afghanistan in 2001–2 and elsewhere, and detained at the US military base at Guantanamo Bay, Cuba, Rasul v. Bush 124 S. Ct. 2686 (2004); US Military Commissions Act 2006, 45 ILM, 2006, p. 1246; and Hamdan v. Rumsfeld 126 S. Ct. 2749 (2006) and see Boumediene v. Bush 553 US _ (2008). See also above, chapter 12, p. 658 and chapter 20, p. 1165.

[33] See e.g. A. Cassese, International Law, 2nd edn, Oxford, 2005, pp. 409–10, cf. Dinstein, Conduct of Hostilities, pp. 29 ff.; M. Finaud, 'L'Abus de la Notion de "Combattant Illégal": Une Atteinte au Droit International Humanitaire', 110 RGDIP, 2006, p. 861, and T. M. Franck, 'Criminals, Combatants, or What – An Examination of the Role of Law in Responding to the Threat of Terror', 98 AJIL, 2005, p. 686. Accordingly, captured Taliban fighters who formed part of the army of Afghanistan at the relevant time would have the status of POWs, while captured Al-Qaida operatives would be subject to relevant national criminal law, including war crimes and crimes against humanity. Note that once a civilian takes part in hostilities, he/she loses the protection of the prohibition of attacks upon him/her: see article 51(3), Protocol I. See also Public Committee Against Torture in Israel v. Government of Israel, Israeli Supreme Court, 13 December 2006, 101 AJIL, 2007, p. 459, A and B v. State of Israel, Israeli Supreme Court, 11 June 2008 and D. Kretzmer, 'Targeted Killing of Suspected Terrorists: Extra-Judicial Executions or Legitimate Means of Defence?', 16 EJIL, 2005, p. 171.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

The framework of obligations covering prisoners of war is founded upon 'the requirement of treatment of POWs as human beings', while 'At the core of the Convention regime are legal obligations to keep POWs alive and in good health.'[34] Article 13 provides that prisoners of war must at all times be humanely treated and must at all times be protected, particularly against acts of violence or intimidation and against 'insults and public curiosity'.[35] This means that displaying prisoners of war on television in a humiliating fashion confessing to 'crimes' or criticising their own government must be regarded as a breach of the Convention.[36] Measures of reprisal against prisoners of war are prohibited. Article 14 provides that prisoners of war are entitled in all circumstances to respect for their persons and their honour.[37]

Prisoners of war are bound only to divulge their name, date of birth, rank and serial number. Article 17 provides that 'no physical or mental torture, nor any other form of coercion, may be inflicted . . . to secure from them information of any kind whatever. Prisoners of war who refuse to answer may not be threatened, insulted, or exposed to unpleasant or disadvantageous treatment of any kind.' Once captured, prisoners of war are to be evacuated as soon as possible to camps situated in an area far enough from the combat zone for them to be out of danger,[38] while article 23 stipulates that 'no prisoner of war may at any time be sent to, or detained in, areas where he may be exposed to the fire of the combat zone, nor may his presence be used to render certain points or areas immune from military operations'.[39] Prisoners of war are subject to the [34] See the Eritrea–Ethiopia Claims Commission in its Partial Award, Prisoners of War, Ethiopia's Claim 4, 1 July 2003, paras. 53 and 64, where the Commission declared that 'customary international law, as reflected in Geneva Conventions I and III, absolutely prohibits the killing of POWs, requires the wounded and sick to be collected and cared for, the dead to be collected, and demands prompt and humane evacuation of POWs'. See also Best, War and Law, p. 135, and Y. Dinstein, 'Prisoners of War' in Encyclopaedia of Public International Law (ed. R. Bernhardt), Amsterdam, 1982, pp. 146, 148.

[35] See also article 11 of Protocol I.

[36] See e.g. the treatment of allied prisoners of war by Iraq in the 1991 Gulf War, The Economist, 26 January 1991, p. 24, and in the 2003 Gulf War: see the report of the condemnation by the International Committee of the Red Cross, http://news.bbc.co.uk/1/hi/world/middle_east/2881187.stm.

[37] See also article 75 of Protocol I.

[38] Article 19.

[39] Thus the reported Iraqi practice during the 1991 Gulf War of sending allied prisoners of war to strategic sites in order to create a 'human shield' to deter allied attacks was clearly a violation of the Convention: see e.g. The Economist, 26 January 1991, p. 24. See also UKMIL, 62 BYIL, 1991, pp. 678 ff.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

laws and orders of the state detaining them.[40] They may be punished for disciplinary offences and tried for offences committed before capture, for example for war crimes. They may also be tried for offences committed before capture against the law of the state holding them.[41] Other provisions of this Convention deal with medical treatment, religious activities, discipline, labour and relations with the exterior. Article 118 provides that prisoners of war shall be released and repatriated without delay after the cessation of hostilities. The Convention on prisoners of war applies only to international armed conflicts,[42] but article 3 (which is common to the four Conventions) provides that as a minimum 'persons . . . including members of armed forces, who have laid down their arms and those placed hors de combat by sickness, wounds, detention, or any other cause, shall in all circumstances be treated humanely'.

Protection of civilians and occupation

The Fourth Geneva Convention is concerned with the protection of civilians in time of war and builds upon the Hague Regulations (attached to Hague Convention IV on the Law and Customs of War on Land, 1907).[43] This Geneva Convention, which marked an extension to the pre-1949 rules, is limited under article 4 to those persons, 'who, at a given moment and in any manner whatsoever, find themselves, in case of a conflict or occupation, in the hands of a party to the conflict or occupying power of which they are not nationals'. The Convention comes into operation immediately upon the outbreak of hostilities or the start of an occupation and ends at the general close of military operations.[44] Under article 50(1) of Protocol I, 1977, a civilian is defined as any person not a combatant,[45]

[40] Article 82, Geneva Convention III.

[41] Articles 82 and 85. See Green, Armed Conflict, p. 210. See also US v. Noriega 746 F. Supp. 1506, 1529 (1990); 99 ILR, pp. 143, 171.

[42] See below, p. 1190.

[43] See e.g. Green, Armed Conflict, chapters 12 and 15; UK, Manual, Chapters 9 and 11; E. Benvenisti, The International Law of Occupation, Princeton, 2004 (with new preface), and S. Wills, 'Occupation Law and Multi-National Operations: Problems and Perspectives', 77 BYIL, 2006, p. 256. The Hague Regulations have become part of customary international law: see Construction of a Wall, ICJ Reports, 2004, pp. 136, 172; 129 ILR, pp. 37, 91.

[44] Article 6.

[45] As defined in article 4 of the Third Geneva Convention, 1949 and article 43, Protocol I, 1977, above, p. 1172. Note, however, the obligation contained in the Optional Protocol to the Convention on the Rights of the Child on the involvement of children in armed conflict, 25 May 2000, to ensure that children under the age of eighteen do not take part in hostilities.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

and in cases of doubt a person is to be considered a civilian. The Fourth Convention provides a highly developed set of rules for the protection of such civilians, including the right to respect for person, honour, convictions and religious practices and the prohibition of torture and other cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment, hostage-taking and reprisals.[46] The wounded and sick are the object of particular protection and respect[47] and there are various judicial guarantees as to due process.[48]

The protection of civilians in occupied territories is covered in section III of Part III of the Fourth Geneva Convention,[49] but what precisely occupied territory is may be open to dispute.[50] Article 42 of the Hague Regulations provides that territory is to be considered as occupied 'when it is actually placed under the authority of the hostile army' and that the occupation only extends to the territory 'where such authority has been established and can be exercised',[51] while article 2(2) of the Convention provides that it is to apply to all cases of partial or total occupation 'of the territory of a High Contracting Party, even if the said occupation meets with no resistance'. The International Court in the Democratic Republic of the Congo v. Uganda case[52] noted that in order to determine whether a state whose forces are present on the territory of another state is an occupying power, one must examine whether there is sufficient evidence to demonstrate that the said authority was in fact established and exercised by the intervening state in the areas in question. The Court understood this to mean in practice in that case that Ugandan forces in the Congo were stationed there in particular areas and that they had substituted their own authority for that of the Congolese government.

The military occupation of enemy territory is termed 'belligerent occupation' and international law establishes a legal framework concerning the legal relations of occupier and occupied. There are two key conditions for the establishment of an occupation in this sense, first, that the former government is no longer capable of publicly exercising its authority in [46] See articles 27–34. The rights of aliens in the territory of a party to a conflict are covered in articles 35–46.

[47] Article 16. [48] See articles 71–6. See also article 75 of Protocol I, 1977.

[49] See also the Hague Regulations, Section III.

[50] Iraqi-occupied Kuwait in 1990–1 was, of course, a prime example of the situation covered by this Convention: see e.g. Security Council resolution 674 (1990).

[51] See the Construction of a Wall case, ICJ Reports, 2004, pp. 136, 167 and Democratic Republic of the Congo v. Uganda, ICJ Reports, 2005, pp. 168, 229, reaffirming article 42 as part of customary international law.

[52] ICJ Reports, 2005, pp. 168, 230.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

the area in question and, secondly, that the occupying power is in a position to substitute its own authority for that of the former government.[53] An occupation will cease as soon as the occupying power is forced out or evacuates the area.[54] Article 43 of the Hague Regulations provides the essential framework of the law of occupation. It notes that, 'The authority of the legitimate power having in fact passed into the hands of the occupant, the latter shall take all the measures in his power to restore and ensure, as far as possible, public order and safety, while respecting, unless absolutely prevented, the laws in force in the country.'[55] This establishes several key elements. First, only 'authority' and not sovereignty passes to the occupier.[56] The former government retains sovereignty and may be deprived of it only with its consent. Secondly, the basis of authority of the occupier lies in effective control. Thirdly, the occupier has both the obligation and the right to maintain public order in the occupied territory. Fourthly, the existing laws of the territory must be preserved as far as possible.

The situation with regard to the West Bank of Jordan (sometimes known as Judaea and Samaria), for example, demonstrates the problems that may arise. Israel has argued that since the West Bank has never been [53] See e.g. UK, Manual, p. 275.

[54] Ibid., p. 277. See also R v. Civil Aviation Authority [2006] EWHC 2465 (Admin), at para. 15; 132 ILR, p. 713, noting that 'The state of Israel has withdrawn from Gaza [in 2005] so that it is not an occupied Palestinian Territory.' Note that Israel handed over certain powers with regard to parts of the West Bank to the Palestinian Authority following the Oslo agreements of 1993: see generally J. Crawford, The Creation of States, 2nd edn, 2006, pp. 442 ff.; New Political Entities in Public and Private International Law (eds. A. Shapira and M. Tabory), The Hague, 1999; E. Benvenisti, 'The Israeli–Palestinian Declaration of Principles: A Framework for Future Settlement', 4 EJIL, 1993, p. 542, and P. Malanczuk, 'Some Basic Aspects of the Agreements Between Israel and the PLO from the Perspective of International Law', 7 EJIL, 1996, p. 485. Since one assumes that the Palestinian Authority is not an occupying power, the fact that Israel is not in effective day-to-day control over the whole area must impact upon its responsibilities, but it is unlikely that this has affected its legal status as such as belligerent occupant.

[55] Note that the International Court has emphasised that 'international humanitarian law contains provisions enabling account to be taken of military exigencies in certain circumstances' and that 'the military exigencies contemplated by these texts may be invoked in occupied territories even after the general close of the military operations that lead to their occupation', Construction of a Wall, ICJ Reports, 2004, pp. 136, 192. See also M. Sassòli, 'Legislation and Maintenance of Public Order and Civil Life by Occupying Powers', 16 EJIL, 2005, p. 661.

[56] See e.g. Prefecture of Voiotia v. Germany (Distomo Massacre), Court of Cassation, Greece, 4 May 2000, 129 ILR, pp. 514, 519 and Mara'abe v. The Prime Minister of Israel, Israel Supreme Court, 15 September 2005, 129 ILR, pp. 241, 252. See also Benvenisti, International Law of Occupation, pp. 5-6, and UK, Manual, p. 278.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

recognised internationally as Jordanian territory,[57] it cannot therefore be regarded as its territory to which the Convention would apply. In other words, to recognise that the Convention applies formally would be tantamount to recognition of Jordanian sovereignty over the disputed land.[58] However, the International Court has stated that the Convention 'is applicable in any occupied territory in the event of an armed conflict arising between two or more High Contracting Parties' so that with regard to the Israel/Palestine territories question, 'the Convention is applicable in the Palestinian territories which before the conflict lay to the east of the Green Line [i.e. the 1949 armistice line] and which, during that conflict, were occupied by Israel, there being no need for any enquiry into the precise legal status of those territories'.[59] The Eritrea–Ethiopia Claims Commission has pointed out that 'These protections [provided by international humanitarian law] should not be cast into doubt because the belligerents dispute the status of territory . . . respecting international protections in such situations does not prejudice the status of the territory'.[60] Further, the Commission emphasised that 'neither text [the Hague Regulations and the Fourth Geneva Convention] suggests that only territory the title of which is clear and uncontested can be occupied territory'.[61]

[57] It was annexed by the Kingdom of Transjordan, as it then was, in 1949 at the conclusion of the Israeli War of Independence, but this annexation was recognised only by the UK and Pakistan. See e.g. A. Gerson, Israel, the West Bank and International Law, London, 1978.

[58] Note that Israel does observe the Convention de facto: see e.g. Mara'abe v. The Prime Minister of Israel, Israeli Supreme Court, 15 September 2005, 129 ILR, pp. 241, 253. This was noted by the International Court in the Construction of a Wall case, ICJ Reports, 2004, pp. 136, 174. See also D. Kretzmer, The Occupation of Justice, New York, 2002; M. Shamgar, 'The Observance of International Law in the Administered Territories', Israel Yearbook on Human Rights, 1977, p. 262; T. Meron, 'West Bank and Gaza', ibid., 1979, p. 108; F. Fleiner-Gerster and H. Meyer, 'New Developments in Humanitarian Law', 34 ICLQ, 1985, p. 267, and E. Cohen, Human Rights in the Israeli-Occupied Territories, Manchester, 1985.

[59] Construction of a Wall case, ICJ Reports, 2004, pp. 136, 177. It should be noted that Israel has long asserted that it applies the humanitarian parts of the Convention to the occupied territories: see e.g. Shamgar, 'Observance of International Law in the Administered Territories'; and Meron, 'West Bank and Gaza', and Mara'abe v. The Prime Minister of Israel, Israeli Supreme Court, 15 September 2005, 129 ILR, pp. 241, 252–3. See also M. N. Shaw, 'Territorial Administration by Non-Territorial Sovereigns' in The Shifting Allocation of Authority in International Law (eds. Y. Shany and T. Broudie), Oxford, 2008, pp. 369, 385 ff.

[60] Partial Award, Central Front, Ethiopia's Claim 2, 28 April 2004, para. 28.

[61] Ibid., para. 29. Note that article 4 of Protocol I provides that, 'The application of the Conventions and of this Protocol, as well as the conclusion of the agreements provided for therein, shall not affect the legal status of the Parties to the conflict. Neither the occupation of a territory nor the application of the Conventions and this Protocol shall affect the legal status of the territory in question.'

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

Article 47 provides that persons protected under the Convention cannot be deprived in any case or in any manner whatsoever of the benefits contained in the Convention by any change introduced as a result of the occupation nor by any agreement between the authorities of the occupied territory and the occupying power nor by any annexation by the latter of the whole or part of the occupied territory. Article 49 prohibits 'individual or mass forcible transfers' as well as deportations of protected persons from the occupied territory regardless of motive, while the occupying power 'shall not deport or transfer parts of its own civilian population into the territory it occupies'.[62] Other provisions refer to the prohibition of forced work or conscription of protected persons, and the prohibition of the destruction of real or personal property except where rendered absolutely necessary by military operations, and of any alteration of the status of public or judicial officials.[63] The occupying power also has the responsibility to ensure that the local population has adequate food and medical supplies and, if not, to facilitate relief schemes.[64] Article 70 provides that protected persons shall not be arrested, prosecuted or convicted for acts committed or opinions expressed before the occupation, apart from breaches of the laws of war.[65]

In addition to the traditional rules of humanitarian law, international human rights law is now seen as in principle applicable to occupation situations. The International Court interpreted article 43 of the Hague Regulations to include 'the duty to secure respect for the applicable rules of international human rights law and international humanitarian law, to protect the inhabitants of the occupied territory against acts of violence, and not to tolerate such violence by any third state'.[66] Further, the Court has stated that the protection offered by human rights conventions

[62] The International Court has stated that this provision prohibits 'any measures taken by an occupying power in order to organize or encourage transfers of parts of its own population into the occupied territory' and that 'the Israeli settlements in the Occupied Palestinian Territory (including East Jerusalem) have been established in breach of international law', Construction of a Wall, ICJ Reports, 2004, pp. 136, 183–4. See also criticisms of Israel's policy of building settlements in territories it has occupied since 1967, UKMIL, 54 BYIL, 1983, pp. 538–9. Note also Kretzmer, Occupation of Justice, chapter 5.

[63] Articles 51, 53 and 54. Article 64 stipulates that penal laws remain in force, unless a threat to the occupier's security, while existing tribunals continue to function. See also Security Council resolution 1472 (2003) concerning the March–April 2003 military operation by coalition forces in Iraq.

[64] Articles 55, 56, 59 and 60.

[65] Section IV consists of regulations for the treatment of internees.

[66] Democratic Republic of the Congo v. Uganda, ICJ Reports, 2005, pp. 168, 231 and 242 ff.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

does not cease in case of armed conflict, unless there has been a relevant derogation permitted by the convention in question. The Court has also emphasised that many human rights treaties apply to the conduct of states parties where the state is exercising jurisdiction on foreign territory[67] and that in such cases the matter will fall to be determined by the applicable lex specialis, that is international humanitarian law.[68] In Democratic Republic of Congo v. Uganda the Court reaffirmed that 'international human rights instruments are applicable "in respect of acts done by a state in the exercise of its jurisdiction outside its own territory", particularly in occupied territories'.[69] It was concluded that Uganda was internationally responsible for various violations of international human rights law and international humanitarian law, including those committed by virtue of failing to comply with its obligations as an occupying power.[70]

As part of this general approach, the Court has noted that the principle of self-determination applies to the Palestinian people,[71] and that the construction by Israel of a separation barrier (sometimes termed a wall or a fence) between its territory and the occupied West Bank was unlawful to the extent that it was situated within the occupied territories.[72]

[67] Construction of a Wall, ICJ Reports, 2004, pp. 136, 178 ff. See also Wills, 'Occupation Law', pp. 265 ff.

[68] Legality of the Threat or Use of Nuclear Weapons, ICJ Reports, 1996, pp. 226, 240.

[69] ICJ Reports, 2005, pp. 168, 242–3. A series of international human rights instruments was listed as being applicable with regard to the Congo situation, including the International Covenants on Human Rights, the Convention on the Rights of the Child and the African Charter on Human and Peoples' Rights, ibid., pp. 243–4.

[70] Ibid., pp. 244–5. Reference was also made to the violation of Article 47 of the Hague Regulations and Article 33 of the Fourth Geneva Convention and of the African Charter on Human and Peoples' Rights with regard to the exploitation of the natural resources of Congo, ibid., pp. 252 ff.

[71] The Court relied primarily upon the terms of the Israeli–Palestinian Interim Agreement, 1995 and the reference therein to the 'legitimate rights' of the Palestinian people, which the Court held included the right to self-determination 'as the General Assembly has moreover recognized on a number of occasions (see, for example, resolution 58/163 of 22 December 2003)', Construction of a Wall, ICJ Reports, 2004, pp. 136, 183.

[72] This was partly because the Court saw this as creating a fait accompli on the ground which might become permanent and would then be tantamount to de facto annexation, and partly because it was seen as severely impeding the exercise by the Palestinian people of its right to self-determination, ibid., p. 184. The Court also noted that it appeared that the construction of the wall was contrary to provisions in the Hague Regulations and the Fourth Geneva Convention concerning requisition of property and liberty of movement, ibid., pp. 185 ff. Israel's argument was that the construction of the barrier commenced after a series of suicide car bombings within its territory emanating from the occupied territories and that the barrier was a temporary security measure, ibid., p. 182. See generally the articles on the case collected in 'Agora', 99 AJIL, 2005, p. 1.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

Further, although an occupying power can plead military exigencies and the requirements of national security or public order in the framework of the international law of occupation, the route of the wall could not be so justified.[73]

The Israeli Supreme Court in a judgment rendered shortly before the International Court's advisory opinion emphasised that the authority of a military commander to order the construction of each segment of the separation barrier could not be founded upon political as distinct from military considerations and that the barrier could not be motivated by annexation wishes nor in order to draw a political border. Such military authority was inherently temporary since belligerent occupation was inherently temporary.[74] In a further case, decided one year after the International Court's advisory opinion, the Israeli Supreme Court referred to the balance to be drawn between the legitimate security needs of the state, its military forces and of persons present in the occupied area in question on the one hand, and the human rights of the local population derived from international humanitarian law on the other.[75] The Court also proceeded on the assumption that the international conventions on human rights applied in the area.[76] In addressing the question as to how to achieve what was termed the 'delicate balance' between military necessity and humanitarian considerations, the Court referred to the application of general principles of law, one of these being the principle of proportionality. This principle was based on three sub-tests, the first being a call for a fit between goal and means, the second calling for the application of the least harmful means in such a situation, and the third being that the damage caused to an individual by the means employed must be of appropriate proportion to the benefit stemming from it.[77] Each segment of the route of the barrier had to be assessed in the light of the impact upon the Palestinian residents and whether any impingement was proportional.[78]

[73] ICJ Reports, 2004, pp. 192 and 193.

[74] Beit Sourik v. Government of Israel, Israeli Supreme Court, 30 June 2004, 129 ILR, pp. 189, 205–6.

[75] Mara'abe v. Prime Minister of Israel, Israeli Supreme Court, 15 September 2005, 129 ILR, pp. 241, 264–5. See also Y. Shany, 'Capacities and Inadequacies: A Look at the Two Separation Barrier Cases', 38 Israel Law Review, 2005, p. 230.

[76] Mara'abe 129 ILR, pp. 241, 266, but without formally deciding the matter, ibid.

[77] Ibid., pp. 266 and 268, reaffirming the decision in Beit Sourik v. Government of Israel, Israeli Supreme Court, 30 June 2004, 129 ILR, pp. 189, 215 ff.

[78] Mara'abe 129, ILR, pp. 241, 286. The Court held that the route of the barrier in the area in question in the case had to be reconsidered as it was not shown that the least injurious means test had been satisfied, ibid., pp. 316 ff. The effect of this would be to reduce the

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

In relation to the application of international human rights treaties outside the territory of the state concerned, the UK Manual of the Law of Armed Conflict concluded that: 'Where the occupying power is a party to the European Convention on Human Rights the standards of that Convention may, depending on the circumstances, be applicable in the occupied territories.'[79]

Moving further beyond the traditional and passive approach with regard to the law of occupation,[80] the Security Council adopted resolution 1483 (2003) after the coalition military action against Iraq, reaffirming the position of the UK and US as occupying powers in Iraq under international law but placing upon them (and the Coalition Provisional Authority, which included other states) a range of other powers and responsibilities over and above the international law relating to occupation.[81] These included the obligation 'to promote the welfare of the Iraqi people through the effective administration of the territory, including . . . the creation of conditions in which the Iraqi people can freely determine their own political future' and the relevance of the establishment of an internationally recognised, representative government of Iraq. In addition, size of the fenced-in enclave projecting into the West Bank. Note that the Court explained that the difference between its judgment and the advisory opinion of the International Court stemmed from the difference in facts laid before the two courts, particularly the paucity of facts relating to the security–military necessity to erect the fence arising from the phenomenon of suicide bombing inside Israel put before the International Court, ibid., pp. 287–8.

[79] At p. 282. See also Al-Skeini v. Secretary of State for Defence [2007] UKHL 26; 133 ILR, p. 693, where the House of Lords held that the European Convention applied to British military detention facilities but not to soldiers on patrol in Iraq, and Al-Jedda v. Secretary of State for Defence [2007] UKHL 58, where the House of Lords held that a binding Security Council resolution authorising the maintenance of public order had precedence over the terms of article 5 of the European Convention. See also Coard v. United States, Report No. 109/99, 29 September 1999; 123 ILR, p. 156, for the view expressed by the Inter-American Commission on Human Rights that the US was bound by relevant rules of humanitarian law and human rights law in the Grenada intervention.

[80] Note the problems posed by long-lasting occupations and the tension between the traditional law of minimal interference with local life and the need to cope with societal changes: see e.g. A. Roberts, 'Prolonged Military Occupation: The Israeli-Occupied Territories Since 1967', 84 AJIL, 1990, p. 44, and Roberts, 'Transformative Military Occupation: Applying the Laws of War and Human Rights', 100 AJIL, 2006, p. 580.

[81] See generally 'Iraq: Law of Occupation', House of Commons Research Paper 03/51, 2 June 2003; E. Benvenisti, 'Water Conflicts During the Occupation of Iraq', 97 AJIL, 2003, p. 860; M. Hmoud, 'The Use of Force Against Iraq: Occupation and Security Council Resolution 1483', 36 Cornell International Law Journal, 2004, p. 435, and D. Scheffer, 'Beyond Occupation Law', 97 AJIL, 2003, p. 842.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

a Special Representative for Iraq was appointed, whose functions included the promotion of human rights.

The conduct of hostilities[82]

International law, in addition to seeking to protect victims of armed conflicts, also tries to constrain the conduct of military operations in a humanitarian fashion. In analysing the rules contained in the 'Law of the Hague', it is important to bear in mind the delicate balance to be maintained between military necessity and humanitarian considerations. A principle of long standing, if not always honoured in practice, is the requirement to protect civilians against the effects of hostilities. As far as the civilian population is concerned during hostilities,[83] the basic rule (sometimes termed the principle of distinction)[84] formulated in article 48 of Protocol I is that the parties to the conflict must at all times distinguish between such population and combatants and between civilian and military objectives and must direct their operations only against military objectives.[85] Military objectives are limited in article 52(2) to 'those objects which by their nature, location, purpose or use make an effective contribution to military action and whose total or partial destruction, capture or neutralisation, in the circumstances ruling at the time, offers a definite military advantage'. There is thus a principle of proportionality to be considered. Judge Higgins, for example, in referring to this principle, noted that 'even a legitimate target may not be attacked if the collateral civilian casualties would be disproportionate to the specific military gain from the attack'.[86] Issues have arisen particularly with regard to so-called 'dual use' objects such as bridges, roads and power stations,[87] and care must be taken to [82] See e.g. Dinstein, Conduct of Hostilities; UK, Manual, chapter 5; Green, Armed Conflict, chapters 7 (land), 8 (maritime) and 9 (air). See also Rogers, Law on the Battlefield, and Best, War and Law, pp. 253 ff. As to armed conflicts at sea, see also The San Remo Manual on International Law Applicable to Armed Conflicts at Sea (ed. L. Doswald-Beck), Cambridge, 1995.

[83] Apart from the provisions protecting the inhabitants of occupied territories under the Fourth Geneva Convention. See also Security Council resolution 1674 (2006) on the Protection of Civilians in Armed Conflicts, and Security Council Presidential Statement of 27 May 2008, 5/PRST/2008/18.

[84] See e.g. Dinstein, Conduct of Hostilities, p. 55.

[85] Ibid., chapter 4.

[86] Dissenting Opinion, Legality of the Threat or Use of Nuclear Weapons, ICJ Reports, 1996, pp. 226, 587; 110 ILR, pp. 163, 536.

[87] Note that in the Eritrea–Ethiopia Claims Commission, Partial Award, Western Front, Aerial Bombardment and Related Claims, Eritrea's Claims 1, 3, 5, 9–13, 14, 21, 25 and 26, 19 December 2005, paras. 113 ff., it was held that article 52(2) constituted a statement of

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

interpret these so that such objects are not indiscriminately attacked on the one hand, while ensuring that, on the other, such objects or facilities are not used by opposing military forces in an attempt to secure immunity from attack, with the inevitable result that civilians may be endangered.[88] Much will depend upon whether the military circumstances are such that they fall within the definition provided in article 52(2). This will require a balancing of military need and civilian endangerment.

Article 51 provides that the civilian population as such, as well as individual civilians, 'shall not be the object of attack. Acts or threats of violence the primary purpose of which is to spread terror among the civilian population are prohibited.'[89] Additionally, indiscriminate attacks[90] are prohibited.[91] Article 57 provides that in the conduct of military operations, 'constant care shall be taken to spare the civilian population, civilians and civilian objects'.

Although reprisals involving the use of force are now prohibited in international law (unless they can be brought within the framework of customary international law. Whether an aerial attack on a power station fell within the term 'military advantage' could only be understood in the context of military operations between the parties as a whole and not simply in the context of a simple attack, ibid. See also UK, Manual, pp. 55 ff.

[88] See, as to the Kosovo conflict 1999, e.g. J. A. Burger, 'International Humanitarian Law and the Kosovo Crisis', 82 International Review of the Red Cross, 2000, p. 129; P. Rowe, 'Kosovo 1999: The Air Campaign', ibid., p. 147, and W. J. Fenrick, 'Targeting and Proportionality during the NATO Bombing Campaign Against Yugoslavia', 12 EJIL, 2001, p. 489. See also the Review of the NATO Bombing Campaign Against the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia by a review committee of the International Criminal Tribunal for the Former Yugoslavia recommending that no investigation be commenced by the Office of the Prosecutor: see www.un.org/icty/pressreal/nato061300.htm, and the attempt to bring aspects of the bombing campaign before the European Court of Human Rights: see Banković v. Belgium, Judgment of 12 December 2001, 133 ILR, p. 94.

[89] See e.g. the Eritrea–Ethiopia Claims Commission, Partial Award, Western Front, Aerial Bombardment and Related Claims, Eritrea's Claims 1, 3, 5, 9–13, 14, 21, 25 and 26, 19 December 2005, para. 27.

[90] These are defined in article 51(4) as: (a) those which are not directed at a specific military objective; (b) those which employ a method or means of combat which cannot be at a specific military objective; or (c) those which employ a method or means of combat the effects of which cannot be limited as required by Protocol I; and consequently in each such case are of a nature to strike military objectives and civilians or civilian objects without distinction.

[91] See 21(5) UN Chronicle, 1984, p. 3 with regard to an appeal by the UN Secretary-General to Iran and Iraq to refrain from attacks on civilian targets. See also Security Council resolution 540 (1983). The above provisions apply to the use by Iraq in the 1991 Gulf War of missiles deliberately fired at civilian targets. The firing of missiles at Israeli and Saudi Arabian cities in early 1991 constituted, of course, an act of aggression against a state not a party to that conflict: see e.g. The Economist, 26 January 1991, p. 21.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

self-defence),[92] belligerent reprisals during an armed conflict may in certain circumstances be legitimate. Their purpose is to ensure the termination of the prior unlawful act which precipitated the reprisal and a return to legality. They must be proportionate to the prior illegal act.[93] Modern law, however, has restricted their application. Reprisals against prisoners of war are prohibited by article 13 of the Third Geneva Convention, while article 52 of Protocol I provides that civilian objects are not to be the object of attack or of reprisals.[94] Civilian objects are all objects which are not military objectives as defined in article 52(2).[95] Cultural objects and places of worship are also protected,[96] as are objects deemed indispensable to the survival of the civilian population, such as foodstuffs, agricultural areas for the production of foodstuffs, crops, livestock, drinking water installations and supplies, and irrigation works, so long as they are not used as sustenance solely for the armed forces or in direct support of military action.[97] Attacks are also prohibited against works or installations containing dangerous forces, namely dams, dykes and nuclear generating stations.[98]

The right of the parties to an armed conflict to choose methods of warfare is not unconstrained.[99] The preamble of the St Petersburg Declaration of 1868, banning explosives or inflammatory projectiles below 400 grammes in weight, emphasises that the 'only legitimate object which states should endeavour to accomplish during war is to weaken the military forces of the enemy', while article 48 of Protocol I provides that a distinction must at all times be drawn between civilians and combatants. Article 22 of the Hague Regulations points out that the 'right of

[92] See above, chapter 20, p. 1131.

[93] See e.g. Green, Armed Conflict, p. 123; C. J. Greenwood, 'Reprisals and Reciprocity in the New Law of Armed Conflict' in Armed Conflict in the New Law (ed. M. A. Meyer), London, 1989, p. 227, and F. Kalshoven, Belligerent Reprisals, Leiden, 1971.

[94] Similarly wounded, sick, shipwrecked, medical and missing persons; also protected against reprisal are the natural environment and works or installations containing dangerous forces: see articles 20 and 53–6.

[95] See above, p. 1176.

[96] See article 53. See also the Hague Convention for the Protection of Cultural Property in the Event of Armed Conflict, 1954 together with the First Protocol, 1954 and the Second Protocol, 1999. The protections as to cultural property are subject to 'military necessity': see article 4 of the 1954 Convention and articles 6 and 7 of the 1999 Protocol. Under articles 3 and 22 of the Protocol, protection is extended to non-international armed conflicts: see R. O'Keefe, The Protection of Cultural Property in Armed Conflict, Cambridge, 2006, and below, p. 1194.

[97] Article 54. [98] Article 56.

[99] See UK, Manual, chapter 6, and Dinstein, Conduct of Hostilities, chapter 3.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

belligerents to adopt means of injuring the enemy is not unlimited',[100] while article 23(e) stipulates that it is especially prohibited to 'employ arms, projectiles or material calculated to cause unnecessary suffering'.[101] Quite how one may define such weapons is rather controversial and can only be determined in the light of actual state practice.[102] The balance between military necessity and humanitarian considerations is relevant here. The International Court in its Advisory Opinion on the Legality of the Threat or Use of Nuclear Weapons[103] summarised the situation in the following authoritative way:

> The cardinal principles contained in the texts constituting the fabric of humanitarian law are the following. The first is aimed at the protection of the civilian population and civilian objects and establishes the distinction between combatants and non-combatants; states must never make civilians the object of attack and must consequently never use weapons that are incapable of distinguishing between civilian and military targets. According to the second principle, it is prohibited to cause unnecessary suffering to combatants; it is accordingly prohibited to use weapons causing them such harm or uselessly aggravating their suffering. In application of that second principle, states do not have unlimited freedom of choice of means in the weapons they use.

The Court emphasised that the fundamental rules flowing from these principles bound all states, whether or not they had ratified the Hague and Geneva Conventions, since they constituted 'intransgressible principles of international customary law'.[104] At the heart of such rules and principles lies the 'overriding consideration of humanity'.[105] Whether the [100] This is repeated in virtually identical terms in article 35, Protocol I.

[101] See article 35(2) of Protocol I and the Preamble to the 1980 Convention on Conventional Weapons: see M. N. Shaw, 'The United Nations Convention on Prohibitions or Restrictions on the Use of Certain Conventional Weapons, 1981', 9 Review of International Studies, 1983, p. 109 at p. 113. Note that 'employment of poisonous weapons or other weapons calculated to cause unnecessary suffering' is stated to be a violation of the laws and customs of war by article 3(a) of the Statute of the International Criminal Tribunal for the Former Yugoslavia: see Report of the UN Secretary-General, S/25704 and Security Council resolution 827 (1993), and see also article 20(d)e of the Draft Code of Crimes against the Peace and Security of Mankind, Report of the International Law Commission on the Work of its Forty-eighth Session, 1996, A/51/10, pp. 111–12.

[102] See e.g. the United States Department of the Army, Field Manual, The Law of Land Warfare, FM 27–10, 1956, p. 18, and regarding the UK, The Law of War on Land, Part III of the Manual of Military Law, 1958, p. 41.

[103] ICJ Reports, 1996, pp. 226, 257; 110 ILR, p. 163. [104] Ibid.

[105] ICJ Reports, 1996, pp. 226, 257 and 262–3. See also the Corfu Channel case, ICJ Reports, 1949, pp. 4, 22; 16 AD, p. 155.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

actual possession or threat or use of nuclear weapons would be regarded as illegal in international law has been a highly controversial question,[106] although there is no doubt that such weapons fall within the general application of international humanitarian law.[107] The International Court has emphasised that, in examining the legality of any particular situation, the principles regulating the resort to force, including the right to self-defence, need to be coupled with the requirement to consider also the norms governing the means and methods of warfare itself. Accordingly, the types of weapons used and the way in which they are used are also part of the legal equation in analysing the legitimacy of any use of force in international law.[108] The Court analysed state practice and concluded that nuclear weapons were not prohibited either specifically or by express provision.[109] Nor were they prohibited by analogy with poisoned gases prohibited under the Second Hague Declaration of 1899, article 23(a) of the Hague Regulations of 1907 and the Geneva Protocol of 1925.[110] Nor were they prohibited by the series of treaties[111] concerning the acquisition, [106] See e.g. Shimoda v. Japan 32 ILR, p. 626.

[107] Ibid., pp. 259–61. See e.g. International Law, the International Court of Justice and Nuclear Weapons (eds. L. Boisson de Chazournes and P. Sands), Cambridge, 1999; D. Akande, 'Nuclear Weapons, Unclear Law?', 68 BYIL, 1997, p. 165; Nuclear Weapons and International Law (ed. I. Pogany), Aldershot, 1987; Green, Armed Conflict, pp. 128 ff., and Green, 'Nuclear Weapons and the Law of Armed Conflict', 17 Denver Journal of International Law and Policy, 1988, p. 1; N. Singh and E. McWhinney, Nuclear Weapons and Contemporary International Law, Dordrecht, 1988; G. Schwarzenberger, Legality of Nuclear Weapons, London, 1957, and H. Meyrowitz, 'Les Armes Nucléaires et le Droit de la Guerre' in Humanitarian Law of Armed Conflict: Challenges (eds. A. J. M. Delissen and G. J. Tanja), Dordrecht, 1991.

[108] The Court emphasised, for example, that 'a use of force that is proportionate under the law of self-defence, must, in order to be lawful, also meet the requirements of the law applicable in armed conflict', ICJ Reports, 1996, pp. 226, 245; 110 ILR, p. 163. The Court also pointed to the applicability of the principle of neutrality to all international armed conflicts, irrespective of the type of weaponry used, ICJ Reports, 1996, p. 261. See also the Nicaragua case, ICJ Reports, 1986, pp. 3, 112; 76 ILR, pp. 349, 446.

[109] ICJ Reports, 1986, p. 247.

[110] Ibid., p. 248. Nor by treaties concerning other weapons of mass destruction such as the Bacteriological Weapons Treaty, 1972 and the Chemical Weapons Treaty, 1993, ibid., pp. 248–9.

[111] E.g. the Peace Treaties of 10 February 1947; the Austrian State Treaty, 1955; the Nuclear Test Ban Treaty, 1963; the Outer Space Treaty, 1967; the Treaty of Tlatelolco of 14 February 1967 on the Prohibition of Nuclear Weapons in Latin America; the Nuclear Non-Proliferation Treaty, 1968 (extended indefinitely in 1995); the Treaty on the Prohibition of the Emplacement of Nuclear Weapons on the Ocean Floor and Sub-soil, 1971; Treaty of Rarotongo of 6 August 1985 on the Nuclear Weapons-Free Zone of the South Pacific; the Treaty of Final Settlement with Respect to Germany, 1990; the Treaty on the manufacture, deployment and testing of nuclear weapons and the treaties concerning the ban on such weapons in certain areas of the world.[112] Nor were nuclear weapons prohibited as a consequence of a series of General Assembly resolutions, which taken together fell short of establishing the necessary opinio juris for the creation of a new rule to that effect.[113] In so far as the principles of international humanitarian law were concerned, the Court, beyond noting their applicability, could reach no conclusion. The Court felt unable to determine whether the principle of neutrality or the principles of international humanitarian law or indeed the norm of self-defence prohibited the threat or use of nuclear weapons.[114] This rather weak conclusion, however, should be seen in the context of continuing efforts to ban all nuclear weapons testing, the increasing number of treaties prohibiting such weapons in specific geographical areas and the commitment given in 1995 by the five declared nuclear weapons states not to use such weapons against non-nuclear weapons states that are parties to the Nuclear Non-Proliferation Treaty.[115] Nevertheless, it does seem clear that the possession of nuclear weapons and their use in extremis and in strict accordance with the criteria governing the right to self-defence are not prohibited under international law.[116]

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

A number of specific bans on particular weapons has been imposed.[117] Examples would include small projectiles under the St Petersburg formula of 1868, dum-dum bullets under the Hague Declaration of 1899 and asphyxiating and deleterious gases under the Hague Declaration of 1899 and the 1925 Geneva Protocol.[118] Under the 1980 Conventional Weapons Treaty,[119] Protocol I, 1980, it is prohibited to use weapons that cannot be detected by X-rays, while Protocol II, 1980 (minimally amended in 1996), prohibits the use of mines and booby-traps against civilians, Protocol III, 1980, the use of incendiary devices against civilians or against military objectives located within a concentration of civilians where the attack is by South East Asia Nuclear Weapon-Free Zone, 1995 and the Treaty on an African Nuclear Weapon-Free Zone, 1996.

[112] ICJ Reports, 1996, pp. 226, 248–53; 110 ILR, p. 163. [113] ICJ Reports, 1996, pp. 254–5.

[114] Ibid., pp. 262–3 and 266. [115] See Security Council resolution 984 (1995).

[116] See also the UK, Manual, pp. 117 ff., and the US The Law of Land Warfare, 1956, s. 35.

[117] See e.g. Green, Armed Conflict, pp. 133 ff.

[118] See also e.g. the 1972 Convention on the Prohibition of the Development, Production and Stockpiling of Bacteriological Weapons and the 1993 Convention on the Prohibition of the Development, Production, Stockpiling and Use of Chemical Weapons and Their Destruction. See 21(3) UN Chronicle, 1984, p. 3 with regard to the use of chemical weapons in the Iran–Iraq war.

[119] See Shaw, 'Conventional Weapons'. Note article 1 was amended in 2001.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

air-delivered incendiary weapons, Protocol IV, 1995, the use of blinding laser weapons and Protocol V, 2003, concerns the explosive remnants of war. In 1997, the Ottawa Convention on the Prohibition of the Use, Stockpiling, Production and Transfer of Anti-Personnel Mines and on their Destruction was adopted.[120]

Article 35(3) of Additional Protocol I to the 1949 Conventions provides that it is prohibited to employ methods or means of warfare which are intended, or may be expected, to cause widespread, long-term and severe damage to the natural environment.[121] Article 55 further states that care is to be taken in warfare to protect the natural environment against such damage, which may prejudice the health or survival of the population, while noting also that attacks against the natural environment by way of reprisals are prohibited. The Convention on the Prohibition of Military or Any Other Hostile Use of Environmental Modification Techniques, 1977 prohibits such activities having widespread, long-lasting or severe effects as the means of destruction, damage or injury to any other state party.

Armed conflicts: international and internal

The rules of international humanitarian law apply to armed conflicts. Accordingly, no formal declaration of war is required in order for the Conventions to apply. The concept of 'armed conflict' is not defined in the Conventions or Protocols, although it has been noted that 'any difference arising between states and leading to the intervention of members of the armed forces is an armed conflict' and 'an armed conflict exists whenever there is a resort to armed force between states or protracted armed violence between governmental authorities and organized armed groups within a state'.[122]

[120] Note the adoption on 30 May 2008 of a Convention banning the use, stockpiling, production and transfer of cluster munitions.

[121] See, for example, the deliberate spillage of vast quantities of oil into the Persian Gulf by Iraq during the 1991 Gulf War: see The Economist, 2 February 1991, p. 20. See also Green, Armed Conflict, p. 138, and Rogers, Law of the Battlefield, chapter 6.

[122] J. Pictet, Commentary on the Geneva Conventions of 12 August 1949, Geneva, 1952, vol. I, p. 29. In the Tadić case, IT-94-1, Decision on Jurisdiction, para. 70; 105 ILR, pp. 453, 488, the Appeals Chamber of the International Criminal Tribunal for the Former Yugoslavia stated that, 'an armed conflict exists whenever there is a resort to armed force between states or protracted armed violence between governmental authorities and organised armed groups or between such groups within a state'.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

A distinction has historically been drawn between international and non-international armed conflicts,[123] founded upon the difference between inter-state relations, which was the proper focus for international law, and intra-state matters which traditionally fell within the domestic jurisdiction of states and were thus in principle impervious to international legal regulation. However, this difference has been breaking down in recent decades. In the sphere of humanitarian law, this can be seen in the gradual application of such rules to internal armed conflicts.[124] The notion of an armed conflict itself was raised before the Appeals Chamber of the International Criminal Tribunal for the Former Yugoslavia in its decision on jurisdictional issues in the Tadić case.[125] It was claimed that no armed conflict as such existed in the Former Yugoslavia with respect to the circumstances of the instant case since the concept of armed conflict covered only the precise time and place of actual hostilities and the events alleged before the Tribunal did not take place during hostilities. The Appeals Chamber of the Tribunal correctly refused to accept a narrow geographical and temporal definition of armed conflicts, whether international or internal. It was stated that:[126]

> International humanitarian law applies from the initiation of such armed conflicts and extends beyond the cessation of hostilities until a general conclusion of peace is reached; or, in the case of internal conflicts, a peaceful settlement is achieved. Until that moment, international humanitarian law continues to apply in the whole territory of the warring states or, in the case of internal conflicts, the whole territory under the control of a party, whether or not actual combat takes place.

This definition arose in the specific context of the Former Yugoslavia, where it was unclear whether an international or a non-international armed conflict or some kind of mixture of the two was involved. This was important to clarify since it would have had an effect upon the relevant applicable law. The Security Council did not as such classify the nature of the conflict, simply condemning widespread violations of international humanitarian law, including mass forcible expulsion and deportation of civilians, imprisonment and abuse of civilians and deliberate attacks upon non-combatants, and calling for the cessation.[127] The Appeals Chamber [123] See e.g. Green, Armed Conflict, chapter 3. [124] See further below, p. 1194.

[125] Case No. IT-94-1-AR 72; 105 ILR, pp. 453, 486 ff. [126] Ibid., p. 488.
[127] See e.g. Security Council resolution 771 (1992). See also C. Gray, 'Bosnia and Herzegovina: Civil War or Inter-State Conflict? Characterisation and Consequences', 67 BYIL, 1996, p. 155.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

concluded that 'the conflicts in the former Yugoslavia have both internal and international aspects'.[128] Since such conflicts could be classified differently according to time and place, a particularly complex situation was created. However, many of the difficulties that this would have created were mitigated by an acceptance of the evolving application of humanitarian law to internal armed conflicts.[129] This development has arisen partly because of the increasing frequency of internal conflicts and partly because of the increasing brutality in their conduct. The growing interdependence of states in the modern world makes it more and more difficult for third states and international organisations to ignore civil conflicts, especially in view of the scope and insistence of modern communications, while the evolution of international human rights law has contributed to the end of the belief and norm that whatever occurs within other states is the concern of no other state or person.[130] Accordingly, the international community is now more willing to demand the application of international humanitarian law to internal conflicts.[131] In the Tadić case, the Appeals Chamber (in considering jurisdictional issues) concluded that article 3 of its Statute, which gave it jurisdiction over 'violations of the laws or customs of war',[132] provided it with such jurisdiction 'regardless of whether they occurred within an internal or an international armed conflict'.[133] In its decision, the Appeals Chamber noted that,

> It is indisputable that an armed conflict is international if it takes place between two or more States. In addition, in case of an internal armed conflict breaking out on the territory of a State, it may become international (or, depending upon the circumstances, be international in character alongside [128] Case No. IT-94-1-AR; 105 ILR, pp. 453, 494. [129] Ibid., pp. 495 ff.

[130] See e.g. General Assembly resolutions 2444 (XXV) and 2675 (XXV), adopted in 1970 unanimously.

[131] See e.g. Security Council resolutions 788 (1992), 972 (1995) and 1001 (1995) with regard to the Liberian civil war; Security Council resolutions 794 (1992) and 814 (1993) with regard to Somalia; Security Council resolution 993 (1993) with regard to Georgia and resolution 1193 (1998) with regard to Afghanistan.

[132] An historic term now subsumed within the concept of international humanitarian law. Article 3 states that such violations shall include, but not be limited to, the employment of poisonous weapons or other weapons calculated to cause unnecessary suffering; wanton destruction of cities, towns or villages or devastation not justified by military necessity; attack or bombardment of undefended towns, villages or buildings; seizure of or destruction or wilful damage done to institutions dedicated to religion, charity and education, the arts and sciences, historic monuments and works of art and science; and plunder of public or private property.

[133] Case No. IT-94-1-AR 72; 105 ILR, pp. 453, 504. See also the Furundžija case, Case No. IT-95-17/1 (decision of Trial Chamber II, 10 December 1998); 121 ILR, pp. 213, 253–4.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

> an internal armed conflict) if (i) another State intervenes in that conflict through its troops, or alternatively if (ii) some of the participants in the internal armed conflict act on behalf of that other State.[134]

The Appeals Chamber concluded that until 19 May 1992 with the open involvement of the Federal Yugoslav Army, the conflict in Bosnia had been international, but the question arose as to the situation when this army was withdrawn at that date. The Chamber examined the legal criteria for establishing when, in an armed conflict which is prima facie internal, armed forces may be regarded as acting on behalf of a foreign power thus turning the conflict into an international one. The Chamber examined article 4 of the Third Geneva Convention which defines prisoner of war status[135] and noted that states have in practice accepted that belligerents may use paramilitary units and other irregulars in the conduct of hostilities only on the condition that those belligerents are prepared to take responsibility for any infringements committed by such forces. In order for irregulars to qualify as lawful combatants, control over them by a party to an international armed conflict was required and thus a relationship of dependence and allegiance. Accordingly, the term 'belonging to a party to the conflict' used in article 4 implicitly refers to a test of control.[136]

In order to determine the meaning of 'control', the decision of the International Court in the Nicaragua case was examined[137] and rejected, the Appeals Chamber preferring a rather weaker test, concluding that in order to attribute the acts of a military or paramilitary group to a state, it must be proved that the state wields overall control over the group, not only by equipping and financing the group, but also by co-ordinating or helping in the general planning of its military activity. However, it was not necessary that, in addition, the state should also issue, either to the head

[134] Judgment of 15 July 1999, para. 84; 124 ILR, p. 96. [135] See above, p. 1172.

[136] Judgment of 15 July 1999, paras. 94 and 95; 124 ILR, p. 100.

[137] In that case it was held that in order to establish the responsibility of the US over the 'Contra' rebels, it was necessary to show that the state was not only in effective control of a military or paramilitary group, but also that there was effective control of the specific operation in the course of which breaches may have been committed. In order to establish that the US was responsible for 'acts contrary to human rights and humanitarian law' allegedly perpetrated by the Nicaraguan Contras, it was necessary to prove that the US had specifically 'directed or enforced' the perpetration of those acts: see ICJ Reports, 1986, pp. 14, 64–5; 76 ILR, p. 349. The International Court in the Genocide Convention (Bosnia v. Serbia) case, ICJ Reports, 2007, reaffirmed its decision in the Nicaragua case on this point and distinguished the Tadić case: see above, chapter 14, p. 791.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

or to members of the group, instructions for the commission of specific acts contrary to international law.[138]

Accordingly, the line between international and internal armed conflicts may be drawn at the point at which it can be shown that a foreign state is either directly intervening within a civil conflict or exercising 'overall control' over a group that is fighting in that conflict.

The Appeals Chamber in the Kunarac case discussed the issue of the meaning of armed conflict where the fighting is sporadic and does not extend to all of the territory of the state concerned. The Chamber held that the laws of war would apply in the whole territory of the warring states or, in the case of internal armed conflicts, the whole territory under the control of a party to the conflict, whether or not actual combat takes place there, and continued to apply until a general conclusion of peace or, in the case of internal armed conflicts, a peaceful settlement is achieved. A violation of the laws or customs of war may therefore occur at a time when and in a place where no fighting is actually taking place.[139]

Non-international armed conflict[140]

Although the 1949 Geneva Conventions were concerned with international armed conflicts, common article 3 did provide in cases of non-international armed conflicts occurring in the territory of one of the parties a series of minimum guarantees for protecting those not taking an active part in hostilities, including the sick and wounded.[141] Precisely where this article applied was difficult to define in all cases. Non-international armed conflicts could, it may be argued, range from full-scale civil wars to relatively minor disturbances. This poses problems for the state in question which may not appreciate the political implications of the application of the Geneva Conventions, and the lack of the reciprocity element due to the absence of another state adds to the problems of enforcement.

[138] Judgment of 15 July 1999, paras. 131 and 145; 124 ILR, pp. 116 and 121.

[139] Decision of 12 June 2002, Case No. IT-96-23 and IT-96-23/1, para. 57.

[140] See e.g. UK, Manual, chapter 15; L. Moir, The Law of Internal Armed Conflict, Cambridge, 2002; Green, Armed Conflict, chapter 19, and T. Meron, Human Rights in Internal Strife, Cambridge, 1987. See also ICRC, Increasing Respect for International Humanitarian Law in Non-International Armed Conflicts, Geneva, 2008.

[141] Note that the Court in the Nicaragua case, ICJ Reports, 1986, pp. 3, 114; 76 ILR, pp. 349, 448, declared that common article 3 also applied to international armed conflicts as a 'minimum yardstick, in addition to the more elaborate rules which are also to apply to international conflicts'.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

Common article 3 lists the following as the minimum safeguards:

> 1. Persons taking no active part in hostilities to be treated humanely without any adverse distinction based on race, colour, religion or faith, sex, birth or wealth.
>
> To this end the following are prohibited:
>
> a) violence to life and person, in particular murder, cruel treatment and torture;
> b) hostage-taking;
> c) outrages upon human dignity, in particular humiliating and degrading treatment;
> d) the passing of sentences and the carrying out of executions in the absence of due process.
>
> 2. The wounded and the sick are to be cared for.

Common article 3[142] was developed by Protocol II, 1977,[143] which applies by virtue of article 1 to all non-international armed conflicts which take place in the territory of a state party between its armed forces and dissident armed forces. The latter have to be under responsible command and exercise such control over a part of its territory as to enable them to carry out sustained and concerted military operations and actually implement Protocol II. It does not apply to situations of internal disturbances and tensions, such as riots, isolated and sporadic acts of violence and other acts of a similar nature, not being armed conflicts.[144] The Protocol lists a series of fundamental guarantees and other provisions calling for the [142] The International Court in the Nicaragua case stated that the rules contained in common article 3 reflected 'elementary considerations of humanity', ICJ Reports, 1986, pp. 14, 114; 76 ILR, p. 349. See also the Tadić case, Case No. IT-94-1-AR; 105 ILR, pp. 453, 506.

[143] Note, of course, that by article 1(4) of Protocol I, 1977, international armed conflicts are now deemed to include armed conflicts in which peoples are fighting against colonial domination, alien occupation and racist regimes: see D. Forsyth, 'Legal Management of International War', 72 AJIL, 1978, p. 272. Article 96(3), Protocol I, requires the authority representing such peoples to make a special declaration undertaking to apply the Geneva Conventions and Protocol I. The UK made a declaration on ratification of Protocol I to the effect that it would not be bound by any such special declaration unless the UK has expressly recognised that it has been made by a body 'which is genuinely an authority representing a people engaged in an armed conflict': see UK, Manual, p. 384. Note also the UK view that 'a high level of intensity of military operations' is required regarding Protocol I so that the Northern Ireland situation, for example, would not have been covered: see 941 HC Deb., col. 237.

[144] See article 1(2), Protocol II and see article 8(2)d of the Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court, 1998. Article 8(2)e of the Rome Statute lists a series of acts which if committed in internal armed conflicts are considered war crimes.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

protection of non-combatants.[145] In particular, one may note the prohibitions on violence to the life, health and physical and mental well-being of persons, including torture; collective punishment; hostage-taking; acts of terrorism; outrages upon personal dignity, including rape and enforced prostitution; and pillage.[146] Further provisions cover the protection of children;[147] the protection of civilians, including the prohibition of attacks on works or installations containing dangerous forces that might cause severe losses among civilians;[148] the treatment of civilians, including their displacement;[149] and the treatment of prisoners and detainees,[150] and the wounded and sick.[151]

The Appeals Chamber in its decision on jurisdiction in the Tadić case noted that international legal rules had developed to regulate internal armed conflict for a number of reasons, including the frequency of civil wars, the increasing cruelty of internal armed conflicts, the large-scale nature of civil strife making third-party involvement more likely and the growth of international human rights law. Thus the distinction between inter-state and civil wars was losing its value so far as human beings were concerned.[152] Indeed, one of the major themes of international humanitarian law has been the growing move towards the rules of human rights law and vice versa.[153] There is a common foundation in the principle of respect for human dignity.[154]

[145] Note that in non-international armed conflicts the domestic law of the state in which the conflict is taking place continues to apply and that a captured rebel is not entitled to POW status. However, persons captured from either the government or rebel or opposition side are entitled to humane treatment: see e.g. UK, Manual, pp. 387 ff.

[146] See article 4. [147] Article 6. [148] Article 15. [149] Article 17. [150] Article 5.

[151] Article 10. Note that the International Criminal Tribunal for Rwanda has jurisdiction to try violations of common article 3 and Protocol II. These are defined in article 4 of its Statute as including: '(a) Violence to life, health and physical or mental well-being of persons, in particular murder as well as cruel treatment such as torture, mutilation or any form of corporal punishment; (b) Collective punishments; (c) Taking of hostages; (d) Acts of terrorism; (e) Outrages upon personal dignity, in particular humiliating and degrading treatment, rape, enforced prostitution and any form of indecent assault; (f) Pillage; (g) The passing of sentences and the carrying out of executions without previous judgment pronounced by a regularly constituted court, affording all the judicial guarantees which are recognized as indispensable by civilised peoples; and (h) Threats to commit any of the foregoing acts.'

[152] Case No. IT-94-1-AR; 105 ILR, pp. 453, 505 ff. But see Moir, Internal Armed Conflict, pp. 188 ff., and Meron, 'The Continuing Role of Custom in the Formation of International Humanitarian Law', 90 AJIL, 1996, pp. 238, 242–3.

[153] See e.g. Moir, Internal Armed Conflict, chapter 5, and R. Provost, International Human Rights and Humanitarian Law, Cambridge, 2002. See also above, p. 1180.

[154] See the Furundžija case, 121 ILR, pp. 213, 271.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

The principles governing internal armed conflicts in humanitarian law are becoming more extensive, while the principles of international human rights law are also rapidly evolving, particularly with regard to the fundamental non-derogable rights which cannot be breached even in times of public emergency.[155] This area of overlap was recognised in 1970 in General Assembly resolution 2675 (XXV) which emphasised that fundamental human rights 'continue to apply fully in situations of armed conflict', while the European Commission on Human Rights in the Cyprus v. Turkey (First and Second Applications) case declared that in belligerent operations a state was bound to respect not only the humanitarian law laid down in the Geneva Conventions but also fundamental human rights.[156]

The Inter-American Commission of Human Rights in the La Tablada case against Argentina noted that the most difficult aspect of common article 3 related to its application at the blurred line at the lower end separating it from especially violent internal disturbances.[157] It was in situations of internal armed conflict that international humanitarian law and international human rights law 'most converge and reinforce each other', so that, for example, common article 3 and article 4 of the Inter-American Convention on Human Rights both protected the right to life and prohibited arbitrary execution. However, there are difficulties in resorting simply to human rights law when issues of the right to life arise in combat situations. Accordingly, 'the Commission must necessarily look to and apply definitional standards and relevant rules of humanitarian law as sources of authoritative guidance in its resolution' of such issues.[158]

The Commission returned to the issue in Coard v. USA and noted that there was 'an integral linkage between the law of human rights and the humanitarian law because they share a "common nucleus of non-derogable rights and a common purpose of protecting human life and dignity", and there may be a substantial overlap in the application of these bodies of law'.[159]

However, in addition to the overlap between internal armed conflict principles and those of human rights law in situations where the level of [155] See e.g. article 15 of the European Convention on Human Rights, 1950; article 4 of the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights, 1966; and article 27 of the Inter-American Convention on Human Rights, 1969. See also above, chapters 6 and 7.

[156] Report of the Commission of 10 July 1976, paras. 509–10.

[157] Report No. 55/97, Case 11.137 and OEA/Ser.L/V/II.98, para. 153.

[158] Ibid., paras. 160–1.

[159] Case No. 10.951; 123 ILR, pp. 156, 169 (footnote omitted).

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

domestic violence has reached a degree of intensity and continuity, there exists an area of civil conflict which is not covered by humanitarian law since it falls below the necessary threshold of common article 3 and Protocol II.[160] Moves have been underway to bridge the gap between this and the application of international human rights law.[161] The International Committee of the Red Cross has been considering the elaboration of a new declaration on internal strife. In addition, a Declaration of Minimum Humanitarian Standards was adopted by a group of experts in 1990.[162] This Declaration emphasises the prohibition of violence to the life, health and physical and mental well-being of persons, including murder, torture and rape; collective punishment; hostage-taking; practising, permitting or tolerating the involuntary disappearance of individuals; pillage; deliberate deprivation of access to necessary food, drinking water and medicine, and threats or incitement to commit any of these acts.[163] In addition, the Declaration provides inter alia that persons deprived of their liberty should be held in recognised places of detention (article 4); that acts or threats of violence to spread terror are prohibited (article 6); that all human beings have the inherent right to life (article 8); that children are to be protected so that, for example, children under fifteen years of age should not be permitted to join armed groups or forces (article 10); that the wounded and sick should be cared for (article 12) and medical, religious and other humanitarian personnel should be protected and assisted (article 14).[164]

[160] See A. Hay, 'The ICRC and International Humanitarian Issues', International Review of the Red Cross, Jan–Feb 1984, p. 3. See also T. Meron, 'Towards a Humanitarian Declaration on Internal Strife', 78 AJIL, 1984, p. 859; Meron, Human Rights in Internal Strife, and Meron, 'On the Inadequate Reach of Humanitarian and Human Rights Law and the Need for a New Instrument', 77 AJIL, 1983, p. 589, and T. Meron and A. Rosas, 'A Declaration of Minimum Humanitarian Standards', 85 AJIL, 1991, p. 375.

[161] As to international human rights law, see generally above, chapter 6. Problems centre upon the situation where humanitarian law does not apply since the threshold criteria for applicability have not been reached; where the state in question is not a party to the relevant instrument; where derogation from the specified standards is involved as a consequence of the declaration of a state of emergency, and where the party concerned is not a government: see A. Eide, A. Rosas and T. Meron, 'Combating Lawlessness in Gray Zone Conflicts Through Minimum Humanitarian Standards', 89 AJIL, 1995, pp. 215, 217.

[162] This was reprinted in the Report of the UN Sub-Commission: see E/CN.4/1995/116 (1995) and UN Commission on Human Rights resolution 1995/29 and E/CN.4/1995/81 and 116. See also T. Meron and A. Rosas, 'Current Development: A Declaration of Minimum Humanitarian Standards', 85 AJIL, 1991, pp. 375, 375–7.

[163] Article 3.

[164] See also the Declaration for the Protection of War Victims, 1993, A/48/742, Annex.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

Enforcement of humanitarian law[165]

Parties to the 1949 Geneva Conventions and to Protocol I, 1977, undertake to respect and to ensure respect for the instrument in question,[166] and to disseminate knowledge of the principles contained therein.[167] A variety of enforcement methods also exist, although the use of reprisals has been prohibited.[168] One of the means of implementation is the concept of the Protecting Power, appointed to look after the interests of nationals of one party to a conflict under the control of the other, whether as prisoners of war or occupied civilians.[169] Sweden and Switzerland performed this role during the Second World War. Such a Power must ensure that compliance with the relevant provisions has been effected and that the system acts as a form of guarantee for the protected person as well as a channel of communication for him with the state of which he is a national. The drawback of this system is its dependence upon the consent of the parties involved. Not only must the Protecting Power be prepared to act in that capacity, but both the state of which the protected person is a national and the state holding such persons must give their consent for the system to operate.[170] Since the role is so central to the enforcement and working of humanitarian law, it is a disadvantage for it to be subject to state sovereignty and consent. It only requires the holding state to refuse its co-operation for this structure of implementation to be greatly weakened, leaving only reliance upon voluntary operations. This has occurred on a number of occasions, for example the Chinese refusal to consent to the appointment of a Protecting Power with regard to its conflict with India in 1962, and the Indian refusal, of 1971 and subsequently, with regard to Pakistani prisoners of war in its charge.[171] Protocol I also provides for an International Fact-Finding Commission for competence to inquire into grave breaches[172] of the Geneva Conventions and that Protocol or other [165] See e.g. UK, Manual, chapter 16, and Best, War and Law, pp. 370 ff.

[166] Common article 1.

[167] See e.g. articles 127 and 144 of the Third and Fourth Geneva Conventions, article 83 of Protocol I and article 19 of Protocol II.

[168] See e.g. articles 20 and 51(6) of Protocol I.

[169] See e.g. Draper, 'Implementation and Enforcement', pp. 13 ff.

[170] See articles 8, 8, 8 and 9 of the Four Geneva Conventions, 1949, respectively.

[171] Note that the system did operate in the Falklands conflict, with Switzerland acting as the Protecting Power of the UK and Brazil as the Protecting Power of Argentina: see e.g. Levie, 'Falklands Crisis', pp. 68–9.

[172] See articles 50, 51, 130 and 147 of the four 1949 Conventions respectively and article 85 of Protocol I, 1977. A Commission of Experts was established in 1992 to investigate violations of international humanitarian law in the territory of the Former Yugoslavia:

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

serious violations, and to facilitate through its good offices the 'restoration of an attitude of respect' for these instruments.[173] The parties to a conflict may themselves, of course, establish an ad hoc inquiry into alleged violations of humanitarian law.[174]

It is, of course, also the case that breaches of international law in this field may constitute war crimes or crimes against humanity or even genocide for which universal jurisdiction is provided.[175] Article 6 of the Charter of the Nuremberg Tribunal, 1945, for example, includes as war crimes for which there is to be individual responsibility the murder, ill-treatment or deportation to slave labour of the civilian population of an occupied territory; the ill-treatment of prisoners of war; the killing of hostages and the wanton destruction of cities, towns and villages.[176]

A great deal of valuable work in the sphere of humanitarian law has been accomplished by the International Red Cross.[177] This indispensable organisation consists of the International Committee of the Red Cross (ICRC), over 100 national Red Cross (or Red Crescent) societies with a League co-ordinating their activities, and conferences of all these elements every four years. The ICRC is the most active body and has a wide-ranging series of functions to perform, including working for the application of the Geneva Conventions and acting in natural and man-made disasters. It has operated in a large number of states, visiting prisoners of war[178] and otherwise functioning to ensure the implementation of humanitarian law.[179] It operates in both international and internal armed conflict see Security Council resolution 780 (1992). See also the Report of the Commission of 27 May 1994, S/1994/674.

173 Article 90, Protocol I, 1977.

174 Articles 52, 53, 132 and 149 of the four 1949 Conventions respectively.

175 See e.g. Draper, 'Implementation and Enforcement', pp. 35 ff. Note also that grave breaches are to be the subject of sanction.

176 See further, with regard to the statutes of the various war crimes tribunals, above, chapters 8 and 12. Note also the UN Compensation Commission dealing with compensation for victims of Iraq's invasion of Kuwait in 1990, above, chapter 18, p. 1045.

177 See e.g. G. Willemin and R. Heacock, The International Committee of the Red Cross, The Hague, 1984, and D. Forsythe, 'The Red Cross as Transnational Movement', 30 International Organisation, 1967, p. 607. See also Best, War and Law, pp. 347 ff.

178 See e.g. articles 126 and 142 of the Third and Fourth Geneva Conventions respectively.

179 The International Court in the Construction of a Wall case, ICJ Reports, 2004, pp. 136, 175–6; 129 ILR, pp. 37, 94, referred to the 'special position' of the ICRC with regard to the Fourth Geneva Convention, while the Eritrea–Ethiopia Claims Commission in the Partial Award, Prisoners of War, Ethiopia's Claim 4, 1 July 2003, paras. 58 and 61–2, noted that the ICRC had been assigned significant responsibilities in a number of articles of the Third Geneva Convention (with which it was concerned) both as 'a humanitarian organization providing relief and as an organization providing necessary and vital external scrutiny of

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

situations. One of the largest operations it has undertaken since 1948 related to the Nigerian civil war, and in that conflict nearly twenty of its personnel were killed on duty. The ICRC has since been deeply involved in the Yugoslav situation and indeed, in 1992, contrary to its usual confidentiality approach, it felt impelled to speak out publicly against the grave breaches of humanitarian law taking place. The organisation has also been involved in Somalia (where its activities included visiting detainees held by the UN forces), Rwanda, Afghanistan, Sri Lanka[180] and in Iraq. Due to circumstances, the ICRC must act with tact and discretion and in many cases states refuse their co-operation. It performed a valuable function in the exchange of prisoners after the 1967 and 1973 Middle East wars, although for several years Israel did not accept the ICRC role regarding the Arab territories it occupied.[181]

Conclusion

The ICRC formulated the following principles as a guide to the relevant legal rules:

1. Persons hors de combat and those who do not take a direct part in hostilities are entitled to respect for their lives and physical and moral integrity. They shall in all circumstances be protected and treated humanely without any adverse distinctions.
2. It is forbidden to kill or injure an enemy who surrenders or who is hors de combat.
3. The wounded and sick shall be collected and cared for by the party to the conflict which has them in its power. Protection also covers medical personnel, establishments, transports and matériel. The emblem of the red cross (red crescent, red lion and sun) is the sign of such protection and must be respected.
4. Captured combatants and civilians under the authority of an adverse party are entitled to respect for their lives, dignity, personal rights and convictions. They shall be protected against all acts of violence and the treatment of POWs' and further emphasised that the provisions requiring scrutiny of the treatment of, and access to, POWs had become part of customary international law.

[180] See e.g. Challenges of the Nineties: ICRC Special Report on Activities 1990–1995, Geneva, 1995. Between 1990 and 1994, over half a million prisoners in over sixty countries were visited by ICRC delegates, ibid.

[181] See generally Annual Report of the ICRC, 1982. See also 'Action by the ICRC in the Event of Breaches of International Humanitarian Law', International Review of the Red Cross, March–April 1981, p. 1.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

reprisals. They shall have the right to correspond with their families and to receive relief.

5. Everyone shall be entitled to benefit from fundamental judicial guarantees. No one shall be held responsible for an act he has not committed. No one shall be subjected to physical or mental torture, corporal punishment or cruel or degrading treatment.
6. Parties to a conflict and members of their armed forces do not have an unlimited choice of methods and means of warfare. It is prohibited to employ weapons or methods of warfare of a nature to cause unnecessary losses or excessive suffering.
7. Parties to a conflict shall at all times distinguish between the civilian population and combatants in order to spare civilian population and property. Neither the civilian populations as such nor civilian persons shall be the object for attack. Attacks shall be directed solely against military objectives.[182]

In addition, the ICRC has published the following statement with regard to non-international armed conflicts:

A. General Rules

1. The obligation to distinguish between combatants and civilians is a general rule applicable in non-international armed conflicts. It prohibits indiscriminate attacks.
2. The prohibition of attacks against the civilian population as such or against individual civilians is a general rule applicable in non-international armed conflicts. Acts of violence intended primarily to spread terror among the civilian population are also prohibited.
3. The prohibition of superfluous injury or unnecessary suffering is a general rule applicable in non-international armed conflicts. It prohibits, in particular, the use of means of warfare which uselessly aggravate the sufferings of disabled men or render their death inevitable.
4. The prohibition to kill, injure or capture an adversary by resort to perfidy is a general rule applicable in non-international armed conflicts; in a non-international armed conflict, acts inviting the confidence of an adversary to lead him to believe that he is entitled to, or obliged to accord protection under the rules of international law applicable in non-international armed conflicts, with intent to betray that confidence, shall constitute perfidy.

[182] See International Review of the Red Cross, Sept.–Oct. 1978, p. 247. See also Green, Armed Conflict, pp. 355–6.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

5. The obligation to respect and protect medical and religious personnel and medical units and transports in the conduct of military operations is a general rule applicable in non-international armed conflicts.
6. The general rule prohibiting attacks against the civilian population implies, as a corollary, the prohibition of attacks on dwellings and other installations which are used only by the civilian population.
7. The general rule prohibiting attacks against the civilian population implies, as a corollary, the prohibition to attack, destroy, remove or render useless objects indispensable to the survival of the civilian population.
8. The general rule to distinguish between combatants and civilians and the prohibition of attack against the civilian population as such or against individual civilians implies, in order to be effective, that all feasible precautions have to be taken to avoid injury, loss or damage to the civilian population.[183]

Suggestions for further reading

I. Detter, The Law of War, 2nd edn, Cambridge, 2000

Y. Dinstein, The Conduct of Hostilities under the Law of International Armed Conflict, Cambridge, 2004

L. Green, The Contemporary Law of Armed Conflict, 2nd edn, Manchester, 2000

UK Ministry of Defence, Manual on the Law of Armed Conflict, Oxford, 2004

[183] See International Review of the Red Cross, Sept.–Oct. 1989, p. 404. See also Green, Armed Conflict, p. 356. Part B of this Declaration dealing with Prohibitions and Restrictions on the Use of Certain Weapons has been omitted. It may be found at the above references.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

22

The United Nations

The UN system

The United Nations[1] was established following the conclusion of the Second World War and in the light of Allied planning and intentions expressed during that conflict.[2] The purposes of the UN are set out in article 1 of the Charter as follows:

> 1. To maintain international peace and security, and to that end, to take effective collective measures for the prevention and removal of threats to the peace, and for the suppression of acts of aggression or other breaches of the peace, and to bring about by peaceful means, and in conformity with the principles of justice and international law, adjustment or settlement of international disputes or situations which might lead to a breach of the peace;
>
> 2. To develop friendly relations among nations based on respect for the principle of equal rights and self-determination of peoples, and to take other appropriate measures to strengthen universal peace;
>
> 3. To achieve international co-operation in solving international problems of an economic, social, cultural or humanitarian character, and in

[1] See e.g. The Charter of the United Nations (ed. B. Simma), 2nd edn, Oxford, 2002; J. P. Cot, A. Pellet and M. Forteau, La Charte des Nations Unies: Commentaire Article par Article, 3rd edn, Paris, 2005; S. Chesterman, T. M. Franck and D. M. Malone, Law and Practice of the United Nations, Oxford, 2008; La Charte des Nations Unies, Constitution Mondiale? (eds. R. Chemain and A. Pellet), Paris 2006; B. Conforti, The Law and Practice of the United Nations, 2nd edn, The Hague, 2000; United Nations Legal Order (eds. O. Schachter and C. C. Joyner), Cambridge, 2 vols., 1995; Bowett's Law of International Institutions (eds. P. Sands and P. Klein), 5th edn, London, 2001, chapter 2; The United Nations and a Just World Order (eds. R. A. Falk, S. S. Kim and S. H. Mendlovitz), Boulder, 1991; B. Broms, United Nations, Helsinki, 1990; E. Luard, A History of the United Nations, London, 1982, vol. I; R. Higgins, The Development of International Law Through the Political Organs of the United Nations, Oxford, 1963; United Nations, Divided World (eds. A. Roberts and B. Kingsbury), 2nd edn, Oxford, 1993; L. M. Goodrich, The United Nations in a Changing World, New York, 1974; the Bertrand Report, 1985, A/40/988, and L. M. Goodrich, E. Hambro and A. P. Simons, Charter of the United Nations, 3rd edn, New York, 1969. See also www.un.org/.

[2] See UNCIO, San Francisco, 15 vols., 1945.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

promoting and encouraging respect for human rights and for fundamental freedoms for all without distinction as to race, sex, language, or religion; and

4. To be a centre for harmonizing the actions of nations in the attainment of these common ends.

While the purposes are clearly wide-ranging, they do provide a useful guide to the comprehensiveness of its concerns. The question of priorities as between the various issues noted is constantly subject to controversy and change, but this only reflects the continuing pressures and altering political balances within the organisation. In particular, the emphasis upon decolonisation, self-determination and apartheid mirrored the growth in UN membership and the dismantling of the colonial empires, while increasing concern with economic and developmental issues is now very apparent and clearly reflects the adverse economic conditions in various parts of the world.

The Charter of the United Nations is not only the multilateral treaty which created the organisation and outlined the rights and obligations of those states signing it, it is also the constitution of the UN, laying down its functions and prescribing its limitations.[3] Foremost amongst these is the recognition of the sovereignty and independence of the member states. Under article 2(7) of the Charter, the UN may not intervene in matters essentially within the domestic jurisdiction of any state (unless enforcement measures under Chapter VII are to be applied). This provision has inspired many debates in the UN, and it came to be accepted that colonial issues were not to be regarded as falling within the article 2(7) restriction. Other changes have also occurred, demonstrating that the concept of domestic jurisdiction is not immutable but a principle of international law delineating international and domestic spheres of operations. As a principle of international law it is susceptible of change through international law and is not dependent upon the unilateral determination of individual states.[4]

In addition to the domestic jurisdiction provision, article 2 also lays down a variety of other principles in accordance with which both the UN and the member states are obliged to act. These include the assertion that the UN is based upon the sovereign equality of states and the principles of fulfilment in good faith of the obligations contained in the Charter, the peaceful settlement of disputes and the prohibition on the use of force.

[3] See Chesterman et al., United Nations, pp. 4 ff. [4] See above, chapter 12, p. 647.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

It is also provided that member states must assist the organisation in its activities taken in accordance with the Charter and must refrain from assisting states against which the UN is taking preventive or enforcement action.

The UN has six principal organs, these being the Security Council, General Assembly, Economic and Social Council, Trusteeship Council, Secretariat and International Court of Justice.[5]

The Security Council[6]

The Council was intended to operate as an efficient executive organ of limited membership, functioning continuously. It was given primary responsibility for the maintenance of international peace and security.[7] The Security Council consists of fifteen members, five of them being permanent members (USA, UK, Russia, China and France). These permanent members, chosen on the basis of power politics in 1945, have the veto. Under article 27 of the Charter, on all but procedural matters, decisions of the Council must be made by an affirmative vote of nine members, including the concurring votes of the permanent members.

A negative vote by any of the permanent members is therefore sufficient to veto any resolution of the Council, save with regard to procedural questions, where nine affirmative votes are all that is required. The veto was written into the Charter in view of the exigencies of power. The USSR, in particular, would not have been willing to accept the UN as it was envisaged without the establishment of the veto to protect it from the Western bias of the Council and General Assembly at that time.[8] In practice, the veto was exercised by the Soviet Union on a considerable [5] See e.g. The United Nations at the Millennium (eds. P. Taylor and A. J. R. Groom), London, 2000. As to the administration of territory by the UN, see above, chapter 5, p. 230.

[6] See e.g. C. Denis, Le Pouvoir Normatif du Conseil de Sécurité des Nations Unies: Portée et Limites, Brussels, 2004; M. Hilaire, United Nations Law and the Security Council, Aldershot, 2005; The UN Security Council from the Cold War to the 21st Century (ed. D. M. Malone), Boulder, 2004; Cot et al., Charte, pp. 867 ff.; S. Bailey and S. Daws, The Procedure of the UN Security Council, Oxford, 1998; S. Bailey, Voting in the Security Council, Oxford, 1969, and Bailey, The Procedure of the Security Council, 2nd edn, Oxford, 1988; Bowett's International Institutions, p. 39, and R. Higgins, 'The Place of International Law in the Settlement of Disputes by the Security Council', 64 AJIL, 1970, p. 1. See also M. C. Wood, 'Security Council Working Methods and Procedure: Recent Developments', 45 ICLQ, 1996, p. 150.

[7] Articles 23, 24, 25 and 28 of the UN Charter.

[8] See e.g. H. G. Nicholas, The United Nations as a Political Institution, Oxford, 1975, pp. 10–13.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

number of occasions, and by the USA less frequently, and by the other members fairly rarely. In more recent years, the exercise of the veto by the US has increased. The question of how one distinguishes between procedural and non-procedural matters has been a highly controversial one. In the statement of the Sponsoring Powers at San Francisco, it was declared that the issue of whether or not a matter was procedural was itself subject to the veto.[9] This 'double-veto' constitutes a formidable barrier. Subsequent practice has interpreted the phrase 'concurring votes of the permanent members' in article 27 in such a way as to permit abstentions. Accordingly, permanent members may abstain with regard to a resolution of the Security Council without being deemed to have exercised their veto against it.[10]

It does not, of course, follow that the five supreme powers of 1945 will continue to be the only permanent members of the Council nor the only ones with a veto.[11] However, the complicated mechanisms for amendment of the Charter,[12] coupled with the existence of the veto, make any change difficult. The question of expansion of Council membership has been before the UN for an appreciable period and various proposals have been made.[13] One proposal would provide for six new permanent seats with [9] Repertory of Practice of UN Organs, New York, 1955, vol. II, p. 104. See also Simma, Charter, p. 489.

[10] See e.g. A. Stavropoulos, 'The Practice of Voluntary Abstentions by Permanent Members of the Security Council under Article 27(3) of the Charter', 61 AJIL, 1967, p. 737. See also the Namibia case, ICJ Reports, 1971, pp. 16, 22; 49 ILR, pp. 2, 12, recognising this practice as lawful.

[11] Of the ten non-permanent seats, five are allocated to Afro-Asian states, one to Eastern Europe, two to Latin America, and two to Western European and other powers: see General Assembly resolution 1991 (XVIII).

[12] See articles 108 and 109 of the Charter, which require inter alia the consent of all the permanent members to any amendment to or alteration of the Charter. It may indeed be suggested that the speed with which Russia was accepted as the continuance of the former USSR with regard to the permanent seat on the Security Council partly arose out of a desire by the Council to avoid opening up the question of membership for general debate: see F. Kirgis, International Organisations in their Legal Setting, 2nd edn, St Paul, 1993, pp. 188 ff. See also above, chapter 17, p. 960.

[13] See e.g. the Report of the High Level Panel on Threats, Challenges and Change, 2004, A/59/565, especially paras. 244 ff. detailing the two proposals made (models A and B respectively) and Secretary-General, In Larger Freedom, A/59/2005, paras. 167 ff. The General Assembly has also been considering the question of the 'equitable representation on and increase in the membership of the Security Council' and an open-ended working group was established in 1993 to consider the matter further: see General Assembly resolution 48/26. In 2007, the President of the General Assembly appointed five facilitators, who reported that expansion of the Council needed to be based both on the contribution of member states to the maintenance of international peace and security and to the other

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

no veto and three new non-permanent seats. Another would provide for no new permanent seats but a new category of eight four-year renewable-term seats and one new two-year non-permanent and non-renewable seat. States usually seen as candidates for permanent positions on the Council include Germany, India, Japan and Brazil, but others are also keen to be considered and no consensus is yet in sight.

The Council has currently three permanent committees, being a Committee of Experts on Rules of Procedure, a Committee on Admission of New Members and a Committee on Council meeting away from Headquarters. There are also a number of ad hoc committees, such as the Governing Council of the United Nations Compensation Commission established by Security Council resolution 692 (1991), the Counter-Terrorism Committee[14] and the Committee established by resolution 1540 (2004), which obliges states inter alia to refrain from supporting by any means non-state actors from developing, acquiring, manufacturing, possessing, transporting, transferring or using nuclear, chemical or biological weapons and their delivery systems. There are also a number of sanctions committees covering particular states under sanction as well as the committee established under resolution 1267 (1999) concerning persons and bodies associated with Al-Qaida and the Taliban.[15] Further subsidiary bodies include the Peacebuilding Commission, the UN Compensation Commission and the International Criminal Tribunals for the Former Yugoslavia and for Rwanda.

The Security Council acts on behalf of the members of the organisation as a whole in performing its functions, and its decisions (but not its recommendations)[16] are binding upon all member states.[17] Its powers are concentrated in two particular categories, the peaceful settlement of disputes and the adoption of enforcement measures. By these means, the Council conducts its primary task, the maintenance of international peace purposes of the United Nations and on equitable geographical distribution, while addressing the underrepresentation of developing countries as well as small states, A/61/47, pp. 11 ff. See also Chesterman et al., United Nations, chapter 17; A. Blanc Altemir and B. Real, 'La Réforme du Conseil de Sécurité des Nations Unies: Quelle Structure et Quels Membres?', 110 RGDIP, 2006, p. 801, and Y. Blum, 'Proposals for UN Security Council Reform', 99 AJIL, 2005, p. 632.

[14] Established under resolution 1373 (2001). See above, chapter 20, p. 1162.

[15] As amended by a number of subsequent resolutions, including resolution 1735 (2006): see further above, chapter 20, p. 1163, note 225.

[16] Compare, for example, article 36 of the Charter (peaceful settlement) with articles 41, 42 and 44 (enforcement actions).

[17] Article 25 of the Charter.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

and security. However, the Council also has a variety of other functions. In the case of trusteeship territories, for example, designated strategic areas fall within the authority of the Security Council rather than the General Assembly,[18] while the admission, suspension and expulsion of member states is carried out by the General Assembly upon the recommendation of the Council.[19] Amendments to the UN Charter require the ratification of all the permanent members of the Council (as well as adoption by a two-thirds vote of the Assembly and ratification by two-thirds of UN members).[20] The judges of the International Court are elected by the Assembly and Council.[21]

Until the end of the Cold War, the Council generally did not fulfil the expectations held of it, although resolution 242 (1967) laid down the basis for negotiations for a Middle East peace settlement and is regarded as the most authoritative expression of the principles to be taken into account.[22] With the development of the glasnost and perestroika policies in the Soviet Union in the late 1980s, increasing co-operation with the US ensued and reached its highest point as the Kuwait crisis evolved.[23] After the attacks on the US of 11 September 2001, further activities ensued, including the adoption of resolutions 1368 and 1373 of 2001 condemning international terrorism, reaffirming the right of self-defence and establishing a Counter-Terrorism Committee. However, the failure of the Council to agree upon measures consequent to resolution 1441 (2002) concerning Iraq's possession of weapons of mass destruction contrary to resolution 687 (1991) and others precipitated a major division within the Council. The US and the UK commenced military operations against Iraq in late March 2003 without express Security Council authorisation and against the opposition of other permanent members.[24] However, despite this crisis, the Council has begun to assume a more proactive role in [19] See articles 4, 5 and 6 of the Charter. The restoration of the rights and privileges of a suspended member is by the Council, article 5.

[18] See articles 82 and 83 of the Charter.

[20] Article 108. A similar requirement operates with regard to alteration of the Charter by a General Conference of Members: see article 109.

[21] Article 4 of the Statute of the International Court of Justice.

[22] Reaffirmed in resolution 338 (1973). See generally I. Pogany, The Security Council and the Arab–Israeli Conflict, Aldershot, 1984, chapter 5, and A. Shapira, 'The Security Council Resolution of November 22, 1967 – Its Legal Nature and Implications', 4 Israel Law Review, 1969, p. 229.

[23] See below, p. 1243. See also The Kuwait Crisis: Basic Documents (eds. E. Lauterpacht, C. Greenwood, M. Weller and D. Bethlehem), Cambridge, 1991.

[24] See further below, p. 1255.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

certain areas. The effect of resolutions 1373 (2001) and 1540 (2004) with the establishment of monitoring committees with significant authority, together with the increasing use of sanctions against specific states, has led some to talk of legislative activity.[25]

The failure of the Council in its primary responsibility to preserve world peace stimulated a number of other developments. It encouraged the General Assembly to assume a residual responsibility for maintaining international peace and security, it encouraged the Secretary-General to take upon himself a more active role and it hastened the development of peacekeeping operations. It also encouraged in some measure the establishment of the military alliances, such as NATO and the Warsaw Pact, which arose as a consequence of the onset of the Cold War and constituted, in effect, regional enforcement systems bypassing the Security Council.

The General Assembly [26]

The General Assembly is the parliamentary body of the UN organisation and consists of representatives of all the member states, of which there are currently 192. Membership of the UN, as provided by article 4 of the Charter, is open to:

> all other peace-loving states which accept the obligations contained in the present Charter and, in the judgment of the organisation, are able and willing to carry out these obligations, and is effected by a decision of the General Assembly upon the recommendation of the Security Council.[27] Other changes in membership may [25] See e.g. J. E. Alvarez, 'Hegemonic International Law Revisited', 97 AJIL, 2003, p. 873, and S. Talmon, 'The Security Council of World Legislature', 99 AJIL, 2005, p. 175. See further as to these resolutions, above, chapter 20, p. 1208.

[26] See e.g. Bowett's International Institutions, pp. 27 ff.; Cot et al., Charte, pp. 631 ff.; Nicholas, United Nations, chapter 5; B. Finley, The Structure of the United Nations General Assembly, Dobbs Ferry, 3 vols., 1977, and S. Bailey, The General Assembly of the United Nations, London, 1964.

[27] An advisory opinion by the International Court held that only the conditions enumerated in article 4 were to be taken into account in considering a request for membership: the Conditions of Admission of a State to Membership of the United Nations case, ICJ Reports, 1948, p. 57; 15 AD, p. 333. See also the Competence of the General Assembly for the Admission of a State to the United Nations case, ICJ Reports, 1950, p. 4; 17 ILR, p. 326, where the Court held that the General Assembly alone could not effect membership in the absence of a recommendation by the Security Council. See also Chesterman et al., United Nations, chapter 5, and Cot et al., Charte, pp. 511 ff.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

take place. For example, in 1991, Byelorussia informed the UN that it had changed its name to Belarus, while the Czech and Slovak Federal Republic ceased to exist on 31 December 1992 to be replaced by two new states (the Czech Republic and Slovakia), accepted as UN members on 19 January 1993. The former German Democratic Republic ceased to exist and its territory was absorbed into the Federal Republic of Germany as from 3 October 1990, while 'The Former Yugoslav Republic of Macedonia' was admitted to the UN on 8 April 1993 under that unusual appellation. Russia was regarded as the continuator of the Soviet Union, so no action was required. In November 2000, the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia was admitted as a new member and in February 2003 it changed its name to Serbia and Montenegro. In 2006, Montenegro seceded and became a member of the UN in its own right.[28] Membership of the UN may be suspended under article 5 of the Charter by the General Assembly, upon the recommendation of the Security Council, where the member state concerned is the object of preventive or enforcement action by the Security Council. Article 6 allows for expulsion of a member by the General Assembly, upon the recommendation of the Security Council, where the member state has persistently violated the Principles contained in the Charter.[29]

Voting in the Assembly is governed by article 18, which stipulates that each member has one vote only, despite widespread disparities in populations and resources between states, and that decisions on 'important questions', including the admission of new members and recommendations relating to international peace and security, are to be made by a two-thirds majority of members present and voting.[30]

[28] See as to succession issues, Chesterman et al., United Nations, pp. 173 ff. and see further as to Yugoslavia and the UN, above, chapter 17, p. 962.

[29] See article 2. See also as to the question of the refusal of credentials to General Assembly delegations e.g. Chesterman et al., United Nations, pp. 191 ff.; Simma, Charter, pp. 253 ff.; D. Ciobanu, 'Credentials of Delegations and Representation of Member States at the United Nations', 25 ICLQ, 1976, p. 351, and M. Halberstam, 'Excluding Israel from the General Assembly by a Rejection of its Credentials', 78 AJIL, 1984, p. 179.

[30] See e.g. G. Clarke and L. B. Sohn, World Peace Through World Law, Cambridge, 1958, pp. 19–30; The Strategy of World Order (eds. R. A. Falk and S. H. Mendlovitz), New York, 1966, vol. III, pp. 272 ff., and L. B. Sohn, Cases on United Nations Law, 2nd edn, Brooklyn, 1967, pp. 248 ff. Note also the emergence of bloc voting, whereby, for example, the Afro-Asian states agree to adopt a common stance on particular issues, which has been a constant feature of the work of the Assembly.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

Except for certain internal matters, such as the budget,[31] the Assembly cannot bind its members. It is not a legislature in that sense, and its resolutions are purely recommendatory. Such resolutions, of course, may be binding if they reflect rules of customary international law and they are significant as instances of state practice that may lead to the formation of a new customary rule, but Assembly resolutions in themselves cannot establish binding legal obligations for member states.[32] The Assembly is essentially a debating chamber, a forum for the exchange of ideas and the discussion of a wide-ranging category of problems. It meets in annual sessions, but special sessions may be called by the Secretary-General at the request of the Security Council or a majority of UN members.[33] Emergency special sessions may also be called by virtue of the Uniting for Peace machinery.[34] Ten such sessions have been convened, covering situations ranging from various aspects of the Middle East situation in 1956, 1958, 1967, 1980 and 1982 and a rolling session commencing in 1997, to Afghanistan in 1980 and Namibia in 1981.

The Assembly has established a variety of organs covering a wide range of topics and activities. It has six main committees that cover respectively disarmament and international security; economic and financial; social, humanitarian and cultural; special political and decolonisation; administrative and budgetary; and legal matters.[35] In addition, there is a procedural General Committee dealing with agenda issues and a Credentials Committee. There are also two Standing Committees dealing with inter-sessional administrative and budgetary questions and contributions, and a number of subsidiary, ad hoc and other bodies dealing with relevant topics, including the International Law Commission, the UN Commission on International Trade Law, the UN Institute for Training and Research, the Council for Namibia and the UN Relief and Works

[31] Article 17 of the Charter. [32] See further above, chapter 3, p. 114.

[33] Article 20 of the Charter. Such special sessions have been held, for example, to discuss the issues of Palestine in 1947–8, Namibia (South West Africa) in 1967, 1978 and 1986, and to debate the world economic order in 1974, 1975 and 1990. Other issues covered include financing the UN Interim Force in Lebanon in 1978, apartheid in 1989, disarmament in 1978, 1982 and 1988, drug abuse in 1990 and 1998, small island developing states in 1999, women in 2000, HIV/AIDS in 2001, children in 2002 and commemoration of the sixtieth anniversary of the liberation of the concentration camps in 2005.

[34] See below, p. 1272.

[35] See e.g. Broms, United Nations, pp. 198 ff. Note that in 1993, the Special Political Committee was merged with the Fourth Committee on Decolonisation: see General Assembly resolution 47/233.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

Agency.[36] The Human Rights Council, established in 2006, is elected by and reports to the Assembly.[37]

Other principal organs [38]

Much of the work of the United Nations in the economic and social spheres of activity is performed by the Economic and Social Council (ECOSOC). It can discuss a wide range of matters, but its powers are restricted and its recommendations are not binding upon UN member states. It consists of fifty-four members elected by the Assembly for three-year terms with staggered elections, and each member has one vote.[39] The Council may, by article 62, initiate or make studies upon a range of issues and make recommendations to the General Assembly, the members of the UN and to the relevant specialised agencies. It may prepare draft conventions for submission to the Assembly and call international conferences. The Council has created a variety of subsidiary organs, ranging from nine functional commissions,[40] to five regional commissions[41] and a number of standing committees and expert bodies.[42] The Council also runs a variety of programmes including the Environment Programme and the Drug Control Programme, and has established a number of other bodies such as the Office of the UN High Commissioner for Refugees and the UN Conference on Trade and Development. Its most prominent function has been in establishing a wide range of economic, social and human rights bodies.[43]

[36] See e.g. 2001 United Nations Handbook, Wellington, 2001, pp. 27 ff. There is also an Investments Committee and a Board of Auditors.

[37] See above, chapter 6, p. 306.

[38] See e.g. 2001 United Nations Handbook, pp. 83 ff., and Broms, United Nations, chapter 11. See also Bowett's International Institutions, p. 55; W. R. Sharp, The UN Economic Council, New York, 1969, and above, chapter 6, p. 302.

[39] Article 61 of the Charter. Note that under article 69, any member of the UN may be invited to participate in its deliberations without a vote. See also Cot et al., Charte, pp. 1581 ff.

[40] These include the Statistical Commission, the Commission on Human Rights which came to an end in 2006, the Commission on the Status of Women and the Commission on Sustainable Development.

[41] On Africa, Asia and the Pacific, Europe, Latin America and the Caribbean, and Western Asia.

[42] These include the Commission on Transnational Corporations; the Commission on Human Settlements; the Committee on Natural Resources; the Committee on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights and the Committee on New and Renewable Sources of Energy and on Energy for Development.

[43] ECOSOC is considering a range of reforms, including holding annual ministerial substantive reviews (AMR) to assess the progress made in the implementation of the outcomes

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

The Trusteeship Council[44] was established in order to supervise the trust territories created after the end of the Second World War.[45] Such territories were to consist of mandated territories, areas detached from enemy states as a result of the Second World War and other territories voluntarily placed under the trusteeship system by the administering authority (of which there have been none).[46] The only former mandated territory which was not placed under the new system or granted independence was South West Africa.[47] With the independence of Palau, the last remaining trust territory, on 1 October 1994, the Council suspended operation on 1 November that year.[48]

The Secretariat of the UN[49] consists of the Secretary-General and his staff, and constitutes virtually an international civil service. The staff are appointed by article 101 upon the basis of efficiency, competence and integrity, 'due regard' being paid 'to the importance of recruiting the staff on as wide a geographical basis as possible'. All member states have undertaken, under article 100, to respect the exclusively international character of the responsibilities of the Secretary-General and his staff, of major UN conferences and summits and internationally agreed development goals: see General Assembly resolution 61/16, 2006, and ECOSOC resolution E/2007/274, 2007.

44 See e.g. Cot et al., Charte, pp. 1887 ff.; Broms, United Nations, chapter 12; Bowett's International Institutions, p. 63, and C. E. Toussaint, The Trusteeship System of the United Nations, New York, 1956.

45 By article 83 of the Charter, the functions of the UN relating to strategic areas were to be exercised by the Security Council (where each permanent member has a veto) rather than, as normal for trust territories, under article 85 by the General Assembly with the assistance of the Trusteeship Council. The last trust territory was the strategic trust territory of the Pacific Islands, administered by the US.

46 Article 77 of the Charter. 47 See above, chapter 5, p. 225.

48 See e.g. Basic Facts About the United Nations, E.95.I.3.1 and Press Release ORG/1211/Rev.1. Note that the UN Secretary-General has called for its formal termination, but this would require an amendment of the Charter: see A/49/1. See also C. L. Willson, 'Changing the Charter: The United Nations Prepares for the Twenty-First Century', 90 AJIL, 1996, pp. 115, 121–2.

49 See e.g. Chesterman et al., United Nations, chapter 4; Cot et al., Charte, pp. 2023 ff.; S. Bailey, 'The United Nations Secretariat' in The Evolution of International Organisations (ed. E. Luard), London, 1966, p. 92, and Bailey, The Secretariat of the UN, London, 1962; T. Meron, The UN Secretariat, Lexington, 1977; S. Schwebel, The Secretary-General of the United Nations, Cambridge, MA, 1952, and Schwebel, 'The International Character of the Secretariat of the United Nations' and 'Secretary-General and Secretariat' in Justice in International Law, Cambridge, 1994, pp. 248 and 297 respectively; A. W. Rovine, The First Fifty Years: The Secretary General in World Politics, 1920–1970, Leiden, 1970, and generally Public Papers of the Secretaries-General of the United Nations (eds. A. W. Cordier and W. Foote, and A. W. Cordier and M. Harrelson), New York, 8 vols., 1969–77. See also Simma, Charter, pp. 1191 ff., and below, p. 1222.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

who are neither to seek nor receive instructions from any other authority but the UN organisation itself.

Under article 97, the Secretary-General is appointed by the General Assembly upon the unanimous recommendation of the Security Council and constitutes the chief administrative officer of the UN. He (or she) must accordingly be a personage acceptable to all the permanent members and this, in the light of effectiveness, is vital. Much depends upon the actual personality and outlook of the particular office holder, and the role played by the Secretary-General in international affairs has tended to vary according to the character of the person concerned. An especially energetic part was performed by Dr Hammerskjöld in the late 1950s and very early 1960s until his untimely death in the Congo,[50] but since that time a rather lower profile has been maintained by the occupants of that position. The current holder of the office is Ban Ki-Moon of the Republic of Korea.

Apart from various administrative functions,[51] the essence of the Secretary-General's authority is contained in article 99 of the Charter, which empowers him to bring to the attention of the Security Council any matter which he feels may strengthen the maintenance of international peace and security, although this power has not often been used.[52] In practice, the role of Secretary-General has extended beyond the various provisions of the Charter. In particular, the Secretary-General has an important role in exercising good offices in order to resolve or contain international crises.[53] Additionally, the Secretary-General is in an important position to mark or possibly to influence developments. The publication of An Agenda for Peace[54] by Dr Boutros-Ghali and of In Larger Freedom[55] by Kofi Annan, for instance, constituted particularly significant events.

[50] See e.g. Bailey, 'United Nations Secretariat'.

[51] These include servicing a variety of organs, committees and conferences; co-ordinating the activities of the secretariat, the specialised agencies and other inter-governmental organisations; the preparation of studies and reports and responsibility for the preparation of the annual budget of the UN. Note that the Secretary-General also acts as depositary for a wide range of multinational treaties, and under article 98, submits an annual report on the work of the organisation.

[52] Article 99 was invoked, for example, in 1950 in the Korean war crisis, in 1960 in the Congo crisis and in 1979 with regard to the Iranian hostage issue: see Yearbook of the UN, 1979, pp. 307–12. See also S/13646 and S. Schwebel, 'The Origins and Development of Article 99 of the Charter' in Justice in International Law, p. 233.

[53] See further below, p. 1222.

[54] The Report of the Secretary-General Pursuant to the Statement Adopted by the Summit Meeting of the Security Council on 31 January 1992, New York, 1992.

[55] A/59/2005.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

In many disputes, the functions assigned to the Secretary-General by the other organs of the United Nations have enabled him to increase the influence of the organisation.[56] One remarkable example of this occurred in the Congo crisis of 1960 and the subsequent Council resolution authorising the Secretary-General in very wide-ranging terms to take action.[57] Another instance of the capacity of the Secretary-General to take action was the decision of 1967 to withdraw the UN peacekeeping force in the Middle East, thus removing an important psychological barrier to war, and provoking a certain amount of criticism.

The sixth principal organ of the UN is the International Court of Justice, established in 1946 as the successor to the Permanent Court of International Justice.[58]

The peaceful settlement of disputes[59]

The League of Nations[60]

The provisions set out in the UN Charter are to a large degree based upon the terms of the Covenant of the League of Nations as amended in the light of experience. Article 12 of the Covenant declared that any dispute likely to lead to a conflict between members was to be dealt with in one of three ways: by arbitration, by judicial settlement or by inquiry by the Council of the League. Article 15 noted that the Council was to try to effect a settlement of the dispute in question, but if that failed, it was to publish a report containing the facts of the case and 'the recommendations which are deemed just and proper in regard thereto'. This report was not, however, binding upon the parties, but if it was a unanimous one the League members were not to go to war 'with any party to the dispute [56] Article 98. See also J. Pérez de Cuéllar, 'The Role of the UN Secretary-General' in Roberts and Kingsbury, United Nations, Divided World, p. 125.

[57] See below, p. 1226. [58] See above, chapter 19.

[59] See e.g. M. Raman, Dispute Settlement through the United Nations, Oxford, 1977; J. G. Merrills, International Dispute Settlement, 4th edn, Cambridge, 2005, chapter 10; United Nations, Handbook on the Peaceful Settlement of Disputes Between States, New York, 1992; N. Bar-Yaacov, The Handling of International Disputes by Means of Inquiry, London, 1974, chapter 8; B. S. Murty, 'Settlement of Disputes' in Manual of Public International Law (ed. M. Sørensen), London, 1968, p. 673; E. Luard, A History of the United Nations, London, 1982, vol. I; Falk and Mendlovitz, Strategy of World Order, vol. III; The United Nations (eds. R. A. Falk and S. Mendlovitz), New York, 1966; Cot et al., Charte, pp. 1047 ff.; N. D. White, Keeping the Peace, 2nd edn, Manchester, 1998.

[60] See generally, e.g. G. Scott, The Rise and Fall of the League of Nations, London, 1973, and Falk and Mendlovitz, Strategy of World Order, chapter 1.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

which complies with the recommendations of the report'. If the report was merely a majority one, League members reserved to themselves 'the right to take such action as they shall consider necessary for the maintenance of right and justice'. In other words, in the latter case the Covenant did not absolutely prohibit the resort to war by members. Where a member resorted to war in disregard of the Covenant, then the various sanctions prescribed in article 16 might apply, although whether the circumstances in which sanctions might be enforced had actually arisen was a point to be decided by the individual members and not by the League itself. Sanctions were in fact used against Italy in 1935–6, but in a half-hearted manner due to political considerations by the leading states at the time.[61]

The United Nations system

The UN system is founded in constitutional terms upon a relatively clear theoretical distinction between the functions of the principal organs of the organisation. However, due to political conditions in the international order, the system failed to operate as outlined in the Charter and adjustments had to be made as opportunities presented themselves. The Security Council was intended to function as the executive of the UN, with the General Assembly as the parliamentary forum. Both organs could contribute to the peaceful settlement of disputes through relatively traditional mechanisms of discussion, good offices and mediation. Only the Security Council could adopt binding decisions and those through the means of Chapter VII, while acting to restore international peace and security. But the pattern of development has proved rather less conducive to clear categorisation. An influential attempt to detail the methods and mechanisms available to the UN in seeking to resolve disputes was made by the UN Secretary-General in the immediate aftermath of the demise of the Soviet Union and the unmistakable ending of the Cold War.

In An Agenda for Peace,[62] the Secretary-General, while emphasising that respect for the fundamental sovereignty and integrity of states constituted the foundation-stone of the organisation,[63] noted the rapid changes affecting both states individually and the international community as a [61] See e.g. Scott, Rise and Fall, chapter 15.

[62] This was welcomed by the General Assembly in resolution 47/120. See also the Report of the Secretary-General on the Implementation of the Recommendations in the 1992 Report, A/47/965.

[63] Ibid., p. 9.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

whole and emphasised the role of the UN in securing peace. The Report sought to categorise the types of actions that the organisation was undertaking or could undertake. Preventive Diplomacy was action to prevent disputes from arising between states, to prevent existing disputes from escalating into conflicts and to limit the spread of the latter when they occur. This included efforts such as fact-finding, good offices and goodwill missions.[64] Peacemaking involves action to bring the hostile parties to agreement, utilising the peaceful means elaborated in Chapter VI of the Charter.[65] Peacekeeping is the deployment of a UN presence in the field.[66] Peacebuilding is action to identify and support structures that will assist peace.[67] Peace Enforcement is peacekeeping not involving the consent of the parties, which would rest upon the enforcement provisions of Chapter VII of the Charter.[68]

The attack on the World Trade Center on 11 September 2001 'dramatised the global threat of terrorism', while focusing attention upon 'reconstructing weak or collapsed states'.[69] The Secretary-General has also emphasised the need to replace the culture of reaction by one of prevention and by developing inter alia a thirty to ninety-day deployment capability.[70]

The Security Council

The primary objective of the United Nations as stipulated in article 1 of the Charter is the maintenance of international peace and security and disputes likely to endanger this are required under article 33 to be solved 'by negotiation, inquiry, mediation, conciliation, arbitration, judicial settlement, resort to regional agencies or arrangements or other peaceful means'. Indeed, the Charter declares as one of its purposes in article 1, 'to [64] Ibid., pp. 13 ff. [65] Ibid., pp. 20 ff. [66] Ibid., pp. 28 ff.

[67] Ibid., pp. 32 ff. See the establishment of the Peacebuilding Commission in 2006, General Assembly resolution 60/180 and Security Council resolution 1645 (2005), intended to bring together all relevant actors, to marshal and sustain resources and advise on the proposed integrated strategies for post-conflict peacebuilding and recovery. See the Report of the Commission on its first session, A/62/137–S/2007/458, 25 July 2007, and Chesterman et al., United Nations, chapter 9.

[68] See Report of the Secretary-General on the Work of the Organisation, New York, 1993, p. 96.

[69] See Report of the Secretary-General on the Work of the Organisation, A/57/1, 2002, p. 1. See also the Secretary-General's Agenda for Further Change, A/57/387, 9 September 2002.

[70] See the Road Map Towards Implementation of the United Nations Millennium Declaration, A/56/326, 6 September 2001. The Millennium Report may be found at www.un.org/millennium/sg/report/.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

bring about by peaceful means and in conformity with the principles of justice and international law, adjustment or settlement of international disputes or situations which might lead to a breach of the peace'. By article 24,[71] the members of the UN conferred on the Security Council primary responsibility for the maintenance of international peace and security, and by article 25[72] agreed to accept and carry out the decisions of the Security Council. The International Court in the Namibia case[73] drew attention to the fact that the provision in article 25 was not limited to enforcement actions under Chapter VII of the Charter but applied to '"decisions of the Security Council" adopted in accordance with the Charter'. Accordingly a declaration of the Council taken under article 24 in the exercise of its primary responsibility for the maintenance of international peace and security could constitute a decision under article 25 so that member states 'would be expected to act in consequence of the declaration made on their behalf'.[74] Whether a particular resolution adopted under article 24 actually constituted a decision binding all member states (and outside the collective security framework of Chapter VII)[75] was a matter for analysis in each particular case, 'having regard to the terms of the resolution to be interpreted, the discussions leading to it, the Charter provisions invoked and, in general, all circumstances that might assist in determining the legal consequences of the resolution of the Security Council'.[76] Under the Charter, the role of the Security Council when dealing with the pacific settlement of disputes specifically under Chapter VI differs from when the Council is contemplating action relating to threats to or breaches of the peace, or acts of aggression under Chapter VII. In the former instance there is no power as such to make binding decisions with regard to member states.

In pursuance of its primary responsibility, the Security Council may, by article 34, 'investigate any dispute, or any situation which might lead to [71] See e.g. Simma, Charter, pp. 442 ff. [72] Ibid., pp. 452 ff.

[73] ICJ Reports, 1971, pp. 16, 52–3; 49 ILR, pp. 1, 42–3.

[74] This approach is controversial and has not, for example, been accepted by Western states: see e.g. Simma, Charter, p. 457. See also R. Higgins, 'The Advisory Opinion on Namibia. Which UN Resolutions are Binding under Article 25 of the Charter?', 21 ICLQ, 1972, p. 270.

[75] See below, p. 1235.

[76] ICJ Reports, 1971, pp. 16, 53; 49 ILR, p. 43. The question as to whether relevant Security Council resolutions on East Timor could be regarded as binding was raised in the East Timor case, ICJ Reports, 1995, pp. 90, 103; 105 ILR, p. 226, but the Court concluded that the resolutions cited did not go so far as to impose obligations. But cf. the Dissenting Opinion by Judge Weeramantry, ICJ Reports, 1995, pp. 205–8.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

international friction or give rise to dispute, in order to determine whether the continuance of the dispute or situation is likely to endanger the maintenance of international peace and security'. In addition to this power of investigation, the Security Council can, where it deems necessary, call upon the parties to settle their dispute by the means elaborated in article 33.[77] The Council may intervene if it wishes at any stage of a dispute or situation, the continuance of which is likely to endanger international peace and security, and under article 36(1) recommend appropriate procedures or methods of adjustment. But in making such recommendations, which are not binding, it must take into consideration the general principle that legal disputes should be referred by the parties to the International Court of Justice.[78] Where the parties to a dispute cannot resolve it by the various methods mentioned in article 33, they should refer it to the Security Council by article 37. The Council, where it is convinced that the continuance of the dispute is likely to endanger international peace and security, may recommend not only procedures and adjustment methods, but also such terms of settlement as it may consider appropriate.

Once the Council, however, has determined the existence of a threat to, or a breach of, the peace or act of aggression, it may make decisions which are binding upon member states of the UN under Chapter VII, but until that point it can under Chapter VI issue recommendations only.[79] Under article 35(1) any UN member state may bring a dispute or a situation which might lead to international friction or give rise to a dispute before the Council, while a non-member state may bring to the attention of the Council any dispute under article 35(2) provided it is a party to the dispute in question and 'accepts in advance, for the purposes of the dispute, the obligations of pacific settlement provided in the present Charter'.

[77] Note that under article 38, the Security Council may make recommendations to the parties with regard to the peaceful settlement of disputes generally if all the parties to the dispute so request.

[78] For example, when the Security Council recommended that the UK and Albania should take their case regarding the Corfu Channel incident to the International Court: see Security Council resolution 22 (1947) and SCOR, 2nd yr, 127th meeting, 9 April 1947, p. 727. See also Luard, History, pp. 209–12. However, this example proved to be exceptional. See also Security Council resolution 395 (1976) calling for negotiations between Turkey and Greece over the Aegean Sea continental shelf dispute and inviting the parties to refer the question to the International Court.

[79] However, note that under article 37(2) if the Council deems that a continuance of a dispute is likely to endanger international peace and security, it 'shall decide whether to take action under article 36 [i.e. recommend appropriate procedures or methods of adjustment] or to recommend such terms of settlement as it may consider appropriate'.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

It is also possible for third parties to bring disputes to the attention of the Council.[80]

In practice, the Security Council has applied all the diplomatic techniques available in various international disputes. This is in addition to open debates and the behind-the-scenes discussions and lobbying that take place. On numerous occasions it has called upon the parties to a dispute to negotiate a settlement and has requested that it be kept informed. The Council offered its good offices in the late 1940s with regard to the Dutch–Indonesian dispute[81] and has had recourse to mediation attempts in many other conflicts, for example with regard to the Kashmir[82] and Cyprus[83] questions.[84] However, the cases where the Council has recommended procedures or methods of adjustment under article 36 have been comparatively rare. Only in the Corfu Channel and Aegean Sea disputes did the Council recommend the parties to turn to the International Court. Probably the most famous Security Council resolution recommending a set of principles to be taken into account in resolving a particular dispute is resolution 242 (1967) dealing with the Middle East. This resolution pointed to two basic principles to be applied in establishing a just and lasting peace in the Middle East: first, Israeli withdrawal 'from territories occupied in the recent conflict' (i.e. the Six Day War) and, secondly, the termination of all claims of belligerency and acknowledgement of the right of every state in the area to live in peace within secure and recognised frontiers.[85]

The General Assembly[86]

Although the primary responsibility with regard to the maintenance of international peace and security lies with the Security Council, the [80] See the succeeding sections as to the General Assembly and the Secretary-General.

[81] See e.g. Luard, History, chapter 9, and S/1156. See also S/514 and S/1234, and Murty, 'Settlement', p. 721.

[82] Murty, 'Settlement', p. 721. See also Luard, History, chapter 14.

[83] See e.g. Murty, 'Settlement', p. 721. See also T. Ehrlich, Cyprus 1958–1967, Oxford, 1974.

[84] Note also the appointment of Count Bernadotte and Dr Jarring as UN mediators in the Middle East in 1948 and 1967 respectively. See Luard, History, chapters 10 and 11, and The Arab–Israeli Conflict (ed. J. N. Moore), Princeton, 3 vols., 1974.

[85] Various other points were referred to in resolution 242, including the need to guarantee freedom of navigation through international waterways in the area, achieve a just settlement of the refugee problem and reinforce the territorial inviolability of every state in the area through measures such as the use of demilitarised zones. Resolution 242 (1967) was reaffirmed in Security Council resolution 338 (1973).

[86] See e.g. White, Keeping the Peace, part II, and M. J. Peterson, The General Assembly in World Politics, Boston, 1986.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

General Assembly may discuss any question or matter within the scope of the Charter, including the maintenance of international peace and security, and may make recommendations to the members of the UN or the Security Council,[87] provided the Council is not itself dealing with the same matter.[88] Under similar conditions, the Assembly may under article 14 'recommend measures for the peaceful adjustment of any situation regardless of origin, which it deems likely to impair the general welfare or friendly relations among nations'. In the Construction of a Wall case,[89] the International Court emphasised that under article 24 the Security Council had a primary and not necessarily an exclusive competence with regard to the maintenance of international peace and security, while the constraint placed by article 12 on the powers of the Assembly to make recommendations for the peaceful adjustment of situations had been interpreted by evolving practice to permit both the Assembly and the Council to deal in parallel with the same matter concerning the maintenance of international peace and security, with the former often taking a broader view.[90]

In practice, the resolutions and declarations of the General Assembly (which are not binding) have covered a very wide field, from colonial disputes to alleged violations of human rights and the need for justice in international economic affairs. The role of the General Assembly increased after 1945 due to two factors: first, the existence of the veto in the Security Council rendered that organ powerless in many important disputes since the permanent members (USA, UK, USSR (now Russia), France and China) rarely agreed with respect to any particular conflict; and secondly, the vast increase in the membership of the UN had the effect of radicalising the Assembly and its deliberations. More recently the increased role of the Security Council has overshadowed that of the Assembly.

The Secretary-General[91]

Just as the impotence of the Security Council stimulated a growing awareness of the potentialities of the General Assembly, it similarly underlined [87] Articles 10 and 11 of the Charter. [88] Article 12.

[89] ICJ Reports, 2004, pp. 136, 148–9; 129 ILR, pp. 37, 66.

[90] As to the right of the Assembly to deal with a threat to or breach of the peace or act of aggression if the Security Council fails to act because of the exercise of the veto by a permanent member, see resolution 377(V), the 'Uniting for Peace' resolution, below, p. 1272.

[91] See e.g. Rovine, First Fifty Years, and Cordier et al., Public Papers.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

the role to be played by the United Nations Secretary-General. By article 99 of the Charter, he is entitled to bring to the attention of the Security Council any matter which he thinks may threaten the maintenance of international peace and security and this power is in addition to his function as the chief administrative officer of the United Nations organisation under article 79.[92] In effect, the Secretary-General has considerable discretion and much has depended upon the views and outlook of the person filling the post at any given time, as well as the general political situation.

The good offices role of the Secretary-General has rapidly expanded.[93] In exercising such a role, Secretaries-General have sought to act independently of the Security Council and General Assembly, in the former case, in so far as they have not been constrained by binding resolutions (as for example in the Kuwait situation of 1990–1). The assumption of good offices and mediation activity may arise either because of independent action by the Secretary-General as part of the exercise of his inherent powers[94] or as a consequence of a request made by the Security Council[95] or General Assembly.[96] In some cases, the Secretary-General has acted upon the invitation of the parties themselves,[97] and on other occasions, the Secretary-General has acted in concert with the relevant regional [92] Under article 98, the Secretary-General also performs such other functions as are entrusted to him by the General Assembly, Security Council, Economic and Social Council and the Trusteeship Council.

[93] See e.g. T. M. Franck, Fairness in International Law and Institutions, Oxford, 1995, chapter 6; Pérez de Cuéllar, 'Role of the UN Secretary-General', p. 125, and T. M. Franck and G. Nolte, 'The Good Offices Function of the UN Secretary-General' in Roberts and Kingsbury, United Nations, Divided World, p. 143.

[94] See e.g. with regard to Abkhazia, Franck, Fairness, p. 207, and Central America, ibid.

[95] See e.g. Security Council resolutions 242 (1967) regarding the Middle East; 367 (1975) regarding Cyprus; 384 (1975) regarding East Timor; 435 (1978) regarding Namibia and 713 (1991) regarding Yugoslavia.

[96] See e.g. with regard to Afghanistan, General Assembly resolution ES-6/2, 1980, and The Geneva Accords published by the United Nations, 1988, DPI/935-40420. As to Cambodia, see Franck, Fairness, p. 184.

[97] See e.g. the General Peace Agreement of Rome between the Mozambique government and RENAMO rebels in 1992, which called upon the UN to monitor its implementation. The President of Mozambique called upon the Secretary-General to chair the key implementation commissions and assist in other ways including the dispatch of monitors: see Report of the Secretary-General, S/24635, 1992, and Franck, Fairness, p. 188. Note that in his Report on the Work of the Organisation, A/57/1, 2002, the Secretary-General noted that he had used his good offices to facilitate national reconciliation and democratisation in Myanmar (at p. 5), while stating that if requested he 'would positively consider the use of my good offices' in seeking a peaceful solution in Nepal (at p. 4).

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

organisation.[98] In many cases, the Secretary-General will appoint a Special Representative to assist in seeking a solution to the particular problem.[99]

The development of good offices and mediation activities first arose as a consequence of the severe restrictions imposed upon UN operations by the Cold War. The cessation of the Cold War led to greatly increased activity by the UN and as a consequence the work of the Secretary-General expanded as he sought to bring to fruition the wide range of initiatives undertaken by the organisation. The experiences of Somalia, Rwanda and Bosnia in the mid-1990s and Iraq from 1991 to the 2003 war have been disappointing for the organisation.

Peacekeeping and observer missions[100]

There is no explicit legal basis for peacekeeping activities in the UN Charter. They arose in the absence of the contribution of armed forces and facilities to the UN as detailed in article 43. Accordingly, a series of arrangements and operations have evolved since the inception of the organisation, which taken together have established a clear pattern of acceptable reaction by the UN in particular crisis situations. The broad bases for such activities lie in the general provisions in the Charter governing the powers of the Security Council and General Assembly. The Security Council, for example, may establish such subsidiary organs as it deems necessary for the performance of its functions (article 29) and those functions are laid down in articles 34 (powers of investigation); 36, 37 and 38 (powers to recommend appropriate procedures or methods of dispute settlement); and 39 (powers of recommendation or decision in order to maintain or restore international peace and security). The Security Council may, in particular under article 42, take such action by land, sea or air forces as may be necessary to maintain or restore international peace [98] See e.g. with regard to the Secretary-General of the Organisation of American States concerning the Central American peace process from the mid-1980s, Report of the UN Secretary-General, A/42/127–S/18688, 1987.

[99] See, for the full list, www.un.org/Depts/dpko/SRSG/index.htm.

[100] See e.g. R. Murphy, UN Peacekeeping in Lebanon, Somalia and Kosovo, Cambridge, 2007; United Nations, United Nations Peacekeeping Operations: Principles and Guidelines, New York, 2008, and UN, The Blue Helmets: A Review of United Nations Peacekeeping, 2nd edn, New York, 1990; D. W. Bowett, UN Forces, London, 1964; The Evolution of UN Peacekeeping (ed. W. J. Durch), London, 1994; White, Keeping the Peace; R. Higgins, United Nations Peacekeeping, Oxford, 4 vols., 1969–81; S. Morphet, 'UN Peacekeeping and Election Monitoring' in Roberts and Kingsbury, United Nations, Divided World, p. 183; A. James, Peacekeeping in International Politics, London, 1990, and Simma, Charter, pp. 648 ff.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

and security. This is the basis for action explicitly taken under Chapter VII of the Charter.[101]

However, the majority of peacekeeping activities have not been so authorised and it is unlikely that article 42 can be seen as the legal basis for all such activities. The Security Council can entrust functions to the Secretary-General under article 98 and this mechanism has proved significant in practice. The General Assembly has wide powers under articles 10 and 11 to discuss and make recommendations on matters within the scope of the UN Charter, including recommendations concerning the maintenance of international peace and security.[102] Under article 14, the Assembly may recommend measures for the peaceful adjustment of any situation regardless of origin which it deems likely to impair the general welfare or friendly relations among nations. It can, however, take no binding decision in such matters.[103] The Assembly may also establish such subsidiary organs as it deems necessary for the performance of its functions (article 22) and entrust functions to the Secretary-General (article 98). It is because such operations fall somewhat between Chapter VI (peaceful settlement) and Chapter VII (enforcement) of the Charter, that the term 'Chapter Six and a Half' has been used.[104]

Essentially peacekeeping involves the deployment of armed forces under UN control to contain and resolve military conflicts. Although originally intended to deal with inter-state conflicts, more recently peacekeeping forces have been used with respect to civil wars and other intra-state conflicts. Again, primarily military deployments have expanded to include civilian personnel as more and more civil functions have been entrusted to such forces. There have been sixty-three peacekeeping missions to date and there are currently seventeen in operation.[105] Peacekeeping and observer missions operate upon a continuum of UN activities and it is helpful to consider these operations together. Indeed, that continuum has in recent years been extended to incorporate elements of enforcement action.[106]

[101] The power of the Security Council to resort to force under article 42 is dealt with below, p. 1251.

[102] However, under article 11(2), where action is necessary on any question relating to the maintenance of international peace and security, the matter must be referred to the Security Council.

[103] See further below, p. 1271.

[104] See e.g. T. Franck, Recourse to Force, Cambridge, 2002, p. 39. It seems to have been first used by Secretary-General Hammarskjöld: see www.un.org/Depts/dpko/dpko/index.asp.

[105] See www.un.org/Depts/dpko/dpko/index.asp (April 2008).

[106] See below, p. 1257.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

The origin of peacekeeping by the UN may be traced to truce supervision activities. The first such activity occurred in Greece, where the UN Special Committee on the Balkans (UNSCOB) was created in 1947.[107] The UN Truce Supervision Organisation (UNTSO) was established in 1948 to supervise the truce in the 1948 Middle East War.[108] Peacekeeping[109] as such arose as a direct consequence of the problems facing the Security Council during the Cold War. The first peacekeeping activity took place in 1956 as a result of the Suez crisis. The UN Emergency Force (UNEF) was established by the General Assembly[110] to position itself between the hostile forces and to supervise the withdrawal of British and French forces from the Suez Canal and Israeli forces from the Sinai peninsula. It was then deployed along the armistice line until May 1967. The second crucial peacekeeping operation took place in the Congo crisis of 1960, which erupted soon after Belgium granted independence to the colony and resulted in mutinies, insurrections and much confused fighting. The Security Council adopted a resolution permitting the Secretary-General to provide military assistance to the Congo government.[111] This was [107] See General Assembly resolution 109. The operation lasted until 1954. See also K. Birgisson, 'United Nations Special Committee on the Balkans' in Durch, Evolution of UN Peacekeeping, chapter 5.

[108] See Security Council resolution 50 (1948), and M. Ghali, 'The United Nations Truce Supervision Organisation' in Durch, Evolution of UN Peacekeeping, chapter 6. It has expanded to supervise the armistice agreements of 1949 and ceasefire arrangements of June 1967. See also the UN Military Observer Group in India and Pakistan (UNMOGIP) established by Security Council resolution 47 (1948) to supervise the ceasefire in Jammu and Kashmir: see K. Birgisson, 'United Nations Military Observer Group in India and Pakistan' in Durch, Evolution of UN Peacekeeping, chapter 16.

[109] This has been defined by the Secretary-General as 'the deployment of a United Nations presence in the field, hitherto with the consent of all the parties concerned, normally involving United Nations military and/or police personnel and frequently civilians as well', An Agenda for Peace, p. 11. Another definition was put forward by a former UN Legal Counsel, who noted that peacekeeping operations were 'actions involving the use of military personnel in international conflict situations on the basis of the consent of all parties concerned and without resorting to armed force except in cases of self-defence', E. Suy, 'Peacekeeping Operations' in A Handbook on International Organisations (ed. R. J. Dupuy), Dordrecht, 1988, p. 379.

[110] See General Assembly resolutions 997, 998 and 1000 (ES-1). The Security Council was unable to act as two permanent members (the UK and France) were directly involved in the crisis and had vetoed draft resolutions. See e.g. M. Ghali, 'United Nations Emergency Force I' in Durch, Evolution of UN Peacekeeping, chapter 7.

[111] S/4387, 14 July 1960. By resolution S/4405, 22 July 1960, the Council requested all states to refrain from action which might impede the restoration of law and order or undermine the territorial integrity and political independence of the Congo. By resolution S/4426, 9 August 1960, the Council confirmed the authority given to the interpreted by Dr Hammarskjöld, the Secretary-General, as a mandate to set up a peacekeeping force on an analogy with UNEF. The exercise of the veto in the Council left the Secretary-General with little guidance as to how to proceed in the situation. Accordingly, he performed many of the tasks that had in 1956 been undertaken by the General Assembly with respect to the Middle East.[112] The development of the Congo crisis from mutiny to civil war meant that the United Nations force (ONUC) was faced with many difficult decisions and these had in the main to be taken by the Secretary-General. The role that could be played by the Secretary-General was emphasised in the succeeding crises in Cyprus (1964)[113] and the Middle East (1973)[114] and in the consequent establishment of United Nations peacekeeping forces for these areas under the general guidance of the Secretary-General.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

The creation of traditional peacekeeping forces, whether in the Middle East in 1967 and again in 1973, in the Congo in 1960 or in Cyprus in 1964, was important in that such forces tended to stabilise particular situations for a certain time. Such United Nations forces are not intended to take enforcement action, but to act as an influence for calm by physically separating warring factions. They are dependent upon the consent of the state upon whose territory they are stationed and can in no way prevent a determined aggression. The various United Nations peacekeeping operations have met with some limited success in temporarily preventing Secretary-General by earlier resolutions and called on member states to carry out the decisions of the Security Council. See e.g. G. Abi-Saab, The United Nations Operation in the Congo 1960–1964, Oxford, 1978; C. Hoskyns, The Congo Since Independence, Oxford, 1965; L. Miller, 'Legal Aspects of UN Action in the Congo', 55 AJIL, 1961, p. 1, and W. J. Durch, 'The UN Operation in the Congo' in Durch, Evolution of UN Peacekeeping, chapter 19.

[112] See Abi-Saab, Congo, pp. 15 ff.

[113] See Security Council resolution 186 (1964). See also Ehrlich, Cyprus 1958–1967, J. A. Stegenger, The United Nations Force in Cyprus, Columbus, 1968, and K. Birgisson, 'United Nations Peacekeeping Forces in Cyprus' in Durch, Evolution of UN Peacekeeping, chapter 13. The force is known as the UN Force in Cyprus (UNICYP).

[114] The Security Council established the UN Emergency Force (UNEF II) to monitor the Israeli–Egyptian disengagement process in 1973: see resolution 340 (1973), and a Disengagement Observer Force with respect to the Israel–Syria disengagement process: see resolution 350 (1974). See generally Pogany, Arab–Israeli Conflict, and M. Ghali, 'United Nations Emergency Force II' in Durch, Evolution of UN Peacekeeping, chapter 8. Note also the creation of the UN Interim Force in the Lebanon (UNIFIL) established by the Council in resolution 425 (1978) after Israel's incursion into the Lebanon in 1978: see e.g. M. Ghali, 'United Nations Interim Force in Lebanon' in Durch, The Evolution of UN Peacekeeping, chapter 10.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

major disturbances, but they failed to prevent the 1967 Arab–Israeli war[115] and the 1974 Turkish invasion of Cyprus.[116] One has to be careful not to overestimate their significance in difficult political situations. In addition to the consent of the host state, such forces also require the continuing support of the Security Council and if that is lost or not provided such forces cannot operate.[117] Just as crucial as these factors is the provision of sufficient resources by the UN and its member states in order to fulfil the agreed mandate. Events in Bosnia, for example, demonstrated how the absence of adequate resources impacted severely upon operations.

Nevertheless, peacekeeping and observer operations do have a role to play, particularly as a way of ensuring that conflict situations in the process of being resolved do not flare up as a result of misunderstandings or miscalculations. Some recent UN operations in this area demonstrate this.[118] The UN Good Offices Mission in Afghanistan and Pakistan was established in the context of the Geneva Accords of 14 April 1988 dealing with the withdrawal of Soviet forces from Afghanistan,[119] while the UN Iran–Iraq Military Observer Group was created the same year following the acceptance by the belligerent states of Security Council resolution 598 (1987) calling for a ceasefire.[120] In 1989, in the context of the resolution of the Namibian problem, the UN Angola Verification Mission (UNAVEM I) commenced operation in order to verify the withdrawal of Cuban forces

[115] In fact the hasty withdrawal of the UNEF in May 1967 by the Secretary-General following an Egyptian request did much to precipitate the conflict. See generally Special Report of the Secretary-General on Removal of UNEF from Egyptian territory, A/6669, 1967, and T. M. Franck, Nation Against Nation, Oxford, 1985.

[116] See e.g. Security Council resolution 359 (1974) criticising the Turkish invasion.

[117] The Israel–Egypt Peace Treaty of 1979 envisaged the deployment of a UN force such as UNEF to supervise the limited forces zones established by the parties but, due to Soviet action, the mandate of UNEF II expired in July 1979: see e.g. M. Akehurst, 'The Peace Treaty Between Egypt and Israel', 7 International Relations, 1981, pp. 1035, 1046, and M. N. Shaw, 'The Egyptian–Israeli Peace Treaty, 1979', 2 Jewish Law Annual, 1980, pp. 180, 185. As a result, a special Multinational Force and Observers unit was established by the parties and the United States, independently of the UN: see 20 ILM, 1981, pp. 1190 ff. See also M. Tabory, The Multinational Force and Observers in the Sinai, Boulder, 1986, and James, Peacekeeping, pp. 122 ff.

[118] See generally White, Keeping the Peace.

[119] See S/19836 and Security Council resolution 622 (1988). This activity continued until 1990: see Morphet, 'UN Peacekeeping', p. 213. See also K. Birgisson, 'United Nations Good Offices Mission in Afghanistan and Pakistan' in Durch, Evolution of UN Peacekeeping, chapter 18.

[120] This was to monitor the ceasefire and lasted until February 1991: see e.g. Morphet, 'UN Peacekeeping', p. 213, and B. Smith, 'United Nations Iran–Iraq Military Observer Group' in Durch, Evolution of UN Peacekeeping, chapter 14.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

from Angola,[121] while the UN Transition Assistance Group (UNTAG), although originally established in 1978 in Security Council resolution 435 (1978), commenced operations with the Namibian independence process on 1 April 1989.[122] Efforts to hold a referendum in Western Sahara are being assisted by the UN Mission for the Referendum in Western Sahara (MINURSO),[123] while the UN Iraq–Kuwait Observer Mission (UNIKOM) was set up to monitor the demilitarised zone between these two states following the Gulf War.[124]

Further examples of crucial and complex peacekeeping and/or observer activities include observing Eritrea's plebiscite on secession from Ethiopia[125] and South Africa's elections in 1994,[126] supervising the demilitarisation of Eastern Slavonia, Baranja and Western Sirmium (Croatia) and inter alia overseeing the return of refugees, training a police force, [121] Security Council resolution 626 (1988). This was completed in 1991. The Security Council then established UNAVEM II to monitor the implementation of the peace accords between the Angolan government and the UNITA rebels: see Security Council resolution 696 (1991), and V. P. Fortna, 'United Nations Angola Verification Mission I' in Durch, Evolution of UN Peacekeeping, chapter 21, and Fortna, 'United Nations Angola Verification Mission II' in Durch, Evolution of UN Peacekeeping, chapter 22. This ended in February 1995.

[122] Security Council resolution 632 (1989). UNTAG monitored the withdrawal of South African troops, confined SWAPO forces to their bases in Angola and Zaire and assisted in the election process. The operation ended in March 1990. See V. P. Fortna, 'United Nations Transition Assistance Group in Namibia' in Durch, Evolution of UN Peacekeeping, chapter 20. In 1992, the UN Operation in Mozambique (ONUMOZ) was established in order to monitor the peace agreement between the Government and RENAMO rebels: see Security Council resolution 797 (1992). The mission ended in December 1994. See also the UN Observer Group for the Verification of Elections in Nicaragua (ONUVEN) sent to monitor elections in that country following the 1987 Esquipulas Agreement. This was the first electoral observer mission to monitor elections in an independent state: see Security Council 637 (1989). See also Morphet, 'UN Peacekeeping', pp. 216 ff., and Franck, Fairness, pp. 105 ff.

[123] See e.g. Security Council resolution 690 (1991) and W. J. Durch, 'United Nations Mission for the Referendum in Western Sahara' in Durch, Evolution of UN Peacekeeping, chapter 23. See also the UN Observer Mission in El Salvador established to verify that the government and rebels in the El Salvador civil war complied with the 1990 peace accord, including human rights provisions: see resolution 693 (1991).

[124] See Security Council resolution 689 (1991). See also the UN Advance Mission in Cambodia (UNAMIC) established pursuant to peace efforts in the civil war in that country and which was followed by the UN Transitional Authority in Cambodia (UNTAC), which exercised governmental functions in that state: see resolutions 717 (1991) and 745 (1992). See further above, chapter 5, p. 231.

[125] See General Assembly resolution 47/114, 1992, and A/47/544.

[126] See Security Council resolution 894 (1994). Over 1,800 electoral observers were sent: see Franck, Fairness, p. 107.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

organising elections and facilitating the removal of mines from the area,[127] monitoring the demilitarisation of the Prevlaka Peninsula in Croatia,[128] assisting the Haitian government in the professionalisation of the police and maintaining a secure environment.[129]

The UN Mission in Ethiopia and Eritrea is a more traditional operation, aimed at overseeing a ceasefire between the two states and assisting them in delimiting and demarcating the boundary.[130] The UN Observer Mission in Georgia has since 1993 been trying to resolve the Abkhazia conflict in Georgia. Its mandate has been expanded and extended since that time.[131] The UN played an extensive role in the move to Timor–Leste independence. The establishment of the UN Mission in East Timor in 1999 provided a mandate to oversee a transition period pending implementation of the decision of the people of that territory under Indonesian occupation as to their future. After the elections and the vote for independence, pro-Indonesian militias commenced a campaign of violence and, after an agreement with Indonesia, the UN adopted resolution 1264 (1999) establishing a multinational force under Australian command to restore peace and security. The UN Transitional Administration in East Timor was established by resolution 1272 (1999) with powers to administer the territory until independence. At the time of the independence of the territory of Timor–Leste in May 2002, the UN Mission of Support in East Timor was established to replace UNTAET.[132] A more traditional peacekeeping deployment was that in August 2006 in Lebanon, facilitating [127] The UN Transitional Administration for Eastern Slavonia, Baranja and Western Sirmium (UNTAES): see Security Council resolution 1037 (1996). This mission had both a military and a civilian component.

[128] The UN Mission of Observers in Prevlaka (UNMOP), Security Council resolution 1038 (1996).

[129] The UN Support Mission in Haiti (UNSMIH): see Security Council resolution 1063 (1996). In June 1996, this mission succeeded the UN Mission in Haiti (UNMIH) created by resolution 867 (1993) to assist the military and police forces in that state. However, it was prevented from deploying. In resolution 940 (1994), the Security Council authorised the creation of a Multi-National Force (MNF): see below, p. 1239, and extended the mandate and scope of UNMIH. After the restoration of the ousted President and the subsequent holding of elections, UNMIH took over responsibility from the MNF (March 1995).

[130] See e.g. Security Council resolutions 1312 (2000), 1320 (2000) and 1640 (2005). This mandate has been regularly renewed: see most recently resolution 1798 (2008).

[131] See e.g. Security Council resolutions 849 (1993), 881 (1993), 1077 (1996), 1364 (2001) 1393 (2002), 1427 (2002), 1462 (2003) and 1494 (2003).

[132] See resolution 1410 (2002). See also, with regard to the UN administration of East Timor, above, chapter 5, p. 232. See as to the establishment by the Security Council of a joint UN–African Union force in Darfur in 2007, below, p. 1280.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

the withdrawal of Israeli forces and permitting the return of the Lebanese army to southern Lebanon following a period of Hizbollah control in that area.[133]

The legal framework for the actual conduct of peacekeeping and observer activities reflects their status as UN organs, so that they are, for example, subject to the law governing the UN organisations as a whole, such as that concerning the privileges and immunities of UN personnel[134] and responsibility.[135] The UN would be liable for breaches of law committed by members of peacekeeping and observer forces and groups and would, on the other hand, be able to claim compensation for damage and injuries caused to its personnel. Where forces are stationed on the territory of a state, the usual practice is for formal agreements to be entered into between that state and the UN concerning, for example, facilities, logistics, privileges and immunities of persons and property, and dispute settlement procedures. In 1990, the Secretary-General produced a Model Status of Forces Agreement for Peacekeeping Operations,[136] which covers such matters. It notes, for instance, that the peacekeeping operation and its members are to respect all local laws and regulations, while the government in question undertakes to respect the exclusively international nature of the operation. Jurisdictional and military discipline issues are also dealt with. The UN has also adopted the Convention on the Safety of United Nations and Associated Personnel, 1994 in order to deal with the situation where the UN operation is not an enforcement operation authorised under Chapter VII of the Charter, in combat with local forces and operating under the laws of armed conflict.

The Convention lays down that the UN and the host state should conclude as soon as possible an agreement on the status of the UN operation and all personnel engaged in the operation, including privileges and immunities issues (article 4), and stipulates that the UN and its personnel shall respect local laws and regulations and refrain from any action or activity incompatible with the impartial and international nature of their duties (article 6). The Convention provides that the intentional commission of activities such as the murder or kidnapping of UN or associated personnel, attacks on official premises or private accommodation or means of transportation, are to be made criminal offences under [133] See resolution 1701 (2006).

[134] See in particular the General Convention on the Privileges and Immunities of the United Nations, 1946.

[135] See also Simma, Charter, pp. 694 ff.

[136] A/45/594.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

national law (article 9), while states parties must take such measures as are necessary to establish jurisdiction in such cases when the crime is committed within their territory (or on board a ship or aircraft registered in that state) or when the alleged offender is a national (article 10). In addition, states parties may establish jurisdiction when the crime has been committed by a stateless person whose habitual residence is in the state concerned or with regard to a national of that state or in an attempt to compel that state to do or abstain from doing any act (article 10).[137]

The question as to whether UN forces are subject to the laws of armed conflict or international humanitarian law[138] has proved controversial. Since the UN is bound by general international law, it is also bound by the customary rules concerning armed conflict,[139] although not by the rules contained only in treaties to which the UN is not a party. Can the United Nations in its various operations involving military personnel in either an enforcement or peacekeeping capacity within states be regarded as subject to international humanitarian law? The problem has arisen in the light of whether such UN activities may be properly classified as 'armed conflicts'.[140] The question of the application of international humanitarian law to operations has been a matter of some concern and a model agreement was put forward in 1991. While the issue proved little of a problem with regard to UN enforcement actions, where it has long been accepted that the rules of humanitarian law applied,[141] although there may be a countervailing pressure since article 2(2) of the Convention on the Safety of United Nations Personnel provides that the Convention will not apply to a UN enforcement operation 'to which the law of international armed conflict applies', difficulties have arisen where the UN has become involved in operations of a mixed peacekeeping/enforcement character. However, the Model Agreement prepared by the Secretary-General in May 1991 specified that 'United Nations peacekeeping operations shall observe and respect the principles and spirit of the general international conventions applicable to the conduct of military [137] The Convention also deals with extradition (articles 13–15) and the fair treatment of alleged offenders (article 17).

[138] See above, chapter 21.

[139] See e.g. S. Will, 'Occupation Law and Multi-National Operations: Problems and Perspectives', 77 BYIL, 2006, pp. 256, 277.

[140] See L. Green, The Contemporary Law of Armed Conflict, 2nd edn, Manchester, 2000, chapter 20.

[141] See e.g. D. W. Bowett, United Nations Forces, London, 1964, p. 56.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

operations'[142] and status of forces agreements signed by the UN with host countries usually contain a provision that humanitarian law applies.[143]

On 6 August 1999, the UN Secretary-General addressed the difficulty and issued a statement declaring that

> The fundamental principles and rules of international humanitarian law . . . are applicable to United Nations forces when in situations of armed conflict they are actively engaged therein as combatants, to the extent and for the duration of their engagement. They are accordingly applicable in enforcement actions, or in peacekeeping operations when the use of force is permissible in self-defence.[144]

Conclusion

The functioning of the United Nations system for the preservation and restoration of world peace has not been a tremendous success in the broadest strategic sense. It constitutes merely one additional factor in international disputes management and one often particularly subject to political pressures. The United Nations has played a minimal part in some of the major conflicts and disputes since its inception, whether it be the Cuban missiles crisis of 1962 or the Vietnam war, the Soviet intervention [142] These conventions would include the 1949 Geneva Conventions and the 1977 Protocols as well as the Convention on the Protection of Cultural Property, 1954: see Green, Armed Conflict, p. 344; C. Greenwood, 'International Humanitarian Law and United Nations Military Operations', 1 Yearbook of International Humanitarian Law, 1998, p. 3, and D. Shraga, 'UN Peacekeeping Operations: Applicability of International Humanitarian Responsibility for Operations-Related Damage', 94 AJIL, 2000, p. 406.

[143] See e.g. the agreement with Rwanda in 1993 on the status of the UN Mission in that country, Shraga, 'UN Peacekeeping Operation', p. 325, footnote 16, and S/26927, 1993, para. 7. Note also the resolutions adopted by the Institut de Droit International stating that the laws of armed conflict apply to the UN, 54 (II) Annuaire de l'Institut de Droit International, 1971, p. 465, and 56 Annuaire de l'Institut de Droit International, 1975, p. 540.

[144] ST/SGB/1999/13 (Bulletin on the Observance by UN Forces of International Humanitarian Law). According to the official United Nations Peacekeeping Operations: Principles and Guidance, pp. 15–16, this statement sets out the 'fundamental principles and rules of international law that may be applicable to United Nations peacekeepers'. See also P. Rowe, 'Maintaining Discipline in United Nations Peace Support Operations', 5 Journal of Conflict and Security Law, 2000, pp. 45, 52 ff.; A. J. T. Dörenberg, 'Legal Aspects of Peacekeeping Operations', 28 The Military Law and Law of War Review, 1989, p. 113; F. Hampson, 'States' Military Operations Authorised by the United Nations and International Humanitarian Law' in The United Nations and International Humanitarian Law (eds. L. Condorelli, A. M. LaRosa and S. Scherrer), Paris, 1996, p. 371; Y. Dinstein, War, Aggression and Self-Defence, 4th edn, Cambridge, 2005, pp. 162–3, and Will, 'Occupation Law', pp. 274 ff.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

in Czechoslovakia and Afghanistan or the Nigerian and Angolan civil wars.

Nevertheless, the position of the United Nations improved with the ending of the Cold War and the substantial changes in the approach of the USSR, soon to be Russia, in particular.[145] More emphasis was laid upon the importance of the UN in the context of an increased co-operation with the US. This began to have a significant impact upon the work and achievements of the UN. The new co-operative approach led to the agreements leading to the independence of Namibia, while substantial progress was made by the five permanent members of the Security Council in working out a solution to the Cambodian problem. The long-running dispute with Iraq and how to deal with its failure to comply fully with Security Council resolution 687 (1991) appeared to mark a further moment of achievement with the adoption of resolution 1441 (2002). However, the unanimity of the Council fractured and, amid deep division, the US and the UK commenced a military action against Iraq in March 2003.[146]

The range and extent of activities engaged in by the UN is startling by past experience. UN missions may not only be used now to stabilise a tense situation in the traditional exposition of the peacekeeping approach, they may also be utilised in order to carry out key administrative functions; verify peace agreements both international and internal; monitor the implementation of human rights accords; supervise and monitor elections; train and oversee police forces; oversee withdrawal and demilitarisation arrangements, and assist in demining operations.

The Secretary-General has emphasised that there are three particularly important principles of peacekeeping.[147] These are the consent of the parties, impartiality and the non-use of force. While these three may characterise traditional peacekeeping and observer missions, even as these developed during the 1990s, they do not apply necessarily to a new form of peacekeeping that is mandated under Chapter VII of the Charter.[148] To seek to revitalise the structure, the Secretary-General mandated a Panel on UN Peace Operations to conduct a thorough review. In the Panel Report, a series of recommendations were made.[149] These included encouraging

[145] See e.g. A. Roberts and B. Kingsbury, 'The UN's Role in International Society since 1945' in Roberts and Kingsbury, United Nations, Divided World, p. 1.

[146] See further below, p. 1255.

[147] Supplement to an Agenda for Peace, A/50/60, 1995, para. 33. See also UN, United Nations Peacekeeping Operations: Principles and Guidelines, chapter 3.

[148] See below, p. 1257.

[149] See A/55/305–S/2000/809, 21 August 2000 and 39 ILM, 2000, p. 1432. The Report is also termed the Brahimi Report after its chair.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

a more frequent use by the Secretary-General of fact-finding missions to areas of tension in support of short-term crisis-preventive action and a doctrinal shift in the use of civilian police and related rule of law elements in peace operations that emphasises an increased focus on, and team approach to, upholding the rule of law and human rights.[150] The Panel reaffirmed that consent of the local parties, impartiality and the use of forces only in self-defence constitute the 'bedrock principles of peacekeeping', but noted that consent could sometimes be manipulated and that impartiality must take into account adherence to UN principles. Equal treatment where one party is violating such principles could not be acceptable.[151] The Panel also called for improved standby arrangements to enable forces to 'meet the need for the robust peacekeeping forces that the Panel has advocated'[152] and 'robust rules of engagement against those who renege on their commitments to a peace accord or otherwise seek to undermine it by violence'.[153] A variety of other recommendations have also been made and the implementation process commenced.[154] In 2006 the Secretary-General outlined a 'Peace Operations 2010' reform strategy[155] and a major reform of the support aspects of peacekeeping operations was initiated.[156]

The collective security system[157]

The system established by the United Nations for the maintenance of international peace and security was intended to be comprehensive in its provisions and universal in its application. It has often been termed a [150] Ibid., paras. 29 ff.

[151] Ibid., paras. 48 ff.
[152] Ibid., paras. 86 ff.
[153] Ibid., para. 55.
[154] See e.g. the Secretary-General's Report on Implementation of 20 October 2000, A/55/502 and the Implementation Reports of 1 June and 21 December 2001, A/55/977 and A/56/732.
[155] A/60/696, paras. 6 ff.
[156] See A/62/11, paras. 51 ff. and Press Release GA/SPD/382, 31 October 2007. As of January 2008, over 100,000 personnel were serving in peace operations, with contributions from 119 states with a budget of $7 billion. Pakistan (10,616), Bangladesh (9,717) and India (9,345) were the largest uniformed personnel contributors, with the US (26%), Japan (17%) and Germany (9%) being the largest providers to the budget: see UN Peacekeeping Factsheet, DPI/2429/rev.2, February 2008.
[157] See e.g. Chesterman et al., United Nations, chapter 10; Cot et al., Charte, pp. 1131 ff.; Denis, Pouvoir Normatif; A. Novosseloff, Le Conseil de Sécurité des Nations Unies et la Maîtrise de la Force Armée, Brussels, 2003; E. de Wet, The Chapter VII Powers of the United Nations Security Council, Oxford, 2004; Franck, Fairness, chapter 9; C. Gray, International Law and the Use of Force, 2nd edn, Oxford, 2004, chapter 7; D. Sarooshi, The United Nations and the Development of Collective Security, Oxford, 1999; R. Higgins, Problems and Process, Oxford, 1994, chapter 15; P. M. Dupuy, 'Sécurité Collective et Organisation de la Paix', 97 RGDIP, 1993, p. 617; G. Gaja, 'Réflexions sur le Rôle du Conseil de Sécurité collective security system, since a wronged state was to be protected by all, and a wrongdoer punished by all. The history of collective security since 1945 demonstrates how flexibility and textual interpretation have prevented the system from failing completely.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

The Security Council

The original scheme by which this was achieved laid great stress upon the role of the Security Council, although this has been modified to some extent in practice. By article 24 of the United Nations Charter, the Council was granted primary responsibility for the maintenance of international peace and security, and its decisions are under article 25 binding upon all member states. It was thus intended to fulfil a dynamic, executive function.

While actions adopted by the Security Council in pursuance of Chapter VI of the Charter, dealing with the pacific settlement of disputes, are purely recommendatory, matters concerning threats to, or breaches of, the peace or acts of aggression, under Chapter VII, give rise to decision-making powers on the part of the Council. This is an important distinction and emphasises the priority accorded within the system to the preservation of peace and the degree of authority awarded to the Security Council to achieve this. The system is completed by article 103 which declares that obligations under the Charter prevail over obligations contained in other international agreements.[158]

Determination of the situation

Before the Council can adopt measures relating to the enforcement of world peace, article 39 of the Charter requires that it must first 'determine the existence of any threat to the peace, breach of the peace or act of dans le Nouvel Ordre Mondial', ibid., p. 297; T. M. Franck and F. Patel, 'UN Police Action in Lieu of War: "The Older Order Changeth"' , 85 AJIL, 1991, p. 63; C. Gray, 'A Crisis of Legitimacy for the UN Collective Security System?', 56 ICLQ, 2007, p. 157; Nguyen Quoc Dinh, P. Daillier and A. Pellet, Droit International Public, 7th edn, Paris, 2002, p. 989, and Simma, Charter, pp. 701 ff.

[158] See the Lockerbie case, ICJ Reports, 1992, p. 3; 94 ILR, p. 478. But see the discussion of article 103 by Judge Lauterpacht in the second provisional measures order in the Genocide (Bosnia and Herzegovina v. Yugoslavia (Serbia and Montenegro)) case, ICJ Reports, 1993, pp. 325, 440; 95 ILR, pp. 43, 158, and by Judge Bedjaoui in the Lockerbie case, ICJ Reports, 1992, pp. 3, 47; 94 ILR, pp. 478, 530. See also Cot et al., Charte, pp. 2133 ff., and A. Toublanc, 'L'Article 103 et la Valeur Juridique de la Charte des Nations Unies', 108 RGDIP, 2004, p. 439.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

aggression'. This is the key to the collective security system. Once such a determination has been made, which may be done implicitly by the use of the language contained in article 39 of the Charter,[159] the way is clear for the adoption of recommendations or decisions to deal with the situation. The adoption of Chapter VII enforcement action constitutes an exception to the principle stated in article 2(7) of the Charter, according to which the UN is not authorised 'to intervene in matters which are essentially within the domestic jurisdiction of any state'.

The question is thus raised at this juncture as to the definition of a threat to, or breach of, the peace or act of aggression. The answer that has emerged in practice is that it depends upon the circumstances of the case and it also depends upon the relationship of the five permanent members of the Council (United Kingdom, United States of America, Russia, China and France) to the issue under consideration, for a negative vote by any of the permanent members is sufficient to block all but procedural resolutions of the Council.[160]

Threat to the peace is the broadest category provided for in article 39 and the one least susceptible to precise definition. In a sense it constitutes a safety net for Security Council action where the conditions needed for a breach of the peace or act of aggression do not appear to be present. It is also the category which has marked a rapid evolution as the perception as to what amounts to a threat to international peace and security has broadened. In particular, the concept has been used to cover internal situations that would once have been shielded from UN action by article 2(7) of the Charter.

A threat to the peace was first determined in the 1948 Middle East War, when in resolution 54 (1948), the Security Council found that the situation created by the conflict in the former mandated territory of Palestine where neighbouring Arab countries had entered the territory in order to conduct hostilities against the new state of Israel constituted 'a threat to the peace within the meaning of article 39' and demanded a cease-fire. In resolution 221 (1966) the Council determined that the situation of the minority white regime in Rhodesia constituted a threat to the peace.[161]

With the cessation of the Cold War, the Security Council has been able to extend its activities under Chapter VII to a remarkable extent. In resolution 713 (1991) the Council determined that the situation in former [159] Gray, Use of Force, p. 197. [160] Article 27 of the UN Charter.

[161] See also Security Council resolution 217 (1965).

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

Yugoslavia[162] constituted a threat to the peace and in resolution 733 (1992), it was held that the situation in Somalia amounted to a threat to peace. In resolution 794 (1992), the Council underlined that 'the magnitude of the human tragedy caused by the conflict in Somalia, further exacerbated by the obstacles being created to the distribution of humanitarian assistance, constitutes a threat to international peace and security'.[163] In resolution 788 (1992) the Council decided that the deteriorating civil war situation in Liberia constituted a threat to international peace, while in resolution 955 (1994), it was determined that the genocide in Rwanda constituted a threat to international peace and security. The latter three cases were clearly internal civil war situations and it could be said that the situation in Yugoslavia at the time of the adoption of the 1991 resolution was also a civil war situation, although this is more complex. Further resolutions with regard to former Yugoslavia determined that threats to the peace were involved.[164] In another move of considerable importance, the Council has also determined that 'widespread violations of international humanitarian law' constitute a threat to peace.[165] Resolutions concerning Sierra Leone[166] affirmed that the civil war in that country constituted a threat to international peace, while resolutions concerning the mixed civil war/foreign intervention conflicts in the Democratic Republic of the Congo affirmed that there existed a 'threat to international peace and security in the region'.[167]

A further expansion in the meaning in practice of a threat to international peace and security took place with regard to Libya. In resolution 748 (1992) the Council determined that 'the failure by the Libyan Government to demonstrate by concrete actions its renunciation of terrorism and in particular its continued failure to respond fully and effectively to the requests in resolution 731 (1992),[168] constitute a threat to international peace and security'. Again, in resolution 1070 (1996), the Council determined that the failure of Sudan to comply with earlier resolutions [162] This situation was characterised by fighting 'causing a heavy loss of human life and material damage, and by the consequences for the countries in the region, in particular in the border areas of neighbouring countries', ibid.

[163] See also Security Council resolution 751 (1992).

[164] See e.g. Security Council resolutions 743 (992), 757 (1992), 787 (1992) and 827 (1993).

[165] See Security Council resolutions 808 (1993), with regard to former Yugoslavia, and 955 (1994), with regard to Rwanda.

[166] See further below, p. 1263. [167] See further below, p. 1264.

[168] Which called for the extradition of alleged bombers of an airplane over Lockerbie in 1988 to the US or UK.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

demanding that it act to extradite to Ethiopia for prosecution suspects on its territory wanted in connection with an assassination attempt against the President of Egypt,[169] constituted a threat to international peace and security. In both cases references to 'international terrorism' were made in the context of a determination of a threat to the peace. This constitutes an important step in combating such a phenomenon for it paves the way for the adoption of binding sanctions in such circumstances. This has been reinforced by resolutions 1368 (2001) and 1373 (2001) adopted in the wake of the 11 September bombings of the World Trade Center in New York and of the Pentagon.[170]

The Haiti situation similarly marked a development in the understanding by the Council as to what may amount to a threat to international peace and security. UN observers monitored an election in that country in 1990, but on 30 September 1991 the elected President Aristide was ousted. In a process which demonstrates the growing interaction between UN organs in crisis situations, the Secretary-General appointed a Special Representative for Haiti on 11 December 1991, the General Assembly authorised a joint UN–Organisation of American States civilian mission on human rights (MICIVIH) on 20 April 1993,[171] and on 16 June 1993, the Security Council imposed an arms and oil embargo on Haiti with sanctions to enter into force on 23 June unless the Secretary-General and the OAS reported that such measures were no longer warranted.[172] The Security Council referred to the fact that 'the legitimate Government of President Jean-Bernard Aristide' had not been reinstated and noted 'the incidence of humanitarian crises, including mass displacements of population, becoming or aggravating threats to international peace and security'.[173] The Council determined therefore that 'in these unique and exceptional circumstances', the continuation of the situation constituted a threat to international peace and security. Thus although the Security Council did not go so far as to declare that the removal of a legitimate government constituted of itself a threat to peace, it was clearly the precipitating factor that taken together with other matters could enable a determination to be made under article 39 thus permitting the [169] Security Council resolutions 1044 (1996) and 1054 (1996).

[170] See above, chapter 20, p. 1162.

[171] See General Assembly resolution 47/20 B.

[172] Security Council resolution 841 (1993).

[173] Note that in Security Council resolution 688 (1991), it had been determined that the consequences of the Iraqi repression of its civilian population in different parts of the country, including areas populated by Kurds, involving considerable refugee flows over the borders of Turkey and Iran threatened international peace and security.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

adoption of binding sanctions. The sanctions were suspended following the Governors Island Agreement of 3 July 1993.[174] However, in resolution 873 (1993), the Council determined that the failure by the military authorities in Haiti to fulfil obligations under that agreement constituted a threat to international peace and security, and sanctions were reimposed.[175] As the Appeal Chamber declared in the Tadić case:

> Indeed, the practice of the Security Council is rich with cases of civil war or internal strife which is classified as a 'threat to the peace' and dealt with under Chapter VII . . . It can thus be said that there is a common understanding, manifested by the 'subsequent practice' of the membership of the United Nations at large, that the 'threat to the peace' of article 39 may include, as one of its species, internal armed conflicts.[176]

Further, in resolution 1540 (2004), the Council affirmed that the proliferation of nuclear, chemical and biological weapons, as well as their means of delivery, constituted a threat to international peace and security and proceeded to establish a sanctions regime monitored by a committee of the Council.

After several decades of discussion and deliberation, a definition of aggression was finally agreed upon by the United Nations General Assembly in 1974.[177] Article 1 provides that aggression is the use of armed force by a state against the sovereignty, territorial integrity or political independence of another state, or in any other manner inconsistent with the United Nations Charter. A number of examples of aggressive acts are given in article 3 and these include the use of weapons by a state against the territory of another state, the blockade of the ports or coasts of a state by the armed forces of another state,[178] and attack by the armed forces of a state on the land, sea or air forces of another state and the sending by, or on behalf of, a state of armed bands to carry out acts of armed force against another state.[179] This elucidation of some of the features of the concept of aggression might prove of some use to the Security Council, but the Council does retain the right to examine all the relevant circumstances, [175] Security Council resolution 873 (1993). Further sanctions were imposed in resolution 917 (1994). Sanctions were finally lifted by resolution 944 (1994), upon the restoration of President Aristide following a US-led operation in Haiti.

[174] Security Council resolution 861 (1993).

[176] 105 ILR, pp. 419, 466.

[177] General Assembly resolution 3314 (XXIX).

[178] As, for example, the blockade of the Israeli port of Eilat in May 1967, above, chapter 20, p. 1138.

[179] See the Nicaragua case, ICJ Reports, 1986, pp. 14, 103–4; 76 ILR, pp. 349, 437.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

including the gravity of any particular incident, before deciding on the determination to make pursuant to article 39.[180]

Findings as to actual breaches of the peace have occurred four times. In 1950, as a result of the invasion of South Korea by North Korea, the Security Council adopted resolutions determining that a breach of the peace had occurred and calling upon member states to assist South Korea,[181] while in resolution 502 (1982) the Council determined that a breach of the peace in the Falkland Islands region had taken place following the Argentine invasion. The third situation which prompted a finding by the Security Council of a breach of the peace was in resolution 598 (1987) dealing with the Iran–Iraq war, while the fourth occasion was in resolution 660 (1990) in which the Council determined that there existed 'a breach of international peace and security as regards the Iraqi invasion of Kuwait'.

Chapter VII measures[182]

Measures not involving the use of force[183] Once the Security Council has resolved that a particular dispute or situation involves a threat to the peace or act of aggression, the way is open to take further measures. Such further measures may, however, be preceded by provisional action taken to prevent the aggravation of the situation. This action, provided for by article 40 of the Charter,[184] is without prejudice to the rights or claims of the parties, and is intended as a provisional measure to stabilise a crisis situation. Usual examples of action taken by the Security Council under this provision include calls for ceasefires (as in the Middle East in 1967 and 1973)[185] and calls for the withdrawal of troops from foreign territory.[186] However, the adoption of provisional measures by the Council [180] The first finding as to aggression by the Security Council was in 1976 with regard to South African action against Angola, Security Council resolution 387 (1976). See also Security Council resolutions 411 (1977) condemning Rhodesian action against Mozambique, 573 (1985) condemning Israel's action against PLO headquarters in Tunisia and 667 (1990) condemning aggressive acts by Iraq against diplomatic premises and personnel in Kuwait.

[181] Security Council resolution S/1501.

[182] See e.g. P. Conlon, 'Legal Problems at the Centre of United Nations Sanctions', 65 Nordic Journal of International Law, 1996, p. 73.

[183] See e.g. M. Doxey, Economic Sanctions and International Enforcement, London, 1980; J. Combacau, Le Pouvoir de Sanction de l'ONU, Paris, 1974; N. Schrijver, 'The Use of Economic Sanctions by the UN Security Council: An International Perspective' in International Economic Law and Armed Conflict (ed. H. Post), Dordrecht, 1994, and Economic Sanctions: Panacea or Peace-Building in a Post-Cold War World (eds. D. Cortright and G. Lopez), Boulder, 1995.

[184] See Simma, Charter, p. 729, and Cot et al., Charte, p. 1171.

[185] See Security Council resolutions 234 (1967) and 338 (1973).

[186] See e.g. Security Council resolution 509 (1982), with regard to Israel's invasion of Lebanon.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

often has an effect ranging far beyond the confines of a purely temporary action. They may induce a calmer atmosphere leading to negotiations to resolve the difficulties and they may set in train moves to settle the dispute upon the basis laid down in the Security Council resolution which called for the provisional measures.

The action adopted by the Council, once it has decided that there exists with regard to a situation a threat to the peace, breach of the peace or act of aggression, may fall into either of two categories. It may amount to the application of measures not involving the use of armed force under article 41, such as the disruption of economic relations or the severance of diplomatic relations, or may call for the use of such force as may be necessary to maintain or restore international peace and security under article 42.

The Council has not until recently utilised the powers it possesses under article 41 to any great extent. The first major instance of action not including the use of force occurred with respect to the Rhodesian situation following upon the Unilateral Declaration of Independence by the white minority government of that territory in 1965.[187] In two resolutions in 1965, the Council called upon member states not to recognise or assist the illegal regime and in particular to break all economic and arms relations with it.[188] The next year, the Council went further and imposed selective mandatory economic sanctions upon Rhodesia,[189] which were extended in 1968 and rendered comprehensive,[190] although several states did act in defiance of these resolutions.[191] Sanctions were [187] See e.g. Simma, Charter, p. 735; Cot et al., Charte, p. 1195; Nguyen Quoc Dinh et al., Droit International Public, p. 997; R. Zacklin, The United Nations and Rhodesia, New York, 1974; J. E. S. Fawcett, 'Security Council Resolutions on Rhodesia', 41 BYIL, 1965–6, p. 103; M. S. McDougal and W. M. Reisman, 'Rhodesia and the United Nations: The Lawfulness of International Concern', 62 AJIL, 1968, p. 1, and J. Nkala, The United Nations, International Law and the Rhodesia Independence Crisis, Oxford, 1985. See also V. Gowlland-Debbas, Collective Responses to Illegal Acts in International Law, Dordrecht, 1990, and Gowlland-Debbas, 'Security Council Enforcement Action and Issues of State Responsibility', 43 ICLQ, 1994, p. 55.

[188] Security Council resolutions 216 (1965) and 217 (1965).

[189] Security Council resolution 232 (1966). Note that under Security Council resolution 221 (1966) the Council inter alia called upon the UK 'to prevent by the use of force if necessary' the arrival in Mozambique of vessels believed to be carrying oil for Rhodesia.

[190] Security Council resolution 253 (1968). See also Security Council resolution 409 (1977).

[191] See N. Polakas, 'Economic Sanctions: An Effective Alternative to Military Coercion?', 6 Brooklyn Journal of International Law, 1980, p. 289. Note also the importation by the United States of Rhodesian chrome and other minerals under the Byrd Amendment between 1972 and 1977: see DUSPIL, 1977, Washington, pp. 830–4.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

terminated in 1979 as a result of the agreement leading to the independence of Zimbabwe.[192]

However, the most comprehensive range of economic sanctions thus far imposed by the Security Council was adopted in the wake of the invasion of Kuwait by Iraq on 2 August 1990.[193] Security Council resolution 661 (1990), noting that Iraq had failed to withdraw immediately and unconditionally from Kuwait[194] and acting specifically under Chapter VII of the Charter, imposed a wide range of economic sanctions upon Iraq, including the prohibition by states of all imports from and exports to Iraq and occupied Kuwait,[195] and the transfer of funds to Iraq and Kuwait for such purposes. Additionally, the Security Council decided that states should not make available to the Government of Iraq or to any commercial, industrial or public utility undertaking in Iraq or Kuwait any funds or any other financial or economic resources and should prevent their nationals and persons within their territories from remitting any other funds to persons or bodies within Iraq or Kuwait,[196] notwithstanding any existing contract or licence.

The Security Council also established a Committee consisting of all members of the Council to oversee the implementation of these measures.[197] Under Security Council resolution 666 (1990), the Committee was instructed to keep the situation regarding foodstuffs in Iraq and Kuwait under constant review and to bear in mind that foodstuffs (as permitted under the terms of the previous resolutions) should be provided through the UN in co-operation with the International Committee of the Red Cross or other appropriate humanitarian agencies and distributed by them or under their supervision. The Committee was additionally given the task of examining requests for assistance under [192] Security Council resolution 460 (1979). See also 19 ILM, 1980, pp. 287 ff. Note in addition Security Council resolution 418 (1977), which imposed an arms embargo upon South Africa.

[193] See Lauterpacht et al., Kuwait Crisis: Basic Documents; The Kuwait Crisis: Sanctions and their Economic Consequences (ed. D. Bethlehem), Cambridge, 1991.

[194] As required in Security Council resolution 660 (1990).

[195] Apart from supplies intended strictly for medical purposes and, 'in humanitarian circumstances', foodstuffs, paragraph 3(c).

[196] Except payments exclusively for strictly medical or humanitarian purposes and, in humanitarian circumstances, foodstuffs, paragraph 4.

[197] See e.g. M. Koskenniemi, 'Le Comité des Sanctions Créé par la Résolution 661 (1990) du Conseil de Sécurité', AFDI, 1991, p. 121, and P. Conlon, 'Lessons from Iraq: The Functions of the Iraq Sanctions Committee as a Source of Sanctions Implementation Authority and Practice', 35 Va. JIL, 1995, p. 632.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

article 50 of the Charter[198] and making recommendations to the President of the Security Council for appropriate action.[199] The binding economic sanctions imposed on Iraq because of its invasion and purported annexation of Kuwait were tightened in Security Council resolution 670 (1990), in which the Council decided that all states, irrespective of any international agreements or contracts, licences or permits in existence, were to deny permission to any aircraft to take off from their territory if the aircraft was carrying cargo to or from Iraq or Kuwait.[200] In addition, states were to deny permission to any aircraft destined to land in Iraq or Kuwait to overfly their territory.[201]

The economic sanctions were reinforced under Security Council resolution 665 (1990) which authorised those UN member states deploying maritime forces in the area in co-operation with the legitimate government of Kuwait 'to use such measures commensurate to the specific circumstances as may be necessary under the authority of the Security Council' in order to enforce the naval blockade on Iraq. The states concerned were requested to co-ordinate their actions 'using as appropriate mechanisms of the Military Staffs Committee'[202] and after consultation with the UN Secretary-General to submit reports to the Security Council and the Committee established under resolution 661 (1990). It is unclear whether given a substantial period of operation, this impressive range of sanctions would have sufficed to compel Iraq to withdraw from Kuwait, for on 16 January 1991 force was employed.

Having once established a comprehensive set of economic and financial sanctions together with mechanisms of supervision, it has become easier to put in place similar responses to other situations. On 31 March 1992, the Security Council imposed a relatively restricted range of sanctions upon Libya due to the latter's refusal to renounce terrorism and [198] Article 50 provides that if preventive or enforcement measures against any state are taken by the Security Council, any other state which finds itself confronted with special economic problems arising from the carrying out of those measures shall have the right to consult the Security Council with regard to a solution to those problems. Note also the reference to article 50 in Security Council resolution 748 (1992), imposing sanctions upon Libya, and resolution 669 (1990). See e.g. Dinstein, War, pp. 283–4; J. Carver and J. Hulsmann, 'The Role of Article 50 of the UN Charter in the Search for International Peace and Security', 49 ICLQ, 2000, p. 528, and Cot et al., Charte, p. 1313.

[199] Security Council resolution 669 (1990).

[200] Other than food in humanitarian circumstances subject to authorisation by the Council or the Committee or supplies intended strictly for medical purposes.

[201] Unless the aircraft was landing for inspection or the flight had been approved by the Committee or the flight was certified by the UN as solely for the purposes of the UN Iran–Iraq Military Observer Group (UNIIMOG).

[202] See below, p. 1251.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

respond fully and effectively to the call in Security Council resolution 731 (1992) to extradite suspected bombers to the UK or US.[203] These sanctions imposed a mandatory arms and air embargo upon Libya. It also called upon states to reduce significantly the number and the level of staff at Libyan diplomatic missions and diplomatic posts. A Committee was set up to monitor compliance with the sanctions. Resolution 1192 (1998) provided inter alia for the suspension of the sanctions upon the certification by the Secretary-General of the arrival of the accused bombers in the Netherlands for trial. This duly occurred[204] and the President of the Council issued a statement on 9 July 1999 noting therefore the suspension of the sanctions.[205]

On 30 May 1992, the Security Council in resolution 757 (1992) imposed a wide range of economic sanctions upon the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia (Serbia and Montenegro), having imposed an arms embargo upon all states within the territory of the former Yugoslavia in resolution 713 (1991).[206] The resolution, adopted under Chapter VII, prohibited the importation of goods from the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia (Serbia and Montenegro) and the export or trans-shipment of such goods by states or their nationals and the sale or supply of any commodities or products to any person or body in the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia or to any person or body for the purposes of any business carried on in or operated from it. In addition, paragraph 5 of this resolution prohibited states from making available to the authorities in the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia (Serbia and Montenegro) or to any commercial, industrial or public utility undertaking there, any funds or any other financial or economic resources. States were also to prevent their nationals and any persons within their territories from providing to anyone within the Federal Republic any funds or resources at all, except for payments exclusively for strictly medical or humanitarian purposes and foodstuffs.[207]

These sanctions were essentially extended by Security Council resolution 820 (1993) to areas of Croatia and Bosnia controlled by the Bosnian Serb forces. In addition, the Danube River was included within the sanctions control system and the transport of all goods (apart from medical [203] Security Council resolution 748 (1992).

[204] See S/1999/726. [205] See S/PRST/1999/22.

[206] A Sanctions Committee was established under Security Council resolution 724 (1991).

[207] See also resolution 787 (1992), which decided that any vessel in which a majority or a controlling interest was held by a person or undertaking in or operating from the Federal Republic was to be considered for the purpose of the sanctions regime as a Yugoslav vessel, irrespective of the flag flown. Further maritime control measures were also adopted under this resolution.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

supplies and foodstuffs) across the land borders to or from the ports of the Federal Republic was prohibited.[208] Resolution 942 (1994) extended sanctions to cover economic activities carried on within states by any entity owned or controlled, directly or indirectly, by any person or entity resident in areas of Bosnia under the control of the Bosnian Serb forces.

As negotiations progressed, the sanctions against the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia were progressively eased.[209] After the Dayton peace agreement was initialled, the arms embargo was lifted[210] and sanctions were suspended indefinitely by resolution 1022 (1995) on 22 November 1995, except with regard to Bosnian Serb forces.[211] Sanctions were fully lifted by resolution 1074 (1996) following the holding of elections in Bosnia as required under the peace agreement and the Sanctions Committee was dissolved. Arms sanctions were reimposed in 1998 due to the Kosovo situation, but lifted in 2001.[212]

Arms sanctions have also been imposed upon Somalia,[213] Rwanda,[214] Liberia[215] and Ethiopia and Eritrea.[216] An arms embargo on Sierra Leone[217]

[208] Resolution 820 also decided that states were to impound all vessels, freight vehicles, rolling stock and aircraft in their territories in which a majority or controlling interest was held by a person or undertaking in or operating from the Federal Republic. Paragraph 21 of the resolution called for states to freeze funds of the authorities in the Federal Republic or of commercial, industrial or public utility undertakings there, and of funds controlled directly or indirectly by such authorities or undertakings or by entities, wherever located or organised, owned or controlled by such authorities or undertakings.

[209] See e.g. Security Council resolutions 943 (1994), 988 (1995), 992 (1995), 1003 (1995) and 1015 (1995).

[210] Security Council resolution 1021 (1995).

[211] The resolution also provided for the release of frozen assets, 'provided that any such funds and assets that are subject to any claims, liens, judgments, or encumbrances, or which are the funds of any person, partnership, corporation, or other entity found or deemed insolvent under law or the accounting principles prevailing in such state, shall remain frozen or impounded until released in accordance with applicable law'.

[212] See resolutions 1160 (1998) and 1367 (2001).

[213] See Security Council resolutions 733 (1992), 751 (1992), 1356 (2001), 1407 (2002) ,1425 (2002), 1744 (2007) and 1772 (2007).

[214] See resolutions 918 (1994), 1005 (1995), 1011 (1995), 1013 (1995), 1053 (1996) and 1161 (1998).

[215] See resolutions 788 (1992) and 985 (1995). Sanctions were terminated by resolution 1343 (2001), but reintroduced in resolution 1521 (2003). See also resolutions 1532 (2004) and 1683 (2006). The regime was most recently extended by resolution 1713 (2006).

[216] See resolution 1298 (2000). Sanctions were terminated in pursuance of Presidential Statement S/PRST/2001/14 of 15 May 2001. Note that this was the first time that sanctions had been imposed on both sides in a conflict: see C. Gray, 'From Unity to Polarisation: International Law and the Use of Force against Iraq', 13 EJIL, 2002, pp. 1, 3.

[217] See resolutions 1132 (1997) and 1171 (1998).

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

was extended to cover the import of rough-cut diamonds other than those controlled by the government under the certificate of origin scheme.[218] An air embargo and a freezing of assets was imposed on the Taliban regime in Afghanistan in 1999.[219] An arms embargo was imposed on all foreign and Congolese armed groups and militias operating in the territory of North and South Kivu and Ituri, and on groups not party to the Global and All-inclusive Agreement in the Democratic Republic of the Congo in resolution 1493 (2003),[220] while in resolution 1718 (2006) an arms embargo was placed on North Korea, which was called upon to suspend all activities related to its ballistic missile programme, and abandon all nuclear weapons and existing nuclear programmes, and all other existing weapons of mass destruction and ballistic missile programmes in a complete, verifiable and irreversible manner. An arms embargo on the Sudan was imposed in 2004 with regard to all non-governmental entities and individuals, including the Janjaweed Arab militia, operating in North, South and West Darfur,[221] while sanctions have also been imposed upon Iran in view of suspicions that it is moving towards the acquisition of nuclear weapons in violation of its obligations under the Nuclear Non-Proliferation Treaty.[222]

[218] See resolutions 1306 (2000), 1385 (2001) and 1446 (2002). The diamonds sanctions ended in June 2003: see SC/7778. Note also the sanctions imposed on the Ivory Coast, comprising an arms embargo, travel ban on particular individuals, assets freeze on individuals and designated entities and diamond sanctions: see e.g. resolutions 1572 (2004), 1584 (2005), 1643 (2005) and 172 (2007). Sanctions were also imposed on individuals to be determined with regard to Lebanon following the assassination of former prime minister Hariri and others: see resolution 1636 (2005).

[219] See resolution 1267 (1999). The sanctions regime was intensified in e.g. resolutions 1333 (2000), 1390 (2002), 1455 (2003), 1526 (2004), 1617 (2005) and 1735 (2006). Sanctions currently cover individuals and entities associated with Al-Qaida, Usama bin Laden and/or the Taliban wherever located.

[220] See also resolutions 1533 (2004), 1596 (2005), 1649 (2005) and 1698 (2006), expanding the scope of the arms embargo, imposing additional targeted sanctions measures (travel ban and assets freeze), and broadening the criteria under which individuals could be designated as subject to those measures. In resolution 1807 (2008), the arms embargo was limited to all non-governmental entities and individuals operating in the territory of the Congo, while the travel ban and assets freeze were extended to individuals operating in that country and committing serious violations of international law involving the targeting of women. See also resolution 1804 (2008) affirming the application of sanctions to various Rwandan armed groups operating in the Congo.

[221] See resolution 1556 (2004). The scope of the arms embargo was expanded and additional measures imposed, including a travel ban and an assets freeze on designated individuals, in resolution 1591 (2005).

[222] Sanctions include a proliferation-sensitive nuclear and ballistic missile programmes-related embargo; an export ban on arms and related matériel from Iran; and individual

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

While measures taken under article 41 have traditionally been economic sanctions, other possibilities exist. The Council may, for example, call for action to be taken to reduce the number and level of diplomatic staff of the target state within other states.[223] More dramatically, the Council has on two occasions established international tribunals to prosecute war criminals by the adoption of binding resolutions under Chapter VII.[224] Further, the Council may adopt a series of determinations concerning legal responsibilities of states that will have considerable consequences.

Security Council Resolution 687 (1991), adopted under Chapter VII of the Charter and agreed to by Iraq as part of the ceasefire arrangement,[225] constitutes the supreme illustration of such a situation. This laid down a series of conditions for the ending of the conflict in the Gulf. The resolution demanded that Iraq and Kuwait respect the inviolability of the international boundary as laid down in the Agreed Minutes signed by Iraq and Kuwait on 4 October 1963. The Council then proceeded to guarantee the inviolability of this international boundary, a development of great significance in the history of the UN. The resolution also provided for the immediate deployment of a UN observer unit to monitor a demilitarised zone to be established extending 10 kilometres into Iraq and 5 kilometres into Kuwait from the international boundary.[226] Iraq was called upon to accept the destruction or removal of all chemical and biological weapons and all ballistic missiles with a range greater than 150 kilometres. A special commission was provided for to ensure that this happened.[227] Iraq was to agree unconditionally not to acquire or develop nuclear weapons. The Security Council resolution reaffirmed that Iraq was liable under international law for any direct loss, damage, including environmental damage and the depletion of natural resources, or injury to foreign governments, targeted sanctions (a travel ban, a travel notification requirement and an assets freeze on designated persons and entities): see resolutions 1737 (2006), 1747 (2007) and 1803 (2008).

[223] See e.g. Security Council resolution 748 (1992), with regard to Libya.

[224] See Security Council resolutions 808 (1992) and 827 (1992) with regard to former Yugoslavia, and 955 (1994) with regard to Rwanda. See also the Milutinović case before the International Criminal Tribunal for the Former Yugoslavia, IT–99–37–PT, 6 May 2003.

[225] See S/22456, 6 April 1991.

[226] See further above, p. 1229.

[227] See also Security Council resolutions 707 (1991) and 715 (1991) and the Reports of the Special Commission, e.g. S/23165; S/23268; S/24108 and Corr.1; S/24984; S/25977; S/26910; S/1994/750; S/1994/1138; S/1994/1422 and S/1994/1422/Add.1.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

nationals and corporations, as a result of Iraq's unlawful invasion and occupation of Kuwait.[228]

The scope and extent of this binding resolution amounts to a considerable development of the Security Council's efforts to resolve disputes. The demands that Iraq give up certain types of weapons and the requirement that repudiation of foreign debt is invalidated would appear to mark a new departure for the Council. In this category would also fall the guarantee given to the inviolability of an international border which is still the subject of dispute between the two parties concerned. In addition to the provisions noted above, the Council established a fund to pay compensation for claims[229] and created a UN Compensation Commission.[230]

Sanctions continued after the ceasefire as the Security Council determined that Iraq had failed to comply fully with resolution 687 (1991). Concern centred upon the failure to destroy weapons of mass destruction as required in the resolution. Iraq was also required to place all of its nuclear-weapon-usable materials under the exclusive control of the International Atomic Energy Agency (IAEA) and unconditionally agree not to acquire or develop nuclear weapons or nuclear-weapon-usable materials.[231] The United Nations Special Commission (UNSCOM) was created to implement the non-nuclear provisions of the resolution and to assist the IAEA in the nuclear areas.

Iraq ceased its partial co-operation with UNSCOM in October 1998. The Security Council adopted resolution 1205 (1998) condemning this as a 'flagrant violation' of resolution 687 (1991). The UNSCOM inspectors were withdrawn in December 1998 and the conclusion of its final report was that Iraq had not provided it with the necessary declarations and notifications as required under Security Council resolution.[232] In resolution 1284 (1999), noting that Iraq had not fully carried out Council resolutions so that sanctions could not be lifted, the Security Council [228] In a further interesting but controversial provision, the resolution 'decides that all Iraqi statements made since 2 August 1990, repudiating its foreign debt, are null and void, and demands that Iraq scrupulously adhere to all of its obligations concerning servicing and repayment of its foreign debt'.

[229] See paragraph 18 of resolution 687 (1991).

[230] Ibid., paragraph 16 and see Security Council resolution 692 (1991). See further above, chapter 18, p. 1045.

[231] Paragraph 12.

[232] See S/1999/1037. See also S/1999/94 detailing the problems faced by UNSCOM and Iraq's partial destruction of proscribed weapons coupled with 'a practice of concealment of proscribed items, including weapons, and a cover up of its activities in contravention of Council resolutions', ibid., para. 5.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

established the UN Monitoring, Verification and Inspection Commission (UNMOVIC) to replace UNSCOM.[233] In resolution 1441 (2002), adopted unanimously, the Security Council pointed to Iraq's failures to comply with resolution 687 (1991) and decided that Iraq remained in 'material breach' of its obligations under Council resolutions. The sanctions regime that continued in force was mitigated by the adoption of the 'oil-for-food' programme instituted under resolution 986 (1995) and administered by the UN.[234]

The issue generally of the efficacy of sanctions remains open, but the economic damage that sanctions can do to the general population of a state, particularly where the government concerned does not operate in good faith, may be immense, and this has opened a debate as to whether sanctions may be better focused and targeted or made 'smarter'.[235] One manifestation of this has been the increasing resort to sanctions against particular individuals or entities (as determined by the Security Council sanctions committee established to deal with the matter). This has raised the issue as to the ability of the named persons or entities to challenge their inclusion on the relevant list. Different de-listing (removal) procedures have been established by the various sanctions committees monitoring imposed sanctions, but these have not permitted direct approaches by individuals or entities concerned and this has prompted human rights concerns.[236] Accordingly, the Security Council adopted resolution 1730 (2006), which called for the Secretary-General to establish within the Secretariat (Security Council Subsidiary Organs Branch) a focal point to receive de-listing requests from the pertinent individuals or entities.

[233] See e.g. C. de Jonge Oudraat, 'UNSCOM: Between Iraq and a Hard Place', 13 EJIL, 2002, p. 139.

[234] See S/1996/356 and, most recently, S/2002/1239. Note that Security Council resolution 1472 (2003), adopted eight days after the military operation against Iraq began, provided for the temporary extension of the oil-for-food arrangements under the changed conditions. The arrangements were also modified in resolutions 1284 (1999) and 1409 (2002). Resolution 1483 (2003) supported the formation of an 'interim administration' for Iraq, following the occupation of that state by the UK and the USA, by the people of Iraq with the help of 'the Authority' (the UK and USA) and all economic sanctions (apart from arms) were lifted: see further below, p. 1256.

[235] See e.g. General Assembly resolution 51/242 and UKMIL, 70 BYIL, 1999, p. 549. See also Gray, Use of Force, p. 209, and Forum, 13 EJIL, 2002, p. 43.

[236] See e.g. E. Rosand, 'The Security Council's Efforts to Monitor the Implementation of Al-Qaida/Taliban Sanctions', 98 AJIL, 2004, p. 745, and B. Fassbender, Targeted Sanctions and Due Process, 2006, a study commissioned by the UN Office of Legal Affairs, www.un.org/law/counsel/Fassbender_study.pdf. See also C. Tomuschat, Human Rights, Oxford, 2003, p. 90, and K. Wellens, Remedies against International Organizations, Cambridge, 2002, p. 89.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

Such requests are to be sent to the designating governments concerned (and governments of citizenship and residence), who may approach the sanctions committee directly or through the focal point, proposing that the individuals or entitites be removed from the sanctions list. It will then be for the sanctions committee to take the decision.[237]

Measures involving the use of force Where the Council feels that the measures short of armed force as prescribed under article 41 have been or would be inadequate, it may take 'such action by air, sea or land forces as may be necessary to maintain or restore international peace and security'. Article 42 also provides that such action may extend to demonstrations, blockades and other armed operations by members of the United Nations. In order to be able to function effectively in this sphere, article 43 provides for member states to conclude agreements with the Security Council to make available armed forces, assistance and facilities, while article 45 provides that member states should hold immediately available national air-force contingents for combined international enforcement action in accordance with article 43 agreements. In this manner it was intended to create a United Nations corps to act as the arm of the Council to suppress threats to, or breaches of, the peace or acts of aggression.

Article 47 provides for the creation of a Military Staffs Committee, composed of the Chiefs of Staff of the five permanent members or their representatives, to advise and assist the Security Council on military requirements and to be responsible for the strategic direction of any armed force placed at the disposal of the Security Council. Indeed, article 46 provides that plans for the application of armed force 'shall be made by the Security Council with the assistance of the Military Staffs Committee'. However, during the Kuwait crisis of 1990–1, the Military Staffs Committee played an important co-ordinating role, while under Security Council resolution 665 (1990) it was given a more general co-ordination function.

[237] Where no comments are received within three months, the sanctions committee will be so informed and any member may request de-listing. The Secretary-General informed the Security Council on 30 March 2007 that the focal point had been established, S/2007/178. Note that in the Yusuf and Kadi cases it was argued that the persons concerned had been wrongly listed and that EU Regulation 881/2002, implementing the UN sanctions, should be annulled with regard to them: see the judgment of 21 September 2005 of the European Court of First Instance, T-306/01 and T/315/01 (which refused to review the Regulation) and the opinion of the advocate-general of the European Court of Justice, C-402/05 P of 16 January 2008, which proposed that the judgment of the Court of First Instance be set aside and the Regulation in so far as it related to the persons concerned annulled. The matter is currently before the European Court of Justice.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

Because of great power disputes and other factors, none of the projected agreements has been signed and article 43 remains ineffective. This has weakened article 42 to the extent that the envisaged procedure for its implementation has had to be abandoned. This has meant that the UN through a process of interpretation by subsequent conduct has been obliged to reconfigure the collective security regime.

The first example of enforcement action in practice was the United Nations' reaction to the North Korean invasion of the South in 1950,[238] and this only occurred because of a fortuitous combination of circumstances. In June 1950 North Korean forces crossed the 28th Parallel dividing North from South Korea and thus precipitated armed conflict. Almost immediately the Security Council debated the issue and, after declaring that a breach of the peace had taken place, called upon member states to assist the United Nations in achieving a North Korean withdrawal. Two days later, another resolution was adopted which recommended that United Nations members should furnish all necessary assistance to the South Korean authorities, while the third in the trio of Security Council resolutions on this issue authorised the United States to designate the commander of the unified forces established for the purpose of aiding the South Koreans and permitted the use of the United Nations flag by such forces.[239]

The only reason that these resolutions were in fact passed by the Council was the absence of the USSR in protest at the seating of the Nationalist Chinese delegation.[240] This prevented the exercise of the veto by the Soviet Union and permitted the creation of an authoritative United Nations umbrella for the US-commanded forces combating the North Korean armies. The USSR returned to the Council at the start of August 1950 and effectively blocked further action by the Council on this issue, but they could not reverse what had been achieved, despite claims that the resolutions were not constitutionally valid in view of the Soviet boycott.[241]

However, although termed United Nations forces, the contingents from the sixteen states which sent troops were under effective United States control, pursuant to a series of agreements concluded by that country with each of the contributing states, and were not in any real sense directed by the United Nations other than operating under a general Security [238] See e.g. Dinstein, War, pp. 292 ff.; Gray, Use of Force, pp. 199 ff., and Franck, Fairness, p. 223.

[239] Security Council resolutions 82 (1950), 83 (1950) and 84 (1950).

[240] See e.g. L. Sohn, Cases on United Nations Law, 2nd edn, Brooklyn, 1967, pp. 479 ff.

[241] Ibid., pp. 481 ff. See also ibid., pp. 509 ff. with regard to the situation following the Chinese involvement in the conflict.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

Council authorisation. This improvised operation clearly revealed the deficiencies in the United Nations system of maintaining the peace since the Charter collective security system as originally envisaged could not operate, but it also demonstrated that the system could be reinterpreted so as to function.[242]

The second example occurred following the invasion of Kuwait by Iraq on 2 August 1990.[243] Resolution 660 (1990), adopted unanimously the same day by the Security Council, condemned the invasion and called for an immediate and unconditional withdrawal. Resolution 662 (1990) declared that the purported Iraqi annexation of Kuwait had no legal validity and was null and void. States and international organisations were called upon to refrain from any action or dealing that might be interpreted as an indirect recognition of the annexation. The Council, specifically acting under Chapter VII of the UN Charter, demanded in resolution 664 (1990) that Iraq permit the immediate departure of the nationals of third countries[244] and in resolution 667 (1990) condemned Iraqi aggressive acts against diplomatic premises and personnel in Kuwait, including the abduction of foreign nationals present in those premises, and demanded the protection of diplomatic premises and personnel.[245] Eventually, the Security Council, feeling that the response of Iraq to all the foregoing resolutions and measures adopted had been unsatisfactory, adopted resolution 678 (1990) on 29 November 1990. This allowed Iraq a further period of grace within which to comply with earlier resolutions and withdraw from Kuwait. This 'final opportunity' was to end on 15 January 1991. After this date, member states co-operating with the Government of Kuwait were authorised to use all necessary means to uphold and implement Security Council resolution 660 (1990) and to restore international peace and security in the area. All states were requested to provide appropriate support for the actions undertaken in pursuance of this resolution. The armed action commenced on 16 January 1991 by a coalition of states[246]

[242] Franck has written, referring to the 'adaptive capacity' of the UN, that the 'gradual emancipation of article 42 as a free-standing authority for deploying collective force, ad hoc, had prevented the collapse of the Charter system in the absence of the standby militia envisioned by article 43', Recourse, p. 23.

[243] See Lauterpacht et al., Kuwait Crisis: Basic Documents. See also O. Schachter, 'United Nations Law in the Gulf Conflict', 85 AJIL, 1991, p. 452.

[244] See also Security Council resolution 674 (1990).

[245] See generally Keesing's Record of World Events, pp. 37631 ff. and pp. 37694 ff. (1990).

[246] The following states supplied armed forces and/or warships or aircraft for the enforcement of the UN resolutions: USA, UK, France, Egypt, Syria, Saudi Arabia, Morocco, the Netherlands, Australia, Italy, Spain, Argentina, Belgium, Canada, Pakistan, Norway,

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

under the leadership of the United States can thus be seen as a legitimate use of force authorised by the UN Security Council under its enforcement powers elaborated in Chapter VII of the UN Charter and binding upon all member states of the UN by virtue of article 25.[247] This is to be seen in the context of the purposes laid down by the Council in binding resolutions, that is the immediate and unconditional withdrawal of Iraq from Kuwait and the restoration of international peace and security in the area, and within the framework of the exercise of enforcement action in the light of the absence of article 43 arrangements.

However, the question has arisen whether the process of reinterpreting the Charter by subsequent conduct has moved beyond the authorisation by the Council to member states to take action in the absence of specifically designated UN forces operating under the aegis of the Military Staffs Committee. In particular, is it possible to argue that in certain situations such authorisation may be implied rather than expressly granted?[248] Following the Gulf War, revolts against the central government in Iraq led to widespread repression by Iraqi forces against the Shias in the south and the Kurds in the north of the country. Security Council resolution 688 (1991), which was not adopted under Chapter VII and did not authorise the use of force, condemned such repression 'the consequences of which threaten international peace and security' and insisted that Iraq allow immediate access by international humanitarian organisations to those in need in the country. In the light of the repression, the US, UK and France sent troops into northern Iraq to create a safe haven for humanitarian operations. They were speedily withdrawn and replaced by a small number of UN Guards operating with the consent of Iraq.[249] In addition, the Western states declared a 'no-fly' zone over southern Iraq in August 1992, having established one over northern Iraq in April 1991. The justification of these zones was argued to be that of supporting resolution 688.[250] Further, it was maintained that the right of self-defence

Denmark, USSR, Bangladesh, Senegal, Niger, Czechoslovakia and the Gulf Co-operation Council (Kuwait, Qatar, Bahrain, Oman and the United Arab Emirates): see Sunday Times 'War in the Gulf' Briefing, 27 January 1991, p. 9.

247 As well as a legitimate use of force in collective self-defence: see above, chapter 20, p. 1146.

248 See e.g. Gray, Use of Force, pp. 264 ff.

249 See e.g. White, Keeping the Peace, p. 192, and F. L. Kirgis, International Organisations in their Legal Setting, 2nd edn, St Paul, 1993, pp. 854 ff.

250 See e.g. the statement of the Minister of State at the Foreign Office on 27 January 1993, UKMIL, 64 BYIL, 1993, p. 739, and see also ibid., at p. 728 and UKMIL, 65 BYIL, 1994, p. 683. See also the statement of President Bush of the US cited in Kirgis, International Organisations, p. 856. Note that on 3 September 1996, in response to the entry of Iraqi existed with regard to flights over the zones, thus permitting proportionate responses to Iraqi actions.[251] Whether resolution 688 can indeed be so interpreted is unclear. What is clear is that such actions were not explicitly mandated by the UN. It is also to be noted that the UK in particular has also founded such actions upon the need to prevent a humanitarian crisis as supported by resolution 688. In March 2001, for example, it was noted that the no-fly zones were established 'in support of resolution 688' and 'are justified under international law in response to a situation of overwhelming humanitarian necessity'.[252]

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

More dramatically, the use of force based impliedly on Security Council resolutions occurred in March 2003, when the UK and the US commenced military action against Iraq.[253] The legal basis for this action was deemed to rest upon the 'combined effect of resolutions 678, 687 and 1441'.[254] Resolution 1441 (2002)[255] inter alia recognised that Iraq's non-compliance with Council resolutions and proliferation of weapons of mass destruction posed a threat to international peace and security and recalled that resolution 678 authorised member states to use all necessary means to restore international peace and security. Citing Chapter VII, the resolution decided that Iraq was and remained in material breach of resolutions troops and tanks into the northern 'no-fly' Kurdish zone in order to aid one of the Kurdish groups against another, US aircraft launched a series of air strikes against Iraq and extended the southern 'no-fly' zone from the 32nd to the 33rd parallel. In so doing the US government cited Security Council resolution 688 (1991): see The Economist, 7 September 1996, pp. 55–6. See also Gray, 'Unity to Polarisation', p. 9.

[251] UKMIL, 64 BYIL, 1993, pp. 728 and 740 with regard to Western air raids against Iraqi targets on 13 January 1993. See also UKMIL, 69 BYIL, 1998, p. 592 and UKMIL, 70 BYIL, 1999, pp. 565, 568 and 590.

[252] See UKMIL, 72 BYIL, 2001, p. 694. See also above, chapter 20, p. 1156.

[253] Note that in December 1998, UK and US airplanes attacked targets in Iraq in response to the withdrawal by that state of co-operation with UN weapons inspectors and based this action on resolutions 1154 (1998) and 1205 (1998) adopted under Chapter VII. The resolutions did not authorise force, but the former noted that any violation by Iraq of its obligations to accord 'immediate, unconditional and unrestricted access' to UNSCOM and the IAEA would have 'severest consequences' and the latter declared that Iraq's decision to end co-operation with UNSCOM was 'a flagrant violation' of resolution 687 (1991): see UKMIL, 69 BYIL, 1998, pp. 589 ff., and Gray, 'Unity to Polarisation', pp. 11 ff.

[254] See the Attorney General, Hansard, House of Lords, vol. 646, Written Answer, 17 March 2003. This UK position was referred to without demur by the US Secretary of State, Briefing, 17 March, 2003: see www.state.gov/secretary/rm/2003/18771.htm. See also the letters dated 21 March 2003 sent to the President of the Security Council from the Permanent Representatives of the UK, US and Australia, S/2003/350-2. See also 52 ICLQ, 2003, pp. 812 ff.

[255] See, as to resolutions 678 (1990) and 687 (1991), above, pp. 1253 and 1248.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

including 687, decided to afford that state a 'final opportunity to comply with its disarmament obligations under relevant resolutions of the Council' and established an enhanced inspection regime. The Council called for declarations from Iraq detailing all aspects of its programmes with regard to weapons of mass destruction and ballistic missiles, noting that false statements or omissions would constitute a further material breach. It decided that Iraq was to provide UNMOVIC and the IAEA with immediate, unimpeded, unconditional and unrestricted access to all relevant sites, records and officials. The Council decided to convene further to 'consider the situation and the need for full compliance with all of the relevant Council resolutions in order to secure international peace and security' and recalled in that context that 'the Council has repeatedly warned Iraq that it will face serious consequences as a result of its continued violations of its obligations'. This resolution was adopted unanimously.

Subsequent events, however, revealed Iraqi deficiencies in complying with the resolution.[256] The Security Council was divided on the need for a follow-up resolution to 1441 in order for force to be used and a draft resolution drawn up by the UK, US and Spain was withdrawn on 17 March once it became clear that one or more permanent members would exercise a veto.[257] On 20 March the military operations commenced. The Security Council can authorise member states to resort to force in order to maintain international peace and security, as in the Kuwait conflict of 1990–1, and the Council did affirm that Iraq's failure to comply with its obligations in resolution 687 to divest itself of weapons of mass destruction constituted a threat to international peace and security. Resolution 1441 was intended as a final opportunity and it was provided that serious consequences would ensue upon Iraq's failure to comply. However, whether this amounts to a justification in international law for the UK and the US to use force in the face of the opposition of other Security Council members remains controversial.[258]

[256] See e.g. UNMOVIC Report of 28 February 2003, S/2003/232, pp. 3, 12–13 and UNMOVIC Working Document on Unresolved Disarmament Issues: Iraq's Proscribed Weapons Programme ('Cluster Document'), 6 March 2003.

[257] See US Secretary of State, Briefing, 17 March 2003, www.state.gov/secretary/rm/2003/18771.htm.

[258] See e.g. 'Agora', 97 AJIL, 2003, p. 553; Gray, Use of Force, pp. 270 ff.; Dinstein, War, pp. 297 ff.; E. Papastavridis, 'Interpretation of Security Council Resolutions under Chapter VII in the Aftermath of the Iraqi Crisis', 56 ICLQ, 2007, p. 83; J.-M. Sorel, 'L'ONU et l'Irak: Le Vil Plomb N'Est Pas Transformé en Or Pur', 108 RGDIP, 2004, p. 845; S. Wheatley, 'The Security Council, Democratic Legitimacy and Regime Change in Iraq', 17 EJIL, 2006, p. 531; and C. Greenwood, 'International Law and the Pre-emptive Use of Force:

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

The use of force in non-enforcement situations

In some recent peacekeeping situations, missions established without reference to Chapter VII of the Charter have later been expanded with mandates wholly or partly referring specifically to Chapter VII and in some cases this has led to the application of force by the UN. The results are variable. In both Bosnia and Somalia the temptation to resort to more robust tactics (often for the best of humanitarian reasons) involving the use of force, but without adequate political or military resources or support, led to severe difficulties.

Former Yugoslavia The outbreak of hostilities in Yugoslavia led the Security Council in resolution 713 (1991), adopted on 25 September 1991, to impose an arms embargo on that country. As the situation deteriorated, the decision was taken to establish a peacekeeping force (the UN Protection Force or UNPROFOR) in order to ensure the demilitarisation of three protected areas in Croatia (inhabited by Serbs).[259] This resolution did not refer to Chapter VII and did specifically note the request of the Government of Yugoslavia for a peacekeeping operation.[260] The full deployment of the force was authorised by resolution 749 (1992). During the following months the mandate of UNPROFOR was gradually extended. By resolution 762 (1992), for example, it was authorised to monitor the situation in areas of Croatia under Yugoslav army control,[261] while by resolution 779 (1992) UNPROFOR assumed responsibility for monitoring the demilitarisation of the Prevlaka peninsula near Dubrovnik.[262] At the same time, the situation in Bosnia and Herzegovina deteriorated. Both Croatia and the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia (Serbia and Montenegro) were criticised for their actions in Bosnia in resolution 757 (1992)[263] and sanctions were imposed upon the latter. In resolution 758 (1992), the Council approved an enlargement of UNPROFOR's mandate and strength and Afghanistan, Al-Qaida and Iraq', 4 San Diego Journal of International Law, 2003, p. 7. See also Sarooshi, Collective Security, chapter 4 and pp. 174 ff. with regard to delegation of Chapter VII powers to member states and the limitations thereupon.

259 Security Council resolution 743 (1992). See also the Report of the Secretary-General, S/23592 and Security Council resolutions 721 (1991) and 724 (1991).

260 The resolution, however, did mention article 25.

261 See also Security Council resolution 769 (1992).

262 Note also Security Council resolution 802 (1993) criticising Croatia for its attacks within or adjacent to the UN protected areas and upon UNPROFOR personnel.

263 The Security Council in this resolution was explicitly acting under Chapter VII. See also resolution 752 (1992) also criticising outside interference in Bosnia, which did not refer to Chapter VII.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

authorised the deployment of military observers and related personnel and equipment to Sarajevo, the capital of Bosnia.[264]

In a further measure responding to the dire situation, the Security Council, acting under Chapter VII, adopted resolution 770 (1992) calling on all states to 'take nationally or through regional agencies or arrangements all measures necessary' to facilitate, in co-ordination with the UN, the delivery of humanitarian assistance to and within Bosnia. The phrase 'all necessary measures', it will be recalled, permits in UN terminology the resort to force.[265] The mandate of UNPROFOR was augmented by resolution 776 (1992) to incorporate support for the humanitarian relief activities of the UN High Commissioner for Refugees (UNHCR) and, in particular, to provide protection where requested. It was noted in the Secretary-General's Report, approved by this resolution, that the normal peacekeeping rules of engagement would be followed, so that force could be used in self-defence, particularly where attempts were made to prevent the carrying out of the mandate.[266] However, resolution 776 (1992) made no mention of either Chapter VII or 'all necessary measures'.

A further stage in the evolution of UNPROFOR's role occurred with the adoption of the 'no-fly' ban imposed on military flights over Bosnia by Security Council resolution 781 (1992). UNPROFOR was given the task of monitoring compliance with this ban.[267]

In order to protect certain Bosnian Moslem areas under siege from Bosnian Serb forces, the Security Council established a number of 'safe [264] Additional elements were deployed to ensure the security of the airport by resolution 761 (1992). Note that neither of these resolutions referred to Chapter VII. See also S/1994/300, with regard to UNPROFOR's mandate relating to Sarajevo airport. The airlift of humanitarian supplies into this airport was the longest lasting such airlift in history and well over 150,000 tons were delivered: see S/1995/444, para. 23.

[265] The Secretary-General was, however, careful to state that this resolution created no additional mandate for UNPROFOR: see S/1995/444, para. 25.

[266] See S/24540. Note that a number of resolutions extended the application of Chapter VII to UNPROFOR's freedom of movement, e.g. resolutions 807 (1993) and 847 (1993), and force was used on a number of occasions in self-defence: see e.g. S/1995/444, para. 55.

[267] See also Security Council resolution 786 (1992). The ban on air activity was expanded in resolution 816 (1993) to cover flights by all fixed-wing and rotary-wing aircraft. At the request of the Secretary-General, the no-fly zone was enforced by aircraft from NATO: see S/1995/444, para. 30. A 'dual key' system was put into operation under which decisions on targeting and execution were to be taken jointly by UN and NATO commanders and the principle of proportionality of response to violations was affirmed: see e.g. Joint Press Statement of 29 October 1994, PKO/32.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

areas'.[268] Although Chapter VII was referred to in these resolutions, it was cited only in the context of resolution 815 (1993), which dealt with the security of UNPROFOR personnel. The enforcement of the 'safe areas' was therefore to be attained by UNPROFOR personnel authorised to use force only to protect themselves.[269] Although the Secretary-General stated that approximately 34,000 extra troops would be necessary, only an additional 7,000 were authorised.[270] At the request of the Secretary-General, NATO established a 3-kilometre 'total exclusion zone' and a 20-kilometre 'military exclusion zone' around Gorazde and a 20-kilometre 'heavy weapons exclusion zone' around Sarajevo. These zones were to be enforced by air strikes if necessary, although no Security Council resolutions referred to such zones or created any special regime with regard to them.[271] Relations between UNPROFOR and the Bosnian Serbs led to a series of incidents in the spring of 1995. The latter breached the Sarajevo no-heavy-weapons arrangement. This precipitated NATO airstrikes which provoked the taking hostage of several hundred UNPROFOR soldiers. The 'safe area' of Srebrenica was then captured by Bosnian Serb forces in July 1995, involving major human rights abuses against the population. After incidents involving other 'safe areas' and Sarajevo, NATO with UN approval launched a series of airstrikes.[272] At the same time, Bosnian and Croat forces captured areas held by the Bosnian Serbs. A ceasefire agreement came into force on 12 October 1995.[273]

UN peacekeeping missions in former Yugoslavia were reorganised in March 1995, following the capture by Croatian forces of three of the four protected areas inhabited by Serbs in Croatia. The UN missions therefore comprised UNPROFOR in Bosnia,[274] the UN Confidence Restoration Operation in Croatia (UNCRO)[275] and the UN Preventive Deployment [268] See resolutions 819 (1993) and 824 (1993). These were Srebrenica, Sarajevo, Tuzla, Zepa, Gorazde and Bihac.

[269] See also Security Council resolution 836 (1993).

[270] Security Council resolution 844 (1993). See also S/25939. Note that the Secretary-General called for the demilitarisation of the 'safe areas', S/1994/1389. At the request of the Secretary, UNPROFOR was also given the task of monitoring the ceasefire agreement between the Bosnian and Croatian armies: see Security Council resolution 908 (1994), and given additional responsibilities with regard to Sarajevo: see Security Council resolution 900 (1994).

[271] S/1995/444, paras. 48–9.

[272] See also Security Council resolution 998 (1995) regarding the proposal to establish a rapid reaction force.

[273] See S/1995/987.

[274] See also Security Council resolution 1026 (1995).

[275] See also Security Council resolutions 990 (1995) and 994 (1995).

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

Force (UNPREDEP) in the former Yugoslav Republic of Macedonia.[276] As a consequence of the Dayton peace agreement initialled in November 1995, UNPROFOR was replaced by a multinational implementation force (IFOR)[277] composed primarily of troops from NATO countries. In addition, it was proposed to set up a UN International Police Task Force to carry out a variety of police-related training and assistance missions.[278]

The evolution of the UN role in the complex Yugoslav tragedy may be characterised as a series of impromptu actions taken in response to traumatic events. UNPROFOR was never authorised to use force beyond that required in self-defence while performing their rapidly expanding duties. The UN sought to fulfil its fundamental mandated responsibilities with respect to Sarajevo and the transportation of humanitarian aid in co-operation with the warring parties based on the peacekeeping principles of impartiality and consent. But the situation was far from a normal peacekeeping situation of separating hostile forces that consent to such separation. The use of air power was subsequently authorised both in order to defend UNPROFOR personnel and to deter attacks upon the 'safe areas', which had been proclaimed as such with little in the way of initial enforcement means. Eventually air strikes by NATO were resorted to in the face of fears of further Bosnian Serb capture of 'safe areas'. Whether a peacekeeping mission in the traditional sense can ever really be mounted in the conditions then faced in Bosnia must be seriously in doubt, although the humanitarian efforts undertaken were important. Only a meaningful enforcement mandate could have given the UN a chance to put an end to the fighting. But that required a major political commitment and substantial resources. These states are rarely willing to provide unless their own vital national interests are at stake.

Somalia[279] The Somali situation marked a similar effort by the UN to resolve a humanitarian crisis arising out of civil war conditions and one that saw a peacekeeping mission drifting into an enforcement one. Following [276] Security Council resolutions 981 (1995), 982 (1995) and 983 (1995). The Security Council had authorised deployment of a preventive force in Macedonia in resolution 795 (1992). See also S/24923, annex.

[277] See Security Council resolution 1031 (1995).

[278] See e.g. S/1995/1031 and Security Council resolution 1026 (1995). The International Police Task Force was established under resolution 1035 (1995).

[279] See e.g. Franck, Fairness, pp. 301 ff., and I. Lewis and J. Mayall, 'Somalia' in The New Interventionism 1991–1994 (ed. J. Mayall), Cambridge, 1996, p. 94. See also J. M. Sorel, 'La Somalie et les Nations Unies', AFDI, 1992, p. 61.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

a prolonged period of civil war, the Security Council urged all parties to agree to a ceasefire and imposed an arms embargo. The Secretary-General was requested to organise humanitarian assistance.[280] A UN technical mission was then established to look at mechanisms to provide such aid and to examine peacekeeping options.[281] The UN Operation in Somalia (UNOSOM) was set up shortly thereafter,[282] but this modest operation (of fifty ceasefire observers and a security force) was deemed insufficient to ensure the delivery of humanitarian assistance, and the deployment of additional UN security units in order to protect the distribution centres and humanitarian convoys was authorised.[283] However, the situation continued to deteriorate and few humanitarian supplies arrived where needed due to constant attacks.[284] Accordingly, after the Secretary-General had concluded that Chapter VII action was required,[285] the Security Council determined that the 'magnitude of the human tragedy caused by the conflict in Somalia, further exacerbated by the obstacles being created to the distribution of humanitarian assistance, constitutes a threat to international peace and security'. The use of 'all necessary means to establish as soon as possible a secure environment for humanitarian relief operations' was authorised and the Unified Task Force was created (UNITAF).[286] This comprised troops from over twenty states, including some 30,000 from the US.[287]

This operation was expanded the following spring and UNOSOM II was established with an enlarged mandate with enforcement powers under Chapter VII.[288] UNOSOM II was given the humanitarian mandate of UNITAF, together with 'responsibility for the consolidation, expansion and maintenance of a secure environment throughout Somalia' and the provision of security to assist the repatriation of refugees and the assisted resettlement of displaced persons. The force was also to complete the disarmament of factions, enforce the Addis Ababa agreement of January 1993[289] and help rebuild the country. The authorisation to take all [280] Security Council resolution 733 (1992). See also S/23829, 1992.

[281] Security Council resolution 746 (1992).
[282] Security Council resolution 751 (1992). This was not originally a Chapter VII operation.
[283] Security Council resolution 775 (1992). See also S/244480, 1992. Under resolution 767 (1992) Somalia was divided into four operational zones for the delivery of food aid and ceasefire purposes.
[284] See S/24859, 1992. [285] S/24868, 1992. [286] Security Council resolution 794 (1992).
[287] The operation was termed 'Operation Restore Hope' and it arrived in Somalia in December 1992: see S/24976, 1992 and S/25168, 1993.
[288] Security Council resolution 814 (1993). See also S/25354, 1993.
[289] See S/25168, annex III.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

necessary measures was reiterated in resolution 837 (1993), following an attack upon UNOSOM II forces. This authorisation was stated to include taking action against those responsible for the attacks and to establish the effective authority of UNOSOM II throughout the country. A series of military incidents then took place involving UN forces.[290] Security Council resolution 897 (1994), while condemning continued violence in the country especially against UN personnel, authorised a reduction in UNOSOM II's force levels to 22,000.[291] And in resolution 954 (1994), the Council decided to terminate the mission at the end of March 1995 and authorised UNOSOM II to take actions necessary to protect the mission and the withdrawal of personnel and assets and to that end called upon member states to provide assistance to aid the withdrawal process. The Secretary-General concluded his report of 14 October 1994 noting that the vacuum of civil authority and of governmental authority severely hampered the work of the UN, while 'the presence of UNOSOM II troops has had limited impact on the peace process and limited impact on security in the face of continuing interclan fighting and banditry'.[292]

Rwanda[293] Following a civil war between government forces and RPF rebels, the Security Council authorised the deployment of the UN Observer Mission Uganda Rwanda (UNOMUR) on the Ugandan side of the border.[294] A peace agreement was signed between the parties at Arusha and the UN set up the UN Assistance Mission for Rwanda (UNAMIR) with a mandate to ensure the security of the capital, Kigali, monitor the ceasefire agreement and monitor the security situation generally up to the installation of the new government.[295] However, the projected transitional institutions were not set up and the security situation deteriorated. Following the deaths of the Presidents of Rwanda and Burundi in an airplane crash on 5 April 1994, full-scale civil war erupted which led to massacres of Hutu opposition leaders and genocidal actions against members of the Tutsi minority. Faced with this situation, the Security Council rejected the option of strengthening UNAMIR and empowering it [290] See e.g. S/26022, 1993, and Security Council resolutions 865 (1993), 878 (1993), 885 (1993) and 886 (1993).

[291] See also Security Council resolutions 923 (1994) and 946 (1994).

[292] S/1994/1166, Part 2, para. 22.

[293] See e.g. Franck, Fairness, pp. 300 ff.

[294] See Security Council resolution 846 (1993). See also resolutions 812 (1993) and 891 (1993). This mission was terminated in resolution 928 (1994).

[295] Security Council resolution 872 (1993). See also resolutions 893 (1994) and 909 (1994).

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

under Chapter VII in favour of withdrawing most of the mission from the country.[296]

As the situation continued to deteriorate, the Council imposed an arms embargo on the country, authorised the increase of UNAMIR to 5,500 and its redeployment in Rwanda and expanded its mandate to include the establishment and maintenance of secure humanitarian areas.[297] However, delays in implementing this led to a proposal from France to establish a French-commanded force to act under Chapter VII of the Charter and subject to Security Council authorisation in order to protect displaced persons and civilians at risk. This was accepted in resolution 929 (1994) in which the Council, acting under Chapter VII, authorised a two-month operation (Operation Turquoise) until UNAMIR was up to strength. Member states were authorised to use all necessary measures to achieve their humanitarian objectives. The force, therefore acting as the 1990–1 Gulf War Coalition had on the basis of Security Council authorisation under Chapter VII, established a humanitarian protected zone in south-western Rwanda. Gradually UNAMIR built up to strength and it began deploying troops in the protected zone on 10 August 1994, taking over responsibility from the French-led force shortly thereafter and deploying in areas throughout the country. UNAMIR's mandate ended on 6 March 1996.[298]

Sierra Leone After prolonged fighting, a military junta took power and the Security Council imposed an oil and arms embargo which was terminated upon the return of the democratically elected President.[299] This was followed by the establishment of the UN Observer Mission in Sierra Leone with the function of monitoring the disarmament process and restructuring the security forces.[300] This mandate was increased following further violence.[301] In October 1998, the Security Council, noting the signing of the Lomé Agreement the previous July, set up the UN Mission in Sierra Leone (UNAMSIL) with an initial 6,000 military personnel to replace the previous mission with an enhanced mandate, including establishing a presence at key locations in the country, monitoring the ceasefire and facilitating humanitarian assistance. Specifically acting under

[296] Security Council resolution 912 (1994).
[297] Security Council resolution 918 (1994). See also resolutions 925 (1994) and 935 (1994).
[298] See Security Council resolution 1029 (1995).
[299] See resolutions 1132 (1997) and 1156 (1998).
[300] See resolution 1181 (1998).
[301] See resolutions 1220 (1999), 1231 (1999), 1245 (1999) and 1260 (1999).

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

Chapter VII, paragraph 14 of resolution 1270 (1999), the Council decided that 'in the discharge of its mandate UNAMSIL may take the necessary action to ensure the security and freedom of movement of its personnel and . . . to afford protection to civilians under imminent threat of physical violence'. The force was increased and the mandate revised in resolution 1289 (2000) to include in paragraph 10, specifically citing Chapter VII, the provision of security at key locations and at other sites and to assist the Sierra Leone law enforcement authorities in the discharge of their responsibilities. UNAMSIL was further authorised to 'take the necessary action' to fulfil the additional tasks.[302]

The Democratic Republic of the Congo The Security Council has also concerned itself with the civil war and foreign interventions in the Democratic Republic of the Congo (the former Zaire). Following fighting involving both internal and external forces, the Lusaka Ceasefire Agreement was signed in July 1999.[303] This was welcomed by the Security Council and the deployment of a small UN military liaison force was authorised.[304] This force was designated the UN Organisation Mission in the Democratic Republic of the Congo (MONUC).[305] The Mission was expanded and extended with a mandate inter alia to include monitoring the ceasefire and to supervise and verify the disengagement arrangements.[306] Paragraph 8 of the resolution, specifically citing Chapter VII, states that the Council has decided that MONUC 'may take the necessary action . . . to protect United Nations and co-located JMC [Joint Military Commission] personnel, facilities, installations and equipment, ensure the security and freedom of movement of its personnel, and protect civilians under imminent threat of physical violence'. During the summer of 2000, fighting broke out between Ugandan and Rwandan forces in the Congo and the Security Council in resolution 1304 (2000), acting under Chapter VII, demanded that Uganda and Rwanda withdraw all their forces from the Congo and that all other foreign military presence and activity, direct and indirect, be brought to an end. MONUC was asked to monitor the cessation of hostilities and [302] The mission was further extended and expanded: see e.g. resolutions 1299 (2000), 1346 (2001), 1400 (2002) and 1436 (2002). It ended in 2005 to be succeeded by the UN Integrated Office in Sierra Leone: see resolutions 1562 (2004) and 1610 (2005). See also, as to the role of ECOWAS, below, p. 1278, note 365.

[303] See S/1999/815 and resolution 1234 (1999). See also P. Okawa, 'Congo's War: The Legal Dimensions of a Protracted Conflict', 77 BYIL, 2006, p. 203, and above, chapter 20, p. 1154.

[304] Resolution 1258 (1999). [305] Resolution 1279 (1999). [306] Resolution 1291 (2000).

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

the disengagement of forces and withdrawal of foreign forces.[307] This demand was repeated in resolutions 1341 (2001) and 1355 (2001), again acting under Chapter VII.[308] In resolution 1797 (2008), MONUC was authorised to assist the authorities in organising, preparing and conducting local elections, while in resolution 1804 (2008), the Security Council demanded that armed groups and militias in the eastern part of the country immediately lay down their arms and turn themselves in to Congolese and MONUC authorities for disarmament, demobilisation, repatriation, resettlement and reintegration. In virtually all of these resolutions, the situation was characterised as a 'threat to international peace and security in the region'.[309]

Sudan Following a long-running civil war in the south of the country, an agreement was signed on 20 July 2002 (the Machakos Protocol) between the parties and this led to subsequent agreements in 2004. In June that year, the UN established a special political mission (UNAMIS) to assist the parties. Faced with a deteriorating situation in Darfur in the western Sudan, the Security Council, acting under Chapter VII of the Charter, adopted resolution 1556 (2004), calling for political talks between the parties, endorsing the dispatch of international monitors, including a protection force envisioned by the African Union, and assigning certain responsibilities to UNAMIS.[310] On 9 January 2005, a full peace agreement (the Comprehensive Peace Agreement) was signed, ending the civil war in the south of Sudan. In resolution 1590 (2005), the Council, acting under Chapter VII, established the UN Mission in Sudan (UNMIS) to support implementation of the Comprehensive Peace Agreement and to take over from UNAMIS, and authorised it to 'take the necessary action' to protect UN and humanitarian personnel. A peaceful solution to the Darfur crisis was also called for in this resolution.[311] African Union efforts to seek a solution to the crisis in Darfur culminated in the signing of the Darfur [307] The mandate of MONUC was further extended in a series of resolutions: 1316 (2000); 1332 (2000); 1493 (2003); 1565 (2004); 1592 (2005); 1635 (2005); 1711 (2006); and 1794 (2007).

[308] See also resolutions 1376 (2001), 1399 (2002), 1417 (2002), 1457 (2003) and 1468 (2003).

[309] See as to the imposition of sanctions, above, p. 1247.

[310] See also resolution 1564 (2004) authorising a human rights presence and resolution 1574 (2004).

[311] Note that on 1 February 2005, a UN Commission of Inquiry into Darfur called for in resolution 1564 (2004) reported that while genocide had not been committed by the Sudan government, its forces and allied Janjaweed militias had carried out 'indiscriminate attacks, including killing of civilians, torture, enforced disappearances, destruction of

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

Peace Agreement on 5 May 2006. Following a recommendation from the UN Secretary-General,[312] the Security Council adopted resolution 1706 (2006) under Chapter VII, determining that the situation in Darfur constituted a threat to international peace and security and deciding that the UNMIS forces be increased and deployed in Darfur in order to support implementation of the Darfur Peace Agreement, without prejudice to their existing mandate in the south of Sudan. UNMIS was authorised to use all necessary measures to protect UN personnel, to support implementation of the peace agreement, to protect civilians under threat of physical violence and to collect arms.[313]

Following discussions with the African Union in view of the deteriorating situation in Darfur,[314] and in the light of the presence of forces from the African Mission in the Sudan (AMIS),[315] the Security Council, noting that the situation continued to constitute a threat to international peace and security, adopted resolution 1769 (2007) establishing the UN–African Union Hybrid Operation in Darfur (UNAMID) incorporating AMIS personnel to consist of a force of up to 19,555 military personnel. Unity of command and control was provided for, with command and control structures and backstopping provided by the United Nations. The Council, acting under Chapter VII, decided that UNAMID was authorised to take the necessary action to protect its personnel, facilities, installations and equipment, and to ensure the security and freedom of movement of its own personnel and humanitarian workers, to support early and effective implementation of the Darfur Peace Agreement, to prevent the disruption of its implementation and armed attacks, and to protect civilians, without prejudice to the responsibility of the government of Sudan.

The range of UN actions from humanitarian assistance to enforcement – conclusions

The UN has not been able to operate Chapter VII as originally envisaged. It has, however, been able to develop a variety of mechanisms to fill the villages, rape and other forms of sexual violence, pillaging and forced displacement', S/2005/60.

312 S/2006/591.

313 The mandate of UNMIS was extended in resolutions 1709 (2006), 1714 (2006) and 1755 (2007).

314 See S/2007/307/Rev.1. As to the imposition of sanctions, see above, p. 1247, and as to the reference of the Darfur situation to the International Criminal Court, see above, chapter 8, p. 412.

315 See below, p. 1280.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

gap left by the non-implementation of article 43. First and foremost, the Council may delegate its enforcement powers to member states. This occurred in Korea, the Gulf War and to some extent in Rwanda. However, the events concerning Iraq have shown uncertainty as to the extent to which, if at all, such authorisation may be implied from resolutions adopted. The UN has also been able to create peacekeeping forces, whose mandate has traditionally been to separate hostile forces with their consent, such as in the Middle East and in Cyprus. The evolution of peacekeeping activities to include confused civil war situations where fighting has not ended and no lasting ceasefire has been put into operation, although prefigured in the Congo crisis of the 1960s, has really taken place in the last few years. It has brought attendant dangers for, as has been seen, the slippage from peacekeeping to self-defence activities more widely defined and thence to de facto enforcement action is sometimes hard to avoid and complicated to justify in legal terms. Consent is the basis of traditional peacekeeping and irrelevant in enforcement activities. In the mandate drift that has been evident in some situations, elements of both consent and imposition have been present in a way that has confused the role of the UN. Nevertheless, behind the difficulties of the UN have lain a dearth of both political will demonstrated by, and material resources provided by, member states for the completion of complex enforcement actions.

Developments that have been seen in recent years have demonstrated an acceptance of a far broader conception of what constitutes a threat to international peace and security, so that not only external aggression but certain purely internal convulsions may qualify, thus constraining further the scope of article 2(7) and the exclusive jurisdiction of states. Secondly, the range of actions taken by the Security Council under Chapter VII has increased to cover a wide variety of missions and the creation of international criminal tribunals to prosecute alleged war criminals for crimes occurring within particular states arising out of civil wars. Not only that, but with regard to Iraq, the Security Council took a range of binding measures of unprecedented scope, from the guaranteeing of a contested boundary to implementing strict controls on certain kinds of armaments and establishing a compensation commission to be funded by a levy on oil exports. Finally, increasing flexibility has been manifested in the creation and use of such forces. The establishment of the hybrid UN–African Union force for Darfur is an interesting development and one that may prefigure a number of similar operations as regions may increasingly wish to marry regional personnel with expertise, equipment and logistical support from outside the region.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

The Security Council, international law and the International Court of Justice

The issue of the relationship between binding decisions of the Council and international law generally has arisen with particular force in recent years in view of the rapidly increased range and nature of activity by the Security Council. The issue has involved particular consideration of the role of the International Court.[316] The Security Council is, of course, constrained by the provisions of the Charter itself. It must follow the procedures laid down and act within the confines of its constitutional authority as detailed particularly in Chapters V to VII. Its composition and voting procedures are laid down, as are the conditions under which it may adopt binding enforcement measures. As the International Court has emphasised, '[t]he political character of an organ cannot release it from the observance of the treaty provisions established by the Charter when they constitute limitations on its powers or criteria for its judgment'.[317] In particular, the Council must under article 24(2) act in accordance with the Purposes and Principles of the Charter, article 1(1) of which declares that one of the aims of the organisation is to bring about a resolution

[316] See, for example, G. R. Watson, 'Constitutionalism, Judicial Review, and the World Court', 34 Harvard International Law Journal, 1993, p. 1; Gowlland-Debbas, 'Security Council Enforcement', p. 55, and Gowlland-Debbas, 'The Relationship between the International Court of Justice and the Security Council in the Light of the Lockerbie Case', 88 AJIL, 1994, p. 643; R. St J. Macdonald, 'Changing Relations between the International Court of Justice and the Security Council of the United Nations', Canadian YIL, 1993, p. 3; R. F. Kennedy, 'Libya v. United States: The International Court of Justice and the Power of Judicial Review', 33 Va. JIL, 1993, p. 899; T. M. Franck, 'The "Powers of Appreciation": Who is the Ultimate Guardian of UN Legality?', 86 AJIL, 1992, p. 519, and Franck, Fairness, pp. 242 ff.; W. M. Reisman, 'The Constitutional Crisis in the United Nations', 87 AJIL, 1993, p. 83; E. McWhinney, 'The International Court as Emerging Constitutional Court and the Co-ordinate UN Institutions (Especially the Security Council): Implications of the Aerial Incident at Lockerbie', Canadian YIL, 1992, p. 261; J. M. Sorel, 'Les Ordonnances de la Cour Internationale de Justice du 14 Avril 1992 dans l'Affaire Relative a des Questions d'Interpretation et d'Application de la Convention de Montreal de 1971 Resultant de l'Incident Aérien de Lockerbie', Revue Générale de Droit International Public, 1993, p. 689; M. N. Shaw, 'The Security Council and the International Court of Justice: Judicial Drift and Judicial Function' in The International Court of Justice (eds. A. S. Muller, D. Raič and J. M. Thuránszky), The Hague, 1997, p. 219; J. Alvarez, 'Judging the Security Council', 90 AJIL, 1996, p. 1, and D. Akande, 'The International Court of Justice and the Security Council: Is There Room for Judicial Control of Decisions of the Political Organs of the United Nations?', 46 ICLQ, 1997, p. 309.

[317] Conditions of Admission of a State to Membership in the United Nations, ICJ Reports, 1948, p. 64; 15 AD, p. 333. See also Judge Bedjaoui, the Lockerbie case, ICJ Reports, 1992, pp. 3, 45; 94 ILR, pp. 478, 528.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

of international disputes by peaceful means 'and in conformity with the principles of justice and international law'.[318]

The Council has recently not only made determinations as to the existence of a threat to or breach of international peace and security under article 39 in traditional inter-state conflict situations, but also under Chapter VII binding determinations as to the location of boundaries, supervision of destruction of weaponry, liability under international law for loss or damage, methods of compensation, asserted repudiation of foreign debt,[319] the establishment of tribunals to try individual war criminals,[320] and assertions as to the use of force against those responsible for, and those inciting, attacks against UN personnel, including their arrest, prosecution and punishment.[321] In addition, the Council has asserted that particular acts were null and void, demanding non-recognition.[322]

In view of this increased activity and the impact this has upon member states, the issue has arisen as to whether there is a body capable of ensuring that the Council does act in conformity with the Charter and international law. Since the International Court is the 'principal judicial organ' of the UN,[323] it would seem to be the natural candidate, and indeed the problem has been posed in two recent cases. In the Genocide (Bosnia and Herzegovina v. Yugoslavia (Serbia and Montenegro)) case,[324] it was claimed by Bosnia that the Security Council-imposed arms embargo upon the former Yugoslavia had to be construed in a manner that did not deprive Bosnia of its inherent right of self-defence under article 51 of the Charter and under customary international law.[325] In the Lockerbie case,[326] Libya claimed that the UK and US were seeking to compel it to surrender alleged [318] See Judge Weeramantry's Dissenting Opinion in the Lockerbie case, ICJ Reports, 1992, p. 65 and that of Judge Bedjaoui, ibid., p. 46; 94 ILR, pp. 548 and 529. See also Judge Fitzmaurice in the Namibia case, ICJ Reports, 1971, pp. 17, 294; 49 ILR, pp. 2, 284–5.

[319] See Security Council resolution 687 (1991) with regard to Iraq after the Gulf War.

[320] Security Council resolutions 808 (1993) and 827 (1993) regarding former Yugoslavia and resolution 955 (1994) regarding Rwanda. See also the Tadić case decided by the Appeals Chamber of the International Criminal Tribunal for the Former Yugoslavia, Case No. IT-94-1-AR72, pp. 13 ff.; 105 ILR, pp. 419, 428 ff.

[321] Security Council resolution 837 (1993) concerning Somalia.

[322] Security Council resolutions 662 (1990) regarding the purported annexation by Iraq of Kuwait and 541 (1983) terming the purported Turkish Cypriot state 'legally invalid'.

[323] Article 92 of the Charter. [324] ICJ Reports, 1992, pp. 3, 6; 95 ILR, pp. 1, 21.

[325] See also the second provisional measures order, ICJ Reports, 1993, pp. 325, 327–8; 95 ILR, pp. 43, 45–6. The Court confined itself to the Genocide Convention.

[326] ICJ Reports, 1992, pp. 3, 14; 94 ILR, pp. 478, 497.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

bombers contrary to the Montreal Convention, 1971 (which required that a state either prosecute or extradite alleged offenders) and that the Council's actions in resolutions 731 (1992) and 748 (1992)[327] were contrary to international law.

While the question of the compatibility of Security Council resolutions with international law was not discussed by the Court in the Bosnia case, the issue assumed central position in the Lockerbie case. The Court here affirmed that all member states were obliged to accept and carry out the decisions of the Security Council in accordance with article 25 of the Charter and that prima facie this obligation extended to resolution 748 (1992), which imposed sanctions upon Libya for failing to extradite the suspects. Thus, in accordance with article 103 of the Charter, under which obligations under the Charter prevail over obligations contained in other international agreements, the resolution prevailed over the Montreal Convention.[328] Judge Shahabuddeen in his Separate Opinion underlined that the issue in the case was whether a decision of the Council could override the legal rights of states and, if so, whether there were any limitations upon its power to characterise a situation as one justifying the making of the decision importing such consequences.[329]

The issue was raised in the request for provisional measures phase of the Congo v. Uganda case. Uganda argued that the request by the Congo for interim measures would 'directly conflict with the Lusaka Agreement, and with the Security Council resolutions – including resolution 1304 . . . calling for implementation of the Agreement'.[330] The Court noted that resolution 1304 was adopted under Chapter VII, but concluded after quoting the text of the resolution that the Security Council had taken no decision which would prima facie preclude the rights claimed by the Congo from being regarded as appropriate for protection by the indication of provisional measures.[331] While there is no doubt that under the Charter system the Council's discretion to determine the existence of threats to or breaches of international peace and security is virtually absolute, limited only by inherent notions of good faith and non-abuse [327] Calling upon Libya to surrender the suspects and imposing sanctions for failing so to do.

[328] ICJ Reports, 1992, p. 15; 94 ILR, p. 498.

[329] ICJ Reports, 1992, p. 32; 94 ILR, p. 515. Judge Lachs noted that the Court was bound 'to respect' the binding decisions of the Security Council as part of international law, ICJ Reports, 1992, p. 26; 94 ILR, p. 509. See Franck, Fairness, p. 243, who emphasised that the verb used, to 'respect', does not mean to 'defer to'. Note that Judge Lachs also pointed to the Court as the 'guardian of legality for the international community as a whole, both within and without the United Nations', ibid.

[330] ICJ Reports, Order of 1 July 2000, para. 30.

[331] Ibid., para. 36.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

of rights,[332] and its discretion to impose measures consequent upon that determination in order to maintain or restore international peace and security is undoubtedly extensive,[333] the determination of the legality or illegality of particular situations is essentially the Council's view as to the matching of particular facts with existing rules of international law. That view, when adopted under Chapter VII, will bind member states, but where it is clearly wrong in law and remains unrectified by the Council subsequently, a challenge to the system is indubitably posed. While the Court can, and has, examined and analysed UN resolutions in the course of deciding a case or rendering an Advisory Opinion, for it to assert a right of judicial review in the fullest sense enabling it to declare invalid a binding Security Council resolution would equally challenge the system as it operates. Between the striking down of Chapter VII decisions and the acceptance of resolutions clearly embodying propositions contrary to international law, an ambiguous and indeterminate area lies.

The role of the General Assembly[334]

The focus of attention during the 1950s shifted from the Security Council to the General Assembly as the use of the veto by the permanent members led to a perception of the reduced effectiveness of the Council. Since it was never really envisaged that the General Assembly would play a large part in the preservation of international peace and security, its powers as defined in the Charter were vague and imprecise. Articles 10 to 14 provide that the Assembly may discuss any question within the scope of the Charter and may consider the general principles of co-operation in the maintenance of international peace and security. The Assembly may make recommendations with respect to questions relating to international peace to members of the United Nations or the Security Council or both, provided (except in the case of general principles of co-operation, including disarmament) the Council is not dealing with the particular matter. In addition, any [332] See e.g. Gowlland-Debbas, 'Security Council Enforcement', pp. 93–4. See also the Tadić case decided by the Appeals Chamber of the International Criminal Tribunal for the Former Yugoslavia, Case No. IT-94-1-AR72, pp. 13 ff.; 105 ILR, pp. 419, 428 ff.

[333] Note that under article 1(1) actions to bring about the adjustment or settlement of international disputes or situations which might lead to a breach of the peace must be in conformity with 'the principles of justice and international law', while there is no such qualification with regard to effective collective measures to prevent and remove threats to the peace and the suppression of breaches of the peace or acts of aggression.

[334] See e.g. Simma, Charter, pp. 247 ff., and White, Keeping the Peace, part II.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

question respecting international peace and security on which action is necessary has to be referred to the Security Council.

The Uniting for Peace resolution was adopted by the Assembly in 1950 and was founded on the view that as the Security Council had the primary responsibility for the maintenance of peace under article 24, it could therefore be argued that the Assembly possessed a secondary responsibility in such matters, which could be activated in the event of obstruction in the Security Council. The resolution[335] declared that where the Council failed to exercise its responsibility upon the occurrence of a threat to the peace, breach of the peace or act of aggression because of the exercise of the veto by any of its permanent members, the General Assembly was to consider the matter at once with a view to making appropriate recommendations to members for collective measures. Such measures could include the use of force when necessary in the case of a breach of the peace or act of aggression, and, if not already in session, the Assembly would be able to meet within twenty-four hours in emergency special session.[336]

However problems soon arose in the context of the creation by the Assembly in 1956 of the United Nations Emergency Force which was to supervise the ceasefire in the Middle East, and by the United Nations Secretary-General in 1960 of the United Nations Force in the Congo. It was argued that since article 11 provides that any question dealing with international peace and security on which action was necessary had to be referred to the Security Council, the constitutionality of such forces was questionable. A number of states refused to pay their share of the expenses incurred, and the matter was referred to the International Court. In the Certain Expenses case,[337] the Court took the term 'action'[338] to refer to 'enforcement action', thus permitting action which did not amount to enforcement action to be called for by the General Assembly and the Secretary-General.[339] This opinion, although leading to some interpretive problems, did permit the creation of United [335] General Assembly resolution 377(V). See e.g. J. Andrassy, 'Uniting for Peace', 50 AJIL, 1956, p. 563. See also M. J. Petersen, 'The Uses of the Uniting for Peace Resolution since 1950', 8 International Organisation, 1959, p. 219, and F. Woolsey, 'The Uniting for Peace Resolution of the United Nations', 45 AJIL, 1951, p. 129.

[336] The General Assembly under article 20 of the UN Charter meets only in regular annual sessions and in such special sessions as occasion may require.

[337] ICJ Reports, 1962, p. 151; 34 ILR, p. 281.

[338] Article 11(2) of the Charter provides that the General Assembly may discuss any questions relating to the maintenance of international peace and security, but any such question 'on which action is necessary' must be referred to the Security Council.

[339] Accordingly, the UN Emergency Force in the Middle East established in 1956 was not contrary to article 11(2) since it had not been intended to take enforcement action, ICJ

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

Nations peacekeeping forces in situations where because of superpower rivalry it was not possible for the Security Council to reach a decision, provided such forces were not concerned with enforcement action. The adoption of this kind of action remains firmly within the prerogative of the Security Council.

In practice the hopes raised by the adoption of the Uniting for Peace resolution have not really been fulfilled. The procedure prescribed within the resolution has been used, for example, with regard to the Suez and Hungarian crises of 1956, the Lebanese and Jordanian troubles of 1958, the Congo upheavals of 1960, the Middle East in 1967, the conflict leading to the creation of Bangladesh in 1971, Afghanistan in 1980, Namibia in 1981 and the Palestine question in 1980 and 1982. But it cannot be said that the Uniting for Peace system has in effect exercised any great influence regarding the maintenance of international peace and security. It has provided a method whereby disputes may be aired before the Assembly in a way that might not have otherwise been possible, but as a reserve mechanism for the preservation or restoration of international peace, it has not proved very successful.

The UN and regional arrangements and agencies[340]

The Security Council has increasingly made use of regional organisations in the context of peacekeeping and peace enforcement. Chapter VIII of the UN Charter concerns regional arrangements. Article 52 provides that nothing contained in the Charter precludes the existence of regional arrangements or agencies for dealing with such matters relating to international peace and security as are appropriate for such arrangements or agencies, providing that these are consistent with the Purposes and Principles of the UN itself.[341] Article 53 notes that the Security Council where appropriate shall utilise such arrangements or agencies for enforcement action under its authority. Without the authorisation of the Security Reports, 1962, pp. 151, 165, 171–2. This precipitated a crisis over the arrears of the states refusing to pay their contributions.

[340] See e.g. Simma, Charter, pp. 807 ff., and Cot, et al., Charte, pp. 1367 ff. See also Gray, Use of Force, chapter 9; A. Abass, Regional Organisations and the Development of Collective Security: Beyond Chapter VIII of the UN Charter, Oxford, 2004; Sarooshi, Collective Security, chapter 6, and O. Schachter, 'Authorised Uses of Force by the United Nations and Regional Organisations' in The New International Order and the Use of Force (eds. L. Damrosch and D. J. Scheffer), Boulder, 1991, p. 65.

[341] Note also the relevance of the right of collective self-defence under both customary international law and article 51 of the Charter: see above, chapter 20, p. 1146.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

Council, regional enforcement action is not possible.[342] Article 54 provides that the Security Council is to be kept fully informed at all times of activities undertaken or in contemplation by regional organisations. The definition of 'regional arrangements or agencies' is left open, so that a useful measure of flexibility is provided, enabling the term to cover a wide range of regional organisations going beyond those strictly established for defence co-operation.[343]

Several issues arise. First, there is the issue of when regional action may be deemed to be appropriate, and here recent events have demonstrated a broader measure of flexibility akin to the widening definition of what constitutes a threat to international peace and security. Secondly, there is the extent to which regional action is consistent with UN purposes and principles, and here the provisions of article 103, assigning priority to Charter obligations over obligations contained in other international agreements, should be noted. Thirdly, there is the question as to whether a broad or a narrow definition of enforcement action is to be accepted.[344] Fourthly, the important issue is raised as to whether prior approval by the Security Council is required in order for a regional organisation to engage in an activity consistent with Chapter VIII. Practice here recently appears to suggest rather controversially that not only is prior approval not required, but that Security Council authorisation need not occur until substantially after the action has commenced.[345] However, it is clear that the UN is keen to co-ordinate activity with regional organisations.[346]

[342] See e.g. M. Akehurst, 'Enforcement Action by Regional Agencies', 42 BYIL, 1967, p. 175; Les Forces Régionales du Maintien de la Paix (ed. A. Pellet), Paris, 1982; C. Borgen, 'The Theory and Practice of Regional Organization Intervention in Civil Wars', 26 New York University Journal of International Law and Politics, 1994, p. 797, and I. Pogany, 'The Arab League and Regional Peacekeeping', 34 NILR, 1987, p. 54.

[343] A number of organisations specifically self-identify as regional agencies as understood by Chapter VIII, such as the Organisation of American States (see article 1 of the Charter of the OAS, 1948), the Organisation for Security and Co-operation in Europe (see para. 25 of the Helsinki Summit Declaration, 1992 and the Charter for European Security, 2000, 39 ILM, 2000, p. 255 and General Assembly resolution 47/10) and the Commonwealth of Independent States (see 35 ILM, 1996, p. 783). See as to the OSCE role in Bosnia under the Dayton peace arrangements, above, chapter 18, p. 1034.

[344] That is, whether all actions noted in articles 41 and 42 are covered or just those using military force.

[345] Note that the report of the High-Level Panel on Threats, Challenges and Change, A/59/565, 2 December 2004, stated that, 'Authorization from the Security Council should in all cases be sought for regional peace operations, recognizing that in some urgent situations that authorization may be sought after such operations have commenced', ibid. at para. 272(a).

[346] See, for example, the Secretary-General, An Agenda for Peace, A/47/277, 17 June 1992, p. 37 and Secretary-General, In Larger Freedom, A/59/2005, 21 March 2005, para.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

Article 52(2) and (3) establishes that peaceful settlement of disputes through regional mechanisms before resort is had to the Security Council is the preferred route and this, on the whole, has been the practice of the UN.[347] Enforcement action is a different matter and here priority lies with the Council under the Charter. However, the reference to the inherent right of collective self-defence in article 51 does detract somewhat from the effect of Chapter VIII, and it also seems clear that regional peacekeeping operations, in the traditional sense of being based on consent of the parties and eschewing the use of force save in self-defence, do not need the authorisation of the Security Council.

Practice in the post-Cold War era has amply demonstrated the increasing awareness by the Security Council of the potentialities of regional organisations. References in resolutions of the Council have varied in this regard. Some have specifically mentioned, commended or supported the work of named regional organisations without mentioning Chapter VIII,[348] others have referred explicitly to Chapter VIII,[349] while others have stated that the Council is acting under Chapter VIII.[350]

A particularly interesting example of the interaction of regional organisations and the UN occurred with regard to Haiti. The OAS adopted sanctions against Haiti upon the overthrow of the elected President Jean-Bertrand Aristide in 1991.[351] Although the General Assembly welcomed 213, proposing that the UN should sign memoranda of understanding with regional organisations having a conflict prevention or peacekeeping capacity, linking such organisations with the UN Standby Arrangements System. See also the World Summit Outcome 2005, General Assembly resolution 60/1, and Security Council resolution 1631 (2005) and the subsequent report of the Secretary-General, A/61/204–S/2006/590, 28 July 2006, paras. 94 ff. See also S/25184 (1993).

347 Although article 52(4) provides that 'this article in no way impairs the application of articles 34 and 35'. See e.g. Simma, Charter., p. 848.

348 See e.g. Security Council resolutions 743 (1992) commending the work of the European Community and the CSCE in former Yugoslavia and 855 (1993) endorsing the activities of the CSCE in former Yugoslavia; and resolution 865 (1993) noting the efforts of the Arab League, the OAU and the Organisation of the Islamic Conference with regard to Somalia.

349 E.g. Security Council resolutions 727 (1992) in regard to former Yugoslavia; 795 (1992) in regard to Macedonia; 757 (1992) in regard to former Yugoslavia; 816 (1993) extending the 'no-fly' zone over Bosnia; 820 (1993) in regard to former Yugoslavia; and resolution 751 (1992) with regard to Somalia, 'cognisant of the importance of co-operation between the United Nations and regional organisations in the context of Chapter VIII of the Charter of the United Nations'.

350 See e.g. Security Council resolution 787 (1992) with regard to the maritime blockade of former Yugoslavia; resolution 794 (1992) with regard to Somalia.

351 OAS resolutions MRE/RES.1/91, MRE/RES.2/91 and MRE/RES.3/92. See article 19 of the OAS Charter. See also S/23109, 1991.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

the actions,[352] the Security Council did not react. Eventually in June 1993, the Council, acting under Chapter VII, imposed an arms and oil embargo on Haiti. Resolution 841 (1993) specifically referred to a series of OAS resolutions,[353] commended the work of the OAS Secretary-General and stressed the need 'for effective co-operation between regional organisations and the United Nations'.[354] In resolution 875 (1993), the Council, acting under Chapters VII and VIII, called upon member states 'acting nationally or through regional agencies or arrangements' in co-operation with the legitimate Government of Haiti to act to ensure the implementation of the arms and oil embargo.[355]

Liberia constitutes another instructive example.[356] A complicated civil war broke out during 1989–90 and, in the absence of any moves by the UN or the OAS, the Economic Community of West African States (ECOWAS) decided to act. This organisation, which consists of sixteen members including Liberia, is aimed at improving living standards in the region.[357] A Protocol on Non-Aggression was signed in 1978 and came into force three years later.[358] This prohibits aggression among member states and does not specifically mention peacekeeping nor provide for the right of unilateral intervention. In May 1990, ECOWAS established a Standing Mediation Committee and this called for an immediate ceasefire in Liberia and for its implementation to be monitored by an ECOWAS monitoring group (ECOMOG). This group, led by Nigeria, landed in Liberia in August 1990 and became involved in actual [352] See General Assembly resolution 46/7, 1991.

[353] Including in addition to those already mentioned, resolutions MRE/RES.4/92, MRE/RES.5/93 and CP/RES.594 (923/92), and declarations CP/Dec. 8 (927/93), CP/Dec. 9 (931/93) and CP/Dec. 10 (934/93).

[354] See also Security Council resolutions 917 (1994) and 933 (1994).

[355] Note also the problematic US argument concerning its invasion of Grenada, claiming that the 1981 treaty establishing the Organisation of Eastern Caribbean States operated as the necessary 'existing' or 'special' treaty which would excuse intervention and a violation of territorial integrity under article 22 of the OAS Charter. However, the OECS Defence Committee could only act unanimously and in cases of external aggression and the landing of troops in order to overthrow the Marxist government on the island would not appear to satisfy the requirements: see e.g. J. N. Moore, Law and the Grenada Mission, Charlottesville, 1984, pp. 45–50, and W. C. Gilmore, The Grenada Intervention, London, 1984. See also American Bar Association Section of International Law and Practice, Report on Grenada, 1984.

[356] See e.g. G. Nolte, 'Restoring Peace by Regional Action: International Legal Aspects of the Liberian Conflict', 53 ZaöRV, 1993, p. 603.

[357] See article 2 of the ECOWAS Treaty, 1975. See also F. Olonisakin, Reinventing Peacekeeping in Africa: Conceptual and Legal Issues in ECOMOG Operations, The Hague, 2000.

[358] See also the Protocol Relating to Mutual Assistance on Defence, 1981.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

fighting. It is somewhat unclear whether ECOWAS provides a sufficient legal basis of itself to justify the actions taken, and UN involvement did not occur until January 1991, when the President of the Security Council issued a statement commending the efforts of ECOWAS to promote peace in Liberia and calling upon the parties to the conflict to co-operate fully with ECOWAS.[359] In April 1992, ECOMOG proceeded to secure a buffer zone on the Liberia–Sierra Leone border envisaged by an October 1991 accord (the Yamoussoukro IV Accord) between the Liberian parties, to secure all entry and exit points in the country and to enforce the disarmament of combatants.[360]

The situation, however, continued to deteriorate and the Security Council adopted resolution 788 (1992) in November of that year. This determined that the deterioration of the situation constituted a threat to international peace and security 'particularly in West Africa as a whole' and recalled Chapter VIII of the Charter. The resolution commended ECOWAS for its 'efforts to restore peace, security and stability in Liberia' and, acting under Chapter VII, imposed an arms embargo upon that country. This support was reaffirmed in resolution 813 (1993), which also noted the endorsement of ECOWAS' efforts by the OAU.[361] With the assistance of the special representative of the UN Secretary-General, a new peace agreement was signed at Cotonou on 25 July 1993, which called upon ECOWAS and the UN to assist in its implementation.[362] The UN Observer Mission in Liberia was established to assist in this process.[363] Security Council resolution 866 (1993) in particular noted that 'this would be the first peacekeeping mission undertaken by the United Nations in co-operation with a peacekeeping mission already set up by another organisation, in this case ECOWAS'. Subsequent resolutions continued to commend ECOWAS for its actions and the UNOMIL mission was extended. Eventually elections were held.[364] When ECOWAS sought [359] S/22110/Add.3, 1991.

[360] S/23863, 1992. This was also supported by a statement from the President of the Security Council, S/23886, 1992. See also S/24815, 1993.

[361] See also S/25402, 1993.

[362] The peace agreement provided that ECOMOG would have the primary responsibility of supervising the military provisions of the agreement, with the UN monitoring and verifying the process, S/26200, 1993, and Security Council resolution 866 (1993) preamble.

[363] See Security Council resolutions 856 (1993) and 866 (1993). See also S/26200 and S/26422 and Add. 1, 1993.

[364] See e.g. Security Council resolutions 911 (1994); 950 (1994), which also commended African states sending troops to ECOMOG; 1014 (1995), which also encouraged African to intervene in Liberia in 2003, the Security Council adopted resolution 1497 (2003) under Chapter VII, authorising the establishment of a multinational force based upon ECOWAS to implement a June 2003 ceasefire. The role of ECOWAS within the context of Chapter VIII was specifically commended. Authority was transferred from the ECOWAS force to a new UN Mission in Liberia in October 2003 by resolution 1509.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

The Liberian situation is therefore marked by the following features: first, intervention in a civil war in an attempt to secure a ceasefire by a regional organisation whose authority in this area was far from clear constitutionally; secondly, delayed support by the Security Council in the context of Chapter VIII until 1992; thirdly, the first establishment of a dual UN–regional organisation peacekeeping operation; fourthly, the acceptance by the UN of the responsibility of the regional organisation for military issues with the UN mission possessing a rather indeterminate monitoring and peace-encouraging role. It should also be noted that apart from the imposition of the arms embargo in resolution 788 (1992), Security Council resolutions refrained from referring to Chapter VII. The UN, therefore, adopted very much a secondary role. While it is clear that the Security Council ultimately supported the action taken by ECOWAS, it is questionable whether the spirit and terms of Chapter VIII were fully complied with.[365] Ultimately, the Security Council fully adopted the actions of ECOWAS, authorised further such actions and then subsumed the ECOWAS operation into a UN peacekeeping mission.

The failed UN experience of the early 1990s in Somalia was succeeded by a long period of neglect in practice, during which the UN maintained the arms embargo on that country and expressed support for regional action to seek to resolve the complicated civil war. In a number of states to send troops to join ECOMOG; and resolutions 1020 (1995), 1071 (1996), 1100 (1997) and 1116 (1997) concerning elections. Note also the Security Council Presidential Statement of July 1997 after the elections inter alia commending ECOMOG, S/PRST/1997/41. See further as to ECOWAS, above, chapter 18, p. 1029.

[365] Note also ECOWAS involvement in Guinea Bissau under an agreement between the government and the opposing junta: see 38 ILM, 1999, p. 28. Security Council resolution 1233 (1999) welcomed the ECOMOG role. ECOMOG also played a part in the Sierra Leone crisis: see e.g. Security Council resolution 1162 (1998) commending ECOWAS and ECOMOG for playing an important role in restoring international peace and security, and resolutions 1270 (1999) and 1289 (2000).

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

Security Council resolutions, for example, the Council, acting under Chapter VII, called for continuation of the arms embargo and also commended the efforts of the African Union (AU) and the Intergovernmental Authority on Development in Eastern Africa (IGAD), the relevant subregional organisation, in support of the Transitional Federal Institutions, the claimant Somali government.[366] In resolution 1725 (2006), the Council, acting under Chapter VII, and following decisions taken by IGAD and the AU, authorised IGAD and the member states of the AU to establish 'a protection and training mission' in Somalia with the mandate inter alia to monitor progress in talks between the Transitional Federal Institutions and the rival Union of Islamic Courts and to maintain security in Baidoa (the headquarters of the Transitional Federal Institutions). In January 2007, the AU decided to deploy for six months a mission to Somalia (AMISOM) aimed at stabilising the situation and which would evolve into a UN operation for long-term stabilisation and post-conflict restoration of Somalia.[367]

As already noted, the UN in the situation in Bosnia turned to NATO[368] in particular in order to enforce the arms embargo against all the states of the former Yugoslavia and to implement sanctions against the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia (Serbia and Montenegro). NATO airplanes in particular enforced the 'no-fly' zone over Bosnia (Operation Deny Flight) as from April 1993 and on 28 February 1994, four warplanes were shot down by NATO aircraft for violating the zone. NATO airplanes also provided close air support for UNPROFOR activities as from June 1993, and as from April 1994, air support to protect UN personnel in the 'safe areas' was instituted. NATO airstrikes took place at UN request during 1994–5 in a variety of situations.[369] Following the Dayton Peace Agreement initialled in November 1995, a 60,000 troop NATO-led implementation force (IFOR) commenced operations in Bosnia. This was authorised by the Security Council, acting under Chapter VII, in resolution 1031 (1995), under which authority was transferred from UNPROFOR to IFOR. Within a short time, this organisation gave way to SFOR (stabilisation force), which was NATO-led but included non-NATO countries.[370] SFOR was

[366] See resolutions 1630 (2005), 1676 (2006) and 1724 (2006).
[367] This was authorised in Security Council resolution 1744 (2007).
[368] With the assistance of the WEU in the maritime activities in the Adriatic under Operation Sharp Guard: see above, p. 1258.
[369] See e.g. S/1995/444, 1995.
[370] See Security Council resolution 1088 (1996). See also www.nato.int/sfor/index.htm.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

replaced by an EU force, EUFOR, in December 2004.[371] In Kosovo, an international security presence parallels the international civil presence[372] and this force, KFOR, like SFOR in Bosnia, is NATO-led.[373] Kosovo declared independence in February 2008.[374] In December 2001, the Security Council authorised the establishment of an International Security Assistance Force in Afghanistan (ISAF) pursuant to the Bonn Agreement.[375] In March 2003, the NATO peacekeeping mission in the Former Yugoslav Republic of Macedonia, which had commenced in August 2001, was handed over to the European Union, this being the first such mission for the EU.[376]

The most dramatic and far-reaching co-operation with a regional organisation in the context of peacekeeping and enforcement is the UN–African Union Hybrid Operation in Darfur. The African Mission in Sudan (AMIS) was created in July 2004, as part of a ceasefire monitoring arrangement together with the European Union. In August that year, AU troops were sent to protect the monitors and the force grew from there. Due to the deteriorating situation, including difficulties with the government of Sudan and resource problems, the AU force eventually merged with the UN force to form the hybrid mission (UNAMID) in 2007.[377]

[371] As authorised by Security Council resolution 1575 (2004). Note the creation of an Interim Emergency Multinational Force in Bunia (the Democratic Republic of the Congo) in Security Council resolution 1484 on 30 May 2003. By a decision of 5 June 2003, the Council of the European Union authorised the sending of a peacekeeping force pursuant to the Security Council resolution. See also EUFOR operations in the Democratic Republic of the Congo during 2006: see Council Joint Action 2006/319/CFSP (repealed by Council Joint Action 2007/147/CFSP) and Council Decision 2006/412/CFSP as authorised in Security Council resolution 1671 (2006); and in Chad and the Central African Republic since 2007: see Council Joint Action 2007/677/CFSP and Council Decision 2008/101/CFSP as authorised by the Security Council in resolution 1778 (2007).

[372] See Security Council resolution 1244 (1999). See also above, chapter 5, p. 1232.

[373] See e.g. www.nato.int/kfor/welcome.html.

[374] See further above, chapter 9, p. 452.

[375] See resolution 1386 (2001). Its mandate has been regularly extended under different leaders: see e.g. resolutions 1413 (2002), 1444 (2003), 1510 (2003) which extended its role throughout the country, 1563 (2004), 1623 (2005), 1707 (2006) and 1776 (2007). ISAF has been supported and led by NATO since 11 August 2003: see www.nato-otan.org/isaf/topics/history/index.html.

[376] See www.nato-otan.org/issues/nato_fyrom/evolution.html.

[377] See www.africa-union.org/DARFUR/homedar.htm; www.unmis.org/english/au.htm and www.accord.org.za/ct/2005-4/ct4_2005_pgs52_53.pdf. See further as to UNAMID, above, p. 1266.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

Suggestions for further reading

Bowett's Law of International Institutions (eds. P. Sands and P. Klein), 5th edn, London, 2001

The Charter of the United Nations (ed. B. Simma), 2nd edn, Oxford, 2002

S. Chesterman, T. M. Franck and D. M. Malone, Law and Practice of the United Nations, Oxford, 2008

J. P. Cot, A. Pellet and M. Forteau, La Charte des Nations Unies: Commentaire Article par Article, 3rd edn, Paris, 2005

J. G. Merrills, International Dispute Settlement, 4th edn, Cambridge, 2005, chapter 10

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

23

International institutions[1]

Introduction

The evolution of the modern nation-state and the consequent development of an international order founded upon a growing number of independent and sovereign territorial units inevitably gave rise to questions of international co-operation.[2] The first major instance of organised international co-operation occurred with the Peace of Westphalia in 1648, which ended the thirty-year religious conflict of Central Europe and formally established the modern secular nation-state arrangement of European politics.[3] Over a century later the Napoleonic wars terminated with the Congress of Vienna in 1815, marking the first systematic attempt to regulate international affairs by means of regular international

[1] Often called 'international organisations'. The terms will be used interchangeably.

[2] See C. F. Amerasinghe, Principles of the Institutional Law of International Organizations, 2nd edn, Cambridge, 2005; J. E. Alvarez, International Organizations as Law-Makers, Oxford, 2005; D. Sarooshi, International Organizations and their Exercise of Sovereign Powers, Oxford, 2005; H. G. Schermers and N. M. Blokker, International Institutional Law, 3rd edn, The Hague, 1995; J. Klabbers, An Introduction to International Institutional Law, Cambridge, 2002; Bowett's Law of International Institutions (eds. P. Sands and P. Klein) 5th edn, London, 2001; N. White, The Law of International Organizations, Manchester, 1996; P. Reuter, International Institutions, London, 1958; Encyclopedia of Public International Law (ed. R. Bernhardt), Amsterdam, 1983, vols. V and VI; G. Schwarzenberger, International Law, London, 1976, vol. III; E. Lauterpacht, 'The Development of the Law of International Organizations by the Decisions of International Tribunals', 152 HR, p. 377; F. Kirgis, International Organizations in their Legal Settings, 2nd edn, St Paul, 1993; A. El Erian, 'The Legal Organization of International Society' in Manual of Public International Law (ed. M. Sørensen), London, 1968, p. 55; M. Whiteman, Digest of International Law, Washington, 1968, vol. XIII; A Handbook of International Organizations (ed. R. J. Dupuy), Dordrecht, 1988; I. Seidl-Hohenveldern, Corporations In and Under International Law, Cambridge, 1987; F. Morgenstern, Legal Problems of International Organizations, Cambridge, 1986, and Nguyen Quoc Dinh, P. Daillier and A. Pellet, Droit International Public, 7th edn, Paris, 2002, p. 571. See also G. Schiavone, International Organizations: A Dictionary and Directory, London, 1992, and Union of International Associations, Yearbook of International Organizations, 39th edn, Brussels, 5 vols., 2002–3.

[3] See e.g. L. Gross, 'The Peace of Westphalia, 1648–1948', 42 AJIL, 1948, p. 20.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

conferences.[4] The Congress system lasted, in various guises, for practically a century and institutionalised not only the balance of power approach to politics, but also a semi-formal international order.[5]

Until the outbreak of the First World War, world affairs were to a large extent influenced by the periodic conferences that were held in Europe. The Paris conference of 1856 and the Berlin gathering of 1871 dealt with the problems of the Balkans, while the 1884–5 Berlin conferences imposed some order upon the scramble for Africa that had begun to develop. These, and other such conferences, constituted an important prelude to the establishment of international institutions, but became themselves ever more inadequate to fulfil the job they had been intended to do. A conference could only be called into being upon the initiative of one or more of the states involved, usually following some international crisis, and this ad hoc procedure imposed severe delays upon the resolution of the issue. It meant that only states specifically invited could attend and these states made decisions upon the basis of unanimous agreement, a factor which severely restricted the utility of the system.[6]

The nineteenth century also witnessed a considerable growth in international non-governmental associations, such as the International Committee of the Red Cross (founded in 1863) and the International Law Association (founded in 1873). These private international unions[7] demonstrated a wide-ranging community of interest on specific topics, and an awareness that co-operation had to be international to be effective. Such unions created the machinery for regular meetings and many established permanent secretariats. The work done by these organisations was, and remains, of considerable value in influencing governmental activities and stimulating world action.[8]

In addition, there developed during the course of the nineteenth century a series of public international unions. These were functional associations linking together governmental departments or administrations for specific purposes, and were set up by multilateral treaties. The first instances of such inter-governmental associations were provided by the international commissions established for the more efficient functioning of such vital arteries of communication as the Rhine and Danube rivers, [4] See e.g. El Erian, 'Legal Organization', p. 58. See also A. Zamoyski, Rites of Peace, London, 2007.

[5] See e.g. Reuter, Institutions, pp. 55–6. See also Bowett's International Institutions, chapter 1.

[6] Bowett's International Institutions, p. 3. [7] Ibid., pp. 4–65.

[8] See as to the role of the International Committee of the Red Cross in international humanitarian law, above, chapter 21, p. 1200.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

and later for other rivers of Central and Western Europe.[9] The powers given to the particular commissions varied from case to case, but most of them performed important administrative and legislative functions. In 1865 the International Telegraphic Union was set up with a permanent bureau or secretariat and nine years later the Universal Postal Union was created. This combined a permanent bureau with periodic conferences, with decisions being taken by majority vote. This marked a step forward, since one of the weaknesses of the political order of ad hoc conferences had been the necessity for unanimity.

The latter half of the nineteenth century was especially marked by the proliferation of such public international unions, covering transportation, communications, health and economic co-operation. These unions restricted themselves to dealing with specific areas and were not comprehensive, but they introduced new ideas which paved the way for the universal organisations of the twentieth century. Such concepts as permanent secretariats, periodic conferences, majority voting, weighted voting and proportionate financial contributions were important in easing administrative co-operation, and they laid the basis for contemporary international institutions.

International organisations (or institutions) have now become indispensable. In a globalised world they facilitate co-operation across state frontiers, allowing for the identification, discussion and resolution of difficulties in a wide range of subjects, from peacekeeping and peace-enforcement to environmental, economic and human rights concerns. This dimension of the international legal system permits the relatively rapid creation of new rules, new patterns of conduct and new compliance mechanisms. Indeed, if there is one paramount characteristic of modern international law, it is the development and reach of international institutions, whether universal or global, regional or subregional.

A brief survey of international institutions

Institutions of a universal character

The innovation of the twentieth century was, of course, the creation of the global, comprehensive organisations of the League of Nations in 1919 and the United Nations in 1945. These were, in many ways, the logical culmination of the pioneering work of the private and public international unions, [9] See Bowett's International Institutions, pp. 6–9.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

the large numbers of which required some form of central co-ordination. This function both the League[10] and the UN attempted to provide.[11] Associated with the UN are the specialised agencies. These are organisations established by inter-governmental agreement and having wide international responsibilities in economic, social, cultural and other fields that have been brought into relationship with the United Nations.[12] Most of the specialised agencies have devised means whereby the decisions of the particular organisation can be rendered virtually binding upon members. This is especially so with regard to the International Labour Organisation (established in 1919 to protect and extend the rights of workers), UNESCO (the UN Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organisation established to further the increase and diffusion of knowledge by various activities, including technical assistance and co-operative ventures with national governments) and the World Health Organisation (established in 1946 with the aim of unifying the standards of health care).[13] Although such institutions are not able to legislate in the usual sense, they are able to apply pressures quite effectively to discourage non-compliance with recommendations or conventions.[14]

The International Bank for Reconstruction and Development (IBRD – the World Bank) emerged from the Bretton Woods Conference of 1944 to encourage financial investment, and it works in close liaison with the International Monetary Fund (IMF), which aims to assist monetary co-operation and increase world trade. A state can only become a member

[10] See e.g. Bowett's International Institutions, chapter 2; G. Scott, Rise and Fall of the League of Nations, London, 1973; El Erian, 'Legal Organization', pp. 60 ff., and F. P. Walters, A History of the League of Nations, Oxford, 2 vols., 1952.

[11] See above, chapter 22.

[12] Article 57 of the Charter. See also articles 62–6 and e.g. J. Harrod, 'Problems of the United Nations Specialised Agencies at the Quarter Century', 28 YBWA, 1974, p. 187, and Klein, in Bernhardt, Encyclopedia of Public International Law, vol. V, pp. 349–69. See also El Erian, 'Legal Organization', pp. 55, 96–106.

[13] See also the Food and Agriculture Organisation, created in 1943 to collect and distribute information related to agricultural and nutritional matters: see e.g. R. W. Phillips, FAO, Its Origins, Formation and Evolution 1945–1981, Rome, 1981. See also www.fao.org/.

[14] The following specialised agencies should also be noted in passing: the International Civil Aviation Organisation; the Universal Postal Union; the International Telecommunication Union; the World Meteorological Organisation; the International Maritime Organisation; the World Intellectual Property Organisation; the International Fund for Agricultural Development; the UN Industrial Development Organisation and the International Fund for Agricultural Development. The International Atomic Energy Agency exists as an autonomous organisation within the UN. See e.g. L. Henkin, R. C. Pugh, O. Schachter and H. Smit, International Law: Cases and Materials, 3rd edn, St Paul, 1993, chapter 18.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

of the World Bank if it is an IMF member. The plenary organ of these agencies is the Board of Governors and the executive organs are the Executive Directors. These agencies, based in Washington DC, are assisted by the International Development Association (IDA) and the International Finance Corporation (IFC), which are affiliated to the World Bank and encourage financial investment and the obtaining of loans on easy terms. These financial organisations differ from the rest of the specialised agencies in that authority lies with the Board of Governors, and voting is determined on a weighted basis according to the level of subscriptions made. Very important decisions require the consent of 70 to 85 per cent of the votes. The IBRD, IDA and IFC together with the Multilateral Investment Guarantee Agency constitute the 'World Bank Group'.[15]

A number of international economic arrangements and institutions (not being specialised agencies) of increasing importance have been established The GATT[16] arose out of an international conference held at Havana in 1947–8 at which it was decided to establish an International Trade Organisation. The organisation did not in fact come into being. However, a General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade (GATT) had been agreed shortly before the conference, involving a series of tariff concessions and trade rules, and this originally temporary instrument continued. The arrangement operated on the basis of a bilateral approach to trade negotiations coupled with unconditional acceptance of the most-favoured-nation principle (by which the most favourable benefits obtained by one state are passed on to other states), although there were special conditions for developing states in this respect. A series of tariff and trade negotiating rounds were held under the auspices of the GATT, which thus [15] See e.g. Bowett's International Institutions, pp. 87 ff. See also W. M. Scammell, 'The International Monetary Fund' in The Evolution of International Organizations (ed. E. Luard), London, 1966, chapter 9; A. Shonfield, 'The World Bank', in ibid., chapter 10; R. Townley, 'The Economic Organs of the United Nations', in ibid., chapter 11, and C. W. Alexandrowicz, The Law-Making Functions of the Specialised Agencies of the United Nations, Sydney, 1973, chapter 9. See also www.worldbank.org/.

[16] See e.g. A. F. Lowenfeld, International Economic Law, 2nd edn, Oxford, 2008; J. H. Jackson, Sovereignty, the WTO, and Changing Fundamentals of International Law, Cambridge, 2006; K. W. Dam, The GATT, Law and International Economic Relations, Chicago, 1970; J. H. Jackson, The World Trading System, 2nd edn, Cambridge, MA, 1997; T. Flory, 'Les Accords du Tokyo Round du GATT et la Réforme des Procédures de Règlement des Différends dans la Système Commercial Interétatique', 86 RGDIP, 1982, p. 235; A. H. Qureshi, International Economic Law, London, 1999, and I. Seidl-Hohenveldern, International Economic Law, 2nd edn, Dordrecht, 1992, p. 90.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

offered a package approach to trade negotiations, and a wide variety of tariff reductions was achieved, as well as agreement reached on mitigating non-tariff barriers. The eighth such round, termed the Uruguay round, commenced in 1986 and concluded with the signing at Marrakesh on 15 April 1994 of a long and complex agreement covering a range of economic issues. It also provided for the establishment of the World Trade Organisation on 1 January 1995 as a permanent institution with its own secretariat. The organisation consists of a Ministerial Conference, with representatives of all members meeting at least once every two years; a General Council composed of representatives of all members meeting as appropriate and exercising the functions of the Conference between sessions;[17] Councils for Trade in Goods, Trade in Services and Trade Related Aspects of Intellectual Property Rights operating under the general guidance of the General Council; a Secretariat and a Director-General.[18] The organisation's main aims are to administer and implement the multilateral and plurilateral trade agreements together making up the WTO, to act as a forum for multilateral trade negotiations, to try and settle trade disputes and to oversee national trade policies. The GATT of 1947 continued until the end of 1995, when it was effectively subsumed, with changes, as GATT 1994 within the WTO system.[19]

Regional institutions

The proliferation of regional institutions, linking together geographically and ideologically related states, since the close of the Second World War, has been impressive. A number of factors can help explain this. The onset of the Cold War and the failure of the Security Council's enforcement procedures stimulated the growth of regional defence alliances (such as NATO and the Warsaw Pact) and bloc politics. The decolonisation process resulted in the independence of scores of states, most of which were eager to play a non-aligned role between East and West, and the rise of globalisation has meant that all states form part of one economic trading system and can no longer individually function effectively, thus precipating the evolution of regional economic arrangements.

[17] The General Council will also meet to discharge the responsibilities of the Dispute Settlement Body and the Trade Policy Review Body: see article IV(3) and (4) of the 1994 Agreement.

[18] See article IV of the Agreement.

[19] See further as to the WTO dispute settlement system, above, chapter 18, p. 1036.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

Europe

It is in Europe that regionalism became most developed institutionally. The establishment of the European Economic Community (thereafter European Union), in particular, was intended to lay the basis for a resurgent Europe with meaningful economic and political integration.[20] It has developed to become a major regional organisation with significant supranational components. Consisting originally of three interlocking communities (the European Coal and Steel Community 1951, the European Atomic Energy Community 1957 and the European Economic Community 1957), the European Union aims at establishing a single unified market with common external tariffs and the elimination of internal tariffs and quotas, and it promotes the free movement of capital and labour. The Single European Act, 1986 and the Treaty on European Union, 1992 both introduced significant changes. The Treaty of Lisbon, signed in 2007 and currently awaiting ratification, is intended to streamline the governance of the Union. The membership of the Union has progressively increased and currently stands at twenty-seven. The institutions of the Union comprise primarily the European Parliament, the Council of Ministers, the Commission and the Court of Justice.[21]

The Council of Europe was created in 1949 with wide-ranging co-operative aims.[22] There are currently forty-seven member states. The Council comprises the Committee of Ministers, consisting of governmental representatives, and the Parliamentary Assembly, composed of members representing the Parliaments of the member states. The most important part of the work of the Council of Europe is the preparation and conclusion of conventions and protocols.[23] There are a very large [20] D. Chalmers and A. Tomkins, European Union Public Law, Cambridge, 2007; P. Craig and G. De Burca, EU Law: Text, Cases and Materials, 4th edn, Oxford, 2007; T. C. Hartley, The Foundations of European Community Law, 6th edn, Oxford, 2007; J. Steiner, L. Woods and C. Twigg-Flesner, EU Law, 9th edn, Oxford, 2006; Lasok's Law and Institutions of the European Communities (eds. D. Lasok and K. P. E. Lasok), 7th edn, London, 2001, and D. Wyatt and A. Dashwood, European Community Law, 4th edn, London, 2000.

[21] Note also the Organisation for Economic Co-operation and Development established in 1960 and developed out of the European machinery created to administer the American Marshall Plan, which was aimed at reviving the European economies: see e.g. C. Archer, Organising Europe, London, 1994, chapter 3; Bowett's International Institutions, pp. 167 ff., and Miller, 'The OECD', YBWA, 1963, p. 80.

[22] See e.g. Archer, Organising Europe, chapter 4; A. H. Robertson, The Council of Europe, 2nd edn, London, 1961, and T. Ouchterlony, The Council of Europe in the New Europe, Edinburgh, 1991. See also above, chapter 7, p. 345, and www.coe.int.

[23] See articles 15 and 16 of the Statute of the Council of Europe.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

number of these, including pre-eminently the European Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms (1950), but including also the European Social Charter (1961) and agreements dealing with cultural and educational questions and conventions covering patents, extradition, migration, state immunity, terrorism and others.

The Organisation for Security and Co-operation in Europe (OSCE)[24] was originally created in 1975 following the Helsinki Conference of European powers (plus the USA and Canada). The Helsinki Final Act was not a binding treaty but a political document, concerned with three areas or 'baskets', being security questions in Europe; co-operation in the fields of economics, science and technology; and co-operation in humanitarian fields. The Conference itself (at the time termed the CSCE) was a diplomatic conference with regular follow-up meetings to review the implementation of the Helsinki Final Act, but after the changes in Eastern Europe in the late 1980s the organisation began to develop. The Charter of Paris for a New Europe signed in 1990 provided for the first standing institutions. The OSCE is essentially a conflict prevention organisation, with an Office for Democratic Institutions and Human Rights, responsible for the promotion of human rights and democracy in the OSCE area. It also monitors elections. Overall responsibility for executive action is exercised by the Chairman-in-Office, who is assisted by the Troika (i.e. the present, preceding and succeeding Chairmen). The High Commissioner on National Minorities was appointed in 1992[25] and there exist a variety of Missions to assist in dispute settlement. The OSCE was also assigned a role in the Bosnia peace arrangements.[26] There are currently fifty-six participating states in the organisation.

The North Atlantic Treaty Organization (NATO)[27] was created in 1949 to counter possible threats from the USSR. It associated the USA and Canada with fourteen European powers for the protection, in essence, [24] See e.g. The CSCE (ed. A. Bloed), Dordrecht, 1993; J. Maresca, To Helsinki – The CSCE 1973–75, Durham, 1987; Essays on Human Rights in the Helsinki Process (eds. A. Bloed and P. Van Dijk), Dordrecht, 1985; A. Bloed and P. Van Dijk, The Human Dimension of the Helsinki Process, Dordrecht, 1991, and D. McGoldrick, 'The Development of the Conference on Security and Co-operation in Europe – From Process to Institution' in Legal Visions of the New Europe (eds. B. S. Jackson and D. McGoldrick), London, 1993, p. 135. See also www.osce.org/ and above, chapters 7, p. 372, and 18, p. 1032.

[25] See further above, chapter 7, p. 376.

[26] See further above, chapter 18, p. 1034.

[27] See e.g. The NATO Handbook, Brussels, 2002 and at www.nato.int/docu/ handbook/2001/index.htm; Archer, Organising Europe, chapter 9; Bowett's International Institutions, pp. 180 ff.; K. Myers, NATO, The Next Thirty Years, Boulder, 1980, and L. S. Kaplan and R. W. Clawson, NATO After Thirty Years, Wilmington, 1981.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

of Western Europe (although Greece and Turkey are also involved). By the Treaty,[28] the parties agreed to consult where the territorial integrity, political independence or security of any of them has been threatened,[29] and accepted that an armed attack against one or more of them in Europe or North America should be considered an attack against all.[30]

The alliance (now comprising twenty-six states) consists of a Council, which is the supreme organ and on which all members are represented,[31] and a NATO parliamentary conference (the North Atlantic Assembly), which acts as an official consultative body. The ending of the Cold War brought about a variety of changes in the organisation. The Euro-Atlantic Partnership Council (EAPC) was established in 1997 (it currently has fifty members, among them NATO states and former members of the Warsaw Pact, including successor states of the USSR).[32] In 1994, the Partnership for Peace programme was inaugurated and this brings together EAPC and other OSCE states into a co-operative framework, which has the potential to provide the mechanism for enlarging the membership of NATO itself. There are currently thirty-four such partners. While the Partnership for Peace focuses upon practical, defence-related and military co-operation, the EAPC constitutes the forum for broad consultation on political and security issues. Countries participating in the Partnership for Peace sign a Framework Document, affirming the commitment to the preservation of democratic societies and the maintenance of the principles of international law, to fulfil in good faith the obligations of the UN Charter and the principles contained in the Universal Declaration of Human Rights and to respect existing borders.[33]

[28] 43 AJIL, 1949, Supp., p. 159.

[29] Article 4. Support to Turkey was requested and provided in early 2003 under article 4: see www.nato.int/docu/pr/2003/p030216e.htm.

[30] Article 5. This was invoked for the first time on 12 September 2001, when the Allies declared that the terrorist attack on the US was deemed to constitute an attack on all members of the alliance: see www.nato.int/docu/pr/2003/p030216e.htm.

[31] Article 9.

[32] This replaced the North Atlantic Co-operation Council established in 1991.

[33] See as to NATO's involvement in peacekeeping and peace-enforcement, above, chapter 22, p. 1279. Note also the Western European Union, described by the Treaty on European Union, 1992 as an integral part of the EU and as its defence component to strengthen the European pillar of the Atlantic alliance. It had a role in the Yugoslav crisis, both in enforcing the Security Council sanctions in co-operation with NATO and in forming part of the joint European Union/WEU administration of the city of Mostar in Bosnia in July 1994. It also conducted a police training mission in Albania in 1997 and demining operations in Croatia from 1997: see e.g. Archer, Organising Europe, chapter 10, and T. Taylor, European Defence Co-operation, London, 1984. See also www.weu.int/.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

The Commonwealth of Independent States was established by an Agreement signed by Russia, Belarus and Ukraine in Minsk on 8 December 1991, to which eight other former Republics of the USSR adhered at Alma Ata on 21 December that year. Georgia joined in 1993, so that the organisation now comprises all the former Soviet Republics apart from the three Baltic States. The organisation is based on respect for the territorial integrity of member states and member states agreed to maintain and retain under joint command, a common military and strategic space, including joint control over nuclear weapons. It was also agreed to establish common co-ordinating institutions.[34] The CIS adopted a Charter in Minsk in January 1993.[35] Under this Charter, the Commonwealth is expressed to be based on the sovereign equality of its members, who are independent subjects of international law. It is expressly stated that the CIS is not a state nor does it possess supranational powers.[36] The supreme organ is the Council of Heads of State, while the Council of Heads of Government has a co-ordinating role.[37] Decisions of both Councils are to be achieved by common consent.[38] In 1993, the leaders of the CIS states, apart from Ukraine and Turkmenistan, signed a treaty to create an Economic Union, while in 1995, seven of the twelve member states signed an agreement for the Defence of the CIS External Borders. A large number of agreements have been signed between member states on a variety of subjects, including prevention of drug smuggling and terrorism, but many of these agreements have not been ratified.[39]

The American continent[40]

The Organisation of American States emerged after the Second World War and built upon the work already done by the Pan-American Union and the various inter-American Conferences since 1890. It consists of two basic treaties: the 1947 Inter-American Treaty of Reciprocal Assistance [34] See articles 5, 6 and 7 of the Minsk Agreement, 31 ILM, 1992, pp. 143 ff.

[35] See 4 Finnish YIL, 1993, p. 263. [36] See article 1. [37] See articles 21 and 22.
[38] Article 23. There are a number of other councils linking various ministers, see articles 27, 28, 30 and 31, together with an Economic Court and a Commission on Human Rights, see articles 32 and 33.
[39] See www.cis.minsk.by/main.aspx?uid=74.
[40] See e.g. Bowett's International Institutions, chapter 7; A. V. W. Thomas and A. J. Thomas, The Organization of American States, Dallas, 1963; M. Ball, The OAS in Transition, Durham, 1969, and M. Wood, 'The Organization of American States', 33 YBWA, 1979, p. 148. See also www.oas.org/.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

(the Rio Treaty), which is a collective self-defence system, and the 1948 Pact of Bogotá, which is the original Charter of the OAS and which was amended in 1967 by the Buenos Aires Protocol, in 1985 by the Cartagena de Indias Protocol and by the 1992 Washington Protocol and the 1993 Managua Protocol. There are currently thirty-five member states. The OAS is a collective security system, an attack on one being deemed an attack on all. The organisation consists of a General Assembly, the supreme organ, which is a plenary organ with wide terms of reference; meetings of consultation of Ministers of Foreign Affairs, which exercise broad powers; a Permanent Council which performs both secretarial supervision and political functions, subject to the authority of the aforementioned institutions, and a number of subsidiary organs. The organisation has adopted a Human Rights Convention[41] and is the most developed of the regional organisations outside Europe, but without any of the supranational powers possessed by the European Union.[42]

The Arab League[43]

The Arab League was created in 1944 and has broad aims. The Council of the League is the supreme organ and performs a useful conciliatory role and various subsidiary organs dealing with economic, cultural and social issues have been set up. Its headquarters are in Tunisia, having been moved there from Egypt after the Israel–Egypt Peace Treaty of 1979. There is also a permanent secretariat and a Secretary-General. The Council of the League has been involved in the peacekeeping operations in Kuwait in 1961, where an Inter-Arab Force was established to deter Iraqi threats, and in Lebanon in 1976 as an umbrella for the operations of the Syrian

[41] See above, chapter 7, p. 381.

[42] There exist also a number of other American organisations of limited competence: see e.g. Bowett's International Institutions, chapter 7. These include, for example, the Inter-American Bank (1959); the Andean Pact (1969); the Caribbean Community and Common Market or CARICOM (1973); the Latin American Integration Association (1980); the Southern Cone Common Market or MERCOSUR (1991) and the Association of Caribbean States (1994).

[43] See e.g. Bowett's International Institutions, p. 237, and R. W. MacDonald, The League of Arab States, Princeton, 1965. See also B. Boutros-Ghali, 'La Ligue des États Arabes', 137 HR, 1972, p. 1, and H. A. Hassouna, The League of Arab States, Dobbs Ferry, 1975. Note also the existence of the Organisation of Petroleum Exporting Countries, founded in 1960, which obtained the power to fix crude oil prices in 1973: see e.g. I. Seymour, OPEC, Instrument of Change, London, 1980, and I. Skeet, OPEC: Twenty-five Years of Prices and Politics, Cambridge, 1988. See also www.Arabji.com/ArabGovt/ArabLeague.htm.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

troops.[44] It played no meaningful part in the Gulf wars and crises from 1980 to 2003.[45]

Africa[46]

The Organisation of African Unity was established in 1963 in Ethiopia and was replaced by the African Union in 2001. The Constitutive Act of the Union lists a series of objectives in article 3 and these include the achieving of greater unity between African countries; defending the sovereignty, territorial integrity and independence of its member states; the promotion of peace, security and stability on the continent and of human and peoples' rights in accordance with the African Charter on Human and Peoples' Rights and other relevant human rights instruments; and the promotion of sustainable development. Article 4 of the Constitutive Act sets out the Principles of the Union and these include respect of borders existing on achievement of independence; establishment of a common defence policy for the African continent; peaceful resolution of conflicts among member states and the prohibition of the use of force or threat to use force among member states of the Union. Interestingly, in addition to the emphasis on territorial integrity, the Principles also provide for the right of the Union to intervene in a member state pursuant to a decision of the Assembly in respect of grave circumstances, namely war crimes, genocide and crimes against humanity, and the right of member states to request intervention from the Union in order to restore peace and security.[47] Also included are respect for democratic principles, human rights, the rule of law and good governance, and condemnation and rejection of unconstitutional changes of governments. The organs of the Union include an Assembly, the supreme organ of the Union, composed of heads of state or government or their representatives, which sets the common policy of the Union;

[44] See e.g. Bowett's International Institutions, p. 238, and G. Feuer, 'Le Force Arabe de Securité au Liban', 22 AFDI, 1976, p. 51. See also above, chapter 18, p. 1031.

[45] Note also the existence of the Gulf Co-operation Council: see Bowett's International Institutions, p. 240.

[46] Ibid., p. 243; Z. Cervenka, The Organization of African Unity and Its Charter, London, 1969, and The Unfinished Quest for Unity, London, 1977; B. Andemicael, The OAU and the UN, London, 1976; M. Wolfers, Politics in the Organization of African Unity, London, 1976; C. A. A. Packer and D. Rukare, 'The New African Union and Its Constitutive Act', 96 AJIL, 2002, p. 365, and K. D. Magliveras and G. J. Naldi, 'The African Union – A New Dawn for Africa?', 51 ICLQ, 2002, p. 415. See also above, chapter 18, p. 1026, and www.africa-union.org/.

[47] See e.g. B. Kioko, 'The Right of Intervention under the African Union's Constitutive Act: From Non-Interference to Non-Intervention', 85 International Review of the Red Cross, 2003, p. 807.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

an Executive Council, composed of foreign or other ministers, which co-ordinates and takes decisions on policies in areas of common interest to the member states, such as foreign trade, water resources and energy; the Pan-African Parliament and the Court of Justice, the jurisdiction of which comprises the application and interpretation of the Act and which is currently being merged with the African Court of Human Rights.[48]

Asia

The Association of South East Asian Nations (ASEAN) was created in 1967.[49] It possesses economic, political and cultural aims and groups together Brunei, Cambodia, Indonesia, Laos, Malaysia, Myanmar, the Philippines, Singapore, Thailand and Vietnam. In 1976 three agreements were signed: a Treaty of Amity and Co-operation, which reaffirmed the parties' commitment to peace and dealt with the peaceful settlement of disputes; the Declaration of ASEAN Concord, which called for increased political and economic co-ordination and co-operation; and the Agreement of Establishment of the Permanent Secretariat to co-ordinate the national secretariats established under the 1967 ASEAN Declaration. In 1987, the Protocol amending the Treaty of Amity was signed, under which countries outside the ASEAN region could accede to the treaty. A number of economic agreements have also been signed, ranging from the Manila Declaration of 1987 to the Framework Agreement on Enhancing ASEAN Economic Co-operation, 1992 and the decision to establish an ASEAN Free Trade Area within fifteen years utilising a Common Effective Preferential Tariff scheme. In 2003, ASEAN Concord II was signed, establishing the ASEAN Security Community, Economic Community and Socio-Cultural Community,[50] and on 20 November 2007 the ASEAN Charter was adopted.

The supreme policy-making body of ASEAN is the Summit, comprising the Heads of State or Government, with a Co-ordinating Council composed of Foreign Ministers.[51] A variety of community councils and sectorial ministerial bodies were also established.[52] An ASEAN Human [48] As to the peaceful settlement mechanisms and as to other African organisations, see above, chapter 18, p. 1026.

[49] See e.g. Bowett's International Institutions, p. 228. See also T. W. Allen, The ASEAN Report, Washington, 2 vols., 1979, and Understanding ASEAN (ed. A. Broinowski), London, 1982. See also www.aseansec.org/.

[50] See 43 ILM, 2004, p. 18.

[51] See articles 7 and 8 of the Charter.

[52] See articles 9 and 10. There is also a Secretary-General and Secretariat and a Committee of Permanent Representatives: see articles 11 and 12.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

Rights Body was proposed under conditions to be determined.[53] Decision-making is in principle to be by consultation and consensus.[54]

Some legal aspects of international organisations[55]

There is no doubt that the contribution to international law generally made by the increasing number and variety of international organisations is marked. In many fields, the practice of international organisations has had an important effect and one that is often not sufficiently appreciated. In addition, state practice within such organisations is an increasingly significant element within the general process of customary law formation. This is particularly true with regard to the United Nations, with its universality of membership and extensive field of activity and interest, although not all such practice will be capable of transmission into customary law, and particular care will have to be exercised with regard to the opinio juris, or binding criterion.[56]

As well as the impact of the practice of international organisations upon international law, it is worth noting the importance of international legal norms within the operations of such organisations. The norms in question guide the work and development of international institutions and may act to correct illegal acts.[57] International organisations have in the past been defined in international treaties simply as 'inter-governmental organisations' in order to demonstrate that the key characteristic of such groupings

[53] Article 14.

[54] Article 20. Where there is no consensus, it will be for the ASEAN Summit to decide how to proceed in a particular matter. Article 22 calls for the establishment of dispute settlement mechanisms.

[55] See e.g. Amerasinghe, Principles; Schermers and Blokker, International Institutional Law; Bowett's International Institutions, part 3; Klabbers, Introduction; A. Reinisch, International Organizations Before National Courts, Cambridge, 2000; I. Brownlie, Principles of Public International Law, 6th edn, Oxford, 2003, chapter 31, and Reuter, International Institutions, pp. 227–64. See also E. Lauterpacht, 'Development' and 'The Legal Effects of Illegal Acts of International Organizations' in Cambridge Essays in International Law, Cambridge, 1965, p. 98; K. Skubiszewski, 'Enactment of Law by International Organizations', 4 BYIL, 1965–6, p. 198; Whiteman, Digest, vol. XIII; R. Higgins, The Development of International Law Through the Political Organs of the United Nations, Oxford, 1963, and generally other sources cited in footnote 2 above.

[56] See above, chapter 3, p. 84.

[57] See e.g. the IMCO case, ICJ Reports, 1960, p. 150; 30 ILR, p. 426; the Conditions of Admission of a State to the United Nations case, ICJ Reports, 1948, p. 57; 15 AD, p. 333; and the Certain Expenses of the United Nations case, ICJ Reports, 1962, p. 151; 34 ILR, p. 281. See also E. Lauterpacht, 'Development', pp. 388–95.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

is that their membership comprises states.[58] However, the International Law Commission in article 2 of its Draft Articles on the Responsibility of International Organisations refers to 'an organisation established by a treaty or other instrument governed by international law and possessing its own legal personality', while noting that international organisations 'may include as members, in addition to states, other entitites'.[59] Amerasinghe refers to organisations 'normally created by a treaty or convention to which states are parties and the members of the organisation so created are generally states' and points to basic characteristics such as establishment by international agreement among states, possession of a constitution, possession of organs separate from its members, establishment under international law, and either exclusive or predominant membership of states or governments.[60]

One may therefore distinguish public international organisations that are the subject of this chapter, from private or non-governmental organisations and from international public companies.[61] The former may have a wide-ranging, open or universal membership (such as the UN and the specialised agencies) or may have a limited or closed membership (such as the African Union or the Organisation for Economic Co-operation and Development). Organisations may have a wider or narrower range of functions, depending upon their constitution, with the UN as a good example of the former and the World Health Organisation as a good example of the latter. Whether a grouping will be regarded as an international organisation will depend essentially upon whether it in fact possesses some or all of the criteria noted above.

Personality[62]

The role of international organisations in the world order centres on their possession of international legal personality as distinct from, and [58] See e.g. the Vienna Convention on the Representation of States in their Relations with International Organizations, 1975; the Vienna Convention on Succession of States in Respect of Treaties, 1978 and the Vienna Convention on the Law of Treaties between States and International Organizations, 1986.

[59] Report of the International Law Commission, 2003, A/58/10, pp. 38 ff.

[60] Principles, pp. 9 and 10.

[61] See above, chapter 5, p. 248.

[62] See e.g. H. Thirlway, 'The Law and Procedure of the International Court of Justice, 1960–1989 (Part Eight)', 67 BYIL, 1996, p. 1; Klabbers, Introduction, chapter 3; Bowett's International Institutions, chapter 15; Amerasinghe, Principles, chapter 3; Schermers and Blokker, International Institutional Law, chapter 11; C. W. Jenks, 'The Legal Personality of

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

in addition to, personality under domestic law. Once this is established, they become subjects of international law and thus capable of enforcing rights and duties upon the international plane as distinct from operating merely within the confines of separate municipal jurisdictions. Not all arrangements by which two or more states co-operate will necessarily establish separate legal personality. The International Court of Justice in Nauru v. Australia[63] noted that the arrangements under which Australia, New Zealand and the UK became the joint 'Administering Authority' for Nauru in the Trusteeship Agreement approved by the UN in 1947 did not establish a separate international legal personality distinct from that of the states.

The question of personality will in the first instance depend upon the terms of the instrument establishing the organisation. If states wish the organisation to be endowed specifically with international personality, this will appear in the constituent treaty and will be determinative of the issue.[64] But this actually occurs in only a minority of cases. However, personality on the international plane may be inferred from the powers or purposes of the organisation and its practice.[65] This is the more usual situation and one authoritatively discussed and settled (at least as far as the UN was concerned directly) by the International Court in the Reparation for Injuries Suffered in the Service of the United Nations case.[66] The Court held that the UN had international legal personality because this was indispensable in order to achieve the purposes and principles specified in the Charter. In other words, it was a necessary inference from the International Organizations', 22 BYIL, 1945, p. 267; M. Rama-Montaldo, 'International Legal Personality and Implied Powers of International Organizations', 44 BYIL, 1970, p. 111; M. Sørensen, 'Principes de Droit International Public', 101 HR, 1960, pp. 1, 127 ff.; H. Barberis, 'Nouvelles Questions Concernant la Personalité Juridique Internationale', 179 HR, 1983, p. 145; F. Seyersted, 'Objective International Personality of Intergovernmental Organizations', 34 Nordisk Tidskrift for International Ret, 1964, p. 1, and C. Ijalaye, The Extension of Corporate Personality in International Law, Dobbs Ferry, 1978. See also above, chapter 5, p. 195.

63 ICJ Reports, 1992, pp. 240, 258; 97 ILR, pp. 1, 25.

64 See e.g. article 6 of the European Coal and Steel Community Treaty, 1951, and article 210 of the EEC Treaty, 1957 (now article 281 of the EC Treaty, Consolidated Version). See also Costa (Flaminio) v. ENEL [1964] ECR 585; 93 ILR, p. 23.

65 Note also the approach championed by Seyersted that international organisations become ipso facto international legal persons where there exists at least one organ with a will distinct from that of the member states: see Seyersted, 'Objective International Personality', and Schermers and Blokker, International Institutional Law, p. 978.

66 ICJ Reports, 1949, p. 174; 16 AD, p. 318.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

functions and rights the organisation was exercising and enjoying. The Court emphasised that it had to be:

> acknowledged that its [i.e. UN's] members, by entrusting certain functions to it, with the attendant duties and responsibilities, have clothed it with the competence required to enable those functions to be effectively discharged.[67]

The possession of international personality meant that the organisation was a subject of international law and capable of having international rights and duties and of enforcing them by bringing international claims.

In reaching this conclusion, the Court examined the United Nations Charter and subsequent relevant treaties and practice to determine the constitutional nature of the United Nations and the extent of its powers and duties. It noted the obligations of members towards the organisation, its ability to make international agreements and the provisions of the Charter contained in Articles 104 and 105, whereby the United Nations was to enjoy such legal capacity, privileges and immunities in the territory of each member state as were necessary for the fulfilment of its purposes.

The Court emphasised that:

> fifty states, representing the vast majority of the members of the international community, had the power in conformity with international law, to bring into being an entity possessing objective international personality, and not merely personality recognised by them alone.[68]

Accordingly, the Court derived the objective international legal personality of the UN from the intention of the members, either directly or implicitly. Such personality was objective in the sense that it could be maintained as against non-members as well, of course, as against members. Objective personality is not dependent upon prior recognition by the non-member concerned and would seem to flow rather from the nature and functions of the organisation itself. It may be that the number of states members of the organisation in question is relevant to the issue of objective personality, but it is not determinative.[69]

[67] ICJ Reports, 1949, p. 179; 16 AD, p. 322. [68] ICJ Reports, 1949, p. 185; 16 AD, p. 330.

[69] See the Third US Restatement of Foreign Relations Law, St Paul, 1987, vol. I, p. 141, noting that '[a]n international organisation with a substantial membership is a person in international law even in relation to states not members of the organisation. However, a state does not have to recognise the legal personality of an organisation of which it is not a member, which has few members, or which is regional in scope in a region to which the state does not belong.' Cf. Amerasinghe, Principles, p. 90. It should be noted that the

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

The attribution of international legal personality to an international organisation is therefore important in establishing that organisation as an entity operating directly upon the international stage rather than obliging the organisation to function internationally through its member states, who may number in the tens of dozens or more. The latter situation inevitably leads to considerable complication in the reaching of agreements as well as causing problems with regard to enforcing the responsibility or claims of such organisations internationally. The question of the effect of international personality upon the liability of member states for problems affecting the organisation will be referred to later in this chapter.[70] However, one needs to be careful not to confuse international with domestic legal personality. Many constituent instruments of international organisations expressly or impliedly provide that the organisation in question shall have personality in domestic law so as to enable it, for example, to contract or acquire or dispose of property or to institute legal proceedings in the local courts or to have the legal capacity necessary for the exercise of its functions.[71] Article 104 of the United Nations Charter itself provides that the UN 'shall enjoy in the territory of each of its members such legal capacity as may be necessary for the exercise of its functions and the fulfilment of its purposes'. Where such provisions exist, it follows that member states of the organisation have accepted an obligation to recognise such legal personality within their legal systems. How that may be achieved will vary from state to state and will depend upon the domestic legal system.[72]

The issue also arises at this point as to whether states that are not parties to the treaty in question and thus not member states of the particular international organisation are obliged to recognise the personality of such organisation. This can be achieved either directly, by entering into an agreement with the organisation – a headquarters agreement permitting the establishment of the organisation within the jurisdiction is the obvious question of objective personality is not essentially linked to recognition by non-member states as such. What will, however, be important will be patterns of dealing with such organisations by non-member states.

70 See below, p. 1314.

71 See e.g. articles IX(2) and VII(2) respectively of the Articles of Agreement of the International Monetary Fund and the International Bank for Reconstruction and Development. See also article 16 of the Constitution of the Food and Agriculture Organisation, article 6h of the Constitution of the World Health Organisation and article 12 of the Constitution of UNESCO.

72 See also e.g. article 282 of the EC Treaty (Consolidated Version) and Klabbers, Introduction, p. 49.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

example[73] – or indirectly by virtue of the rules of private international law (or conflict of laws).

Of course, most international organisations need to operate within particular states and thus require that their personality be recognised not only within international law but also within particular domestic law in order to be able to make and defend claims and generally to perform legal acts in domestic law. This may be achieved in different ways. In many legal systems, a domestic court will determine the legal status and capacity of a legal person by reference to the applicable or proper law, which will in the case of international organisations be international law. Thus if the organisation had personality under international law, this would suffice to establish personality under domestic law.[74] Indeed, in states where treaties form part of domestic law upon ratification by parliament, then domestic legal personality would be a consequence of becoming a party to an international agreement establishing an international organisation explicitly endowed with legal personality, such as the UN, for example.[75]

However, in the UK, the approach has been rather different since the UK adopts a dualist approach to international treaties, so that in order for such agreements to operate within the domestic system, express legislative incorporation is required.[76] The International Organisations Act 1968 grants the legal capacity of a body corporate to any organisation declared by Order in Council to be an organisation of which the UK and one or more foreign states are members. The view taken by the House of Lords in the Tin case[77] was that the legal effect of the Order in Council of 1972 concerning the International Tin Council (ITC) was to create the ITC as a legal person separate and distinct from its members, since 'as [73] See e.g. Re Poncet 15 AD, p. 346 (concerning Switzerland and the UN).

[74] See e.g. International Tin Council v. Amalgamet Inc. 524 NYS 2d 971 (1988); 80 ILR, p. 30. See also UNRAA v. Daan 16 AD, p. 337 and Branno v. Ministry of War 22 ILR, p. 756.

[75] See e.g. UN v. B 19 ILR, p. 490 and International Tin Council v. Amalgamet Inc. 524 NYS 2d 971 (1988). See also Amerasinghe, Principles, pp. 69 ff. As to the relationship between international law and domestic law generally, see above, chapter 4.

[76] See e.g. J. W. Bridge, 'The United Nations and English Law', 18 ICLQ, 1969, p. 689; G. Marston, 'The Origin of the Personality of International Organizations in United Kingdom Law', 40 ICLQ, 1991, p. 403, and F. A. Mann, 'International Organizations as National Corporations', 107 LQR, 1991, p. 357. See also R. Higgins, Report on the 'Legal Consequences for Member States of the Non-Fulfilment by International Organizations of their Obligations toward Third States', Annuaire de l'Institut de Droit International, 1995 I, p. 249.

[77] J. H. Rayner (Mincing Lane) Ltd v. Department of Trade and Industry [1989] 3 WLR 969, 982 and 1004 ff.; 81 ILR, pp. 670, 678 and 703 ff.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

an international legal persona [it] had no status under the laws of the United Kingdom'.[78] In other words, without such legislative action, an international organisation would have no legal existence in the UK. There is an exception to this strict approach and that is where the organisation has been granted legal personality in another country. The case of Arab Monetary Fund v. Hashim (No. 3)[79] concerned the attempt by the AMF to bring an action before the English courts to recover funds allegedly embezzled. The relevant constituent treaty of 1976 between a number of Arab states gave the AMF 'independent juridical personality' and a decree was adopted in Abu Dhabi giving the organisation independent legal status and the capacity to sue and be sued in United Arab Emirates law. There was, however, no Order in Council under the International Organisations Act 1968 giving the AMF legal personality within the UK. The Court of Appeal took the view that the decision of the House of Lords in the Tin case[80] meant that the ordinary conflict of laws rules allowing recognition of an entity created under foreign law could not be applied to an organisation established under international law, since this would apparently circumvent the principle that an international organisation with legal personality created outside the jurisdiction would not have capacity to sue in England without a relevant authorising Order in Council.[81]

The House of Lords, however, by a majority of four to one, expressed the opinion that the majority of the Court of Appeal had felt inhibited by observations made in the Tin cases and that the latter cases had not affected the principles that the recognition of a foreign state was a matter for the Crown and that if a foreign state is recognised by the Crown, the courts of the UK would recognise the corporate bodies created by that state. The House of Lords noted that the UK courts could indeed recognise an international organisation as a separate entity by comity provided that the entity was created by one or more of the member states.[82]

In other words, in the UK, an international organisation can be recognised as having personality by one of several methods: first, where Parliament has by legislation incorporated an international treaty [78] [1989] 3 WLR 1008; 81 ILR, p. 708 (per Lord Oliver). But see Lord Templeman in Arab Monetary Fund v. Hashim (No. 3) [1991] 2 WLR 729, 738; 85 ILR, pp. 1, 11, who noted that no argument based on incorporation by one or more foreign states had been relevant or canvassed in the Tin case.

[79] [1991] 2 WLR 729; 85 ILR, p. 1.

[80] [1989] 3 WLR 969; 81 ILR, p. 670.

[81] [1990] All ER 769, 775 (Donaldson MR); 83 ILR, pp. 259–61 and 778 (Nourse LJ); 83 ILR, p. 264.

[82] [1991] 2 WLR 738–9; 85 ILR, pp. 12–13.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

establishing such an organisation;[83] secondly, where the executive expressly recognises an international organisation;[84] thirdly, where an Order in Council under the International Organisations Act so provides; and fourthly, where the courts by virtue of comity recognise an international organisation that has personality in one or more of the member states.[85] It is an approach that is not without some difficulty, not least because of the implication that an international organisation not the subject of a UK Order in Council and not incorporated in the domestic law of member states may not be recognised as having personality in the UK, even though there exists an international treaty establishing such an international organisation with international personality. On the other hand, to argue that an international organisation has legal personality solely due to the fact that it has legal personality within the domestic law of another country which is thus to be applied in the UK due to conflict of law rules poses its own problems. However, the court in Westland Helicopters Ltd v. AOI[86] held that the law governing the status and capacities of such an organisation was international law.

To state that an international organisation has international personality does not dispose of the question of what such personality entails. While the attribution of international personality to an organisation endows it with a separate identity, distinct from its constituent elements, the consequences of such personality will vary according to the circumstances. Whereas all international legal persons will have some rights and duties (and by definition rights and duties distinct from those of the members of the organisation), they will not all have the same capacities.[87] The question of how such rights and duties may be enforced or maintained will also depend upon the circumstances. States are recognised as possessing the widest range of rights and duties, those of international organisations are clearly circumscribed in terms of express powers laid down in the constituent instruments or implied powers necessarily derived therefrom or otherwise evolved through practice.[88] The International Court

[83] See [1991] 2 WLR 738; 85 ILR, p. 12, giving the example of the Bretton Woods Agreements Act 1945.

[84] Ibid. [85] Ibid. [86] [1995] 2 WLR 126; 108 ILR, p. 564.

[87] The International Court in the Reparation case, ICJ Reports, 1949, pp. 174, 178; 16 AD, p. 330, stated that, 'The subjects of law in any legal system are not necessarily identical in nature or in the extent of their rights, and their nature depends upon the needs of the community.'

[88] The Court in the Reparation case took particular care to emphasise that possession of international personality was far from an ascription of statehood or recognition of equal rights and duties, ICJ Reports, 1949, pp. 174, 185; 16 AD, p. 330.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

emphasised that the attribution of international personality to the UN, for example, was not the same thing as declaring the UN to be a state nor that its legal personality and rights and duties were the same as those of a state. By the same token it did not mean that the UN was a 'super-state'.[89] The Court declared that UN personality involved the competence to possess and maintain rights and the capacity to enforce them on the international stage.[90] Accordingly, whereas states would possess the totality of international rights and duties recognised by international law, 'the rights and duties of an entity such as the [UN] Organisation must depend upon its purposes and functions as specified or implied in its constituent documents and developed in practice'.[91] Precisely which powers and capacities are involved will in reality therefore depend upon a careful analysis of the organisation itself, including the relationship of such powers and capacities to the stated purposes and duties of that organisation.

The constituent instruments[92]

International organisations are expressly created by states by formal decision as laid down in their constituent instruments. The very nature, status and authority of such organisations will therefore depend primarily upon the terms of the constituent instruments or constitutions under which they are established. Such instruments have a dual provenance. They constitute multilateral treaties, since they are binding agreements entered into by states parties, and as such fall within the framework of the international law of treaties.[93] But such agreements are multilateral treaties possessing a special character since they are also methods of creation of new subjects of international law. This dual nature has an impact most clearly in the realm of interpretation of the basic documents of the organisation.[94] This was clearly brought out in the Advisory Opinion of [89] Ibid., p. 179; 16 AD, p. 322. See also the WHO case, ICJ Reports, 1980, pp. 73, 89; 62 ILR, pp. 450, 473.

[90] ICJ Reports, 1949, p. 179. [91] Ibid., p. 180.

[92] See e.g. Amerasinghe, Principles, chapter 2; Schermers and Blokker, International Institutional Law, pp. 710 ff., and E. P. Hexner, 'Interpretation by International Organizations of their Basic Instruments', 53 AJIL, 1959, p. 341.

[93] As to which see above, chapter 16.

[94] See C. F. Amerasinghe, 'Interpretation of Texts in Open International Organizations', 65 BYIL, 1994, p. 175; M. N. Shaw, Title to Territory in Africa: International Legal Issues, Oxford, 1986, pp. 64–73; S. Rosenne, 'Is the Constitution of an International Organization an International Treaty?', 12 Communicazioni e Studi, 1966, p. 21, and G. Distefano, 'La Pratique Subséquente des États Parties à un Traité', AFDI, 1994, p. 41. See also

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

the International Court of Justice (requested by the World Health Organisation) in the Legality of the Use by a State of Nuclear Weapons in Armed Conflict case. The Court declared that:

> [t]he constituent instruments of international organisations are also treaties of a particular type; their object is to create new subjects of law endowed with a certain autonomy, to which the parties entrust the task of realising common goals. Such treaties can raise specific problems of interpretation owing, inter alia, to their character which is conventional and at the same time institutional; the very nature of the organisation created, the objectives which have been assigned to it by its founder, the imperatives associated with the effective performance of its functions, as well as its own practice, are all elements which may deserve special attention when the time comes to interpret these constituent treaties.[95]

Accordingly, one needs to consider the special nature of the constituent instruments as forming not only multilateral agreements but also constitutional documents subject to constant practice, and thus interpretation, both of the institution itself and of member states and others in relation to it. In the first instance, it will usually be for the organs of the institution to interpret the relevant constituent instruments.[96] In some cases, the constituent instruments themselves will determine the organ with the power of interpretation and may provide the methods and mechanisms for resolving interpretation disputes.[97] Occasionally, a court or tribunal will be established with such a competence. For example, the International Tribunal for the Law of the Sea can interpret the Law of the Sea Convention and the European Court of Justice can interpret the EU treaties and instruments. In so far as the UN is concerned, the Security Council and General Assembly may request an advisory opinion from the International Court of Justice, as may other organs of the organisation and specialised agencies where authorised by the General Assembly with regard to a question within the scope of their activities.[98] The constituent instruments of

H. Lauterpacht, The Development of International Law by the International Court, London, 1958, pp. 267–81, and E. Lauterpacht, 'Development', pp. 414 ff.

[95] ICJ Reports, 1996, pp. 66, 74–5; 110 ILR, pp. 1, 14–15.

[96] See Certain Expenses of the United Nations, ICJ Reports, 1962, pp. 151, 168. See also Amerasinghe, Principles, pp. 25 ff.

[97] The constitutions of the various international financial institutions, such as the International Monetary Fund and the World Bank, invariably provide for binding determination by the supreme plenary organ: see e.g. Amerasinghe, Principles, pp. 28 ff.

[98] See article 96(1) and (2) of the Charter. See further above, chapter 19, p. 1108. Note that there is no provision in the Charter authorising the International Court to review decisions of the UN judicially, but see further above, chapter 22, p. 1268.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

some organisations provide for binding final determination by the International Court using advisory proceedings, that is, organisations in such situations agree to accept the advisory opinion as binding.[99] In addition, article XIX, section 32, of the Convention on the Privileges and Immunities of Specialised Agencies, 1947, provides that differences between a specialised agency and a member arising out of the interpretation or the application of the convention are to be submitted to the International Court under the advisory procedure contained in article 96 of the Charter and article 65 of the Statute of the Court and the opinion thus obtained is to be treated as decisive by the parties.[100] In contentious cases, the International Court may need to interpret the constituent instruments of an international organisation, including the UN Charter itself, where this is relevant to the determination of the issue at hand.[101]

The fact that the constituent instruments of international organisations are invariably multilateral agreements means that the process of their interpretation will be governed by articles 31 and 32 of the Vienna Convention on the Law of Treaties, 1969.[102] However, such agreements are of a special nature since they also from the constitutions of international organisations[103] and this argues for a more flexible or purpose-orientated

[99] See e.g. article 37 of the International Labour Organisation Constitution. Article XIV of the UNESCO Constitution 1945 provides that, 'Any question or dispute concerning the interpretation of this Constitution shall be referred for determination to the International Court of Justice or to an arbitral tribunal, as the General Conference may determine.' See also Amerasinghe, Principles, p. 29.

[100] See also article VIII, section 30, of the Convention on the Privileges and Immunities of the United Nations, 1946, with regard to disputes between the UN and member states as to the interpretation or application of the Convention. Note in addition article VIII, sectioin 21(b) of the UN–US Headquarters Agreement, 1947.

[101] Note that by article 34 of the Statute of the International Court, only states may be parties to a contentious case before the Court.

[102] Note that by virtue of article 5 of the Vienna Convention on the Law of Treaties, 1969, this Convention applies to any treaty which is the constituent instrument of an international organisation and to any treaty adopted within an international organisation, without prejudice to any relevant rules of the organisation. See also the Advisory Opinion on the Legality of the Use by a State of Nuclear Weapons, ICJ Reports, 1996, pp. 66, 74, noting that, 'From a formal standpoint, the constituent instruments of international organisations are multilateral treaties, to which the well-established rules of treaty interpretation apply.' See as to the principles of treaty interpretation, above, chapter 16, p. 932.

[103] ICJ Reports, 1996, pp. 66, 74, referring to the institutional character of such organisations and emphasising that, 'the very nature of the organisation created, the objectives which have been assigned to it by its founders, the imperatives associated with the effective performance of its functions, as well as its own practice, are all elements which may deserve special attention when the time comes to interpret these constituent treaties'.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

method of interpretation. Rather less attention than would be the case in the interpretation of normal treaties is paid to the intentions of the original framers and the travaux préparatoires (negotiating materials) and rather more to the principle of effectiveness in the light of the object and purposes of the agreement in question.[104] Because constitutions are 'living instruments' in constant use in order to carry out the purposes of the organisation in changing and developing circumstances, subsequent practice is of particular importance in the context of interpretation.[105] The International Court has relied upon the subsequent practice of international organisations in a number of cases, although usually to support an interpretation already reached by the Court.[106]

The powers of international institutions[107]

International organisations are unlike states that possess a general competence as subjects of international law.[108] They are governed by the principle of speciality, so that, as the International Court has noted, 'they are invested by the states which create them with powers, the limits of which are a function of the common interests whose promotion those states entrust to them'.[109] Such powers may be expressly laid down in the constituent [104] See Amerasinghe, Principles, p. 59. See also the Reparation case, ICJ Reports, 1949, pp. 174, 180.

[105] See article 31(3)b of the Vienna Convention. See also E. Lauterpacht, 'Development', pp. 420 ff.

[106] See e.g. the Competence of the General Assembly for the Admission of a State to the United Nations case, ICJ Reports, 1950, pp. 4, 9; 17 ILR, pp. 326, 329; the Namibia case, ICJ Reports, 1971, pp. 17, 22; 49 ILR, pp. 2, 12, and the IMCO case, ICJ Reports, 1960, pp. 150, 167–8; 30 ILR, pp. 426, 439–41.

[107] See e.g. Sarooshi, International Organizations; Klabbers, Introduction, chapter 4; E. Lauterpacht, 'Development', pp. 423–74; Amerasinghe, Principles, p. 135; Rama-Montaldo, 'Legal Personality'; A. I. L. Campbell, 'The Limits of Powers of International Organizations', 32 ICLQ, 1983, p. 523; K. Skubiszewski, 'Implied Powers of International Organizations' in International Law at a Time of Perplexity (ed. Y. Dinstein), Dordrecht, 1989, p. 855, and Kirgis, International Organizations, chapter 3.

[108] See the Advisory Opinion of the International Court on the Legality of the Use by a State of Nuclear Weapons in Armed Conflict brought by the World Health Organisation, ICJ Reports, 1996, pp. 66, 78–9.

[109] Ibid. The Court here cited the Permanent Court's Advisory Opinion in the Jurisdiction of the European Commission of the Danube, PCIJ, Series B, No. 14, p. 64, which noted that, 'As the European Commission is not a state, but an international institution with a special purpose, it only has the functions bestowed upon it by the Definitive Statute with a view to the fulfilment of that purpose, but it has power to exercise those functions to their full extent, in so far as the Statute does not impose restrictions upon it.'

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

instruments or may arise subsidiarily as implied powers,[110] being those deemed necessary for fulfilment of the functions of the particular organisation. The test of validity for such powers has been variously expressed. The International Court noted in the Reparation case that:[111]

> [u]nder international law the organization must be deemed to have those powers which, though not expressly provided in the charter, are conferred upon it by necessary implication as being essential to the performance of its duties.[112]

In the Effect of Awards of Compensation Made by the UN Administrative Tribunal case,[113] the Court held that the General Assembly could validly establish an administrative tribunal in the absence of an express power since the capacity to do this arose 'by necessary intendment' out of the Charter, while in the Certain Expenses of the UN case,[114] the Court declared that 'when the organisation takes action which warrants the assertion that it was appropriate for the fulfilment of one of the stated purposes of the United Nations, the presumption is that such action is not ultra vires the organisation'. The tests posited therefore have ranged from powers arising by 'necessary implication as being essential to the performance' of constitutionally laid down duties, to those arising 'by necessary intendment' out of the constituent instrument, to those deemed 'appropriate for the fulfilment' of constitutionally authorised purposes of the organisation. There are clearly variations of emphasis in such formulations.[115] Nevertheless, although the functional test is determinative, it operates within the framework of those powers expressly conferred by the constitution of the organisation. Thus any attempt to infer a power that was inconsistent with an express power would fail, although there is clearly an area of ambiguity here.[116] In the Legality of the Use by a State of Nuclear Weapons [110] See Schermers and Blokker, International Institutional Law, pp. 158 ff.

[111] ICJ Reports, 1949, pp. 174, 182; 16 AD, pp. 318, 326.

[112] This passage was cited in the Legality of the Use by a State of Nuclear Weapons case, ICJ Reports, 1996, pp. 66, 78–9. Compare also the approach adopted by the International Court in the Reparation case with that adopted by Judge Hackworth in his Dissenting Opinion in that case, ICJ Reports, 1949, pp. 196–8; 16 AD, pp. 318, 328. See also G. G. Fitzmaurice, 'The Law and Procedure of the International Court of Justice: International Organizations and Tribunals', 29 BYIL, 1952, p. 1.

[113] ICJ Reports, 1954, pp. 47, 56–7; 21 ILR, pp. 310, 317–18.

[114] ICJ Reports, 1962, pp. 151, 168; 34 ILR, pp. 281, 297.

[115] See also the Fédéchar case, Case 8/55, European Court Reports, 1954–6, p. 299.

[116] See also e.g. the International Status of South-West Africa case, ICJ Reports, 1950, pp. 128, 136–8; 17 ILR, pp. 47, 53; the Expenses case, ICJ Reports, 1962, pp. 151, 167–8; 34 ILR, pp. 281, 296 and the Namibia case, ICJ Reports, 1971, pp. 16, 47–9; 49 ILR, pp. 2, 37.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

case,[117] the Court noted that the World Health Organisation had under article 2 of its Constitution adopted in 1946 the competence 'to deal with the effects on health of the use of nuclear weapons, or any other hazardous activity, and to take preventive measures aimed at protecting the health of populations in the event of such weapons being used or such activities engaged in'.[118] However, the Court concluded that the question asked of it related not to the effects of the use of nuclear weapons on health, but to the legality of the use of such weapons in view of their health and environmental effects. Whatever those effects might be, the competence of the WHO to deal with them was not dependent upon the legality of the acts that caused them. Accordingly, the Court concluded that in the light of the constitution of the WHO as properly interpreted, the organisation had not been granted the competence to address the legality of the use of nuclear weapons and that therefore the competence to request an advisory opinion did not exist since the question posed was not one that could be considered as arising 'within the scope of . . . activities' of the WHO as required by article 96(2) of the UN Charter.[119]

So far as the International Court itself is concerned, it has held that it possesses 'an inherent jurisdiction enabling it to take such action as may be required, on the one hand to ensure that the exercise of its jurisdiction over the merits, if and when established, shall not be frustrated, and on the other, to provide for the orderly settlement of all matters in dispute, to ensure the observance of the "inherent limitations on the exercise of the judicial function" of the Court, and to "maintain its judicial character"'.[120]

Of great importance is the question of the capacity of international organisations to conclude international treaties.[121] This will primarily [117] ICJ Reports, 1996, pp. 66, 78–9. [118] Ibid., p. 76.

[119] Article 96(2) of the UN Charter provides that organs of the UN (apart from the Security Council and General Assembly) and specialised agencies which may at any time be so authorised by the General Assembly may request advisory opinions of the International Court on 'legal questions arising within the scope of their activities'.

[120] The Nuclear Tests case, ICJ Reports, 1974, pp. 253, 259; 57 ILR, p. 398. See the Appeals Chamber in the Tadić (Jurisdiction) case, 105 ILR, pp. 453, 463 ff. See also E. Lauterpacht, '"Partial" Judgments and the Inherent Jurisdiction of the International Court of Justice' in Fifty Years of the International Court of Justice (eds. V. Lowe and M. Fitzmaurice), Cambridge, 1996, pp. 465, 476 ff.

[121] See e.g. Klabbers, Introduction, chapter 13; Schermers and Blokker, International Institutional Law, pp. 1096 ff.; J. W. Schneider, Treaty-Making Power of International Organizations, Geneva, 1959, and C. Parry 'The Treaty-Making Power of the UN', 26 BYIL, 1949, p. 147. See also above, chapter 16, p. 953, with regard to the Convention on the Law of Treaties between States and International Organisations. See also Yearbook of the ILC, 1982, vol. II, part 2, pp. 9 ff.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

depend upon the constituent instrument, since the existence of legal personality is on its own probably insufficient to ground the competence to enter into international agreements.[122] Article 6 of the Vienna Convention on the Law of Treaties between States and International Organisations, 1986 provides that '[t]he capacity of an international organisation to conclude treaties is governed by the rules of that organisation'. This is a wider formulation than reliance solely upon the constituent instrument and permits recourse to issues of implied powers, interpretation and subsequent practice. It was noted in the commentary of the International Law Commission that the phrase 'the rules of the organisation' meant, in addition to the constituent instruments,[123] relevant decisions and resolutions and the established practice of the organisation.[124] Accordingly, demonstration of treaty-making capacity will revolve around the competences of the organisation as demonstrated in each particular case by reference to the constituent instruments, evidenced implied powers and subsequent practice.

The applicable law[125]

International institutions are established by states by means of international treaties. Such instruments fall to be interpreted and applied within the framework of international law. Accordingly, as a general rule, the applicable or 'proper' or 'personal' law of international organisations is international law.[126] In addition, the organisation in question may well have entered into treaty relationships with particular states, for example, [122] See e.g. Hungdah Chiu, The Capacity of International Organizations to Conclude Treaties and the Special Legal Aspects of the Treaties So Concluded, The Hague, 1966; Agreements of International Organizations and the Vienna Convention on the Law of Treaties (ed. K. Zemanek), Vienna, 1971; G. Nascimento e Silva, 'The 1986 Vienna Convention and the Treaty-Making Power of International Organizations', 29 German YIL, 1986, p. 68, and 'The 1969 and 1986 Conventions on the Law of Treaties: A Comparison' in Dinstein, International Law at a Time of Perplexity, p. 461.

[123] See e.g. article 43 and articles 75, 77, 79, 83 and 85 of the UN Charter concerning military assistance arrangements with the Security Council and Trusteeship Agreements respectively.

[124] Yearbook of the ILC, 1982, vol. II, part 2, p. 41.

[125] See e.g. Amerasinghe, Principles, pp. 20–2 and 227 ff.; F. A. Mann, 'International Corporations and National Law', 42 BYIL, 1967, p. 145; F. Seyersted, 'Applicable Law in Relations Between Intergovernmental Organizations and Private Parties', 122 HR, 1976 III, p. 427, and C. W. Jenks, The Proper Law of International Organizations, London, 1961.

[126] Jenks, Proper Law, p. 3, wrote that 'if a body has the character of an international body corporate the law governing its corporate life must necessarily be international in character'. See also the Third US Restatement of Foreign Relations Law, vol. I, pp. 133 ff.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

in the case of a headquarters agreement, and these relationships will also be governed by international law. Those matters that will necessarily (in the absence of express provision to the contrary) be governed by international law will include questions as to the existence, constitution, status, membership and representation of the organisation.[127]

However, the applicable law in particular circumstances may be domestic law. Thus, where the organisation is purchasing or leasing land or entering into contracts for equipment or services, such activities will normally be subject to the appropriate national law. Tortious liability as between the organisation and a private individual will generally be subject to domestic law, but tortious activity may be governed by international law depending upon the circumstances, for example, where there has been damage to the property of an international organisation by the police or armed forces of a state. The internal law of the organisation will cover matters such as employment relations, the establishment and functioning of subsidiary organs and the management of administrative services.[128] The internal law of an organisation, which includes the constituent instruments and subsidiary regulations and norms and any relevant contractual arrangements, may in reality be seen as a specialised and particularised part of international law, since it is founded upon agreements that draw their validity and applicability from the principles of international law.

The responsibility of international institutions[129]

The establishment of an international organisation with international personality results in the formation of a new legal person, separate and distinct from that of the states creating it. This separate and distinct personality necessarily imports consequences as to international responsibility, [127] See also Colman J in Westland Helicopters Ltd v. AOI [1995] 2 WLR 126, 144 ff., and Millett J in In re International Tin Council [1987] Ch. 419, 452, upheld by the Court of Appeal, [1989] Ch. 309, 330.

[128] See e.g. Amerasinghe, Principles, chapter 9. See also P. Cahier, 'Le Droit Interne des Organisations Internationales', 67 RGDIP, 1963, p. 563, and G. Balldore-Pallieri, 'Le Droit Interne des Organisations Internationales', 127 HR, 1969 II, p. 1.

[129] See e.g. Klabbers, Introduction, chapter 14; Amerasinghe, Principles, chapter 12; Schermers and Blokker, International Institutional Law, pp. 1166 ff.; Bowett's International Institutions, pp. 512 ff.; M. Hirsch, The Responsibility of International Organizations Towards Third Parties: Some Basic Principles, Dordrecht, 1995; P. Klein, La Responsabilité des Organisations Internationales, Brussels, 1998; C. Eagleton, 'International Organisation and the Law of Responsibility', 76 HR, 1950 I, p. 319; F. V. Garcia Amador, 'State Responsibility: Some New Problems', 94 HR, 1958, p. 410, and M. Perez Gonzalez, 'Les Organisations

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

both to and by the organisation. The International Court noted in the Reparation case, for example, that[130] 'when an infringement occurs, the organisation should be able to call upon the responsible state to remedy its default, and, in particular, to obtain from the state reparation for the damage that the default may have caused' and emphasised that there existed an 'undeniable right of the organization to demand that its members shall fulfil the obligations entered into by them in the interest of the good working of the organization'.[131] Responsibility is a necessary consequence of international personality and the resulting possession of international rights and duties. Such rights and duties may flow from treaties, such as headquarters agreements,[132] or from the principles of customary international law.[133] The precise nature of responsibility will depend upon the circumstances of the case and, no doubt, analogies drawn from the law of state responsibility with regard to the conditions under which responsibility will be imposed.[134] In brief, one can note the following. The basis of international responsibility is the breach of an international obligation[135] and such obligations will depend upon the situation. The Court noted in the Reparation case[136] that the obligations entered into by member states to enable the agents of the UN to perform their duties were obligations owed to the organisation. Thus, the organisation has, in the case of a breach of such obligations, 'the capacity to claim adequate reparation, and that in assessing this reparation it is authorised to include the damage suffered by the victim or by persons entitled through him'. Whereas Internationales et le Droit de la Responsabilité', 92 RGDIP, 1988, p. 63. The International Law Commission is currently considering the question of responsibility of international organisations: see e.g. Report of the ILC, 2007, A/62/10, p. 178, and references to draft articles as currently proposed are to those contained in this document. See also above, chapter 14.

130 ICJ Reports, 1949, pp. 174, 183; 16 AD, pp. 318, 327.

131 ICJ Reports, 1949, p. 184; 16 AD, p. 328.

132 See e.g. the WHO Regional Office case, ICJ Reports, 1980, p. 73; 62 ILR, p. 450 and the Case Concerning the Obligation to Arbitrate, ICJ Reports, 1988, p. 12; 82 ILR, p. 225.

133 See the WHO Regional Office case, ICJ Reports, 1980, pp. 73, 90; 62 ILR, pp. 450, 474, referring to 'general rules of international law'.

134 See above, chapter 14. See also Report of the ILC, 2007, A/62/10, p. 178.

135 See e.g. the Reparation case, ICJ Reports, 1949, p. 180; 16 AD, p. 323. Article 3 of the ILC draft articles on responsibility of international organisations provides that, 'Every internationally wrongful act of an international organization entails the international responsibility of the international organization' and that, 'There is an internationally wrongful act of an international organization when conduct consisting of an action or omission: (a) Is attributable to the international organization under international law; and (b) Constitutes a breach of an international obligation of that international organization.'

136 ICJ Reports, 1949, p. 184; 16 AD, p. 328.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

the right of a state to assert a claim on behalf of a victim is predicated upon the link of nationality, in the case of an international organisation, the necessary link relates to the requirements of the organisation and therefore the fact that the victim was acting on behalf of the organisation in exercising one of the functions of that organisation. As the Court noted, 'the organization . . . possesses a right of functional protection in respect of its agents'.[137]

Just as a state can be held responsible for injury to an organisation, so can the organisation be held responsible for injury to a state, where the injury arises out of a breach by the organisation of an international obligation deriving from a treaty provision or principle of customary international law.[138] Again, analogies will be drawn from the general rules relating to state responsibility with regard to the conditions under which responsibility is imposed. For example, the conduct of an organ or an agent of an international organisation in the performance of the functions of that organ or agent (including officials and other persons or entities through whom the organisation acts) is considered as an act of the organisation, irrespective of the position actually held by the organ or agent and even if the conduct exceeds the authority of that organ or agent.[139] An international organisation which aids or assists a state or another international organisation in the commission of an internationally wrongful act will itself bear international responsibility where the organisation knew the circumstances of the wrongful act and the act would be internationally wrongful if committed by that organisation.[140] As in [137] ICJ Reports, 1949, p. 184; 16 AD, p. 329. Note that the Court held that there was no rule of law which assigned priority either to the national state of the victim or the international organisation with regard to the bringing of an international claim, ICJ Reports, 1949, p. 185; 16 AD, p. 330.

[138] See e.g. the WHO Regional Office case, ICJ Reports, 1980, p. 73; 62 ILR, p. 450. Note that under articles 6 and 13 of the Outer Space Treaty, 1967, international organisations may be subject to the obligations of the treaty without being parties to it.

[139] See articles 4 and 6 of the ILC draft articles on responsibility of international organisations.

[140] Article 12 of the ILC draft articles on the responsibility of international organisations. Note that draft article 25 provides that a state which aids or assists an international organisation in the commission of an internationally wrongful act by the latter is internationally responsible in the same circumstances. But see here Behrami v. France, European Court of Human Rights, judgment of 2 May 2007, 133 ILR, p. 1, where the Court dismissed as inadmissible an application against a number of NATO states operating with the framework of KFOR (the international security force in Kosovo authorised by the Security Council under Chapter VII of the UN Charter) on the grounds that the actions complained against were 'directly attributable to the UN', whether to KFOR or to UNMIK (the international civil administration in Kosovo): see above, chapter 7, p. 350.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

the case of states, international organisations may benefit from the precluding of responsibility in particular circumstances, such as consent by a state or an international organisation to the commission of the act or where the act constitutes a lawful measure of self-defence in conformity with international law.[141] An international organisation responsible for the internationally wrongful act is under an obligation to cease that act and to offer appropriate assurances and guarantees of non-repetition (if circumstances so require) and to make full reparation for the injury caused.[142]

The issue of responsibility has particularly arisen in the context of UN peacekeeping operations and liability for the activities of the members of such forces. In such circumstances, the UN has accepted responsibility and offered compensation for wrongful acts.[143] The crucial issue will be whether the wrongful acts in question are imputable to the UN and this has not been accepted where the offenders were under the jurisdiction of the national state, rather than under that of the UN. Much will depend upon the circumstances of the operation in question and the nature of the link between the offenders and the UN. It appears, for example, to have been accepted that in the Korean (1950) and Kuwait (1990) operations the relationship between the national forces and the UN was such as to preclude the latter's responsibility.[144] While responsibility will exist for internationally unlawful acts attributable to the institution in question, tortious liability may also arise for injurious consequences caused by lawful activities, for example environmental damage as a result of legitimate space activities.[145]

[141] Articles 17 and 18. Other examples of circumstances precluding wrongfulness include countermeasures, force majeure, distress and necessity: see articles 19–22. However, nothing may preclude the wrongful act of an international organisation which is not in conformity with an obligation arising under a peremptory norm of general international law (jus cogens): article 23 and see above, chapter 3, p. 123.

[142] Articles 33 and 34. Full reparation is to take the form of restitution (re-establishment of the situation existing before the wrongful act was committed), compensation and satisfaction, either singly or in combination: see articles 37 to 42.

[143] See e.g. B. Amrallah, 'The International Responsibility of the United Nations for Activities Carried Out by UN Peace-Keeping Forces', 23 Revue Égyptienne de Droit International, 1976, p. 57; D. W. Bowett, UN Forces, London, 1964, pp. 149 ff.; F. Seyersted, 'United Nations Forces: Some Legal Problems', 37 BYIL, 1961, p. 351. See also Amerasinghe, Principles, pp. 401 ff., and M v. Organisation des Nations Unies et l'État Belge 45 ILR, p. 446.

[144] See Amerasinghe, Principles, p. 403. See also Behrami v. France, above, note 140.

[145] As to remedies generally, see K. Wellens, Remedies Against International Organizations, Cambridge, 2002.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

In the context of often unclear divisions of responsibility between the UN itself and states contributing troops for peacekeeping purposes, particularly serious issues have arisen with regard to allegations of sexual misconduct by UN peacekeepers. Because military members of national contingents are not subject to the criminal jurisdiction of the host state, the model Status of Forces Agreement between the UN and the state where the peacekeeping force was to be stationed envisaged that the Secretary-General would obtain formal assurances from the troop-contributing country concerned that it would exercise jurisdiction with respect to crimes that might be committed by its forces in the mission area. However, this has not been the practice. It has recently been recommended that peacekeeping operations should be accompanied by a memorandum of understanding which would include a provision to this effect.[146]

Liability of member states[147]

The relationship between the member states of an organisation and the organisation itself is often complex. The situation is further complicated upon a consideration of the position of third states (or organisations) prejudiced by the activities of the organisation. The starting point for any analysis is the issue of legal personality. An international organisation created by states that does not itself possess legal personality cannot be the bearer of rights or obligations separate and distinct from those of the member states. It therefore follows that such organisations cannot be interposed as between the injured third parties and the member states of that organisation. In such cases any liability for the debts or delicts attributable to the organisation causing harm to third parties would fall upon the member states.[148] Where, however, the organisation does possess legal personality, the situation is different. Separate personality implies liability for activities entered into. The question of the liability of member states to third parties may arise subsidiarily and poses some difficulty. Such a question falls to be decided by the rules of international law not [146] See the UN Report on Sexual Exploitation and Abuse by UN Peacekeeping Personnel, A/59/710, 24 March 2005, para. 78. See also A/45/594, annex, para. 48.

[147] See e.g. Amerasinghe, Principles, chapter 13; Schermers and Blokker, International Institutional Law, pp. 990 ff.; Higgins, 'Legal Consequences'; H. Schermers, 'Liability of International Organizations', 1 Leiden Journal of International Law, 1988, p. 14; C. F. Amerasinghe, 'Liability to Third Parties of Member States of International Organizations: Practice, Principle and Judicial Precedent', 85 AJIL, 1991, 259.

[148] See e.g. Higgins, 'Legal Consequences', p. 378, and Amerasinghe, Principles, p. 412.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

least since it is consequential upon a determination of personality which is in the case of international organisations governed by international law.[149] The problem is also to be addressed in the context of the general principle of international law that treaties do not create obligations for third states without their consent (pacta tertiis nec nocent nec prosunt).[150] By virtue of this rule, member states would not be responsible for breaches of agreements between organisations and other parties.

The problems faced by the International Tin Council during 1985–6 are instructive in this context.[151] The ITC, created in 1956, conducted its activities in accordance with successive international tin agreements, which aimed to regulate the tin market by virtue of export controls and the establishment of buffer stocks of tin financed by member states. The Sixth International Tin Agreement of 1982 brought together twenty-three producer and consumer states and the EEC. In October 1985, the ITC announced that it had run out of funds and credit and the London Metal Exchange suspended trading in tin. The situation had arisen basically as a result of over-production of the metal and purchasing of tin by the ITC at prices above the market level.

Since the ITC member states refused to guarantee the debts of the organisation and since proposals to create a successor organisation to the ITC collapsed, serious questions were posed as to legal liabilities. The ITC was a corporate entity enjoying a measure of legal immunity in the UK as a result of the International Tin Council (Immunities and Privileges) Order 1972. It had immunity from the jurisdiction of the courts except in cases of enforcement of an arbitral award. The ITC Headquarters Agreement provided that contracts entered into with a person or company resident [149] It is possible for states to create an international organisation under domestic law, for example, the Bank for International Settlements, but this is very rare: see e.g. M. Giovanoli, 'The Role of the Bank for International Settlements in International Monetary Co-operation and Its Tasks Relating to the European Currency Unit', 23 The International Lawyer, 1989, p. 841.

[150] See articles 34 and 35 of the Vienna Convention on the Law of Treaties, 1969 and articles 34 and 35 of the Vienna Convention on the Law of Treaties between States and International Organisations or between International Organisations, 1986. See also C. Chinkin, Third Parties in International Law, Oxford, 1993. See also above, chapter 16, p. 928.

[151] See e.g. The Second Report from the Trade and Industry Committee, 1985–6, HC 305-I, 1986 and The Times, 13 March 1986, p. 21 and ibid., 14 March 1986, p. 17. See also G. Wassermann, 'Tin and Other Commodities in Crisis', 20 Journal of World Trade Law, 1986, p. 232; E. Lauterpacht, 'Development', p. 412; I. Cheyne, 'The International Tin Council', 36 ICLQ, 1987, p. 931, ibid., 38 ICLQ, 1989, p. 417 and ibid., 39 ICLQ, 1990, p. 945, and R. Sadurska and C. M. Chinkin, 'The Collapse of the International Tin Council: A Case of State Responsibility?', 30 Va. JIL, 1990, p. 845.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

in the UK were to contain an arbitration clause. It was also the case that where a specific agreement provided for a waiver of immunity by the organisation, the courts would have jurisdiction.[152] Accordingly, the immunity from suit of the ITC was by no means unlimited.

A variety of actions were commenced by the creditors, of which the most important was the direct action. Here, a number of banks and brokers proceeded directly against the Department of Trade and Industry of the British government and other members of the ITC on the argument that they were liable on contracts concluded by the ITC.[153] The issues were argued at length in the Court of Appeal and in the House of Lords.[154] The main submission[155] for present purposes was that the members of the ITC and the organisation were liable concurrently for the debts under both English and international law. It was argued that under international law members of an international organisation bear joint and several liability for its debts unless the constituent treaty expressly excludes such liability. Although there had been hints of such an approach earlier[156] and treaty practice had been far from consistent, Lord Templeman noted that 'no plausible evidence was produced of the existence of such a rule of international law'[157] and this, it is believed, correctly

[152] See e.g. Standard Chartered Bank v. ITC [1986] 3 All ER 257; 77 ILR, p. 8.

[153] See also the attempt to have the ITC wound up under Part XXI of the Companies Act 1985, Re International Tin Council [1988] 3 All ER 257, 361; 80 ILR, p. 181, and the attempt to appoint a receiver by way of equitable execution over the assets of the ITC following an arbitration award against the ITC (converted into a judgment) which it was argued would enable contributions or an indemnity to be claimed from the members, Maclaine Watson v. International Tin Council [1988] 3 WLR 1169; 80 ILR, p. 191.

[154] Maclaine Watson v. Department of Trade and Industry [1988] 3 WLR 1033 (Court of Appeal); 80 ILR, p. 49 and [1989] 3 All ER 523 (House of Lords) sub. nom. J. H. Rayner Ltd v. Department of Trade and Industry; 81 ILR, p. 671.

[155] One submission was that the relevant International Tin Council (Immunities and Privileges) Order 1972 did not incorporate the ITC under English law but conferred upon it the capacities of a body corporate and thus the ITC did not have legal personality. This was rejected by the House of Lords, [1989] 3 All ER 523, 527–8 and 548–9; 81 ILR, pp. 677, 703. Another submission was that the ITC was only authorised to enter into contracts as an agent for the members under the terms of the Sixth International Tin Agreement, 1982. This was also dismissed, on the basis that the terms of the Order clearly authorised the ITC to enter into contracts as a principal, [1989] 3 All ER 530 and 556–7; 81 ILR, pp. 681, 715.

[156] See e.g. Westland Helicopters v. Arab Organization for Industrialisation 23 ILM, 1984, 1071; 80 ILR, p. 600. See H. T. Adam, Les Organismes Internationaux Specialisés, Paris, 1965, vol. I, pp. 129–30, and Seidl-Hohenveldern, Corporations, pp. 119–20.

[157] [1989] 3 All ER 523, 529; 81 ILR, p. 680. This was the view adopted by a majority of the Court of Appeal: see Ralph Gibson LJ, [1988] 3 WLR 1033, 1149 and Kerr LJ, ibid., 1088–9 (but cf. Nourse LJ, ibid., 1129–31); 80 ILR, pp. 49, 170; 101–2; 147–9. It is fair to

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

represents the current state of international law.[158] The liability of a member state could arise, of course, either through an express provision[159] in the constituent instruments of the organisation providing for the liability of member states or where the organisation was in fact under the direct control of the state concerned or acted as its agent in law and in fact, or by virtue of unilateral undertakings or guarantee by the state in the particular circumstances.[160]

There may, however, be instances where the liability of member states is engaged. For example, in Matthews v. UK, the European Court of Human Rights stated that the European Convention on Human Rights did not exclude the transfer of competences to international organisations 'provided that Convention rights continue to be "secured". Member states' responsibility therefore continues even after such a transfer.'[161] Similarly, where the member state acts together with an international organisation in the commission of an unlawful act, then it too will be liable.[162]

The accountability of international institutions

The concept of accountability is broader than the principles of responsibility and liability for internationally wrongful acts and rests upon the notion that the lawful application of power imports accountability for its exercise. Such accountability will necessarily range across legal, political, administrative and financial forms and essentially create a emphasise that the approach of the Court, in effect, was primarily focused upon domestic law and founded upon the perception that without the relevant Order in Council the ITC had no legal existence in the law of the UK. An international organisation had legal personality in the sphere of international law and it did not thereby automatically acquire legal personality within domestic legal systems. For that, at least in the case of the UK, specific legislation was required.

158 See e.g. the 1991 Partial Award on Liability of the ICC Tribunal in the Westland Helicopters case: see Higgins, 'Legal Consequences', p. 393. See also I. F. I. Shihata, 'Role of Law in Economic Development: The Legal Problems of International Public Ventures', 25 Revue Égyptienne de Droit International, 1969, pp. 119, 125; Schermers and Blokker, International Institutional Law, p. 992, and Amerasinghe, Principles, pp. 431 ff.

159 Or indeed a provision demonstrating such an intention.

160 See articles 7 and 8 of the Resolution of the Institut de Droit International, Annuaire de l'Institut de Droit International, 1995 I, pp. 465, 467.

161 Judgment of 18 February 1999, para. 32; 123 ILR, p. 13. However, see also Bosphorus Airways v. Ireland, Judgment of 30 June 2005 and Behrami v. France, Judgment of 2 May 2007; 133 ILR, p. 1.

162 See above, p. 1312.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

regulatory and behavioural framework. In such a context, particular attention should be devoted to the principle of good governance, which concerns the benchmarks of good administration and transparent conduct and monitoring; the principle of good faith; the principle of constitutionality and institutional balance, including acting within the scope of functions; the principle of supervision and control with respect to subsidiary organs; the principle of stating reasons for decisions; the principle of procedural regularity to prevent inter alia abuse of discretionary powers and errors of fact or law; the principle of objectivity and impartiality, and the principle of due diligence.[163]

Privileges and immunities[164]

In order to carry out their functions more effectively, states and their representatives benefit from a variety of privileges and immunities. International organisations will also be entitled to the grant of privileges and immunities for their assets, properties and representatives. The two situations are not, of course, analogous in practice, since, for example, the basis of state immunities may be seen in terms of the sovereign equality of states and reciprocity, while this is not realistic with regard to organisations, both because they are not in a position of 'sovereign [163] See e.g. A. Momirov, Accountability of International Organizations in Post-Conflict Governance Missions, The Hague, 2005, and K. Wellens, 'The Primary Model Rules of Accountability of International Organizations: The Principles and Rules Governing Their Conduct or the Yardsticks for Their Accountability', in Proliferation of International Organizations (eds. N. M. Blokker and H. G. Schermers), Leiden, 2001, p. 433. See also the Recommended Rules and Practices drafted by the Committee on the Accountability of International Organisations and adopted in 2004 at the Berlin Conference of the International Law Association.

[164] See e.g. Klabbers, Introduction, chapter 8; Reinisch, International Organizations, pp. 127 ff.; Amerasinghe, Principles, chapter 10; E. Gaillard and I. Pingel-Lenuzza, 'International Organizations and Immunity from Jurisdiction: To Restrict or To Bypass', 51 ICLQ, 2002, p. 1; M. Singer, 'Jurisdictional Immunity of International Organizations: Human Rights and Functional Necessity Concerns', 36 Va. JIL, 1995, p. 53; C. W. Jenks, International Immunities, London, 1961; J. F. Lalive, 'L'Immunité de Juridiction et d'Execution des Organisations Internationales', 84 HR, 1953 III, p. 205; C. Dominicé, 'Le Nature et l'Étendue de l'Immunité des Organisations' in Festschrift Ignaz Seidl-Hohenveldern (ed. K. H. Böckstiegel), Cologne, 1988, p. 11; Nguyen Quoc Dinh, 'Les Privilèges et Immunités des Organisations Internationales d'après les Jurisprudences Nationales Depuis 1945', AFDI, 1957, p. 55; D. B. Michaels, International Privileges and Immunities, The Hague, 1971; Kirgis, International Organizations, pp. 26 ff.; Yearbook of the ILC, 1967, vol. II, pp. 154 ff.; DUSPIL, 1978, pp. 90 ff. and ibid., 1979, pp. 189 ff., and Morgenstern, Legal Problems, pp. 5–10.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

equality'[165] and because they are unable to grant (or withdraw) immunities as a reciprocal gesture. It is also the case that the immunities of states have been restricted in the light of the distinction between transactions jure imperii and jure gestionis,[166] while any such distinction in the case of international organisations would be inappropriate.[167] The true basis for the immunities accorded to international organisations is that they are necessitated by the effective exercise of their functions. This, of course, will raise the question as to how one is to measure the level of immunities in the light of such functional necessity.

As far as the UN itself is concerned, article 105 of the Charter notes that:

> (1) The Organization shall enjoy in the territory of each of its members such privileges and immunities as are necessary for the fulfilment of its purposes.
> (2) Representatives of the members of the United Nations and officials of the Organization shall similarly enjoy such privileges and immunities as are necessary for the independent exercise of their functions in connection with the Organization.[168]

These general provisions have been supplemented by the General Convention on the Privileges and Immunities of the United Nations, 1946, and by the Convention on Privileges and Immunities of the Specialised Agencies, 1947.[169] These general conventions, building upon provisions in the relevant constituent instruments, have themselves been supplemented by bilateral agreements, particularly the growing number of headquarters and host agreements. The UN, for example, has concluded headquarters agreements with the United States for the UN Headquarters in New [165] The reference, for example, in Branno v. Ministry of War 22 ILR, p. 756, to the 'sovereignty of NATO' is misleading.

[166] See above, chapter 13, p. 708.

[167] See R. Higgins, Problems and Process, Oxford, 1994, p. 93.

[168] Note that the provisions dealing with privileges and immunities of international financial institutions tend to be considerably more detailed: see e.g. article VII of the Articles of Agreement of the International Bank for Reconstruction and Development, article IX of the Articles of Agreement of the International Monetary Fund and articles 46 to 55 of the Constitution of the European Bank for Reconstruction and Development.

[169] This also contains separate draft annexes relating to each specialised agency. See also the Agreement on the Privileges and Immunities of the Organisation of American States, 1949; the General Agreement on the Privileges and Immunities of the Council of Europe, 1949 and the Protocol Concerning the Privileges and Immunities of the European Communities, 1965.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

York and with Switzerland for the UN Office in Geneva in 1947.[170] Such agreements, for example, provide for the application of local laws within the headquarters area subject to the application of relevant staff administrative regulations; the immunity of the premises and property of the organisation from search, requisition and confiscation and other forms of interference by the host state; exemption from local taxes except for utility charges and freedom of communication.[171]

The International Court noted in the Applicability of the Obligation to Arbitrate case,[172] which concerned US anti-terrorism legislation necessitating the closure of the PLO Observer Mission to the UN in New York, that the US was obliged to respect the obligation contained in section 21 of the UN Headquarters Agreement to enter into arbitration where a dispute had arisen concerning the interpretation and application of the Agreement. This was despite the US view that it was not certain a dispute had arisen, since the existence of an international dispute was a matter for objective determination.[173] The Court emphasised in particular that the provisions of a treaty prevail over the domestic law of a state party to that treaty.[174]

It is clearly the functional approach rather than any representational argument that forms the theoretical basis for the recognition of privileges and immunities with respect to international organisations. This point has been made in cases before domestic courts, but it is important to note that this concept includes the need for the preservation of the independence of the institution as against the state in whose territory it is operating. In Mendaro v. World Bank,[175] for example, the US Court of Appeals held that the reason for the granting of immunities to international organisations was to enable them to pursue their functions more effectively and in particular to permit organisations to operate free from unilateral control by a member state over their activities within its territory. In Iran–US Claims Tribunal v.

[170] See also the agreements with Austria, 1979, regarding the UN Vienna Centre; with Japan, 1976, regarding the UN University, and with Kenya, 1975, regarding the UN Environment Programme. Note also the various Status of Forces Agreements concluded by the UN with, for example, Egypt in 1957, the Congo in 1961 and Cyprus in 1964, dealing with matters such as the legal status, facilities, privileges and immunities of the UN peacekeeping forces.

[171] Similar agreements may cover regional offices of international organisations: see e.g. the Agreement between the World Health Organisation and Egypt, 1951 concerning a regional office of the organisation in that state.

[172] ICJ Reports, 1988, p. 12; 82 ILR, p. 225.

[173] ICJ Reports, 1988, pp. 27–30; 82 ILR, p. 245.

[174] ICJ Reports, 1988, pp. 33–4; 82 ILR, p. 251.

[175] 717 F.2d 610, 615–17 (1983); 99 ILR, pp. 92, 97–9.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

AS,[176] the Dutch Supreme Court pointed to the 'interest of the international organisation in having a guarantee that it will be able to perform its tasks independently and free from interferences under all circumstances' and noted that 'an international organisation is in principle not subject to the jurisdiction of the courts of the host state in respect of all disputes which are immediately connected with the performance of the tasks entrusted to the organisation in question'. The Italian Court of Cassation in FAO v. INPDAI[177] held that activities closely affecting the institutional purposes of the international organisation qualified for immunity, while the Employment Appeal Tribunal in Mukuro v. European Bank for Reconstruction and Development[178] stated that immunity from suit and legal process was justified on the ground that it was necessary for the fulfilment of the purposes of the bank in question, for the preservation of its independence and neutrality from control by or interference from the host state and for the effective and uninterrupted exercise of its multinational functions through its representatives. The Swiss Labour Court in ZM v. Permanent Delegation of the League of Arab States to the UN held that 'customary international law recognised that international organisations, whether universal or regional, enjoy absolute jurisdictional immunity . . . This privilege of international organisations arises from the purposes and functions assigned to them. They can only carry out their tasks if they are beyond the censure of the courts of member states or their headquarters.'[179]

The issue of the immunity of international organisations came before the European Court of Human Rights in Waite and Kennedy v. Germany, where the applicants complained that by granting immunity to an international organisation in an employment dispute, Germany had violated the Convention right of free access to a court under article 6(1). The European Court, however, declared that the attribution of privileges and immunities to international organisations was 'an essential means of ensuring the proper functioning of such organisations free from unilateral interference [176] 94 ILR, pp. 321, 329. See also Eckhardt v. Eurocontrol (No. 2), ibid., pp. 331, 337–8, where the District Court of Maastricht held that since an international organisation had been created by treaty by states, such organisation was entitled to immunity from jurisdiction on the grounds of customary international law to the extent necessary for the operation of its public service.

[177] 87 ILR, pp. 1, 6–7. See also Mininni v. Bari Institute, ibid., p. 28 and Sindacato UIL v. Bari Institute, ibid., p. 37.

[178] [1994] ICR 897, 903. See also the European Molecular Biology Laboratory Arbitration 105 ILR, p. 1.

[179] 116 ILR, pp. 643, 647.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

by individual governments' and that the requirements of article 6 would be satisfied where there existed reasonable alternative means to protect effectively the rights in question under the Convention and a satisfactory system of dispute settlement in the relevant international instruments.[180] It may be that such alternative dispute settlement requirements are not essential where the relevant international agreement providing for the immunities in question pre-dated the European Convention on Human Rights, but this should be regarded as controversial.[181]

Immunities may be granted to the representatives of states to the organisation, to the officials of the organisation and to the organisation itself. As far as the position of representatives of states to international organisations is concerned, article IV, section 11, of the UN General Convention, 1946 provides for the following privileges and immunities:

(a) immunity from personal arrest or detention and from seizure of their personal baggage, and in respect of words spoken or written and all acts done by them in their capacity as representatives, immunity from legal process of every kind;
(b) inviolability for all papers and documents;
(c) the right to use codes and to receive papers or correspondence by courier or in sealed bags;
(d) exemption in respect of themselves and their spouses from immigration restrictions, alien registration or national service obligations in the state they are visiting or through which they are passing in the exercise of their functions;
(e) the same facilities in respect of currency or exchange restrictions as are accorded to representatives of foreign governments on temporary official missions;
(f) the same immunities and facilities in respect of their personal baggage as are accorded to diplomatic envoys; and also
(g) such other privileges, immunities and facilities not inconsistent with the foregoing as diplomatic envoys enjoy, except that they shall have no right to claim exemption from customs duties on goods imported (otherwise than as part of their personal baggage) or from excise duties or sales taxes.

[180] Judgment of 18 February 1999, paras. 63 and 67 ff.; 116 ILR, pp. 121, 134, and see Beer and Regan v. Germany, European Court of Human Rights, Judgment of 18 February 1999, paras. 53 ff. See also Consortium X v. Swiss Federal Government, Swiss Federal Supreme Court, 1st Civil Law Chamber, 2 July 2004 and Entico Corporation v. UNESCO [2008] EWHC 531 (Comm).

[181] See e.g. Entico Corporation v. UNESCO [2008] EWHC 531 (Comm).

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

Article IV, section 14 provides that such privileges and immunites are accorded > in order to safeguard the independent exercise of their functions in connection with the United Nations. Consequently a Member not only has the right but is under a duty to waive the immunity of its representative in any case where in the opinion of the Member the immunity would impede the course of justice, and it can be waived without prejudice to the purpose for which the immunity is accorded.[182]

One particular issue that has arisen and appears to have received no definitive determination relates to the competence of the host state under customary international law to seek unilaterally to withdraw the immunities of a state representative to an international organisation where relevant international agreements are unclear.[183] The matter was the subject of an application to the International Court of Justice by the Commonwealth of Dominica against Switzerland in 2006, complaining that the latter state had terminated the appointment of a Head of Mission accredited by the applicant to the UN and specialised agencies (but not to Switzerland).[184] However, the application was subsequently withdrawn.[185]

The question of the privileges and immunities of representatives, however, is invariably addressed in headquarters agreements between [182] Article IV, section 16 provides that the term 'representatives' is deemed to include 'all delegates, deputy delegates, advisers, technical experts and secretaries of delegations'. The question of the representation of states to international organisations is also dealt with in the 1975 Vienna Convention on the Representation of States in their Relations with International Organisations of a Universal Character, which is closely modelled on the 1961 Vienna Convention on Diplomatic Relations, although it has been criticised by a number of host states for permitting more extensive privileges and immunities than is required in the light of functional necessity. See DUSPIL, 1975, pp. 38 ff. Article 30 of the Convention, in particular, provides that the head of mission and the members of the diplomatic staff of the mission shall enjoy immunity from the criminal jurisdiction of the host state and immunity from its civil and administrative jurisdiction, except in cases of real action relating to private immovable property situated in the host state (unless held on behalf of the sending state for the purposes of the mission); actions relating to succession and actions relating to any professional or commercial activity exercised by the person in question in the host state outside his official functions. See also above, chapter 13, p. 764.

[183] Note that some conventions permit this: see, for example, article VII, section 25 of the Convention on the Immunities of Specialised Agencies. See also Amerasinghe, Principles, pp. 338 ff.

[184] This application dated 26 April 2006 was precipitated by the case of A v. B, Swiss Federal Supreme Court, 1st Civil Law Chamber, 8 April 2004, no. 4C.140/2003.

[185] See ICJ, Order of 9 June 2006. The case was entitled 'case concerning the status vis-à-vis the host state of a diplomatic envoy to the United Nations'.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

international organisations and host states. Article V, section 15 of the UN Headquarters Agreement, 1947, for example, states that representatives[186] are entitled in the territory of the US 'to the same privileges and immunities, subject to corresponding conditions and obligations, as it accords to diplomatic envoys accredited to it'.[187]

Secondly, privileges and immunities are granted to the officials of the organisation. Article V, section 18 of the UN Convention provides that officials of the UN are immune from legal process in respect of words spoken or written and all acts performed by them in their official capacity; exempt from taxation on the salaries and emoluments paid to them by the United Nations; immune from national service obligations; and immune, together with their spouses and relatives dependent on them, from immigration restrictions and alien registration. They also have the right to import free of duty their furniture and effects at the time of first taking up their post in the country in question. In addition, the Secretary-General and all Assistant Secretaries-General are accorded in respect of themselves, their spouses and minor children, the privileges and immunities exemptions and facilities accorded to diplomatic envoys, in accordance with international law.[188] Further, section 20 provides that privileges and immunities are granted to officials in the interests of the United Nations and not for the personal benefit of the individuals themselves. The Secretary-General has the right and the duty to waive the immunity of any official in any case where, in his opinion, the immunity would impede the course of justice and can be waived without prejudice to the interests of the United Nations. In the case of the Secretary-General, the Security Council shall have the right to waive immunity.

Experts performing missions for the UN are also granted a range of privileges and immunities, such as are necessary for the independent exercise of their functions during the period of their missions, including the time spent on journeys in connection with their missions. In particular they are accorded immunity from personal arrest or detention and from seizure of their personal baggage; immunity from legal process in respect of words spoken or written and acts done by them in the course of the performance of their mission; inviolability for all papers and documents; for the purpose of their communications with the United Nations, the right to use codes and to receive papers or correspondence by courier or [186] These are defined in article V, section 15(1)–(4).

[187] See also Third US Restatement of Foreign Relations Law, pp. 518 ff.
[188] Section 19.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

in sealed bags; and the same immunities and facilities in respect of their personal baggage as are accorded to diplomatic envoys.[189]

The question of the immunities of persons on mission for the UN has come before the International Court in a couple of cases. The International Court delivered an advisory opinion concerning the applicability of provisions in the UN General Convention to special rapporteurs appointed by the Sub-Commission on the Prevention of Discrimination and the Protection of Minorities.[190] As noted above, article VI, section 22, of the Convention provides that experts performing missions for the United Nations are to be accorded such privileges and immunities as are necessary for the independent exercise of their functions during the periods of their missions. The International Court noted that such privileges and immunities could indeed be invoked against the state of nationality or of residence[191] and that special rapporteurs for the Sub-Commission were to be regarded as experts on missions within the meaning of section 22.[192] The privileges and immunities that would apply would be those that were necessary for the exercise of their functions, and in particular for the establishment of any contacts which may be useful for the preparation, the drafting and the presentation of their reports to the Sub-Commission.[193]

The issue was revisited in the Immunity from Legal Process advisory opinion of the International Court which concerned the question of the immunity from legal process in Malaysia of Mr Cumaraswamy, a Special Rapporteur of the UN Commission of Human Rights on the Independence of Judges and Lawyers.[194] The Court confirmed that article VI, section 22 applied to Mr Cumaraswamy who, as Special Rapporteur, had been entrusted with a mission by the UN and was therefore an expert [189] Article VI, section 22. Section 23 provides that privileges and immunities are granted in the interests of the United Nations and not for the personal benefit of the individuals themselves and the Secretary-General has the right and the duty to waive the immunity of any expert in any case where, in his opinion, the immunity would impede the course of justice and it can be waived without prejudice to the interests of the United Nations.

[190] Applicability of Article VI, Section 22, of the Convention on the Privileges and Immunities of the United Nations, ICJ Reports, 1989, p. 177; 85 ILR, p. 300. This opinion was requested by the Economic and Social Council, its first request for an Advisory Opinion under article 96(2) of the UN Charter.

[191] In the absence of a reservation by the state concerned, ICJ Reports, 1989, pp. 195–6; 85 ILR, pp. 322–3.

[192] This applied even though the rapporteur concerned was not, or was no longer, a member of the Sub-Commission, since such a person is entrusted by the Sub-Commission with a research mission, ICJ Reports, 1989, pp. 196–7; 85 ILR, pp. 323–4.

[193] Ibid.

[194] ICJ Reports, 1999, p. 62; 121 ILR, p. 405.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

within the terms of the section. The Court held that he was entitled to immunity with regard to the words spoken by him during the course of an interview that was published in a journal and that, in deciding whether an expert on mission was entitled to immunity in particular circumstances, the UN Secretary-General had a 'pivotal role'.[195] The Court concluded by stating that the government of Malaysia had an obligation under article 105 of the Charter and under the General Convention to inform its courts of the position taken by the Secretary-General. Failure to do so rendered the state liable under international law.[196]

Thirdly, privileges and immunities are granted to the organisation itself. The range of privileges and immunities usually extended includes immunity from jurisdiction; inviolability of premises and archives; currency and fiscal privileges and freedom of communications.[197] In the case of immunity from jurisdiction, article II, section 2 of the UN General Convention, 1946 provides that:

> The United Nations, its property and assets wherever located and by whomsoever held, shall enjoy immunity from every form of legal process except insofar as in any particular case it has expressly waived its immunity. It is, however, understood that no waiver of immunity shall extend to any measure of execution.[198]

One question that has arisen is whether such immunity is absolute or, as is the case now with state immunity, a distinction between sovereign or public acts (jure imperii) on the one hand and private acts (jure gestionis) on the other can be drawn. However, the analogy with state immunity is inappropriate. International organisations do not exercise sovereign power nor is the theoretical basis of reciprocity arguable. International organisations are not states, but entities created in order to perform particular functions. In any event, relevant treaties do not make a distinction between sovereign or public acts and private acts in the case of international organisations and such a distinction cannot be inferred. Amerasinghe has, indeed, concluded that such a distinction is not justified and [196] Ibid., pp. 87–8. The Court also affirmed that questions of immunity were preliminary issues to be decided expeditiously in limine litis, ibid., p. 88. This is the same position as immunity claims before domestic courts: see above, chapter 13, p. 700.

[195] ICJ Reports, 1999, pp. 84 and 87.

[197] In all cases, the relevant agreements need to be examined as particular privileges and immunities may vary.

[198] See also article III, section 4 of the Specialised Agencies Convention, 1947. See Amerasinghe, Principles, pp. 320 ff.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

that the key to immunity for international organisations is whether the immunity is necessary for the fulfilment of the organisation's functions and purposes.[199] It should also be noted that international organisations benefit from immunity from execution or enforcement, which means that their property or other assets cannot be seized, while a waiver of immunity from jurisdiction, which must be express, does not encompass a waiver of immunity from execution which would have to be given separately and expressly.[200]

Immunity will also cover inviolability of premises and archives.[201] This is particularly important for the effective operation of international organisations. Article II, section 3 of the UN Convention, for example, provides that,

> The premises of the Untied Nations shall be inviolable. The property and assets of the United Nations, wherever located and by whomsoever held, shall be immune from search, requisition, confiscation, expropriation and any other form of interference, whether by executive, administrative, judicial or legislative action, while section 4 provides that, 'The archives of the United Nations, and in general all documents belonging to it or held by it, shall be inviolable wherever located.'[202] Similar provisions exist in all relevant agreements concerning international organisations. The inviolability of premises means that the authorities of a state cannot enter without the permission of the administrative head of the organisation even where a crime has been committed there or in order to arrest a person. Further, the host state is under [199] Principles, p. 322. Note, however, that many international financial institutions, such as the International Bank for Reconstruction and Development, known as the World Bank (but not the International Monetary Fund), expressly qualify immunity and permit actions to be brought against them, particularly with regard to applications founded on loan agreements in the case of the World Bank: see article VII of the Articles of Agreement of the International Bank for Reconstruction and Development and Lutcher SA v. Inter-American Development Bank 382 F.2d 454 (1967) and Mendaro v. World Bank 717 F.2d 610 (1983); 92 ILR, p. 92. Note also article 6 of the Headquarters Agreement between the UK and the International Maritime Satellite Organisation, 1980. See also Amerasinghe, Principles, pp. 320 ff.

[200] See e.g. article II, section 2 of the UN Convention. See also Singer, 'Jurisdictional Immunity', pp. 72 ff.

[201] See Amerasinghe, Principles, pp. 330 ff.

[202] See also article II, section 5 of the Convention on the Privileges and Immunities of Specialised Agencies, 1947. Note that in Shearson Lehman v. Maclaine Watson (No. 2) [1988] 1 WLR 16; 77 ILR, p. 145, the House of Lords held that the inviolability of official documents could be lost as a result of communication to third parties.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

a duty of due diligence with regard to the protection of the premises in question. However, the premises remain under the general jurisdiction of the host state, subject to the immunity described. Accordingly, a crime committed on the premises may be prosecuted in the local courts.[203]

Immunity also includes certain currency and fiscal privileges, such as exemption from direct taxation with regard to the assets, income and property of the organisation and from customs dues. Organisations may also be permitted to hold and transfer funds and other financial assets freely.[204] Freedom of official communications equal to that provided to foreign governments is also usually stipulated with regard to international organisations, including freedom from censorship, while the right to send and receive correspondence by courier and bag, on the same basis as diplomatic couriers and diplomatic bags, is also provided for.[205]

International agreements concerning privileges and immunities have been implemented into domestic law by specific legislation in a number of states where there is no automatic incorporation of ratified treaties, examples being the UK International Organisations Act 1968[206] and the US International Organisations Immunities Act 1945.[207] The usual pattern under such legislation is for the general empowering provisions contained in those Acts to be applied to named international organisations by specific secondary acts. In the case of the International Organisations Act 1968, for example, a wide variety of organisations have had privileges and immunities conferred upon them by Order in Council.[208] In the case of [203] See Amerasinghe, Principles, pp. 330 ff.

[204] Ibid., p. 335. See also article II, sections 5 and 7 of the UN Convention and article III, sections 7 and 9 of the Specialised Agencies Convention.

[205] See article III, sections 9 and 10 of the UN Convention and article IV, sections 11 and 12 of the Specialised Agencies Convention. See also Amerasinghe, Principles, pp. 335 ff.

[206] Replacing the International Organisations (Immunities and Privileges) Act 1950. The International Organisations Act 1981 inter alia extended the 1968 Act to commonwealth organisations and to international commodity organisations and permitted the extension of privileges and immunities to states' representatives attending conferences in the UK. See also the International Organisations Act 2005.

[207] See also Legislative Texts and Treaty Provisions Concerning the Legal Status, Privileges and Immunities of International Organizations, ST/LEG/SER.B/10 and 11.

[208] See e.g. the African Development Bank, SI 1983/142; Council of Europe, SI 1960/442; European Patent Organisation, SI 1978/179 and SI 1980/1096; International Maritime and Satellite Organisation, SI 1980/187; NATO, SI 1974/1257 and SI 1975/1209, and the UN, SI 1974/1261 and SI 1975/1209. An examination of Orders in Council would demonstrate the following privileges and immunities: immunity from suit and legal process; inviolability of official archives and premises; exemption or relief from taxes and rates, but not import taxes except where the goods or publications are imported or exported for official use; various reliefs with regard to car tax and VAT (value added tax) with regard to cars or

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

the US Act, the same process is normally conducted by means of Executive Orders.[209]

Dissolution[210]

The constitutions of some international organisations contain express provisions with regard to dissolution. Article VI(5) of the Articles of Agreement of the International Bank for Reconstruction and Development (the World Bank), for example, provides for dissolution by a vote of the majority of Governors exercising a majority of total voting, and detailed provisions are made for consequential matters. Payment of creditors and claims, for instance, will have precedence over asset distribution, while the distribution of assets will take place on a proportional basis to shareholding. Different organisations with such express provisions take different positions with regard to the type of majority required for dissolution. In the case of the European Bank for Reconstruction and Development, for example, a majority of two-thirds of the members and three-quarters of the total voting power is required. A simple majority vote is sufficient in the case of the International Monetary Fund, and a majority of member states coupled with a majority of votes is necessary in the case of the International Bank for Reconstruction and Development. Where an organisation has been established for a limited period, the constitution will invariably provide for dissolution upon the expiry of that period.[211] Where there are no specific provisions concerning dissolution, goods destined for official use, and priority to be given to telecommunications to and from the UN Secretary-General, the heads of principal organs of the UN and the President of the International Court: see also the International Organisations Act 1968, Schedule I. See also sections 2–7 of the US International Organisations Immunities Act 1945.

209 See e.g. the Executive Order 12359 of 22 April 1980 designating the Multi-National Force and Observers as a public international organisation under s. 1 of the 1945 Act entitled to enjoy the privileges, exemptions and immunities conferred by that Act. See also Executive Order 12403 of 8 February 1983 with regard to the African Development Bank; Executive Order 12467 of 2 March 1984 with regard to the International Boundary and Water Commission, US and Mexico; Executive Order 12628 of 8 March 1988 with regard to the UN Industrial Development Organisation, and Executive Order 12647 of 2 August 1988 with regard to the Multilateral Investment Guarantee Agency. See further Cumulative DUSPIL 1981–8, Washington, 1993, vol. I, pp. 330 ff.

210 See e.g. Amerasinghe, Principles, chapter 15; Klabbers, Introduction, chapter 15, and Schermers and Blokker, International Institutional Law, pp. 1015 ff. See also C. W. Jenks, 'Some Constitutional Problems of International Organizations', 22 BYIL, 1945, p. 11, and Bowett's International Institutions, pp. 526 ff.

211 This applies particularly to commodity organisations: see e.g. the International Tin Agreement, 1981; the Natural Rubber Agreement, 1987 and the International Sugar Agreement, 1992.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

it is likely that an organisation may be dissolved by the decision of its highest representative body.[212] The League of Nations, for example, was dissolved by a decision taken by the Assembly without the need for individual assent by each member[213] and a similar process was adopted with regard to other organisations.[214] It is unclear whether unanimity is needed or whether the degree of majority required under the constitution of the particular organisation for the determination of important questions[215] would suffice.[216] The actual process of liquidating the assets and dealing with the liabilities of dissolved organisations is invariably laid down by the organisation itself, either in the constitutional documents or by special measures adopted on dissolution.

Succession[217]

Succession between international organisations takes place when the functions and (usually) the rights and obligations are transferred from one organisation to another. This may occur by way of straightforward replacement,[218] or by absorption,[219] or by merger, or by effective secession of part of an organisation, or by simple transfer of certain functions from one organisation to another.[220] This is achieved by agreement and is dependent upon the constitutional competence of the successor organisation

[212] See Amerasinghe, Principles, p. 468, and Schermers and Blokker, International Institutional Law, p. 1024.

[213] In fact the decision was taken unanimously by the thirty-five members present, ten members being absent: see e.g. H. McKinnon Wood, 'Dissolution of the League of Nations', 23 BYIL, 1946, p. 317.

[214] See e.g. the dissolutions of the International Meteorological Organisation; the UN Relief and Rehabilitation Administration; the International Refugee Organisation; the International Commission for Air Navigation; the South East Asian Treaty Organisation and the Latin American Free Trade Association: see Schermers and Blokker, International Institutional Law, pp. 1024–5.

[215] E.g. the two-thirds majority required under article 18 of the UN Charter for the General Assembly's determination of important questions.

[216] Organisations may be dissolved where the same parties to the treaty establishing the organisations enter a new agreement or possibly by disuse or more controversially as a result of changed circumstances (rebus sic stantibus): see Schermers and Blokker, International Institutional Law, pp. 1021–8.

[217] See Amerasinghe, Principles, pp. 473 ff.; Schermers and Blokker, International Institutional Law, pp. 1015 ff.; H. Chiu, 'Succession in International Organizations', 14 ICLQ, 1965, p. 83, and P. R. Myers, Succession between International Organizations, London, 1993.

[218] Such as the replacement of the League of Nations by the United Nations.

[219] E.g. the absorption of the International Bureau of Education by UNESCO.

[220] See Amerasinghe, Principles, pp. 474 ff.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

to perform the functions thus transferred of the former organisation. In certain circumstances, succession may proceed by way of implication in the absence of express provision.[221] The precise consequences of such succession will depend upon the agreement concerned between the parties in question.[222] In general, assets of the predecessor organisation will go to the successor organisation, as well as archives.[223] Whether the same rule applies to debts is unclear.[224]

Suggestions for further reading

J. E. Alvarez, International Organizations as Law-Makers, Oxford, 2005

C. F. Amerasinghe, Principles of the Institutional Law of International Organizations, 2nd edn, Cambridge, 2005

Bowett's Law of International Institutions (eds. P. Sands and P. Klein), 5th edn, London, 2001

J. Klabbers, An Introduction to International Institutional Law, Cambridge, 2002

D. Sarooshi, International Organizations and their Exercise of Sovereign Powers, Oxford, 2005

H. G. Schermers and N. M. Blokker, International Institutional Law, 3rd edn, The Hague, 1995

[221] The International Court in the Status of South-West Africa case, ICJ Reports, 1950, pp. 128, 134–7; 17 ILR, pp. 47, 51–5, held that the supervisory responsibilities of South Africa under the mandate to administer the territory of South West Africa/Namibia continued beyond the dissolution of the League of Nations and were in essence succeeded to by the UN. This was in the context of the fact that the mandate itself constituted an international status for the territory which therefore continued irrespective of the existence of the League and partly because the resolution of the Assembly of the League dissolving the League of Nations had declared that the supervisory functions of the League were ending, not the mandates themselves. It was emphasised that the obligation to submit to supervision did not disappear merely because the supervisory organ had ceased to exist as the UN performed similar, though not identical, supervisory functions. The Court concluded that the UN General Assembly was legally qualified to exercise these supervisory functions, in the light inter alia of articles 10 and 80 of the UN Charter. This was reaffirmed by the Court in the Namibia case, ICJ Reports, 1971, pp. 16, 37; 49 ILR, pp. 2, 26–34.

[222] See Schermers and Blokker, International Institutional Law, p. 1017 with regard to the relationship between the World Trade Organisation and the General Agreement on Tarrifs and Trade (GATT) arrangements.

[223] See e.g. PAU v. American Security and Trust Company, US District Court for the District of Columbia, 18 ILR, p. 441.

[224] See e.g. Klabbers, Introduction, pp. 329–30.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

SOME USEFUL INTERNATIONAL LAW WEBSITES

See also web references in chapter footnotes

General sites (with links to relevant materials)

www.washlaw.edu/forint/forintmain.html The foreign and international law web of the Washburn University School of Law Library www.asil.org/resource/home.htm Electronic resource guide of the American Society of International Law www.llrx.com/international law.html Web journal research guide www.lib.uchicago.edu/~llou/forintlaw.html LyonetteLouis-Jacques guide to international law research, University of Chicago

www.law.ecel.uwa.edu.au/intlaw/ University of Western Australia guide to international law resources www2.spfo.unibo.it/spolfo/ILMAIN.htm University of Bologna research guide to international law www.law.cam.ac.uk/RCIL/home.htm Lauterpacht Research Centre for International Law

www.worldlii.org/catalog/ World Law site www.hg.org/govt.html Hieros Gamos law links library.ukc.ac.uk/library/lawlinks/international.htm University of Kent law links www.bibl.ulaval.ca/ress/droit/bouton8.html University of Laval, French Canadian site on international law

www.ridi.org/ French resource for international law generally

This listing excludes subscription services. The links were correct at the date of writing. No responsibility is undertaken as to their continued existence or accuracy.

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

www.un.org/law United Nations site dealing with international law generally www4.worldbank.org/legal/lawlibrary.html World Bank Law Library, including links to international organisations, treaties and legal topics

www.un.org/law/ilc/ International Law Commission

www.icc-cpi.int/legaltools ICC Legal Tools (these deal mostly with international criminal law, but also with general international law, human rights law, humanitarian law and national implementation)

www.asil.org/resource/home.htm ASIL Guide for Electronic Resources for International Law www.llrx.com/international_law.html Law & Technology Resources for Legal Professions (International Law Guide) www2.lib.uchicago.edu/~llou/forintlaw.html University of Chicago Library (Legal Research on International Law Issues Using the Internet)

www2.spfo.unibo.it/spolfo/ILMAIN.htm University of Bologna (Research Guide to International Law on the Internet)

www.lcil.cam.ac.uk/ The Lauterpacht Centre for International Law, University of Cambridge www.worldlii.org/catalog/ World Law

www.hg.org/govt.html HG.org Worldwide Legal Directories www.bibl.ulaval.ca/mieux/chercher/portails/droit/ droit_international Université Laval www.ridi.org/ Réseau Internet pour le Droit International www.un.org/law/ United Nations (International Law)

History of international law

www.yale.edu/lawweb/avalon/avalon.htm Yale University Avalon Project – historical documents

Sources

Treaties (see also Treaties)

http://untreaty.un.org/ UN treaty site

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

Cases (see also International courts and tribunals)

www.virtual-institute.de/en/wcd/wcd.cfm Max Planck Institute World Court digest

www.jura.uni-duesseldorf.de/rave/e/englhome.asp Index to court decisions and journal articles

Sources and evidence of custom/state practice/development of international law (see also International law and municipal law)

www.un.org/law/ilc/ International Law Commission

www.uncitral.org/en-index.htm UN Commission on International Trade Law www.gksoft.com/govt/en/ Links to government websites

Writings

www.jura.uni-duesseldorf.de/rave/e/englhome.asp Index to court decisions and journal articles

www.ejil.org/ and www3.oup.co.uk/ejilaw/ European Journal of International Law http://stu.findlaw.com/journals/international.html International law journals

www.srdi.ws/ Summary of international law journals (French)

International law and municipal law

National constitutions and legislation

www.oefre.unibe.ch/law/icl/index.html International constitutional law site from University of Berne www.findlaw.com/01topics/06constitutional/03forconst/ index.html World constitutions www.legislation.hmso.gov.uk/ UK legislation

www.hmso.gov.uk/stat.htm UK statutory instruments

www.bailii.org/ British and Irish legal information – cases and legislation

http://thomas.loc.gov/ US legislation

www.canlii.org/ Canadian legal materials

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

www.llrx.com/features/canadian3.htm Canadian law

www.journal-officiel.gouv.fr/ French legislation

www.llrx.com/features/frenchlaw.htm French law

www.austlii.org/ Australian legal materials

www.worldlii.org/ Materials from other jurisdictions

http://jurist.law.pitt.edu/world/index.htm Links to national laws

National cases

www.courtserve2.net/index.htm UK cases

www.bailii.org/ British and Irish legal information – cases and legislation

www.scotcourts.gov.uk/ Scottish cases http://supct.law.cornell.edu/supct/index.php US Supreme Court cases http://europa.eu.int/comm/justice_home/ejn/index_en.htm European Judicial Network in civil and commercial law www.coe.fr/venice/links-e.htm Venice Commission links to national constitutional courts

Human rights (See also International humanitarian law)

International human rights

www.un.org/rights/index.html UN human rights

www.unhchr.ch/ UN High Commissioner for Human Rights

www1.umn.edu/humanrts/ University of Minnesota human rights library

http://humanrights.britishcouncil.org/newsite2/frameset.asp?CatID=1&CatName=News&GroupID=3&GroupName=World&UserID= British Council's human rights network www.law-lib.utoronto.ca/diana/ Women's human rights resources www.amnesty.org/ Amnesty International www.un.org/law/icc/ International Criminal Court

www.iccnow.org/ International Criminal Court materials

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

www.icty.org/ International Criminal Tribunal for the Former Yugoslavia

www.ictr.org/ International Criminal Tribunal for Rwanda

Regional human rights

www.echr.coe.int/ European Court of Human Rights www.cpt.coe.int/en/ European Committee for the Prevention of Torture www.coe.int/t/E/human rights/ecri/ European Commission against Racism and Intolerance www.ecmi.de/doc/index.html European Centre for Minority Issues www.achpr.org/ African Commission for Human and Peoples' Rights www1.umn.edu/humanrts/africa/comcases/allcases.html Decisions of African Commission www1.umn.edu/humanrts/cases/commissn.htm Inter-American Commission on Human Rights www1.umn.edu/humanrts/iachr/iachr.html Inter-American Court of Human Rights www.corteidh.or.cr/ Official site for Inter-American Court of Human Rights www.cidh.oas.org/ Official site for Inter-American Commission www.gwdg.de/~ujvr/hrch/hrch.htm Human Rights Chamber, Bosnia Territory

www-ibru.dur.ac.uk/ International Boundaries Research Unit, University of Durham

http://garnet.acns.fsu.edu/~phensel/territory.html general boundary links www.antdiv.gov.au/default.asp?casid=76 Antarctica site of Australian government

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

Air and space law

www.iasl.mcgill.ca/ McGill University Institute of Air and Space Law

www.icao.int/ International Civil Aviation Organisation www.oosa.unvienna.org/SpaceLaw/spacelaw.htm UN international space law site www.fas.org/spp/civil/russia/pol docs.htm Russian space policy documents

www.nasa.gov/ NASA

www.esa.int/export/esaCP/index.html European Space Agency

Law of the sea

www.un.org/Depts/los/index.htm UN site dealing with law of the sea issues

www.oceanlaw.org/ Council on Ocean Law site

Treaties

www.yale.edu/lawweb/avalon/avalon.htm University of Yale Avalon Project

http://fletcher.tufts.edu/multilaterals.html University of Tufts Fletcher School Multilaterals Project

http://untreaty.un.org/ UN treaty site

http://conventions.coe.int/ Council of Europe treaty site www.state.gov/s/l/c8455.htm US treaties in force site www.fco.gov.uk/servlet/Front?pagename=OpenMarket/Xcelerate/ShowPage&c=Page&cid=1007029396014 UK Foreign Office treaty site www.austlii.edu.au/au/other/dfat/ Australian Treaties Library

International environmental law

www.ipcc.ch/ Intergovernmental Panel on Climate Change, established by WMO and UNEP

http://unfccc.int/ UN Framework Convention on Climate Change

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

www.internationalwaterlaw.org/ International Water Law Project

www.iaea.org/worldatom/ IAEA

www.nea.fr/ OECD Nuclear Energy Agency

www.un.org/esa/sustdev/ UN Commission on Sustainable Development

http://iisdl.iisd.ca/ International Institute for Sustainable Development

International courts and tribunals (see also Human rights) www.pict-pcti.org/home.html International Courts and Tribunals Project site www.icj-cij.org/ International Court of Justice www.itlos.org/ International Tribunal for the Law of the Sea

http://pca-cpa.org/ Permanent Court of Arbitration

http://europa.eu.int/cj/en/index.htm European Court of Justice and Court of First Instance www.eca.eu.int/EN/menu.htm European Court of Auditors http://wbln0018.worldbank.org/ipn/ipnweb.nsf World Bank Inspection Panels www.bicusa.org/mdbs/wbg/inspectionpanel/ World Bank Inspection Panel http://untreaty.un.org/ola-internet/unat.htm UN Administrative Tribunal www.worldbank.org/icsid/ International Centre for the Settlement of Investment Disputes www.iccwbo.org/index court.asp International Chamber of Commerce dispute resolution www.iusct.org/index-english.html Iran–US Claims Tribunal

www.unog.ch/uncc/ UN Compensation Commission (Iraq)

www.tas-cas.org/ Court of Arbitration for Sport

www.ccj.org.ni/ Central American Court of Justice www.wto.org/english/tratop_e/dispu_e/dispu_e.htm WTO dispute settlement

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

International terrorism

http://jurist.law.pitt.edu/terrorism.htm terrorism

www.un.org/terrorism UN website on terrorism

www.undcp.org/odccp/terrorism.html UN Office on Drugs and Crime terrorism programme www.un.org/Docs/sc/committees/1373/ Counter-Terrorism Committee of the Security Council

http://europa.eu.int/comm/justice home/news/terrorism/documents/index en.htm EU and terrorism materials

International humanitarian law

www.ihlresearch.org/portal/ihli/portalhome.php International humanitarian law research site www.icrc.org/ International Committee of the Red Cross www1.umn.edu/humanrts/instree/auoy.htm University of Minnesota international humanitarian law www.yale.edu/lawweb/avalon/lawofwar/lawwar.htm University of Yale Avalon Project laws of war www.yale.edu/lawweb/avalon/imt/imt.htm Nuremberg war crimes trials http://fas-www.harvard.edu/~hsp/ Chemical and biological weapons site www.sipri.se/ Stockholm International Peace Research Institute

http://ourworld.compuserve.com/homepages/Aspals/Homepage.htm Military law site

International institutions

General

www.uia.org/extlinks/pub.php Links to international organisations

www.un.org/ United Nations

www.wto.org WTO

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

Specialised agencies

www.imo.org/home.asp International Maritime Organisation

http://ilo.org/ ILO

http://who.org/ WHO

www.fao.org/ Food and Agriculture Organisation

Regional organisations

www.nato.int/sfor/index.htm SFOR

www.nato.int/kfor/welcome.html KFOR www.weu.int/ WEU

www.oecd.org/ OECD

www.coe.int/ Council of Europe

http://europa.eu.int/ EU

www.arableagueonline.org/arableague/index en.jsp Arab League

www.africa-union.org/ African Union

www.aseansec.org/ Association of South East Asian Nations (ASEAN)

www.sadc.int/index.php?lang=english&path=&page=index SADC

www.ecowas.int/ ECOWAS

www.iss.co.za/AF/RegOrg/unity_to_union/ecowas.html ECOWAS documents

www.oas.org/default.htm OAS

www.al-bab.com/arab/docs/league.htm Arab League

www.nato.int/ NATO

www.osce.org/ OSCE

www.nafta-sec-alena.org/english/index.htm NAFTA

www.mercosur.org.uy/ Mercosur

www.ohr.int/ High Representative of Bosnia and Herzegovina

International Criminal Law

www.icc-cpi.int International Criminal Court

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

www.un.org/icty International Criminal Tribunal for the Former Yugoslavia www.sc-sl.org Special Court for Sierra Leone www.eccc.gov.kh Extraordinary Chambers in the Courts of Cambodia

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

INDEX

Abbreviations used in the index

ACHPR (African Charter on Human and Peoples' Rights (1981)) (Banjul Charter)
ACHR (American Convention on Human Rights (1969))
ACY (Arbitration Commission of the European Conference on Yugoslavia)
AMIS (African Mission in the Sudan)
AMISOM (African Mission to Somalia)
ASEAN (Association of South East Asian Nations)
AU (African Union)
Banjul Charter (African Charter on Human and Peoples' Rights (1981))
BITs (bilateral investment treaties)
CARICOM (Association of Caribbean States)
CEDAW (Convention on the Elimination of All Forms of Discrimination Against Women) (1979)
CERD (Committee on the Elimination of Racial Discrimination)
CFCs (chlorofluorocarbons)
CFSP (Common Foreign and Security Policy)
CIS (Commonwealth of Independent States)
COCOM (Coordinating Committee for Multilateral Export Controls)
CoE (Council of Europe)
COMECON (Council for Mutual Economic Assistance)
Comesa (Common Market for Eastern and Southern Africa)
CRC (Convention on the Rights of the Child (1989))
CSCE (Conference on Security and Co-operation in Europe)
Draft Code of Offences (ILC Draft Code of Offences against the Peace and Security of Mankind (1954))
DSB (WTO Dispute Settlement Body)
DSU (WTO Dispute Settlement Understanding)
EAPC (Euro-Atlantic Partnership Council)
EBRD (European Bank for Reconstruction and Development)
EC (European Community)
ECAFE (Economic Commission for Asia and the Far East)
ECHR (European Convention on Human Rights (1950))
ECJ (European Court of Justice)
ECOMOG (ECOWAS Monitoring Group)
ECOSOC (Economic and Social Council)
ECOWAS (Economic Community of West African States)
ECSC (European Coal and Steel Community)
ECtHR (European Court of Human Rights)
EDC (Enforced Disappearances Convention (2006))
EEZ (exclusive economic zone)
EFTA (European Free Trade Area)

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

EIA (environmental impact assessment)
EMEP (Cooperative Programme on long-range transmission of air pollutants in Europe)
EMU (European Monetary Union)
ESC (European Social Charter (1961))
EU (European Union)
EUFOR (EU Force in Yugoslavia)
EULEX (EU Rule of Law Mission in Kosovo)
FAO (Food and Agriculture Organisation)
FRG (Federal Republic of Germany)
FRY (Federal Republic of Yugoslavia)
FTC (NAFTA Free Trade Commission)
GATS (General Agreement on Trade in Services)
GATT (General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade (1947/1994))
GC (Geneva Humanitarian Conventions (1949))
GCHS (Geneva Convention on the High Seas (1958))
GCTS (Geneva Convention on the Territorial Sea (1958))
GDR (German Democratic Republic)
GEF (Global Environmental Facility)
'grave breach' (grave breaches as identified by the Geneva Conventions (1949))
IAComHR (Inter-American Commission on Human Rights)
IACtHR (Inter-American Court of Human Rights)
IAEA (International Atomic Energy Agency)
IBRD (International Bank for Reconstruction and Development)
ICAO (International Civil Aviation Organisation)
ICC (International Chamber of Commerce)
ICC (International Criminal Court)
ICCPR (International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights (1966))
ICESCR (International Covenant on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights (1966))
ICJ (International Court of Justice)
ICSID (International Convention/Centre for the Settlement of Investment Disputes)
ICTR (International Criminal Tribunal for Rwanda)
ICTY (International Criminal Tribunal for the Former Yugoslavia)
IDA (International Development Association)
IFAD (International Fund for Agricultural Development)
IFC (International Finance Corporation)
IFOR (Implementation Force)
IGAD (Intergovernmental Authority on Development in Eastern Africa)
ILA (International Law Association)
ILC (International Law Commission)
ILO (International Labour Organisation)
IMCO (International Maritime Organisation)
IMF (International Monetary Fund)
IMO (International Maritime Organisation)
ISAF (International Security Force in Afghanistan) 1280
ITLOS (International Tribunal for the Law of the Sea)
ITU (International Telegraphic, later Telecommunication, Union)
KFOR (Kosovo Force)
MICIVIH (UN–OAS civilian mission on human rights in Haiti)
MINURSO (UN Mission for the Referendum in Western Sahara)
MONUC (UN Mission in the Congo)
MWC (Convention on the Protection of the Rights of Migrant Workers and Their Families (1990))
NAFO (North Atlantic Fisheries Organisation)
NAFTA (North America Free Trade Area)
NAIL (New Approaches to International Law)
NATO (North Atlantic Treaty Organisation)

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

NGOs (non-governmental organisations)
NLM (national liberation movement)
OAS (Organisation of American States)
OAU (Organisation of African Unity)
ODIHR (Office of Democratic Institutions and Human Rights)
OECD (Organisation for Economic Co-operation and Development)
OECS (Organisation of Eastern Caribbean States)
OHCHR (Office of the UN High Commissioner for Human Rights)
ONUC (UN Operation in the Congo)
ONUCA (UN Observer Group in Central America)
ONUMOZ (UN Operation in Mozambique)
ONUVEN (UN Observer Group for the Verification of Elections in Nigeria)
OPEC (Organisation of Petroleum Exporting Countries)
OSCE (Organisation for Security and Co-operation in Europe)
PCA (Permanent Court of Arbitration)
PCIJ (Permanent Court of International Justice)
PLO (Palestine Liberation Organisation)
POPs (persistent organic pollutants)
RoP (Rules of Procedure)
RWCT (Rwanda War Crimes Tribunal)
SADR (Saharan Arab Democratic Republic)
SAR (Hong Kong Administrative Arrangement)
SC (Security Council)
SFOR (UN Stabilisation Force)
SFRY (Socialist Federal Republic of Yugoslavia)
SWAPO (South West Africa People's Organisation)
TC (Torture Convention (1984))
TRIPS (Agreement on Trade-Related Aspects of Intellectual Property Rights)
TRNC (Turkish Republic of Northern Cyprus)
UAR (United Arab Republic)
UDHR (Universal Declaration of Human Rights (1948))
UDI (Unilateral Declaration of Independence)
UDI (Unilateral Declaration of Independence (Rhodesia) (1965))
UNAMIC (UN Advance Mission in Cambodia)
UNAMID (UN–African Union Hybrid Operation in Dafur)
UNAMIR (UN Assistance Mission for Uganda)
UNAMIS (UN Special Political Mission in Sudan)
UNAMSIL (UN Mission in Sierra Leone)
UNASOG (UN Aouzou Strip Observer Group)
UNAVEM (UN Angola Verification Mission)
UNC (United Nations Charter)
UNCESCR (UN Committee on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights)
UNCHR (UN Commission on Human Rights)
UNCITRAL (UN Commission on International Trade Law)
UNCLOS (United Nations Conference/Convention on the Law of the Sea)
UNCRO (UN Confidence Restoration Operation in Croatia)
UNCTAD (UN Conference on Trade and Development)
UNDRO (UN Disaster Relief Office)
UNEF (UN Emergency Force)
UNEP (UN Environment Programme)
UNESCO (UN Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organisation)
UNGA (United Nations General Assembly)
UNHRC (UN Human Rights Committee)
UNIDO (UN Industrial Development Organisation)
UNIKOM (UN Iraq–Kuwait Observer Mission)
UNMIH (UN Mission in Haiti)

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

UNMIK (UN Mission in Kosovo)
UNMIS (UN Mission in Sudan)
UNMISET (UN Mission of Support in East Timor)
UNMOGIP (UN Military Observer Group in India and Pakistan)
UNMOP (UN Mission of Observers in Prevlaka)
UNMOVIC (UN Monitoring, Verification and Inspection Commission)
UNOMIL (UN Observer Mission in Liberia)
UNOMUR (UN Observer Mission Uganda Rwanda)
UNOSOM (UN Operation in Somalia)
UNPREDEP (UN Preventive Deployment Force)
UNPROFOR (UN Protection Force)
UNSCOB (UN Special Committee on the Balkans)
UNSCOM (UN Special Commission (Iraq))
UNSMIH (UN Support Mission in Haiti)
UNTAC (UN Transitional Authority in Cambodia)
UNTAES (UN Transitional Administration for Eastern Slavonia)
UNTAET (UN Transitional Administration in East Timor)
UNTAG (UN Transition Assistance Group in Namibia)
UNTSO (UN Truce Supervision Organisation)
UPU (Universal Postal Union)
VCCR (Vienna Convention on Consular Relations (1963))
VCDR (Vienna Convention on Diplomatic Relations (1961))
VCLT (Vienna Convention on the Law of Treaties (1969))
WEU (Western European Union)
WHO (World Health Organisation)
WMD (weapons of mass destruction)

Aaland Islands
  Finnish Declaration on (WWI peace treaties) 294 n162 minorities, protection of 294 n162
  servitudes and 539–40
  state succession and 969 n75
  territorial sovereignty 200–1, 251–2, 489 n12
  treaty succession 539–40
abandonment of territory 505, 521
Abkhazia 238, 258, 1223 n94, 1230 Aboriginals: see indigenous peoples academic writers as source of international law (ICJ 38(1)(d)) 28, 112–13 in absence of supreme authority in international law 113 declining influence 113 development of profession 28
  as interpreters and stimulators 113
  subsidiary nature 112
access to courts, right of
  ECHR 6 357
  immunity from jurisdiction of international organisations and 1321 accountability
  see also state responsibility for internationally wrongful act
  international organisations 66, 1317–18
  Namibia, UN Council for 248
  World Bank 1040
accretion 495, 498, 499, 520, 531
Achille Lauro incident 665, 679–80, 1161 n221
ACHR (1969) 381–91, 1292, see also IAComHR; IACtHR; OAS
  American Declaration of the Rights and Duties of Man as aid to interpretation 389 Death Penalty, Protocol on the Abolition of (1990) 384
  derogation 274–5
  Economic, Social and Cultural Rights, Inter-American Protocol (1985) 384
  entry into force 381

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

ACHR (cont.)
environmental rights 847
limitation/claw-back provisions 275 n57
municipal law as violation of obligations 383
non-parties, applicability to 382
obligation to investigate 390
obligation to prevent violations 390 repeal of offending legislation 383
signatories 381 n216
ACHR, derogations
'compelling governmental interest' 388
non-derogation principle 389
acid rain 845
acquiescence
see also estoppel; prescription as means of territorial acquisition
customary international law and 80–1, 89–91
definition 80–1, 89
equity and 89
failure to protest as 89–91, 560, 563–4
good faith and 89
new states and 91
self-defence, right to (UNC 51) and 1137 state responsibility, lapse of claim and 799 statehood/recognition of international persons and 242, 244, 261
territorial acquisition and 505–6, 516–17
territorial sovereignty over high seas 609 treaty validity and 939
acquiescence, jurisprudence
Anglo-Norwegian Fisheries 77, 90, 560
Gulf of Maine 89
acquired rights of aliens in case of state succession 1001–4 agreement as preferred option 1003
continuation, presumption of 1003 contractual rights and duties 1002–3
expropriation and 1003
as fundamental principle of international law 1001
German Settlers case 1002
Lighthouses arbitration 1003–4 nationals of successor state distinguished 1001 non-vested rights distinguished 1003
Robert E. Brown case 1003
state responsibility for failure to observe 1003–4 West Rand Central Gold Mining Company case 1002–3 acquired rights, respect for archipelagic states 567–8
as general principle of law 103
human rights treaties 983 n142
minorities and 524 n207
territorial acquisition and 524
act of state doctrine
see also justiciability act performed wholly on foreign territory, limitation to 722
burden/standard of proof 192
Buttes 181–4
deportation/expulsion 827
justiciability considerations 180–92
political question doctrine 189–92
state immunity and 699–701, 722
administrative treaties 151 admiralty proceedings relating to state-owned ships, state immunity and 728 advisory opinions
ECtHR 352–3
IACtHR 385, 388–90, 391, 398 n8
ICJ: see ICJ advisory jurisdiction
ITLOS 642
affirmative action: see differential treatment, justifiable Afghanistan
arms sanctions (UNC 41) 1247
diplomatic relations and 458 n50
human rights in 305
Iranian diplomats, murder of 764
ISAF 1280
Red Cross and 1201
UN effectiveness 1233–4
UN Good Offices Mission 1228
Uniting for Peace resolution 1273
US attacks on 1134, 1136–7, 1140

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

USSR invasion 36, 1153, 1234
USSR withdrawal (Geneva Accords (1988)) 1228
Africa
see also colonial territories; decolonisation; ECOWAS; uti possidetis doctrine/stability of boundaries
cession of territories 503–4
contiguity principle and 524
ECA (UN Economic Commission for Africa) 1213 judicial/arbitral settlement procedures, opposition to 1027, 1063 scramble for/Berlin Conferences (1884–5) 1283
uti possidetis doctrine/stability of boundaries 526–7, 968, 969, 1028
African Charter on Human and Peoples' Rights (1981): see Banjul Charter (1981) African Commission on Human and Peoples' Rights 392–5 educational and promotional responsibilities 392
establishment 392
financial resources 394
IAComHR compared 392
membership 392
reporting obligations 394
Rules of Procedure 394
Secretary, appointment 392
Special Rapporteurs 392–3
working groups 393
African Commission on Human and Peoples' Rights, complaints procedure
inter-state complaints 393
intergovernmental organisations and 394
jurisprudence 394
non-state complaints 393–4
provisional measures 393–4
special cases involving serious or massive violation of rights 393 African Court of Human and Peoples' Rights
establishment 394
individual right of petition 394–5 merger with African Union Court of Justice 1294
NGOs and 394–5
African Union
AMIS 1266, 1280
AMISOM 1279
Charter: see Banjul Charter (1981)
common defence policy 1293
Constitutive Act 1293
Court of Justice 1115 n371, 1294
Darfur and 1230 n132, 1265–6
dispute settlement 1293
Hazardous Wastes, Bamako Convention on (1991) 806 n129, 896
history 1293–4
humanitarian intervention 1293
Liberia, involvement in 1277, 1279
national liberation movements (NLMs) and 245–6 OAU, change of name from 391, 1293
object and purpose 47, 1293
organisation and structure 1293–4
Pan-African Parliament 1294
peaceful co-existence and 215–16
peacekeeping operations 236–7, 1265–6, 1277, 1279, 1293
Principles 1293
recognition of Bantustans and 202
as regional arrangement (Chapter VIII) 1275 n348
SADR and 236–7
self-determination and 256
Somalia and 1275 n348
Sudan and 1265–6
territorial integrity and 1293
Terrorism, Convention on the Prevention and Combating of Terrorism (1999/2005) 1164
UNAMID 1266, 1267
use of force, prohibition 1293
uti possidetis principle and 290, 526, 1028
website 1340
African Union, dispute settlement 1026–30
Algeria–Morocco boundary dispute (1963) 1027

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

African Union (cont.)
Cairo Declaration (1993) (Mechanism for Conflict Prevention, Management and Resolution) 1027–8
Commission of Mediation, Conciliation and Arbitration 1023, 1026–7
Peace and Security Council: see African Union for Peace and Security Council Peace and Security Council 526 n219
Somali–Ethiopia conflict 1027
Western Sahara (1978) 1027
African Union for Peace and Security Council
African Standby Force 1028
Cairo Declaration (1993) and 1028
Commission of African Union 1028
Continental Early Warning System 1028
establishment (2002) 1028
human rights, respect for 1028
membership 1029
as organ of OAU 1028
Panel of the Wise 1028
role and powers 1028–9
rule of law and 1028
Special Fund 1028
territorial integrity 1028
territorial sovereignty 1028
uti possidetis principle 1028
Afro-Asian states
Bandung Conference (1955) 215
European influence on 100
expropriation/nationalisation and 828
SC and 1207
UNGA voting and 1211 n30
Agenda for Peace 1113, 1215, 1217–18, 1226 n109, 1234, 1274, 1313
aggression
see also peace and security, right to; use of force; war
customary international law and 147, 439
determination of existence (UNC 39) 1240–1
individual criminal responsibility 402, 439, 671
jurisdiction 671
League of Nations and 30–1, 1121–2, 1215–16
aggression by Burundi, Rwanda and Uganda 393
Germany 30–1
Iraq (against diplomats in Kuwait) 1241, 1241 n180
Israel against PLO headquarters in Tunisia (SC resolution 573 (1985)) 1241 n180
Italy 30
Japan 30
South Africa in Angola (SC resolution 387 (1976)) 1241 n180 aggression, definition/classification as Allied Control Council Law No. 10 439 blockade as 1240
as crime against peace 439, 671, 1123
as crime of leadership 439 difficulties over 410, 439–40 examples 1240
ICC Statute 411, 439
ILC Draft Code of Crimes against the Peace and Security of Mankind (1996) 439 n226, 671
as international crime 439–40, 807
jus cogens and 808 n198
mercenaries and 1153 n177
as 'most serious crime' 411
Nuremberg Charter/Tribunal 400, 439
SC Chapter VII responsibilities and 439–40 as the 'supreme international crime' 439
Tokyo Charter 439
UNGA resolution 3314 (XXIX) (Consensus Definition) 439, 469 n104, 488 n6, 502 n78, 671 n116, 1133 n70, 1148 n157, 1152 n174, 1153 n177, 1240
aggression, prohibition
ECOWAS Protocol on Non-Aggression (1978) 1276

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

as erga omnes obligation 124
jus cogens/peremptory norms 808 n198
Kellogg–Briand Pact (1928) 439 n226
natural law and 54
peaceful co-existence and 216
Third World and 39–40
Tokyo Tribunal 400
Ahtisaari Plan (Comprehensive Proposal for the Kosovo Status Settlement) (2008) 204
EU Special Representative 204
International Civilian Representative (ICR) 204
air pollution: see atmospheric pollution aircraft
see also civil aviation, conventions relating to crimes against: see hijacking; piracy
nationality 664
registration 664 transit passage (straits) 577
airspace
see also outer space
archipelagic states and 568
civil aviation conventions and 542–3
customary international law and 78
over continental shelf 589
over territorial waters 570 sovereignty over (usque ad coelum) 78, 541–3, 570
website 1337
Al-Qaida/Taliban 386, 1136, 1174 n33, 1208, 1247 n219
Alaska
Cook Inlet and 563–4
sale to US (1867) 500
Albania
CoE Torture Committee and 363 n115
ICJ and 1073
minorities in 294 n164
OSCE mission 1033
recognition pre-WWI 199
Algeria, pre-colonial archives 995
aliens
see also deportation/expulsion; expropriation/nationalisation of property of foreign national; standard of treatment of alien Council of Europe and 347 n8 state's right to refuse admission 826
Alma Ata Declaration (1991) 209, 961 n21, 968 n69, 977, 1291
Alsace-Lorraine, treaty succession (1919) 974 alternative reconciliation systems
Rwandan Gaccaca court system 272
truth and reconciliation commissions 272
American Civil War, non-recognition policy and 482–3 American Declaration of the Rights and Duties of Man (1948) 382, 469
legal status 389
American Revolution 26
amicus curiae briefs 1073
AMIS 1266, 1280
as regional arrangement (Chapter VII) 1280
AMISOM 1279
amnesty laws 271–2, 420
in Peru 372 n35, 390
truth and reconciliation commissions 272
Amsterdam Treaty (1999) 179
human rights and 370–1
anadromous species 624 n356
Andean Pact (1969) 1292 n42
Angola
civil war in 1150, 1233–4
communist intervention 1150 Cuban intervention in 1150, 1228–9 intervention in Congo 1154
non-recognition policy 482
South African troops in 1150, 1241 n180
UN mission 1228–9
UNAVEM I 1228–9
Annan, Kofi 1215–16
annexation of territory, legal effect 501–2
Falkland Islands 532
treaty succession 973–4
Antarctic Minerals Resources Convention (1988) 537–8, 857 n65

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

Antarctic Treaty (1959) 536–8
as law-making treaty 95
suspension of territorial claims and 536 Antarctic Treaty System 536–8 consultative status and meetings 537
Environmental Protection Committee 538
Antarctica
British Antarctic Territory 536
as common heritage of mankind 533–4, 538 n283
criminal jurisdiction 663
definition 535–6
demilitarisation 536
discovery 536
environmental protection 536–7, 538
Marie Byrd Land 536
overlapping nature of claims 536 sector principle 536
as terra nullius 198 n9
territorial claims 535–6
anthropology and the law 52–3, 55
Aouzou Strip Observer Group (UNASOG) 1011–12
apartheid
as crime against humanity 436–7, 438
as 'grave breach' 401
ICTY 5 and 670
individual criminal responsibility 401, 402
as international crime 401, 671, 807
jurisdiction 674 n674
jus cogens/peremptory norm 808 n198
lasting legacy 269
recognition of actions promoting, exclusion 203 n32
in South Africa 202 n31, 203
UN condemnation/emphasis on 649, 1205
UN Special Committee 303
UN Special Session (1989) 1212 n33
UNCHR Group of Three 305
universal jurisdiction 671
as usage/customary international law 115
Apartheid Convention (1973) 286, 305, 335
individual criminal responsibility 401
appeal against conviction or sentence, right of, ECHR Protocol VII 348
Aquinas, St Thomas 22, 53, 1119
Arab Charter on Human Rights (1994)
Cairo Declaration on Human Rights in Islam (1990) and 395
entry into force 395
ICCPR and 395
ICESCR and 395
international norms and standards, compatibility with 395 n298 Islamic Shari'ah and 395 n295
scope 395
UDHR and 395
UNC and 395
Arab Human Rights Commission
establishment 395
membership 395
reporting obligations 395
Arab League
establishment (1944) 1292
Gulf Co-operation Council 1254 n246, 1293 n45
human rights and 395
national liberation movements (NLMs) and 245–6
OPEC 1292 n43
peacekeeping 1292–3
privileges and immunities 1321
as regional arrangement (Chapter VIII) 1275 n348
in Somalia 1275 n348
structure and organisation 1292
websites 1340
Arab League, dispute settlement 1031–2
Arab Deterrent Force 1032 Arab Security Force 1032
conciliation attempts 1031–2
Inter-Arab force 1032
Arab world
counter-terrorism and 1164
Israel, recognition of 447, 462 nn71 and 74, 464
national identity and 395
ouster from Spain 20
US, diplomatic relations with 467

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

arbitral awards challenge to, timeliness 1054
final and binding effect 1033, 1041, 1042, 1044, 1053
new facts subsequent to, relevance 1054 obligation to accept 1049
recognition and enforcement 720–1, 1041, 1042, 1044
rectification or correction 1054
res judicata and 1053 n263
revision 1054
arbitral awards, nullity on grounds of corruption of arbitrator 1053
'essential error' 1053–4
excess of powers/excès de pouvoir and 1053
failure to state reasons 1053
ILC Model Rules and 1053–4 invalidity of compromis 1053 manifest error 1054
serious departure from fundamental rule of procedure 1053 arbitrary arrest during armed conflict, as 'grave breach' 403 arbitration clause/agreement applicable law, determinant of 1052
as basis of jurisdiction 1051
BITs and 1041, 1042
compromis/special agreement 1051 consent, need for 1051
ICSID 1041
OSCE arbitral tribunals 1033
rules of procedure and 1052 waiver of state immunity and 741–2, 744 arbitration (commercial): see International Chamber of Commerce (ICC) arbitration (commercial), ICSID and: see ICSID arbitration (inter-state) 1048–56, see also arbitral awards; arbitration tribunals as adjudicative technique 1054 advantages 1055
Conciliation and Arbitration, CSCE Convention on (1992) 378
conciliation distinguished 1022
consent, need for: see arbitration clause/agreement
definition 1049, 1054
dispute settlement involving non-state parties and 1055
as equitable method 1049
European Convention for the Peaceful Settlement of Disputes (1957) 1032 evaluation 1054–6
GATT 1036
good faith and 1054
ICJ process compared 1054
League of Nations 1216
limitations 1055–6
MERCOSUR 1038 n165
NAFTA 1039–40
NATO 1032
negotiation, role 1054
OSCE 1033
PCA: see PCA
UNCLOS Annexes VII and VIII 636 arbitration (inter-state), history and development 1048–50
Alabama Claims, role 111, 1048
Hague Convention for the Pacific Settlement of Disputes (1899) and 1048–9
Hague Convention for the Pacific Settlement of Disputes (1907) and 1049
Interpretation of Article 3 of the Treaty of Lausanne and 1049 arbitration tribunals
see also individual tribunals appointment to 1050–1 composition 1050–1
umpire/chair 1051
arbitration tribunals, applicable law
arbitration clause/agreement and 1052
General Act for the Pacific Settlement of Disputes (1928) 1052 n257
general principles of international law 1052
international law unless parties agree otherwise 1052
'law and equity' 1052

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com arbitration tribunals, jurisdiction arbitration clause/agreement as basis 1051

compétence de la compétence 1051, 1052–3 arbitration tribunals, procedure
see also UNCITRAL, Arbitration Rules arbitration clause/agreement and 1052
Hague Conventions (1899/1907) 1052
ILC Model Rules (UNGA resolution 1262 (XI)) 1050, 1053–4
Iran–US Claims Tribunal 1044
PCA Optional Rules for Arbitrating Disputes between Two States (1992) 1050
archipelagic states 565–8
acquired rights and 567–8
archipelagic sea lanes passage 568 Bahrain as 566
baselines 561–2, 565–7
customary international law 568
declaration of status as, relevance 566 definition (GCTS/UNCLOS provisions) 566–7
hot pursuit and 618
Indonesia as 566
innocent passage (UNCLOS 52 and 53) 568 internal waters 556 n13, 567 n69 Japan as 566
overflight 542 n304, 568
piracy and 616
submarine cables and 567–8 territorial sovereignty and 567–8 traditional fishing rights and 567–8
UK as 566
UNCLOS and 555
archives, inviolability consular 755, 773, 795
diplomatic 755, 795
international organisations 776, 1326, 1327–8 international organisations, representatives of states 1322 archives, state succession and: see state succession to state archives Arctic
continental shelf 588
pollution-free zone 583
Arctic territory, claims to contiguity principle and 535
definition of area 534–5 occupation and 535
sector principle 535
Argentina
Antarctic, claims over 535–6
continental shelf 585
freedom of association 341
Gulf War and 1253 n246
human rights in 383
ILO and 341
torture in 329
'armed attack' 1132–3, see also self-defence, right to (UNC 51) action against embassy or individuals abroad 1134, 1143–4 burden of proof 1133, 1135
by non-state entities 1134–7 computer attacks 1139 n103
intentional and targeted attack 1133
Nicaragua 1133
Oil Platforms 1133
sending of armed bands 1132–3, 1134
September 11 attacks 1136–7
single act as 1133
state responsibility and 1133
terrorist attack 1136–7 time of 1133–4
on unflagged ship 1133
armed conflict
see also aggression; civil war; international humanitarian law; neutrality; non-international armed conflict; use of force; weapons, prohibited
colonial domination, alien occupation and racist regimes, fights against as international conflicts 1149 n157, 1172, 1173 n30, 1195 n143
definition (ILC Draft Articles) 1126
definition (Tadić) 435, 1190–3

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

duration 435, 1191–3
environmental protection and 1186 n94, 1190
freedom of navigation (high seas) and 610–11 international and non-international conflict distinguished 1191–4 Kunarac 1194
Optional Protocol on the Involvement of Children in (2000) 332
peacekeeping operations 1232–3
sporadic fighting over limited area 1194 treaties and 904 n9, 946, 952 n225, 1126 n37 VCLT, continuing applicability 752 armed forces
see also peacekeeping operations conscription of foreign nationals 659 intervention in third state, effect 1193 national service, immunity of international officials 1324 prerogative power and 153, 184
presence on foreign territory, need for consent of host state 184, 214, 651, 1231
privileges and immunities 776
state immunity and 708, 713, 728
state responsibility and 790 status of forces agreements 184, 658, 776, 1231, 1233 n143
tortious liability 1310
Armenia
see also Nagorno-Karabakh
Azerbaijan and 237–8
EU Guidelines (1991) and 451–2
arms control
regional and subregional arrangements 1034
treaty succession and 976–7
arms sanctions as response to threat to or breach of the peace (UNC 41) Afghanistan 1247
Congo 1247
Eritrea 1246–7
Ethiopia 1246–7
Haiti 1276
Iran 1247
Ivory Coast 1247 n218
Liberia 1246–7, 1277–8
Libya 1244–5, 1270
North Korea 1247
Rwanda 1246–7, 1263
Sierra Leone 1246–7
Somalia 1246–7, 1260–1, 1278–9
Sudan 1247
Yugoslavia (FRY) 1245, 1246, 1257, 1269, 1279 arms trading, search and visit, right of 619 arrest: see detention; forcible abduction/unlawful arrest artificial islands 199, 582, 583, 609
ASEAN 1294–5
Common Effective Preferential Tariff Scheme 1294
decision-making 1295
Declaration of ASEAN Concord (1976) 1294
dispute settlement 1034 n145
establishment (1967) 1294
Framework Agreement on Enhancing ASEAN Economic Co-operation (1992) 1294
Free Trade Area 1294
Human Rights Body 1294–5
Manila Declaration (1987) 1294
membership 1294
object and purpose 1294
Permanent Secretariat, Agreement of the Establishment of (1976) 1294
Security Community, Economic Community and Socio-Cultural Community (2007) (Concord II) 1294 Treaty of Amity and Co-operation (1976) 1294
website 1340
Asia
19th century use of force against 1121
cession of territories 503–4
counter-terrorism in 1164
ESCAP (UN Economic and Social Commission for Asia and the Pacific) 1213
regional organisations 1294–5

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

Asian–African Legal Consultative Committee 119
asphyxiating and deleterious gases 1189
Associated States of the West Indies 239 Association of Caribbean States 1292 n42
associations of states
  confederations 217, 238–9
  Cook Islands and New Zealand 239 independence, right to 239
  international legal personality 238–42
astronauts, rescue 547 asylum
  see also refugees; Refugees Convention (1951)
  applicable law 758
  Asylum case 76–7
  consular immunity and 774
  customary international law 758
  IAComHR recommendation on 383 n228
  international crimes and 383 n228
  in Latin America 2, 27, 76–7
  as matter of common interest for EU members 370 right to (UDHR 14) 279 right to, whether 758–9
  treaty provision for 758–9
  'urgent and compelling reasons of humanity' and 750 asylum seekers
  African Commission Special Rapporteur 392–3
  terrorism and 1161 n216
atmospheric pollution 844, 871–5, see also polluting substances; transboundary pollution, conventions and other international instruments relating to 'atmosphere' 871
  customary international law 872
  EMEP 873
  Pollutant Release and Transfer Register 848 n20
  'pollution' 871–3
  Trail Smelter 872
Atmospheric Pollution Convention (1979) 871–4
  'best efforts' obligation 873
  co-operation obligation 873
  information, notification and consultation 873
  'pollution' 871–3
  state responsibility and 856
Austin, John 3–4
Australia
  acquisition by occupation 504
  Antarctic claims 535–6
  Antarctic mining 538
  continental shelf 588
  customary international law and 167
  external affairs powers 221–2
  extraterritorial jurisdiction, blocking legislation 691 n238
  federal/component state powers, allocation 221–2
  Foreign States Immunities Act 1985 707 n53, 708 n60, 728 n168, 745 n257
  Gulf War and 1253 n246
  justiciability 184 n292, 189
  legitimate expectations 168–9
  nuclear tests: see nuclear tests
  Racial Discrimination Convention (1965) and 221–2
  recognition of governments 459 terrorist threat assessment, justiciability 189 treaties, ratification 168–9
  treaties/municipal law relationship 167–8, 169–70
  unincorporated treaties and 168–9
  websites 1332, 1335, 1336, 1337
Austria
  state immunity and 704–5
  state immunity from execution/attachment 748
Austrian State Treaty (1955) 294, 1188
Austro-Hungarian Empire, dissolution 293, 974, 980 n131, 999
  minorities in 293
  state succession to public debt 999
  state succession (Treaty of St Germain (1919)) 957–8, 996, 999

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

aut dedere aut judicare principle
bilateral arrangements 679
Bonn Declaration (1978) 679
Crimes against the Peace and Security of Mankind, ILC Draft Code (1996) 671, 1160
extradition treaties 673–9, 687
hijacking conventions 676–9
Hostages Convention (1979) 676
Internationally Protected Persons Convention (1973) 675, 764–5
terrorist offences 1160 Torture Convention (1984) and 674, 675
treaty provisions 674–9
avulsion 531
Azerbaijan 200, see also Nagorno-Karabakh
EU Guidelines (1991) and 451–2
SC resolutions 238
territorial integrity 238

Bahrain, as archipelagic state 566
balance of interests
contiguous zone 578–9
damage to individual and benefit 1182
EEZ 580
environment and trade/economic development 45, 48–9, 849–51, 879, see also environmental protection and trade/economic development, balance equality of law and fact 288–9 fishing zones 581
goal and means 1182 hazardous activities 861–2
human rights 281
humanitarian law and military necessity 1178 n55, 1181–2, 1183, 1184–5, 1187
Law of the Sea Convention (1982) 555
legitimate security interests and human rights 1182 rights and obligations 44 sovereignty and the international community 892 sustainable development as 870 balance of power 20, 27, 57, 1119, 1120, 1121, 1283 balance of terror 43 Baltic states
see also individual states
annexation by USSR (1940) 203, 468, 961
CIS and 240, 378, 1291
Climate Change Convention (1992) and 879
declaration of independence 961–2
EU Declaration (1991) 961 EU statement on the presence of Russian troops (1992) 214
recognition (1991) 203
resumption of statehood/dissolution of USSR 36, 207, 209
sacred trust concept 251
state succession and 961–2
Bamako Convention on Hazardous Wastes (1991) 806 n129, 896
Ban Ki-Moon 1215
Bandung Conference (1955) 215
Bangladesh
Gulf War and 1253 n246
prisoners of war, treatment of 669 secession from Pakistan (1971) 200, 960, 1273 territorial claims 498 n58
Uniting for Peace resolution and 1273
Bangladesh–Pakistan boundary 498 n58
Banjul Charter (1981)
see also African Commission on Human and Peoples' Rights conclusion/entry into force 391
environment rights 847
individuals, duties to state 392
non-derogation, absence of provision for 275 n55
'peoples' 392
scope 391–2
self-determination, right to 290
signatories 391
Bank of International Settlement 249
Bantustans 202–3, 480–1, 526

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

baselines 558–62, 591
Anglo-Norwegian Fisheries 559–61
archipelagic states 561–2, 565–7
courbe tangente 560 n30
economic interests and 560–1 GCTS/UNCLOS provisions 558–9, 561 large-scale charts and 558
long usage and 560–1 low-tide elevation and 558–9
low-water line 558–9
Qatar v. Bahrain 561–2
straight baselines 559–62, 565–7
tracé parallèle 560
Bay of Biscay, continental shelf 585
bays 562–5
closing line 562–4 condominium 563
GCTS provisions 562
historic 562–4
innocent passage 563
pluri-state bays 563
Beagle Channel mediation 1018 n38, 1055
behaviourialism 55–60
Belarus
see also Byelorussia SSR
CIS membership 249
Climate Change Convention (1992) and 879
EU Guidelines (1991) and 451–2
state succession and 961 n21
treaty succession 976–7
UDHR and 278–9
Belgian Congo, secession, right to 526
Belgium
criminal jurisdiction, presence of accused, relevance 672–3
deep sea mining 630
Grave Breaches of International Humanitarian Law, law of 10 February 1999 672
Gulf War and 1253 n246
international law in municipal courts 173
nuclear power installations in 775 n116, 890 n254
recognition of governments 459
rescue of hostages in the Congo 1144
secession from the Netherlands (1830) 971, 974–5, 985 n152
treaties/municipal law relationship 177–8
treaty succession (1830) 971, 974–5
belligerent occupation
see also civilian population during armed conflict, protection of (GC IV and Protocol I (Part IV)); Israel occupied territories; occupation (acquisition of territory) adequate food and medical supplies 1180
annexation, exclusion 1182
balance between legitimate security interests and human rights 1182 Congo v. Uganda 1177, 1181
Construction of a Wall 1179
continuity of benefits in case of changes to institutions 1180
criminal jurisdiction 654 n38
definition/classification as 1177
effective control test 1177–8
Eritrea–Ethiopia Claims Commission 1179
forced labour or conscription 1180 freedom from arrest for pre-occupation opinions 1180
GC IV provisions 1177–80
Hague Regulations (1907) 1177, 1178, 1180 human rights law, applicability 1180–4 human rights treaties, applicability 1180–1, 1183 long-lasting occupations 1183 n80
military necessity 401, 1181–2
national security and public order considerations 1181–2 nationality, acquisition and 662 penal laws, continuity 1180 n63
powers and authority of military commander 1182 proactive obligations of occupying power 1183–4
proportionality and 1182
sovereignty, effect on 500–1, 1178
state responsibility and 1181, 1193

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

status of public or judicial officials 1180
West Bank 1178–9, 1181–2
belligerent reprisals 1130 n59
belligerent status
civil war and 1149–51
control test 1193–4
Nicaragua 1193–4
recognition of 245, 444, 453, 1149–50
belligerents
see also armed conflict
Hague Conferences (1899 and 1907) and 1169 insurgents distinguished 1149 international law, applicability to 245, 1169
international legal personality 245
rights and duties 1149–50
as subjects of international law 1150
Bering Sea, straddling stocks 625 n358, 627
Bering Straits 578 n115
Berlin Conference (1871) 1283
Berlin Conferences (1884–5) 1283
Berlin, status post-WWII
as focus of East–West conflict 57
relinquishment of Three Power rights and responsibilities (1990) 228, 965
Bernadotte, Count 47
Bessarabia, USSR annexation 468
Biafra, recognition of 461
bigamy, jurisdiction 663
Bin Laden, Osama 1134 Biodiversity Convention (1992) 846
biological experiments, prohibition 1171
BITs (bilateral investment treaties) 837–40
applicable law, jurisdiction of forum state 840 compensation for expropriation 839–40
as consent to arbitration 1041, 1042
customary international law and 838
diplomatic protection and 818 n244, 838
fair and equitable treatment 839 ICSID arbitration, provision for 1041 increasing resort to 818 n244
'investment' 830 n303, 838–9
MFN treatment 839
non-discrimination 839
non-expropriation undertaking 839–40
object and purpose 838
'prompt, adequate and effective compensation' 834
as source of international law, limitations 98 n107, 841 state practice and 98 n107, 838, 841
UK practice 838–9
Black Sea Straits 930
Blackstone, William 140
blockades
as aggressive act 1240
as enforcement measure (UNC 41) 1244
'force' (UNC 2(4)), whether 611, 1121, 1124, 1130
SC and 1130
as UNC 42 measure 1251, 1275 n350
Yugoslavia 1275 n350
Bodin, Jean 21, 26
Bogotá Declaration on the geostationary orbit (1976) 552
Bogotá Pact (1948) (Treaty of Pacific Settlement) 1023, 1031
consent to ICJ jurisdiction and 1080 Bolivia
human rights in 383
ICSID, denunciation 1041 n184
booby-traps, prohibition of use against civilians 1189 Bophuthatswana
apartheid and 203 n32, 674
independence/recognition of 202–3
borders: see boundaries
Bosnia and Herzegovina
see also Dayton Agreement (1995) Bosnian Serb forces in 1245–6, 1258–9, 1260 confederation with Croatia 238 n215
Constitutional Court 380
currency and exchange restrictions 380 n213 elections, supervision 1033–4
ethnic cleansing 316

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

Bosnia and Herzegovina (cont.)
Genocide Convention (1948), succession to 981, 984 genocide in 283–5
High Representative, role 203–4, 231–2, 427
human rights in 982
humanitarian assistance 1258
IFOR 1260, 1279–80
independence/recognition of 201, 203–4, 239 n217, 461–2
international legal personality 231–2
NATO no-fly zones 1258, 1275, 1279
OSCE supervision of elections 377 n201, 1033–4, 1274 n343, 1289
Peace Implementation Council 231–2
property, right of refugees to recover 380 n212
recognition of 461–2
recognition and UN membership 201, 210, 461–2, 962
referendum (1992) 962
self-defence, right to (UNC 51) 1269
SFOR and: see SFOR
title to territory, non-recognition 470
UN and 1224, 1257–60
website 1340
Bosnia and Herzegovina Human Rights Chamber 379–80
6-months rule 380
admissibility 380
applicable law 427
decisions, final and binding nature 380 ECHR implementation and 379
establishment 231 n179, 379
exhaustion of local remedies and 380
full Chamber/panels 380
housing-related issues and property rights as focus 380 indictments 427
membership 379
President 380
standing 379–80
termination of mandate 380
'victim of violation' 379–80
website 1336
workload 380
Bosnia and Herzegovina Human Rights Commission (2004) 380
Bosnia War Crimes Chamber admissibility decisions, review of 426
appeals chamber 426
Dayton Agreement (1995) and 427 n166
establishment (2003) 426
ICTY completion strategy and 426
judges, appointment 427
Office of the Prosecutor of the State Court 427
as part of Bosnia State Court 426
Registry 427
trial chambers/panels 426–7
Bosnia War Crimes Chamber, jurisdiction cases submitted by the ICTY Office of the Prosecutor 426 highly sensitive cases 426
as referred by ICTY 426
'Rules of the Road' cases 426
Bosphorus and Dardenelles Straits (Montreux Convention (1936)) 578 boundaries
see also territorial acquisition; territorial integrity; territorial title/territorial sovereignty, evidence of including effectivités; uti possidetis doctrine/stability of boundaries delimitation (land) 108–9
equity and 108–9
Helsinki Final Act (1975) and 372–3 intangibility: see uti possidetis doctrine/stability of boundaries
inviolability 451, 452, 1123
natural boundaries 524
treaty succession 529 n234
UN guarantee (Kuwait–Iraq boundary) (SC resolution 687 (1991)) 521 n193, 1248, 1267
websites 1336
boundary awards as source of title 497–8
boundary disputes 496
Algeria–Morocco (1963) 1027
Chad–Libya 1011–12

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

federal state disputes, relevance to international law 112, 223, 498 recognition of state and 199–200
self-determination, right to and 524
boundary treaties
CIS Agreement on the Defence of its External Borders (1995) 1291
erga omnes obligations 495
as executed treaties/final and binding effect 496, 528–9 as means of acquiring territory 495–8
state succession and 529 n234, 967–70, 971
as validation of non-binding document 496 boundary treaties, interpretation
customary international law and 496
difficulties 496–7
fundamental change of circumstances/rebus sic stantibus (VCLT 62(2)) 968–9 intention of parties, difficulty of determining 496 intertemporal 496–7, 500 n68
subsequent practice and 497
VCLT 31 and 32 and 496
Boutros-Ghali, Boutros 1215 boycotts 236, 1124, 1252
BP 803
Brazil, Bogotá Declaration (1976) 552
Brierly, J. 147, 490
British Antarctic Territory 536
British Commonwealth 239–40, 788, 1084
British Somaliland 237, see also Somalia; Somaliland broadcasting
Declaration of Guiding Principles on the Use of Satellite Broadcasting (UNESCO) (1972) 550
ITU regulations 550–1
Principles Governing the Use by State of Artificial Earth Satellites for International Direct Television Broadcasting (UNGA resolution 37/92) 550 broadcasting, unauthorised (UNCLOS 109 and 110), right of search and visit 615, 617
Brunei, ASEAN membership 1294
Bryan treaties (commissions of inquiry) 1020 Bulgaria, minorities in 293 n164
burden/standard of proof
act of state doctrine 192
advisory jurisdiction 1111–12
armed attack 1133, 1135
DSB 1037
fault 784, 888
force majeure 796
genocide 285 n116
human rights treaties 938
ICC 441
ICJ 1091, 1100, 1133
innocent passage 571
interest of a legal nature 1100
regional international law 77, 92
self-defence 1133, 1135
state immunity: see state immunity, burden/standard of proof
state responsibility 780, 784, 888
third state intervention 1098–101
Burma, independence 493–4
Burundi, treaty succession and 958 n6
Byelorussia SSR
see also Belarus
change of name 1211
recognition 262–3
UN membership 218, 464
Bynkershoek 25, 112
Byrd amendment 164
Byzantium 18, 19

cabotage 570
Cairo Declaration (1993) (Mechanism for Conflict Prevention, Management and Resolution) 1027–8
Cairo Declaration on Human Rights in Islam (1990) 395
Calvo doctrine 824
Cambodia
ASEAN membership 1294
Khmer Rouge/Pol Pot atrocities 421
London embassy, abandonment 757–8
Paris Peace Agreements (1991) 231

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

Cambodia (cont.)
recognition of government 466, 757
UN and 231, 1234
UNAMIC 1129 n124
US rescue of hostages 1144
Cambodia, Extraordinary Chambers of 421–3 Cambodia, Extraordinary Chambers of, judges independent co-investigation judges 422 as mix of Cambodian and international 421–2 nomination 421–2
Cambodia, Extraordinary Chambers of, jurisdiction crimes against humanity under ICTY Statute 422 as determined by Cambodian Law establishing Chambers (2001) 421
genocide 422
'grave breaches' 422
offences committed between 17 April 1975 and 6 January 1979, limitation to 421 serious violations of Cambodian penal law 421 serious violations of international conventions recognised by Cambodia 421 serious violations of international humanitarian law and custom 421 Cambodia, Extraordinary Chambers of, organs/organisation cases completed and in process 422–3 co-prosecutors 422
composition and appointment to 421–2 establishment under Cambodian law (2001) 421
Supreme Court Chamber 421
Trial Chamber 421
Cambodia, Extraordinary Chambers of, procedure
applicable law 422
due process and 422
ICCPR and 422
international standards of justice and 422 Cambodia, Extraordinary Chambers of, UN–Cambodia Agreement (2003) 421 treaty status 421
VCLT (1969) and 421
Cameroon, Nigerian minorities in 524 n207
Canada
Arctic claims 535
Coastal Fisheries Protection Act 1985 627
customary international law and 166–7
deep sea mining 630
employment contracts, state immunity in relation to 726
extraterritorial jurisdiction, blocking legislation 693 n251
federal/component state powers, allocation 219, 733
Gulf War and 1253 n246
ILO conventions and 220
international law in municipal courts 166–7
legislation, presumption of consistency with international obligations 143, 153
minorities in 295, 296, 321
pollution-free zones 583
recognition of governments 459
secession of Quebec 255–6, 291 n151, 293, 295, 523
State Immunity Act 1982 707 n52, 716, 727 n163
state immunity and 711, 714
straddling stocks 667
websites 1332, 1334, 1335
canals: see Kiel Canal; Panama Canal Zone; Suez Canal canon law 19
carbon sinks 878–9, 880
CARICOM (Association of Caribbean States) 1292 n42
Cartagena de Indias Protocol (1985) 381 n219
catadromous species 624 n356
Catholic Church, role 19, 21, 53, 609
CEDAW: see General Recommendations (CEDAW); Women, Committee on the Elimination of All Forms of

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

Discrimination Against; Women, Convention on the Elimination of All Forms of Discrimination Against (1979)
Celtic Sea, continental shelf 588
Central African Republic
EU peacekeeping force 1280 n371
EUFOR 1280 n371
referral of situation to ICC 413
Central America, OAS mediation 1224 n98
Central American Court of Justice individual's right of petition 259
website 1338
central bank, immunity from execution 745 CERD: see Racial Discrimination Committee
cession of territory 499–500
actual delivery, relevance 500
African territories 503–4
Alaska sale (1867) 500
Alsace-Lorraine (1919) 974
Asian territories 503–4
by gift or exchange 500
consent, need for 515 n159
implementation of treaties relating to 151 intention to transfer, need for 499 Island of Palmas 499
nationality following 1007
in peace treaty 500
as peaceful transfer 499 Philippines 500
prerogative power and 181
servitudes and 499
state succession to public debt and 998
territorial sea 570
treaty succession 973–4
validity of treaties prior to UNC (VCLT 52) 502, 508 n110
Venice (1866) 500
West Indies, sale of territories in (1916) 500
Ceylon: see Sri Lanka
CFCs 876–7, 878
CFSP pillar 241, 242
human rights and 370
Chad
civil war, AU mediation (1978) 1027
EU peacekeeping force 1280 n371
EUFOR 1280 n371
minorities in 524 n207
Chad–Libya boundary dispute
see also Libya/Chad, Territorial Dispute in the table of cases settlement 1011–12
Channel Islands, effect on delimitation 594
Channel Tunnel fixed link, jurisdiction 657
Charter for European Security (2000) 1274 n343
Charter of Paris (1990) 375, 1289
expert resource list 375
institutionalisation of Helsinki Act process 375
recognition of states and 451
Chatham House Principles on International Law on the Use of Force in Self-Defence 1137 n94
Chechnya
ethnic cleansing 347 n8
human rights in 346–7, 364 n123
OSCE Mission 375 n188, 1033
Russia's admission to the CoE and 346 n4
chemicals
Chemicals, Inter-Organisation Programme for the Sound Management of (1995) 897 n310
Prior Informed Consent Procedure Convention (1998) 896 n299
Cheng, Bin 78
Chernobyl incident: see nuclear accidents
Child, Committee on Rights of 331–3 Concluding Observations 332–3
establishment 331
follow-up measures 333
general comments 333
general discussion days 332, 333
general recommendations 332
membership 331
powers 331–2
reporting obligations 331
urgent action procedure 332

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

Child, Convention on the Rights of (1989)
Armed Conflict, Optional Protocol on the Involvement of Children in (2000) 332
'best interests of the child' as primary consideration 331 child prostitution and 325
conclusion/entry into force 331
education in respect for the environment 847 minorities' rights and 368 n151 obligations 331
child, rights of
see also children
ACHR 19 381
armed conflict and 332 n365
Copenhagen Final Act (1990) and 374
correspondence and (CRC 24) 331 death penalty and 318, 395 n298 disablement, right to enjoy full life in case of (CRC 23) 331 drugs, protection from (CRC 33) 313 economic, social and cultural measures 317 family and (CRC 24) 331
freedom of expression (CRC 13) 317, 331
freedom of thought, conscience and religion (CRC 14) 331
'girl-child' 325, 332, 420 n126
health and (CRC 24) 331
IAComHR Special Rapporteur 383
illegitimacy and 357, 661
international humanitarian law, application to (CRC 38) 313 justice system 333
life (CRC 6) 331
name (CRC 7) 331
national human rights institutions, role 333 nationality (ICCPR 24(3)/ CRC 7) 318, 331, 659 n59, 662
non-derogation principle 275
non-discrimination 318, 357
privacy and (CRC 24) 331
prostitution and 325
refugee status, appropriate protection and assistance (CRC 22) 331 sale of 305, 332 n367
Sierra Leone 420
UN Children's Fund 303
UNCHR 305
UNHRC General Comment 17 317–18
Vienna Declaration and Programme of Action (1993) 280, 332
violence, protection from physical and mental (CRC 19) 331 child soldiers 331, 332, 413, 1176
Children, Optional Protocol on their Involvement in (2000) 332
Chile claims over the Antarctic 535–6
continental shelf 585
human rights in 304, 383
China
see also Manchuria
ancient civilisations 15
Belgrade embassy, bombing 756
deep sea mining 630
economic expansion 38
international law and 36–8
international relations, approach to 38
Japanese invasion of (1931) 30, 468
law as a concept and 37–8
as major power 44
Marxism–Leninism and 38
moral principles and 37
Nuclear Test Ban Treaty (1963) and 888
peaceful co-existence and 37, 215
recognition as state/government 445, 455, 463, 467, 476–7
SC membership/veto 3, 215, 1206, 1237
Sun Yat Sen incident (1896) 754
Taiwan and 234–5
treaties, compliance/implementation (VCLT 26–7) 38
treaties as source of international law and 38 unequal treaties and 38
China–India conflict 1199

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

Chorzów Factory principle/restitutio in integrum 389–90, 801–5, see also damages/compensation for expropriation or breach of international law, measure arbitral tribunals and 802 n15 cultural objects and 802 n154
as general principle of law 103, 801–2
IACtHR 802 nn150 and 152
ICJ jurisprudence 801–2
ILC Articles on State Responsibility 802–3 illegal possession of territory 802 n154
ITLOS 801
marine pollution and 901
moral damage and 802 obligation to terminate illegal situation distinguished 803 restitution, compensation and satisfaction as 802
restitution in kind 802–3
USSR acceptance of responsibility for aerial accident in Belgium 785 n45
Chorzów Factory principle/restitutio in integrum, jurisprudence
AMCO 103
Arrest Warrant case 1102
BP case 803
Gabčíkovo–Nagymaros Project 801, 804, 1102
Genocide Convention case 801
Great Belt case 1102
Rainbow Warrior 803
Right to Information on Consular Assistance 389–90
Saiga (No. 2) 801–2
Texaco 803–4
USS Stark incident 786 n50
CIS
Alma Ata Declaration (1991) 209, 961 n21, 968 n69, 977, 1291
Baltic states and 240, 378, 1291
consensus decision-taking 240–1
Council of Heads of State 1291
Defence of CIS External Borders, Agreement on (1995) 1291
Economic Court 1115 n371, 1291
Economic Union 1291
establishment 1291
human rights in 240, 378–9
international legal personality 240–1
membership 240, 1291
Minsk Agreement (1991) 961 n21, 968 n69, 1291
nuclear weapons and 1291
organisation 1291
origins 203, 240
as regional arrangement (Chapter VIII) 1274 n343
state succession and 240, 960–1
status 1291
structure 240–1
territorial integrity and 240, 968 n69, 1291
uti possidetis principle 968 n69
CIS Charter (1993)
conclusion 1291
equality of states and 1291
as treaty 240
CIS Convention on Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms (1995) 378–9
CoE Parliamentary Assembly resolution 1249 (2001) and 379 ECCHR, primacy 379
entry into force 379
implementation 378–9
minorities, protection of 378
participation in public life, right of 378
work, right to 378
CIS Human Rights Commission 378–9
6-months rule 379
exhaustion of local remedies, need for 379
individual and collective applications 379
inter-state complaints 378–9 Ciskei 480–1
city states 20
civil aviation, conventions relating to see also hijacking
Chicago Convention (1944) 664
Montreal Convention for the Suppression of Unlawful Acts against the Safety of Civil Aviation

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

civil aviation (cont.)
(1971) 668, 674 n 134, 676, 677–8, 687 n213, 1160 n212, 1270
Rome Convention on Damage Caused by Foreign Aircraft to Third Parties on the Surface (1952) 925
Tokyo Convention on Offences Committed on Board Aircraft (1963) 668, 676–7, 678, 1160 n212
websites 1337
civil jurisdiction 651–2
assets in forum state and 652
civil law practice 652, 663
common law practice 663
customary international law 652
domicile as basis 647, 650, 651, 652, 663 habitual residence as basis 652
nationality and 663
service of writ as basis 651–2 state practice, absence 652
territorial sea 574–5
civil law systems
civil jurisdiction and 652, 663
nationality and 661
state immunity and 710–11
civil and political rights
see also ICCPR (1966)
Banjul Charter 391
definition and scope 208, 269–70
relative priority 269–70
USSR and 268–9
civil war
see also non-international armed conflict; rebellions
in Angola 1150, 1233–4 belligerent status and 1149–51
as internal matter 1148–9
intervention in 1148–51
in Liberia 1276–7
neutrality and 1150
in Nigeria 460–1, 526, 1152 n175, 1201, 1233–4 recognition of governments and 460
in Rwanda 1262–3
self-determination, right to and 1148
state responsibility and 791–3
UN involvement in 1151 n163
in Vietnam 1150
civilian population during armed conflict, protection of (GC IV and Protocol I (Part IV)) 1176–86, see also belligerent occupation apartheid and 401
attack on as 'grave breach' 401
as basic principle of humanitarian law 1169–70, 1184–5
Eritrea–Ethiopia Claims Commission 1185
'grave breaches' against 401
indiscriminate attacks 1185
Iran–Iraq war 1185 n91
Kosovo 1185 n88
mines and booby-traps, prohibition (Conventional Weapons Treaty (1980)) 1189–90
non-international armed conflict and 435, 1196
proportionality and 1184–5
Protection of Civilians in Armed Conflicts (SC resolution 1674 (2006)) 1184 n83 racial discrimination and 401 spreading of terror 1185 transfer or deportation 401 widespread or systematic attack on as crime against humanity 408 civilian property, destruction and appropriation (GC IV, 53)/ protection of civilian objects (Protocol I, 52–7) 1169–70, 1184–6 attack on works or installations containing dangerous forces (dams, dykes and nuclear generating stations) 401, 1186
'civilian objects' 1186
cultural objects 1186
customary international law 1184 n87
dual purpose objects 1184–5
as 'grave breach' 403, 434
Hague Convention for the Protection of Cultural Property in the Event of Armed Conflict (1954) 1186 n96
individual criminal responsibility 1200

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

military objectives, limitation of action to 1184–5
non-international armed conflict and 435
reprisals 1186
wanton destruction of cities, towns and villages 1200
'civilisation' as test of statehood 200 claims commissions, US–Mexico 1056
Clarion–Clipperton Ridge 630–1
'clean slate' principle 957, 974–5, 977–8, 979 climate change 846, see also global warming clean development mechanism 880
as common concern of mankind 534 n260, 875–6, 878
common heritage of mankind and 534 n260, 875–6 consensus on 881 n202
developing countries and 869, 879, 881
Kyoto Protocol (1997) 880–1
Marrakesh Accords (2001) 881
precautionary principle and 869
state responsibility and 857
sustainable development and 870
UNGA resolution 43/53 (global warming) 875–6, 878
websites 1337
Climate Change Convention (1992)
administrative arrangements 880
adoption 878
'adverse effects' 857
balance of interests 879
Baltic states 879
Belarus and 879
carbon sinks 878–9, 880
Compliance Committee 881 Conference of the parties 879–80, 881
co-operation obligation 879
developed country obligations 879, 881
developing countries and 879, 881
entry into force 880
greenhouse gases 878–9, 880–1
Kyoto Protocol (1997) 880–1
landlocked states 879
maintenance of inventories 878
objective 878
programmes to mitigate 878–9
Ukraine 879
website 1337
closed seas doctrine 24, 553–4, see also high seas, freedom of cluster bombs 1190 n120
'coalition of states' 1253–4
coastal state jurisdiction in internal waters and ports 557–8
warships and 558
coastal state obligations, notice of danger 571
coastal state rights laws and regulations relating to innocent passage 570, 572
municipal law and 570
national security 570
seabed resources (UNCLOS, Part XI) 588–9
territorial sea 569–70
UNCLOS and 555
coastal trading 570
COCOM, US ban on export to 692 cod war 581–2, 1032 codes of practice 118
environmental protection 118
international economic law 118
international trade 97, 118 merchant and maritime codes 19–20 codification and development of international law Committee on the Principles of International Law and 121
ILA and 121
ILC and 119–21
ILO and 121
Institut de Droit International 121
international organisations 1295
specialised agencies 121
UNCITRAL and 121
UNCTAD and 121
UNESCO and 121
coercion of state
'coercion' 943–4
as erga omnes obligation 944
Fisheries Jurisdiction case 943

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

coercion of state (cont.)
ILC Articles on State Responsibility 782
VCLT 52 500, 502, 942–4
Vienna Declaration on the Prohibition of Military, Political or Economic Coercion in the Conclusion of Treaties (1966) 943
Cold War
international law and 33, 36, 41
international relations, impact on 36–7
Cold War, impact 33, 36–7, 41, 573, 1209–10, 1217, 1224, 1226, 1234, 1287, 1290 collective expulsion, prohibition, migrant workers and (MWC 22) 333 collective promotion of human rights, Helsinki Final Act (1975) 373 collective rights 271, 281, 291, 299, 301–2, 366 collective security 1235–56, see also aggression; arms sanctions as response to threat to or breach of the peace (UNC 41); economic sanctions as response to threat to or breach of the peace (UNC 41); regional arrangements for the maintenance of international peace and security (UNC Chapter VIII); threat to the peace, actual breach or aggression (UNC 39) breach of peace and 1241 evolution of the system 1235–6
NATO and 1290
OAS 1292
SC role 1236
September 11 attacks and 1290 n30
UNGA and 1271–3
collective self-defence (Rio Treaty (1947)) 1291–2 collective self-defence (UNC 51) 1136–7 cumulation of individual rights to self-defence distinguished 1146–7
customary international law 1146, 1147, 1273
inherent right 793, 1146
Inter-American Treaty of Reciprocal Assistance (1947) 1137 intervention at request of government and 1152 Iraqi invasion of Kuwait and 1147
NATO and 1137, 1146–7
Nicaragua 1147
state responsibility and 793
Warsaw Pact and 1146–7
collective use of force (Chapter VII) 1251–6
'coalition of states' 1253–4
commitment of air-force contingents (UNC 45) 1251 commitment of forces to Security Council (UNC 43) 1244, 1251–2, 1266–7 delegation to states 1267
evaluation 1266–7
flexibility of concept 1267
implied authorisation 1254–6
Iraqi invasion of Kuwait (SC resolution 660 (1990)) 1253–4 justification by subsequent events 1254–6
Korean War 4, 1252–3
Liberia and 1278–9
Military Staffs Committee (UNC 47) 1244, 1251, 1254
Rwanda 1263
Sierra Leone 1263–4
Somalia 1261–2
state responsibility and 807
Yugoslavia 1258–9
collective use of force other than under Chapter VII 1257–67
Congo 1264–5
Rwanda 1262–3
Sierra Leone 1263–4
Somalia 1260–2
Yugoslavia 1257–60
collisions on the high seas
GCHS 11(1) 618, 656–7
Lotus principle 84–5, 618, 655–7
Colombia
asylum and 76–7, 92, 758–9
Bogotá Declaration (1976) 552
Contadora negotiating process 1031

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

dissolution (1829–31) 980
human rights in 317, 330, 383, 387 n247
ICC and 411 n83
satellites and 552
state succession to public debt 998–9
treaty succession (1829–31) 980
Colonial Declaration: see Declaration on the Granting of Independence to Colonial Countries and Peoples (1960) (UNGA resolution 1514 (XV))
colonial domination
as international crime 807
use of force and 807
colonial territories
see also decolonisation; self-determination colonial application clauses 926
domestic jurisdiction principle (UNC 2(7)) and 212–13, 649
international law in municipal courts 213, 649
pre-colonial archives 995
status 495
COMECON 57
Comesa 1038
Court of Justice 1115 n371
comity 2
effects doctrine and 689 n218
extraterritorial jurisdiction and 694 international legal personality of international organisations and 1301, 1302 presumption of conformity with 159, 690, 691
state immunity and 706, 717 command responsibility principle 399, 402, 408, 443 n229
commissions of inquiry 638
as alternative to arbitration 1020 Bryan treaties 1020
conciliation distinguished 1022
disputed fact, limitation to 1020
Dogger Bank incident (1904) 1020
Geneva Conventions (1949) and 1199–1200
Hague Conference (1899) 1020
Hague Conference (1907) 1020–1
ILO and 1021
inquiry as fact-finding procedure distinguished 1020 n46, 1022
International Fact-Finding Commission (grave breaches of the Geneva Conventions) 1199–1200
Letelier and Moffitt 1021
Maine incident and 1020 n47
PCA Optional Rules for Fact-Finding Commissions of Inquiry (1997) 1022 n62
Red Crusader 1021
specialised agencies and 1021–2
Taft/Knox Treaties (1911) 1020 n54
UN use of 1021–2
US attitude to 1020
World Bank Inspection Panel 1021 n59
Committee on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights: see UNCESCR Committee on the Principles of International Law 121 common concern of mankind 534 n260, 875–6, 878 common heritage of mankind 533–4 Antarctica 533–4, 538 n283 climate change and 534 n260, 875–6 concept of 488
landlocked states and 607
law of the sea and 488, 492, 533–4
moon 533, 548–9, 882
Moon Treaty (1979) 881–2
seabed resources (UNCLOS 136) 554–5, 629
Commonwealth of Nations, international legal personality 239–40 communist states: see socialist states companies
see also multinational private companies; multinational public companies limited liability companies 105 nationality of: see nationality of companies non-recognition and 479
privatised utilities 787

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

compensation: see damages; damages/compensation for expropriation or breach of international law, measure competition law (EU) 695–6 compulsory service in forces of a hostile power, as 'grave breaches' 434 COMSAT 549
conciliation 1022–4
  African Union Commission of Mediation, Conciliation and Arbitration 1023, 1026–7
  Arab League and 1031–2
  arbitration distinguished 1022
  Cairo Declaration (1994) 1028
  compulsory commitment 1022 n65
  Conciliation and Arbitration, CSCE Convention on (1992) 378
  Convention on the Representation of States in their Relations with International Organisations (1975) 1023
  definition 1022
  European Convention for the Peaceful Settlement of Disputes (1957) 1023, 1032
  evaluation 1022–4
  flexibility 1024
  GATT 1035–6
  good offices/mediation and 1022, 1023
  Institut de Droit International Regulations (1961) 1023
  Jan Mayen 1024
  Law of the Sea Convention (1982) 1024
  law of the sea disputes 638
  NAFTA 1039
  NATO 1032
  negotiations as parallel procedure 1024
  Organisation of Eastern Caribbean States (1981) 1022 n65
  Ozone Layer Convention (1985) 1022, 1024
  Pact of Bogotá (1948) 1023
  PCA Optional Conciliation Rules (1998) 1023 n68
  PCA Optional Rules for Conciliation of Disputes Relating to Natural Resources and the Environment (2002) 1023 n68
  UN Model Rules (UNGA resolution 50/50) 1023
  UNCLOS 284 635, 638
  VCLT Annex 1022 n65
  Vienna Convention on the Representation of States in their Relations with International Organisations 1022 n65
  Vienna Convention on State Succession to State Property, Archives and Debts (1983) 1023–4
  Vienna Convention on Treaty Succession (1978) 1023–4 conciliation commissions 1022–4, see also claims commissions; truth and reconciliation commissions Chaco Commission (1929) 1023 n66
  Conciliation Commission for the Congo (1960) 1024
  Conciliation Commission for Palestine (UNGA resolution 194 (III)) 1024
  Franco-Siamese Conciliation Commission (1947) 1023 n66
  Franco-Swiss Commission (1955) 1023 n66
  ICSID 1040–1, 1042
  ILO 340–1
  ILO Convention against Discrimination in Education 1035 n151
  OSCE 1033
  Racial Discrimination Committee 313
  UNCLOS 284 and 635
  UNESCO Conciliation and Good Offices Commission 342
  UNESCO Convention against Discrimination in Education 1035 n151
  UNHRC 319
conciliation, reports
  good faith consideration obligation 1022 non-binding nature of reports 1022, 1023
condominiums
  Fonseca, Gulf of 229–30, 563

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

Gulf Neutral Zone (1922) 229 n168
international legal personality 228–30
New Hebrides 228–9
confederations 217, 238–9
conflict of laws
definition and scope 1–2, 647
jurisdiction, rules relating to 647 public international law, overlap 647 conflict prevention
see also OSCE/CSCE
human rights and 377
national minorities and 376
Confucius 37–8
Congo, Conciliation Commission for (1960) 1024 Congo, Democratic Republic of aggression by Burundi, Rwanda and Uganda, allegations of 393 aid to government authorities (SC resolution 1234 (1999)) 1154
arms sanctions (UNC 41) 1247
Bogotá Declaration (1976) 552
collective use of force (Chapter VII) 1264–5
collective use of force other than under Chapter VII 1264
EUFOR 1280 n371
human rights in 305
independence 205
Interim Emergency Multinational Force in Bunia 1280 n371
intervention in 1154–5, 1270
Lusaka Ceasefire Agreement (1999) 1154, 1264, 1270
minorities in 295 n170
MONUC 1154, 1262–3, 1264–5
ONUC 1226–7
referral of situation to ICC 413
rescue of hostages 1144
SC resolution 1234 (1999) 526, 1154
as threat to peace 1264–5
UN peacekeeping 1226–7, 1273
UN Secretary-General and 1216, 1226–7
Congress of Vienna (1815) 27, 28, 1282–3
conquest 500–2
Falkland Islands 532, 533
conscription, introduction of 28 consensus
see also aggression, definition/classification as, UNGA resolution 3314 (XXIX) (Consensus Definition)
acta jure gestionis/acta jure imperii distinction and 711 ASEAN decision-taking 1295
ASEAN dispute settlement and 1294–5
CIS 240–1
climate change 881 n202
definition 910 n40
formation of international law 10, 74, 93, 147 n88
GATT/WTO dispute settlement 1035, 1036–7
ICJ Chambers, composition 1062
International Seabed Authority and 634 nn398 and 400 private/public law dichotomy 710
as reflection of shift from exclusive to inclusive law-making 10
Rio Statement of Principles and 870
SC reform and 1208
sustainable development principles 870 treaty drafting and 368, 910
UNCLOS III and 10 n38
UNHRC and 315, 316
use of force and 1118, 1139 n99
consent
maritime delimitation 590–1
peacekeeping operations 1227
territorial acquisition and 515–17
consent as basis of international law 9–11
dualism and 29–30, 131
municipal and international law interrelationship and 143
'new' states and 9
positivism and 131
treaties and 94–5, 148
USSR and 33
withdrawal of consent, effect 10 consent as basis for jurisdiction: see arbitration clause/agreement; ICJ jurisdiction, consent

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

consent and the formation of customary international law see also acquiescence
acquiescence 80–1, 89–91
implied consent 11, 34
Lotus 81
new states and 91
non-participation in practice 80–1, 84–5
persistent objector rule 91 regional or local customary law and 93 Consolato del Mare 19
conspiracy
cross-border jurisdiction 655
individual criminal responsibility 399
Nuremberg Charter (1945)/Tribunal 399
Constantinople Convention (1888) 540, 930
Constantinople, fall of 20 constituent instruments: see international organisations, constituent instruments consular access (VCCR 36)
Avena 135–6, 220–1, 774
as general principle of international law 389–90, 774 n435
LaGrand 135, 220–1, 773–4
Right to Information on Consular Assistance (IACtHR) 389–90, 773 n436
UN Mission in Kosovo incident 774 n435
US due process rules and 135–6, 220–1, 389–90 consular archives and documents
definition 763
inviolability (VCCR 33) 755, 773, 795
consular bag 761, 773
consular immunities arrest and detention 774
criminal proceedings and 774 diplomatic asylum and 774
functional nature 774
Koeppel and Koeppel 774
waiver 774 n438
consular premises
inviolability 772
protection obligation 772–3
tax exemption 773
consular privileges and immunities see also consular access (VCCR 36); consular immunities; Vienna Convention on Consular Relations (1963)
consular bag 761, 773
customs duties, exemption 772
freedom of communication 773
tax exemption 772
consular relations
consular functions 772 development of institution 751
exequatur, need for 772
exequatur as recognition of state 463
modern communication methods, effect 751
Consular Relations Convention (1963), diplomatic bag 761 consultation obligation
Atmospheric Pollution Convention (1979) 873
GATT XXII 1035
Non-Navigational Uses of International Waterways Convention (1997) 885
Vienna Convention on State Succession to State Property, Archives and Debts (1983) 1015 n22
Vienna Convention on Treaty Succession (1978) 1015 n22 Contadora negotiating process (Esquipulas II agreement) 1031 contiguity principle
in Africa 524
Arctic territory, claims to 535
contiguous zone 554, 578–80
12-mile limit 579–80
24-mile limit 580
as balance of coastal and non-coastal state interests 578–9 claim, need for 579 fiscal regulations 578, 579, 580
fishing rights 578
GCTS provisions 579–80

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

Gidel and 579
hot pursuit and 618
islands, right to 564–5
jurisdiction 657
maritime resources and 579
as part of EEZ 580
as part of high seas 579
sanitary regulations and 579
UNCLOS provisions 580
continental shelf 584–90, see also maritime delimitation airspace and 589
claims to 586, 588
coastal states' rights and duties 588–90
customary international law 585 n144, 596, 601 n243, see also Continental Shelf Convention (1958), customary international law
definition 584, 586–8
delimitation 592–605
distance criterion 597
EEZ and 586, 597 n217
equity and 108, 594–605
exploration and exploitation 589
GCTS provisions 586–7
geographical criterion for determining 586–7 history and development of concept 585–6
hot pursuit and 618
inherent right to 586 installations 589–90
intertemporal law 508–9
islands, right to 564–5, 588
mineral resources and 584–5, 588–9 as natural prolongation 586, 587–8, 592, 593, 594, 596, 606, 1024 navigation, fishing and conservation of living resources, unjustifiable interference 589 occupation/effective control, relevance 587
oil rigs 589–90
opposite and adjacent states 592 payments or contributions in kind for exploitation of 590 rocks, right to 588
safety zones 589
seabed, subsoil and waters around coast as alternative claim 585 sedentary species and 589, 624 n356 sovereign rights 588–9
submarine cables and pipelines 589
superjacent water as high seas 589
Third World and 555
title to 588–9
Truman Proclamation (1945) 585, 588–9
UNCLOS provisions 586, 587–8
wrecks and 589
Continental Shelf, Commission on the Limits of 587–8
membership 587–8
reporting obligations 588
Continental Shelf Convention (1958) 585, 587–8, 592–7 customary international law and 85–6, 87–8, 586–7, 591–5, 596–7, 599, 601 n243, 605–6, see also continental shelf, customary international law
reservations 916
third parties, applicability to 85–6, 87–8, 95–6
Control Council Law No. 10 400, 439
Cook Inlet 563–4
Cook Islands, international legal personality 239
Copenhagen Criteria (1993) 371 n164
corporal punishment 1196 n151
Corpus Juris Civilis 18
correspondence, freedom from unlawful interference, child (CRC 24) 331 corruption of arbitrators 1053
representative of state (VCLT 50) 942
Cosmos incident 546, 854
Costa Rica, recognition of government (1919) 455–6 Council of Europe 345–7, 1289, see also ECHR; ECtHR
aims 345, 1288
conventions and other instruments concluded under auspices of: see ECHR (1950); Minorities, Framework Convention for the

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

Council of Europe (cont.)
Protection of (1994) (CoE); Minority Languages, European Charter for Regional or Minority Languages (1992) establishment and role 345, 1288–9
European Social Charter: see European Social Charter (1961) (as amended) Honouring of Obligations and Commitments Committee 346 n5
human rights and 345–7
human rights and counter-terrorism, Guidelines (2002 and 2005) 1166
immunities 1319 n169
Macedonia and 346
membership 345–6, 1288
minorities, protection of 298, 365–8, see also Minorities, Framework Convention for the Protection of (1994) (CoE)
municipal law and 140
OSCE/CSCE and 378
Parliamentary Assembly 345, 1288
principles 345
Privileges and Immunities of the Council of Europe, General Agreement on (1949) 1319 n169
resolutions and recommendations 359
rule of law and 345, 350
Standing Conference of Local and Regional Authorities 345, 365
structure 345, 1288
USSR and 347 n8
websites 1337, 1340
Council of Europe Commissioner for Human Rights
establishment 346
individual petitions, exclusion 346 n6
object and purpose 346
opinion 347
recommendations 347
reporting obligations, absence 346 n6
Council of Europe, Committee of Ministers 345, 352 n38, 353–4, 359–60, 1288
advisory opinion, right to request 352 n38
CoE internal organisation, responsibility for 359 Declaration on Monitoring Arrangements (1994) 346 democracy, role in promotion of 359 implementation of ECtHR decisions and 353–4, 359–60
as political body 359 promotion of CoE's aims and 359 resolutions and recommendations and 359
counter-claims
challenge to admissibility 1097
defence distinguished 1096
direct connection with subject-matter of claim, need for 1096–7
ICJ 284, 1096–7
as independent claim 1096
ITLOS 641
as testing of the law 84 counterfeiting, jurisdiction 674
countermeasures
conditions attaching to 795–6
excluded measures (ILC Draft Articles on State Responsibility, art. 50) 795
Gabčíkovo–Nagymaros Project 794
previous internationally wrongful act, need for 794, 795 prior request for discontinuation of act, need for 794, 795–6
proportionality and 794, 795
responsibility for breach of international obligation and 127, 794–6, 1313 n141 termination of treaty as response to prior breach by other party (VCLT 60) 794, 947 courtesy 2
crab fisheries (Alaskan King Crab) 589
crimes against humanity
applicability outside armed conflict 438, 670
Cambodian Extraordinary Chambers and 422
East Timor Special Panels for Serious Crimes 425

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

ICC and 411, 670
ICTR and 408
ICTY and 404
individual criminal responsibility 46, 399, 402, 671
as international crimes 436–8
Iraqi High Tribunal 429
as 'most serious crime' 411, 670
Non-Applicability of Statutory Limitations Convention (1968) 669
non-combatants, applicability to 438
Nuremberg Charter (1945)/Tribunal 399, 400, 436, 669–70
Serbian War Crimes Chamber 429
as 'serious crime' 425
universal jurisdiction 668–73, 1200
war crimes distinguished 438
crimes against humanity, definition/classification as 670
apartheid 436–7, 438
cruel and inhuman treatment 436
deportation 408, 436
enforced disappearances 334, 436–7
extermination 408, 436
genocide 438, 670
imprisonment/detention during armed conflict 436
legality until law of territory where perpetrated, relevance 436 nuclear weapons, threat or use of 317 persecution on political, racial or religious grounds 408, 436
rape 408, 436
slavery 408, 436
torture 408, 436
widespread or systematic attack against civilian population 408
wilful killing/murder 408, 436
crimes against humanity, elements of the crime/relevant factors attack on civilian population, relationship with 438 knowledge of aims of attack 438 nationality of victim 438
personal motivation 438 policy or plan 437–8
widespread and systematic attack 437 crimes against humanity, jurisprudence Akayesu 437, 438
Kunurac 437–8
Martić 438
Tadić 437, 438
crimes against peace
aggression as 439, 671, 1123
individual criminal responsibility 399, 439
Nuremberg Charter (1945)/Tribunal 399, 400, 669–70
war crimes distinguished 670
Crimes against the Peace and Security of Mankind, ILC Draft Code (1996) 401, 402, 671
aut dedere aut judicare principle 671, 1160 individual criminal responsibility and 401, 439 n226, 671 omissions from 1991 Draft 671 prohibited weapons 1187 n101
universal jurisdiction and 671
crimes against UN and association personnel, individual criminal responsibility 402, 671
criminal jurisdiction 652–87
Antarctica 663
belligerent occupation 654 n38
Channel Tunnel fixed link 657
civil law practice 663
common law practice 663–4 concurrent jurisdiction 654–5
conspiracy 655
cross-border offences: see cross-border jurisdiction; effects doctrine illegal arrest: see forcible abduction/unlawful arrest immigration offences 655
internal waters 557
international crimes 398
international organisations and 1328
Israel–Jordan Peace Treaty (1994) 657–8 nationality principle 654, 659–64, see also nationality as basis of jurisdiction optional exercise 141–2, 652
outer space 548 n323

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

criminal jurisdiction (cont.)
passive personality principle, 664–6, see also passive personality principle piracy: see piracy presence of accused, relevance 672–3 protective principle 666–8, see also protective principle quasi-universal jurisdiction 673–83 territorial principle 652–8, see also territorial jurisdiction
territorial sea 141–2, 574, 656–7
'treaty crimes' 674–5 treaty provision 398–9, 673–80
universal principle 668–87, see also universal jurisdiction criminal responsibility: see individual criminal responsibility critical date
breach of treaty and 946 territorial acquisition 509–10
Croatia
see also Yugoslavia
confederation with Bosnia and Herzegovina 238 n215
demilitarisation 1229
economic sanctions (UNC 41) 1245–6
ethnic cleansing 316
human rights 982
human rights treaties and 982–3
minorities in 461
peacekeeping operations 1229
recognition of 201, 461
recognition and UN membership 201, 210, 962
state succession and 210, 962
treaty succession 982–3
UN membership 201
UNCRO 1259
cross-border jurisdiction
see also effects doctrine/extraterritorial jurisdiction on economic matters Channel Tunnel fixed link 657
customs control 658
definition 654–5
immigration controls 657–8
Israel–Jordan Peace Treaty (1994) and 657–8
Lockerbie bombing 654–5
cruel and inhuman treatment
as crime against humanity 436
as 'grave breach' 401, 434
cruel and inhuman treatment, classification as death penalty 322, 358
stoning 358
cruel and inhuman treatment, prohibition
ACHR 5 274, 381
civilians in wartime 1177
ECHR 3 357
individual criminal responsibility 401
interrogation techniques in Northern Ireland 357
non-derogation principle 274
non-international armed conflict 1195, 1196
prisoners of war (Geneva Convention (1949)) 1175 cruise missiles 189–90, 1134
CSCE: see OSCE/CSCE Cuba
Angola and 1150, 1228–9
embargoes 693 n251, 1130
human rights in 305, 383
missile crisis 8, 1153, 1233
secession from Spain (1898) 975
US sanctions 692–3, 694–5
cultural co-operation 373 cultural genocide 283 cultural heritage
state archives and 994, 996
state succession to state property and 991, 996
UNCLOS and 994
cultural identity
CIS Convention 378
migrant workers and (MWC 31) 333
cultural objects in armed conflict 1186
attacks on as 'grave breach' 401, 403
military necessity and 1186
cultural objects, restitution 802 n154 cultural relativism 41–2, 268–70 culture, right to protection of

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

Banjul Charter 391
as collective right 281
EU Charter of Fundamental Rights (2000) 371
indigenous peoples 298
minorities 294, 296, 297, 366
currency counterfeiting, individual criminal responsibility 399 currency and exchange restrictions Bosnia and Herzegovina 380 n213
international organisations, privileges and immunities 1328
international organisations, representatives of states to 1322 customary international law 72–98, see also codification and development of international law; consent and the formation of customary international law; customary law; opinio juris; regional international law; sources of international law (ICJ 38); state practice as source of international law, requirements
burden/standard of proof 92 consensus and 10, 74, 93, 147 n88
definition 6
as democratic process 74
determination of existence, responsibility for 75–6 as 'evidence of general practice accepted as law' 74
as evolving process 902
flexibility 74, 78–9, 93
ILC role 120
'instant' 74, 78
municipal law and 166–7, 173, 174–6
positivism and 51, 75
as reflection of interests of individual states 79–80 usage distinguished 115 customary international law as reflected in treaties and comparable international instruments bilateral treaties and 97–8
co-existence of treaty and customary law 85–6, 87–8, 96–7, 555, 586–7, 591–5, 596–7, 599, 601 n243, 605–6, 716–17, 752, 928–9, 984, 990, 1132, 1167–8, 1187–8
codification and development of international law distinguished 85–6, 95 Continental Shelf Convention 85–6, 87–8, 586–7, 591–5, 596–7, 599, 601 n243, 605–6 development/creation of customary international law and 95–6, 556
Geneva Conventions (1949) and Protocol I 1184 n87, 1187
Hague Convention IV (1899) and Regulations (1907) 1168 n7, 1187–8
Law of the Sea Convention (1982) 556, 559, 568
opinio juris and 88–9
Racial Discrimination Convention (1965) 286
UN Charter 929
Vienna Convention on State Succession to State Property, Archives and Debts (1983) 986, 987, 990, 1000
Vienna Convention on Treaties (1969) 496, 903, 933, 948, 951
Vienna Convention on Treaty Succession (1978) 976
customary law
see also customary international law; regional international law
definition 72 n8
democratic nature of 74
development of 72–3
indigenous peoples 229, 299, 300
international law, relevance to 41, 73–4 local practices 92–3
municipal law, relevance in 73
customs control
consular exemption 772
contiguous zone and 578, 579, 580
cross-border jurisdiction 658
diplomatic exemption 767, 770 n413
EEZ 583, 643
international organisations, privileges and immunities 1328
territorial sea and 570, 572
customs unions, status 202, 211–12, 954

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

customs zones 579
Cyprus
federal status 235
independence (1960) 235, 294 n166, 987 n163
international law in municipal courts 170–1
state succession to public property (1960) 987
treaties/municipal law relationship 170–1
Turkish invasion 1228
UN mediation 1221
UN Secretary-General and 1227
Cyprus, Turkish Republic of Northern (TRNC)
as de facto administered entity 236
international legal personality 235–6
recognition, refusal of 236, 464, 478–9, 1269
SC resolutions 235–6, 469–70, 1269
UN peacekeeping 1227
Czech Republic
boundaries 968 n69
establishment 209
UN membership 985, 1211
Czech and Slovak Republic
dissolution 198, 209, 980, 992–3
nationality 1008
state succession to state property 992–3
treaty succession 980–1
uti possidetis principle 968
Czechoslovakia
see also Gabčíkovo–Nagymaros Project
German invasion of 468, 501–2
Gulf War and 1253 n246
minorities in 293 n164
treaty succession 970
UDHR and 278–9
USSR invasion of/intervention in 35, 36, 57, 1233–4

damages for, individual criminal responsibility 416 damages/compensation for expropriation or breach of international law, measure see also Chorzów Factory principle/restitutio in integrum actual investment 836
applicable law 840
'appropriate compensation' 834
BITs and 839–40
Charter of Economic Rights and Duties of States (1974) 834–5
customary international law 834–5 debts or monies due 835
direct and foreseeable damage 836
discounted cash flow (DCF) and 836 Energy Charter Treaty 835, 837 n350
exemplary damages 804–5
fair market value 805, 835–7 injury to citizens or their property 1101–2 interest and 802 n152
just compensation 835 n333
lawfulness of taking and 836–7 lost profits 804, 836–7
lump-sum settlement 823, 840–1, 1044–5 material damage, in absence of 805 moral damages 802, 805
NAFTA 835 n335
offset 802 n152
pain and suffering 805
physical assets 835
prompt, adequate and effective 834, 835 property of nationals 933–4
punitive damages 804–5
treaties of friendship, commerce and navigation and 840 n395
UN Compensation Commission 1045
UNGA resolution 1803 (XVII) (Permanent sovereignty over natural resources) 834–5 wilful or negligent action or omission of injured party and 802 n152, 1102 World Bank Foreign Direct Investment Guidelines (1992) 835 damages/compensation for expropriation or breach of international law, measure, jurisprudence

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

AMCO 103
Aminoil 834
Amoco 837
INA 836–7
Metalclad 836
SEDCO 841
Texaco 834
Danube
see also Gabčíkovo–Nagymaros Project
economic sanctions (UNC 41) 1245–6
Danube Commission 28, 76, 1283–4, 1306 n109
Danzig, status 231 n176
Dar al-Islam 18
Dardenelles Straits (Montreux Convention (1936)) 578
Darfur 1265–6, see also Sudan
African Commission resolution on 393
SC referral to the ICC 412
UN–AU joint peacekeeping force 1230 n132
UNAMID 1266, 1267
Dayton Agreement (1995)
see also Bosnia and Herzegovina
Bosnia War Crimes Chamber and 427 n166 Bosnian Commission on Human Rights and 1034 constitution of Bosnia and Herzegovina as independent state 239 n217, 461 economic and arms sanctions and 210, 1246 equitable principles and 109
High Representative and 204–5, 231–2
Human Rights Chamber of Bosnia and Herzegovina: see Bosnia and Herzegovina Human Rights Chamber
ICTY and 406 n57
IFOR and 1260, 1279–80
implementation, responsibility for 231–2
OSCE role in Bosnia 377 n201, 1033–4, 1274 n343
Peace Implementation Council 231–2
Yugoslavia (FRY), renaming as 284 n105
DDT 874
de Visscher, C. 79, 507
death penalty
see also executions African Commission working party 393
as arbitrary deprivation of life (ACHR 4) 390 child/minors 318, 395 n298
as cruel and inhuman treatment 322
due process and 321, 390, 1196 n151
extradition and 321, 358
interim measures and 320
Iraqi High Tribunal 429
legal representation, right to 321
pregnant women and 318
death penalty, abolition
Death Penalty, Inter-American Protocol on the Abolition of (1990) 384
ECHR Protocol XIII 348
ICCPR, second Optional Protocol and 322 n315
'debt for nature' swaps 851
debt recovery, use of force and 1121 n14 Declaration on the Granting of Independence to Colonial Countries and Peoples (1960) (UNGA resolution 1514 (XV)) importance in history of decolonisation 253
self-determination, right to 40, 115–16, 252–3, 255, 256
territorial integrity 290
uti possidetis principle 290
Declaration on Principles of International Law Concerning Friendly Relations (1970) (UNGA resolution 2625 (XXV))
as aid to interpretation of UN Charter 1123
colonial territories and 495
equality of states 214
good faith fulfilment of obligations 104

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

Declaration on Principles (cont.)
ICCPR and ICESCR and 253–4
non-binding effect 1123–4
non-interference principle and 213, 1123, 1127
as opinio juris 115 peaceful settlement of disputes 1013, 1123 prohibition of the use of force and 469, 1123–4 rebels, assistance to 1152–3 reprisals, prohibition 671, 1123
self-determination, right to 116, 252–3, 256, 290, 522, 526, 1123, 1148
territorial acquisition and 502, 508 n110
territorial integrity 469, 1123
use of force (UNC 2(4)) and 1123–5
wars of aggression as crime against peace 1123 Declarations
Armed Intervention in the Domestic Affairs of States (UNGA resolution 2131 (XX)) 1127
Elimination of All Forms of Intolerance and of Discrimination Based on Religion or Belief 287 n128
Elimination of Violence against Women (1994) (UNGA resolution 48/104) 287 n129, 325
Enhancement of the Effectiveness of the Principle of Refraining from the Threat or Use of Force in International Relations (UNGA resolution 42/22) 1123 n24
Human Rights of Individuals who are not Nationals of the Country in which they Live (UNGA resolution 40/144) 826 Measures to Eliminate International Terrorism (UNGA resolutions 49/60 and 51/210) 1160–1
non-binding effect 1222
Outer Space (UNGA resolutions 1962 (XVII) and 51/126) 544
Protection from torture/cruel, inhuman and degrading treatment (UNGA resolution 3452 (XXX)) 327
Religious Intolerance 305
Right to Development (UNGA resolution 41/128) 301–2
Rights and Duties of States, ILC Draft (1949) 134 n17
Rights of Indigenous Peoples (2007) 299, 307 n220 Rights of Persons Belonging to National or Ethnic, Religious and Linguistic Minorities (UNGA resolution 47/135) 297
decolonisation
see also Declaration on the Granting of Independence to Colonial Countries and Peoples (1960) (UNGA resolution 1514 (XV)); uti possidetis doctrine/stability of boundaries creation of new states and 198, 199
devolution agreements 958, 967, 979
international law and 38–40, 44
national liberation movements (NLMs), role 245 non-alignment and 1287
state archives and 994–5
state succession to state property 977, 990 n182, 994–5
State Succession to State Property, Archives and Debts (1983), Vienna Convention on (1983) 977
territorial acquisition and 492
Third World, impact on attitudes of 269 treaty succession: see treaty succession
UN and 1205
UN Special Committee 253, 303
deep sea mining: see seabed resources (UNCLOS, Part XI) defence ministers, immunity ratione personae 740 n235 deforestation 866 n118, 875
demilitarised zones, status 969, 1221 n85, 1229–30, 1248, 1257, 1259 n270

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

democracy
as basis for human rights 268
humanitarian intervention and 1158
and international law 27
Office for Democratic Institutions and Human Rights (OSCE) 1289
recognition of states and 452
democracy, right to
CoE and 359
Copenhagen Final Act (1990) and 374
denial of justice, standard of treatment of aliens and 825
Denmark
Arctic claims 535
civil jurisdiction 652
extraterritorial jurisdiction, blocking legislation 691 n238
Gulf War and 1253 n246
Denmark/Iceland Union
dissolution 996 n215
state archives and 996 n215
deportation or transfer of protected persons (GC IV, 49) 1169–70, 1180
as crime against humanity 408, 436
as 'grave breach' 401, 408, 434
ICTR 408
individual criminal responsibility 1200
right of 826
deportation/expulsion
see also collective expulsion, prohibition of alien lawfully resident (ECHR Protocol VII) 348 Boffolo 826
duty to receive expelled national 827 n291 enforcement of expulsion orders 347 n8 European Convention on Establishment (1956) 827
gender discrimination and 321
ICCPR 13 826–7
reasons, need for 826
torture and (TC 3) 327, 329
detention
see also prompt hearing, right to African Commission Special Rapporteur 392–3
'cleansing' operations in Chechen Republic and 347
Committee for the Prevention of Torture, right to visit places of 363–5 Torture Sub-Committee on 330 developing countries
see also self-determination; Third World climate change and 869, 879, 881
diplomatic communications, rights relating to 759 n356
environmental protection and 869
national identity and 35, 40–1
North–South axis 41
ozone depletion and 869 n132
SC membership 39–40
seabed resources and 555, 628
standard of treatment of aliens and 823
state immunity and 710
USSR approach to international law and 35 development, right to see also sustainable development principle
Banjul Charter 391
CESCR General Comment 3 302
as collective right 301
Declaration on Right to Development (UNGA resolution 41/128) 301–2
Energy for Development, UN Committee on 1213 n42
sustainable development (Rio Principle 3) and 302
UNCHR working group on 304
Vienna Declaration and Programme of Action (1994) 302
Working Group on 302
differential treatment, justifiable 288–9, 296–7, 318, 324
affirmative action 288–9, 296–7, 318, 324
CEDAW General Comment 5 324 forms of 324
diplomatic archives and documents, inviolability (VCLT 24) 755, 795

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

diplomatic asylum: see asylum
diplomatic bag
see also diplomatic communications, rights relating to abuse, protection against 759–61
consular bag 761, 773
Consular Relations Convention (1963) and 761
customary international law 760 n346
definition 759 n337
Dikko incident (1984) 758
electronic screening, legitimacy 760, 761
ILC Draft Articles on the Diplomatic Courier and the Diplomatic Bag (1989) 759 n337, 761
Libyan embassy siege and 760
lorry, whether 759 n342
preservation and protection of human life and 760–1 protest against violation 759–60 reservations to Vienna Convention 760
Rome airport incident (1964) 759 n342 visible markings and contents 759 diplomatic communications, rights relating to 759–62 developing countries' views on 759 n356 diplomatic bag: see diplomatic bag freedom/protection of 759 messages in code and cipher 759
wireless transmitter, need for permission 759 diplomatic courier, privileges and immunities 761–2 diplomatic functions promotion of information and friendly relations 753 representation and protection of interests and nationals of sending state 753
as sovereign activity 725–7 diplomatic head of mission/ambassador agrément, need for/reasons for refusal 753 classes of 753
named individual requirement 753
presentation of credentials, effect 753
diplomatic immunities (personal)
absolute nature 737, 738 n227
of ambassador 737
civil and administrative jurisdiction 766–70
criminal jurisdiction of receiving state 766, 770 employment contracts: see employment contracts, state immunity in relation to execution 767
ICJ judges 1059–60
immovable property exception 766
motoring offences 766
private professional or commercial activity exception 767, 769–70 succession matters exception 766–7 summons as witness 767
UK Memorandum on Diplomatic Privileges and Immunities in the UK 767 diplomatic immunities (personal), waiver 771–2 counter-claims and 771
express waiver, need for 771, 772 inter partes undertaking, effect 771–2 rarity 771
as right of sending state 771–2
US Guidance with regard to Personal Rights and Immunities of Foreign Diplomatic and Consular Personnel 771 waiver from execution distinguished 771 diplomatic missions persona non grata, practice relating to declaration of 186, 753, 759, 766, 770 reduction of staff as sanction (SC resolution 748 (1992)) 753 diplomatic obligations non-interference in domestic affairs 753 respect for laws and regulations of host state 753

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

diplomatic premises
'full facilities for the performance of the functions of the mission' (VCLT 25) 762 immunity from search, requisition, attachment or execution 762 Iranian Hostages case: see United States Diplomatic and Consular Staff in Tehran Case (USA v. Iran) (Iranian hostages case) in the table of cases mission premises and diplomatic residences distinguished 762–3 recognition as 463 n78
state immunity and 728, 755, 762–3
tax exemption (VCLT 23) 762
UK State Immunity Act 1978 762–3
unsuitable use 755
use compatible with diplomatic functions obligation 755 VCLT provisions 762–3
diplomatic premises, abandonment 757–8
break in relations and 758 n329
Cambodian embassy in London 747–8
Iranian embassy in London 758
squatters' rights 757 n328
transfer of title to host state 757–8
UK practice 757–8
US practice 758 n329
diplomatic premises, inviolability 754–9 Chinese embassy in Belgrade, US bombing of 756 emergency entry 754
entry with consent 757 n324 Iraqi embassy in Pakistan 754 n309
justification, possibility of 754
Libyan embassy in London 756–7, 760
Nicaraguan embassy in Panama 754 n309 obligation to protect and 755–6 respect and protection obligation following break in relations distinguished 756 self-defence, right of and 756–7 Ugandan embassy in Kinshasa 755–6 diplomatic premises, obligation to protect 754–8 Congo v. Uganda 755–6
due diligence obligation 1327–8
Ethiopian entry, ransacking and seizure of Eritrean Embassy residence 756 n319
reciprocity and 754
US embassy and consular premises in China 756
US embassy in Tehran 755 diplomatic privileges (personal) see also diplomatic immunities (personal); Internationally Protected Persons Convention (1973) administrative and technical staff, entitlement 768 Congo v. Uganda 765
customs duties and inspection 767, 770 n413 diplomatic bag: see diplomatic bag; diplomatic communications, rights relating to diplomatic couriers 761–2 diplomats' families, entitlement 767–8
duration 768–70
entitlement, evidence of 765
Eritrean detention of Ethiopian Chargé d'Affaires 765 n372
following termination of office 738 n225 freedom of movement and travel 764 head of state entitlement to 737
ICJ judges 1059–60
inviolability of papers, correspondence and property 765 inviolability of person 764–5
inviolability of private residence 765
Iranian Hostages case: see United States Diplomatic and Consular Staff in Tehran Case (USA v. Iran) (Iranian hostages case) in the table of cases Islamic law (aman) 18
nationality, relevance 767, 768

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

diplomatic privileges (cont.) notification of appointment, arrival and departure of members of mission and family members, need for 768–9 protection obligation 764
ratione personae 737, 738, 740
reciprocity and 764
recognition of state/government, dependence on 453, 454, 471–2 social security provisions, exemption 767 sovereign immunity as source of 751
state immunity and 709 n63, 755 n314 tax exemption 767, 768 n384, 770 n413
territorial integrity/territorial sovereignty, respect for as basis 697, 751 UNGA resolution 53/97 (condemnation of violence against diplomatic and consular missions and persons) 764
diplomatic protection
see also nationality of claims; protection of nationals abroad, use of force; standard of treatment of aliens BITs and 818 n244
customary international law 811
definition 809–10
dual nationality and 815
espousal of claim principle 258, 810, 1044
EU citizens and 810 n211
exhaustion of local remedies, need for 811, 819–20, 1071–2
flag state jurisdiction and 819
ILC Articles on State Responsibility and 809
justiciability 188–9
legitimate expectations 188, 812
mediation and 809
mixed arbitral tribunals/claims commissions and 823 national working for international organisation and 811 212
scope 809
shareholders 817–18
ships 819
statelessness and 810–11
UK Rules regarding the Taking up of International Claims by HMG 811–12, 814, 818 Diplomatic Protection, ILC Draft Articles on (2006)
art. 4 (state of nationality of natural person) 812 n223, 814
art. 6(1) (dual nationality: joint protection) 815 n233
art. 7 (claim against state of nationality) 815
art. 8 (stateless persons and refugees) 811–12
art. 9 (nationality of corporation) 817
art. 14 (exhaustion of local remedies) 820
art. 15 (effective remedy) 820 diplomatic protection, jurisprudence Abbasi 812
Application of Genocide Convention case 809 n202
Barcelona Traction 811, 816–17
Diallo 817–18
Iran–US Tribunal cases 815
Mavrommatis 810
Mergé case 815
Nottebohm 813–14
diplomatic relations 750–72, see also Diplomatic Relations Convention (1961) (VCDR)
armed conflict and 752
dispute settlement and 1014–47
history 54–5, 750–2
international rights and duties in absence of 471
modern communication methods, effect 751
mutual consent, need for 752–3 reciprocal nature of obligations 751–2 recognition de facto and 460
recognition of governments and 457, 458, 460, 467, 471

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

special missions: see Special Missions Convention (1969); special missions, immunities statehood, as criterion of 198, 202, 244, 451, 453 diplomatic relations, break
as alternative to withdrawal of recognition 467 break or reduction of representation as response to threat to the peace (UNC 41) 753, 1242, 1245, 1248 respect for and protection of diplomatic premises following 756 Diplomatic Relations Convention (1961) (VCDR) 752–72 armed conflict, applicability in case of 752 codification/development of international law 752 customary international law, continuing role 752 drafting process 120
entry into force 903
ICJ jurisdiction 1079
non-parties, applicability to 770
reservations 760
scope and general approach 752
diplomatic representation, as sovereign power 217 diplomatic status, responsibility for determining 193 Disabilities, Committee on the Rights of Persons with confidential inquiries 334
grave or systematic violations, right to inquire into 334
individual communications 334
inter-state complaints 334
membership 334
reporting obligations 334
Disabilities, Convention on the Rights of Persons with (2006)
conclusion 334
discrimination, prohibition 334 states' obligations 334
disabled persons, rights
children (CRC 23) 331
ESC and 361
General Comment (UNCESCR) No. 5 310
Vienna Declaration and Programme of Action (1993) 280
disappearances: see enforced disappearances disarmament, UN Special Sessions 1212 n33 discovery, Antarctica 536 discovery as means of territorial acquisition 504, 508 discrimination: see gender discrimination; non-discrimination principle; racial discrimination; religious discrimination Discrimination Sub-Commission: see Human Rights, Sub-commission on the Promotion and Protection of dispute settlement 1010–56, see also African Union, dispute settlement; Arab League, dispute settlement; League of Nations, dispute settlement; NATO, dispute settlement; OAS, dispute settlement; OSCE/CSCE, dispute settlement; peacekeeping operations; and individual tribunals commitment to peaceful settlement as criterion for recognition of state 452 compulsory adjudication, increasing acceptability 1115
consent, need for 1012
Declaration on Principles of International Law (1970) 1013
diplomatic procedures and adjudication distinguished 1011, 1047
'dispute' 1012
EEZ 583
EU 1038
existence of a dispute, need for 1012 Fisheries Disputes Chamber 640 n443
fishing rights 635, 636–7
friendly settlement as preferred option 342–3, 353, 387, 1216

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

dispute settlement (cont.)
ICSID: see ICSID
justiciable and non-justiciable disputes, distinguishability 1012–13
'legal' dispute 1012–13
marine scientific research 636
methods 1013–14, see also commissions of inquiry; conciliation; conciliation commissions; good offices/mediation; law of the sea, dispute settlement (UNCLOS Part XV); negotiation as means of dispute settlement; OSCE/CSCE multiple methods used in conjunction 1011–12 obligation to settle disputes by peaceful means (UNC 2(3)) 1013
political context 1013
regional arrangements (UNC Chapter VIII) 1024–6, see also regional arrangements for the maintenance of international peace and security (UNC Chapter VIII) reservations to treaty provisions 921 seabed resources: see Seabed Disputes Chamber (UNCLOS 186–91)
specialised agencies and 1034–5
Treaties between States and International Organisations Convention (1986) and 945–6 treaties, invalidity, termination, withdrawal or suspension (VCLT 65–6) 952–3
use of force, prohibition 1123 dispute settlement, agreements relating to see also law of the sea, dispute settlement (UNCLOS Part XV)
Bogotá Pact (1948) 1023, 1031
Chad–Libya Framework Agreement on the Peaceful Settlement of the Territorial Dispute (1989) 1011
Conciliation and Arbitration, CSCE Convention on (1992) 378
European Convention for the Peaceful Settlement of Disputes (1957) 1023, 1032
interpretation of 936
Manila Declaration on the Peaceful Settlement of International Disputes (1982) (UNGA resolution 37/10) 1013 n17, 1014 nn18 and 20, 1016 n28, 1026 n78
OSCE Convention on Conciliation and Arbitration (1992) 1033
Vienna Convention on State Succession to State Property, Archives and Debts (1983) 1015 n22
Vienna Convention on Treaty Succession (1978) 1015 nn22 and 23, 1023–4
WWI Peace Treaties 936
dissolution of states
Austro-Hungarian Empire 293, 974, 980 n131, 999
by consent 208–9
continuity of states and 209
Czech and Slovak Republic 198, 209, 980, 992–3
Denmark/Iceland Union 996 n215 extinction of territory and 208 n52
as fact 208
federal states 210, 218
gradual dissolution 959–60 illegal use of force and 208 internal upheavals and 208 Irish Free State/UK (1921) 999
legal consequences 208
Mali Federation (1960) 974, 980
Norway/Sweden Union 980
Rhodesia and Nyasaland, Federation of (1963) 980
state practice 980
treaty succession 974, 979–81
United Arab Republic 974, 980
USSR 36, 44, 198, 207, 209, 240–1, 315–16, 345, 527, 960–2, 993
Yugoslavia (SFRY) 36, 198, 209–10, 959–60 dissolution of states, state succession and 960–3
nationality and 1007–8
public debt 998–1001
state archives 996

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

distress 797–8
force majeure distinguished 797
responsibility for breach of international obligation and 1313 n141
Dogger Bank incident (1904) 1020 domestic jurisdiction principle (UNC 2(7)) 488, 493, 647–9, 1205, see also intervention in the affairs of another state, justification; intervention in the affairs of another state, prohibition acquisition of title and 493
Chapter VII enforcement action as exception to 1237, 1267 colonial issues and 212–13, 649 definition as matter of international law 648 n8, 1084, 1205 diplomatic obligations and 753 erosion of 648–9
as general principle of international law 649, 1205
human rights and: see human rights, state sovereignty/domestic jurisdiction principle and ICJ jurisdiction and 1083–4
individual petition, effect of agreement to 273 interaction between international and domestic law and 648–9 OSCE/CSCE and 375–6
premature recognition of states and 460–1 relativity of concept 212, 648
state sovereignty and 212–14
territorial integrity and 522
treatment of own nationals and 648 domestic violence against women 324, 325, 385
armed conflict and 1197–8 domicile as basis for civil jurisdiction 647, 650, 651, 652, 663
Dominican Republic
human rights in 383
ILO and 341
UNHRC and 315 n271
double criminality principle 686
Dover Straits, France–UK Agreement (1988) 577 drug abuse
UN Special Session 1212 n33
websites 1339
Drug Control Programme 1213
drug trafficking
Convention against Illicit Traffic in Narcotic Drugs and Psychotropic Substances (1988) 674 n134
ILC Draft Code on Crimes against the Peace and Security of Mankind (1991) 671 n119
individual criminal responsibility 399
international court, proposal for 410 jurisdiction, treaty provision 673, 674
UNCLOS 108 616 n328
visit and search, rights of 619 drugs, protection of child from illicit use (CRC 33) 331 dual nationality
diplomatic protection and 815
equality of states and 815
ICSID and 1042
Iran–US Claims Tribunal 815, 1044
Mergé case 815
state succession and 1004–5
dualism 29–30
consent as basis 29, 131
definition 131, 132–3
inconsistencies of doctrine 30
transformation doctrine 139
Triepel and 29–30
due diligence
appropriateness test 861
diplomatic premises, inviolability and 1327–8
environmental damage, state responsibility 854–6, 861, 887–8
flexibility of concept 855
international organisations and 1318
proportionality and 861
Sierra Leone Special Court 420 n126
state responsibility and 785, 791
treaty provision (general) 855–6
ultra-hazardous activities 887–8
UNCLOS provision 855

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

due process/fair trial
ACHR 8 390
Arab Charter on Human Rights 395
Copenhagen Final Act (1990) and 374
death penalty and 321, 390
deprivation as 'grave breach' 434
ECHR 6 348, 357, 716–17
Extraordinary Chambers of Cambodia 422
Helsinki Final Act (1975) 373
ICC 55 441–2
ICC 66 442
ICC 67 442–3
ICCPR 14 315
ICTR 20 441
ICTY 21 406, 440–1
Iraqi High Tribunal 429
legal representation, right to 321
non-international armed conflict 1195
state immunity and 716–17
UDHR 9 and 10 279
UN Compensation Commission (Iraq) 1047 n220
UNHRC General Comment 32 319
Duguit, L. 53–4
dum-dum bullets 1189
Dunant, Henry 1168
duties to the state 392

East Timor
applicable law 425
international legal personality 233–4
occupation by Indonesia 425
SC resolutions 233–4
self-determination, right to 255
UNGA resolutions 1021 n59
UNMISET 234, 425, 1230
UNTAET 233–4, 424–5, 1230
East Timor Special Panels for Serious Crimes
applicable law 425
Armando Dos Santos 425
composition 425
crimes against humanity 425
establishment (UNTAET Regulation 2000/15) 424–5 genocide and 425
individual criminal responsibility 425
judges 425
jurisdiction 425
murder 425
non-retroactivity of UNTAET Regulation 425
sexual offences 425
suspension of operations 425
torture 425
Eastern Europe
minorities in 293–4, 297–8
post-WWI states 448
SC and 1207
uti possidetis doctrine/stability of boundaries and 527–8
Eastern Slavonia 1229–30, see also UNTAES EBRD
dissolution provisions 1329
privileges and immunities 1319 n168, 1321
sustainable development and 869 n136
EC
international legal personality 241
as 'legal order' 241
ECA (UN Economic Commission for Africa) 1213
ECAFE 262
ECE (UN Economic Commission for Europe) 1213
ECHR (1950) 347–60
belligerent occupation, applicability in case of 1183
binding nature 46
Bosnia, applicability to 379
CIS Human Rights Convention and 379
conclusion 347
customary international law and 716
'decision in accordance with the law' 348
EU and 369–70
European public order and 349, 354
'general principles of international law' 933–4
implementation, choice of means 348, 357, see also Bosnia

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

and Herzegovina Human Rights Chamber; ECtHR
'in time of emergency' (ECHR 15) 357–8 incorporation 348
individual's standing 46, 259, 352, 353
KFOR operations and 350–1
limitation/claw-back provisions 275 n57, 348, 357–8
margin of appreciation 356–7
national security considerations 358
non-derogation principle 274, 356
objective nature of obligations 348–9 obligation to make inquiry/investigate 358 obligation to take steps to safeguard life 358 reservations 354 n52, 916–17
rule of law and 347
SC resolutions, primacy (UNC 103) 1183 n79
state immunity and 716–17
state responsibility and 349–50
underlying principles 347
'within the jurisdiction' (ECHR 1)/extraterritorial application 276, 349–50, 658 n55, 687, 826
ECHR (1950), interpretation
as constitutional instrument of European public order 349 effectiveness principle 349, 352 n37
municipal law and 156
principles of international law, conformity with 349, 717 subsequent changes, need to reflect (living instrument principle) 349, 937–8 teleological approach (object and purpose) 349
ECJ 1038
EU fisheries disputes and 635 individual's rights and 46
municipal courts and 140, 156–7
website 1338
ECLAC (UN Economic Commission for Latin America) 1213
ECOMOG 1029, 1276–8
Economic Community of West African States: see ECOWAS economic relations, international law and 40 economic restrictions as retorsion 1128 economic sanctions as response to threat to or breach of the peace (UNC 41) 4–5, 1242–51, see also arms sanctions as response to threat to or breach of the peace (UNC 41); blockades; boycotts against individuals or entities 1250 Al-Qaida/Taliban 1163 n225 challenge to inclusion on list, right of (SC resolution 1730 (2006)) 1250–1
Chapter VII action 4 conflict with EU or municipal law, possibility of 154–5
evaluation 1250–1
Haiti 1239–40, 1243, 1276
Iraq and 4, 1243–4, 1276
Korean war and 4
League of Nations and 1217
necessity 3–4
no-fly zones 1156, 1254–5, 1258, 1275 n349, 1279
non-recognition policy and 470 obligation to implement 154–5
Rhodesia 4, 469, 1242–3
Sanctions Assistance Missions 1033 n141
Sanctions Committee (FRY) 1246
Sanctions Committee (Iraq) 1243–4 Sanctions Committee (Libya) 1245
sanctions committees 1208
SC 1267 monitoring committee 1163 n225
Yugoslavia (SFRY) 210
Economic, Social and Cultural Rights Committee: see UNCESCR
Economic, Social and Cultural Rights, Inter-American Protocol (1985) individual/state petition and 384
reporting obligations 384
trade unions, right to organise and join 384

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

economic and social rights
ACHR 26 381
African Commission working group 393
IAComHR and 383
rights of the child and 317
USSR and 268–9
ECOSOC
human rights responsibilities 303–4
membership 1213
national liberation movements (NLMs) and 246
recommendations, non-binding effect 1213
role and powers 1213
subsidiary organs 1213
voting 1213
ecosystems 856–8, 871, 876 n176, 878, 886
ECOWAS
constituent instrument 1029
Democracy and Good Governance Protocol (2001) 1029 dispute settlement role 1029, 1038, 1276–8
ECOMOG 1029, 1276–8
Guinea-Bissau 1029, 1278 n365
Liberia and 1029, 1276–8
Liberia–Sierra Leone buffer zone 1277
Mechanism for Conflict Prevention, Management and Resolutions, Peacekeeping and Security (1999) 1029 Mediation and Security Council 1029 n108
membership 1276
Protocol on Non-Aggression (1978) 1276
as regional arrangement (Chapter VII) 1276–8
SC/AU endorsement of action in Somalia 1277
Sierra Leone and 1029
Standing Mediation Committee 1276
websites 1340
ECSC, international legal personality 241
ECtHR 351–60
ECtHR, admissibility
6-months rule 355
exhaustion of local remedies 273–4, 355–6
oral hearings 352
prejudice, need for 360 procedure for determining 351–2 ECtHR, decisions
binding effect 353
Committee of Ministers, role 353–4, 359–60
ICJ, divergence from 1116
implementation, responsibility for 353
municipal courts and 140
precedent and 352
publication 353
ECtHR, jurisdiction, powers and role
advisory opinions 352–3
effective examination of issues 352 n37 fact-finding, avoidance 357 friendly settlement 353 interim measures (RoP 39) 352 n37
subsidiarity principle 356–7
ECtHR, organisation and procedure
1998 reorganisation (Protocol XI) 351, 353–4
2004 reforms (Protocol XIV) 360
ad hoc judges 1061 n21
Chambers, composition 351, 354
Committees (3 judges) 351
full-time status 353
Grand Chamber 351
Grand Chamber, referral to 352, 353, 354
Judge Rapporteurs 351–2
judges, appointment 351
judges, participation in different stages of same case 354
President (Chambers) 351
President and Vice-presidents (Court) 351 public hearings 353
rules of procedure 351 Sections 351
third party intervention 353
website 1336

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

women, failure to include in nominations list 352 n38
workload 360
ECtHR, remedies
just satisfaction 353, 359, 806 n184
measures to prevent recurrence/end continuing violation 360
publication of information provided by state 360 ECtHR, standing/locus standi
abstract issues/actio popularis, exclusion 354–5 individual applications 259, 352, 353
inter-state applications 352, 354
'victim of a violation' 355
Ecuador, Bogotá Declaration (1976) 552
Education, Convention against Discrimination in (1960), complaints procedure 342 education, right to
ACHR 13 384
CIS Convention 378
ECHR Protocol I 348
Education Rights of Minorities, OSCE Hague Recommendation (1996) 376 n194
environmental protection and 847
ICESCR 13 308–9
indigenous peoples 299
migrants (MWC 30) 333
UDHR 26 279
educational co-operation 373
EEZ 580–4
artificial islands 582, 589
as balance between coastal and non-coastal state interests 580
claims to 583
coastal states' rights and duties 582
contiguous zone as part of 580 continental shelf and 586, 597 n217
customary international law and 74, 583, 601 n243
customs control 583, 643
dispute settlement 583, 636–7
equity and 108, 583
establishment of concept 554
fish stocks and 624
fishing zones and 580–2, 583
freedom of navigation 582
hot pursuit and 618
islands, right to 564–5, 582
marine pollution 899
marine scientific research 582, 583 n134
non-coastal states' rights and duties 582–3 North Sea, Declaration on the Co-ordinated Extension of Jurisdiction in 583
opposite and adjacent states 592
overflight, right of 582
pollution-free zones and 583
seabed and subsoil rights, exclusion 597 security/neutrality zones and 584 straits and 576–7
submarine cables and pipelines 582
Third World and 555
UNCLOS provisions 582–3
USA–USSR Maritime Boundary Agreement (1990) 584
width 582
effective remedy, right to see also exhaustion of local remedies
Charter of Paris (1990) 375
ECHR 13 348, 358–9
UDHR 8 279
effectivités: see territorial title/territorial sovereignty, evidence of including effectivités effects doctrine/extraterritorial jurisdiction on economic matters 688–92
as balancing exercise 689–90 blocking legislation 691–2 COCOM ban 692
comity and 689 n218, 690
diplomatic protest 691 n238
'effect' 689
EU and 694–5
EU competition law and 695–6
EU–USA, Agreement Regarding the Application of Competition Laws (1991) 694
EU–USA, Memorandum of Understanding on Cuban sanctions 1997 694–5

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

effects doctrine/extraterritorial (cont.)
freezing of Iranian assets and 692 Helms-Burton legislation 693–5
nationality issues and 688 n219
OAS Judicial Committee Opinion on validity of US legislation 693–4 objective territorial principle distinguished 688 punitive damages and 688
Siberian pipeline episode 692
UK–US agreement to consult in case of difficulty (1984) 692 n247
US sanctions 692–3
Egypt
see also United Arab Republic
Gulf War and 1253 n246
recognition of Israel 462 n74
treaties in ancient Egypt 14
Egypt–Syria union: see United Arab Republic
EIAs 865–7
Environmental Impact Assessment in a Transboundary Context Convention (1991) 847–8, 858, 866–7
EU and 866
hazardous activities and 861
international watercourses 865 n115, 884
nuclear power installations 866 n116
Nuclear Tests case 867
public participation 847–8, 866–7
UNCLOS 865–6
UNEP 865 n114
Eichmann case
forcible abduction/unlawful arrest 214, 651, 680
non-retroactivity principle (nullum crimen sine lege) 672
passive personality principle 664 n77 universal jurisdiction 669 n102, 671–2
Eilat blockade 1138
El Salvador
continental shelf 585
human rights in 305, 383
UN mission 1229 n123
elderly, rights: see older persons, rights elections, right to free
see also public life, right to participate in Copenhagen Final Act (1990) and 374
ECHR Protocol I 348
ICCPR 292–3
observers 1229–30
embargoes 1124
Cuba 693 n251, 1130
Iranian assets 688 n220
Israel 1125
Libya 1245
Sierra Leone 1263
South Africa 4
embassies: see diplomatic head of mission/ambassador; diplomatic premises embassy bank accounts, immunity from execution/attachment 746–8, 762 emblems, use in time of war 1170, 1172
empiricism 25, 52–3
employment contracts, state immunity in relation to 719 n114, 725–7, 770
Barrandon 726–7
Canada Labour Code 726
diplomatic missions employees and 725–7, 770 nationality of individual, relevance 725
Quattri 726
Sengupta 725–6
endangered species 845
Energy Charter Treaty (1995)
damages/compensation 835, 837 n350
environmental protection and trade/economic development, balance 850
expropriation, lawfulness 842 n373
ICSID and 1041 n188
'investment' 830 n303, 839 n356
Energy for Development, UN Committee on 1213 n42
Energy, UN Committee on New and Renewable Sources 1213 n42
enforced disappearances see also Forced Disappearances of Persons, Inter-American Convention on (1994)

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

as crime against humanity 334, 436–7
Declaration of Minimum Humanitarian Standards (1990) 1198
definition (EDC 2) 334
as extraditable offence 678 n153
in Honduras 390
IAComHR and 383
right to life (ECHR 2) and 358
UNCHR working group 304
universal jurisdiction and 678 n153
Enforced Disappearances Committee 334–5
individual communications (EDC 31) 335 inter-state complaints (EDC 32) 335 interim measures (EDC 30) 335
on-site visits, right to make (EDC 33) 335 reporting obligations (EDC 29) 335 urgent measures (EDC 34) 335 Enforced Disappearances Convention (2006)
conclusion 307 n220, 334
criminal offence, obligation to establish (EDC 4) 334 England
see also UK
Law Merchant (lex mercatoria) 19
as nation-state 20
Entebbe incident 680, 1144
environmental damage, state responsibility 851–62
'adverse effects' on the environment 857–8, 863
Civil Liability for Environmental Damage Convention (1993) 858 climate change 857
customary international law 851–4
damage caused by private individuals 858–9 difficulties of applying traditional approach 862
due diligence obligation 854–6, 861, 887–8
hazardous activities: see hazardous activities; Hazardous Activities, ILC Draft Articles on the Prevention of Transboundary Harm from (2001)
international watercourses 851–2, 883
Iraqi invasion of Kuwait and 858 n73, 1045 n209, 1248–9 obligation to avoid injury to other states 851–3, 857, 885
ozone depletion 857
Stockholm Declaration (1992) 853
strict liability 853–5
territorial sovereignty, relevance 851
UNCLOS provisions 853
environmental damage, state responsibility, jurisprudence
Corfu Channel 852, 854
Gut Dam arbitration 854
Island of Palmas 852
Legality of Nuclear Weapons case 852–3
Nuclear Tests case 852
River Oder 851–2
Trail Smelter 852, 854
environmental offences
as international crime 807
jus cogens/peremptory norms and 807
universal jurisdiction 671
environmental protection 844–901, see also international watercourses; precautionary principle; sustainable development principle
armed conflict and 1186 n94, 1190
coastal state's right to regulate 572 conventions relating to 846 developed countries and 868–9
developing countries and 869
ecosystems 856–8, 871, 876 n176, 878, 886
education and 847
'environment', definition for purposes of 858
expropriation and 834
Gulf War, oil spillage 1190
Hague Declaration on the Environment (1989) 878
ICJ Chamber for Environmental Matters 1062
international law, role 45, 48, 60, 845

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

environmental protection (cont.)
NGOs and 846
nuclear tests and 889
nuclear weapons and 793
policy-oriented approach to international law and 60
'polluter pays' principle 870–1, 884
prohibited weapons 1190
Prohibition of Military or Any Other Hostile Use of Environmental Modification Techniques, Convention on (1977) 1190 scope 844–5, see also atmospheric pollution; EIAs; hazardous activities; ozone depletion; precautionary principle; sustainable development principle
soft law and 118
territorial principle and 852–3 treaty interpretation and 887
UNEP 846, 865, 878, 1213
Vienna Convention on Treaty Succession (1978) and 1023–4
websites 1337–8
Environmental Protection Committee (Antarctica) 538 environmental protection, international co-operation on 845–6, 862–71, see also information and participation in public debate, right to Atmospheric Pollution Convention (1979) 873
Climate Change Convention (1992) 879
Corfu Channel 863
international watercourses 884–5
notification obligation 861, 863–4
Ozone Layer Convention (1985) 876
Rio Declaration (1992) 863
state responsibility and 861
Stockholm Declaration (1992) 862–3
environmental protection and trade/economic development, balance 45, 48–9, 849–51
'debt for nature' swaps 851
Energy Charter Treaty (1994) 850
OECD Declaration on Integrating Climate Change Adaptation into Development Co-operation (2006) 850 n22
precautionary principle 850–1
Rio Declaration (1972) 850, see also Rio Declaration on Environment and Development (1972)
Stockholm Declaration (1972) 849–50
environmental rights
Aarhus Convention (1998) 848–9
ACHR 847
African Charter on Human and Peoples' Rights (1981) 847
CRC (1989) 847
Dublin Declaration on the Environmental Imperative (1990) 848
European Charter on Environment and Health (1982) 848 n18
as human right 847–8
IDI Strasbourg resolution (1997) 848, 865, 872 n154
information and participation in public discussion 847–9 Minorities Sub-Commission Draft Principles on Human Rights and the Environment (1994) 848
OSCE/CSCE 847
Rio Declaration (1992): see Rio Declaration on Environment and Development (1972)
Stockholm Declaration (1972) 847
equal pay, right to MWC 28 333
UDHR 23 279
equality before the courts, CIS Convention 378 equality before the law
see also non-discrimination
Arab Charter on Human Rights 395
equality in fact, need for 288–9
EU Charter on Fundamental Rights (2000) 371
Helsinki Final Act (1975) 373
Kelsen on 132
migrants (MWC 18) 333
minorities 366
UDHR 7 279

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

equality of parties
peacekeeping operations 1235
UNHRC General Comment 32 319 n291
equality of states 129, 214–15, 371, 395
act of state doctrine and 180
Charter of Economic Rights and Duties of States (1974) and 833
CIS Charter (1993) 1291
Declaration on Principles of International Law (1970) 214
diplomatic privileges and immunities and 751
diplomatic protection in case of dual nationality and 815
domestic jurisdiction (UNC 2(7)) and 1205 Helsinki Final Act (1975) 214 n88
jurisdiction and 645, 698
justiciability and 180–3
law creation and 215
monism and 132
natural law and 215
'new' states and 39
peaceful co-existence and 215, 216
positivism and 215
state immunity and 215, 735, 1318–19
state responsibility and 778
state sovereignty and 6, 26, 45, 214–15
state succession and 957
Third World concern for 269
Tunkin and 35
UN Charter 1205
UN voting arrangements and 215, 1211 values-based legal system and 45
Vattel and 26
Vyshinsky and 33
Equatorial Guinea, human rights in 305
equity
acquiescence and 89
arbitration and 1049, 1052
boundary delimitation (land) 108–9 boundary delimitation (uti possidetis) 530
EEZ and 108, 583
equality distinguished 107 n159, 108, 597 ex aequo et bono compared 1087
international watercourses 104, 884, 885
as law 105–9, 1052, 1087
maritime delimitation 106–8, 594–7, 605
Non-Navigational Uses of International Watercourses Convention (1997) and 108
rule of law and 107
stability and certainty of the law considerations 594–5, 605 state succession to state property and 990 n182, 991–2, 998, 999–1000
territorial acquisition and 515
UNCLOS and 108
equity, jurisprudence
Anglo-French Continental Shelf 593, 595
Barbados v. Trinidad and Tobago 605
Barcelona Traction 107
Burkina Faso/Republic of Mali 108–9
Cameroon v. Nigeria 604–5
Diversion of Water 106
Eritrea/Yemen 603
Guinea–Guinea Bissau Maritime Delimitation 596
Gulf of Maine 595, 601–2
Jan Mayen 599–601
Legality of Nuclear Weapons 109
Libya/Malta 107, 596–7
North Sea Continental Shelf 106–7, 593, 595
Qatar v. Bahrain 603–4
Rann of Kutch 106
St Pierre and Miquelon 598–9, 602
South-West Africa cases 107
Tunisia/Libya 107–8, 594–5, 597–8
erga omnes obligations
aggression, prohibition 124
Barcelona Traction 124, 982
boundary treaties 495
definition 260
direct effect 178–9
genocide/Genocide Convention 124, 125, 284, 981–2

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

erga omnes (cont.)
human rights treaties 981–2
jus cogens/peremptory norms distinguished 124–5 non-recognition 470
procedural nature of rule 124
racial discrimination, prohibition 124
self-determination, right to 125, 255
slavery 124
state responsibility and 800, 808
torture, prohibition 124–5
treaty-based human rights 275 validity of treaties (VCLT 52) and 944
Eritrea
arms sanctions (UNC 41) 1246–7
breaches of diplomatic privileges and immunities 765 n372
secession from Ethiopia 1229
UN mission 1230
UN presence 1229
Eritrea–Ethiopia Claims Commission
applicable law 1168
protection of civilian population in armed conflict 1185
Eritrea/Yemen
historic traditions 41 n141
PCA and 1050
treaties, interpretation and 934
ESCAP (UN Economic and Social Commission for Asia and the Pacific) 1213
espionage, Siberian pipeline episode 692
Esquipulas II agreement (1987) 1031
Estonia
CIS membership 249
minorities in 293 n164
non-recognition of Soviet Republic of 483
OSCE Mission 1033
USSR invasion/annexation of 468, 961
estoppel
see also acquiescence; preclusion; res judicata
definition/requirements 102–3, 517–19 formation of customary international law 89
as general principle of law 102–3
individual petition, effect of agreement to 273
statehood/recognition of international persons and 242, 244, 261–2 title to territory and 515, 517–19
treaty validity and 941–2
estoppel, jurisprudence
Cameroon v. Nigeria 103, 519
ELSI 102–3
Serbian Loans 102
Temple of Vihear 102, 518–19
Estrada doctrine 457–8
Eternal Law 22, 53
ethics: see moral principles
Ethiopia
see also Eritrea; Ethiopia, Italian occupation of arms sanctions (UNC 41) 1246–7
breaches of diplomatic privileges and immunities 756 n319
pre-colonial archives 995
Somali claims over 523–4, 1027
UN mission 1230
Ethiopia, Italian occupation of 30, 460, 467, 468
Ethiopian archives, restoration 995
recognition of 460, 467, 468, 473–4
ethnic cleansing
in Chechnya 347 n8
in FRY, Croatia and Bosnia and Herzegovina 316, 982 genocide distinguished 433
as 'grave breach' 403
ethnic identity, CIS Convention 378
EU
accession, requirements for 371
CFCs 878
Copenhagen Criteria (1993) 371 n164
diplomatic protection 810 n211
dispute settlement 1038
EEC/ECSC/Euratom and 1288
EEZ and 583
EIAs 866

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

European Communities/European Community (EC) and 1288
extraterritorial jurisdiction 695–6
fisheries dispute settlement 635 fundamental principles of 370–1
immunities 1319 n169
institutions 1288
international legal personality 241–2
legal status 734–5
membership 1288
NAFO and 627
nuclear accidents 891 n259
object and purpose 47–8, 1288
origins 1288
'polluter pays' principle 870
Privileges and Immunities of the European Communities, Protocol Concerning (1965) 1329 n169 recognition of Bosnia-Herzegovina 461–2 recognition of Croatia 461
recognition of governments 459 n56
recognition of Yugoslav Republics, Declaration on (1991) 452, 465 n89 as regional arrangement (Chapter VII) 1275 n348
rule of law 370
Single European Act (1986) 1288
Social Chapter 1173, see also European Social Charter (1961) (as amended) Somalia and 1275 n348
state immunity and 734–5
structure 241
suspension of rights 371 Terrorism, Framework Decision on (2002) 1164
treaty-making powers 242
US extraterritorial legislation and 694–5
website 1340
WEU and 1290 n33
EU Charter of Fundamental Rights (2000) 371–2
legal status 371–2
Lisbon Treaty (2007) and 371
Poland and 371 n172
scope 371
'shared set of values' and 371
UK and 371 n172
EU competition law 695–6
EU co-operation agreements, human rights clause 372
EU Guidelines on Recognition of New States (1991) 207, 451–2, 461, 522, 976
EU and human rights 369–72
Amsterdam Treaty (1999) 370–1
Charter of Fundamental Rights (2000) 371–2 co-operation agreements and 372
ECHR and 369–70
European Parliament and 372
'fundamental rights', obligation to respect 370 fundamental rights protected by member state constitutions and 369 general principles of law/customary international law and 369 human rights treaties involving member states and 369
Maastricht Treaty (1992) 370
Treaty of Rome (1957) and 369
EU law
direct effect 178–9
human rights, sources 369–70
in municipal courts 140, 156–7 primacy 156–7, 178, 179, 241
EU pillars 241–2
EU Special Representative (Kosovo) 204 EU, treaties relating to interpretation, responsibility for 1304
Lisbon Treaty (2007) 242, 371–2, 1288
Maastricht Treaty 241, 370
Nice Treaty 241 n238
Treaty on European Union (TEU) (1992) 1288
EUFOR
Central African Republic 1280 n371
Chad 1280 n371
Congo and 1280 n371
as regional arrangement (Chapter VIII) 1280
EULEX 204 n41

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

EURATOM
environmental protection and 889
international legal personality 241
Euro-Atlantic Partnership Council (EAPC) 1290
Eurofima 249
Europe, human rights in 345–80
European Commission on Legal Co-operation 119 European Committee of Social Rights implementation of ESC and 361–2 membership and term of office 361 publication of decisions 361–2
reporting obligations 361
European Committee of Social Rights, complaints procedure
admissibility 362
Collective Complaints 362 decisions, implementation 362
standing/locus standi 362
European Convention for the Peaceful Settlement of Disputes (1957) arbitration provisions 1032 conciliation provisions 1023, 1032
ICJ jurisdiction 1032
European Convention for the Prevention of Torture and Inhuman and Degrading Treatment or Punishment: see Torture, European Convention on (1987)
European Parliament
European Parliamentary Elections Act 1978 (UK) 149
human rights and 372
status 1288
European Social Charter (1961) (as amended) 360–2 adherents 361
complaints procedure: see European Committee of Social Rights, complaints procedure delay in concluding 360–1
disabled persons, rights 361
European Committee of Social Rights, role 361–2 family life, right to 361
gender discrimination 361 n102
NGOs and 362
partial acceptance, possibility of 361 poverty and 361 n104
revisions (1991/1996) 361 n104
scope 361–2
sexual harassment, protection against 361 n104
trade union rights 361, 362 European Space Agency, website 1337 evidence: see ICJ, evidence
ex injuria jus non oritur 104–5, 468
excès de pouvoir 1053 Executions, Special Rapporteur on Extrajudicial, Summary or Arbitrary 305, 330, 1165 n236, see also death penalty
executive certificates conclusiveness 193–4, 471, 473, 477–8, 482, 484–5, 704 evidentiary value 481, 747
judicial review 193
matters deemed to fall outside scope of 479, 480–1 non-committal position 480–1
recognition and 471, 472–3, 477–8, 480–1
scope 192–3
state immunity and 747
UK and 193–4, 471, 473, 477–8, 479, 480, 482, 704
US and 194, 471, 482, 484–5
exemplary damages 804–5
exhaustion of conciliation procedures 1080 exhaustion of diplomatic negotiations 1015–17, 1070
Barbados v. Trinidad and Tobago 1016 n24
German External Debts 1017
ILC Draft Instrument on Protection of the Environment from Damage Caused by Space Debris (1994) 1016 n28
Land Reclamation case 1012–17
Legality of Nuclear Weapons 1017
North Sea Continental Shelf cases 1016 Railway Traffic case 1016

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

exhaustion of local remedies 819–22, see also effective remedy, right to 6-months rule (ECtHR) 355, 356
as admissibility issue 1070, 1071
Bosnia and Herzegovina Human Rights Chamber 380
CIS Convention on Human Rights 379
CIS Human Rights Commission and 379
customary international law 819, 822–3
diplomatic protection and 811, 819–20, 1071–2 domestic jurisdiction principle and 649 n14, 819 ECtHR and 273–4, 355–6
effective remedy, need for 273, 274 n48, 355, 820–1
human rights and 273–4
Human Rights Chamber of Bosnia and Herzegovina 380
IACtHR and 273–4
identity of claims, relevance 822
ILC Draft Articles on Diplomatic Protection (2006) 820
inter-state cases 355–6
inter-state claims and 821–2
ITLOS 642
procedural rule, whether 819
Racial Discrimination Convention 273
state responsibility and 819–20
UNESCO and 342
UNHRC and 273–4, 319
waiver 821–2
Women, Committee on the Elimination of All Forms of Discrimination 323 exhaustion of local remedies, jurisprudence Ambatielos 820
ELSI 821–2
Finnish Ships arbitration 820–1
Interhandel 821
expert bodies: see UN treaty bodies expert evidence, ICJ 1089
explosives or inflammatory projectiles 1168, 1186, 1189–90
expropriation/nationalisation of property of national 828, 933–4 expropriation/nationalisation of property of foreign national 827–43, see also Chorzów Factory principle/restitutio in integrum; damages/compensation for expropriation or breach of international law, measure; expropriation/nationalisation of property of foreign national, legality; standard of treatment of aliens
BITs and: see BITs (bilateral investment treaties) ECHR, Protocol 1 and 829 n299
in expropriating state 191–2 foreign-owned property outside the jurisdiction distinguished 650
'internationalised' contract and 829
justiciability 191–2
'property' 830
restitution and 803–4
state contracts and 829
expropriation/nationalisation of property of foreign national, definition/classification as 830–2 creeping expropriation 832 Indonesian nationalisations (1965) 830–1 interference with rights amounting to deprivation of effective control and use 831 investor's assumption of risks and 831
NAFTA 830 n305, 832 n312
seizure of controlling stock interest 831–2 taking of ancillary rights 832 expropriation/nationalisation of property of foreign national, jurisprudence
AIG 837 n250
Amoco 837
Biloune 831–2
BP case 833
Certain German Interests in Polish Upper Silesia 833 Generation Ukraine 832 n313

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

expropriation/nationalisation (cont.)
INA 836–7
Liamco 830, 833, 842
Metalclad 832 n312, 836
Santa Elena 832, 833–4
Starrett 831
Texaco 829, 834
expropriation/nationalisation of property of foreign national, legality/requirements 828–37
applicable law 840
Charter of Economic Rights and Duties of States (1974) 833 compensation 192, 834–7, see also damages/compensation for expropriation or breach of international law, measure NAFTA 835 n335
non-discrimination 842
public purpose 833–4
taking for environmental reasons 834
UNGA resolution 1803 (XVII) (Permanent sovereignty over natural resources) 833, 834–5 wartime measures 833
expulsion: see collective expulsion, prohibition; deportation/expulsion extermination, as crime against humanity 408, 436 extinction of states: see dissolution of states extraditable offences
enforced disappearances 678 n153
Internationally Protected Persons Convention (1973) and 764–5
treaty provision for 674, 675
extradition 686–9, see also forcible abduction/unlawful arrest
customary international law 686
death penalty and 321, 358–9
definition 686
double criminality and 686
ECHR jurisdiction (ECHR 1) and 349, 687 entitlement to request 646, 647
human rights law and 687
of own nationals 687 political offence doctrine and 667, 686–7 speciality principle 686
terrorism and 1160, 1161
torture and (TC 3) 327, 329
unincorporated treaties and 185
extradition treaties
aut dedere aut judicare principle and 673–9, 687
CoE and 1288–9
extraditable offences and 674
international terrorist conventions and 687, 1159 interpretation 155 n129 legislative approval 151
as source of international law 98 n107 extrajudicial killings 126 n238, 160 n165, 305, 330, 684–5, 1165 n236
extraterritorial jurisdiction belligerent occupation and 654 n38
comity and 694
consent of other state, relevance 658 effects doctrine: see effects doctrine/extraterritorial jurisdiction on economic matters exclusion 653 presumption against 653–4, 688
UK and 688 n218
USA and 688–96
extraterritorial legislation
see also foreign law, recognition and enforcement effective link, need for 650 possibility of 649
taxes 650

'failed' states 201–2
fair trial/hearing: see due process/fair trial
Falk, R. A. 61
Falkland Islands
conquest and annexation 532, 533 discovery and occupation claims 532
history 532
prescription and 532
recognition of UK title 533
security zone 584 n139
self-determination, right to 199, 533
Falklands war
exclusion zone 1130 n62
hospital ships 1172 n26

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

Protecting Power 1199 n171
self-defence, right to (UNC 51) 1146
family life, right to CRC 24 331
ECHR 8 348
ESC and 361
ICCPR 17 275
non-derogation principle 275
family reunification, right of, Helsinki Final Act (1975) 373–4 family unity, right to, state succession and 1007 FAO
legal personality in domestic law 1299 n71
privileges and immunities 1321
as subject of international law 47
website 1340
FAO complaints procedure, ICJ/arbitration and 1034 n148
fault
burden/standard of proof 784, 888
due diligence requirement: see due diligence environmental damage 853–6 intentional or negligent conduct (dolus/culpa) and 783 nuclear activities, civil liability 894
pollution 887–8, 900–1
Space Objects, Convention on International Liability for Damage caused by (1972) 854, 888
state responsibility and 783–5, 853–6 strict liability ('objective' responsibility/'risk' theory) 783, 789, 853–5, 887–8, 894, 900
treaty provision 855–6
ultra vires acts of officials 789
federal states 217–23
ACY Opinion No. 1 and 217–18
allocation of powers 217–18 boundary disputes, relevance to international law 112, 223, 498 confederation distinguished 217, 238–9
dissolution 210, 218
ILO Conventions and 220
international legal personality 218–19
jurisdictional competence 647 law applicable between component units as source of international law 112, 223 secession, right to 218, 255–6, 291 n151, 293, 295, 963
self-determination, right to and 218
state responsibility and 222–3
treaty-making powers 161, 218–20
treaty obligations 220–2
federal states, state immunity and 709, 733–5
Alamieyeseigha 734
European Convention on State Immunity (1972) 733
Mellenger 733
UK State Immunity Act 1978 and 733–4
UN State Immunity Convention (2004) and 734
feudalism 20, 489
Fiji, Nuclear Tests case and 1098
Finland
see also Aaland Islands
Arctic territory 535
extraterritorial jurisdiction, blocking legislation 691 n238
minorities in 294 n164, 296
secession from Russian Empire (1919) 201, 975 Soviet invasion of 31, 468
state succession 539–40
treaty succession 200–1, 971, 975
fiscal regulations of coastal state 578, 579, 580 fish stocks
anadromous species 624 n356
catadromous species 624 n356
conservation and management obligations (UNCLOS 56(1)) 624
EEZ 623–4
high seas fishing rights and 624 highly migratory species 624 n356, 627–8
marine mammals 624 n356
sedentary species 589, 624 n356
sovereign rights of coastal states 624

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

fishing rights
see also straddling stocks
archipelagic states and 567–8
contiguous zone 578
dispute settlement 635, 636–7, 640 n443
high seas 609, 610
fishing rights, Conventions relating to European Fisheries Convention (1964) 581
North Atlantic Fisheries Convention (1978) 627 fishing stocks, halibut 627
fishing zones
as balance of coastal state and traditional fishing rights 581 conservation of fishing stocks and 581
customary international law 581, 582
EEZ and 580–2
establishment 554
exclusive jurisdiction and 581
Fisheries Jurisdiction 581
preferential rights 582 recognition, relevance 581–2
Rockall 565 n61
UK and 565 n61
flag state jurisdiction
collisions on the high seas 618
crimes committed on board ship 557
diplomatic protection and 819
disciplinary offences 557
exclusive jurisdiction/single flag requirement 613–14
flagless ships 611, 613–14
high seas and 611–14
in internal waters 556–8 international law, obligation to enforce 611
Lotus principle 655–7
marine pollution 899
in port 557–8
slave trading 616
straddling stocks 626
warships/state-owned ships 558, 614
flags of convenience 611–12
Fonseca, Gulf of, as condominium 229–30, 563
force majeure
assumption of risk and 796 n109
burden/standard of proof 796
conduct of claimant state and 796 n109 distress distinguished 797
Gill 796
ILC Articles on State Responsibility 796
innocent passage and 571, 577, 796 n108
Rainbow Warrior 797–8
responsibility for breach of international obligation and 779, 796–7, 1313 n141
Serbian Loans 796
'force' (UNC 2(4)), classification as 1124–6, see also use of force (UNC 2(4))
blockades 1121, 1124, 1130, 1138, 1240, 1244, 1251, 1275
economic force 1124–5
embargoes 1124–5, see also embargoes internal use 1126
reprisals: see reprisals
retorsion 1128–9
threats of force 1125–6
Forced Disappearances of Persons, Inter-American Convention on (1994) 384 petitions and communications, procedure 384
precautionary measures 384
forced labour 340, 1180
forcible abduction/unlawful arrest 651
Alvarez-Machain 685–6
effect on jurisdiction 214, 681–3
Eichmann 214, 651, 680
extradition arrangements and 681–3 on or over high seas 680–1 protest, relevance 681–2
UK jurisprudence 682–3
US jurisprudence 681–2 foreign arbitral award, recognition and enforcement, recognition of government and 484

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

foreign direct investment
see also BITs (bilateral investment treaties) insurance against political risks 842
'investment' 830 n303, 838–9, see also ICSID
Multilateral Investment Guarantee Agency 842–3
World Bank Guidelines (1992) 250, 828, 835, 837, 842 n373 foreign judgment, recognition and enforcement, refusal on grounds of manifest bias 649
procedure in foreign courts, relevance 649 foreign law, recognition and enforcement conflict with international law and 140, 186–7 as conflict of laws problem 650 fiscal law 650
judicial notice and 140
justiciability 186–7
law contrary to international law 650
nuclear activities, civil liability and 895 penal law 650
public policy exception 187
recognition and 471–3, 483
foreign ministers
full powers (VCLT 7) and 908
as internationally protected persons 675–6
foreign ministers, immunity ratione personae (Congo v. Belgium) 739–40 acts in violation of international law 740
torture 740
Foreign Office certificates: see executive certificates
foreign relations, justiciability 140, 182, 187–92
Forests, Consensus Statement on the Management, Conservation and Sustainable Development of (1992) 870 n138 Formosa: see Taiwan (Taipei) forum prorogatum 1076
fragmentation of international law, risk of 65–7, 123–4
ILC Report on Fragmentation 66, 123
France
Algerian archives 995
Antarctic claims 535–6
Antarctic mining 538
deep sea mining 630
employment contracts, state immunity in relation to 726–7
extradition of own nationals 687
international law in municipal courts 173–4
Iraq annexation of Kuwait and 1253 n246
Morocco and: see Morocco–France relationship
as nation-state 20
nationality 661
nuclear power installations 775 n116, 890 n254
Nuclear Test Ban Treaty (1963) and 888
nuclear tests: see nuclear tests
outer space, control of information 551
Rainbow Warrior: see Rainbow Warrior
recognition of governments 459, 467
Rwanda and 1263
SC membership 3, 1206
SC membership/veto 3, 215, 1206, 1237
state immunity from jurisdiction 726–7
treaties/municipal law relationship 173–4
US–Vietnam mediation 1018
Vietnamese archives 995
Franck, T. M. 61–2
Franco regime 460
fraud, validity of treaties and (VCLT 48) 942 free trade, respect for, recognition of states and 452

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

freedom of assembly 268
Arab Charter on Human Rights 395
ECHR 11 348
ICCPR 21 292
OSCE/CSCE 374
UDHR 20 279
freedom of association 271, see also trade union, freedom to organise or join Arab Charter on Human Rights 395
in Argentina 341
Copenhagen Final Act (1990) and 374
ECHR 11 348, 357
ICCPR 22 292, 315
ILO and 338
Freedom of Association, ILO Committee on
jurisprudence 340–1
membership 340
Freedom of Association, ILO Fact-finding and Conciliation Commission 340–1
Argentina and 341
Dominican Republic 341
South Africa and 341
freedom of expression
ACHR 13 388–9
African Commission Special Rapporteur 392–3
compulsory licensing of journalists and 388–9
Copenhagen Final Act (1990) and 374
ECHR 10 348
IAComHR Special Rapporteur 383 n229
ICCPR 19 292
ILO and 338
rights of the child and (CRC 331) 317, 331
UDHR 19 279
freedom of information, satellite broadcasting and 550
freedom of movement
ECHR Protocol IV 348 publication of laws and regulations governing 373–4 freedom of movement, right to enter/leave one's own country
Copenhagen Final Act (1990) and 374
ECHR Protocol IV 348
Helsinki Final Act (1975) 373
freedom of navigation (high seas) 609, 610–11
armed conflict and 610–11
customary international law 610
dispute settlement 636
EEZ compared 582
self-defence, right of (UNC 51) and 610–11 freedom of navigation (high seas), jurisprudence
Corfu Channel 610
Nicaragua 610
freedom of navigation (international watercourses), SC resolution 242 (1967) 1221 n85 freedom of thought, conscience and religion 271, see also religious discrimination, prohibition
ACHR 12 275
Arab Charter on Human Rights 395
as basic civil right 268
child's rights (CRC 14) 331
Copenhagen Final Act (1990) and 374
Declaration on Religious Intolerance 305
ECHR 9 348
EU Charter of Fundamental Rights (2000) 371
Helsinki Final Act (1975) 373
ICCPR 18 275, 315
indigenous peoples' rights and 298 minorities' rights and 281, 297, 366
non-derogation 274–5
Religion or Belief, OSCE Advisory Panel of Experts on the Freedom of 377 n201
UDHR 18 279
French Revolution 26, 27
Friendly Relations Declaration: see Declaration on Principles of International Law Concerning

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

Friendly Relations (1970) (UNGA resolution 2625 (XXV))
friendly settlement as preferred option 342–3, 353, 387
frontiers: see boundaries
functionalist approaches 48, 58 n47
fundamental change of circumstances/rebus sic stantibus (VCLT 62(2))
boundary treaties 968–9
customary international law 950, 951
Fisheries Jurisdiction 950–1
Gabčíkovo–Nagymaros Project 951–2
justification for 950
pacta sunt servanda and 950
requirements 951
termination of treaties on grounds of 950–2 fundamental norms: see jus cogens/peremptory norms fundamental rights in the EU: see EU Charter of Fundamental Rights (2000); EU and human rights

Gabčíkovo–Nagymaros Project
see also Gabčíkovo–Nagymaros Project Case (Hungary/Slovakia) (Judgment) in the table of cases; international watercourses
servitudes and 970
summary of issues 886–7
treaty succession and 887
Water Co-operation Facility 887 n239 Gabon, seabed resources 628 games theory 58
GATT
establishment/status 40, 1286 Taiwan and 235
third parties and 97
Uruguay Round 1034–5, 1287
GATT/WTO dispute settlement procedures 1035–8, 1287 conciliation (GATT XXIII) 1035
consensus and 1035, 1036–7
consultations (GATT XXII) 1035
good offices/mediation 1035–6
nullification or impairment of benefit and 1035
Panel reports, adoption and implementation 1035 Panels 1035
retaliatory measures 1035
Uruguay Round additions 1034–5
website 1338
GATT/WTO dispute settlement procedures (DSU) 1036–8
Appellate Body 1037 compensation for non-compliance 1037 compliance 1037
consultations 1036
'covered agreements' 1036
Dispute Settlement Body 1036 general international law, impact on 1037–8 good offices, conciliation or mediation 1036 international trade law, role in development of 1036–7 monitoring 1037
panel reports 1036–7 suspension of concessions and obligations 1037 Gaza 247
gender discrimination see also Women, Committee on the Elimination of All Forms of Discrimination Against; women, rights of affirmative action 324
deportation rules 321
ECtHR, nominations for appointment as judge and 352 n38
equal pay and (UDHR 23) 279 ESC and 361 n102
minorities and 297
nationality and 662
General Assembly: see UNGA; UNGA resolutions
General Comments (CRC)
2 (role of independent human rights institutions) 333
10 (children's rights in juvenile justice) 333

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

General Comments (UNCESCR)
1 (technical assistance measures) 310
2 (international technical assistance measures) 310
3 (international co-operation) 302 n199, 310
4 (housing) 310
5 (disabilities) 310
5 (rights of persons with disabilities) 310
6 (older persons) 310
10 (national human rights institutions) 276 n67
16 (equal treatment of men and women) 310
18 (right to work) 310
19 (right to social security) 310
General Comments (UNHRC) 316–19
6 (right to life) 317
12 (self-determination) 291–2
17 (rights of the child) 317–18
22 (non-discrimination) 287 n128, 288 n 135, 318
23 (minorities) 296–7, 318
24 (ICCPR reservations) 318, 923–4
26 (ICCPR denunciation/withdrawal) 318, 945–6, 983
28 (rights of women and General Comment 23) 318–19
29 (non-derogable provisions) 319 n291
32 (fair trial/equality of parties) 319 n291
general principles of law/international law 98–105
acquired rights, respect for 103, 1001
Chorzów Factory principle/restitutio in integrum 103, 801–2
consular access (VCCR 36) 388–9
discretionary nature 105 distinction, difficulty of 99
domestic jurisdiction principle (UNC 2(7)) 648, 1205
equity: see equity
estoppel 102–3
ex injuria jus non oritur 104–5, 468
good faith: see good faith
natural law and 99
non-discrimination 288
non liquet and 98–9, 1087, 1189
pacta sunt servanda 29, 94, 103, 903–4, 966–7
'polluter pays' principle 870–1
positivism and 99
'recognised by civilised nations' 100
reparation for breach of international obligation 801 n147
res judicata 101–2
'rules' and 'principles', equivalence 98 n109
self-determination, right to 40, 251–5 source of law, status as 99, 109, 123, 127
territorial integrity 488
UDHR and 279
uti possidetis doctrine/stability of boundaries 290–1, 968
war, renunciation as an instrument of policy 1122
general principles of law/international law, jurisprudence
Barcelona Traction 105
Chorzów Factory 100
Corfu Channel 101
German Settlers in Poland 100–1
UN Administrative Tribunal 101
General Recommendations (CEDAW)
5 (temporary special measures) 324
8 (opportunities for participation in government) 324
12 (reporting on measures to deal with violence towards women) 324
14 (female circumcision, eradication) 324
19 (measures to deal with violence towards women) 324
21 (equality in marriage and family relations) 324
24 (women and health) 324
25 (temporary special measures) 324
General Recommendations (CERD)
XII (42) (successor states) 313 n259
XIV (42) (non-discrimination) 313 n259

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

XIX (discrimination based on descent) 313
Geneva Conventions (1949) and Protocols I and II (1977) 1169–70, 1172–6, see also civilian property; civilian property, destruction and appropriation (GC IV, 53)
biological experiments, prohibition 1171
civilians 1169, 1176–84
combatant, definition 1173–4 combatant, 'unlawful' 1174 conduct of hostilities 1184–90 conscription of protected persons 1180
as customary international law 1187
deportation or transfer of protected persons (GC IV, 49) 1169–70, 1180, see also deportation or transfer of protected persons (GC IV, 49) emblems 1172
forced labour 1180
hostage-taking and 1169–70
individual criminal responsibility 401
and 'law of the Hague' as single system 1170 medical units and establishments 1171–2 obligation to respect and ensure respect 1199
origins 28, 1169
prisoners of war, see also prisoners of war
reprisals 1169–70, 1175, 1185–6
scope 1169–70
torture 1169–70
wounded and sick 1169–70, 1171–2, 1186 n94
wounded, sick and shipwrecked members of the armed forces at sea 1169, 1172 Geneva Conventions (1949) and Protocols I and II (1977), applicability
civilians 1174
combatants in irregular warfare 1173
'declared war or any other [international] armed conflict' 1170–1
in international conflict 435, 1170–1
Israel occupied territories 1178–80
military necessity and 1178 n55, 1181–2, 1183, 1184–5
in non-international armed conflict 404–5, 408, 435, 1149–51, 1194–5 struggles against racist regimes 1172, 1173 n30 wars against colonial domination 1172, 1173 n30 Geneva Conventions (1949) and Protocols I and II (1977), enforcement 1199–1201 ad hoc inquiries 1200
individual criminal responsibility 401, 425
International Fact-Finding Commission (grave breaches) 1199–1200
Protecting Powers 1199
universal jurisdiction and 669–70
Geneva Conventions (1958), drafting process 120
Geneva Conventions on the law of the sea (1958)
see also Continental Shelf Convention (1958); High Seas Convention (1958); Territorial Sea Convention (1958)
customary international law and 555
genocide 430–3
in Bosnia and Herzegovina 283–5 burden/standard of proof 285 n116
as crime against humanity 438, 670
East Timor Special Panels for Serious Crimes 425
Extraordinary Chambers of Cambodia 422
Iraqi High Tribunal 429
in Rwanda 283, 407, 409
Genocide Convention (1948) 282–5
conclusion 280
ICJ jurisdiction in relation to (Art. IX) 283, 284

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

Genocide Convention (cont.)
individual criminal responsibility and 46, 401
as law-making treaty 95
reservations 388, 918–19
treaty succession 981–2, 984
Genocide Convention (1948), applicability absence of territorial limitation 284 events prior to a given date 284 group in geographically limited area 285
non-international armed conflict 284
Genocide Convention (1948), obligations erga omnes nature 125, 284, 981–2
as obligations of conduct 285 prevention of genocide 285 punishment of genocide 285
genocide, definition/requirements cultural genocide, exclusion 283, 432 ethnic cleansing distinguished 433 ethnic cleansing as evidence of 433 genocide by omission 433 Genocide Convention II 282 group 'as such' 285, 431
group 'in part' 432–3
group membership, difficulty of defining 432
ICTR 409, 433
ICTY 4 430, 432
intention: see genocide, mens rea requirement
as international crime 282, 284, 430–3, 807
jurisprudence relating to 283–4 limited geographical area, effect 431 material elements 433
mens rea 431
as 'most serious crime' 411
political groups, exclusion 282 rape and sexual violence as 433, 670
as serious crime 425
standard of proof 285
widespread and systematic acts 431
genocide, jurisdiction
ICJ 283, 284
ICTR 408, 431
ICTY 404, 431
international penal tribunal 282, 410 place where act committed 282
universal 671, 673
genocide, mens rea requirement
confessions and 431
difficulty of establishing 431 of each perpetrator 432
ICTR jurisprudence 431
ICTY jurisprudence 431–2
incitement, need for in case of 431 inference from facts 431 intention to destroy group in whole or in part 282, 285, 431 genocide, prohibition 282–5
as collective right 281
customary international law 275
erga omnes obligation 124, 125, 284
ILC Code of Offences 410
indigenous peoples 299
as jus cogens/peremptory norm 126, 808
state responsibility and 276, 283, 284–5
genocide, responsibility
individual criminal responsibility 46, 262, 400–1, 402, 425, 439, 671
state responsibility 276, 283, 284–5
Gentili, Alberico 23, 112 genuine link, need for (nationality) 258, 611–13, 643, 1005, 1006 Gény, François 53–4, 75
geographically disadvantaged states 555, 608, 634 n399
Georgia
Alma Ata Declaration and 961 n21
CIS membership 240, 1291
international humanitarian law and 1192
OSCE Mission 375 n188, 1033
secession attempts 238
UN mission 1230
geostationary orbit 552
sovereignty and (Bogotá Declaration (1976)) 552 German Empire
dissolution 293
minorities, protection of 293
state succession 964–5

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

Germany, Democratic Republic of (GDR)
as agent of USSR 477–8
Nuclear Test Ban Treaty (1963) and 471
recognition by FRG 227
recognition of government 455, 471, 477–8, 483–4, 964
recognition as state 964
USSR forces, withdrawal 965
Germany, Federal Republic of (FRG)
deep sea mining 630, 631
employment contracts, state immunity in relation to 726 n155
extradition of own nationals 687
ICJ and 1073
minority languages 365 n129
nationality 661
nuclear power installations 775 n116, 890 n254
recognition by GDR 227
state immunity from execution/attachment 746
state immunity in respect of torture 718 n108
as successor to the Reich 964–5
treaties/municipal law relationship 170–2
Germany, FRG–GDR unification (1990) 208–9, 227–8, 964–6 arms/armed forces limitations 228, 965 assimilation of GDR 228, 965–6, 971, 972–3 Berlin State Bank, FRG's assumption of responsibility for 998 borders 228, 965
FRG–GDR Monetary, Economic and Social Union Treaty (1990) 228, 965
state succession to public debt 998
state succession to state property 992
treaty succession 971, 972–3
UN membership and 1211
Unification Treaty (1990) 228, 965–6, 972–3, 992 Germany pre-1945
aggression 30–1
Czechoslovakia, invasion of 468, 501–2
Nazism 54, 294
unification (1871) 28
Germany, status post-WWII 227–8 agency of necessity 227
annexation, exclusion 227, 501
Berlin, relinquishment of Three Power rights and responsibilities (1990) 228, 965
Control Council Law No. 10 400, 439
Convention on Relations between the Three Powers and FRG (1955) 964
Final Settlement (1990) (France, UK, USA, USSR–GDR, FRG) 228, 965
Four Power rights and responsibilities 464–5
FRG–GDR relationship and 463 n79, 964
'Germany as a whole' 964–5
international legal personality 227–8 occupation (FRG), termination 964
peace treaty, reservation of powers pending 227, 228
Polish administrative area (Kaliningrad) 964 n45
Saarland 965 n55
suspension of Allied rights and responsibilities (1990) 965 n54
Ghana, ILO and 340
Gibraltar, self-determination, right to 523 n199
Gidel, A. 113, 579
'girl-child' 325, 332, 420 n126
glasnost 36, 46–7, 1209
Global Counter-Terrorism Strategy (2006) 1161
Global Environmental Facility (GEF) 846, 874, 881
global warming 845, 875–6, 878–81, see also climate change; Climate Change Convention (1992)
as common concern of mankind 878
greenhouse gases 878–9, 880–1
Hague Declaration on the Environment (1989) 878
UNEP and 878
UNGA resolutions 43/53 and 44/207 878

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

globalisation
as challenge to nation-state 48 n16
international law, effect on 36, 41–2, 44, 48–9, 65–6, 197, 1115–16
regional organisations and 1287
state sovereignty and 48
Golan Heights, proposed change in status 469 n105, 502 n80
good faith
acquiescence and 89
Declaration on Principles of International Law (1970) 104
as general principle of law 103–4, 1205
ILC Draft Declaration on the Rights and Duties of States (1949) 134 n17
international organisations and 1318
Nuclear Tests case 104
peaceful co-existence and 216
Rio Declaration (1992) 104 n142
territorial acquisition and 515
treaties, interpretation and 933
UN Charter and 103–4, 1205
unilateral acts and 122
good offices/mediation 1013, 1017, 1018–19
Afghanistan (1988) (UN Secretary-General's good offices) 1019
African Union Commission of Mediation, Conciliation and Arbitration 1023, 1026–7
AU commissions in relation to particular disputes 1027
Beagle Channel 1018 n38, 1055
Cairo Declaration (1994) 1028
Central America 1224 n98
conciliation and 1022, 1023
diplomatic protection and 809
ECOWAS 1029 n108, 1276
GATT 1035–6
Hague Conventions (1899/1907) 1019
India–Pakistan Dispute (1965) (USSR) 1018
Middle East (1973–4) (US Secretary of State) 1018
Myanmar 1223 n97
NAFTA (1994) 1039
NATO 1032
OAS 1019 n42
Pact of Bogotá (1948) 1023, 1031
regional organisations and 1019
Russo-Japanese War (1906) (US President) 1018
SADC Organ on Politics, Defence and Security Co-operation 1029–30
SC 1221
UN Good Offices Mission in Afghanistan and Pakistan 1228
UN Secretary-General 1018–19, 1215–16, 1223–4
UNESCO Conciliation and Good Offices Commission 342
UNGA/Security Council 1217, 1218, 1221
US–North Vietnamese negotiations (France) 1018
WIPO Mediation, Arbitration and Expedited Arbitration Rules (1994) 1035 n151
Gorazde 1259
government, interventionism 55–6 government, right to participate in: see public life, right to participate in 'grave breaches'
Extraordinary Chambers of Cambodia 422
ICTY Statute 403
individual criminal responsibility 401–2, 403
universal jurisdiction 434–5, 669–70, 1200
'grave breaches', classification as arbitrary arrest during armed conflict 403 attacks on cultural objects in armed conflict 401, 403 attacks on religious property/places of worship 401, 403 civilian population as object of attack 401 compulsory service in forces of a hostile power 434
cruel and inhuman treatment 401
deportation or transfer of protected person 401, 408, 434

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

destruction and appropriation of civilian property 401, 403, 434
ethnic cleansing 403
fair and regular trial, deprivation of 434 historic monuments and works of art, attacks on 401 hostages, taking of civilians as 401, 434
ICTY 2 433–4
mass killings 403
pillage 403, 1196
racial discrimination 401
rape 403, 1196
torture or inhuman treatment 401, 403, 434
wilful killing 401, 403, 434, 669, 670 wilfully causing great suffering or serious injury to body or health 434 Great Belt dispute 578 n115
Greece
continental shelf 509, 1220 n78
extraterritorial exercise of jurisdiction 665 n82
human rights in 363 n115, 364 international law in ancient Greece 16
Kosovo and 453
minorities in 293 n164
state immunity in respect of tortious activity 728 n165
state succession and 1003–4
Torture Committee (CoE) and 363 n115
UNSCOB 1226
greenhouse gases 878–9, 880–1
Greenland, sovereignty over: see Eastern Greenland case in the table of cases Grenada, US invasion (1984) 1144, 1151, 1183 n79, 1276 n355
Grotius, Hugo 23–4, 112, 553–4, 1120
Guantanamo Bay detention centre human rights and counter-terrorism, tension between 1165–6
status 658
urgent measures and 386
Guatemala, human rights in 305, 383
guerillas
combatant status 1173
state responsibility for 790
guidelines, legal status 118
Guinea, UNHRC and 315 n271
Guinea-Bissau
see also Guinea-Bissau v. Senegal (Arbitral Award of 31 July 1989 (Guinea-Bissau v. Senegal)) and Guinea/Guinea-Bissau Maritime Delimitation Case in the table of cases
ECOWAS 1029, 1278 n365
independence (UNGA resolution 3061 (XXVIII)) 205–6 Portuguese military occupation (1972–3) 205–6
Gulf of Aqaba 578 n115
Gulf Co-operation Council 1293 n45
membership 1253 n246
Gulf of Fonseca: see Fonseca, Gulf of Gulf Neutral Zone (1922) 229 n168
Gulf of Sirte 564
Gulf War 1253–4

habeas corpus 389, 658 n57, 754
non-derogation principle 389
habitual residence
civil jurisdiction and 652
criminal jurisdiction and 676, 1232
nationality in case of state succession and 1006, 1007–8
statelessness and 676, 1232
Habsburg empire: see Austro-Hungarian Empire Hague Conferences (1899/1907) 28, 1168–9
'belligerents' and 1169
Hague Convention IV (1899) and Regulations (1907)
continuing validity 1169
as customary international law 928, 1168 n7, 1187–8
enforcement 1169
and Geneva Conventions (1949) and Protocols I and II (1977) as single system 1170 Martens Clause 1169 n9
reciprocity and 1169
scope 1169

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

Hague Convention for the Pacific Settlement of Disputes 1049
Hague Convention for the Protection of Cultural Property in the Event of Armed Conflict (1954) 1186 n96
Haiti
arms sanctions 1276
economic sanctions (UNC 41) 1239–40, 1243, 1276
Governors Island Agreement (1993) 1240
human rights in 383
MICIVIH 1239
MNF 1230 n129
OAS and 1275–6
as threat to the peace 1239–40
UNMIH 1230 n129
UNSMIH 1230
halibut 627
halons 876–7
Hammerskjöld, Dag 1215
Hanseatic League 19
harbours and ports: see internal waters; ports
Hart, H. L. A. 51–2
Harvard Research drafts 121, 654 n40, 659 n58, 666 n93, 668 n99
Haw-Haw, Lord 667
Hawaii
treaty succession 973–4
US annexation (1898) 973–4 hazardous activities 859–62, see also nuclear activities
'activity' 887
ILC work on 859–62
international liability and state responsibility distinguished 860
'polluter pays' principle 870, 896
Prior Informed Consent Procedure Convention (1998) 896 n299
strict liability and 887–8
Transboundary Harm Arising out of Hazardous Activities, Draft Principles on the Allocation of Loss (2006) 858 n71, 862
ultra-hazardous activities 887–97
Hazardous Activities, ILC Draft Articles on the Prevention of Transboundary Harm from (2001) 856 n60, 860–2 applicability 860
due diligence obligation 861
EIAs 861
'equitable balance of interests' 861–2
good faith co-operation 861 measures to prevent or minimise risk 860–1 monitoring mechanisms 861
notification and information obligation 861
'risk of causing significant transboundary harm' 860
hazardous waste 845, 895–7, see also marine pollution
Bamako Convention (1991) 806 n129, 896
Basle Convention (1989) 846 n8, 863, 896 notification obligations 896
OECD and 896
Transboundary Effects of Industrial Accidents Convention (1992) 870–1, 897
headquarters agreements
applicable law 1309–10
privileges and immunities provisions 1319–20, 1322–3
as recognition of international legal personality 1299–1300 UN agreements 1319–20
heads of state
full powers (VCLT 7) and 134, 908–9, 941
individual criminal responsibility 399, 409, 735
as internationally protected persons 675–6
as representative of state (VCLT 7(2)) 134, 908–9, 941
treaty-making powers 907–8 heads of state, former immunity from jurisdiction ratione materiae 420, 738
individual criminal responsibility 409
heads of state, immunities 735–8
absolute immunity 737

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

customary international law 736
diplomatic privileges and immunities 737 diplomatic privileges and immunities, assimilation to 738 n225 hearing of claim to immunity in open court and 764 n369
jus cogens nature of 737
jus cogens/peremptory norms and 126 n239 official and private acts distinguished 737
ratione personae 736–8
responsibility for determining right to 736–7
torture 718
UN Convention on State Immunity (2004) 709
heads of state, immunities, jurisprudence Ghaddafi 737
Marcos cases 736
Noriega 736
Pinochet (No. 3) 738
Tachiona 737–8
health
see also WHO
child (CRC 24) 331
Declaration on Minimum Humanitarian Standards (1990) 1198
international law, role 48
women and 324
health services, right to
indigenous peoples 299
migrant workers and (MWC 28) 333
healthy environment, right to 302, 392, 847–8
European Charter on Environment and Health (1982) 848 n18
Hebron 247
Hegel, G. W. F. 29
Helms-Burton legislation: see effects doctrine/extraterritorial jurisdiction on economic matters
Helsinki Conference (1992) 1274, 1289
Helsinki Declaration on the Protection of the Ozone Layer (1989) 877 Helsinki Final Act (1975)
see also OSCE
Basket I 373, 1289
Basket II 373 n179, 1289
Basket III 373–4, 1289 boundaries/territorial settlement and 372–3
Charter of Paris (1990) 375
Copenhagen Concluding Document (1990) 374
equality of states 214 n88
human contacts 373
human rights, impact on 117–18, 373 implementation, right of individuals to observe and promote 373 non-binding status 373, 1289
recognition of states and 451
scope 372–3
self-determination, right to 289–90
signatories 372
USSR and 373
Vienna Concluding Document (1989) 374
Vienna follow-up meeting (1989) 373 Helsinki Final Act (1975), implementation measures 374 bilateral meetings 374 exchange of information 374
follow-up meetings 1289
Helsinki Rules (1966) 883–4
Hickenlooper Amendments 191, 1128–9
High Representative (Bosnia and Herzegovina) 203–4, 231–2 high seas 609–28, see also contiguous zones; continental shelf; EEZ; flag state jurisdiction; hot pursuit; marine pollution; territorial sea broadcasting and 617
conservation and management obligations (UNCLOS 117–20) 624
continental shelf, waters superjacent to 589 definition including variations over time 609
environmental damage, state responsibility 853

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

high seas (cont.)
illegal arrests 680–1 peaceful use, limitation to (UNCLOS 88) 610
remote sensing 551
as res communis 492, 503, 517, 553–4
territorial acquisition and 517
High Seas Convention (1958)
see also Law of the Sea Convention (1982)
'generally declaratory of established principles of international law' 595, 610 high seas, freedom of see also freedom of navigation (high seas); law of the sea, history and development
artificial islands 609
Bynkershoek and 25
closed seas doctrine and 24, 553–4, 609
customary international law 610
encroachments on 554–5, 578, 609
fishing rights 609, 610
Grotius and 24, 553–4
interests of others, obligation to respect 609–10 International Seabed Area activities and 610
landlocked states and 610
mineral resources, impact on doctrine 554 naval exercises 610
nuclear tests and 610
overflight 609, 636
Papal Bulls (1493 and 1506) 609
scientific research 609, 610
search and visit, right of: see search and visit, right of submarine cables and pipelines 609
UNCLOS 87 609–11
high seas (jurisdiction) 611–28, see also flag state jurisdiction; ships (jurisdiction) compensation for unjustified exercise 614–15 hot pursuit: see hot pursuit Lotus principle 655–7
marine pollution 620–3
piracy and 614, 615–16
right of approach 614–15
right of search and visit: see search and visit, right of
slave trading 614, 616
unauthorised broadcasting 615, 617
hijacking
Achille Lauro incident 665, 679–80, 1161 n221
aut dedere aut judicare principle 676–9
Bonn Declaration (1978) 679
customary international law 678 enforcement of hijacking conventions 678–9 Hague Convention (1970) 668, 674 n134, 676, 677, 678, 687 n213, 1160 n212
as international crime 678
Montreal Convention (1971) 668, 674 n134, 676, 677–8, 687 n213, 1160 n212 self-help and 679–80
state practice 678
Tokyo Convention (1963) 668, 676–7, 678, 1160 n212
universal jurisdiction and 678
historic bays 562–4
requirements 563–4
historic title 41 n141, 591, 592
dispute settlement 637
historic traditions: see customary law history of international law: see international law, history and development Hittites 14
HIV/AIDS, UNGA special session on (2001) 1212 n33
Hizbollah 1136, 1231
Hobbes, Thomas 26
Holy Roman Empire 19
Holy See
Beagle Channel mediation 1018 n38, 1055
diplomatic relations 244
as government 244
history 243–4
international legal personality 197, 243–4, 261

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

international organisations and 244
Italy and 244
Lateran Treaty (1929) 244
state, whether 197, 243–4, 261
treaty-making powers 244
Honduras, enforced disappearances 390
Hong Kong
history 1008–9
human rights in 317 n281, 1009
ICCPR/ICESCR and 1009
lease over the New Territories 539, 1008 SAR 1008–9
state succession and 1008–9
termination of British sovereignty and jurisdiction 539 n285, 1008–9
treaty succession and 974
WTO dispute settlement 1037 n159 hors de combat: see civilian population during armed conflict, protection of (GC IV and Protocol I (Part IV)); civilian property, destruction and appropriation; non-combatants/persons hors de combat hospital ships, protected status 1172
hostage-taking Iranian Hostages case: see United States Diplomatic and Consular Staff in Tehran Case (USA v. Iran) (Iranian hostages case) in the table of cases
non-international armed conflict and 1195
rescue 1144
state immunity and 715–16
hostage-taking of civilians in time of war 1169–70, 1177
as 'grave breach' 401
individual criminal responsibility 1200
killing of 1200
hostage-taking, conventions and other international instruments relating to Declaration on Minimum Humanitarian Standards (1990) 1198
Geneva Conventions (1949) and Protocols I and II (1977) 401, 1169–70
SC resolution 579 (1985) 1161 n221
Hostages Convention (1979)
aut dedere aut judicare principle and 676
protective principle and 668
hot pursuit
development of concept 617
GCHS/UNCLOS provisions 617–18
non-compliance with rules 643
requirements 617–18
use of force, avoidance 618 housing issues, Bosnia and Herzegovina Human Rights Chamber and 380 housing, right to adequate 301, 310, 361 Hudson Bay 563
human contacts, right to 373–4 human dignity, right to 60, 61, 267, 1195
as common foundation of human rights and humanitarian law 1196 Human Dimension of the CSCE (Moscow Mechanism) annual meetings 376–7
Copenhagen Concluding Document (1990) 374
Helsinki Conference (1992) and 375–7
ODIHR 377
Permanent Council, role 377
Vienna Concluding Document (1989) 374
human rights
see also ACHR; ECHR; ECtHR; IACtHR; ICCPR (1966); ICESCR (1966); international humanitarian law; UNCHR; UNHRC; Universal Declaration of Human Rights (1948); and individual rights
African Commission Special Rapporteur 392–3
African Union for Peace and Security Council 1028 ASEAN and 1294–5
balance of interests and 281
belligerent occupation and 1180–4
CFSP pillar 370

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

human rights (cont.)
CIS and 240
collective rights 271
conflict prevention and 377
cultural relativism and 41–2, 268–70
customary international law 275
environment and 847–8, see also environmental rights
equality of states and 45, 49
ethics/morality and 266
EU and 369–72
European system 345–80
extradition and 687
Helsinki Final Act (1975) and 117–18, 373
Human Rights of Individuals who are not Nationals of the Country in which they Live (UNGA resolution 40/144) 826
individual as subject of international law and 258, 268–9 interdependence 848
international humanitarian law, convergence 1168, 1196–8
international legal personality and 197
as interrelated complex of rights 280
jus cogens/peremptory norms and 266–7 minorities and: see minorities, protection of municipal and international law, interrelationship 130
national security 357–8, 1181–2
Office for Democratic Institutions and Human Rights (OSCE) 1289
OSCE and 372–8, 1289
promotion as basic purpose of government 374
recognition of states and 451, 452, 461
'right' 265–6
specialised agencies and 299
standard of treatment of aliens and 825–6
state immunity and 715–18
state responsibility and 793
state as source of 268–9
state sovereignty/domestic jurisdiction principle and 49, 213, 268, 269, 270, 272–3, 278, 488, 648
state/statehood, right to and 207, 451 sustainable development principle and 848
terrorism and 43–4, 1159, 1161, 1164–6
UN Norms on the Responsibilities of Transnational Corporations (2003) 250
universality 269, 280
values underlying 267
websites 1335–6
Human Rights Chamber of Bosnia and Herzegovina: see Bosnia and Herzegovina Human Rights Chamber
Human Rights Commission: see UNCHR (UN Commission on Human Rights) Human Rights Committee: see UNHRC human rights, compliance/enforcement
see also Child, Committee on the Rights of; Disabilities, Committee on the Rights of Persons with; ECOSOC; Enforced Disappearances Committee; Migrant Workers Committee; Racial Discrimination Committee; regional human rights bodies, common practices; Torture Committee; UN Human Rights Council; UN, human rights responsibilities; UN treaty bodies; UNHRC; Women, Committee on the Elimination of All Forms of Discrimination Against amnesty laws and 271–2, 372 n35, 390, 420 education in 280, 281, 337
exhaustion of local remedies and 273–4
extraterritorial responsibilities 276
inconsistencies, risk of 327, 336–7
level of 266
machinery for 271
national human rights bodies 276
non-state actors 272

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

obligation of states and international organisations actively to protect 276
obligation to investigate 358, 390
proliferation of supervisory committees 334 public debate, role 304
state responsibility for 276
human rights, development of law
Helsinki Final Act (1975) and 117–18
League of Nations 270–1
Marxism and 267
natural law and 54, 258, 266–7
new norms and instruments, proposals for 337 NGOs and 271, 276 n69
policy-oriented approach to international law and 60, 267
positivism and 266, 267, 270
UN conventions 302–3
WWI peace treaties 271
WWII and 271–2
human rights in CIS 240, 378–9
Czechoslovakia 278–9
Haiti 383
non-self-governing territories 277
South Africa 304
USSR 50 268–9, 278–9
Human Rights, Sub-commission on the Promotion and Protection of 307–8
change of name 307
Communications, Working Group on 305, 308
draft Norms on the Responsibilities of Transnational Corporations and other Business Enterprises with Regard to Human Rights (2003) 250 Draft Principles on Human Rights and the Environment (1994) 848
establishment 294
Human Rights and the Environment, report on (1994) 848 indigenous minorities, working group on 299, 308 inter-sessional working group 297, 309
membership 308
role 304, 305
Slavery, Working Group on the Contemporary Forms of 308
special rapporteurs 1325
states of emergency, reports on 308 termination (UNGA resolution 60/251) 307 Terrorism and Human Rights, report on 1164 n234
human rights treaties
see also individual treaties
acquired rights and 983 n142
belligerent occupation and 1180–1, 1183
burden/standard of proof 938
co-existence of treaty and customary law 716–17, 984 compliance/implementation 220 n112 cultural relativism as justification for breach 270 denunciation/withdrawal (VCLT 56) 946
as distinct category 388, 967
erga omnes obligations 981–2
extraterritorial application 276, 322, 349–50
interpretation 349, 937–8
legal order, establishment by 388 monitoring bodies, role 924, 983–4
non-derogation principle 274–5, 389
ratification, importance of 336
reservations 336, 354 n52, 388, 922–4
reservations, competence to determine validity 923–4 territorial treaties, analogy with 981–2
treaty succession and 336–7, 981–4
USA implementation/compliance 220 n112
USSR and 269
Vienna Declaration and Programme of Action (1993): see Vienna Declaration and Programme of Action (1994)

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

human rights treaties, limitation/claw-back provisions 275
'compelling governmental interest' 388
'decision reached in accordance with the law' 348
national security considerations 358
humanitarian intervention by states 1155–8 19th century 270, 1155
AU 1293
dislike of doctrine 1155–6 humanitarian necessity and 1156–7, 1184–5, 1187
in Kosovo 1156–7
reconstruction following intervention, obligation 1158
'responsibility to protect' and 1158 restoration of democracy 1158
safe haven in northern Iraq 1156
self-determination, right to and 1158
in Somalia 1260–2
state, status as and 201–2
UK Policy Guidelines on Humanitarian Crises (2001) 1157 n201
use of force (UNC 2(4)) and 1155–8 humanitarian law: see international humanitarian law Hume, David 25
Hungary
see also Gabčíkovo–Nagymaros Project
minorities in 297 n198
recognition of government (1956) 455
Roma and 297 n198
Torture Committee (CoE) and 363 n115
USSR, intervention in 57, 1273

IAComHR 381–7, see also ACHR (1969); IACtHR
admissibility 382
advisory services 383 asylum and 383 n228
communications 382
contempt laws (leyes de desacato), study on 393–4 disappearances and 383 enforced disappearances and 384
establishment 381
Inter-American Torture Convention (1985) and 384
international crimes and 383 n228
membership 385
mentally ill, protection of 383 n228
migrant workers, rights of 383 n228 municipal law and ACHR obligations, determination of conflict 383
powers 381–2
as principle organ of OAS 381 promotion of human rights and 382 publications 382–3
recommendations to states on progressive measures 382 refugees and 383
reports to OAS 383
right to act on own initiative/ex propria motu 383
torture and 383
websites 1336
workload 382
IAComHR complaints procedure compliance record 387
follow-up measures 387
friendly settlement as preferred option 387
individual petition, right of 259, 382, 384, 385
inter-state complaints 382
jurisdiction over Guantanamo Bay detention centre 386
precautionary measures 384, 385–6
proposals and recommendations 387
provisional measures 384
IAComHR, Special Rapporteurs on children 383
freedom of expression 383 n229
human rights and counter-terrorism 1164–5 indigenous peoples 383
women 383

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

IAComHR, Statute 381–2
amendment (1965) 382
amendment (1978) 382
IACtHR 387–91
3-months rule 387
admissibility 390
advisory jurisdiction 385, 388–90, 391, 398 n8 Chorzów Factory principle/restitutio in integrum 802 nn150 and 152
contentious jurisdiction 390–1
exhaustion of local remedies and 273–4
IAComHR, action at request of 387 jurisdiction, dependence on prior consent 387 jurisdiction, tribunal's obligation to establish 644
membership 387
provisional measures 384, 387, 391
role 388
treaty interpretation and 388
website 1336
IAEA
Civil Liability for Nuclear Damage Convention (1960) 893–4
Code of Practice on the International Transboundary Movement of Radioactive Waste (1990) 893 n277, 896–7
Early Notification of a Nuclear Accident Convention (1986) and 890–1
establishment 889
Guidelines for Mutual Emergency Arrangements (1977) 891
Iraq and 1249, 1256
Nuclear Accident, Vienna Convention on Assistance in case of (1986) 889, 891–2
Nuclear Safety Convention (1994) 892–3
object and purpose 889
Principles of Radioactive Waste Management (1995) 893 n277 standards and guidelines 889
Third Party Liability in the Field of Nuclear Energy (1960) 893–4
website 894, 1338
IBRD
see also World Bank
legal personality in domestic law 1299 n71, 1315 n149
ICAO (International Civil Aviation Organisation), website 1337
ICC (International Chamber of Commerce): see International Chamber of Commerce (ICC) ICC (International Criminal Court), admissibility independence and impartiality of alternative forum and 415 intention to shield from criminal responsibility and 415 investigation or prosecution by state with jurisdiction and 414–15
non bis in idem principle 415
ICC (International Criminal Court), appeals against decisions Appeals Chamber, composition and powers 417
by convicted person 417
by Prosecutor 417 grounds 417
on jurisdiction/admissibility 417
of Pre-Trial Chamber 417
on Pre-Trial Chamber's own initiative action 417 on release of person being investigated 417
on sentence 417
of Trial Chamber 417
ICC (International Criminal Court), history and development 410–11 drug-trafficking, proposed international court for and 410 Genocide Convention (1948) and 282, 410
ILC draft Statute 410–11
opposition to 411
Preparatory Committee 411 treaty basis 411
websites 1335, 1341
ICC (International Criminal Court), individual criminal responsibility 411, 670, 735
heads of state and 735

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

ICC (International Criminal Court), investigations authorisation to commence 413, 416 decision not to proceed 416
Pre-Trial Chamber and 413, 416
subsequent request following refusal 413 n90 ICC (International Criminal Court), judges election by Assembly of States Parties 415 Pre-Trial Division and 416 qualities and qualifications 415, 416, 417 representation of world's legal systems and 415
term of office 416
Trial Division and 416
ICC (International Criminal Court), jurisdiction 411–15 12-months rule (SC resolution 1422 (2002)) 414
aggression 439–40
complementarity 414
consent, need for 411
crimes committed after entry into force, limitation to 411 determination by Court 413, 416
'most serious crimes' 411, 670 nationals 411
preliminary determination by Pre-Trial Chamber 413, 416 referral by Prosecutor 412–13
referral by Security Council 412, 413–14 referral by states party 412–13
SC/ICC, uncertainty over respective competences 439–40 states parties, limitation to 411 territorial/personal nature 412
ICC (International Criminal Court), organs/organisation see also ICC (International Criminal Court), appeals against decisions Appeals Division 415, 417
Deputy Prosecutors 415
Office of the Prosecutor 415
Pre-Trial Chamber: see ICC (International Criminal Court), Pre-Trial Chamber Pre-Trial Division 415, 416
Presidency 415
Prosecutor 415
Registry 415
Trial Chamber: see ICC (International Criminal Court), Trial Chamber Trial Division 415
websites 1336, 1340
ICC (International Criminal Court), Pre-Trial Chamber 416 authorisation of investigation 412–13
composition 416
own initiative action, right of 416 review of Prosecutor's decision not to proceed with investigation 416 victims' representations to 412–13 warrants of arrest/summons to appear 416 ICC (International Criminal Court), procedure committal for trial 416
fair trial (ICC 55) 441–2
fair trial (ICC 66) 442
fair trial (ICC 67) 442
Pre-Trial 416
prompt hearing 416
protection and privacy of victims and witnesses 416
referrals by state party 412–13
Trial Chamber, establishment 416
ICC (International Criminal Court), state obligations obligations under another treaty and 414 surrender on request 414
unwillingness or inability to prosecute and 414–15
USA and 414
ICC (International Criminal Court), Statute (1998)
crimes against humanity, definition/classification as 436–7 Elements of Crimes 411 n81
entry into force 411
incorporation in Iraqi law 429 range and content 411
'treaty crimes', omission 674–5

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

ICC (International Criminal Court), Trial Chamber 416–17
composition 416
confidentiality of information 417 determination of guilt 416 determination of punishment/penalty 416
function 416
protection of victims and witnesses 417
public hearings/in camera proceedings 416–17
ICCPR (1966)
see also UNHRC
binding effect 253, 314
death penalty, second Optional Protocol on the abolition of 322 n315 Declaration on Principles of International Law (1970) and 253–4 denunciation/withdrawal, exclusion 318, 945–6, 983
derogation 275
Extraordinary Chambers of Cambodia and 422
Hong Kong and 1009
individual's rights under 46
interpretation of UN Charter and 253
nationality, right of choice (ICCPR 1) 1005 occupied territories, applicability in 322
reservations 318, 923–4
rights covered 314–15
self-determination and (ICCPR 1) 253–4, 289, 314, 522 territorial application: see 'within its territory and subject to its jurisdiction' (ICCPR 2) below
third parties and 253
treaty succession 983, 1009
'within its territory and subject to its jurisdiction' (ICCPR 2) 276, 314, 318, 321, 322, 826
ice packs, territorial sovereignty over 535 Iceland
see also Denmark/Iceland Union
fishing zones 581–2, 610
ICESCR (1966) 308–11, see also Human Rights, Sub-commission on the Promotion and Protection of; UNCESCR best efforts obligation to achieve progressive realisation of rights (ICESCR 2) 308
binding effect 253, 308, 309
conclusion and entry into force 308
Declaration on Principles of International Law (1970) and 253–4
Hong Kong and 1009
implementation, difficulties of 309
individual's rights under 46
interpretation of UN Charter and 253–4 nationality, right of choice (ICESCR 1) 1005 reporting obligation (ICESCR 16–22) 309–10
third parties and 253
treaty succession 983, 1009
ICJ 1057–1117
antecedents 1057–8
developing countries and 38–9
Liechtenstein and 217
website 1079, 1338
ICJ, admissibility 1071–2, see also ICJ, standing/locus standi
at merits stage 1088, 1097
counter-claims 1096–7
definition 1071
exhaustion of diplomatic negotiations, relevance 1015–17, 1070
exhaustion of local remedies and 1072 moot case/dispute no longer in existence 887–8, 1069, 1070, 1088, 1098
object and purpose 1108–9
as preliminary matter 1072, 1106
seisin 1072

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

ICJ advisory jurisdiction 1108–13
authorisation from UNGA, need for 1112
burden/standard of proof 1111–12 consent of parties, relevance 1109–10
'decisiveness' of opinion 1113
on difference between UN and member state 1113 Difference Relating to Immunity 1113
Eastern Carelia 1110–12
hypothetical situation and 1108–9 international organisations, right to request 954–5, 1072, 1304–5 legal question, need for 1112
as legal task 1109
Legality of Nuclear Weapons (WHO request) 1112, 1303–8
non-binding nature 1034–5, 1110
'other organs and specialised agencies', right to request (UNC 96(2)) 1112 political considerations and 1109 presumption in favour of jurisdiction 1110 reformulation of request 1109
refusal of party to participate, effect 1109–10 right to request 1108, 1112
SC and 1113–14
specialised agencies and 1034–5, 1308 n119, 1325 n190
sufficiency of evidence 1111
UN Secretary-General and 1113
Western Sahara 1110–11
'within the scope of their activities' requirement (UNC 96(2)) 1111, 1112 ICJ, applicable law equitable considerations within framework of the law 1087
ex aequo et bono 1087
ICJ 38 sources 1086
moral principles, relevance 12
non-liquet 98–9, 1087, 1189
special factors at request of parties 1086 n193 ICJ Chambers appointment of judges 1062–3 arbitration compared 1063 attraction to states reluctant to engage in third party adjudication 1063
Chamber for Environmental Matters 1062
Chamber of Summary Procedure 1062
composition 1062–3
composition, consensus approach 1062
flexibility 1063
procedure 1062
ICJ, counter-claims 1096–7
challenge to admissibility 1097
defence distinguished 1096
direct connection with subject-matter of claim, need for 1096–7
as independent claim 1096
ICJ decisions
binding force 963, 1101, 1104 Cameroon v. Nigeria 110–11
compliance/non-compliance 1104 development of international law and 110, 1104 ECtHR and ICTY, divergence 1116
enforcement 1104
finality 963, 1104
municipal courts and 158–9, 220–1
new events subsequent to, effect 1071 rejection in subsequent case 110–11 separate opinions 1059
third parties and 110, 1101
ICJ decisions, interpretation (ICJ 60) 1105 clarification, limitation to 1105 dispute, need for 1105 operative part of judgment, limitation to 1105
ICJ decisions, re-examination of situation 1107–8
Nuclear Tests 888–9, 1107–8
special procedure, possibility of 1107 ICJ decisions, revision (ICJ 61) 1071, 1105–7 admissibility as preliminary matter 1106 cumulative nature of ICJ 61 requirements 1106–7

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

decisive fact unknown to Court and party claiming revision, need for 1105–6 negligence, relevance 1106 time-limits 1106
ICJ, evidence 1088–92 advisory jurisdiction and 1111 affidavits 1090
boundaries 1090
burden/standard of proof 1091, 1100, 1133
Court's competence to determine procedure 1089 documentary evidence 1090
evaluation 1089–90
expert evidence 1089
findings of fact made by another tribunal 1090
flexibility 1088–9
improperly obtained 1092
inferences and admissions against interest 1089
judicial notice 1091
on-site visits 1089
power to compel 1089
subpoena, absence of provision for 1089 witnesses, infrequency 1089
ICJ judges
ad hoc 1060–2 dismissal, requirements 1060
election 1059, 1209
impartiality 1060 n17
non-participation on grounds of conflict of interest 1060 n17 participation in different stages of same case 1060 n17, 1061 n25
president/vice-president 1060
privileges and immunities 1059–60 qualifications and conditions 1060
term of office 1059–60
ICJ jurisdiction 1064–1117, see also ICJ advisory jurisdiction absence of party, effect 255 amendment of claim, possibility of 1070 n91
compétence de la compétence 1069, 1070, 1084, 1086
concurrent 1066–7
Connally amendment 1083–4 consent/compromis, limitation to 1066, 1086 contentious 1070–86
Court's right to choose own grounds 1071
critical date 1070
final and binding nature of Court's decision on 1071 formal requirements, relevance 1070 grounds for declining 1065–6 hypothetical case, exclusion in contentious cases 1068, 1088
ILO conventions and 340
inherent powers 1070, 1074, 1308 judicial review and 1113–14, 1271
law of the sea disputes 635
legal dispute requirement: see ICJ, legal dispute requirement as legal/objective matter 1070, 1080 merits distinguished 1071 motives of parties, relevance 1071, 1088
as preliminary matter 1072
remedies 1071
SC role distinguished 1066
wrongfulness of act, sufficiency to found jurisdiction 1085–6 ICJ jurisdiction, consent 3, 1075–81
compromissory clause 1079 conduct of parties as 1076 consent to PCIJ jurisdiction and 1080–1 forum prorogatum and 1076
as fundamental principle 1075, 1085–6 jus cogens/fundamental norms, relevance 1085 Monetary Gold 1078–9 Pact of Bogotá, effect 1080 referral by Security Council and 1076–7 signed minutes of meeting as 1077 special agreement/compromis 1075 third party rights and 1078–9
treaty provisions 1079
unilateral application and 1077
withdrawal or amendment 1080, 1084–6

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

ICJ jurisdiction, optional clause (ICJ 36(2)) 269, 1081–6 acceptances 1081–2
conditions/reservations 1082–5 implications of acceptance 1082 interpretation of declaration, responsibility for 1083–4 modification or termination after initiation of proceedings 1084–5 ratione personae reservations 1084–5 ratione temporis reservations 1084 reciprocity, need for 1082–3
treaty status 905
USSR and 269 n18
'vital interests'/domestic jurisdiction and 1083–4
withdrawal or amendment 1085–6
ICJ, legal dispute requirement 1032, 1064–7
burden of proof 1100
'dispute', existence of 1068–70
hypothetical case 1068, 1088
ICJ/Security Council responsibilities distinguished 1220, 1221
jurisprudence 1067–9
'legal dispute' 1067–8
legal interest 1088
moot case/dispute no longer in existence 887–8, 1069, 1070, 1088, 1098 political factors, relevance 1064–7 request for interpretation of judgment 1105 ICJ, organisation 1058–64
composition 39–40, 1058–9
politicisation, allegations of 1059, 1061
seat 1060
ICJ, preliminary objections 1074–5, 1087–8
joinder with merits 1087
jurisdiction 1074–5
merits as separate issue 1087–8
as preliminary matter 1087
res judicata and 102
time-limit 1087
ICJ procedure Court's competence to determine 1089, 1107 evidence 1089
pleadings 1064
Practice Directions 1063–4
Rules of Court 1063–4
seisin 1072
ICJ, provisional measures 283–4, 1066, 1093–6 avoidance of irreparable harm and 1094–5
binding effect 1095–6
conflict with state's treaty obligations 1270
on Court's own iniatitive 1095
non-aggravation or extension of dispute and 1095 object and purpose of Statute and 1095–6
preservation of the evidence 1095
preservation of parties' rights 1094–5
prima facie jurisdiction and 1093–4
urgency 1094–5
ICJ, remedies 1101–4, see also Chorzów Factory principle/restitutio in integrum; damages/compensation for expropriation or breach of international law, measure; remedies; reparation for breach of international obligation
declaratory judgment 1101
inherent jurisdiction 1072, 1101
ubi jus ibi remedium 1072
ICJ role 1113–14, see also Security Council and international law/ICJ relationship development of international law 1064–5, 1114 extension of contentious jurisdiction to international organisations 1113 as guardian of legality for international community as a whole 1270 n329 increased activity 1114 integrity of judicial process 1070–1, 1073, 1308 interpretation of the constituent instruments of international organisations 1304–5

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

judicial nature 1064–5, 1070–1, 1308 judicial review 1113–14, 1304 n98
national courts and 1113
'principal judicial organ of the UN' 1058, 1065, 1113–14, 1117, 1210, 1269–70 resolution of case in accordance with international law 1065–7 Serbia and Montenegro v. UK 1065
as superior court in international system 1117
UN Secretary-General and 1113
ICJ, standing/locus standi 1072–4
Albania 1073
amicus curiae briefs 1073
arbitral tribunals distinguished 1055 contentious and advisory jurisdiction distinguished 1072 FRG 1073
international organisations 1072, 1113
Italy 1073
Japan 1072 n103
Liechtenstein 217, 1072 n103
Nauru 1072 n103
NGOs 1073
as preliminary matter 1073
San Marino 1072 n103
Serbia and Montenegro 963, 1073–4 states not party to Statute, requirements 1072–3 states party to Statute, limitation to 1072–4 Switzerland 1072
treaties in force prior to ICJ Statute 1073
Yugoslavia (FRY) 963
ICJ, third state intervention 642, 1097–1101 binding effect of decision on third party 1101
burden/standard of proof 1098–1101
construction of convention to which third states are party (ICJ 63) 1098
'interest of a legal nature' 1100
jurisdictional link between intervener and parties to the case, relevance 1100 legal interest likely to be affected by decision 226, 1098 opposition by parties, relevance 1098 right to be heard 1101
South West Africa cases 226
status of intervener 1098 threshold 1099–1101
ICJ/PCIJ relationship 31, 1058, 1080–1, 1083
ICSID 1040–2
applicable law 1042
arbitral tribunals 1038–9
autonomy/'international' status 1041 conciliation commissions 1040–1, 1042
denunciation 1041 n184
individuals, standing 259, 1041–2
NAFTA and 1038–9, 1041
nationality of claims 1042
procedure 1042
role 1040–1
website 1338
ICSID Additional Facility 1038–9
ICSID awards
final and binding nature 1041, 1042
recognition and enforcement 1041, 1042
ICSID, jurisdiction
Additional Facility and 1041
'any legal dispute arising directly out of an investment' 1041 BITs provision for 1041, 1042
consent, need for 1041
dual nationals, exclusion 1042
exclusion of disputes 1041 n184 national of state other than one complained against requirement 1042 parties to the Convention, limitation to 1041 treatment as national of another state 1042
ICTR
see also ICC (International Criminal Court); ICTY
completion strategy 409
consent to jurisdiction, relevance 403
establishment by Security Council Chapter VII resolution 403, 407–8

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

ICTR (cont.)
fair trial (ICTR 20) 441
ICTY, similarities 408
jurisprudence 409
prioritisation 409
Rwanda, tensions with 409
website 1336
ICTR, individual criminal responsibility 46
aiding and abetting the planning, preparation or execution of crimes 408 command responsibility 408
for genocide 283
head of state, former 409, 735
planning, instigation, ordering and committing of crimes 408
position of accused person, relevance 408
superior orders and 408
ICTR, judges
ad litem 408, 409
nationality 408
number 408, 409
ICTR, jurisdiction
consent to, relevance 408
crimes against humanity 408, 436–8
GC, common article 3 and Additional Protocol II (non-international armed conflict) 408
genocide 408, 431
national courts referral to 409–10
national proceedings, grounds for deferral 408–9
non bis in idem principle 408 serious violations of international humanitarian law in the territory in 1994 408
ICTR, organisation
Appeals Chamber (Joint ICTY/ICTR) 404, 406, 408
mismanagement problems 409
Office of the Prosecutor 408
Prosecutor, establishment and appointment of separate 409
Registry 408
Trial Chambers 408
ICTY
see also ICC (International Criminal Court); ICTR
cases completed and in progress 407 Commission of Experts 403
completion strategy 406–7, 426
establishment by Security Council Chapter VII resolution 403, 406 legality 406
Statute, drafting and approval 403
website 1336, 1341
ICTY, individual criminal responsibility 46
aiding and abetting the planning, preparation or execution of crimes 404
customary international law and 405
for genocide 283
for 'grave breaches' 401, 403
head of state 409, 735
mitigation of punishment and 404
non-international armed conflict and 404–5
planning, instigation, ordering and committing of crimes 404
position of accused person, relevance 404
superior orders and 404–5
superior's knowledge of subordinate's act and 404
ICTY, judges
ad litem 404, 409
Chamber judges 404
number 404, 409
ICTY, judgments
appeal for error of law or fact 406 ICJ decisions, divergence 1116 punishment 406
ICTY, jurisdiction absence of cut-off date 404
concurrent/primacy 405
consent to, relevance 403
crimes against humanity 404, 436–8, 670
events in Kosovo 404
events in Macedonia 404 n43
genocide 404, 431

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

'grave breaches' 403
grave breaches of the Geneva Conventions (1949) and Protocols I and II (1977) 404 national courts in region of former Yugoslavia, referral to 407
national proceedings, grounds for deferral 405
non bis in idem principle 405 serious violations of international humanitarian law in the territory since 1991 404
torture 326
violation of the laws or customs of war 404
ICTY, organisation
Appeals Chamber (Joint ICTY/ICTR) 404, 406, 408 appointment by UNGA 404
composition 404
ICTR judges, inclusion in Appeals Chamber Panel 404
Office of the Prosecutor 404
Registry 404
term 404
Trial Chambers 404
ICTY, procedure
arrest, detention, surrender of accused persons 406 fair trial (ICTY 21) 406, 440–1 indictment 406 initiation of investigations 405
on-site investigations 405 prima facie case requirement 406
Prosecutor's powers 405
Prosecutor's role 405–6
protection of victims and witnesses 406
ICTY, state obligations compliance with request for assistance or order issued by Tribunal 405 co-operation in the investigation and prosecution of accused 405
IDA, role 1286, see also World Bank
IFA, role 1286
IFAD (International Fund for Agricultural Development) 1285 n14
IFC (International Finance Corporation) 1285–6
IFOR 1260, 1279–80
IGAD
Liberia and 1279
as regional arrangement (Chapter VIII) 1279 ILA
establishment (1873) 1283
information and notification obligations 864–5
Internally Displaced Persons, Declaration of International Law Principles (2000) 287 n129 Montreal Rules of International Law Applicable to Transfrontier Pollution (1982) 856–7, 864, 872
role 121
Rules on Groundwaters (1986) 884
Rules on Water Pollution (1982) 884 n217
Space Debris, Draft Instrument on the Protection of the Environment from 347 n321, 882, 1016 n28
State Immunity, Draft Articles for Convention on (1994) 708 n61, 709 n64, 734–5
ILC 119–21
Chorzów Factory principle/restitutio in integrum 802
consultative partners 119 customary international law, role in establishing 121 Declaration on the Rights and Duties of States, Draft (1949) 134 n17
Diplomatic Courier and the Diplomatic Bag, Draft Articles (1989) 759 n337, 761–2 Diplomatic Protection, Draft Articles on: see Diplomatic Protection, ILC Draft Articles on (2006) draft conventions 120–1 Effects of Armed Conflicts on Treaties, Draft Articles on 904 n9, 946, 952 n225, 1126 n37
Gabčíkovo–Nagymaros Project and 120

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

ILC (cont.)
ICC, draft Statute 410–11
individual criminal responsibility 401, 402
Jurisdictional Immunities, Draft Articles on (1991) 738
jus cogens/peremptory norms and 126
membership 40, 119
Model Rules on Arbitral Procedure (UNGA resolution 1262 (XI)) 1050, 1053–4
Nationality of Natural Persons in Relation to a Succession of States, Draft Articles (1999) 1006–8 Offences, Draft Articles 401, 410, 439 n226
opinio juris and 88–9, 120–1
Report on Fragmentation 66, 123
reports 120–1
Reservations to Normative Multilateral Treaties Including Human Rights Treaties, Preliminary Conclusions (1997) 924
Reservations to Treaties, Draft Guide to Practice (2007) 914 n56, 915 n61, 916, 918, 919, 921 n91, 922 n92, 924 n104 Responsibilities of International Organisations, Draft Articles 1295–6, 1312 self-determination, right to as universal principle of law 290
State Responsibility, ILC Articles on (2001): see State Responsibility, ILC Articles on (2001)
State Succession, Draft Articles (1981) 990 n182, 1007
Transboundary Harm Arising out of Hazardous Activities, Draft Principles on the Allocation of Loss (2006) 858 n71, 862
Transboundary Harm from Hazardous Activities, Draft Articles on the Prevention of, 855 n51, 856 n60, 860–2, see also Hazardous Activities, ILC Draft Articles on the Prevention of Transboundary Harm from (2001)
website 1333
working methods 120
illegitimacy
nationality and 661
prohibition of discrimination against (ECHR 14) 357
ILO 338–41
binding decisions 1285
codification and development of international law and 121
commissions of inquiry 1021
conciliation commissions 340–1
constituent instrument, interpretation 1305 n99
environmental protection and 889
establishment (1919) 31, 271, 338, 1285
gender discrimination and 325
international labour standards, role in promoting 338–9 Philadelphia Declaration (1944) 338
principles 338
Racial Discrimination Committee and 313
as specialised agency 338 n401
as subject of international law 47
Tripartite Declaration of Principles concerning Multinational Enterprises and Social Policy 250 tripartite structure 338, 340
website 1340
ILO complaints procedure 340–1
Committee on Freedom of Association 340–1
ICJ and 340, 1034 n148
inter-state complaints 340
standing/locus standi 340
ILO conventions
see also ICJ complaints procedure above
29 (Forced Labour) 340
107 (Indigenous and Tribal Populations (1957)) 298
169 (Indigenous and Tribal Peoples in Independent Countries (1989)) 298
federal states and 220
ICJ jurisdiction 340

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

ILO conventions and recommendations, Committee of Experts on the Application of
establishment 339
membership 339
role 339
ILO conventions and recommendations, role and procedure 338–9 International Labour Conference Committee on the Application of 339–40
reporting obligations 339
social justice and 339
submission to national authorities 339
IMCO: see IMO (formerly IMCO) IMF
constituent instrument, interpretation 1304 n97
dissolution powers 1329
establishment 40, 1285–6
legal personality in domestic law 1299 n71
privileges and immunities 1319 n168
state succession to state property and 993
immigration control
Channel Tunnel fixed link and 657
contiguous zone 578, 579, 580
cross-border jurisdiction 657–8 international officials and 1324 international organisations, representatives to and 1322 immigration offences, criminal jurisdiction 655 immunity ratione personae 735–40, see also diplomatic immunities (personal); employment contracts, state immunity in relation to; heads of state, former, immunity from jurisdiction ratione materiae; heads of state, immunities, jurisprudence; international officials, privileges and immunities; international organisations, privileges and immunities; international organisations, privileges and immunities of representatives of states to; state immunity headings
absolute immunity 739
Congo v. Belgium 739
customary international law 739
defence ministers 740 n235 diplomatic agents 737, 738, 740
foreign ministers 739–40
heads of government other than heads of state 738–9
'holders of high-ranking office in a state' 740
serving heads of state 735–8
IMO (formerly IMCO)
dispute settlement 1016 n25, 1035 pollution incidents and 900 rules and standards 899
website 1340
imprisonment for civil debt, prohibition
ECHR Protocol 4 348
ICCPR 275
non-derogation 275
imprisonment/detention during armed conflict, as crime against humanity 436
incendiary devices 1189–90
incorporation doctrine 140–8 applicability to non-customary law 140–1 constitutional bars 147–8 customary international law, limitation to 140, 157–8 treaties, ratification and 140 independence of Bantustans 202–3, 469
Bophuthatswana 202–3
Burma 493
Congo 205
Cyprus (1960) 235, 294 n166, 987 n163
Guinea-Bissau 205–6
Kosovo 201, 204, 424, 452–3
Latin America 27
Lithuania 203
Moldova 238
Namibia 227
Palau 1214
Somaliland 237
Timor-Leste 233–4
Transkei 202–3

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

independence of states
associations of states 239
constitutional provisions of former power and 493–4 critical date (territorial acquisition) and 510
definition 211–12
as fundamental right 211–14
as legal concept 202, 211 means of acquiring 493–4 referendum, role in determining 201 n24, 962 restrictions on, effect 211–12
rights and duties deriving from 212–14 state/statehood, as criterion for 202–4 unilateral declarations of 201, 203, 206, 478, 1242–3
use of force (UNC 2(4)) and 1123
independence of states, jurisprudence
Austro-German Customs Union 211–12
Island of Palmas 211 n74
Lotus 212
Nicaragua 212
India
ancient civilisations 15
deep sea mining 630
as major power 44
manganese production 628
municipal and international law, interrelationship 170
peaceful coexistence and 215
seabed resources 628
as successor to British India 960, 985, 999
UNMOGIP 1226 n108
India–Pakistan relations dispute (1965) (USSR mediation) 1018
Indian treatment of Pakistani prisoners of war 1199
state succession to public debt 999
indigenous peoples, rights
African Commission working group 393
American Declaration on Indigenous Peoples 300 autonomy/self-government 299
collective rights 299
Declaration on the Rights of (2007) 299, 307 n220
definition 298
education 299
forced assimilation, prohibition 299 genocide, protection from 299
health services 299
IAComHR Special Rapporteur 383
IACtHR and 300–1
ILO conventions relating to 298 independent experts group 300
individual rights 299
juridical personality/personality before the law 300 land tenure/way of life associated with the land 229, 296, 298, 300 legal systems, respect for 229, 299, 300 liberty and security 299 Martinez Cobo Report (1984) 298–9 media, access to 299 minority status 296, 298
nationality 299
natural resources 300, 390
in New Hebrides 229
in Nicaragua 300
in Paraguay 300–1
participation in life of state 299
'peoples', use of 298
property rights 300, 390–1
reserves 296
self-determination 299
self-identification as fundamental criterion 298 social, cultural, religious and spiritual values and practices 298, 299 special rapporteur: see special rapporteurs UN Development Group Guidelines on Indigenous Peoples' Issues (2008) 299–300
UN Permanent Forum on Indigenous Issues 299

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

UNCHR working group on 299, 308
Vienna Declaration and Programme of Action (1993) 280
Voluntary Fund 299
Working Group 299
individual criminal responsibility 397–443, see also international criminal courts and tribunals; Nuremberg Charter (1945)
aggression 402, 439, 671
aiding and abetting the planning, preparation or execution of crimes 404
apartheid 401, 402
civilian property in time of conflict, destruction 1200 command responsibility 399, 402, 408, 443 n229
conspiracy 399
crime against the UN 402
crimes against humanity 46, 399, 402, 671
crimes against peace 399, 402
Crimes against the Peace and Security of Mankind, ILC Draft Code (1996) and 401, 439 n226, 671 crimes against UN and associated personnel 402, 671
cruel and inhuman treatment 401
currency offences 399
customary international law and 405, 435–6
deportation or transfer of protected persons (GC IV, 49) 1200
development of concept 397–9
drug trafficking 399
East Timor Special Panels for Serious Crimes 425
Geneva Conventions (1949) and Protocols (1977) 401
genocide/Genocide Convention (1948) 46, 262, 400–1, 402, 425, 439, 671
'grave breaches' 401–2, 403
heads of state 399, 409, 735
hostage-taking of civilians in time of war 1200
ICC 411, 670
ICTR 46, 283, 408
ICTY 46, 283, 403, 404
ILC Draft Code of Offences 401, 402 international criminal courts and tribunals 397
international humanitarian law 1200
internationalised criminal courts and tribunals 418
Iraqi High Tribunal 429
jurisdiction and: see criminal jurisdiction
jus cogens/peremptory norms and 126
mitigation of punishment and 404
non-international armed conflict and 404–5
Nuremberg Charter (1945)/Tribunal 46, 399–401, 669, 735, 1200
obscene publications 399
piracy 262, 397
planning, instigation, ordering and committing of crimes 404
position of accused person, relevance 404, 408
prisoners of war, ill treatment 1200 punishment/penalty 404, 406, 416
SC resolutions on Somalia and Kuwait 402
sexual offences 425
Sierra Leone Special Court 418
slave trading 397
state responsibility, effect on 402, 782, 807 submarine telegraph cables and 399 superior orders defence: see superior orders defence
superior's knowledge of subordinate's act and 404
Tokyo Tribunal 46, 400
torture 401, 425, 684
treaty-defined crime under international law, need for 398, 399
war crimes 262, 399, 402, 434, 439, 671, 1200
wilful killing/murder 425, 1200

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

individuals, status in international law 45–6, 257–9, see also individual criminal responsibility; standing/locus standi (individual) duties to the state (Banjul Charter) 392
ECHR and 46
ECJ and 46
Genocide Convention (1948) and 46
Helsinki Final Act (1975) and 373
human rights and 258, 268–9
ICCPR and 46
ICESCR and 46
ICTR and 46
ICTY and 46
international legal personality 262
minorities, protection and 259
mixed arbitral tribunals 258–9
nationality and 258
Nuremberg Charter (1945)/Tribunal 46
as objects of 258
rights and obligations distinguished 46–7
standing 258–9
Tokyo Tribunal 46
treaty rights and obligations 149–50, 185
UDHR (1948) and 46
USSR and 46–7, 268–9
individuals, status in international law, treaty provision
ACHR 259
Convention for the Establishment of the Central American Court of Justice (1907) 259
EC treaties 259
ECHR 259
Germany–Poland Convention on Upper Silesia (1922) 259
ICCPR Optional Protocol (1966) 259
ICSID (1965) 259, 1041–2
Racial Discrimination Convention (1965) 259
Treaty of Versailles (1919) 258–9
WWI treaties 259, 294
Indonesia
ASEAN membership 1294
Bogotá Declaration (1976) 552
expropriation/nationalisation of property of foreign national 830–1 Netherlands, dispute with 1221
straight baselines 565–6
Straits of Lombok and Sunda, closure 568
Industrial Revolution 28 inflammatory projectiles 1186 information and notification obligation
see also EIAs
Atmospheric Pollution Convention (1979) 873
Basle Convention on the Control of Transboundary Movements of Hazardous Wastes (1989) 896
Corfu Channel 863
hazardous activities 861, 865
IAEA Code of Practice on the International Transboundary Movement of Radioactive Waste (1990) 896–7
ILA and 864–5
Montreal Rules (1982) 864
Non-Navigational Uses of International Watercourses (1997) 885–6 Nordic Convention on the Protection of the Environment (1979) 864
Nordic Mutual Assistance Agreement (1963) 891
nuclear accident, bilateral agreements 890–1
Nuclear Accident, Convention on Early Notification of (1986) 890–1
OECD and 863–4
Preparedness, Response and Co-operation Convention (1990) 870–1, 900
Prior Informed Consent Procedure Convention (1998) 896 n299
Protection and Use of Transboundary Watercourses Convention (1992) 884, 885–6 regional agreements 865 n115
Rio Declaration (1992) 864
state practice 864–5
treaty provisions 865–6
information and participation in public debate, right to

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

see also public life, right to participate in Aarhus Convention (1998) 848–9
Aarhus Convention Compliance Committee 849
EIAs 847–8, 866–7
environmental matters 847–8
Helsinki Final Act (1975) 373
OSCE/CSCE (1982) 847
ratification of treaties and 912
satellite broadcasting and 550
innocent passage
see also straits (innocent passage); straits (transit passage) (UNCLOS 34 and 35)
airspace 542–3
archipelagic sea lanes passage 568
archipelagic waters 568
internal waters 557, 569
innocent passage (territorial sea) 569, 570–4 action in case of non-innocent passage 571
bays 563
charges 571
civil jurisdiction and 574–5
criminal jurisdiction and 574
force majeure and 571, 577, 796 n108
GCTS provisions (GCTS 17) 570–1, 572
'innocent' 571–4, 576
Innocent Passage, Uniform Interpretation of the Rules of International Law Governing (1989) 573–4
landlocked states 570, 608
laws and regulations, compliance obligation (GCTS 17) 572 laws and regulations, right to adopt (UNCLOS 21(1)) 570, 572 notice of danger, obligation 571 nuclear substances and 574 n95
'passage' 571
scientific research and 572
suspension 571
Third World and 573
UNCLOS provisions (UNCLOS 17–26) 570, 571–2, 573–4
Uniform Interpretation of the Rules of International Law Governing Innocent Passage (1989) 573–4 warships in time of peace 570, 572–4 inquiry: see commissions of inquiry
Institut de Droit International arbitration procedure and 1048 n231
codification and development of international law and 121
conciliation procedure and 1023 n68
domestic jurisdiction principle and 273
environmental protection and 848, 865, 872 n154
international humanitarian law and UN peacekeeping forces 1233 n143
international law in municipal courts 138
international watercourses and 884 n217 intertemporal law and 508 n109 liability of member states for acts of international organisations 1317 recognition of states, legal effects 448 Regulations on the Procedure of Conciliation (1961) 1023 self-defence (UNC 51) and 1137 n94, 1139 n103, 1140 n108 treaties and the effects of armed conflicts 946 n202
universal jurisdiction 672–3
insurgents
definition 1149
international legal personality 245
intervention and 1149
recognition of 245, 444
insurrections, state responsibility and 791–3 intangibility principle: see uti possidetis doctrine/stability of boundaries intellectual property proceedings, state immunity and 728
INTELSAT 249, 549
Inter-American Bank 1292
Inter-American Committee on Peaceful Settlement 1031
Inter-American Convention against Terrorism 1164

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

Inter-American Convention on Human Rights (1969): see ACHR (1969)
Inter-American Council of Jurists 119
Inter-American Peace Committee 1031
Inter-Arab Force (Iraq–Kuwait conflict) 1032
INTER-SPUTNIK 549
inter-state courts/tribunals
see also ICJ; ICSID; ITLOS; PCA; PCIJ co-operation between 1116–17
cross-reference 1117 ICJ, role 1117
proliferation 1115–17
Interim Emergency Multinational Force in Bunia 1280 n371
interim measures: see provisional measures internal armed conflict, applicability of international law 245 internal waters 556–8, see also criminal jurisdiction archipelagic states and 556 n13, 567 n69
assimilation to coastal state territory 556–7
classification as 556–7
innocent passage, exclusion 557 jurisdiction over foreign ships 557–8, 574
piracy and 616
internally displaced persons, African Commission Special Rapporteur 392–3
Internally Displaced Persons, ILA Declaration of International Law Principles (2000) 287 n129
international administration of territories 230–4 Jerusalem and 230
Trieste 230–1
international administrative law 48, 1295
international agencies, development 1284–5
International Centre for the Settlement of Investment Disputes (ICSID): see ICSID International Chamber of Commerce (ICC), dispute settlement 1043, 1338
International Civilian Representative (ICR) (Kosovo) 204
International Commission for Air Navigation, dissolution 1330 n214 International Committee of the Red Cross: see Red Cross (ICRC) international communications, international law, role 48
'international community' 5–6
in ancient world 15–16
Dar al-Islam and 18 international co-operation: see environmental protection, international co-operation on international crimes
see also crimes against humanity; crimes against peace and security; individual criminal responsibility; international criminal courts and tribunals; universal jurisdiction; war crimes
IAComHR recommendation on 383 n228
international delicts distinguished 807
jus cogens/peremptory norms and 126, 807–8
state responsibility and 807–8 international crimes, classification as aggression 126, 439–40
apartheid 401, 671, 807
colonial domination by force 807
crimes against humanity 436–8
environmental pollution 807
genocide 282, 284, 430–3, 807
hijacking 678
piracy 397
slave trading 397
slavery 807
war crimes 433–6
international criminal courts and tribunals, development of 397, 399–402, see also Nuremberg Charter (1945)/Tribunal; Tokyo Tribunal Allied High Tribunal (1919) 399
post-WWI military tribunals 399 post-WWII war crimes trials under Control Council Law No. 10 400, 439

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

international economic law 40, 48
international legal personality and 197
municipal and international law, interrelationship 130
soft law and 118
international humanitarian law 1167–1203, see also armed conflict; human rights; weapons, prohibited choice of methods of warfare, limitation on 1186–7
customary international law 1167–8, 1187
emblems, use in time of war 1170, 1172
enforcement 1199–1201
food aid to Iraq 1244 n200
in Georgia 1192
human rights law, convergence 1168, 1196–8
ICRC principles (general) 1201–2
ICRC principles (non-international armed conflicts) 1201–2 ICRC, role 1200–1
individual criminal responsibility 1200
military necessity and 1178 n55, 1181–2, 1183, 1184–5 serious violation of 404, 408, 418, 419–20, 421, 429, 435–6
state responsibility and 434, 793
websites 1339
international humanitarian law, applicability
'armed conflict' 1190–3
children (CRC 38) 331
combatants and non-combatants distinguished 1170–1 from initiation of conflict to conclusion of peace 435, 1191–3 international armed conflict 435
international legal personality and 197
non-international armed conflict 404–5, 408, 435
peacekeeping operations 1232–3
Tadić 435, 1190–3
US intervention in Grenada 1183 n79 whole territory of state or under the control of warring party 435 international humanitarian law and the conduct of hostilities 1184–90 protection of civilians as basic principle 1169–70, 1184–5 international humanitarian law, conventions and similar international instruments related to applicability to third parties 1168
customary international law and 1167–8
Declaration of Minimum Humanitarian Standards 1198
Geneva Convention for the Amelioration of the Condition of the Wounded in Armies in the Field (1864) 1168
Geneva Conventions (1949) and Protocols I and II (1977): see Geneva Conventions (1949) and Protocols I and II (1977)
Geneva Conventions, Protocol I 1184–6
Hague Convention IV and Regulations: see Hague Convention IV (1899) and Regulations (1907)
Hague Convention for the Protection of Cultural Property in the Event of Armed Conflict (1954) 1186 n96
Protection of Civilians in Armed Conflicts (SC resolution 1674 (2006)) 1184 n83
St Petersburg Declaration (1868) 1168, 1186, 1189
termination for material breach (VCLT 60(5)) 949 international humanitarian law, history and development 28, 270, 1167–70 battle of Solferino and 1168 change of terminology from laws of war 1167
Dunant, Henry and 1168
Geneva Conventions (1929) 1169
Geneva Conventions (1949) and Protocols I and II (1977), 1169–70, see also Geneva Conventions (1949)
Hague Conferences (1899 and 1907) 1168–9

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

international humanitarian (cont.)
St Petersburg Declaration (1868) 1168, 1186, 1189
international humanitarian law, scope conduct of hostilities: see international humanitarian law and the conduct of hostilities 'violations of the laws or customs of war' 1192
wounded and sick 270, 1169–70, 1186 n94
wounded, sick and shipwrecked members of the armed forces at sea 1169, 1186 n94 international investment law see also multinational private companies, codes of conduct
municipal and international law, interrelationship 130 International Labour Conference, 339–40, see also ILO international law
see also general principles of law/international law; international law, history and development; intertemporal law
comity and 2
conflicts within 140
gaps/non-liquet 98–9, 1087, 1189 municipal law and: see municipal courts and international law; municipal and international law, interrelationship
SC and 1268–71
subjects of: see subjects of international law international law, breach municipal law as defence 133–6, 137, 138, 648, 941
Nottebohm 648
international law, compliance with see also state responsibility for internationally wrongful act; treaties, compliance/implementation (VCLT 26–7) advantages of compliance 8
China and 38
exaggerated expectations 7, 12–13 justification of actions by reference to international law 8 legal terminology and practice as essential part of international relations 8–9 legitimacy and 61–3
level of 6–8
as obligation 138
reciprocity as driving force 7–8 rules of the game, recognition of need for 7 vital interests as justification for violation 8 international law, definition, function and scope 2, 34, see also international trade law
balance of interests and 45 balance of rights and obligations and 44 economic relations 40, 48
environmental protection 45, 48
functionalist approach 48, 58 n47
health 48
labour standards 48
marine resources 48
peaceful co-existence as basic premise 44 policy-oriented approaches 58–63, 64, 267 international law, history and development 13–42, see also codification; natural law; positivism 19th century 27–30, 270
20th century 30–1
ancient world 14–18
authoritative decision-takers and 59–60
behaviouralism and 55–60
China and 36–8
cold war and 33, 36, 41
communist approaches to 31–8 consistency and certainty of law/responsiveness to change conundrum 43–4
decolonisation and 38–40, 44
developing countries and 9, 23, 38–42
diplomatic law 750–2

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

Eurocentricity 27–9, 39–40, 44–5, 114, 200 expansion of 28, 31, 43–9
globalisation and 36, 41–2, 44, 48–9, 65–6, 197, 1115–16
Middle Ages 19–20
nation-state and 13–14, 20–2, 487–8, 1282
positivism as brake on 51
power politics and 12, 55, 79–80, 215, 489, 1206
Renaissance 14, 20–2
as response to changing conditions 488–9 self-determination principle and 40 Spain and 22–3
technological development and 41, 43–4, 48
USSR and 8, 31–8
websites 1333, 1334
international law as law 1–13 auto-limitation 9 basis of obligation 9–11, 61–3 binding, whether 61–3 consensus doctrine 10–11
contractual/consensual approach 9–11
moral principles, relevance 2, 3–4, 12, 54, 74–5
natural law and 23
'new' states and 9
politics and 11–13, 24, 38, 44, 67–8, 79–80, 488–9
positivism and 52
international law, research, resources and teaching of 28
websites 1332–3
international law, theories of see also consent as basis of international law; international law, compliance with; positivism critical legal studies movement and 63–5 diplomatic history, relevance 54–5 dualism 29–30, see also dualism general theory of international law, impossibility 63 institutional processes, relevance 54–5 legal philosophy and 49–54
liberalism and 63
monism 29
NAIL (New Approaches to International Law) 63–4 recognition theories and 449
international law, universality
China and 38
decolonisation and 38–40
fragmentation, risk of 65–7, 123–4 law between socialist states and 35
Law Merchant 19
regional international law 2, 35
regional organisations and 48
universalism/particularism 27, 41–2, 64
USSR and 33–5
international legal personality 195–7, see also juridical personality/personality before the law, right to; state/statehood; subjects of international law
applicable law 219–20
human rights law and 197
international economic law and 197
international humanitarian law and 197
Lisbon Treaty (2007) and 242
multiplicity of models 242, 260, 263–4 practice as source of international law and 263 recognition of government and 457
rights, duties and the enforcement of 196, 263
state responsibility and 263, 1311 states: see state/statehood international legal personality, criteria/relevant factors and the acquisition of 195–7 attribution of rights and duties as determining factor 263–4 capacity to enter into international legal relations 260, 263 constitutional/constituent instrument provisions 97, 216, 261
definition and scope 195–6
directly imposed international law obligations 262

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

international legal personality (cont.)
effective territorial control 262–3 enforcement powers, relevance 264
'legal entity distinct from its members' test 264
members' intention 1298
objective (erga omnes) 260, 263, 1298
qualified personality 261, 262–3 recognition of, need for 220–1, 261–2, 449 status falling short of 196–7, 263–4, 1297
treaty-making powers 260, 263
international legal personality of associations of states 238–42
belligerents 245
Bosnia and Herzegovina 231–2
Byelorussia 218, 262–3
Commonwealth of Nations 239–40
condominiums 228–30
Cook Islands 239
East Timor 233–4
EC 241
ECSC 241
EU 241–2
EU pillars 241–2
EURATOM 241
federal states 217–23
Germany post-WWII 227–8
Holy See 197, 243–4, 261
ICRC 244 n244, 261–2 individuals 262
insurgents 245
international organisations: see international organisations, international legal personality international organisations, see also international organisations, international legal personality internationally administered territories 230–4
Kosovo 232–3
multinational private companies 249–50, 262
multinational public companies 248–9
national liberation movements (NLMs) 245–8
Nauru 199, 224 n136, 1297
Palestine 247–8
Palestinian Authority 247–8
private persons party to agreement subject to international law 262
SADR 236–7
Sovereign Order of Malta 243
SWAPO 248
Taiwan 234–5
tribes 216–17, 264, 503, 525
TRNC 235–6
trust territories 224–8
Ukraine SSR 218
UN 47, 83, 1297–8, 1302–3
UN Council for Namibia 248
Vanuatu 229
international legal system enforcement machinery, absence, 3, 4–5, see also economic sanctions as response to threat to or breach of the peace (UNC 41); regional arrangements for the maintenance of international peace and security (UNC Chapter VIII); self-defence, right to (UNC 51) establishment of rights and duties 902–3 judicial system, limitations 3, 70 legislature, absence 3, 70
non-hierarchical nature 5–6 separation of powers and 6, 11–12
weaknesses 12–13
International Meteorological Organisation, dissolution 1330 n214
international officials
diplomatic protection and 811 n212
as internationally protected persons 675–6
international officials, privileges and immunities 1324–6 customs duty on first installation, freedom from 1324
experts 1324–5
functional test 1324
immigration restrictions, exemption 1324
immunity from jurisdiction 1324
immunity from national service obligations 1324

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

tax exemption 1324
UN Secretary-General 1324
waiver obligation 1324
international organisations
see also individual organisations; regional organisations codification and development of international law and 1295
collective recognition of states and 465–6
dissolution 1329–30
growth 28, 47–8
ICJ and 1072, 1113
norms governing work and development as part of international law 1295
origin 1284
state practice and 82–3, 88–9, 1295
state succession and 985–6
succession 1330–1
websites 1339
international organisations, accountability 66, 1317–18
abuse of power and 1318 balance between constitutionality and institutional balance 1318
due diligence 1318
good faith and 1318
reasoned decisions, need for 1318
subsidiary organs and 1318
transparency 1318
World Bank 1040
international organisations, applicable law 1309–10
commercial contracts 1310
headquarters agreements 1309–10
internal law of organisation 1310 status-related matters 1310
tortious liability 1310
treaty relationships 1310 international organisations, constituent instruments 1303–6 as constitutional/constitutive instrument 1303–4 ECOWAS 1029
as internal law of organisation 1310
international legal personality and 216, 261, 1297, 1299, 1303
interpretation of 936–7
Legality of Nuclear Weapons (WHO request) 1303–4
member state liability and 1317
multilateral treaty status 1303, 1305–6 powers, dependence on 97, 1302, 1307, 1308–9 privileges and immunities of organisations, general conventions on and 1319–20 reservations, exclusion 920 subsequent practice 261
treaties between states and international organisations and 954 VCLT, applicability (VCLT 5) 907, 937 international organisations, constituent instruments, interpretation 936–7, 1304–8 ICJ advisory proceedings and 954, 1072, 1304–5
Legality of Nuclear Weapons (WHO request) 1303–4
responsibility for 1304–5 special rules 936–7, 1305–6
specialised agencies and 1305
subsequent practice and 937
teleological approach (object and purpose) 936–7, 1305–6
UN Charter 937
VCLT 31 and 32, applicability 1305 international organisations, definition/classification as ILC Articles on the Responsibility of International Organisations 1295–6 multinational public companies distinguished 1296 NGOs distinguished 1296
as product of treaty 1296
Treaty Succession, Vienna Convention on (1978) 1295–6 international organisations, international legal personality 47, 259–60, 1296–1303
applicable law 260
by inference 1297–8
capacity and 1303

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

international organisations (cont.)
capacity to claim reparation for breach of obligations 1311–12 constituent instrument as basis 216, 261, 1297, 1303 determining factors 259–60, 1296 effects 1299, 1302–3 intention of members and 1298
Nauru v. Australia 1297
objective (erga omnes) 1298, 1299
organisations created under domestic law and 1315 n149 recognition under private international law 1300 Reparation for Injuries 47, 83, 1297–8, 1302–3
responsibility and 1311
right to sue and be sued 1311–12
rights and duties resulting from 1302–3
as subjects of international law 47, 258, 259–60, 1297
Third Restatement of Foreign Relations Law 1298 n69 international organisations, international legal personality under domestic law acceptance in domestic law of status under international law 1300 Arab Monetary Fund case 1301
headquarters agreement and 1299–1300 incorporation of treaty and 1301–2 legislation, need for 1300–2 obligation of member states to make provision for 1299 personality under domestic law distinguished 1296–7, 1299 private international law and 1300 recognition by courts on basis of comity/acceptance in other states 1302 recognition by the executive 1302
Tin cases 1300–2
UK and 1300–2
Westland Helicopters 1302
international organisations, member state liability towards organisation 1311–12
Reparation case 1311–12
international organisations, member state liability towards third parties 1314–17
applicable law 1314–15
Matthews v. UK 1317
organisation not having legal personality and 1314
pacta tertiis nec nocent nec prosunt rule 1315
Tin cases 721, 1315–17
tortious liability 721
transfer of competences to international organisation and 1317 international organisations, membership and relationship with members 1295–6 entities other than states 1296
Holy See and 244
state sovereignty and 57, 488
states, limitation to 1295–6 international organisations, powers and responsibilities human rights obligations 276
ILC Commentary 1309
Treaties between States and International Organisations Convention (1986) 1309
treaty-making powers 1308–9
international organisations, privileges and immunities 1318–29, see also international officials, privileges and immunities access to courts, right of and 1321–2
criminal jurisdiction and 1328
currency restrictions and 1328
customary international law 776, 1321 n176
customs duties, exemption 1328
diplomatic bags and 1328
freedom of communication 1320, 1328
functional necessity test 776, 1319–22
General Convention on the Privileges and Immunities of the UN (1946) 776
headquarters agreements and 1319–20, 1323–4

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com immunity from execution or enforcement 1327

immunity from jurisdiction 1326
international financial institutions and 1319 n168 inviolability of premises and archives 776, 1326, 1327–8 jure imperii/jure gestionis distinction, relevance 1318–19, 1326–7
Privileges and Immunities of the Council of Europe, General Agreement on (1949) 1319 n169
Privileges and Immunities of the European Communities, Protocol Concerning (1965) 1329 n169
Privileges and Immunities of the OAS Agreement (1949) 1319 n169 reciprocity, relevance 1318–19, 1326
specialised agencies 776 n447, 1319
state immunity distinguished 1318–19, 1326–7 UN 1319–21, see also UN, privileges and immunities
waiver 1327
international organisations, privileges and immunities, jurisprudence Eckhardt v. Eurocontrol (No. 2) and 1321 n176
FAO v. INPDAI 1321
Iran–US Claims Tribunal v. AS 1320–1
Kukuru v. EBRD 1321
Mandaro v. World Bank 1320
Obligation to Arbitrate case 1320
Waite and Kennedy v. Germany 1321–2
ZM v. Permanent Delegation of the League of Arab States to the UN 1321 international organisations, privileges and immunities of representatives of states to 775–6, 1322–4 administrative and technical staff, entitlement 776
codes and cyphers, right to use 1322 currency and exchange restrictions, facilities relating to 1322
customary international law 1323
customs exemption 1322
diplomatic bag 761
functional test 1323
headquarters agreements provisions 1323–4
immigration restrictions, exemption 1322
immunity from arrest/seizure of personal baggage 1322 immunity from civil and administrative jurisdiction 776 immunity from criminal jurisdiction 776
International Organisations, Vienna Convention on the Representation of States in their Relations with (1975): see International Organisations, Vienna Convention on the Representation of States in their Relations with (1975)
inviolability of archives, documents and correspondence 1322 inviolability of premises 776
municipal law and 1328–9
personal baggage immunities and facilities 1322
'representative' 1323 n182
tax exemption 1322
UK practice 1328
unilateral withdrawal and 1323
US practice 1328
waiver obligation 1323
international organisations, responsibility 13, 1310–14, see also state responsibility for internationally wrongful act including acts of, international organisation for acts of organ or agent 1312 for aid or assistance to a state or another organisation 1312 attribution 1312
countermeasures and 1313 n141
customary international law 1311
distress and 1313 n141
force majeure and 1313 n141
ILC Draft Articles on 1295–6, 1312
international legal personality and 1311
jus cogens/peremptory norms 1313 n141
for lawful acts 1313

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

international organisations (cont.)
necessity and 1313 n141
outer space 546, 859, 1312 n138
peacekeeping operations 1313–14
preclusion 1312–13
remedies 1313
tortious liability 1313
treaty base 1311
International Organisations, Vienna Convention on the Representation of States in their Relations with (1975) criticism of/refusal to sign 775–6, 1323 n182
diplomatic bag 761
diplomatic relations between sending and host states, relevance 775–6 General Convention on the Privileges and Immunities of the UN distinguished 776 scope 775–6, 1323 n182 International Organisations, Vienna Convention on Treaties between States and (1986) advisory opinions and 954–5
conclusion 953
dispute settlement provisions 954–5
ILC views on 953–4
member states of organisation and 953–4 powers and responsibilities of organisation and 1309
'reservation' to 914 n57
VCLT, relationship with 953
International Refugee Organisation, dissolution 1330 n214 international relations, history and development 1282–4 19th century changes 27–8
American Continent, developments on 1291 ASEAN, establishment and development 1294–5
Berlin Conference (1871) 1283
Berlin Conferences (1884–5) 1283
China and 38
Cold War, impact 33, 36–7, 41, 573, 1209, 1217, 1224, 1226, 1234, 1287, 1290
congress system 1282–3
establishment (1919) 31, 271, 338, 1285
games theory and 58
ILA, establishment (1873) 1283
international conferences and conventions, effect of growth in 28, 54–5 international law as reflection of 43, 67–8 international river commissions 1283 Islamic approach to 18
Napoleonic wars 27, 1282
natural law value system and 21
NGOs: see NGOs
non-alignment 57, 1287
Paris Conference (1856) 1283
Peace of Westphalia (1948) 26, 1120, 1282
power politics and 36, 55, 215
public international unions/intergovernmental associations 1283–4 Red Cross, establishment (1863) 1283 scramble for Africa 1283
superpower politics 57
Thirty Years War 1283
Treaty of Versailles (1919) and 30
unanimity approach 1283
USSR approach to 35, 36
International Seabed Authority (UNCLOS 156–85) 633–5
'Area' 629
Assembly, composition and powers 633–4 consensus and 634 nn398 and 400
Council, composition and powers 633, 634
Economic Planning Commission 634
Enterprise 629, 630, 633, 634–5
'equitable sharing' principle and 590, 629
exploitation of the continental shelf and 590
ITLOS and 639
landlocked states and 634 n399
Legal and Technical Commission 634
opposition to 631

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

organs 633–5
role and responsibilities 629–31
special interests, representation of 634 n399 International Settlement Bank 249
state succession to state property and 993
International Steering Group (Kosovo) 204 international straits: see straits (innocent passage); straits (transit passage) international trade law, history and development 45, see also effects doctrine/extraterritorial jurisdiction on economic matters; GATT Law Merchant as 19–20
Renaissance 14, 20–2
soft law and 118
WTO dispute settlement procedures and 1037–8 international watercourses 883–7, see also Danube; Danube Commission; Gabčíkovo–Nagymaros Project; Kiel Canal; Panama Canal Zone; Suez Canal adverse impact, measures to avoid 885–6 bilateral agreements 885, 886 n235
Civil Liability and Compensation for Damage Caused by the Transboundary Effects of Industrial Accidents (2003) 884 n218
Congress of Vienna (1815) and 28 consultation and negotiation 886
customary international law 851–2, 883
definition 883
dispute settlement 885–6
ecosystems, protection of 886
EIAs 865 n115, 884
equitable and reasonable share principle 108, 884, 885
freedom of navigation 1221 n85
Helsinki Rules (1966) 883–4
ILA Rules on Groundwaters (1986) 884
ILA Rules on Water Pollution (1982) 884 n217
international co-operation 884–5
Lac Lanoux 852, 864, 883 n215, 1017 measures to protect 884
Non-Navigational Uses of International Watercourses Convention (1997) 108, 885–6
notification obligations 884, 885–6
obligation to avoid injury to other states 885
Oder 851–2, 883
'polluter pays' principle 884
'pollution' 886 n233
precautionary principle 884
regional agreements 886 n235
Rhine Commission: see Rhine Commission riparian rights 883, 885
state succession 970
sustainable development principle 884
'transboundary impact' 858
transboundary protection, state responsibility 858 Transboundary Watercourses and International Lakes Convention (1992) 858, 884–5 international watercourses, boundaries 498, 505–6, 531 accretion and 495, 498, 499, 520, 531
avulsion and 531
change of boundary and 531
channel as 498, 531
navigable/non-navigable rivers 498
thalweg 531
'internationalised' contracts 829
internationalised criminal courts and tribunals 417–30, see also Bosnia War Crimes Chamber; Cambodia, Extraordinary Chambers of; East Timor Special Panels for Serious Crimes; Iraqi High Tribunal; Kosovo Regulation 64 panels; Lebanon Special Tribunal; Serbian War Crimes Chamber; Sierra Leone Special Court
applicable law 418
definition 417–18

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

internationalised criminal courts (cont.)
individual criminal responsibility and 418
reason for growth in 417
Internationally Protected Persons Convention (1973)
adoption 764
aut dedere aut judicare principle and 675, 764–5
extraditable offences and 764–5
'international protected persons' 675–6
passive personality principle 665
summary of provisions 764–5 Interoceanmetal Joint Organisation 630
intertemporal law
boundary treaties, interpretation 496–7, 500 n68
continental shelf 508–9
legislative interpretation and 160–1 territorial acquisition 496–7, 500 n68, 508–9, 520–1 treaties of cession prior to UNC, validity 500 n68, 508 n110 treaties, interpretation 496–7, 500 n68 intervention in the affairs of another state, justification aid to government authorities 1151–2, 1154–5 collective self-defence and 1152
Congo 1154–5
Grenada 1144, 1151, 1183 n79, 1276 n355 human rights protection 49, 213, 268, 269, 270, 272–3, 278, 488, 648 humanitarian intervention by states 449, 1155–8, see also humanitarian intervention by states Nicaragua 1151 n165
Panama 1151
state practice 1152
threats to international peace and security 1237 intervention in the affairs of another state, prohibition 1147–58, see also domestic jurisdiction principle (UNC 2(7)); use of force (UNC 2(4))
aid to rebels 213, 1152–5
civil wars 1148–51
colonial territories and 212–13, 649
Congo 1154–5
Corfu Channel 1127–8
Declaration on Armed Intervention in the Domestic Affairs of States (1965) 1127 Declaration on Friendly Relations (UNGA resolution 2625 (XXV)) 213, 1123, 1127, 1148 democratic rights and 49
equality of states and 1205
EU and 213
national identity and 213
Nicaragua 1148, 1153
peaceful co-existence and 215
positivism and 279
racial oppression and 213
restoration of democracy 1158
Rushdie fatwa as 213 n82
state practice 1153
territorial jurisdiction and 213–14
UNC 2(7) 212–13, 488
investment: see foreign direct investment Iran
arms sanctions (UNC 41) 1247
embargoes 688 n220
human rights in 305
London embassy 757 n324
non-recognition policy and 484
nuclear weapons and 1247
prisoners of war 1021 n59
Rushdie fatwa as intervention in UK affairs 213 n82 straight baselines 561 n37
Iran–Iraq war 1228
as breach of the peace (SC resolution 598 (1987)) 1241 child soldiers and 331
civilian population and 1185 n91
freedom of navigation and 610–11 genuine link/reflagging 612–13
UN Iran–Iraq Military Observer Group 1228
UNIIMOG 1244 n201
Iran–US Claims Tribunal 1043–5
applicable law 1043–4

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

claims below and above $250,000 distinguished 1044
composition 1044
development of international law and 111, 1044–5
diplomatic protection distinguished 1044 dual nationals and 1044
espousal of claim principle and 1044
establishment 1043
final and binding nature of awards 1044 individual, standing 1043
privileges and immunities 1320–1
recognition and enforcement of awards 1044 rules of procedure (UNCITRAL as modified by parties or Tribunal) 1044 Security Fund 1044
Iran–US Claims Tribunal, jurisdiction disputes relating to the interpretation of the Claims Settlement Agreement 1043 inter-state contractual claims 1043 violations of individuals' property rights arising out of the hostages crisis 1043 Iran–US relations freezing of assets 692 sanctions 692–3
Iraq
see also Iran–Iraq war
Arab League and 1032
Coalition Provisional Authority 428
human rights in 83–4, 305
ICC Statute (1998), incorporation 429 invasion of Kuwait: see Kuwait, Iraqi invasion of Kurds and 1156, 1239, 1254–5
minorities in 293 n164
no-fly zones 1156, 1254–5
'oil-for-food' scheme 1250
prisoners of war 1021 n59
prisoners of war, treatment of 1175 n39
Red Cross and 1201, 1243
safe haven 1156
as threat to the peace (SC 688 (1991)) 1156, 1239, 1254–5
UN blockade 1244
UN failure 1224, 1234
UNIKOM 1229
UNMOVIC 1249–50, 1256
UNSCOM 1249–50, 1255 n253
US missile attack in Baghdad (1993) 1145
WMD and 1248–50
Iraq, occupation of 1183–4
human rights, Special Representative 1183–4 internationally recognised government of Iraq as objective 1183–4 obligations of occupying powers 1183–4
Iraqi High Tribunal
Appeals Chamber 429
death penalty 429
due process/fair trial and 429
establishment 428–9
individual criminal responsibility 429
Iraqi Special Tribunal, as successor to 429 judges (Iraqi nationals) 429
non-Iraqi nationals, role 429
President 429
Trial Chambers 429
Iraqi High Tribunal, jurisdiction
concurrent/primacy 429
crimes against humanity 429
crimes committed between 16 July 1968 and 1 May 2003 429 crimes of regime of Saddam Hussein 429
genocide 429
over Iraqi nationals or residents 429
war crimes 429
Ireland
continental shelf 588
customary international law and 167
international law in municipal courts 170
treaties/municipal law relationship 170

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

Irish Free State–UK Treaty (1921), state succession to public debt and 999 irregular forces, right of self-defence and 1135–6 ISAF 1280
Isaiah 15
Islamic approach to international law/international relations 18
  diplomatic privileges and immunities and 18
  inter-faith relations 18
  war, laws of 18
Islamic Conference 395 n295
Islamic Shari'ah as applicable law 395 n295
islands 564–5
  artificial 199, 582, 583, 609
  chain 559, 565
  contiguous zone, right to 564–5 continental shelf, right to 564–5, 588 creation 498
  definition (GCTS/UNCLOS) 564
  EEZ, right to 564–5, 582 installations on the continental shelf distinguished 589–90 low-tide elevations distinguished 559
  maritime delimitation and 594–5, 598, 603, 605
  oil rigs distinguished 589–90
  rocks, status 559, 565, 582
  self-determination and 199
  sovereignty over 524
  territorial sea, entitlement 564–5
Israel
  boundary disputes 200
  diplomatic premises, immunity in relation to 755 n314 Eichmann case 214, 651, 671–2, 680, see also Eichmann case
  embargoes 1125
  Entebbe rescue 680, 1144
  international law in ancient Israel 15
  international law in municipal courts 166
  recognition 200, 457
  recognition by Arab countries 447, 462 nn71 and 74
  Red Cross and 1201
  self-defence, right to (including pre-emptive action) 1135, 1138, 1139
  state succession 960
Israel occupied territories
  see also Construction of a Wall case, Beit Sourik and Mara'abe in the table of cases
  annexation, exclusion 1182
  Geneva Conventions (1949) and Protocols I and II (1977), applicability 1178–9
  Golan Heights, proposed change in status 469 n105, 502 n80
  human rights and 1181–2
  ICCPR, applicability 322
  national security and public order considerations 1181–2
  powers and authority of military commander 1182
  Special Committee on Practices in 303
  territorial acquisition and 502
  West Bank 1178–9, 1181–2
  withdrawal from, agreements related to 247
Israel–Egypt Peace Treaty (1979) 1228 n117
Israel–Jordan Peace Treaty (1994), jurisdictional arrangements 657–8
Italy
  1930s aggression 30
  city states 20
  customary international law and 173
  deep sea mining 630
  employment contracts, state immunity in relation to 726
  Gulf War and 1253 n246
  Holy See and 244
  ICJ and 1073
  international law in municipal courts 173
  state immunity from execution/attachment 747 state succession (1947) 958 n4
  unification (1870) 28

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

ITLOS
see also law of the sea, dispute settlement (UNCLOS Part XV); law of the sea, jurisprudence ad hoc judges 639
advisory opinions 642
applicable law 639–40
composition 638–9
counter-claims 641
exhaustion of domestic remedies 642
experts 639
jurisdiction 639
jurisprudence 642–4
non-appearance 641
non-state entities and 639 parallel treaties, primacy 637–8
prompt release proceedings (UNCLOS 292) 642–3
provisional measures 637–8, 640–1, 643, 644
qualifications 639
Seabed Disputes Chamber: see Seabed Disputes Chamber (UNCLOS 186–91)
standing 639
term of office 639
third party intervention 641–2
website 1338
ITU 28, 244, 549, 550–1, 1285 n14
establishment (1865) 28, 1284
role 549
Ivory Coast, arms sanctions (UNC 41) 1247 n218

Jammu 1226 n108
Jan Mayen Island 599–601
Japan
1930s aggression 30
as archipelagic state 566
customary international law and 176
deep sea mining 630
ICJ and 1072 n103
international law in municipal courts 177
invasion of China/Manchuria (1931) 30, 468 League of Nations, withdrawal from 30
minorities in 295
Pacific Islands Trust Territory and 224
Taiwan and 234
treaties/municipal law relationship 176
Jay Treaty (1794) 823, 1048
Jericho 247
Jerusalem
proposed international status (1947) 230
SC resolutions (476 (1980) and 478 (1980)) (change of status) 469
Jordan, 1958 crisis 1273
journalists, compulsory licensing 388–9
Joyce case 667
Judaism, and international law 15 judicial decisions as source of international law 109–12 cross-reference between municipal and international courts 130 cross-reference between tribunals 111, 352 n37
as evidence of customary international law 112 ICTR and ICTY decisions 111 international arbitral tribunals 111 municipal courts 111, 112
PCIJ/ICJ decisions 109–11
as subsidiary source 109
websites 1334–5
judicial impartiality 1060 n17
judicial independence 11–12
African Commission resolution on 393
ICC 415
Zimbabwe 393
judicial notice
of foreign law 140
ICJ 1091
of international law 140–1
judicial review 182, 188–91, 193, 692, 812
ICJ and 1113–14, 1271
judicial role 56, 146, 147
juridical personality/personality before the law, right to
ACHR 3 274
ICCPR 16 275
indigenous peoples and 300
non-derogation 274

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

jurisdiction
see also domestic jurisdiction principle (UNC 2(7)); justiciability
applicable law 647
aut dedere aut judicare principle 671, 1160
civil jurisdiction: see civil jurisdiction; torts in violation of international law, jurisdiction (US Alien Tort Claims Act) criminal jurisdiction: see criminal jurisdiction definition, difficulties and confusion 647 executive jurisdiction 650–1, see also forcible abduction/unlawful arrest extraterritorial jurisdiction: see extraterritorial jurisdiction federal states: see federal states international law and conflict of laws rules distinguished 646–7 law-making (prescriptive) and law-enforcement jurisdiction distinguished 645–6 legislative, executive and judicial jurisdiction distinguished 645, 649–50 overview 645–7
ships: see ships (jurisdiction) territorial jurisdiction: see territorial jurisdiction jurisdiction based on nationality, collisions on the high seas 618
jus civile 16–17
jus cogens/peremptory norms 124–7
acquired rights 1001 aggression 808 n198
apartheid 808 n198
creation of 126–7
customary/treaty law, limitation to 127
definition 125–6
environmental offences 807
erga omnes rules distinguished 124–5
genocide 126, 808
heads of state immunities and 126 n239
human rights 266–7
ICJ jurisdiction and 1085
international crimes 126
lex specialis derogat legi generalis and 124
natural law and 125–6
non-derogation principle 125, 126, 275, 807, 1197
piracy 126
racial discrimination 808 n198
SC resolutions and 127
self-determination, right to 808 n198
slave trading 126, 808
slavery 808 n198
standing/locus standi and 125
state immunity from jurisdiction and 127, 716
State Responsibility, ILC Articles and 126, 807–8
torture 326, 808
treaty amendment and 931–2 treaty obligations and 127 treaty reservations and 1217
universal jurisdiction and 673–4
use of force, prohibition 126
validity of treaties and (VCLT 53 and 64) 125, 127, 944 jus communis 534
jus gentium 16–18
jus soli 661
just satisfaction (ECHR 41) 353, 359, 806 n184
just war 1119–20
balance of power system and 1120
Grotius 24
law of war and 1120–1
nation-state and 1119–21
Peace of Westphalia (1948) 26, 1120, 1282
positivism and 1120
St Augustine 1119
state sovereignty and 1119–21
Suarez 1120
Vitoria 23, 1120
WWI and 1121
justice, natural law and 24, 54
Justice and Home Affairs Pillar 241, 242
justiciability 179–88, see also act of state doctrine

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

basis of doctrine 180–1 constitutionality of foreign government 186 defence matters 184
definition 179–80
diplomatic protection 188–9
diplomatic representation, matters related to 186 n302 domestic acts, applicability to 180–1 evidential bar considerations 180 foreign law 186–7
foreign relations and 140, 182, 187–92 individual's treaty rights and obligations 185 manageable judicial standards, need for 182, 186, 190–1
separation of powers and 180, 189
state immunity and 180, 182–3, 699–701
state sovereignty and 180–3
taking of property in foreign state 191–2 terrorist threat assessment 189 treaty concluded between third states 185–6 unincorporated treaties 183–6

Kadesh 14
Kaliningrad 964 n45
Kant, Immanuel 132
Kashmir 1221, 1226 n108
Katanga secession 205
self-determination and 392
Kazakhstan
EU Guidelines (1991) and 451–2
treaty succession 976–7
Kellogg–Briand Pact (1928) 439 n226, 468, 501, 506, 509, 942, 1122
Kelsen, Hans 49–51, 72, 131–2, 1068 n75
Kenya
Bogotá Declaration (1976) 552
bombing of US embassy 1134
Somali claims over 523–4
treaty succession and 958 n6
Kerkennah islands, effect on delimitation 594
KFOR
as regional arrangement (Chapter VIII) 1280
state responsibility and 350–1, 787–8, 1312 n140
website 1340
Khrushchev, Nikita 33
Kiel Canal, as international waterway (Treaty of Versailles) 540, 930
Kinmen 235
Korean war 57, 1215
collective use of force (Chapter VII) 4
Korovin, E. A. 32
Koskenniemi, M. 63–5
Kosovo
see also KFOR Ahtisaari Plan (2008) 204, 452–3
applicable law 233
civilian population and 1185 n88
Constitutional Framework for Provisional Self-Government (2001) 233
EU Special Representative 204
EULEX 204 n41
humanitarian intervention in 1158–9
ICTY and 404
independence 201, 204, 424, 452–3
International Civilian Representative (ICR) 204
international legal personality 232–3
International Steering Group 204
minorities in 295 n170
OSCE Mission 1033
recognition of 453
recognition and UN membership 453
SC resolution 1244 (1999) and 232–3, 452
sovereignty over 233
Special Representative, role 233
territorial title 233
Torture Committee (CoE) and 363 n115
UN membership and 453
UNMIK 232–3, 423
War and Ethnic Crimes Court 423 n145

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

Kosovo Regulation 64 panels
applicable law 424
composition 423–44
establishment 423
problems relating to 424
Kozhenvikov, F. I. 34
Kurds, repression by Iraq (SC 688 (1991)) 1156, 1239, 1254–5
Kuwait boundary with Iraq, UN guarantee (SC resolution 687) 521 n193, 1248, 1267
torture and 716–17
Kuwait, Iraqi invasion of 186–7, see also UN Compensation Commission (Iraq)
as act of aggression 1241 n180
Arab League and 1032
as breach of the peace 1241
collective self-defence and 1147
economic sanctions as response to threat to or breach of the peace (UNC 41) 4, 1243–4, 1248–50
individual criminal responsibility 402
Iraq's historic claim to Kuwait and 525
non-recognition policy and 469–70, 1269
SC resolution 660 (1990) 1241, 1253–4
SC resolution 661 (1990) 1147 n149, 1243
SC resolution 662 (1990) 1269
SC resolutions 402, 469–70, 502, 1223, 1269
state responsibility for damage arising from (SC resolution 687 (1991)) 858 n73, 1045 n209, 1248–9
UNIKOM 1229
Kyoto Protocol (1997) 880–1
Kyrghyzstan, EU Guidelines (1991) and 451–2 labour rights: see ILO; work, right to; workers' rights Lagash 14

LaGrand 135
lakes: see international watercourses land law, municipal and international law distinguished 489, 490–1
landlocked states 607–8
access to the sea, right of (UNCLOS 125) 607–8
climate change and 879
common heritage of mankind and 607 equality of treatment in ports 608
freedom of the high seas and 610
innocent passage and 570, 608
International Seabed Authority and 634 n399 law of the sea, role in the development of 80 living resources, right to equitable exploitation (UNCLOS 69(1)) 608
seabed resources 590, 607–8
UNCLOS and 555
language, rights relating to 268, 281, 294, 297, 318, 365–6, 367, see also Minority Languages, European Charter for Regional or Minority Languages (1992)
CIS Convention 378
Linguistic Rights of Minorities, OSCE Oslo Recommendations (1998) 376
Use of Minority Languages in the Broadcast Media, OSCE Guidelines (2003) 376 n192
Laos, ASEAN membership 1294
Las Malvinas: see Falkland Islands
laser weapons 1190
Lateran Treaty (1929) 244
Latin America
19th century use of force against 1121
Andean Pact (1669) 1292 n42
asylum and 2, 27, 76–7
ECLAC (UN Economic Commission for Latin America) 1213
independence 27
nuclear weapons, prohibition 610 n297
regional international law 2, 27, 76–7, 92

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

SC and 39–40, 1207
SC membership 39–40
specialised agencies 384
standard of treatment of alien 27
US sphere of influence 57
uti possidetis doctrine/stability of boundaries and 525–6, 967–8
Latin American Free Trade Organisation, dissolution 1330 n214
Latin American Integration Association 1292 n42
Latvia
CIS membership 249
minorities in 294 n164
USSR invasion/annexation of 468, 961
Lauterpacht, H. 131–2, 197, 200, 205, 218, 260, 449–50 law anthropology and 52–3, 55
function of 1
natural law see natural law positivism: see positivism psychology and 52–3, 55
realism and 49, 53, 55–6 sanction and 3–4
sociology and 51–4, 55–6, 59
law-habit 11
Law Merchant 19
Law Merchant (lex mercatoria) 19
law of the sea
see also contiguous zone; continental shelf; EEZ; high seas, freedom of; ITLOS; Law of the Sea Convention (1982); marine pollution; marine resources; maritime delimitation; seabed; territorial sea
common heritage of mankind and 488, 492, 533–4, 554–5, 629
economic pressures and 555
websites 1337
Law of the Sea Convention (1982)
as balance of interests 555
customary international law and 556, 559, 568
entry into force 555–6
Geneva Conventions (1958), continuing relevance 555
interpretation, responsibility for 1304
as law-creating treaty 556 pressures leading to 555
Third World and 555
law of the sea, dispute settlement (UNCLOS Part XV) 635–44, see also ITLOS arbitral tribunal (Annex VII) 635–6 arbitral tribunal (Annex VIII) 636 choice of forum 635–6
choice of means 635
commissions of inquiry 638
compulsory procedures (UNCLOS 286 and 287) 635, 636–8 conciliation (UNCLOS 284) 635, 638 delimitation 637, 640 n443
ECJ and 635
EEZ rights 583, 636–7
expeditious exchange of views (UNCLOS 283) 635 fishing rights 635, 636–7, 640 n443
freedom of navigation 636
historic title 637
ICJ and 635
international organisations and 636 n410
marine scientific research 636
military and law enforcement activities 637
negotiation obligation (UNCLOS 283(1)) 638, 1015–16 parallel conventions, primacy 637–8 peaceful settlement obligation (UNCLOS 279) 635
submarine cables and pipelines 636
law of the sea, history and development closed sea/open sea conflict 553–4, 568, 609
Consolato del Mare 19
encroachment on the freedom of the high seas 554–5, 568–9
Geneva Conventions (1958) 555
'land dominates the sea' principle 553, 560–1
Law Merchant (lex mercatoria) 19

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

law of the sea (cont.)
Mare Clausum Sive de Dominio Maris (Grotius) 24, 553–4
Rhodian Sea Law 19
UNCLOS/Law of the Sea Convention (1982), role 556
League of Nations
abolition of war and 1121–2, 1215–16
dissolution 1330
establishment 30, 1284
as European organisation 30 expulsion from 31
failure 30–1
human rights and 270–1
individual's right of petition 271
Liechtenstein and 217
minorities protection 31, 271
recognition of states and 468
self-determination and 251–2
terrorism and 1159 n211
UN and 31, 225, 1114 n362
USA and 30
use of force and 1121–2, 1216–17
USSR and 30–1, 33
withdrawals from 30 League of Nations, dispute settlement 1216–17 arbitration, judicial settlement or inquiry (LoN 12) 1216 obligation not to war with party to dispute (LoN 15) 1216–17 report and recommendations 1216–17 settlement as preferred option 1216 leases of territory 539, see also Hong Kong; servitudes Panama Canal Zone 539
Lebanon
Arab League and 1032
International Independent Investigation Commission 427 peacekeeping in 1212 n33, 1230–1, 1273
UN Interim Force 1212 n33
Lebanon Special Tribunal
applicable law 428
Chambers 428
Defence Office 428 establishment by Chapter VII Security Council resolutions 427–8
judges 428
Prosecutor 428
Registry 428
Lebanon Special Tribunal, jurisdiction attacks connected in accordance with principles of criminal justice 428 attacks in Lebanon between 1 October 2004 and 12 December 2005 428 attacks similar in nature and gravity to attack of 14 February 2005 428
concurrent/primacy 428
later date decided by Security Council and the parties 428 legal assistance, right to, Copenhagen Final Act (1990) and 374 legal dispute, definition 1012–13, 1067–8 legal order, requirements 2–3
legal personality: see international legal personality legal representation, right to, death penalty and 321 legislation, interpretation consistency with international obligations, presumption of 143, 153, 159, 164–5, 168 intertemporal approach 160–1
unincorporated treaties and 150–1, 183–5
legislation, website 1334–5 legislative jurisdiction 649–50, see also extraterritorial legislation; foreign law, recognition and enforcement legitimacy of criminal law proceedings 417–18 legitimacy of international law 61–3
legitimate expectations
diplomatic protection 188, 812
ratified but unincorporated treaty 151, 168–9 lex specialis derogat legi generalis 66, 124, 1181 jus cogens and 124
regional international law and 92–3
Right of Passage 92–3

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

liberalism and international law 63
Liberia
arms sanctions (UNC 41) 1246–7, 1277–9
AU involvement in 1277, 1279
Chapter VII action 1278–9
civil war 1029
ECOMOG and 1029, 1276–8
ECOWAS and 1029, 1276–8
flags of convenience 611–12
IGAD and 1279
peacekeeping operations in 1276–9
Protocol on Non-Aggression (1978) 1276
regional arrangements (Chapter VII) and 1276–9
as threat to the peace (SC resolution 788 (1992)) 1238
UN failure in 1278–9
UN Mission (SC resolution 1509 (2003)) 1278
UN Observer Mission 1277
Yamoussoukro Accord (1991) 1277
Liberia–Sierra Leone buffer zone 1277
liberty and security of person, right to see also enforced disappearances
Arab Charter on Human Rights 395
CIS Convention 378
as collective right 299
ECHR 5 348
ICCPR 9 315
indigenous peoples 299
as natural right 266
UDHR 3 279
Libya
see also Chad–Libya boundary dispute Aouzou Strip and 1011–12
arms and air embargo (UNC 41) 753, 1245
embargoes 1245
Gulf of Sirte as historic bay 564
London embassy 756, 760 sanctions (UNC 41) 1270
terrorism and 1244–5
US air raid 1144
US sanctions 692–3
Liechtenstein
ICJ and 217, 1072 n103
League of Nations membership 217 nationality/diplomatic protection 813–14 sovereign status 217
Torture Committee and 364
UN membership 217, 1072 n103
life, right to see also death penalty; enforced disappearances
ACHR 4 274, 381
arbitrary loss 317 n284
armed conflict and 317 n284
CIS Convention 378
CRC 6 331
date of conception, relevance 381
Declaration on Minimum Humanitarian Standards (1990) 1198
ECHR 2 274, 348, 357, 358
ICCPR 6 275, 314
as natural right 266
non-derogation principle and 274, 275, 358
Lisbon Treaty (2007)
Charter of Fundamental Rights (2000) and 371–2
ECHR and 372
EU international legal personality 242
object and purpose 1288
Lithuania
annexation by USSR (1940) 203
CIS membership 249
declaration of independence (1990) 203
independence/recognition of 203
minorities in 294 n164
USSR invasion/annexation of 468, 961 Litvinov Agreement (1933) 162, 465
lobster fisheries 589
local government, participation of minorities in 368 n151 Locke, John 25, 26, 266
locus standi: see standing/locus standi
Lombok, Strait of 568
Lord's Resistance Army 413, 1154–5

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

lump-sum settlement 823, 840–1, 1044–5 distribution, responsibility for 841 evidence of customary international law, whether 841
Lusaka Ceasefire Agreement (1999) 1154, 1264, 1270

Maastricht Treaty 241
human rights and 370
McDougal, M. S. 59–60
Macedonia
see also Yugoslavia
CoE and 346
CoE Torture Committee and 364 n115
Council of Europe 346
ICTY and 404 n43
OSCE Mission 1033
peacekeeping operations 1280
recognition 462 n71, 464
UN membership 464, 1211
UNPREDEP 1259–60
Machiavelli, Nicolò 20
Maine, H. 22
Malaysia
ASEAN membership 1294
immunity of UN special rapporteur 1325–6
Mali Federation, dissolution (1960) 974, 980
Malta, Sovereign Order of 243
Malvinas: see Falkland Islands
Managua Protocol (1993) 381 n219
Manchuria
Japanese invasion of (1931) 30, 468
non-recognition doctrine and 468 mandate system 224–7, see also South West Africa mandate
definition 31, 224
freedom of thought, conscience and religion 271
human rights and 270–1
mandate agreements as treaties 905
Permanent Mandates Commission 271
as 'sacred trust of civilisation' 224, 251, 271, 277
self-determination, right to and 251
sovereignty and 225, 493
trusteeship system and 224, 225–6, 277
Manila Declaration (1987) (ASEAN) 1294 maps as evidence 496, 519–20, 1091 large-scale charts 558
Mareva injunction 743
margin of appreciation 356–7
Marie Byrd Land 536
Marine Environment Disputes Chamber 640 n443
marine mammals 624 n356
marine pollution 620–3, 844, 898–901, see also oil pollution
coastal state jurisdiction 899
compensation for impairment of environment 901
due diligence and 855
EEZ and 899
flag state jurisdiction 899
forum 901
GCHS 24 620
IMO and 899, 900
insurance obligation 901
limited liability 901
port state jurisdiction 899 regional conventions 898 n314
reporting obligations 900
state-owned ships 899
strict liability 900
territorial sea and 899
warships and 899
marine pollution, conventions relating to Civil Liability Convention (1969/1992) 621, 894 n286, 900–1
Civil Liability for Oil Pollution Damage from Exploration and Exploitation of Seabed Mineral Resources 900 n325
International Fund Convention (1971) 621, 901
Intervention on the High Seas Convention (1969) 620–1, 798 n124, 900 London Dumping Convention (1972) 621, 855, 893

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

MARPOL Convention (1973) 621, 898–9
Oslo Dumping Convention (1972) 621, 895
Paris Convention on Marine Pollution from Land-Based Sources (1986) 621, 872, 875, 894, 895
Preparedness, Response and Co-operation Convention (1990) 870–1, 900
Prevention of Pollution of the Seas by Oil (1954) 621 UNCLOS 621–3, 875, 898 n314, 899
marine resources
see also seabed resources (UNCLOS, Part XI)
as common heritage of mankind 554–5 conservation obligations and rights 572
fishing zones and 581
freedom of the high seas doctrine, impact on 554–5
international law, role 48
landlocked states and 608
marine scientific research
dispute settlement 636
EEZ 582, 583 n134
high seas 609, 610
innocent passage and 572
seabed resources distinguished 629 n374 maritime delimitation 590–607, see also baselines; continental shelf; Continental Shelf Convention (1958), customary international law and 3-mile and 12-mile territorial sea limits distinguished 592 access to fish stocks 600, 602, 606 agreement, need for 590–1, 595–6
coastal configuration 596–7, 598, 604, 606 coastal lengths 597, 598, 599, 605, 606 customary international law in relation to continental shelf and EEZ, relevance 601 defence arrangements and 602
delimitations involving opposite and adjacent coasts distinguished 591, 592, 600
dispute settlement 637, 640 n443
distance 597
distributive justice, exclusion 107 n159, 108, 597 economic position of two states 597–8 equidistance/special circumstances principle 85–6, 107 n154, 591–5, 599, 600, 602, 603, 604, 605, 606, 916 equitable principles 106–8, 593–605
GCTS provisions 591, 592–5
geography as key factor 596, 598, 602 historic title and 591, 592 islands, relevance 594–5, 598, 603, 605 jurisprudence: see equity, jurisprudence landmass 597–8
marine scientific research considerations 602 median line 591–2, 594, 595, 597, 598, 599–600, 603 methodology 591–2, 595–6, 597, 598–9, 604–6 modus vivendi line 605–6 non-encroachment 593, 597, 598, 599, 606
non-refashioning of nature 107, 597, 606 oil resources and 602, 606 practice of parties 606–7
proportionality 593, 597, 598, 599, 601, 603, 604
security considerations 600, 606 single continental shelf and fishing zone/EEZ boundary 595–6, 601–4
'special circumstances' and 'relevant circumstances', relevance 599 n234
territorial sea 591–2
UNCLOS provisions 591–2, 595–605
uti possidetis principle and 591
maritime law: see law of the sea Maroua Declaration (1975), validity 134, 914

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

Marrakesh Accords (2001) 881
Marrakesh Agreement (1994) 1287
marriage, right of, ECHR 12 348 Marshall Islands 225
Marshall Plan 1288 n21
Martens clause 1169 n9
Marxism and international law 31–2, 267
  in China 37–8
mass killings, as 'grave breach' 403 material breach of treaty: see treaties, termination for material breach (VCLT 60)
Matsu 235
Mauritania, territorial claims against Morocco 237, 254, 491, 525, 1110
Mayotte 1019 n42
Media, OSCE Representative on the freedom of the press 377 distinction 1018
  Hague Conventions (1899/1907) 1019
  third party involvement 108 mediation: see good offices/mediation mentally ill, protection of, IAComHR recommendation on 383 n228 mercenaries, recruitment, use, financing and training
  as act of aggression 1153 n177
  Convention on (1989) 1173 n31
  ILC Draft Code of Crimes against the Peace and Security of Mankind (1991) 671 special rapporteur 305
MERCOSUR
  membership 1038
  website 1340
MERCOSUR dispute settlement procedures (Protocol of Brasilia) 1038 n165 arbitration 1038 n165
  negotiations 1038 n165
merger of states 208–9
  as absorption process 965–6, 997–8
  Germany (1871) 28
  Germany (1990): see Germany, FRG–GDR unification (1990)
  Italy (1870) 28
  Yemen Arab Republic/People's Democratic Republic of Yemen (1990) 963–4 merger of states, state succession and 963–6
  nationality and 1007
  state archives 996
  state property and 992
  treaty succession and 971–3
Mesopotamia 14
meteorology, remote sensing 551
Mexico–US relations, Texas, secession of 998
MFN treatment 839
MICIVIH 1239
Micronesia 224, 225
Middle Ages 18, 19–20, 21 n71
Middle East
  see also individual countries
  1948 War 1237
  early treaties 14
  ICRC and 1201
  SC and 446, 1209, 1241
  SC resolution 54 (1948) 1237
  SC resolution 242 (1967) 469, 502, 1209, 1221, 1223
  as threat to the peace (SC resolution 54 (1948)) 1237
  UN peacekeeping force, role 1267
  UN peacekeeping force, withdrawal 1216
  UN Secretary-General and 1227
  UNEF 1226, 1228, 1272
  UNEF II 1227, 1228 n117
  UNGA special sessions 1212
  Uniting for Peace and 1273
  UNTSO 1226
  US mediation 1018
Middle East Peace Conference (1993) 245 Migrant Workers Committee 333–4
  establishment 334
  individual complaints 334
  inter-state complaints 334
  membership 334
  reporting obligations 334
Migrant Workers Convention (1990) applicability (MWC 2 and 3) 333

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

conclusion/entry into force 333
minorities and 369 n151
migrant workers, rights of collective expulsion, protection from (MWC 22) 333 cultural identity (MWC 31) 333 education (MWC 30) 333 equality of treatment with nationals 333 health/medical treatment (MWC 28) 333 IAComHR 383 n228
'migrant' (MWC 2) 333
protection of minorities and 296
regular/documented situation and 333 trade union, freedom to join (MRC 26) 333 Vienna Declaration and Programme of Action (1993) 280
migration
military necessity
belligerent occupation and 401, 1181–2
cultural objects and 1186
humanitarian considerations and 1181–2, 1183, 1184
ICTY and 443 n229
protection of cultural property and 1186
Military Staffs Committee (UNC 47) 1244, 1251, 1254
mineral resources
Antarctica: see Antarctic Minerals Resources Convention (1988)
continental shelf 584–5
seabed: see seabed resources, Conventions and other international instruments relating to; seabed resources (UNCLOS, Part XI)
mines and booby traps
Corfu Channel 575–6, 784–6
state responsibility and 785–6
US mining of Nicaraguan waters 785 mines and booby traps, prohibition of use against civilians 1189–90 Minorities, Framework Convention for the Protection of (1994) (CoE) 365–8 CAHMIN (Committee for the Protection of National Minorities) 366 n135
conclusion and entry into force 366
FRY and 367 n141
'national minorities', absence of definition 368
obligations 366–7
Vienna Declaration and Programme of Action (1993) and 366 Minorities, Framework Convention for the Protection of (1994) (CoE), implementation 367–8
Advisory Committee 367–8
Committee of Ministers and 367–8 conclusions and recommendations 367–8 individual complaints, exclusion 367 monitoring arrangements 367, 368
non-parties and 367 n141
publication of conclusions and recommendations 368 publication of reports 367
reporting obligations 367
Minorities, Independent Expert on 297 Minorities, OSCE High Commissioner on National
confidentiality of proceedings 376
Education Rights of Minorities, Hague Recommendation (1996) 376 n194
establishment 376, 1289
Linguistic Rights of Minorities, Oslo Recommendations (1998) 376
Public Life, Lund Guidelines on the Effective Participation of National Minorities in (1999) 376 n194
Use of Minority Languages in the Broadcast Media, Guidelines on (2003) 376 n194 minorities, protection of 293–301, see also Minorities, Framework Convention for the Protection of (1994) (CoE)
Aaland Islands 294 n162
acquired rights and 524 n207

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

minorities, protection (cont.)
affirmative action 296–7
CIS Convention 378
collective activity, right of 271
as collective right 271, 281, 294, 299, 366
Copenhagen Final Act (1990) and 374
Council of Europe 298, 365–8
cultural life 294, 296, 297, 366
Declaration on Minimum Humanitarian Standards (1990) 1198 determination of existence as objective matter 296, 298
differential treatment, justification 296–7
Eastern and Central European states and 293–4, 297–8
ECHR 14 365
equality of fact, need for 271, 288
gender discrimination and 297
geographic proportions, avoidance of measures changing 367
ICCPR 27 294–7
indigenous peoples: see indigenous peoples as individual right 294–5
individual's standing 259, 294
language, right to 281, 294, 297, 365, 367, see also Minority Languages, European Charter for Regional or Minority Languages (1992) League of Nations, role 31, 294 migrant workers and 296
'minorities' 295, 296, 368
Minority Schools in Albania 271, 288
nationality of individuals, relevance 295, 296
Nazi exploitation of minority issues 294
NGOs, role 297
Nigerian minorities in Cameroon 524 n207
non-discrimination and 271, 366
OSCE/CSCE 298, 376
Peace Treaty (Italy–Allied Powers) (1947) 294 n166
petition, right of 294
political life, right to participate in 366
recognition of states and 451, 452, 461
religion, right to practise 281, 297, 366
reserves 296
Roma 297 n198
satellite broadcasting and 550
self-determination, right to 522–3 technical co-operation and 297
territorially based rights 296
UN Declaration on (UNGA resolution 47/135) 297
UNHRC 305
UNHRC General Comment 23 296–7, 318
Vienna Declaration and Programme of Action (1993) 280, 366
women and 318–19, 321
WWI minorities treaties 259, 271, 293–4
WWII, treaty provisions following 294 Minorities Sub-Commission: see Human Rights, Sub-commission on the Promotion and Protection of Minority Languages, European Charter for Regional or Minority Languages (1992) 365–6 accession by non-CoE members 366 measures to promote use of 365 Minority Languages, European Charter for Regional or Minority Languages (1992), Committee of Experts 365–6
membership 365
reporting obligations 365
standing/locus standi 365
minors
see also child, rights of
death penalty and 318
Minsk Process 1033 n142
MINURSO 1229
mixed arbitral tribunals/claims commissions

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

diplomatic protection and 823
individuals, standing 258–9
Mexican Claims commissions 1056
Moldova
CoE membership 346 n4
EU Guidelines on Recognition of New States (1991) and 451–2
independence 238
OSCE Mission 375, 1033
monism 29, 131–2
equality of states and 132
pacta sunt servanda as basis 29
positivism and 51, 131
Montenegro
see also Yugoslavia
secession 963 n39
UN membership 1211
Montreal Rules of International Law Applicable to Transfrontier Pollution (1982) 856–7, 864, 872 MONUC 1154, 1262–3, 1264–5
moon
as common heritage of mankind 548–9, 882
demilitarisation 548
international regime 548–9
peaceful purposes, limitation of activities to 548 Moon Treaty (1979) 548–9, 881–2, see also Outer Space Treaty (1967) moral principles
China and 37
human rights and 266
international law and 2, 3–4, 12, 54, 74–5, 1010
natural law and 25, 53–4
'positive morality' 3–4
positivism and 29, 49
Morocco
Gulf War and 1253 n246
SADR and 236–7
territorial claims against Mauritania 237, 254, 491, 525, 1110 territorial claims over Algerian territory 525
Western Sahara and 525, see also Western Sahara Morocco–France relationship (Treaty of Fez (1912)) 216 sovereign status of Morocco 216
Moscow Mechanism: see Human Dimension of the CSCE (Moscow Mechanism)
Mozambique
General Peace Agreement (1992) 1223 n97
ONUMOZ 1229 n122
peacekeeping operations 1229
Rhodesia and 1241 n180, 1242 n189
Multilateral Investment Guarantee Agency 842–3
multinational private companies
see also Transnational Corporations, UN Commission on
definition 249–50
international legal personality 249–50
multinational private companies, codes of conduct draft Norms on the Responsibilities of Transnational Corporations and other Business Enterprises with Regard to Human Rights (2003) 250
ILO Tripartite Declaration of Principles concerning Multinational Enterprises and Social Policy 250
OECD Guidelines for Multinational Enterprises 250
UN Commission on Transnational Corporations, draft Code of Conduct 250 World Bank Guidelines on the Treatment of Foreign Direct Investment 250, 828, 835, 837, 842 n373 multinational public companies
definition 248–9
examples 249
international legal personality 248–9
international organisations distinguished 1296

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

municipal courts and international law 138–79, see also judicial decisions as source of international law cross-citation between municipal and international courts 130 ECJ decisions and 140
ECtHR decisions and 140, 156
ICJ decisions 158–9
international law as defence 130
municipal court decisions as source of international law 111, 112 public policy considerations 139 municipal and international law, interrelationship 129–94, see also municipal courts and international law ambiguity 142–8
applicability of municipal law in international tribunals 136–7 conflict between 140, 143, 159, 164–6
consent and 143
distinction between 1, 2–4, 130 dualism: see dualism growing interpenetration 129–30, 138 incorporation doctrine: see incorporation doctrine
jurisprudence 134–7, 141–7, 157–61
monism: see monism
positivism and 131
primacy 131–7, 158–9, 164, 177–9
state sovereignty and 178
transformation doctrine: see transformation doctrine treaties: see treaties, compliance/implementation (VCLT 26–7); treaties, interpretation (VCLT 31–3)
UK practice 139–57
US practice 150–1, 157–66
websites 1334–5
municipal law
as defence to breach of international law 133–6, 137, 138, 648, 941 as evidence of compliance with international obligations 137
as evidence of state practice 83, 136–7
murder: see wilful killing/murder mutual assistance 674
Myanmar 1223 n97
ASEAN membership 1294

NAFTA (1992)
'expropriation' 830 n305, 832 n312
expropriation, requirements 835 n335
'full and equitable treatment' (NAFTA 1105) 1039 n174
'full protection and security' (NAFTA 1105) 1039 n174 interpretation, FTC responsibility for 1039
object and purpose 1038
parties to 1038
website 1340
NAFTA dispute settlement procedures 1038–40
applicable law 1039
Arbitral Panels 1039–40
bi-national panel reviews 1039
compliance obligation 1039–40
Final Reports 1039–40
financial services provisions 1039
Free Trade Commission 1039
good offices/mediation/conciliation 1039
ICSID Additional Facility 1038–9
ICSID arbitral tribunal 1038–9, 1041 individual investor/state party disputes (Chapter 11) 1038–9 Initial Reports 1039–40 inter-state disputes (Chapter 20) 1039–40
interim measures 1039
Scientific Review Board 1039
suspension of benefits of equivalent effect 1040 UNCITRAL Arbitration Rules and 1038–9
website 1340
Nagorno-Karabakh 237–8, 375 n186, 1033 n142
NAIL (New Approaches to International Law) 63–4
name, right to
ACHR 18 275, 381

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

CRC 7 331
non-derogation 275
Namibia
see also South West Africa mandate
independence 227, 1234
intervention in Congo 1154
status 225–7, 248
SWAPO and 248
UN and 1234
UN responsibility for 226
UNGA Special Session 1212 n33
Uniting for Peace and 1273
UNTAG 231 n177, 1229
Namibia, UN Council for 303, 1212
establishment, role and purpose 248
international legal personality 248
membership and accountability 248 travel and identity documents 248 Napoleonic wars 27, 1282
nation-state
death of 67 n87
international law, history and development and 9, 13–14, 20–2, 48 n16, 58, 1282–3
just war and 1119–21
as principal subject of international law 1, 10
national debt: see public debt; state succession to public debt national identity, importance 35, 40–1, 213
Arab Charter on Human Rights 395
national liberation movements (NLMs)
decolonisation and 245
ECOSOC and 246
international legal personality 245–8
petition to UN, right of 245
PLO as 248
recognition by AU or Arab League, effect 245–6 recognition as state, effect 246 UNGA observer status 245
national security
coastal state rights 570
human rights and 357–8, 1181–2
protective principle: see protective principle security zones 584
national treatment, migrant workers' right to 333 nationalisations: see expropriation/nationalisation of property of foreign national nationalism 27–8
nationality
civil jurisdiction and 663
definition 660–1
diplomatic protection and 258, 661, see also nationality of claims dual nationality: see dual nationality Hague Convention on the Conflict of Nationality Laws (1930) 660, 812–13 as link between individual and international law 258, 660–1, 808–9, 813–14
Nationality Decrees in Tunis and Morocco 660, 813
Nottebohm 660, 813–14
obligations of national 660 rights deriving from 659–60
state practice 813–14
nationality, acquisition/grant births on ships and 662 n69 children of diplomatic personnel 661–2 children of enemy aliens 662
civil law practice 661
common law practice 661–2 genuine link, need for 258, 611–13, 643, 660–1, 664, 813–14, 815, 1005, 1006
jus sanguinis 661
jus soli 661
naturalisation 663
in occupied territory 662
right to choose (ICCPR/ICESCR) 1005
state succession and 489
state's right to determine 258, 812–13 state's right to determine rules relating to 648, 660 nationality as basis of jurisdiction
criminal jurisdiction 654, 659–64
territorial jurisdiction and 653
universal jurisdiction and 673

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

nationality of claims 258, 648, 808–19, see also diplomatic protection companies and 815–18 continuity requirement 810–11, 814
ICSID 1042
ILC Articles on State Responsibility and 808
nationality of companies 1042
diplomatic protection and 815–17
foreign control, effect 1042
ILC Draft Articles on Diplomatic Protection 817
subsidiary companies incorporated abroad 688 n219 Nationality, European Convention on (1997), state succession and 1005–6 nationality of aircraft 664
ships: see ships (nationality and registration)
nationality of married women 662
Convention on the Elimination of Discrimination against Women (1979) and 662 Convention on the Nationality of Married Women (1957) and 662 nationality of children, rights in regard to 662 nationality, right to
ACHR 20 275
child (ICCPR 24(3)/CRC 7) 318, 331, 659 n59, 662
European Convention on Nationality (1948) 659 n59 ICCPR 659 n59
illegitimacy 661
indigenous peoples 299
minorities and 295, 296
non-derogation 275
UDHR 659 n59
nationality and state succession 957, 1004–8
ACY Opinion No. 2 1005
agreement as preferred option 1005–6
applicable law 1004
automatic acquisition of new nationality 1005
cession of territory and 1007
change, presumption of 1004–5, 1006
dual nationality and 1004–5
European Convention on Nationality (1997) and 1005–6 family unity and 1007
genuine link and 1005, 1006
habitual residents 1006, 1007–8
ILC Draft Articles on (1999) 1006–8 merger/dissolution of state and 1007–8 option to retain original nationality and depart 1005 retention of original nationality, provision for 1004–5 right of option 1005, 1007–8 right to a nationality and 1006 rules relating to, obligation of new sovereign to declare 1004 Statelessness, Convention on the Reduction of (1961) and 1005 statelessness, obligation to avoid 1005, 1006 nationals abroad, use of force to protect: see protection of nationals abroad, use of force native peoples, South American Indians 23
NATO 1289–90
collective security and 1290
collective self-defence (UNC 51) and 1137, 1146–7
EAPC and 1290
humanitarian intervention in Kosovo 1156–7
membership 1290
object and purpose 47
origin and purpose 57, 1210, 1289–90
Partnership for Peace 1290
protection of civilian population in case of armed conflict 1185 n88
September 11 attacks and 1290 n30
Status of Forces Agreement (1951) 184, 658, 776 n448, 1320 n170
structure and organisation 1290
territorial integrity and 1290

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

UN Security Council and 1210
US Afghanistan operations and 1136 NATO, dispute settlement arbitration (inter-state) 1032
cod war and 1032
conciliation 1032
good offices/mediation 1032
natural boundaries 524 natural law 53–4
absolute values 25
academic writers, influence 112
aggression, prohibition and 54 Catholic Church and 53
equality of states and 215
general principles of law/international law and 99
Greek concept 17, 21
human rights and 54, 258, 266–7
jus cogens/peremptory norms and 125–6, 266–7
jus gentium and 17–18 justice and 24, 54
moral principles and 25, 53–4
as moralistic system 25
obligatory character of international law and 23
pacta sunt servanda and 23
positivism and 24–7, 49–54
reason and 24
Renaissance and 22
Roman concept 17–18
Spanish philosophy and 23
state sovereignty and 27, 132
Stoic concept 17
treaties, role 25
natural resources, right to indigenous peoples and 300, 390
moon: see moon
natural resources, right to permanent sovereignty over Stockholm Declaration 850
UN Council for Namibia and 248
UNGA resolution 1803 (XVII) 833, 834–5
Natural Resources, UN Committee on 1213 n42 natural rights 26–7
naturalisation 663
naturalism: see natural law
Nauru
ICJ and 1072 n103
international legal personality 199, 224 n136, 1297
naval exercises, right to conduct on the high seas 610
Nazism
minority issues, exploitation of 294
natural law and 54
necessity
see also force majeure; military necessity
Gabčíkovo–Nagymaros Project 798–9
ILC Articles on State Responsibility 798
Oil Platforms 1141
Rainbow Warrior 798
responsibility for breach of international obligation and 798–9, 1313 n141
Saiga (No. 2) 798–9
self-defence, right to 793, 1131, 1134 n80, 1140–1
state responsibility and 793
negotiation as means of dispute settlement 638, 1014–17, see also exhaustion of diplomatic negotiations arbitration, role in 1054
at request of Security Council 1221 consultation obligation 1015 n22 court's direction for 1016 good faith obligation 1016, 1017
as preliminary to other methods 1015 threat to the peace and (UNC 33) 1017 negotiation as means of dispute settlement, treaty obligation 1015–17, 1070
IMCO (1948) 1016 n25
Manila Declaration on the Peaceful Settlement of International Disputes (1982) (UNGA resolution 37/10) 1013 n17, 1016 n28
MERCOSUR 1038 n165

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

negotiation as means (cont.)
Non-Navigational Uses of International Waterways Convention (1997) 885
Nuclear Non-Proliferation Treaty (1968) 1017
Revised General Act for the Settlement of Disputes (1949) 1016 n25
UNC 33 1017
UNCLOS 283(1) 638, 1015
Netherlands
civil jurisdiction 652
customary international law and 173
deep sea mining 630
freedom of the seas and 24
Gulf War and 1253 n246
Indonesia and 1221
international law in municipal courts 172
nuclear power installations 775 n116
recognition of governments 459 n56
treaties/municipal law relationship 172–3 neutral zones 229 n168
neutrality (general)
civil war and 1150
development of law of 1121
neutrality zones 584
New Hebrides, status 228–9
new states
see also developing countries
acquiescence in existing rules of international law 91 international law, impact on 38–42
New Territories (Hong Kong) 539, 1008
New Zealand
Antarctic claims 535–6
Cook Islands and 239
customary international law and 167
French nuclear tests: see nuclear tests
international law in municipal courts 167
Rainbow Warrior: see Rainbow Warrior
recognition of governments 459 n56
unincorporated treaties and 169
NGOs
see also Red Cross (ICRC)
19th century origin 1283
African Court of Human and Peoples' Rights and 394–5
environmental protection and 846
ESC and 362
human rights and 271, 276 n69
ICJ, standing 1073
minorities and 297
outer space and 546
role 1283
as subjects of international law 261
UNHRC and 315–16
Nicaragua
border conflicts 1032
election observers 1229 n122
human rights in 383
indigenous peoples in 300
ONUVEN 1229
Nice Treaty 241 n238
Niger 1253 n246
Gulf War and 1253 n246
Nigeria
civil war in 460–1, 526, 1152 n175, 1201, 1233–4
Liberia, involvement in 1276–7
Maroua Declaration (1975): see Maroua Declaration (1975) secession, right to 526
non-aggression principle: see aggression, prohibition
non-alignment 57, 1287
non bis in idem principle
ECHR Protocol VII 348
ICC 415
ICTR 408
ICTY 405
non-combatants/persons hors de combat crimes against humanity and 438
non-international armed conflict and (GC, common article 3) 435, 1194–5
non-derogation principle amendment or modification of treaty and 931–2
armed conflict 274, 1197
child, rights of 275
cruel and inhuman treatment 274
family life 275

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

freedom of thought, conscience and religion 274–5 fundamental rights 125, 126, 275, 1197 habeas corpus 389
jus cogens/peremptory norms 125, 126, 275, 807, 1197
public life 275
slavery 274, 275
torture 274, 275
non-discrimination principle 286–9, see also differential treatment, justifiable; gender discrimination; Human Rights, Sub-commission on the Promotion and Protection of; minorities, protection of; non-discrimination principle; racial discrimination; religious discrimination, prohibition; women, rights of BITs 839
child, rights of 318, 357
customary international law 275, 286–7
'discrimination' 288, 318
ECHR Protocol XIII 348
equality in fact, need for 288
EU Charter of Fundamental Rights (2000) 371
expropriation and 842
as general principle of law 288
Helsinki Final Act (1975) 373
ICCPR 286, 287–8
ICESCR 286
minorities and 271, 366
MWC provisions 333
racial discrimination: see racial discrimination regional instruments 286–7
rights of the child and 318
UDHR 286
UNC 55 and 56 286–7
UNHRC General Comment 22 287 n128, 288 n135, 318
WWI peace treaties 271
non-international armed conflict 1194–8, see also belligerents; civil war; rebellions civilians, protection of 435, 1196 Coard v. USA 1197
colonial domination, alien occupation and racist regimes, fights against as international conflicts 1149 n157, 1172, 1173 n30, 1195 n143
common article 3, applicability 1194–5
customary international law 436
Declaration of Minimum Humanitarian Standards 1198
definition/classification as 1194
domestic law in conflict state, continuing applicability 1196 n145
due process/fair trial 1195
Geneva Conventions (1949) and Protocols I and II (1977) and 404–5, 408, 435, 1149–51
Genocide Convention (1948) and 284
hostage-taking 1195
human dignity, respect for 1195, 1196 human rights and humanitarian law, convergence 1197–8 humanitarian law threshold 1198 ICRC draft principles 1202–3
individual criminal responsibility and 404–5
internal disturbances distinguished 1195
international humanitarian law and 404–5, 408, 435
non-combatants/persons hors de combat (GC, common article 3) 435, 1194–5 non-combatants/persons hors de combat (Protocol I) 1195–6
in Rwanda 435
terrorism and 1196
torture and 1195, 1196
wounded and sick 1195
non-intervention principle: see intervention in affairs of another state, prohibition
non liquet 98–9, 1087, 1189
Non-Proliferation Treaty: see Nuclear Non-Proliferation Treaty (1968)

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

non-recognition, effect
see also recognition (general), legal effects; recognition of states, legal effects and underlying theories acts consistent with forum state's constitution 483 acts not hostile to forum state 483 acts not intended to circumvent forum state policy 484 humanitarian acts and 470 n112
in international law 470–1
in municipal law 471–86
on private rights and obligations 478–9, 483–4 on state's international law rights and obligations 470–1
non-recognition policy 457, 468–70
American Civil War and 482–3
Angola and 482
Bantustans and 469
companies, legal personality 479
definition 468
economic sanctions as response to threat to or breach of the peace (UNC 41) and 470
erga omnes obligation 470
Estonia and 483
ex injuria jus non oritur principle and 468
GDR 455, 471, 477–8, 483–4
Iraqi invasion of Kuwait 469–70
Kellogg–Briand Pact (1928), relevance 468
League of Nations and 468
Lithuania's declaration of independence (1940) 203
Manchuria and 468
Namibia 470
Panama Canal and 457
prohibition on the use of force against territorial integrity 469
Rhodesian UDI (1965) 469
Stimson doctrine 468
title to territory obtained through aggression 470
TRNC and 236, 464, 469–70
USSR annexation of Lithuania (1940) 203
non-retroactivity principle (nullum crimen sine lege)
ACHR 9 274
ECHR 7 274, 348
Eichmann 672
ICCPR 15 275
non-derogation 274
universal jurisdiction and 672
non-retroactivity principle (treaties) (VCLT 28) 926
Torture Convention 329
non-self-governing territories
human rights and 277
promotion of well-being as a 'sacred trust' 277
Racial Discrimination Committee and 313–14
Western Sahara 237
Noriega, Manuel, status 736, 1151
North Atlantic Fisheries Organisation (NAFO) 626–7
North Korea
arms sanctions (UNC 41) 1247
recognition of 445
security zone 584 n139
North Pole, continental shelf 588
North Sea, Declaration on the Co-ordinated Extension of Jurisdiction in 583
North–South divide 41
North Vietnam
French mediation 1018
informal contacts 463
recognition of government 455
Northern Ireland
CoE's Torture Committee and 363 n115
interrogation techniques in 357
Northern Mariana Islands 225
Norway
Antarctic claims 535–6
Arctic territory 535
Gulf War and 1253 n246
minorities in 295
Spitzbergen and 535
straight baselines 559–60
treaties/municipal law relationship 178

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

Norway/Sweden Union
dissolution 980
treaty-making powers 909
nuclear accidents
assistance 891–2
Assistance in case of Nuclear Accident Convention (1986) 889, 891–2 balance between interests of sovereignty and the international community 892 Early Notification in case of Nuclear Accident Convention (1986) 890–1
Nordic Mutual Assistance Agreement (1963) 891
Transboundary Effects of Industrial Accidents Convention (1992) 870–1, 897
UNDRO and 891
nuclear activities 888–95
environmental protection and 845
IAEA: see IAEA
innocent passage and 574 n95
outer space 547, 858 n72, 881–2
recognition of states and 452
nuclear activities, civil liability 893–5
access to courts of foreign polluter and 893
Civil Liability for Nuclear Damage Convention (1963) 893–5 enforcement of foreign judgments and 895
insurance obligation 894
inter-state claims 895
jurisdiction 895
Maritime Carriage of Nuclear Material, Convention Relating to Civil Liability (1971) 894 n282
Nuclear Ships, Brussels Convention on the Liability of Operators of (1962) 894 n282 operator responsibility 894
state responsibility and 894
strict liability 894
Supplementary Compensation for Nuclear Damage Convention (1997) 894–5
Third Party Liability in the Field of Nuclear Energy (1960) 893–5 nuclear activities, treaties and other international instruments relating to see also nuclear accidents; Nuclear Non-Proliferation Treaty (1968)
bilateral agreements 866 n116
Nordic Mutual Assistance Agreement (1963) 891
Nuclear Safety Convention 892–3
Nuclear Test Ban Treaty (1963) 471, 610, 888–9
Nuclear Non-Proliferation Treaty (1968)
good faith negotiations obligation 1017
Iran and 1247
legality of nuclear weapons and 889
prohibition of use of nuclear weapons and 1189
recognition of states and 452, 976
nuclear power installations 890 n254
bilateral agreements relating to 866 n116
EIAs 866 n116
environmental protection and 850, 866, 889
Nuclear Safety Convention (1994) 892–3
nuclear-powered ships 225, 574 n95
Nuclear Safety Convention (1994) 892–3 compliance obligations 892–3 licensing obligation 893 non-binding provisions 893
reporting obligations 892–3
responsibility for safety 892, 893
Nuclear Ships, Brussels Convention on the Liability of Operators of (1962) 894 n282
Nuclear Test Ban Treaty (1963)
China and 888
France and 888
third parties and 610, 888–9
nuclear tests
customary international law 610
environmental protection and 889
freedom of the high seas and 610

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

nuclear waste
High Seas Convention (1958) and 620, 889 n251
IAEA Code of Practice on the International Transboundary Movement of Radioactive Waste (1990) 893 n277, 896–7
IAEA Principles of Radioactive Waste Management (1995) 893 n277, 897 n302
Safety of Spent Fuel and Radioactive Waste Management Convention (1997) 893 n277, 897 n302 nuclear weapons absence of prohibition 1188–9 balance of terror and 43
CIS 1291
crimes against humanity and 317
environmental protection and 793
international law, effect on 43
Iran 1247
legality 99 n112, 889
non-proliferation obligations: see Nuclear Non-Proliferation Treaty (1968)
outer space 545
regional treaties 610 n297
right to life and 317
self-defence, right to (UNC 51) and 99 n112, 1142–3
UNHRC General Comment 6 and 317
Nuremberg Charter (1945)/Tribunal
aggression 400, 439
annexation of territory, effect 501–2
composition 399–400
conspiracy and 399
crimes against humanity and 399, 400, 436
crimes against peace and 399, 400
as customary international law 400
heads of state and 735
individual criminal responsibility 46, 399–401, 669, 735, 1200
superior orders defence 400
UNGA resolution 95 (I) and 400
universal jurisdiction 669–70
war crimes and 399, 400, 434–5
website 1339

OAS
see also ACHR (1969); Economic, Social and Cultural Rights, Inter-American Protocol (1985); Forced Disappearances of Persons, Inter-American Convention on (1994); IAComHR, IACtHR; Torture Convention (Inter-American) (1985); Women, Inter-American Convention on the Prevention, Punishment and Eradication of Violence Against (1994)
American Declaration on Indigenous Peoples 300
as collective security system 1292
collective self-defence and 1291–2
establishment (1948) 1291–2
EU powers distinguished 1292
Haiti, involvement in 1275–6
Helms-Burton legislation, Judicial Committee Opinion on 693–4
immunities 1319 n169
Inter-American Treaty of Reciprocal Assistance (Rio Treaty) 1291–2 mediation 1019 n42
object and purpose 47, 1290
Pan American Union and 1291
Privileges and Immunities of the OAS Agreement (1949) 1319 n169
recognition of states and 451, 458 n49
as regional arrangement (Chapter VIII) 1274 n343, 1275–6
structure and organisation 1292
treaty status 389
website 1340
OAS Charter (1948) 1291–2
American Declaration of the Rights and Duties (1948) and 382, 389, 469
dispute settlement provisions 1030
Protocols amending 381 n219, 1292
recognition of states, legal effects 448

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

OAS, dispute settlement 1030–1
Bogotá Charter (1948) 1030–1
Bogotá Pact (1948) (Treaty of Pacific Settlement) 1023, 1032
Costa Rica–Nicaragua frontier incidents 1031
Inter-American Committee on Peaceful Settlement 1031
Inter-American Peace Committee 1031
International Verification and Follow-up Commission 1031
OAS Permanent Council 1031
OAU: see African Union obscene publications, individual criminal responsibility and 399 occupation (acquisition of territory) 448, 491, 495, 502–11, see also belligerent occupation; territorial title/territorial sovereignty, evidence of including effectivités
Arctic 535
continental shelf 587
definition 503
Falkland Islands 532
Pacific Islands 512
terra nullius and 503
occupied territory
see also Israel occupied territories
East Timor 425
ECHR and 350
ICCPR and 322
state responsibility for acts in 350
Oder–Neisse (FRG–Poland) border 228, 965
ODIHR
Monitoring Section 377
role 377
OECD
environmental protection and 889
Guidelines for Multinational Enterprises 250 hazardous waste and 896
Marshall Plan and 1288 n21
'polluter pays' principle 870
pollution and 870, 871
purpose 1288 n21
website 1338, 1340
OECS, treaty (1981) as basis for US intervention in Grenada 1183 n79, 1276 n355
OECS/CSCE, conciliation 1022 n65, 1023
Office for Democratic Institutions and Human Rights (OSCE) 1289
offshore installations 90, 589–90, 609
'oil for food' scheme (SC resolution 778 (1992)) 1046
oil pollution 809–901, see also marine pollution
Gulf War oil spillage 1190
'polluter pays' principle 870
Torrey Canyon 621, 798, 900 n322
oil resources, maritime delimitation and 602
oil rigs 589–90
Okhotsk, Sea of, straddling stocks 625 n358, 627
older persons, rights
ESC 361 n102
General Comment (UNCESCR) 6 310
Oleron, Rolls of 19
Oman 1253 n246
ONUC 1226–7
ONUMOZ 1229 n122
ONUVEN 1229
OPEC 1292 n43
Operation Turquoise 1263
opinio juris 74–6, 84–9 codification treaties and 88–9 creation of new rule and 86–8
definition 84
evidence of 87–9
ILC reports and 88–9, 120–1
as marker of existence of rule 68 n89
outer space and 544
UNGA/SC resolutions and 88, 115, 116–17, 254, 544
USSR and 34
opinio juris, jurisprudence
Lotus 84
Nicaragua 86, 87, 96
North Sea Continental Shelf cases 85–6, 87–8, 96

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

Organisation of African Unity: see African Union Organisation of the Islamic Conference
as regional arrangement (Chapter VIII) 1275 n348
Somalia and 1275 n348
OSCE/CSCE
see also Charter of Paris (1990); Helsinki Final Act (1975); Human Dimension of the CSCE (Moscow Mechanism)
Bosnia, supervision of elections 377 n201, 1033–4, 1274 n343, 1289
Chairman-in-Office 1289
as Chapter VIII regional organisation 1274 n343
as conflict prevention organisation 1289
Council of Europe and 378
CSCE period 372–7
development following the end of the Cold War 1289 dispute settlement missions 1289
domestic jurisdiction principle (UNC 2(7)) and 375–6 election-monitoring role 1289
environmental rights 847
High Commissioner on National Minorities: see Minorities, OSCE High Commissioner on National
human rights and 372–8
institutionalisation of Helsinki Act process 375 Media, OSCE Representative on the Freedom of 377
minorities, protection of 298
Office for Democratic Institutions and Human Rights 1289
organisation 1289
origin and development 1289
Permanent Council 377
as regional arrangement (Chapter VIII) 376, 1274 n343, 1275 n348
Religion or Belief, Advisory Panel of Experts on the Freedom of 377 n201 Roma and 376
structure 1289
as successor to CSCE 377
Terrorism, Ministerial Declaration and Plan of Action on Combating (2001) 1164 Troika 1289
website 1340
Yugoslavia, involvement in 1275 n348
OSCE/CSCE, dispute settlement 1032–4
arbitral tribunals 1033
Conciliation and Arbitration Convention (1992) 378, 1033
conciliation commissions 1033
Dispute Settlement Mechanism 1032–3 Missions 375, 1033
rapid and equitable solution of disputes in good faith obligation 1032
Sanctions Assistance Missions 1033 n141
Valletta Report (1991) 1032–3
Ottoman Empire, dissolution 293, 1000 n235
minorities, protection of 293
state succession to public debt 999
outer space 541–52, 881–2, see also airspace; space objects
as common heritage of mankind 488, 545, 881–2
criminal jurisdiction 548 n323
customary international law/state practice 544
débris 547 n321, 882
Débris, ILA Draft Instrument on the Protection of the Environment from (1994) 347 n321, 882, 1016 n28 definition and delimitation 543–4
demilitarisation 548
exploration 543
geostationary orbit 552
innocent passage, exclusion 542
international environmental damage, state responsibility and 853
international law, role 45
international regulation of activities in 544–6
jurisdiction 548 n323

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

Moon Treaty (1979) 548–9, 881–2
nuclear activities 547, 858 n72, 881–2 private activities 548 n323
remote sensing 551–2
as res communis 492, 544
'Star Wars' and 545 n314
telecommunications and 549–52
UN Committee on Peaceful Uses of Outer Space 545 n314
UNESCO and 550
websites 1337
Outer Space, Committee on the Peaceful Uses of 545 n314, 550, 551–2 outer space conventions and other international instruments relating to ILA International Instrument on the Protection of the Environment from Damage Caused by Space Debris (Buenos Aires 1994) 347 n321, 1016 n28
International Liability for Damage caused by Space Objects (1972) 546–7 Principles Governing Activities of States in the Exploration and Use of Outer Space (1967) 545–6
Principles Relevant to the Use of Nuclear Power Sources in Outer Space (UNGA resolution 47/68) 547, 881 n206
Registration of Objects Launched into Outer Space (1976) 547
Rescue of Astronauts, Return of Astronauts and the Return of Objects Launched into Outer Space (1968) 547
UNGA resolution 1962 (XVII) (Declaration on Outer Space) 544
Outer Space Treaty (1967) 545–6, 881, see also Moon Treaty (1979)
common heritage of mankind and 488 n8, 545
international organisations and 546, 1312 n138
NGOs 546
nuclear weapons, exclusion 545 peaceful purposes limitation 545–6
state responsibility 545–6, 859
overflight, right of archipelagic states 542 n304, 568
EEZ 582
high seas 609, 636
straits 576, 577, 578 n115
ozone depletion 845, 875–81
developing countries and 869 n132 GEF and 846, 871 n168
halons 876–7
precautionary principle 867–8
state responsibility and 857
Ozone Layer Convention (1985)
'adverse effects' 857, 876 n176
CFCs 876–7, 878
conciliation 1022, 1024
co-operation obligation 876
disputes settlement 876
entry into force 876
as framework agreement 876
'ozone layer' 857, 875
protective measures 876
state responsibility and 855 n50
UNEP and 846
Ozone Layer, Helsinki Declaration on (1989) 877
Ozone Layer, Montreal Protocol on Substances that Deplete (1987) 846, 869 n132, 876–8
Adjustments and Amendments (1990) 877
Adjustments and Amendments (1992) 877–8 controlled substances 876–7
dispute settlement 877
Implementation Committee 877–8
Multilateral Fund 877–8

Pacific
Clarion–Clipperton Ridge 630–1
ESCAP (UN Economic and Social Commission for Asia and the Pacific) 1213
straddling stocks 627
pacific blockade, as measure short of war 1121 Pacific Islands Trust Territory 1214 n45
self-determination, right of 225
as special arrangement 224

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

Pact of Paris (1928): see Kellogg–Briand Pact (1928)
pacta sunt servanda
as general principle of law 29, 94, 103, 903–4, 966–7
natural law and 23
as non-consensual obligation 10, 29, 50–1
positivism and 10, 29, 50–1, 52
rebus sic stantibus doctrine and 950
Pakistan
see also Bangladesh; Bangladesh–Pakistan boundary; India–Pakistan relations divided territory 200
Gulf War and 1253 n246
as new state 960
State Immunity Ordinance 1981 707 n53, 745 n257
state succession and 985
UN Good Offices Mission 1228
UN membership 985
UN mission 1228
UNMOGIP 1226 n108
Palau 225, 1214
Palestine
see also PLO, status
Conciliation Commission (1948) 1024
General Assembly Special Session on 1212 n33
international legal personality 247–8 partition (1947) 230
recognition (1988) 199
self-determination, right of 1181
as threat to the peace (SCR 54 (1948)) 1237
Uniting for Peace resolution and 1273
Palestine Conciliation Commission (UNGA resolution 194 (III)) 1024 Palestine People, Special Committee on the Inalienable Rights of 303 Palestinian Authority
international legal personality 247–8
PLO distinguished 247, 248
powers and responsibilities 247
Palestinian Interim Self-Government Authority 247
Pan-African Parliament 1294
Pan-American Union 1291–2
Panama
'clean state' approach 971
Contadora negotiating process 1031 n125
flags of convenience 611–12
secession from Colombia (1903) 971, 975, 998–9
US intervention (1989) 1144, 1151, 1189
WMD measures 620
Panama Canal
non-recognition policy and 457
servitudes 540
Panama Canal Zone
jurisdictional rights 658 n34
lease 539
transfer of sovereignty to Panama 539
papacy, role and status 19, 20, 609
Papal Bulls (1493 and 1506) 609
papal states 243–4
Paraguay
human rights in 383
indigenous peoples in 300–1
Paris Conference (1856) 1283
parliamentary supremacy 50
Partnership for Peace 1290
Framework Document 1290
Pashukanis, Evgeny 32–3
passive personality principle 664–6
Achille Lauro 665
Congo v. Belgium (Arrest Warrant) case 666
Cutting case 664–5
Eichmann 664 n77
Hostages Convention (1979) and 665
Internationally Protected Persons Convention (1973) and 665
Lotus 665
terrorist offences and 666 n91
Third US Restatement 666 n91
UK/US and 665–6
PCA 1049–50
arbitration and 1058
composition of tribunals 1051
election of ICJ judges and 1059

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

establishment 28, 111, 1049, 1057–8 examples of use 1049–50
International Bureau 1049
Optional Conciliation Rules (1998) 1023 n68
Optional Rules for Arbitrating Disputes between Two States (1992) 1050
Optional Rules for Conciliation of Disputes Relating to Natural Resources and the Environment (2002) 1023 n68
Optional Rules for Fact-Finding Commissions of Inquiry (1997) 1022 n62 panels, composition, qualifications and nomination procedure 1049 PCIJ, effect on 1054
Permanent Administrative Council 1049
role 1049, 1057–8
website 636 n410, 1338
PCIJ
compulsory jurisdiction, optional clause declarations 1083 decisions as source of international law 110
establishment 31, 1058
ICJ as successor 31, 1058, 1080–1, 1083
peace, see also collective security; dispute settlement; peacekeeping operations; use of force peace and security, right to 268, 302
Banjul Charter 393
recognition of states and 452
peace treaties
Israel–Egypt (1979) 1228 n117
Israel–Jordan (1994) 657–8
Japan (1951) 234
WWI 259, 271, 294 n162
WWII 227, 228, 294
peaceful co-existence 215–16
AU and 215–16
Bandung Conference (1955) 215
as basic premise of international law 44
China and 37, 215
definition 34–5
equality of states and 215, 216
Five Principles of Peaceful Co-existence (1954) 215
good faith and 216
India and 215
non-aggression obligation 216
non-intervention principle and 215
state sovereignty and 34, 215
territorial integrity and 215, 216
Third World and 215–16
UNGA resolutions 215
USSR and 33–6, 216
peacekeeping operations 1224–33
Abkhazia 1230
African Union 1265–6
as alternative to UNC 43 force contributions 1224, 1266–7
AMIS 1266, 1280
AMISOM 1279
Angola 1228–9, 1233–4
Arab League 1292–3
'armed conflict', whether 1232–3
Congo 1226–7, 1273
consent of host state, need for 1227, 1234, 1235, 1267, 1275, 1321
Croatia 1229
Darfur 1230 n132, 1265–6
definition and scope 1225, 1226, 1234–5
East Timor 1230
enforcement action distinguished 1227 equality of treatment 1235 Eritrean independence plebiscite 1229
evaluation 1227–8, 1233–5
fact-finding missions 1234–5
Georgia 1230
Haiti 1230
history 1224, 1226–31
IFOR 1260, 1279–80
impartiality, need for 1234
Interim Emergency Multinational Force in Bunia 1280 n371
international humanitarian law, applicability 1232–3
international organisations, responsibility for activities of members 1313–14

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

peacekeeping operations (cont.)
jurisdiction in relation to 418, 1232, 1314 KFOR: see KFOR Lebanon 1212 n33, 1230–1
Liberia 1276–8
Middle East, withdrawal 1216
MINURSO 1229
MONUC 1154, 1262–3, 1264–5
Mozambique 1229
as non-enforcement actions 1272–3 ONUC 1226–7
ONUMOZ 1229 n122
ONUVEN 1229
Operation Turquoise 1263
'Peace Operations 2010' 1235
Peace Operations Panel review 1234–5
Peacekeeping Commission 1218 n67
privileges and immunities 1231
refocusing of role from policing to rule of law and human rights 1235 regional organisations (Chapter VIII) 1275 resources, insufficiency 1228
Rwanda 1233 n143, 1263–4
Safety of UN Personnel Convention (1994) 1231–2
SC authority to establish 1224–5
SC measures under UNC 42 and 1224–5
Sierra Leone 418
Somalia 1260–2, 1279
South African elections (1994) 1229
status of forces agreements 1231, 1233, 1314 status of forces/state responsibility and 350–1, 787–8, 1231, 1312 n140 status as UN organs 1231 subsidiary organ status (UNC 29) and 1224
Sudan 1265–6
Timor-Leste 1230
truce-supervision activities 1226–7
UN Interim Force (Lebanon) 1212 n33
UN International Police Task Force (Yugoslavia) 1260
UN Iran–Iraq Military Observer Group 1228
UN Secretary-General and 1216, 1225, 1226–7
UNAMIC 1129 n124
UNAMID 1266, 1267
UNAMIR 1262–3
UNAMIS 1265, 1280
UNAMSIL 1263–4
UNAVEM I 1228–9
UNC provisions relevant to 1224–5
UNCRO 1259
UNEF 1226, 1228, 1272
UNEF II 1227, 1228 n117
UNGA and 1225, 1271–3
UNIKOM 1229
Uniting for Peace (UNGA resolution 377 (V)) 1212, 1222 n90, 1272–3
UNMIS 1265–6
UNMOP 1229–30
UNOMIL 1277
UNOMUR 1262
UNOSOM II 1261–2
UNPREDEP 1259–60
UNPROFOR 1257–60
UNSCOB 1226
UNSMIH 1230
UNTAES 231 n177, 1229–30
UNTAG 231 n177, 1229
use of force, exclusion 1234, 1235
USSR and 8, 33–5
Yugoslavia 1257–60
Penghu 235
'people' 256–7, 392
indigenous 'peoples' 298
peremptory norms: see jus cogens/peremptory norms perestroika 36, 46–7, 1209
Permanent Mandates Commission 271
persecution on political, racial or religious grounds, as crime against humanity 408, 436 Persian Gulf, continental shelf 584 persistent organic pollutants (POPs) 874 personality before the law: see juridical personality/personality before the law, right to

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

Peru
amnesty laws, compatibility with IACHR 372 n35, 390
continental shelf 585
Pescadores 234
Philadelphia Declaration (1994) 338
Philippines, ASEAN membership 1294
pillage 403, 1196, 1198
as 'grave breach' 403, 1196
pillars (EU), international legal personality 241–2 pipelines: see submarine cables and pipelines
piracy
attempts to commit offence, sufficiency 398
definition 398, 615
GCHS 15 615 n323
high seas and 614, 615–16
individual criminal responsibility 262, 397 internal waters, territorial sea and archipelagic waters 616
as international crime 397
jure gentium 270, 398
jurisdiction 614, 615–16
as jus cogens/peremptory norm 126
as municipal law offence 398 Regional Co-operation in Asia Agreement (2005) 616
terra nullius and 398, 615–16
third parties acting in good faith and 616
UNCLOS 101 615
universal jurisdiction and 270, 397, 615–16, 668
PLO, status
see also Palestinian Authority; Palestinian Interim Self-Government Authority agreements with Israel on Palestinian Authority 247–8
international legal personality 246–8
Israel–PLO Declaration of Principles on Interim Self-Government Arrangements (1993) and 199 n17, 246–7
as NLM 248
state responsibility for internationally wrongful act and 683
UN mission office 165
UN observer status 246
USA and 165
poisoned gas 1188
Pol Pot 421, 757
Poland
see also Chorzów Factory principle/restitutio in integrum
Austro-Hungarian Empire, dissolution and 980 n131, 1002 borders with Germany 228, 965, 1002 deep sea mining 630 n383
EU Charter of Fundamental Rights (2000) 371 n172
German Settlers 100, 1002 international law and 173, 178 n252 minorities 293 n164 recognition post-WWI 448, 475–6
UDHR and 278–9
USSR intervention in 57
WMD and 620 n341
polar regions 534–8, see also Antarctica; Arctic territory, claims to police powers, state immunity and 715, 716, 732 policy-oriented approaches to international law 58–63, 64, 267 Polisario 236
political offences 667, 686–7
European Convention on the Suppression of Terrorism (1977) and 687 n211
political question doctrine 189–92, 683
political rights, minorities 366 politics
19th century developments 27–8
international law and 11–13, 24, 38, 44, 67–8, 79–80, 488–9 recognition of states/governments and 445, 447, 450, 455, 456, 457–8, 465, 468, 471 UNCHR and 306
'polluter pays' principle
EU and 870
as general principle of international environmental law 870–1
hazardous activities 870, 896

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

'polluter pays' (cont.)
international watercourses 884
OECD and 870
Rio Declaration (1992) 870
polluting substances nitrogen oxides 873
POPs (persistent organic pollutants) 873
sulphur emissions 873
'pollution' 871–2, 886 n233
pollution-free zones 583, see also atmospheric pollution; marine pollution
Ponsonby rule 152–3, 912
POPs (persistent organic pollutants) 874
population expansion ports
jurisdiction 556–8
landlocked states' right to equality of treatment 607–8
servitudes and 539
straddling stocks obligations 626 Portugal
closed seas concept 24, 553–4, 609
Guinea-Bissau and: see Guinea-Bissau
international law in municipal courts 173
nuclear power 775 n116
Portugal, African colonial territories
ILO Convention on Forced Labour (1930) and 340
NLM participation in UNGA Fourth Committee 245
positivism 49–53
19th century 29–30, 46, 49, 270
academic writers and 28, 113
consent as basis of international law 131
customary international law and 51, 75
development of international law, as brake on 51
domestic jurisdiction principle and 270
equality of states and 215
fundamental norms, dependence on 49–51
general principles of law/international law and 99
human rights and 266, 267, 270
individual as subject of international law and 258 intellectual basis 21–2 international law as law and 52
just war and 1120
monism and 51, 131
moral principles and 29, 49
municipal and international law, interrelationship 131
natural law and 24–7
pacta sunt servanda and 10, 29, 50–1, 52
as political concept 50
sovereignty and 29, 46, 75, 131
state succession and 957
state/statehood and 29, 267
transformation doctrine 139
USSR and 33–4
Zouche, Richard and 25
post, telegraph and telephone services (PTT)
see also ITU; UPU
as sovereign power 217 Pound, Roscoe 52 poverty
European Social Charter (1961) (as amended) 361 n104
ILO and 338
power politics 12, 55, 79–80, 215, 489, 1206
Praetor Peregrinus 17
precautionary measures: see provisional measures precautionary principle 867–8, see also sustainable development principle Bergen Ministerial Declaration (1990) 867–8
climate change and 869
Energy Charter Treaty (1994) and 850 international watercourses and 884
Rio Declaration 867
straddling stocks 625
precedent/stare decisis doctrine 141, 145, 174, 706–7
ECtHR and 352

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

interrelationship between different tribunals 1116
state immunity cases 706–7 preclusion 516, 796, see also estoppel preliminary objections: see ICJ, preliminary objections prerogative 137, 149
justiciability and 181–2
prescription as means of territorial acquisition 491, 495, 504–7, 532, see also territorial title/territorial sovereignty, evidence of including effectivités
acquiescence/absence of challenge 505–6 acquisitive prescription 517
de Visscher's views on 507
definition 504–5
Falkland Islands 532
high seas 609
occupation distinguished 505 peaceful and uninterrupted possession, need for 505–6, 517 n171 reasonable period 506–7 requirements (Botswana/Namibia) 504–5 press, freedom of, OSCE Representative on 377 Prevention of Discrimination and the Protection of Minorities, Sub-Commission on: see Human Rights, Sub-commission on the Promotion and Protection of Prevlaka peninsular
UNMOP 1229–30
UNPROFOR 1257
printing, importance 20 prisoners, treatment of, codes of practice relating to 327
prisoners of war
19th century treaties on 270
Bangladeshi treatment of Pakistani prisoners 669 combatants in irregular warfare 1173
definition 1172–3
disciplinary offences 1176
doubts about status 1174 exchange of 1201
Geneva Convention (1949) 1169–70, 1172–6 history and development 270
humane treatment 1175
Indian treatment of Pakistani prisoners 1199 individual criminal responsibility for ill-treatment 1200 medical treatment 1176 obligations of 1175–6 obligations towards 1175–6 release and repatriation 1176 religious activities 1176
reprisals 1175, 1186
Taliban fighters/Al-Qaida operatives 1174 n33
torture 1175
UK Military Manual 1174 n32
US Law of Land Warfare 1174 n32 war crimes committed by 1176 privacy, freedom from unlawful interference
child (CRC 24) 331
CIS Convention 378
ECHR 8 348
UDHR 12 279
private international law: see conflict of laws privileges and immunities: see consular privileges and immunities; diplomatic immunities (personal); diplomatic privileges (personal); international organisations, privileges and immunities; peacekeeping operations, privileges and immunities Privy Council, state responsibility and 788 prize law 79
prompt hearing, right to anti-terrorist measures and 357–8
ECHR 5(3) and 6(1) 357–8
ICC 416
ICCPR 9(4) 322
military discipline cases, applicability to 322
prompt release proceedings (UNCLOS 292) 642–3

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

'property' 830
Harvard Draft Convention on the International Responsibility of States for Injuries to Aliens (1961) 830
Liamco 830
property rights
see also expropriation/nationalisation of property of foreign national; state succession to property, archives, assets and liabilities
ACHR 21 390
Arab Charter on Human Rights 395
Bosnia and Herzegovina Human Rights Chamber and 380
ECHR Protocol I 348, 829
indigenous peoples 300, 390–1
as natural right 27, 266
proportionality
balance between damage to individual and benefit 1182 balance between goal and means 1182
belligerent occupation and 1182
countermeasures 794, 795
due diligence and 861
least harmful means requirement 1182
Legality of Nuclear Weapons 1141, 1142
Oil Platforms 1142
protection of civilian population during hostilities and 1184–5 protection of nationals abroad 1144–5 remedies 802–3, 806
reprisals 1186
self-defence, right to (UNC 51) 1131, 1134 n80, 1139, 1140–3, 1188
state responsibility and 793
US bombing raid in Libya 1144–5
US invasions in Panama and Grenada 1144–5, 1183 n79
use of force and 1120
prostitution 326
Suppression of Traffic in Persons and Exploitation of Prostitution Convention (1949) 303 protected persons, unlawful deportation or transfer, as 'grave breach': see deportation or transfer of protected persons (GC IV, 49)
protected states 216–17
Protecting Powers 1199
protection of nationals abroad, use of force 1143–5
'armed attack', need for 1143–4 in Cambodia 1144
Entebbe 680, 1144
Grenada, US intervention in 1144
Libya, US bombing attack on 1144–5
Panama, US intervention in 1144 permission of government of territory concerned 1144 proportionality, need for 1144–5
rescue of hostages in the Congo 1144
UK views on 1145
US action 1144–5
protective measures: see provisional measures protective principle 666–8
definition and scope 666–7
Hostages Convention (1979) 668
Joyce v. DPP 667
risk of abuse 667
treaty usage 668
US practice 667 n97
vital interests and 667
protectorates 216–17
protest, effect: see acquiescence, failure to protest as provisional measures
African Commission 393–4
assurances regarding non-repetition of act complained of 643 avoidance of irreparable harm and 352 n37, 386, 641, 1094–5
binding effect 1095–6
on Court's own initiative 1095
ECtHR (RoP 39) 352 n37
Enforced Disappearances Committee 335
Guantanamo Bay detention centre and 386
IAComHR 384, 385–6
IACtHR 384, 387, 391
ICJ: see ICJ, provisional measures

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

Inter-American Forced Disappearances Convention (1994) 384
ITLOS 637–8, 640–1, 643, 644
NAFTA 1039
non-aggravation or extension of dispute and 283–4, 1095
non-compliance as violation of treaty obligations 320 object and purpose of relevant treaty provision and 1095–6
preservation of the evidence 1095
preservation of parties' rights 641, 1094–5
prima facie jurisdiction and 1093–4
request to take measures to stop challenged conduct 283–4 Seabed Disputes Chamber 640 n444
'serious and urgent', requirement 384 n237, 386
Torture Committee (UN) 328–9
UNHRC 320
urgency 335, 386, 641, 1094–5
psychology and the law 52–3, 55
public debt
see also state succession to public debt classification of 997
definition 997
public international law: see conflict of laws; international law public life, right to participate in see also elections, right to free; information and participation in public debate, right to; public life, right to participate in
ACHR 23 275, 381
CEDAW General Recommendation 8 324
CERC General Recommendation 21 293
CIS Convention 378
ICCPR 25 292–3
non-derogation 275
Public Life, OSCE Guidelines on the Effective Participation of National Minorities in (1999) 376 n194 public policy
see also political question doctrine municipal courts and international law 139 publicists: see academic writers as source of international law (ICJ 38(1)(d)) Pufendorf, Samuel 25, 112 punishment, collective 1196, 1198 punishment/penalty in case of criminal responsibility compensation to victims 416
financial penalty 416
ICC and 416
ICTY and 404, 406
imprisonment, limitation to 406
maximum term 416
punitive damages 804–5

Quebec 255, 291 n151, 293, 295, 523

racial discrimination
as 'grave breach' 401
individual criminal responsibility 401
prohibition: see racial discrimination, prohibition
SFRY and 312
Zionism and 395 n298
Racial Discrimination Committee 311–14
conciliation commissions 313
confidentiality of proceedings 313
early warning measures 312, 337
establishment 311–12
evaluation of 313–14
exhaustion of local remedies 273
financing and budgetary arrangements 336
general recommendations: see General Recommendations (CERD) ILO/UNESCO, co-operation with 313
individual right of petition 313
individual's standing 259
inter-state complaints 313
meetings 313
membership 312
powers 312
reporting obligations 312–13, 314

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

Racial Discrimination (cont.) reporting obligations, improvements to procedures 314 role and activities 312–14
trust/non-self-governing territories and 313–14 urgent procedures 312, 337
Racial Discrimination Convention (1965)
ad hoc Conciliation Commission 313 compromissory clause (ICJ) 1079
conclusion/entry into force 280, 286
federal state compliance 221–2
individual's rights under 259
'racial discrimination' 288
treaty succession 983 n144
racial discrimination, prohibition
see also non-discrimination
customary international law and 286–7
as erga omnes obligation 124
as jus cogens/peremptory norm 808 n198
state sovereignty/domestic jurisdiction principle and 213
Vienna Declaration and Programme of Action (1993) 280 racist regimes, applicability of Geneva Conventions in struggles against 1149 n157, 1172, 1173 n30, 1195 n143 Radbruch, Gustav 53
radioactive materials, safety considerations 881, 889
dumping at sea 620
nuclear power installations and 643, 893–4
outer space 547, 881 n206
Transboundary Movement of Nuclear Waste, IAEA Code of Practice (1990) 896–7
Rainbow Warrior
Chorzów Factory principle/restitutio in integrum 803
damages, measure of 803 material breach of treaty 948
state responsibility 779, 786, 797–8, 800
termination of treaty and 946 Rameses II 14
rape
as crime against humanity 408, 436
Darfur 1265 n311
Declaration of Minimum Humanitarian Standards 1198
definition in international law 409
ethnic cleansing and 433
Geneva Conventions, Protocol I and 1196
as genocide 670
as 'grave breach' 403, 1196
realism and the law 49, 53, 55–6 rebellions
see also civil war
aid to rebels, exclusion 1152–8
Declaration on Principles of International Law (1970) 1152–3
as internal matter 1149, 1195
use of force, right 1126 rebus sic stantibus: see fundamental change of circumstances/rebus sic stantibus (VCLT 62(2)) reciprocity
as basis for compliance with law 7, 40, 44 as essential element in obligations between states 751–2, 754, 764, 1082–3, 1169, 1318–19, 1326
recognition (general) 444–5 as discretionary act 450, 453, 471 executive certificates, role 471, 472–3, 477–8, 480–1, 482, see also executive certificates as executive responsibility 471, 473 of fishing zone claims 581–2
judicial role 471, 482
non-recognition policy: see non-recognition policy political considerations 445, 447, 450, 455, 456, 457–8, 465, 468, 471 recognition as what? 445, 453
as responsibility of individual state 444, 450–1, 466 territorial sovereignty over the high seas 609 recognition (general), legal effects
see also non-recognition, effect contracts, enforceability 473

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

de facto/de jure,
distinguishability 453–4, 472–8, 483–4
diplomatic privileges and immunities and 453, 454, 471–2 diplomatic relations and 457, 458, 460, 471 effect on state itself 456 enforcement of international rights and obligations and 457
as evidence of factual situation 449
in municipal law 460
property outside territory of recognised state and 473–4, 483 recognition and enforcement of foreign law, right to 471–3, 483 retroactivity 454, 473, 475–7, 485
right to sue and be sued 449, 471, 480–1
state immunity and 453, 454, 455, 471, 704
state practice 450
succession to property belonging to predecessor state and 472–4 successive de jure governments and 475, 476 territorial acquisition, role 492–3, 494–5, 516–17, 520–1, 533
as undertaking to deal with recognised entity as governing authority 454–5
recognition of governments 454–68
approval of government distinguished 458, 1151 automatic recognition (Estrada doctrine) 457–8
civil war and 460
constitutionality of government and 481
constitutive/declaratory theories compared 458
de facto/de jure 454, 457, 459–60, 466–7, 472–3 effective control, need for/sufficiency 455–6, 460, 477, 481, 1151 Estrada doctrine 457–8
formal recognition, abandonment of practice 458–9, 481
international legal personality and 457
legitimacy doctrine (Tobar doctrine) 457 legitimacy of government, need for 455–6 nature of forum states' dealings with, relevance 481 recognition by non-forum states, relevance 481 recognition of state and 456–7
recognition as what? 454
Tobar doctrine 457
UK practice 193–4, 455, 458–9, 467, 472–81
unconstitutional change of government, limitation to 454
US practice 162, 458, 467
USSR (1921/1924) 460
Wilson doctrine 457, 458
recognition of governments, withdrawal 466–8 break of diplomatic relations as alternative 467
of de facto recognition 466 recognition of successor government and 466–7 recognition, jurisprudence
Adams v. Adams 478
Arab Monetary Fund v. Hashim 479 n139
Arantzazu Mendi 474–6
Autocephalous Church of Cyprus v. Goldberg 484
Caglar v. Bellingham 478–9
Carl Zeiss Stiftung v. Rayner and Keeler Ltd (No. 2) 445, 477–8, 480–1, 482
Civil Air Transport Inc. v. Central Air Transport Corporation 476–7 Gdynia Amerika Linie v. Boguslawski 475–6
Gur Corporation v. Trust Bank of Africa 480
Haile Selassie v. Cable and Wireless Ltd (No. 2) 473
Hesperides Hotels Ltd v. Aegean Turkish Holidays 478
Kunstammlungen zu Weimar v. Elicofon 484

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

recognition, jurisprudence (cont.)
Luther v. Sagor 472–3, 483
The Maret 483, 485
Ministry of Defense of the Islamic Republic of Iran v. Gould 484
National Petrochemical v. M/T Stolt Sheaf 484–5
Republic of Panama v. Citizens & Southern International Bank 484–5 Republic of Somalia v. Woodhouse Drake 481
Salimoff v. Standard Oil Co. 483, 485
Sokoloff v. National City Bank of New York 483
Tinoco 455–6
Transportes Aeros de Angola v. Ronair 482
UK 472–81
Upright v. Mercury Business Machines 483–4
USA 482–6
recognition of Albania pre-WWI 199
belligerent status 245, 444, 453, 1149–50
Bosnia and Herzegovina 201, 461–2
Croatia 201, 461
liberation movements 245, 246
Palestine (1988) 199
SADR 236
TRNC 236, 464, 469–70
recognition of states 445–54
boundary disputes and 199
EU practice 451–2
FRG–GDR relationship and 463 n79, 964
OAS and 448, 451, 458 n49
post-WWI 448 premature recognition 460–2
recognition of government and 456–7
state succession and 959
title to territory, legality of acquisition and 470, 492–3, 494, 500, 521
UK practice 447, 451, 464
US practice 162, 445, 446–7, 450–1, 452
recognition of states, collective 465–6
by international organisation 465–6
EU recognition of Yugoslav Republics and 465 recognition of states, conditional 465 criteria, changes in distinguished 465 Litvinov Agreement (1933) and 465
non-fulfilment of conditions, effect 465 recognition of states, criteria other than those relevant to statehood see also state/statehood, criteria boundaries, respect for and 451, 452 Charter of Paris and 451
democracy, respect for 452
disarmament obligations and 452, 976
EU Guidelines (1991) 207, 451–2, 461
free trade, respect for 452
Helsinki Final Act (1975) and 451
human rights 451, 461
independence, wish for on part of state to be recognised 452
minorities and 451, 461
non-proliferation obligations and 452, 976 nuclear safety and 452
OSCE/CSCE commitments and 451 peaceful settlement of succession and regional disputes, commitment to 452 recognition as compensation for failure to fulfil criteria 462
rule of law and 207, 451
security commitments, acceptance 452
UN Charter and 451
recognition of states, implied 462–5 accidental recognition, risk of 462–3 bilateral treaty and 463 claims by state against unrecognised entity, effect 464 consular exequatur and 463 disclaimer 462–3, 464
establishment of diplomatic relations as 463 informal diplomatic contacts, whether 463

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

intention to recognise, need for 453–4 international conference, participation in 464 message of congratulation to new state as 463 Montevideo Convention on the Rights and Duties of States (1933) and 462 n73 multilateral treaty negotiations and signature 464
recognition of government 457
state practice 465
recognition of states, legal effects and underlying theories 444–5, 470–86, see also non-recognition, effect
ACY Opinion No. 1 198, 210, 448
ACY Opinion No. 8 449
ACY Opinion No. 13 958, 991–2
ACY Opinion No. 18 450
constitutive theory 207, 261, 445–6, 447, 448–50, 471, 492–3, 494–5 de facto and de jure recognition distinguished 453–4 declaratory theory 207, 446–8, 449
Institut de Droit International (1936 resolution) 448 international law theories and 449 international legal personality/subject of international law status and 220–1, 261–2, 449, 1302–3 Lauterpacht doctrine 449–50
OAS Charter (1948) 448
opposability bilaterally 445, 449, 453
opposability erga omnes 445, 453 statehood and, 198, 200, 201, 202, 207–8, 246, 261–2, 445–6, 448, 453, see also state/statehood
UN membership and 201, 453, 461–2, 464, 466
WWI Peace Treaties and 448
Red Crescent, protection of 1172
Red Cross (ICRC)
in Afghanistan 1201
Declaration of Minimum Humanitarian Standards (1990) 1198
establishment (1863) 28, 1283
exchange of prisoners of war and 1201 food aid, supervision of 1243
Geneva Conventions (1949) and Protocols I and II (1977) and 28, 1200 humanitarian role 1200–1
international legal personality 244 n244, 261–2
in Iraq 1201, 1243
Iraq prisoners of war and 1175
Israel and 1201
membership 1200
Middle East and 1201
in Nigeria 1201
principles (general) 1201–2 principles (non-international armed conflicts) 1202–3
role 28, 1200–1
in Rwanda 1201
in Somalia 1201
in Sri Lanka 1201
treaty-making power 28, 262
website 1339
in Yugoslavia 1201
Red Diamond, protection of 1172
Red Sea servitudes 540
referenda, role 201 n24, 962, 1229
refugees
see also asylum
African Commission Special Rapporteur 392–3 children and (CRC 22) 331
IAComHR and 383
Internally Displaced Persons, ILA Declaration of International Law Principles (2000) 287 n129
International Refugee Organisation, dissolution 1330 n214
property, right to recover 380 n212 Refugees Convention (1951) and Protocol (1967)
conclusion 303 n203
implementing legislation 185
Refugees, UN High Commissioner for (UNHCR)
establishment 1213
UNGA reporting obligation 303
UNPROFOR and 1258

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

regional arrangements for the maintenance of international peace and security (UNC Chapter VIII) 1024–6, 1273–80, see also individual organisations
Agenda for Peace and 1274 n346
AMIS 1280
CIS as 1274 n343
concurrent jurisdiction 1026
conflict with UNC obligations 1025
consent and 1275
consistency with UNC Principles and Purposes requirement (UNC 52) 1273 ECOWAS as 1276–9
'enforcement action' for purposes of 1274 enforcement action, SC authorisation (UNC 53(1)) 1025, 1030, 1273, 1274–5
EUFOR 1280
flexibility of definition 1274
IGAD as 1279
Interim Emergency Multinational Force in Bunia 1280 n371
ISAF 1280
KFOR 1280
Liberia and 1276–9
Manila Declaration on the Peaceful Settlement of International Disputes (1982) (UNGA resolution 37/10) 1026 n78 notification to SC requirement (UNC 54) 1274
OAS as 1274 n343, 1275–6
OSCE as 376, 1274 n343, 1275 n348 peaceful settlement of disputes before resort to SC 1275
primacy of UNC obligations (UNC 103) 1274
SC authorisation/approval 1274–5
SC and UNGA roles and 1025–6
UN co-ordination with 1274, 1277–8
UN Standby Arrangements System and 1275 n346
UNAMIS 1280
regional human rights bodies, common practices
inter-state complaints 352, 354, 382
procedure 382
regional international law 92–3
burden/standard of proof 77, 92
consensus and 93
development of 48
Latin America and 2, 27, 76–7, 92
lex specialis derogat legi generalis and 92–3
USSR and 35
regional international law, jurisprudence
Asylum case 76–7, 78, 92
Right of Passage 92–3 regional organisations 1287–96, see also Arab League and individual organisations
regional organisations
Africa 1293–4
Americas 1291–2
Arab League 1292–3
Asia 1294–5
Europe 1288–91
globalisation and 1287
good offices/mediation 1019
growth in 1287
proliferation 47–8
UN Economic Commissions 1213
UN Secretary-General and 1223–4 universality of international law and 48
websites 1340
Reisman, W. M. 60
religion, freedom of: see freedom of thought, conscience and religion; religious discrimination, prohibition religious activities, prisoners of war 1175 religious communities, Helsinki Final Act (1975) 373 religious discrimination, prohibition
see also freedom of thought, conscience and religion
customary international law 287
Declaration on the Elimination of All Forms of Intolerance and of Discrimination Based on Religion or Belief 287 n128, 305

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

special rapporteur on freedom of religion or belief 287 n128, 305 religious property and places of worship during armed conflict 1186 attacks on as 'grave breach' 401, 403
remedies
see also Chorzów Factory principle/restitutio in integrum; effective remedy, right to; ICJ, remedies; remedies; satisfaction as remedy for breach of international obligation; state responsibility for internationally wrongful act, consequences/remedies
declaratory judgment 1101
direct negotiation to resolve issues 1103–4 ICCPR and 322 n315
inherent jurisdiction 1072, 1101
international organisations and 1313
moral or legal damage to state and 805–6 mutual cancellation of claims and counter-claims 1102 need for/ubi jus ibi remedium 196, 322 n315, 1072, see also effective remedy, right to proportionality and 802–3, 806
Rainbow Warrior 800, 805–6
reparation: see Chorzów Factory principle/restitutio in integrum; reparation repeal of offending legislation 383
review and reconsideration of offending action 1103
specific performance 803
Torture Convention and 327
unilateral undertaking to comply with obligations 1103
remote sensing 551–2
UNGA Principles on (resolution 41/65) 551–2
Renaissance and the development of international law 14, 20–2 RENAMO 1223 n97, 1229 n122 reparation for breach of international obligation 801–6, see also Chorzów Factory principle/restitutio in integrum; damages/compensation for expropriation or breach of international law, measure; remedies; state responsibility for internationally wrongful act
applicable law 802
as general principle of international law 801 n147
international organisations, capacity to claim 1311–12 Reparation case 1311–12
restitution in kind 802–3 wilful or negligent action or omission of injured party and 802 n152, 1102
reprisals
see also countermeasures
belligerent reprisals 1130 n59
civilian objects 1186
Declaration on Principles of International Law (1970) and 671, 1123
definition 1129
Geneva Conventions (1949) and Protocols I and II (1977) 1169–70, 1175, 1177, 1185–6 lawfulness 1129–30, 1185–6
as measure short of war 1121 Naulilaa 1129–30
prisoners of war and 1175, 1186
proportionality 1186
Protocol I 1186
purpose 1186 restrictions on the use of force and 5, 1122, 1123, 1129–30 retorsion distinguished 1129
wounded and sick 1186 n94
wounded, sick and shipwrecked members of the armed forces at sea 1186 n94 Republika Srpska 239 n217
res communis
acquiescence and 517
common heritage principle compared 533–4
definition 492
high seas as 492, 503, 517, 553–4
outer space 492, 544
territorial sea 569

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

res judicata
see also estoppel
arbitral awards and 1053 n263
Corfu Channel 101
as general principle of law 101–2
Genocide Convention case 101–2
Laguna del Desierto 101 n124
preliminary objections judgments and 102
Right of Passage 101–2
reservations, see also treaties, reservations reserves, right to live in 296 residence, right to choose, ECHR, Protocol IV 348 restitution: see Chorzów Factory principle/restitutio in integrum
retorsion
definition 1128, 1129
Hickenlooper amendment as 1128–9
lawfulness 1128–9
Rhine Commission 28, 1283–4, 1306 n109
Rhodesia
Mozambique and 1241 n180, 1242 n189
Portugal and 469
sanctions and 4, 469
as threat to the peace (SC resolution 221 (1966)) 1237
UDI (1965), effect 206, 469, 478, 1242–3
Rhodesia and Nyasaland, Federation of, dissolution (1963) 980
Rhodian Sea Law 19
Rio Declaration (1992), 'polluter pays' principle 870
Rio Declaration on Environment and Development (1972) common but differentiated responsibilities (Principle 7) 868–9 consensus approach 870
development, right to (Principle 3) 302
EIAs (Principle 19) 865 n115 environment as a human right and 848
environmental protection and trade/economic development, balance 850
good faith (Principles 19 and 27) 104 n142
international co-operation 863
notification obligation (Principle 19) 864 precautionary principle (Principle 15) 867 sovereignty over natural resources (Principle 2) 850 states and sovereign rights, focus on 848
sustainable development (Principle 3) 848, 869
riots, as internal matters 1126, 1195
'risk' theory/strict liability 783, 789, 853–5, 887–8, 894, 900
rivers: see international watercourses Rockall 565 n61
rocks, status 559, 565, 582
Rolls of Oleron 19
Roma
OSCE/CSCE and 376
problems of 297 n198
Roman law 16–18, 171, 490, 495, 957
Romania
CoE Torture Committee and 363 n115
minorities in 293 n164, 295
Rome Statute: see ICC (International Criminal Court), Statute (1998)
Rousseau, C. 113, 132–3 royal prerogative: see prerogative
rule of law
African Union for Peace and Security Council 1028
CoE and 345, 350
Copenhagen Final Act (1990) and 374
ECHR and 347
equity and 107
EU and 370
recognition of states and 207, 451
UNESCO and 341
USSR and 36

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

Russia
see also USSR
Alaska sale (1867) 500
Baltic states, troops in 214
CoE Torture Committee and 363 n115
continental shelf 588
customary international law and 176
international law in municipal courts 176
League of Nations/PCIJ and 1110 n344
minorities in 295
SC membership/veto 3, 209, 215, 961, 1206, 1237
straddling stocks 627
as successor to USSR 36, 209, 240, 960–1
treaties/municipal law relationship 176
UN membership 960–1, 985
Rwanda
arms sanctions (UNC 41) 1246–7, 1263
civil war 1262–3
collective use of force (Chapter VII) 1263
collective use of force other than under Chapter VII 1262–3 conflict in, non-international nature 435
EU and 370
genocide 407, 409
ICRC and 1201
intervention in Congo 1154, 1264–5
peacekeeping operations 1263
as threat to the peace (SC resolution 788 (1992)) 1238
UN mission 1233 n143
UNAMIR 1262–3
UNOMUR 1262
Rwanda, International Criminal Tribunal for (ICTR): see ICTR
Rwanda, Special Rapporteur on 330
Rwandan Gaccaca court system 272

Saar, status 231 n176
Saarland 965 n55
SADC Organ on Politics, Defence and Security Co-operation 1029–30 enforcement action 1030 establishment of SADC (1992) 1029
Inter-State Politics and Diplomacy Committee 1030
jurisdiction 1030
objective 1029–30
SC and 1030
'significant inter-state conflict' 1030
structures 1030
safety zones (installations on the continental shelf) 589 Saharan Arab Democratic Republic (SADR)
see also Western Sahara
AU and 236–7
effective control test 237
international legal personality 236–7
Morocco and 236–7
recognition 236–7
self-determination, right to 236–7
UK and 237 n208
St Augustine 1119
St Petersburg Declaration (1868) 1168, 1186, 1189
St Pierre and Miquelon 598–9, 602
Sami community in Sweden 295–6
San Marino, ICJ and 1072 n103
Sanctions Assistance Missions 1033 n141
sanctions, bilateral see also arms sanctions as response to threat to or breach of the peace (UNC 41); economic sanctions as response to threat to or breach of the peace (UNC 41) effects doctrine/extraterritorial jurisdiction on economic matters and 692–3 sanitary regulations of coastal state 571, 572, 579, 580 Sanjak 1033
satellite broadcasting 550–1 freedom of information and 550
minorities, protection of 550
state sovereignty and 550
satellites 78

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

satisfaction as remedy for breach of international obligation acknowledgment of breach 806 apology 806
declaration of breach of international obligations 806, 1101
definition 805
establishment of fund to promote closer relations 806 expression of regret 806
measures to prevent recurrence/end continuing violation 360, 803, 806, 1313
public condemnation 806 public condemnation as 806
Rainbow Warrior 806
state practice 805–6
Saudi Arabia
Gulf War and 1253 n246
torture and 715, 717–18
UDHR and 278–9
scientific research: see marine scientific research
Scilly Isles, effect on delimitation 594
Seabed Disputes Chamber (UNCLOS 186–91) accelerated procedure 640 n444
ad hoc chambers 640 advisory opinion jurisdiction 640
applicable law 640
Chamber for Fisheries Disputes 640 n443
Chamber for Marine Environment Disputes 640 n443
Chamber for Maritime Delimitation Disputes 640 n443
Chamber of Summary Procedure 640 decisions, enforceability 640 n441
inter-state disputes 637
jurisdiction 637, 640
procedure 640 n441
provisional measures 640 n444, 641
standing 640
seabed resources, Conventions and other international instruments relating to Civil Liability for Oil Pollution Damage from Exploration and Exploitation of Seabed Mineral Resources 900 n325
Geneva Convention on the Territorial Sea (1958) 570 Interim Agreement on Polymetallic Nodules (1982) 631
Provisional Understanding Regarding Deep Seabed Mining (1984) 631 Provisional Understanding on Resolution of Practical Problems of Deep Sea Mining Areas (1987) 631–2 seabed resources (UNCLOS, Part XI) 628–34, see also marine resources
'Area' (UNCLOS 1) 629
Authority: see International Seabed Authority (UNCLOS 156–85)
Clarion–Clipperton Zone 630–1
coastal state rights 588–9
as common heritage of mankind (UNCLOS 3) 554–5, 629
consortia 628
developing countries/Third World and 555, 628 dispute settlement: see Seabed Disputes Chamber (UNCLOS 186–91) Enterprise 629, 630, 633, 634–5
landlocked states and 590
mineral resources, extent and distribution 628 mining technology 43, 628
moratorium (UNGA resolution 2574 (XXIV)) 629
overlapping claims 631
pioneer investors 630–1
reciprocating states regime 631–2 UN Declaration of Principles Governing the Seabed (1970) 533, 629
universality principle 632
seabed resources (UNCLOS, Part XI), Implementation Agreement (1994) 632–3 costs and institutional arrangements (Annex) 633 developed states and 633
entry into force 632

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

provisional application 632–3
transfer of technology (deep sea mining) 633
UNCLOS, interpretation as single instrument 632
seabed and subsoil, rights to prior to UNCLOS 582
EEZ 597
search and visit, right of arms trading 619
GCHS 22 615
slave trading 614, 616, 619
straddling stocks 626
submarine cables, protection 619 treaty rights 619–20
unauthorised broadcasting and (UNCLOS 110) 615
UNCLOS 110 615
WMD 619–20
SEATO, dissolution 1330 n214
secession, legal effects decolonisation and secession from independent state distinguished 975 dissolution distinguished 974
state succession to public debt and 998–1001
treaty succession 974–7
secession, right to/examples of Bangladesh 1273
Belgian Congo 526
Belgium/Netherlands (1830) 971, 974–5
Cuba/Spain (1898) 975
federal states 218, 255–6, 291 n151, 293, 295, 963
in Georgia 238
in Moldova 238
in Nigeria 526
Panama/Colombia (1903) 975
Quebec 255, 291 n151, 293, 295, 523
self-determination and 206–7, 255–6, 291, 293, 295, 523
in Somalia 237
in Sudan 526
in Yugoslavia (FRY) 963 Security Council 1206–10, 1218–21 developing states and 1208 n12
ICC and 439–40
membership 3, 39–40, 215, 961, 1206–7
proposals for change 1207–8
referrals to ICC 412, 413–14
UNGA working group on equitable representation and increase in membership 1207 n13 veto: see veto (SC) Security Council committees and subsidiary organs
see also ICTR; ICTY; UN Compensation Commission
Admission of New Members 1208
Council meeting away from Headquarters 1208
Counter-Terrorism 1162–3, 1164 n234, 1208, 1209, 1339
Experts on Rules of Procedure 1208
Governing Council of the UN Compensation Commission 1208 Peacebuilding Commission 1208
sanctions committees 1208
Security Council and international law/ICJ relationship 1268–71, see also ICJ role 'conformity with the principles of justice and international law' obligation 1268–9, 1271 n333
Congo v. Uganda 1270
Genocide Convention case 1269–70
ICJ advisory jurisdiction and 1113–14
ICJ as possible court of review 1269–71
ICJ's obligation to respect SC decisions 1270
Lockerbie 1269–70 obligation to comply with international law including UNC obligations 1268–71
SC and ICJ roles distinguished 1066
SC 'legal' decisions 1269
SC referral to the ICJ 1076–7
Security Council resolutions
binding effect 47, 114, 1219, 1223, 1270
conflict with legal rights of states 1270

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

Security Council resolutions (cont.)
as evidence of state practice 82–3, 115–17, 544, 1295
ICJ's obligation to respect 1270 on ICTR 407, 409, 1269
on ICTY 403
jus cogens/peremptory norms and 127
opinio juris and 544
Rhodesia 469
on South West Africa/Namibia 226, 227, 230 treaty obligations, primacy (UNC 103) 127, 1183 n79 Security Council resolutions by number
54 (1948) (Middle East) 1237
221 (1966) (Rhodesia) 1237
242 (1967) (Middle East) 469, 502, 1209, 1221, 1223
301 (1971) (Namibia) 227
338 (1973) 1209 n22, 1221 n85, 1241 n135
353 (1974) (Northern Cyprus) 235
367 (1975) (good offices mission to Cyprus) 1018–19
476 (1980) (Jerusalem) 469 n105
478 (1980) (Jerusalem) 469 n105
491 (1981) (Golan Heights) 469 n105
497 (1981) (Golan Heights) 502 n80
502 (1982) (Falklands) 1146
541 (1983) (Northern Cyprus) 235, 236, 469–70, 1269
550 (1984) (Northern Cyprus) 236
573 (1985) (Israel/PLO) 1241 n180
579 (1985) (hostage-taking) 1161 n221
598 (1982) (Iran–Iraq war) 1241
660 (1990) (Iraqi invasion of Kuwait) 1253
660 (1990) (Iraqi occupation of Kuwait) 1241, 1253–4
661 (1990) (Iraqi occupation of Kuwait) 1147 n149, 1243
662 (1990) (Iraqi occupation of Kuwait) 470, 502, 1253, 1269
665 (1990) (Iraqi sanctions) 1244
667 (1990) (Iraq action against diplomats in Kuwait) 1241 n180, 1253
670 (1990) (Iraqi sanctions) 1244
674 (1990) (Iraqi occupation of Kuwait) 402
678 (1990) (Iraqi occupation of Kuwait) 1253
683 (1990) (US–Pacific Islands Compacts of Association) 225
687 (1991) (Iraq–Kuwait) 521, 858, 1045, 1209, 1234, 1248–50, 1255 n253, 1269
688 (1991) (Iraqi repression of Kurds) 1156, 1239, 1254–5
692 (1991) (Iraq–Kuwait) 1045
705 (1991) (Iraq) 1045
706 (1991) (Iraq) 1045
713 (1991) (Yugoslavia) 1237–8
731 (1992) (Libya) 1162, 1245
733 (1992) (Somalia) 1238
748 (1992) (Libya) 1270
749 (1992) (Yugoslavia) 1257
752 (1992) (SFRY) 210
757 (1992) (SFRY) 210
757 (1992) (Yugoslavia) 1257
758 (1992) (Yugoslavia) 1257–8
762 (1992) (Yugoslavia) 1257
770 (1992) (Yugoslavia) 1258
776 (1992) (Yugoslavia) 1258
777 (1992) (SFRY) 210, 963
778 (1992) ('oil for food' scheme) 1046
779 (1992) (Yugoslavia) 1257
788 (1992) (Liberia) 1238, 1277
789 (1992) (Yugoslavia) 1258
815 (1993) (Yugoslavia) 1259
866 (1993) (Liberia) 1277
915 (1994) (UNASOG) 1011–12
929 (1994) (Operation Turquoise) 1263
955 (1994) (ICTR) 407, 1269
1022 (1995) (SFRY) 210
1031 (1995) (Dayton Agreement) 231
1031 (1995) (IFOR) 1279
1070 (1996) (Sudan) 1162
1192 (1998) (sanctions on Libya) 1245
1234 (1999) (Congo) 526, 1154, 1264
1244 (1999) (Kosovo) 232–3, 452, 1157, 1280
1264 (1999) (East Timor) 233–4, 424 n150, 1230

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

1267 (1999) (Al-Qaida sanctions) 1164 n225
1272 (1999) (UNTAET) 233–4, 1230
1315 (2000) (Sierra Leone Special Court) 418
1368 (2001) (11 September attacks) 1136, 1162, 1209, 1239
1373 (2001) (11 September attacks) 1136, 1162, 1163, 1208, 1209, 1210, 1239
1373 (2001) (terrorist measures) 1136
1441 (2002) (Iraqi non-compliance with SC resolutions) 1255–6
1442 (2002) (referrals to ICC) 414
1497 (2003) (Liberia) 1277–8
1509 (2003) (UN Mission in Liberia) 1278
1540 (2004) (WMD) 620, 1163, 1208, 1210, 1240
1556 (2004) (Sudan) 1265
1590 (2005) (Sudan) 1265
1624 (2005) (terrorist measures) 1163
1645 (2005) (Peacekeeping Commission) 1218 n67
1664 (2006) (Special Tribunal for Lebanon) 427
1674 (2006) (Protection of Civilians in Armed Conflicts) 1184 n83
1701 (2006) (Lebanon) 1230–1
1706 (2006) (Sudan) 1266
1730 (2006) (sanctions de-listing) 1250–1
1757 (2007) (Special Tribunal for Lebanon) 427–8
1769 (2007) (Sudan) 1266
Security Council, role and powers 1218–21, see also peacekeeping operations; threat to the peace, actual breach or aggression (UNC 39) admission, suspension and expulsion, recommendations to UNGA 1209, 1210
Chapter VI 1219–21
Chapter VI and Chapter VII action distinguished 1219, 1220, 1225, 1236, 1257–67, 1272–3
Cold War and 1209–10
collective security 1236, see also collective security decisions, binding effect 1208–9, 1219 enforcement measures (Chapter VII) 1208–9
evaluation 1209–10
as executive organ 47, 1206
good offices/mediation 1221
ICJ judges, election 1209
international peace and security 1024–6, 1206, 1208–9, 1218–21
investigation of dispute (UNC 34) 1219–20 member states' rights 1220
non-member states' rights 1220
Pacific Islands Trust Territory 224 parties' obligation to refer dispute to (UNC 37) 1220 peaceful settlement of disputes (Chapter VI) 1208–9, 1218–21, 1222 peacekeeping operations, authority to establish 1225 recommendation of procedures or methods of adjustment (UNC 36(1)) 1220 recommendation to refer to the ICJ 1220, 1221
recommendations, non-binding effect 1208–9, 1220
recommendations for pacific settlement (UNC 38) 1220 n77 request to parties to negotiate settlement 1221 resolution 242 (1967), importance 1209, 1221 right to call on parties to settle dispute by peaceful means (UNC 33) 1220 strategic trust areas 1209, 1214 substitutes for 1210
terrorism and 1161–3, 1209
third parties' rights 1221
UNGA concurrent responsibilities and 1210, 1222, 1271–3

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

security, right to: see liberty and security of person, right to; national security; peace and security, right to security zones 584
sedentary species 589, 624 n356
Selden, John 24
self-defence, right to (UNC 51) 1131–47
  acquiescence and 1137
  against embassy abroad, sufficiency 1134 against irregular forces 1135–6 anticipatory or pre-emptive 1137–40 armed attack, need for 1133–40, see also 'armed attack' attacks by non-state entities 1134–7
  burden of proof 1133, 1135
  Chatham House Principles on International Law on the Use of Force in Self-Defence 1137 n94 collective self-defence: see collective self-defence (UNC 51)
  customary international law and 97, 793, 1132, 1137 n94, 1139
  determination of legality, responsibility for 4–5
  diplomatic premises, inviolability and 576–7
  Entebbe incident 680, 1144
  Falklands War 1146
  high seas during armed conflict and 611
  independence of states and 212
  inherent right 1131–2, 1136, 1137 n94
  Institut de Droit International resolution (2007) 1139 n103, 1140 n108 necessity 1131, 1134 n80, 1140–1 no-fly zones and 1254–5
  nuclear weapons and 99 n112, 1142–3 proportionality 1131, 1134 n80, 1139, 1140–3, 1188
  report to Security Council, need for 1143
  SC resolution 502 (1982) 1146
  SC resolution 661 (1990) 1147 n149
  SC resolutions 1368 (2001) and 1373 (2001) 1136
  state responsibility and 793
  terrorism and 1135–7
  UN arms embargo and 1269
  US operations in Afghanistan 1136–7
  use of force (UNC 2(4)) and 4–5, 1123–4, 1131–47
self-defence, right to (UNC 51), jurisprudence 1967 Israel–Arab War 1138
  Caroline 1131, 1139–40, 1145
  Congo v. Uganda 1135–6
  Construction of a Wall 1135
  Legality of Nuclear Weapons 99 n112, 1141, 1142
  Nicaragua 1132, 1134–5, 1138–9, 1140–1, 1147
  Oil Platforms 1141, 1142
self-determination, right to 251–7
  19th century and 28
  Aaland Islands 200–1, 251–2
  ACHR 20 290, 392
  associations of states 238–9
  AU and 256
  boundary disputes and 524
  in case of foreign occupation 523
  CIS and 241
  civil wars and 1148
  as collective right 281, 292
  Colonial Declaration (UNGA resolution 1514 (XV)) 40, 115–16, 252–3, 255, 256, 522–3 as criterion of statehood 198
  customary international law, whether 254
  Declaration on Principles of International Law (1970) 116, 252–3, 256, 290, 522, 526, 1148 decolonisation process and 40, 252–3
  definition 256–7
  democratic governance and 292–3 economic self-determination, right to 40, 293 effective government, required standard 205–6
  as erga omnes obligation 125, 255
  EU Guidelines on Recognition of New States (1991) and 207

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

Falkland Islands 199, 533
federal states 218
as general principle of international law 40, 251–5, 290
General Recommendation 21 293
Gibraltar and 523 n199
Helsinki Final Act (1975) 289–90
as human right 289–93
humanitarian intervention and 1158
ICCPR Art. 1 253, 289, 314, 522
ICESCR Art. 1 253, 289, 308
ILC and 290
indigenous peoples 299
insurgents and belligerents 245
internal self-determination, right to 292–3, 523
international law, effect on 40
islands 199
jurisprudence 254–5
as jus cogens/peremptory norm 808 n198
League of Nations and 251–2
as legal principle 115–16 mandate system and 251
minorities 522–3
minorities protection and 251
opinio juris and 254
Pacific Islands Trust Territories–US Compacts of Association (1986) and 225 Palestine 1181
'people' 256–7
SADR 236–7
secession and 206–7, 255, 291, 293, 295, 523
Somalia 523–4
state practice 252, 290
state/statehood and 205–7, 257
territorial integrity and 256–7, 290–1, 392, 488, 523–4
trust territories 225
UN Charter (UNC 1(2) and UNC 55) 252
UNGA resolution 1541 (XV) and 256 n293
UNHRC and 290
UNHRC General Comment No. 1 291–2
use of force (UNC 2(4)) and 1123, 1148–9
uti possidetis doctrine/stability of boundaries and 526–8
Vienna Declaration and Programme of Action (1993) and 291 n151 self-executing treaties 162–4, 177 self-help: see self-defence, right to (UNC 51) Senegal, Gulf War and 1253 n246
separation of powers
act of state and 137, 149
in the international legal system 6, 11–12, 1268–71 treaty implementation and 148, 168 September 11 attacks
as 'armed attack' 1136–7
NATO response 1290 n29
SC resolution 1368 (2001) 1136, 1162, 1209, 1239
SC resolution 1373 (2001) 1136, 1162, 1163, 1208, 1209, 1210, 1239
self-defence, right to (UNC 51) and 1135 n83, 1136
as threat to international security 1162, 1218, 1239
Serbia
see also Yugoslavia (FRY); Yugoslavia (SFRY)
state succession 210, 960, 962–4
UN membership 1211
UNGA resolution 60/264 (secession of Montenegro) 963 n39
UNTAES and 231 n177, 1229–30
Yugoslavia (FRY), change to (2006) 963
Serbian War Crimes Chamber applicable law (Serbian law) 429 establishment by Serbian National Assembly 429–30
judges 429–30
as national court 430
Serbian War Crimes Chamber, jurisdiction
crimes against humanity 429
serious violations of international humanitarian law 429
Serbo-Croat-Slovene state, minorities 293 n164

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

serious injury to body or health, as war crime 434 service of process on foreign state acceptable means 749
Kuwait Airways 749
state immunity and 749
UK State Immunity Act 1978 749
Westminster City Council v. Iran 749
servitudes 538–41, see also leases of territory
Aaland Islands 539–40
cession of territory and 499
customary international law 970
definition 538, 539
Eritrea/Yemen 540
examples 539
Gabčíkovo–Nagymaros Project 970
North Atlantic Fisheries arbitration and 541
Panama Canal 540
Red Sea and 540
Suez Canal 540
territorial sovereignty distinguished 490
treaty succession and 969–70
sexual discrimination: see gender discrimination
sexual harassment, protection against 361 n104
sexual offences
ethnic cleansing and 433
individual criminal responsibility 425
as 'serious crime' 425
SFOR
Dayton Agreement, responsibility for implementation 231 n179
establishment 1279
website 1279 n370, 1340
Shabra and Shatilla murders 672 n121 shareholders, diplomatic protection and 817–18 Sharon, Ariel 672, 737 n221 ships (arrest/attachment), in territorial waters 575–6 ships (jurisdiction)
see also hot pursuit; innocent passage collisions on the high seas 84–5, 618, 656–7
criminal jurisdiction 574
flag state: see flag state jurisdiction
high seas 611–28
internal waters 557–8
territorial waters 574–5
ships (jurisdiction), jurisprudence
Franconia 141–2
Lotus 84–5, 212, 618, 655–7
NBB v. Ocean Trade Company 557 n18
Parlement Belge 148–9, 702, 705
R v. Anderson 557
Schooner Exchange v. McFaddon 558, 653, 699
Wildenhus 557
ships (nationality and registration) conditions for, requirement to state 611 conditions, state's right to determine 664
customary international law and 612
diplomatic protection and 819
evidence of 613
flag, dependence on 611
flagless/stateless ships 611, 613–14
genuine link requirement (UNCLOS 91) 611–13, 643, 664 Iran–Iraq War, reflagging during 612–13 ships owned or operating in/from Yugoslavia (FRY) 1245 n207
UN Conference on Conditions of Registration of Ships (1984) 612
ships (nationality and registration), jurisprudence IMCO 612
Naim Molvan v. AG for Palestine 613–14
Saiga (No. 2) 611–12, 613, 819
ships, state-owned (immunities) 148–9, 703–4, 705–6
Brussels Convention (1926) 704 n33
GCTS (1958) and 704 n33
ownership and control distinguished 703–4 UNCLOS and 704 n33
warships, limitation to 148–9

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

Sierra Leone
collective use of force (Chapter VII) 1263–4
collective use of force other than under Chapter VII 1263–4
ECOWAS and 1029
embargoes 1263
Malicious Damages Act 1861 420 n126
peacekeeping operations 418
Prevention of Cruelty to Children Act 1926 420 n126 threat to international peace and security (UNSC resolutions) 1238, 1277
UN Observer Mission 1263
UNAMSIL 1263–4
Sierra Leone Special Court 418–20 appeal, right of 419
due diligence 420 n126
establishment (SC resolution 1315 (2000)) 418
heads of state, immunities from jurisdiction of former 420, 735
individual criminal responsibility 418
Sierra Leone Special Court, applicable law decisions of Sierra Leone Supreme Court 419
ICTR/ICTY decisions 419
Sierra Leone Special Court, judges appointment 419
number 419–20
Sierra Leone Special Court, jurisdiction
cases completed and in progress 420
concurrent/primacy 418, 420
crimes against humanity 419
crimes under Sierra Leonean law 420
GC, common article 3 and Additional Protocol II (non-international armed conflict) 419
peacekeepers 418
serious violations of international humanitarian law 418, 419–20
Sierra Leone Special Court, organs/organisation
Appeals Chamber 418, 419
collection of evidence 419
completion strategy 420
investigation and prosecution 419
Office of the Prosecutor, powers 419
Prosecutor 418, 419
Registry 418, 419
Sierra Leonean/international staff 419
Trial Chambers 418–19
website 1341
Silesia, minorities post-WWI 293 n164
Singapore
ASEAN, membership 1294
State Immunity Act 1979 707, 727 n163, 745 n257
Single European Act (1986) 1288
slave trading, prohibition
19th century and 619
High Seas Convention (1958) and 614, 616
individual criminal responsibility 397
as international crime 397
as jus cogens/peremptory norm 126, 808 obligation to take effective measures to prevent and punish (UNCLOS 99) 616 right of search and visit 614, 616, 619 treaty provisions 616 n328
UNCLOS and 614, 616
universal jurisdiction 397–8
slavery
as crime against humanity 408, 436
jus cogens/peremptory norms 808 n198
slavery, prohibition
19th century and 270
ACHR 6 274
customary international law 275
ECHR 4 274, 348
as erga omnes obligation 124
ICCPR 8 275, 315
as international crime 807
non-derogation 274, 275
Slavery, Slave Trade and Institutions and Practices Similar to Slavery, Convention on (1956) 303

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

slavery, prohibition (cont.)
Suppression of Traffic in Persons and Exploitation of Prostitution (1949) 303
universal jurisdiction and 270, 673
Slavery, UNCHR Working Group on the Contemporary Forms of 308
Slavonia: see UNTAES
Slovakia
boundaries 968 n69
establishment 209
UN membership 985, 1211
Slovenia, recognition and UN membership 210, 962 smuggling, agreements/regulations regulating 579, 619, 1291 Social Charter: see European Social Charter (1961) (as amended) social contract 26–7
social and economic rights
ACHPR 391
ACHR 381
Economic Rights Committee: see UNCESCR
Minorities, Framework Convention for the Protection of 366
Third World and 269–70
social justice, ILO and 339
social security provisions, diplomatic exemption 767 social security, right to CIS Convention 378
ESC 11–14 361
General Comments (UNCESCR) 19 308
state succession to property and 992 n194
UDHR 25 279
social values, protection of 298
socialist states
see also USSR
human rights and 278–9
international law and 31–8
trade with 692–3 sociology and law 51–4, 55–6, 59
soft law 117–19
Solferino, battle of 1168
Somalia
AMISOM 1279
arms sanctions (UNC 41) 1246–7, 1260–1, 1278–9
AU mediation 1027, 1279
civil conflict 208 n56
collective use of force (Chapter VII) 1261, 1279
humanitarian assistance 1260–2
ICRC and 1201
individual criminal responsibility 402
international humanitarian law and 402
Organisation of the Islamic Conference and 1275 n348
peacekeeping operations 1260–2, 1279
recognition of governments and 481
self-determination, right to and 523–4
territorial claims 491, 523–4
as threat to the peace (SC resolution 733 (1992)) 1238
Transitional Federal Institutions/Union of Islamic Courts 1279
UN failure in 1224
UNOSOM II 1261–2
war crimes and 402
Somaliland
AU and 237
Constitution (2001) 237
declaration of independence (1991) 237, 467 n99 relations falling short of recognition as state 237, 467 n99
UK and 237 n211, 467 n99
sources of international law (ICJ 38) 69–128, see also customary international law; equity; general principles; general principles of law/international law; judicial decisions as source of international law; state practice as source of international law; treaties as source of international law
customary law 41
customary and treaty law, primacy 94–5, 123–4

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

decisions of international institutions 51
definition 70
formal and material sources, distinguishability 71 general applicability of Statute enumeration 70–1 hierarchy 66, 94, 123–7
ILC and 119–21
international administrative law 1295
international legal system deficiencies and 70 judicial decisions 109–12
law-creation and law-determination, distinguishability 71, 113–14 municipal law analogies 105, 489, 490 municipal law sources distinguished 69–70 states as subjects, makers and enforcers of law 6 UNGA and SRC resolutions 114–17
unilateral acts 121–2
websites 1333–4
South Africa
apartheid: see apartheid
Bantustans 202–3, 470, 480–1, 526
Ciskei and 480–1
customary international law and 174–6
diplomatic protection, justiciability 188–9 elections (1994), UN role 1229
embargoes 4
Foreign States Immunities Act 1981 707 n53, 727 n163, 745 n257
freedom of association 341
human rights in 304
ILO and 341
international law in municipal courts 174–6
justiciability 188–9
Namibia and: see Namibia; South West Africa mandate precedent/stare decisis doctrine 174
secession and 526
state immunity and commercial transactions 720
Status of Ciskei Act 1981 480
treaties/municipal law relationship 174–5
South Africa, intervention in Angolan civil war 1150, 1241 n180
South Africa, legislation
Constitution 1996 175–6
Constitution (interim) 1993 174–5, 202 n31
South African Development Community (SADC): see SADC Organ on Politics, Defence and Security Co-operation
South American Indians 23
South Korea, invasion by North Korea as breach of the peace (SC S/1501) 1241
South Ossetia 258
South Pacific Nuclear Free Zone 610
South West Africa mandate 225–7, 230, 1214, see also Namibia mandate, succession 1331 n221
petition to UN, right of 225
termination of mandate 226
sovereign immunity: see state immunity Sovereign Order of Malta, international legal personality 243 sovereign powers diplomatic representation 217
postal administration 217 sovereignty: see state sovereignty; territorial sovereignty Soviet Union: see USSR space: see outer space space law, influence of USSR and US 80 space objects
damage by 347 n321, 546–7, 1016 n28 International Liability for Damage Caused by Space Objects Convention (1972) 854, 888
jurisdiction 546
Spain
civil war, recognition issues 460
closed seas concept 24, 553–4, 609
CoE Torture Committee and 363 n115
continental shelf 588

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

Spain (cont.)
development of international law and 22–3
genocide, jurisdiction 673
Gulf War and 1253 n246
as nation-state 20
in the New World 23
state immunity from execution/attachment 747–8
universal jurisdiction and 673
Spanish Inquisition 23
Special Missions Convention (1969) 774–5
customary international law, whether 775
drafting process 120
notification of size and composition 775 siting, need for agreement on 775
special missions, immunities official activities, limitation to 775
ratione materiae 775
Sissoko 775
Tabatabai 775
UN Convention on State Immunity (2004) 709
special rapporteurs 222–3, 287 n128, 299, 304–5, 320, 325, 1325
specialised agencies 338–44, see also individual agencies binding nature of decisions 1285
codification and development of international law and 121
colonial territories, assistance to 246 249 commissions of inquiry and 1021–2 constituent instruments, interpretation 1305
definition 1285
dispute settlement procedures 1034–5
human rights and 299
ICJ advisory jurisdiction and 1034–5, 1308 n119, 1325 n190
influence, means of exerting 1285 Latin American system and 384 list of 1285 n14
privileges and immunities 776 n447
Privileges and Immunities of the Specialised Agencies, Convention on (1947) 1319 recognition and 245–6
role 1285
speciality principle 686
specific performance
as remedy 803
state immunity and 743
spheres of influence 57
Spitzbergen 535
Sri Lanka
Red Cross and 1201
suspension of US aid 1129
stability clauses 829
Stalin, Joseph 33
Stammler, R. 53
standard of living, right to adequate (ICESCR 11) 308 standard of proof, genocide 285 standard of treatment of aliens 823–7, see also acquired rights of aliens in case of state succession; aliens; deportation/expulsion; expropriation/nationalisation of property of foreign national 19th century developments 270, 824–5
Calvo doctrine 824
denial of justice and 825
developing countries' attitude towards 823
differential treatment, justification 826
Harvard Draft Convention on the International Responsiblity of States for Injury to Aliens (1961) 830 human rights obligations and 825–6 international minimum standard 824–5
in Latin America 27
MFN treatment 839
mixed claims commissions and 823
national treatment 825
standard of treatment of aliens, jurisprudence Certain German Interests in Polish Upper Silesia 824

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

Garcia 824
Neer 824–5
Roberts 824
standards, legal status 118
standing/locus standi
European Committee of Social Rights complaints procedure 362
Framework Convention for the Protection of National Minorities (1994) 367
ICC appeals 417
ICJ 963, 1072–4
ILO complaints procedure 340
international organisations 1311–12
ITLOS 639
jus cogens/peremptory norms and 125
Minority Languages Convention Committee of Experts 365
NGOs 1073
Seabed Disputes Chamber 640
standing/locus standi (individual) African Commission 393–4
CEDAW 324
CERC 313
CIS Human Rights Commission 379
Committee on Economic and Social Rights 311
as common practice 335
diplomatic protection and 258
ECtHR 259, 352, 353
Enforced Disappearances Committee 335
IAComHR 259, 382, 384, 385
ICSID 259, 1041–2
Iran–US Claims Tribunal 1043
ITLOS 639
mandated/trust territories and 225, 245
Migrant Workers Committee 334
NAFTA Chapter 11 investment disputes 1038–9
post-WWII developments 271
Torture Committee (UN) 328
treaty provision 258–9
UNESCO 342
UNHRC 319–22
'victim of violation' 330, 379–80
'Star Wars' 545 n314
stare decisis doctrine: see precedent/stare decisis doctrine state agencies/instrumentalities/entities, jurisprudence Baccus 703, 729
Bancec 732
Czarnikoff v. Rolimpex 731
Dole Food Co. v. Patrickson 722 n132
Krajina v. Tass Agency 703, 729–33
Kuwait Airways 731
Trendtex 728–9
state agencies/instrumentalities/entities, state immunity entitlement 728–33, 736
act of state and 192
sovereign acts, limitation to 731
state agencies/instrumentalities/entities, status as for state immunity purposes applicable law for determining 703, 729 bank as 722
control test 730
direct ownership requirement 722 n132 evidence of, source and evaluation 730
functional test 730
'government'/government departments 732–3 intention to give sovereign status and 731–2 ITLOS and 639
responsibility for determining 736–7 separate legal personality requirement 728–31
UN State Immunity Convention (2004) and 709
state archives
see also state succession to state archives
cultural heritage and 994, 996
definition 993–4
UNESCO and 994
state contracts
applicable law 829
'internationalised' contracts and 829
pacta sunt servanda and 829
stability clauses 829

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

state of emergency reports on 308
right to declare 389
state immunity diplomatic privileges and immunities and 709 n63, 728, 755, 762–3
reciprocity and 1318–19, 1326
state immunity, burden/standard of proof 708–9, 712, 740 n237, 743, 748–9 balance of probabilities 748–9 court's own motion obligation 748 n278 execution/attachment 743, 746–7 head of mission certificate and 747
jurisdiction 712, 740 n237
Maclaine Watson 748–9
purpose of funds 746–7
sovereign nature of act 708–9
UK State Immunity Act 1978 and 748
state immunity, classification of act for purposes of 708–14 acts jure imperii and jure gestionis distinguished 701, 708 n61, 709–14, 1319
civil law practice 710–11
commercial transactions: see state immunity and commercial transactions contract for repair of ambassador's residence 719 n112
developing countries and 710
development programme, participation in 723
employment contracts: see employment contracts, state immunity in relation to enforcement of arbitration award 720–1 exchange control, acts in compliance with 722 government bonds, issue/rescheduling 722–3
hostage-taking 715–16
human rights violations 715–18
ILC draft articles 708 n61
initial and subsequent acts, distinguishability 712, 714 issue of foreign Treasury notes 721
as judicial act 708 n59
lease on ambassadorial residence 755 n314 military bases, acts in connection with 713–14 military training agreement 723 modified 'nature' test 710 nature v. purpose test 709–14
official publication 723
police powers 715, 716, 732
private citizen test 710–11, 714 n90, 722–3 reward for information about fugitive 723 security enforcement 716
state-sponsored terrorism 685 n197, 715–16 tortious activity 684, 685, 721
torture 160, 715, 716–18
UN State Immunity Convention (2004) 708–9 violations of international law 160, 684, 685 state immunity, classification for purposes of, jus cogens/peremptory norms violation and 127, 716
state immunity and commercial transactions 718–25
act in forum state in connection with commercial act elsewhere 723–4 acta jure imperii and jure gestionis distinction, relevance 719 acts 'other than in the exercise of sovereign authority' and 719–21
'commercial transaction' (UK State Immunity Act 1978) 718–21
'commercial transaction' (UN State Immunity Convention) 725
'commercial transaction' (US Foreign Sovereign Immunities Act 1976) 721–3 direct effect in forum state of commercial act elsewhere 723–4 inter-state transactions 724

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

UN State Immunity Convention 720–1, 724–5
state immunity, entitlement
Duff Development case 704
EEC 734–5
federal states and 709, 733–5
'foreign state' 704, 728–35 government departments 732–3 heads of state: see heads of state political subdivision 709 recognition of state or government, dependence on 453, 454, 455, 471, 704
'state' 709
state agencies/instrumentalities/entities: see state agencies/instrumentalities/entities, state immunity entitlement; state agencies/instrumentalities/entities, status as for state immunity purposes
state-owned ships 148–9, 703–4, 705–6
'terrorist states' 685 n197, 715–16
warships 699
State Immunity, European Convention on (1972)
federal states and 733
immunity from execution 744 immunity as rule subject to exceptions 707 n56, 708 n61
tortious proceedings 727
State immunity, European Tribunal in matters of 707 n56, 744–5 state immunity, exceptions
employment contracts: see employment contracts, state immunity in relation to immovable property in the forum state, action related to 723, 728, 766 n382 property taken in violation of international law 728 n168
state immunity from execution/attachment 744–8
burden of proof 743
central bank assets 745 classification of act for purposes of: see state immunity, classification of act connection between property and entity in proceedings, need for 744–5 embassy bank account and 746–8, 762
European Convention on State Immunity (1972) and 744
'property' 745
property taken in violation of international law 745 n262
purpose of property to be seized, relevance 744–8, 762 state immunity from jurisdiction distinguished 744, 745–6
UK State Immunity Act 745
UN State Immunity Convention (2004) and 744
US Foreign Sovereign Immunities Act 1976 745–6 state immunity from execution/attachment, waiver arbitration clause/agreement 744
by international agreement 744 contractual provision 744
pre-judgment attachment 742
waiver of immunity from jurisdiction distinguished 740, 744 written consent, need for 745
state immunity from jurisdiction 677–742
civil and criminal jurisdiction distinguished 718 classification of act for purposes of: see state immunity, classification of act for purposes of
customary international law 716
state immunity from jurisdiction, procedural matters due process/right to a remedy and 716–17 service of process 749
state immunity from jurisdiction, theories of absolute immunity 701–4

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

state immunity (cont.)
act of state doctrine and 699–701, 722
comity and 706, 717
conventions relating to 698
historical development 697–704
in personam/in rem actions, attempt to distinguish 706–7 non-justiciability distinguished 180, 182–3, 699–701
as personal attribute 697–8 precedent/stare decisis doctrine and 706–7 privileges and immunities of international organisations distinguished 1318–19, 1326–7 restrictive immunity 704–8 as rule of immunity subject to exceptions 707, 708–9, 715, 749
as rule of procedure/jurisdiction 700, 717–18 sovereign equality of states and 1318–19, 1326
state practice, dependence on 698, 704–8
Tate Letter (1952) 705
territorial integrity/territorial sovereignty, respect for as basis 697
state immunity from jurisdiction, waiver 740–2 action to establish immunity and 741 n239 arbitration clause and 741–2 bilateral treaty provisions 742 n245 burden of proof 740 n237
choice of law clause and 740 n238, 741
counterclaims and 741 express waiver 740
failure to challenge award and 741 submission to the jurisdiction as 740–1
UK State Immunity Act 1978 740–1
UN State Immunity Convention (2004) 740, 741 waiver of immunity from execution distinguished 740, 744
state immunity from pre-judgment attachment 742–3
Mareva injunction 743
UN Convention on State Immunity (2004) and 743 n248
waiver 742
State Immunity, Inter-American Draft Convention on (1983) 707 n56 state immunity, jurisprudence Abbott 747–8
AIC Ltd v. Nigeria 720, 745
Al-Adsani cases 716–17
Alamieyeseigha 734
Alcom 707, 718 n111, 746–7, 762
Alfred Dunhill 705
Baccus 703, 729
Banamar 747
Bancec 732
Bouzari 716
Canada Labour Code 711, 714, 726
Condor 747
Cristina 702–3
Czarnikoff v. Rolimpex 731
De Sanchez case 711
Ferrini 718 n108
Holland v. Lampen-Wolfe 699, 713–14, 716, 731
International Association of Machinists 700
Intpro 763
I^e Congreso Del Partido 707, 710–11, 712–13, 714
Jones v. Saudi Arabia 717–18, 733
KJ International v. MV Oscar Jupiter 720
Krajina v. Tass Agency 703, 729–30
Kuwait Airways 714, 731
Leasing West 748
Letelier case 700–1, 727–8, 749–50
Littrell (No. 2) 713
Maclaine Watson 734–5, 763
Mellenger 733
Parlement Belge 148–9, 702, 705
Permanent Mission of India v. New York State 723
Philippine Admiral case 705–6
Philippine Embassy case 746
Pinochet (No. 3) 699, 718, 737, 738
Porto Alexandre 703

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

Propend Finance 752
Re P (No. 2) 732–3
Saudi Arabia v. Nelson 715
Schooner Exchange v. McFadden 699
Sengupta 714 n90, 725–6
Simpson v. Libya 715–16
Svenska Petroleum v. Lithuania 720–1
Tel Oren 750
Thai-Europe Tapioca case 706
Trendtex 706–7, 728–9
Verlinden 750
Victory Transport case 705, 708, 735
Weltover 724
Yuan Ysmael 703
Zedan 724
state immunity, procedural matters, as preliminary matter 700, 743, 748
State Immunity, UN Convention on (2004) acts jure imperii and jure gestionis distinguished 720 commercial activity and 720–1, 724–5
'commercial transaction' 725 criminal proceedings, exclusion 707 n53
federal states and 734
immovable property in forum state, action relating to 766 n382 post-judgment attachment and 744–5 pre-judgment attachment and 743 n248
ratione personae and ratione materiae entitlement distinguished 738 restrictive immunity and 707 n53
as rule subject to exceptions 708–9, 717
'state' (art. 2(1)(b)) 709, 734
tortious proceedings 727
waiver of immunity 740, 741
state practice, classification as/evidence of 81–4 BITs 98 n107, 838
claims and counter-claims 84
codification treaties 88–9 enforcement action, relevance 83–4 federal court decisions 112, 223 ILC reports 88–9, 120–1
municipal court decisions 112
municipal law 83, 136–7
practice of entities other than states and international organisations 263 practice of international organisations 82–3, 88–9, 1295 publications relating to 82 n39 Scotia 83
statements and arguments falling short of firm position 82 n38
UNGA/SCR resolutions 82–3, 88–9, 115–17, 1295
UNHRC practice 290
state practice as source of international law, jurisprudence Anglo-Norwegian Fisheries case 77, 90, 560
Asylum case 76–7, 78, 92
European Commission of the Danube 76 n19
Lotus 81
Nicaragua 77–8
North Sea Continental Shelf cases 77, 85–6, 95–6
state practice as source of international law, requirements classification as state practice: see state practice, classification as/evidence of consistency with law/legal facts 514–15 constant and uniform practice 75, 76–81, 560, 563–4 continuity 80
difficulties of establishing 73–4
duration 75, 76, 80, 86
formalisation 28
'immemorial usage' 76 n19
intention to create norm 117
lump sum settlements 841
persistent objector rule 91
power politics and 79–80, 215
practice subsequent to treaty, relevance 85–6, 252 repetition 75, 76, 78–9
SEDCO 841
sufficiency 74, 76–81

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

state practice (cont.)
uniformity 77–8
USSR and 34
state responsibility for consequences of lawful act 1313
State Responsibility, ILC Articles on (2001)
art. 1 (general principle of state responsibility) 781
art. 2 (elements) 782
art. 3 (characterisation of act) 782
art. 4 (conduct of organs of state) 222, 786–7
art. 5 (conduct of persons or entities exercising governmental authority) 787–8
art. 6 (organs placed at disposal of state by another state) 788
art. 7 (excess of authority/ contravention of instructions) 789
art. 8 (conduct directed or controlled by state) 789–91
art. 9 (conduct in absence or default of official authorities) 791
art. 10 (conduct of insurrectional or other movement) 791–3
art. 11 (conduct acknowledged and accepted by state as its own) 793
art. 12 (existence of breach) 782
art. 13 (critical date) 782
art. 14 (continuing breach) 782
art. 15 (composite act) 782
art. 16 (aid or assistance) 782
art. 17 (direction and control of act) 782
art. 18 (coercion) 782
art. 19 [1996 Draft Articles] (jus cogens/peremptory norms breaches) 126, 807–8
art. 20 (consent) 793, 1152 n171
art. 21 (self-defence) 793, 1132 n66
art. 22 (countermeasures) 794–5
art. 23 (force majeure) 796–7
art. 24 (distress) 797
art. 25 (necessity) 798–9
art. 30 (cessation and non-repetition) 800–1, 803 n161
art. 31 (reparation) 801–2
art. 32 (internal law as justification: irrelevance) 802 n151
art. 34 (forms of reparation) 802
art. 35 (restitution) 802–3
art. 36(1) (compensation obligation) 804 art. 36(2) (measure of compensation) 804–5
art. 37 (satisfaction) 803
art. 39 (compensation: offset) 802 n152
art. 40 (serious breach of jus cogens/peremptory norms obligation) 808
art. 40(2) ('serious breach' of peremptory norm obligation) 127
art. 41 (serious breach of jus cogens/peremptory norms obligation: consequences) 808
art. 41(2) (non-recognition of lawfulness of peremptory norm breach) 127
art. 42 (invocation of responsibility) 799
art. 44 (admissibility of claims/nationality of claims) 808
art. 44(b) (exhaustion of local remedies) 808, 819–20
art. 45 (loss of right to invoke) 799
art. 46 (plurality of injured states) 799
art. 47 (plurality of responsible states) 799
art. 48 (invocation by state other than injured state) 124, 800
art. 49 (countermeasures) 795
art. 50 (obligations not affected by countermeasures) 795
art. 50(d) (countermeasures in case of breach of peremptory norm) 127
art. 51 (countermeasures: proportionality) 795
art. 52 (countermeasures: conditions) 795–6
art. 58 (individual responsibility) 782
fault 785
importance 120
summary and drafting history 780–1

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

state responsibility for internationally wrongful act 778–843, see also Chorzów Factory principle/restitutio in integrum; expropriation/nationalisation; international law, compliance with; reparation for breach of international obligation; standard of treatment of aliens
applicable law 138, 778–80
of belligerents 1181, 1193
breaches of jus cogens/peremptory norms and 127
burden/standard of proof 780, 784, 888
Chapter VII enforcement action and 807–8
definition 778
environmental damage: see environmental damage, state responsibility exhaustion of local remedies 819–20
federal states and 222–3
individual criminal responsibility and 402, 782, 807
international legal personality and 263, 1311 Iraqi invasion of Kuwait 858 n73, 1045 n209, 1248–9 jurisdiction/admissibility distinguished 1085–6
nuclear activities, civil liability and 894
in occupied territory 350
self-defence, right to (UNC 51) 793
State Responsibility, ILC Articles on (2001): see State Responsibility, ILC Articles on (2001)
state succession law, interrelationship 779–80 in territory occupied by third power 350 treaty obligations, interrelationship 779 state responsibility for internationally wrongful act, consequences/remedies 800–22, see also satisfaction as remedy for breach of international obligation
acknowledgment of breach 806 cessation of act/assurances of non-repetition 800–1, 803 n161 guarantee of non-repetition 806
reparation 801–6
satisfaction 805–6
state responsibility for internationally wrongful act, consequences/remedies, jurisprudence
LaGrand 800–1
Rainbow Warrior 779, 786, 797–8, 800
state responsibility for internationally wrongful act, imputability 781, 785–99, see also state responsibility for internationally wrongful act including acts of adoption of act as its own 792–3
definition 786
ILC Articles 786–9
knowledge of act, sufficiency 785–6
ultra vires acts 788–9
state responsibility for internationally wrongful act including
armed attack 1133
breach of international humanitarian law 434 breach of treaty 779, 785 damage caused by air crash 785 damage to state property 785
genocide 276, 283, 284–5
human rights, failure to prevent abuses 276
international crimes 807–8
mine-laying in internal or territorial waters 785–6 mob violence 791–3
violation of territorial integrity 785 state responsibility for internationally wrongful act including acts of see also state responsibility for internationally wrongful act, imputability agents operating abroad 322, 658 n55 armed bands sent to third country 1135
belligerents 1150
contras 790

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

state responsibility (cont.) entities falling short of statehood 263 executive 138
guerrillas 790 international organisation 1312 n140 judiciary 138, 786, 788
KFOR 350–1, 787–8, 1312 n140
legislature 138
organ or agent of state placed at disposal of international entity 787–8 organs, persons or groups whose acts are attributable 222, 284–5, 786–7 peacekeeping forces 350–1, 787–8, 1231, 1312 n140 person or entity exercising elements of governmental authority 787 persons exercising elements of governmental authority in default/absence of official authorities 791 persons or groups of persons acting under direction or control of state 789–91 PLO 683
political subdivisions/components of federal state 222–3, 786 predecessor state/government 791–2, 1003–4, 1152 n171
private persons 789, 858–9
privatised companies 787
UK Privy Council 788
state responsibility for internationally wrongful act, invocation/claim 799–800 acquiescence in lapse of claim 799
by state individually or group of states 799 erga omnes obligations and 800, 808 Eurotunnel 799 n136
joint and separate responsibility 799 radical change to other states to which obligation owed and 799
'specially affects' requirement 799 waiver of claim and 799
state responsibility for internationally wrongful act, jurisprudence
see also Chorzów Factory principle/restitutio in integrum
Aerial Incident case 785
Barcelona Traction 800
Behrami 350–1, 787–8, 1312 n140
Caire 783, 788
Corfu Channel case 784–6
Gabčíkovo–Nagymaros Project 794
Genocide Convention case 786–7, 791
Gill 796, 797
Home Missionary Society 783–4
ICJ/ICTR and ECtHR, difference of views on 1116
Iranian Hostages case 793
LaGrand 223
Legality of Nuclear Weapons 793
Loizidou 790
Mossé 788
Neer 783
Nicaragua 785, 790
Rainbow Warrior 779, 786, 797–8
Rankin 792
Right to Information on Consular Assistance 389–90
Sandline 789
Short 792
Spanish Zones of Morocco 781
Special Rapporteur case 222–3, 786
Tadić 790
Union Bridge Company case 788–9
Yeager 792
Youman 788
Zafiro 789
state responsibility for internationally wrongful act, justification/circumstances precluding responsibility 793–9 consent to act 793, 1152 n171 countermeasures, acts constituting, 127, 794–6, 1313 n141, see also countermeasures
distress 797–8
due diligence 785, 791
force majeure 779, 796–7, 1313 n141 human rights considerations 793 humanitarian considerations 793 necessity and 793
proportionality and 793
self-defence 793
state responsibility for internationally wrongful act, loss or damage

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

resulting from unlawful act or omission 781, 856–8
'adverse effects' on the environment 857–8, 863
Antarctic Mineral Resources Convention (1988) 857 n65
Atmospheric Pollution Convention (1979) 856
ILA Montreal Rules (1982) 856–7
ILC Draft Articles on Prevention of Transboundary Harm from Hazardous Activities 856 n60
Ozone Layer Convention (1985) 857 reasonable and equitable use of territory and 857 risk, sufficiency 856
Trail Smelter 856–7
UNCLOS provisions 856
state responsibility for internationally wrongful act, requirements/classification as see also fault; state responsibility for internationally wrongful act, loss or damage resulting from unlawful act or omission, need for aid or assistance in breach by third state 782
applicable law 782
coercion 782
continuing and composite act distinguished 782 contractual and tortious responsibility, absence of distinction 779
critical date 782
customary international law 786–7 direction and control of act 782
failure to control acts of private individuals 789 fault, relevance 783–5, 853–5, see also due diligence; fault
ILC Articles 781–2
imputable act or omission breaching obligation 781, see also state responsibility for internationally wrongful act, imputability international legal obligation between two states 781 state sovereignty
see also independence of states acts dependent on/reflecting 181
anti-terrorist measures and 43–4 balance of power and 57
belligerent occupation and 501
CIS and 240
constraints on, effect 211–12, 213, 216
constraints under international law 58, 63–4, 70
developing countries and 36, 39, 40
devolution of 494
domestic and international sovereignty distinguished 21–2, 29, 44
domestic jurisdiction principle (UNC 2(7)) 212–14, 647–8
equality of states and 6, 26, 45, 129, 214–15
globalisation and 48
history of concept 13, 21–2, 26, 487–8
human rights and 49, 213, 268, 269, 270, 272–3, 278, 488, 648
international organisations and 57, 488
jurisdictional rights and 212, 217, 645
just war and 1119–21
justiciability and 180–3
Kosovo and 233
Liechtenstein 217
mandated territories and 225, 493
Morocco (Treaty of Fez (1912)) and 216
municipal and international law, interrelationship and 178
natural law and 27, 132
peaceful co-existence and 34, 215, 216
positivism and 29, 46, 75, 131
protected states 216
protectorates 216–17
reciprocity and 44
satellite broadcasting and 550
suspension, effect 503
technological developments, effect 488

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

state sovereignty (cont.) territory and 487–8
Third World concern for 269
UN Charter and 1205
USSR and 33–4, 35
'will of the state' and 29, 30
state succession 956–1009, see also treaty succession
Aaland Islands 969 n75
ad hoc nature of rules 958–9
Baltic states 961–2
continuity of legal personality and 957
customary international law 958 n6, 959, 967, 976, 984, 986, 987, 989, 990 date of 454 n34, 959–60, 962
definition 959
dissolution of states and 960–3
Hong Kong 1008–9
ILC Draft Articles (1981) 990 n182, 1007 international organisations and 960–1, 985–6, see also UN membership merger of states: see merger of states, state succession and municipal and international law rules distinguished 957 nationality and: see nationality and state succession
positivism and 957
private rights: see acquired rights of aliens in case of state succession recognition and acquiescence, role 959
Roman Law and 957
state responsibility for internationally wrongful act, interrelationship 779–80 succession of governments distinguished 957 transference and inherent rights and duties distinguished 957 Yugoslav Agreement on Succession Issues (2001) 989, 991, 992 n192, 993
state succession, bilateral treaties and 957–8 Burma–UK (1947) 958
Minsk Agreement (1991) 961 n21, 968 n69, 1291
Peace Treaty (Italy–Allied Powers) (1947) 958 n4
St Germain (1919) 957–8, 996, 996 n215, 999
state succession, continuity of state and 209, 960–6 British India/India/Pakistan 960, 985, 999
German Reich/FRG 964–5
Israel/British Palestine 960 protest, effect 962–3
Russia/USSR 36, 209, 240, 960–1
SC membership and 961
UN membership and 960–1
USSR/Baltic states 961–2
Yugoslavia (FRY)/Serbia 960
Yugoslavia (SFRY) 209–10, 960, 962–3, 981
state succession, jurisprudence
ACY Opinion No. 8 958
Espionage Prosecution case 958–9
state succession to property, archives, assets and liabilities 986–1004
ACY Opinion No. 9 986
ACY Opinion No. 11 454 n34
ACY Opinion No. 13 991–2
ACY Opinion No. 14 986–91
customary international law 986, 990, 1000, 1001
'property, rights and interests owned by the state' 987 public prerogative test 988–9
recognition and 472–4
settlement by agreement as preferred solution 986–7
'social ownership' and 988–9
Treaty of St Germain (1919) 957–8, 996 n215, 999
state succession to public debt 996–1001
Austro-Hungarian Empire (1919/1923 Peace Treaties) 999
Colombia/Panama (1903) 998–9 continuity of debt, presumption of 997, 998

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

customary international law 997, 1000, 1001
equitable distribution and 998, 999–1000 Irish Free State–UK Treaty (1921) 999 local/localised debts 996 merger/unification and 997–8
newly independent states and 1000–1 Ottoman Empire and 999
private creditors and 997
secession and 1000
secured debt 999
state practice 998–9
Texas secession (1840) 998
Yugoslav Agreement on Succession Issues (2001) and 1000 state succession to state archives 993–6 in absence of agreement 994–5
agreement, need for 995–6
Algerian archives 995
'archives' 993–4
archives relating to territory 995
compensation, relevance 994
decolonisation situation and 994–5
Denmark/Iceland Union and 996 n215
dissolution of states and 996
Ethiopian archives (Treaty of Peace with Italy (1947)) 995 merger of states and 996
pre-colonial period archives 995 reproduction of archives and 995 third state archives 994
treaty provision for 994
Treaty of St Germain (1919) 996 n215
Vietnamese archives 995
Yugoslav Agreement on Succession Issues (2001) and 996
state succession to state property 987–93
agreement, need for 986–7, 988, 992–3
applicable law 987–8
cultural heritage and 991, 996
customary international law 986, 990
Cyprus and 987 n162
Czech and Slovak Republic agreements 992–3 date in case of variation between several successor states 988
date of passing 988 decolonisation situation and 990 n182
equitable division 991–2
equity and 990 n182
'financial assets' 992 n194
FRG–GDR unification (1990) and 992
IMF/World Bank-held assets/IMF key 993 immovable property outside the successor state 989–90 immovable property in the successor state 989
merger/unification and 992
movable property outside the successor state 991–2 movable property in the successor state 990–1
newly independent states and 990
private rights distinguished 987 n160, 988–9
'public property' 987–9 social security assets 992
state practice 992–3
territorial principle 988, 989, 990–1
USSR/successor state agreements 993
Yugoslavia (SFRY), dissolution and 988–91, 993
State Succession to State Property, Archives and Debts, Vienna Convention on (1983) 986–7 agreement, need for 986–7, 996
'archives' 994
conclusion 959
customary international law and 986, 987, 990, 1000, 1001
date of succession 959
decolonised territories 977
dispute settlement 1015 n22, 1023–4
equitable division 991–2, 999–1000
immovable property outside the successor state 990 n181, 991–2
immovable property in the successor state 989

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

State Succession (cont.)
movable property in the successor state 990–1
newly independent states and 995, 1000–1
private creditors and 997
'state property' 987
state/statehood 197–242, see also equality of states; independence, right to; international legal personality; recognition of states as abstraction 29
creation of 197–204
date, difficulty of determining 200–1
decolonisation and 198
extinction: see dissolution of states
'failed' states 201–2
GDR 964
Holy See and 197, 243–4, 261
humanitarian intervention and 201–2
international law, dependence on principles of 45
merger of states 208–9
positivism and 29, 267
self-determination and 205–7, 257
states as primary subjects of international law 45, 46, 197, 261, 487–8 state/statehood, criteria
see also recognition of states, criteria other than those relevant to statehood
ACY Opinion No. 1 198, 210, 448
boundary disputes, relevance 199–200
'civilisation' 200 defined territory 198, 199, 451, 487–8, 492–3, 494–5 democracy, relevance 207 diplomatic relations/capacity to enter into 198, 202, 244, 451, 453, 734 divided territory, relevance 200, 202 economic position, relevance 203–4 effective government/organised political authority 198–9, 200–2, 205–6, 237, 451, 461–2 estoppel/acquiescence and 242, 244, 261–2
flexibility 198–9
human rights, respect for 207
as interaction between law and fact 197–8 internal political and constitutional arrangements, relevance 198, 200
international legal personality and 202, 1302–3 minorities, treatment of and 207
Montevideo Convention on the Rights and Duties of States (1933) 198 permanent population 198, 199, 451
recognition and 198, 200, 201, 202, 207–8, 244, 246, 261–2, 445–6, 448, 450–1, 453 self-determination and 198, 205–7, see also self-determination, right to statelessness change of husband's nationality and 662
diplomatic protection and 810–11
jurisdiction over stateless person habitually resident in the territory 676, 1232
ships 611, 613–14
state succession and 1005, 1006
Stateless Persons, Convention on Status of (1954) 303, 335
Statelessness, Convention on the Reduction of (1961) 303, 1005
Stimson doctrine 468
state succession and 1005
Stockholm Declaration (1972)
see also UNEP
environment as a human right 847
environmental protection and trade/economic development, balance 849–50 hazardous waste 895 n291 international co-operation obligation 862–3
obligation to avoid injury to other states 853, 857
obligation to provide information 890 n253 sustainable development principle 869 n135

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

Stockholm Declaration (1992), international co-operation obligation 862–3 stoicism 17
straddling stocks 624–8
  Bering Sea 625 n358, 627
  conservation measures, need for agreement on 624–6
  flag state jurisdiction 626
  NAFO and 626–7
  Okhotsk, Sea of 625 n358, 627
  port state rights and obligations 626
  precautionary principle 625
  regional organisations, role 625–8
  Russian EEZ 627
  search and visit, right of 626
  Straddling Stocks Agreement (1995) 625–6
  UNCLOS provisions 624–5
  Western and Central Pacific Ocean, Convention on the Conservation and Management of Highly Migratory Fish Stocks in (2001) 627–8 straits (innocent passage) 555, 575–8, see also straits (transit passage) bilateral treaty provisions 578
  Corfu Channel 575–6
  EEZ and 576–7
  exceptions 576–7
  GCTS provisions (GCTS 16(4)) 575–6
  'innocent' 576
  as residual right (UNCLOS 45) 577
  'strait' 576 n102
straits (transit passage)
  see also straits (innocent passage) Bosphorus and Dardenelles (Montreux Convention (1936)) 578
  customary international law 577
  Dover Straits 577
  force majeure 577
  overflight 576, 577, 578 n115
  submarines 577
  suspension, exclusion 577
straits (transit passage) (UNCLOS 34 and 35) 576–8
Strupp, K. 131
Suárez, Francisco 23, 1120
subjects of international law 1, 195–264, see also international legal personality; state/statehood
  belligerents 1150
  extension/range 45–8, 196–7, 1302 n87
  individuals as: see individuals, status in international law international organisations, international legal personality as: see international organisations, international legal personality
  NGOs 261
  positivism, effect on 258
  recognition and 261
  UN 47, 261
submarine cables and pipelines
  archipelagic states and 567–8
  continental shelf 589
  dispute settlement 636
  EEZ 582
  high seas and 609
  individual criminal responsibility and 399
  search and visit, right of 619
submarines, straits (transit passage) 577 subsidiarity, ECtHR and 356–7
Sudan
  AMIS 1266
  arms sanctions (UNC 41) 1247
  AU and 1265–6
  collective use of force (Chapter VII) 1265
  collective use of force other than under Chapter VII 1265
  human rights in 305
  Machakos Protocol (2002) 1265
  secession and 526
  as threat to the peace (SC resolutions 1044 (1996) and 1054 (1996)) 1238–9
  UNAMID 1266, 1267
  UNAMIS 1265, 1280
  UNMIS 1265–6
  US attacks on 1134

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

Suez Canal
Constantinople Convention (1888) 540
as international waterway (Constantinople Convention (1888)) 540, 930
servitudes 540
Suez crisis (1956) 1226, 1273
Sulu, Sultanate of 1100 n284
Sumeria 14
summary executions, special rapporteur on 305
Sun Yat Sen incident (1896) 754
Sunda, Straits of 568
superior orders defence
see also individual criminal responsibility
ICTR 408
ICTY 404–5
mitigation and 404–5
Nuremberg Charter (1945)/Tribunal 400
Tokyo Tribunal 400
Suriname, human rights in 383
sustainable development, EBRD and 869 n136 Sustainable Development, Inter-Agency Committee on 846, 870 n140
sustainable development principle
see also precautionary principle
as balance of economic, environmental and social factors 870
Bergen Ministerial Declaration (1990) 867–8
Climate Change Convention (1992) 870
consensus on 870
as human right 848
international watercourses 884
Rio Principle 3 848, 869
Stockholm Declaration (1972) 869 n135
Sustainable Development, UN Commission on 846, 870 n140, 1213
website 1338
SWAPO 1229 n122
international legal personality 248
Sweden
see also Aaland Islands
civil jurisdiction 652
minorities in 295–6
as Protecting Power 1199
Sami community 295–6
Switzerland
BIS and 249
ECHR reservations 916–17, 922
federal/component state powers, allocation 219
ICJ and 1072
immunities of international organisations 1321
nationality 661
nuclear power installations 890 n254
as Protecting Power 1199
UN membership and 1072 n103
Syria
see also United Arab Republic
Gulf War and 1253 n246
UN membership 985

Taft/Knox Treaties (1911) 1020 n54
Taipei: see Taiwan (Taipei) Taiwan (Taipei)
cession to Japan (1895) 234
China (People's Republic) and 234–5
as 'customs territory' 235 entitlement to property sold prior to recognition of China 476–7 GATT and 235
history 234–5
international legal personality 234–5
ITLOS and 639
recognition 464 n80
recognition, withdrawal 467
SC resolutions 234–5
sovereignty, renunciation by Japan 234 Straddling Stocks Agreement (1995) and 625 n360
UK relations with 463
WTO and 235
Tajihistan 1033
EU Guidelines on Recognition and 452 n28
EU Guidelines on Recognition of New States (1991) and 451–2

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

taking of property: see expropriation/nationalisation of property of foreign national Taliban/Al-Qaida 386, 1136, 1174 n33, 1208, 1247 n219 Tanganyika–Zanzibar, treaty succession 958 n6, 972 n92, 973 Tanzania
  bombing of US embassy 1134
  establishment 973
Tate Letter (1952) 705
tax exemption
  consular premises 773
  consuls 772
  diplomatic agents 767, 768 n384, 770 n413
  diplomatic premises 762
  international officials 1324
  international organisations 1320, 1327, 1328 n208 representatives to international organisations 1322
  UN Secretary-General 1324
taxation, jurisdictional link, need for 650 technological development, international law and 41, 43–4, 488 Tehran Proclamation on Human Rights (1968) 279 telecommunications
  COMSAT 549
  INTELSAT 249, 549
  INTER-SPUTNIK 549
  outer space and 549–52
  satellite broadcasting 550–1, see also satellite broadcasting World Administrative Radio Conferences 549 terra nullius 507, 511, 516, 615 absence of 198
  acquiescence and 516
  acquisition of territory and 495, 503, 511 Antarctica and 198 n9
  jurisdiction and 398, 615–16
  non-recognition of state and 471
  prescription and 504–5, 507
  res communis distinguished 492 suspension of sovereignty, effect 503
  Western Sahara 503
territorial acquisition 492–521, see also cession of territory abandonment of territory and 505, 521
  accretion 495, 498, 499, 520, 531
  acquiescence 505–6, 516–17
  acquired rights and 524
  annexation, legal effect 501–2
  avulsion 531
  boundary awards and 497 boundary treaties and 495–8
  cession 151, 181, 499–500
  classification of modes 495
  conquest 469, 500–2, 532, 533
  consent and 515–17
  constitutive theory and 492–3, 494–5
  critical date 509–10
  Declaration on Principles of International Law (1970) 502, 508 n110
  decolonisation and 492
  discovery 504, 508, 532
  domestic jurisdiction considerations and 493 effective control 502–21, see also territorial title/territorial sovereignty, evidence of including effectivités
  equity and 515
  good faith and 515
  high seas and 517
  ice packs 535
  intertemporal law 496–7, 500 n68, 508–9, 520–1 loss of territory 521
  low-tide elevations and 558–9
  new states and 492–5
  occupation: see occupation (acquisition of territory) prescription: see prescription as means of territorial acquisition recognition/statehood considerations and 492–3, 494–5, 516–17, 520–1, 533 restitution of illegally-held territory 802 n154
  SC resolution 242 (1967) 469, 520

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

territorial acquisition (cont.)
subsequent conduct including recognition, acquiescence and estoppel 515–20 of terra nullius 198, 503 transfer by former power 494
use of force (UNC 2(4)) and 502, 520–1 territorial disputes, classification 491–2
territorial integrity 522–8
African Union for Peace and Security Council 1028
AU and 1293
Azerbaijan 238
CIS and 240, 968 n69, 1291
Declaration on the Rights and Duties of States (1949) and 469
domestic jurisdiction principle (UNC 2(7)) and 522
as fundamental principle of international law 488
humanitarian intervention and 1155–6
inviolability of frontiers and 451, 452, 1123
NATO and 1290
non-recognition policy and 469
peaceful co-existence and 215
SC resolution 242 (1967) 1221 n85
self-determination and 256–7, 290–1, 392, 488, 522–4
UNGA resolutions on 290, 469
use of force (UNC 2(4)) and 468, 1123, 1126–8
USSR and 35
uti possidetis doctrine/stability of boundaries: see uti possidetis doctrine/stability of boundaries territorial jurisdiction
see also domestic jurisdiction principle (UNC 2(7)); extraterritorial jurisdiction; extraterritorial legislation; intervention in affairs of another state, justification; intervention in affairs of another state, prohibition basis of principle 652–3 control of the territory as basis 658, see also belligerent occupation
criminal jurisdiction 652–8 cross-border jurisdiction: see cross-border jurisdiction as default position 645–7, 649
environmental protection and 852–3
Franconia 141–2
Guantanamo Bay Naval Base and 658
Lockerbie bombing 654–5
Lotus 655–7
nationality of accused, relevance 653 objective territorial principle 654–9, see also effects doctrine/extraterritorial jurisdiction on economic matters
territorial sea 656–7
'within its territory and subject to its jurisdiction' (ICCPR 2) 276, 314, 318, 321, 322
'within the jurisdiction' (ECHR 1) 276, 349–50, 658 n55
territorial sea 556–75
archipelagic states: see archipelagic states assimilation to coastal state territory 570
baselines: see baselines
cabotage 570
cession 570
coastal state regulatory powers 570
delimitation 591–2
innocent passage: see innocent passage (territorial sea) installations on the continental shelf and 589–90 internal waters: see internal waters islands, entitlement 564–5 juridical nature 569–70
long-standing regional economic interests and 561
marine pollution 899
national security and 570
as res communis 569
sovereign rights of coastal state 569–70 states with opposite/adjacent coasts 591
width 554, 568–9
Territorial Sea Convention (1958)
airspace 570

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

archipelagic states 566
bays 562
coastal state rights 570
islands 564–5
seabed and subsoil 570
straight baselines 561
width, failure to agree on 568–9 territorial sea, jurisdiction civil 574–5
criminal 141–2, 574, 656–7
exclusive jurisdiction and 554
Franconia 141–2
piracy 616
territorial sovereignty
see also domestic jurisdiction principle (UNC 2(7)); forcible abduction/unlawful arrest; intervention in the affairs of another state, prohibition; territorial title
Aaland Islands 200–1, 251–2
African Union for Peace and Security Council 1028
airspace 78, 541–3, 570
archipelagic states 567–8
concept/definition 487–8, 489–92, 852 countervailing tendencies 49
criminal jurisdiction and 652–3
environmental damage and: see environmental damage, state responsibility executive jurisdiction and 650–1
as fundamental concept of international law 487–8 mandated and trust territories 493 municipal law analogies 489, 490, 491 n23
Roman Law and 490
servitudes distinguished 490 title distinguished 588–9 trust territories and 493
territorial title
as basis for territorial sovereignty 490
belligerent occupation and 500–1, 1178
Bosnia and Herzegovina 470
changes, effect of 489, 524
contiguity principle 524
continental shelf 588–9
as evidence of right 490
jurisprudence 489, 491, 511–15
Kosovo 233
non-recognition policy and 470
relativity of/'better title' as basis 490–1, 511–14, 524
as source of right 490 sovereign rights distinguished 588–9 territorial title/territorial sovereignty, evidence of including effectivités 511–15
'à titre de souverain' requirement 505, 513
as balance of competing state activities 507 exercise of sovereignty as test 513–14
flexibility of concept 511–12
historical claims 525 intention to acquire, need for 513 legal title, relevance 514–15
maps 496, 519–20, 1091
minimum level of state activity, need for 511
personal allegiance 491
post-independence evidence 530
state archives post-decolonisation and 995 statements of government officials 1090
uti possidetis principle and 529–30
within geographical area, sufficiency 514 territorial waters, airspace, sovereignty over 570 terrorism
see also hijacking
Achille Lauro incident 665, 679–80, 1161 n221
as armed attack 1136–7
asylum seekers and 1161 n216
best practice measures 1163
Committee on the implementation of Security Council resolution 1373 (2001) 1163 Counter-Terrorism Committee 1162–3, 1164 n234, 1208, 1209, 1339
definition 1159, 1160, 1161 n210

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

terrorism (cont.)
detention without trial and 357–8
during armed hostilities 1185
Global Counter-Terrorism Strategy (2006) 1161
human rights and 43–4, 1159, 1161, 1164–6
human rights and counter-terrorism, CoE Guidelines (2002 and 2005) 1166 human rights, IAComHR Special Rapporteur on 1164–5 ICTR 4 1196 n151
international law and 43–4, 1159–66
League of Nations and 1159 n211
Libya and 1238–9
motivation, relevance 1159
non-international armed conflict 1196
OSCE Ministerial Declaration and Plan of Action on Combating Terrorism (2001) 1164 political offence doctrine and 687 n211
SC and 1161–3
Security 1267 Committee 1163 n223
self-defence, right to (UNC 51) 1135–7
September 11 attacks: see September 11 attacks sovereignty and 43–4
state immunity and 685 n197, 715–16 states' obligation to refrain from 1160–1 states' reports on measures 1163 threat assessment, justiciability 189
as threat to international peace and security 1136, 1161–3
UN Ad Hoc Committee on (1972) 1160
UN Charter purposes and principles and 1161 n216, 1162
UNGA resolutions 1161
uninvolved third states as target 1159
websites 1139, 1159 n207, 1163 n228, 1339 terrorism, conventions relating to 687, 1159–60
Comprehensive Convention on International Terrorism, progress on 1161 Conventions, UN Ad Hoc Committee on (1996) 1161
extradition and 687
list 1160 n212, 1164
regional conventions 1164
terrorism, jurisdiction
aut dedere aut judicare 1160, 1161
bilateral arrangements 679
extradition obligation 1160 obligation to establish 1160 obligation to make an offence 1160 support for terrorism distinguished 670
universal 670
Texas, secession of 998
Thailand
ASEAN membership 1294 border dispute with Cambodia (Temple of Preah Vihear) 518–19, 941–2
straight baselines 561 n37
US good offices and 1018 n36
thalweg principle 531
third party intervention
ICJ: see ICJ, third state intervention interest of a legal nature liable to be affected by decision 641–2
ITLOS 641
Third World
see also developing countries
apartheid, impact on 269 appropriateness 40–1
civil and political rights 269–70
continental shelf and 555
decolonisation, impact on 269
economic and social rights 269–70
EEZ and 555
equality of states and 269
heterogenous nature 40–1, 269
human rights and 269–70
innocent passage and 573
international law priorities/attitudes to 38–42, 114, 269, 823
law of the sea and 555
origin of concept 57
peaceful co-existence and 215–16

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

seabed resources and 555, 628
state sovereignty and 36, 39, 40, 269
warships in territorial sea 573 threat to the peace, actual breach or aggression (UNC 39) 1217–18, see also aggression; arms sanctions as response to threat to or breach of the peace (UNC 41); collective use of force (Chapter VII); collective use of force other than under Chapter VII; economic sanctions as response to threat to or breach of the peace (UNC 41); peacekeeping; peacekeeping operations actual breaches 1241
Agenda for Peace 1113, 1215, 1217–18, 1226 n109, 1234, 1274, 1313
broadening of concept 1237, 1267
Chapter Six and a Half 1225
Chapter VI and Chapter VII action distinguished 1208–9, 1218–21, 1222, 1236, 1257–67, 1272–3
'determination of the situation' (UNC 39) 1236–41
domestic jurisdiction principle (UNC 2(7)) and 1237, 1267
former Yugoslavia (SC resolution 713 (1991)) 1237–8 good faith and non-abuse of rights obligations of SC 1270–1
Haiti 1239–40
ICTR and ICTY as response to (UNC 41) 1248
internal situations 1237 Liberia (SC resolution 788 (1992)) 1238, 1277 mandate drift 1257–67
measures involving force (UNC 42) 1251–6 measures not involving force (UNC 41) 1242–51
Middle East war (1948) (SC resolution 54 (1948)) 1237
Palestine 1237
peace enforcement 1218 peacebuilding 1218
peacemaking 1218
preventive diplomacy 1218
preventive or enforcement measures, third state right of consultation (UNC 50) 1243–4 provisional action to prevent aggravation (UNC 40) 1241–2 Rhodesia (SC resolution 221 (1966)) 1237
Rwanda (SC resolution 788 (1992)) 1238
as a safety net 1237
SC and 1024–6, 1206, 1208–9, 1218–21
September 11 attacks 1162, 1218, 1239
severance or reduction of diplomatic relations and (UNC 41) 1242, 1245
Sudan (SC resolutions 1044 (1996) and 1054 (1996)) 1238–9
Tadić 1240
terrorism and 1136, 1161–3
UN Secretary-General and 1222–3
UNGA and 1210, 1217–18, 1221–2
WMD (SC resolution 1540 (2004)) 619, 1240
Yugoslavia (SC resolution 713 (1991)) 1237–8
Timor-Leste, independence 234, 1230
Tiran Strait 578 n115
title: see territorial title
Tobar doctrine 457
Tokyo Tribunal/Charter aggression and 439
aggression, prohibition 400
composition 400
individual criminal responsibility and 46, 400
superior orders defence 400
Torrey Canyon 621, 798, 900 n322
tortious proceedings, state immunity in respect of 684, 685, 721, 727–8 torts in violation of international law, jurisdiction (US Alien Tort Claims Act) 683–6 Alvarez-Machain 685–6
Amerada Hess 685
Filartiga v. Pena-Irala 159–61, 683
as jurisdictional statute 160–1, 686
Kadić v. Karadzić 684

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

torts in violation (cont.)
non-governmental acts, limitation to 684 political question doctrine and 683 Sanchez-Espinoza 684
scope 160–1, 684–6
Siderman 160
state immunity and 160, 684, 685
Tel Oren 683, 684
terrorism and 160, 684–6
Torture Victim Protection Act 1992 and 160 n165, 684–5 violations of international law, US citizens' right of suit 684
torture
in Argentina 329
civil law remedy, obligation 716–18
as crime against humanity 408, 436
criminal law remedy, obligation 718
customary international law 329, 675
definition 327
as 'grave breach' 401, 403, 434
individual criminal responsibility 401, 425, 684
jurisdiction 398–9
Kuwait and 716–17
physical, mental and moral integrity, respect for and 381 in Rwanda 1196 n151
in Saudi Arabia 717–18
Special Rapporteur on 305, 325, 330
universal jurisdiction 675
women and 325
Torture Committee (CoE)
annual reports, publication 364–5
confidentiality of proceedings 364–5
establishment 363
fact-finding and reporting 363
membership 363 n111
on-site visits 363
places of detention, right to visit 363–5 reports on visits 364
role 363
Torture Committee (UN) 326–30 concluding observations/general comments 328–9
confidential inquiries 328
confidentiality of proceedings 328
establishment 327
examination of evidence, state's co-operation 328
financing and budgetary arrangements 336
individual communications ('victim') 328
inter-state complaints 328
interim measures 328
membership 327
new claims during proceedings 329–30 non-confidential summary account, possibility of 328 reporting obligations/procedure 328–9, 335
Special Rapporteur (follow-up) 329
Special Rapporteur on Torture, co-operation with 330
standard of proof 329
Sub-Committee on Detention (Optional Protocol) 330
Torture Convention (1984)
'any territory under its jurisdiction' 327
aut dedere aut judicare principle 674, 675
implementation 675
opting-out options 328
signature/entry into force 326
'torture' (TC 1) 327
UNCHR working group on drafting of 305
USSR and 269
Torture Convention (1984), obligations criminal offence, establishment as (TC 4) 327 jurisdiction, establishment of (TC 5) 327 non-return to country where risk of torture (TC 3) 327, 329 prevention measures (TC 2) 327 prosecution or extradition of persons charged with (TC 7) 327 remedy, provision of (TC 14) 327, 716 n98 Torture Convention (Inter-American) (1985) 384, 390
conclusion 384

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

torture, conventions and other international instruments relating to Arab Charter on Human Rights 395
Code of Conduct for Law Enforcement Officers (1979) 327
ECHR 3 274, 326, 348
Geneva Conventions (1949) and Protocols I and II (1977) 1169–70
ICCPR 7 275
Principles of Medical Ethics (1982) 327
Standard Minimum Rules for the Treatment of Prisoners (1955) 327
UDHR 5 279
UN Declaration (1975) (UNGA resolution 3452 (XXX)) 326–7 Torture, European Convention on (1987) 362–5
object and purpose 362–3
parties to 362
Torture, OSCE Panel for the Prevention of 377 n201
torture, prohibition
ACHR 5 381
civilians in wartime 1177
Copenhagen Final Act (1990) and 374
customary international law 275, 326
as erga omnes obligation 124–5
IAComHR and 383
jus cogens/peremptory norm 326, 808 n198
non-derogation 274, 275
in non-international armed conflict 1195, 1196
prisoners of war 1175
state immunity and 160, 715, 716–18
state responsibility and 276
Vienna Declaration and Programme of Action (1993) 280
women and 325
trade union, freedom to organise or join
ECHR 11(1) 357
ESC and 361, 362
migrant workers, rights (MWC 26) 333
OAS Protocol on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights (1988) and 384
'transboundary impact' 858
transboundary pollution, conventions and other international instruments relating to see also Hazardous Activities, ILC Draft Articles on the Prevention of Transboundary Harm from (2001)
Aarhus Convention (1998) 848–9
Civil Liability and Compensation for Damage Caused by the Transboundary Effects of Industrial Accidents (2003) 884 n218
Helsinki Protocol (1985) 873
Long-Range Transboundary Atmospheric Pollution Convention (1979): see Atmospheric Pollution Convention (1979)
Non-Navigational Uses of International Watercourses Convention (1997) 108, 885–6
Oslo Protocol (1994) 874
Persistent Organic Pollutants Convention (2001) 874
website 874 n169
Sophia Protocol (1988) 873
Transboundary Context, Convention on EIAs in Context of (1991) 847–8, 858
Transboundary Effects of Industrial Accidents Convention (1992) 870–1, 897
Transboundary Harm Arising out of Hazardous Activities, Draft Principles on the Allocation of Loss (2006) 858 n71, 862
Transboundary Movement of Nuclear Waste, IAEA Code of Practice (1990) 896–7
Transboundary Watercourses and International Lakes Convention (1992) 858, 884–5 Transdniestra 238
transfer of technology (deep sea mining) 633

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

transformation doctrine 139, 141–8
definition 141
eclipse by incorporation doctrine 141–8
ratification of treaties and 139
transit passage: see innocent passage; landlocked states, access to the sea, right of (UNCLOS 125); straits (transit passage)
Transkei, independence/recognition of 202–3 Transnational Corporations, UN Commission on see also multinational private companies; multinational public companies draft Code of Conduct 250
establishment 1213 n42
travaux préparatoires (VCLT 32)
as aid to interpretation 155–6, 917, 921 n91, 935
confirmatory role 935 n158
ECHR 917
non-participants in negotiations and 935 n158 Treaty of Versailles (1919) 935 n158 travel and identity documents, UN Council for Namibia and 248 travel restrictions as retorsion 1128 treason, jurisdiction 663, 667
treaties 902–55
in the ancient world 14, 16
conventions governing: see International Organisations, Vienna Convention on Treaties between States and (1986); Treaty Succession, Vienna Convention on (1978); Vienna Convention on the Law of Treaties (1969)
function 902–3
natural law and 25
non-retroactivity: see non-retroactivity principle (treaties)
recognition of states and 463
special treaty-regimes 67
succession: see treaty succession
websites 1334, 1337
treaties, amendment and modification (VCLT 39–41) 930–2 accession to treaty after amendment 931 amendment and modification distinguished 930 by subsequent treaty (VCLT 30) 932
jus cogens rule and 931–2 multilateral treaties (VCLT 40) 931–2 non-derogable provisions and 931–2 oral or tacit amendment 931
procedure 931–2
treaty provision for 931
UN Charter 931, 1207–8, 1209
treaties, applicable law
customary international law 93 n91, 94
forum state law 165
treaties, application (VCLT 28–30) 926–30, see also erga omnes obligations in case of armed conflict 904 n9, 946, 952 n225, 1126 n37
co-existence of treaty and customary law 85–6, 87–8, 96–7, 555, 586–7, 591–5, 596–7, 599, 601 n243, 605–6, 716–17, 752, 928–9, 984, 990, 1132, 1167–8, 1187–8
colonial application clauses 926 conflict between UN Charter and other treaty obligations (UNC 103) 127, 927, 1025, 1183 n79, 1236, 1270, 1274
entirety of party's territory (VCLT 29) 926
erga omnes obligations 275, 930
extension to newly acquired territory 971 extraterritorial/territorial 273, 322, 349–50 non-retroactivity (VCLT 28) 926
provisional application 632–3 successive treaties (VCLT 30) 476, 637–8, 927–8, 931–2 treaties by category 94
administrative agreements 151 boundary/territorial treaties 151, 162, 495–8, 528–9, 967–70, 979–80
Bryan treaties (commissions of inquiry) 1020

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

codification treaties 95, see also customary international law as reflected in treaties and comparable international instruments constituent instruments of international organisations: see international organisations, constituent instruments
devolution agreements 958, 967, 979
dispositive treaties 496, 969–70
executive agreements 161–2
'financial' treaties 151
human rights treaties: see human rights treaties law-making treaties 94, 958 multilateral/bilateral 967, 970–1, 976–7 political/'personal' treaties 967, 970, 979–80
self-executing/non-self-executing treaties 162–4, 177 treaty-contracts 94
treaties, compliance/implementation (VCLT 26–7)
see also treaties, termination for material breach (VCLT 60); treaties, unincorporated Aarhus Convention provisions 849 between signature and ratification 911
cession of territory and 151
China and 38
choice of means 348, 357
civil law systems and 171–6
compliance obligation 38
constitution, as aid to interpretation of 169–70 constitutional provision for 169–79
derogation 274–5
diversity of practice 177–9
federal states 218–19, 220–2
implementing legislation, need for 149–53, 172, 177–8
jurisprudence 149–51
methods 152–3
municipal law conflict, relevance (VCLT 27) 134, 153–4, 164, 165–6, 941
Nuclear Safety Convention (1994) 892–3
pacta sunt servanda (VCLT 26) 94, 904, 966–7, see also pacta sunt servanda state responsibility considerations 779, 946 treaties concluded in breach of jus cogens/peremptory norms and 127 treaties not involving change to municipal law 151–2 treaties as 'supreme law of the land' 165–6
war-related treaties 151 treaties, conclusion (VCLT 6–18)
flexibility 907–8
full powers (VCLT 7) 134, 908–9 government department agreements 908 head of state agreements 908
as prerogative power 181
signature as consent 911
treaties, consent (VCLT 11) 94–5, 148, 909–13
accession 913
adoption by UNGA resolution 909–10 adoption in international conferences and 909
by acceptance 913
by all parties 910
by approval 913
by exchange of instruments (VCLT 13) 911
by ratification: see treaties, ratification (VCLT 14) by signature (VCLT 12) 910–11, see also treaties, signature (VCLT 12)
consensus and 368, 910
unanimity/majority voting and 919 treaties, consequences of invalidity (VCLT 69–72) 944–5 acts performed in good faith before invocation of invalidity (VCLT 69(2)) 945 acts performed in reliance on treaty (VCLT 69(2)) 944–5 jus cogens conflict and (VCLT 71) 945

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

treaties, consequences (cont.)
voidability (VCLT 64) 127, 945
voidness ab initio (VCLT 69(1)) 127, 944–5 treaties, definition/form (VCLT 2(1)(a)) 93–4, 902, 904
American Declaration on the Rights and Duties of Man (1948) 389
Anglo-Iranian Oil Co. case 905
CIS Charter 240
concession agreements 905
constituent instruments as 907 contractual nature 94–5, 910
flexibility 905
ICJ optional declarations 905 intention of parties and 906 n19 intention to create binding obligations, need for 905–7 internal treaties within international organisations 906 mandate agreements 905
memoranda of understanding 906
nomenclature, relevance 93, 904
non-binding agreements distinguished 118–19, 905–7
OAS Charter (1948) 389
oral agreements 904
Qatar v. Bahrain 907
UN–Cambodia Agreement establishing Extraordinary Chambers in the Courts of Cambodia (2003) 421 unilateral declarations 905 treaties, denunciation/withdrawal (VCLT 56)
human rights treaties 946
ICCPR (1966) 318, 945–6, 983
ICSID 1041 n184
League of Nations Covenant 30
treaties, entry into force effect on non-ratifying states 926 registration and publication following 926
timing 925–6
treaties and the individual, unincorporated treaty 149–50 treaties, interpretation (VCLT 31–3) 932–8 ambiguity and 935
boundary treaties: see boundary treaties, interpretation clear language/ordinary meaning in context (VCLT 31(1)) 156–7, 933–4, 936 constituent instruments: see international organisations, constituent instruments, interpretation constituent instruments 936–7
'context' (VCLT 31(2)) 934
customary international law 933
derogation from ordinary meaning 938
dispute settlement provisions 936
effectiveness principle 349, 352 n37, 936
environmental law and 887 explanatory memoranda 152–3 general principles of international law, applicability 933–4
good faith and 933
human rights treaties: see human rights treaties, interpretation
IACtHR and 388
interpretative declarations 915–18
intertemporal approach 496–7, 500 n68, 934
jurisprudence 155–6, 936–8
literal approach 932–3 manifest absurdity or unreasonable result (VCLT 32(b)) 935 multilingual texts (VCLT 33) 938 object and purpose, interpretation of 921 n91
other treaties concluded at the same time and 389 parallel interpretation of customary international law 97 parties' intention and 932, 934
'relevant rules of international law applicable between the parties' (VCLT 31(3)(c)) 935
special meaning intended by parties (VCLT 31(4)) 938
subsequent changes, need to reflect (living instrument principle) 349, 887, 937–8

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

subsequent practice (VCLT 31(3)(b)) 252, 261, 497, 934–5 supplementary means (VCLT 32) 935–6 teleological approach (object and purpose) (VCLT 31(1)) 155, 156–7, 349, 932–3, 1305–6 travaux préparatoires: see travaux préparatoires unilateral interpretation, effect 932 treaties and municipal law, primacy 1320 treaties, parties international organisations and states: see International Organisations, Vienna Convention on Treaties between States and (1986)
unequal treaties 38
treaties, ratification (VCLT 14)
advantages of requirement 912
'approval'/'acceptance' compared 913
bilateral agreements 913
as consent 910, 911–13
definition 911
depositary 913
incorporation and 140
internal law and 139
legitimate expectations and 151, 168–9 multilateral treaties 913
origin 911
Ponsonby Rule and 152–3, 912
requirement for 912–13
responsibility for 911
transformation doctrine and 139 validity of treaty and 134
treaties, registration 926 consequences of failure to register (UNC 102) 926 secret treaties and 926
timing 925
treaties, reservations (VCLT 19–23) 913–25 acceptance by other parties (VCLT 20) 388, 918–20, 921 advantages of system 914
Anglo-French Continental Shelf case 916
Belilos case 916–17, 922 bilateral agreements and 915 compatibility with object and purposes of treaty, need for 388, 918, 919, 921, 924
constituent instruments 920
Continental Shelf Convention (1958) and 916 definition (VCLT 2) 913–14
dispute settlement provisions and 921 ECHR and 354 n52, 916–17
effect 920–2
federal states and 220
human rights treaties 336, 354 n52, 388, 922–4
ILC Draft Guide to Practice (2007) 914 n56, 915 n61, 916, 918, 919, 921 n91, 922 n92, 924 n104 impermissible reservations 354 n52, 919, 921–4 interpretative declarations distinguished 915–18
jus cogens/peremptory norms and 127
League of Nations and 918
Loizidou (Preliminary Objections) 922–3
Norwegian Loans case 1082–3 political statements accompanying treaty distinguished 915
Reservations to the Genocide Convention case 388, 918 Reservations to Normative Multilateral Treaties Including Human Rights Treaties, ILC Preliminary Conclusions (1997) 924 timing (VCLT 19) 919
UNHRC General Comment 24/52 and 318, 923–4 universality/integrity debate 914–15 validity, presumption of 921 validity, responsibility for determining 922, 923–4 VCLT 27 and 760

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

treaties, signature (VCLT 12)
as consent 910–11
formality of 910–11
as interim step 911
legal effect 911
recognition of states and 326
withdrawal 911 n45
treaties as source of international law (ICJ 38(1)(a)) 6, 93–8 bilateral treaties 97–8
China and 38
law-creating treaties 95–6, 556
primacy 94–5, 123–4
USSR and 34
treaties, termination for material breach (VCLT 60) 947–9 anticipated breach and 948
customary international law 947–8
Gabčíkovo–Nagymaros Project 948
humanitarian treaties and (VCLT 60(5)) 949 multilateral treaties and (VCLT 60(2)) 948–9
Rainbow Warrior 946
as reprisal or countermeasure 794, 947
Tacna-Arica arbitration 947–8 treaties, termination and suspension (VCLT 54–64) 945–52, see also treaties, termination for material breach (VCLT 60)
armed conflict and 946 n202
by agreement of parties (VCLT 54 and 57) 945 consequences (VCLT 70 and 72) 952 denunciation or withdrawal (VCLT 56): see treaties, denunciation/withdrawal (VCLT 56)
desuetude 123
dispute settlement (VCLT 66) 952–3 effect on rights created prior to termination and suspension (VCLT 70(1)(b)) 946 fulfilment of purposes and 946 fundamental change of circumstances and (VCLT 62) 950–2, see also fundamental change of circumstances/rebus sic stantibus (VCLT 62) impossibility of performance (VCLT 61) 949–50
Rainbow Warrior 946
subsequent treaty and (VCLT 59) 947 suspension (VCLT 58) 946–7, 949–50 treaty provision for (VCLT 54 and 57) 945–6 treaties, third parties and (VCLT 34–8) 95–6, 903, 928–30, 1312
ILC views on 928
intention/agreement of parties (VCLT 35) 929 obligations and rights distinguished 929
pacta tertiis nec nocent nec prosunt rule 928, 1315
UNC 2(6) and 97, 928–9, 1124
treaties, unincorporated
as aid to interpretation of legislation 150–1, 160, 183–5
as factual background 150 individual's rights and obligations under 149–50
interpretation, responsibility for 150
justiciability 183–6 legitimate expectations and 151, 168–9 treaties, validity (VCLT 42–53) 939–52, see also treaties, consequences of invalidity (VCLT 69–72) acquiescence and (VCLT 45) 939 bases for challenge to (VCLT 42) 939 breach of internal law regarding competence, relevance (VCLT 46(1)) 940–1 Cameroon v. Nigeria 134, 940–1
coercion of representative of state and (VCLT 51) 942 coercion of state (VCLT 52) 500, 502, 942–4 conclusion in violation of internal law (VCLT 46) 134, 940–1 corruption of representative of state and (VCLT 50) 942

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

Declaration on the Prohibition of Military, Political or Economic Coercion in the Conclusion of Treaties (1966) 943
dispute settlement (VCLT 65–8) 952–3
erga omnes obligations 944
error and (VCLT 48) 941–2
estoppel from challenging 941–2 fraud and 942
jus cogens/peremptory norms and (VCLT 53 and 64) 125, 127, 944
'manifest' violation of internal law concerning rule of fundamental importance 134, 940–1 ratification and 134
separability (VCLT 44) 939 unauthorised conclusion 909
treaty-making powers
applicable law 908
EU 242
federal states 161, 218–20
Holy See 244
ICRC 262
international legal responsibility and 260, 263
international organisations 1308–9
as prerogative power 149, 181
unions of states and 909
treaty succession 966–84
Aaland Islands 539–40
agreement of all parties to multilateral treaty, need for 979 agreement between states concerned, need for 975 agreement with contracting parties, need for 967, 972–3
Alsace-Lorraine 974
application to part of new territory 972, 975 arms control and 976–7
Belgium (1830) 971, 974–5
boundary treaties 529 n234, 967–70, 971
cession of territory 973–4
chairpersons of human rights treaty bodies and 984
'clean slate' principle 957, 971, 974–5, 977–8, 979
continuity in respect of human rights treaties, presumption of 984 continuity in respect of non-newly independent states, presumption of 975–7, 980
customary international law 958 n6, 967, 976, 984
Czechoslovakia 970
devolution agreements 958, 967, 979
dissolution and 974, 979–81
EU Guidelines on Recognition of New States (1991) 976
extension of treaty to newly acquired territory 971
Finland 200–1, 971, 975
FRG–GDR unification (1990) 971, 972–3
fundamental change of circumstances/rebus sic stantibus (VCLT 62(2)) 968–9
Gabčíkovo–Nagymaros Project 887
Genocide Convention (1948) 981–2, 984
German Unification (1990) and 966 n57
Hawaii 973–4
Hong Kong 974
human rights treaties 336–7, 981–4
ICCPR/ICESCR 982–3
ICJ jurisprudence 981, 984
merger of states 971–3
multilateral treaties 970–1, 976–7, 979
'newly independent states' 975–6, 977–9, 990
object and purpose of treaty and 971–2, 973–4, 975, 979
parties' intention and 971–2, 980
political/'personal' treaties 967, 970, 979–80
Racial Discrimination Convention 983 n144 recognition conditions and 976 secession (other than decolonisation) 975–7 stability of treaty relationships and 975–6 Tanganyika–Zanzibar 958 n6, 972 n92, 973

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

treaty succession (cont.)
territorial regimes/servitudes, treaties creating 539–40, 969–70, 979–80 treaty monitoring bodies, role 983–4 UNCHR resolution 1994/16 983–4
UNHRC General Comment 26 (continuity of obligations) 983 unilateral declarations, effect 967, 979
United Arab Republic 972 n92, 973
Treaty Succession, Vienna Convention on (1978)
see also the table of treaties
boundary treaties 529 n234, 969
cession of territory 973
conciliation 1023–4
conclusion/entry into force 959
continuity in absence of agreement to contrary 980–1
customary international law and 976
date of succession 959
decolonised territories 975, 977–9
dispute settlement 1015 nn22 and 23, 1023–4 international organisations, definition 1295–6 leases and servitudes 538
merger of states 971–2
'newly independent states' 975–6, 977–9, 990
stability of treaty relationships 975–6 tribes, status 216–17, 264, 503, 525
Triepel, H. 29–30, 131
Trieste 230–1
Trinidad and Tobago
death penalty 320
drug-trafficking, proposal for international court 410
UNHRC interim measures, non-compliance 320
Troika (OSCE) 1289
Truman Proclamation (1945) 585, 588–9
trust territories
classification as 1214
individual petition, right of 225, 245
international legal personality 224–8
Racial Discrimination Committee and 313–14
self-determination, right to 225
strategic trust areas, Security Council responsibility for 1209, 1214 Trusteeship Council 1214
Pacific Islands Trust Territory and 224, 225 suspension of operation (1994) 1214 trusteeship system
individual petition, right of 225, 245
mandate system and 224, 225–6, 277
as 'sacred trust of civilisation' 277 truth and reconciliation commissions 272, see also amnesty laws tuna fisheries
conventions relating to 624 n356, 628 n367, 637–8
sustainable development and 870 n139
Tunkin, G. I. 32–5, 81, 91, 94, 99, 196, 215, 216, 268
Turkey, CoE Torture Committee and 363 n115
Turkmenistan, EU Guidelines (1991) and 451–2
Tuvalu 199, 208 n52

Uganda
Bogotá Declaration (1976) 552
intervention in the Congo 1264–5 referral of Lord's Resistance Army situation to ICC 413 treaty succession and 958 n6
UK
Antarctic claims 535–6
as archipelagic state 566
BITs 838–9
British Antarctic Territory 536
continental shelf 588
Council of Europe and 140
criminal law jurisdiction 663–4
deep sea mining 630, 631
diplomatic premises and 463 n79, 757–8
Diplomatic Privileges and Immunities in the UK Memorandum 767
diplomatic protection 188, 811–12, 814, 818
ECHR during belligerent occupation (Military Manual) 1183

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

ECHR, incorporation 156
ECtHR decisions 156
employment contracts, state immunity in relation to 725–6, 770
EU Charter of Fundamental Rights (2000) 371 n172
EU law and 140, 156–7, 179 evidence obtained in violation of international law 140
executive certificates 193–4, 471, 473, 477–8, 479, 480, 484–5, 704
extraterritorial jurisdiction and 688 n218, 691–2 fishing zones and 565 n61
flags of convenience/reflagging 613
forcible abduction/unlawful arrest and 682–3 Humanitarian Crises, Policy Guidelines on (2001) 1157 n201
incorporation doctrine 140–8
international organisations, international legal personality 1300–2 international organisations, liability of member states 1315–17
international organisations, privileges and immunities 1328
Iraq annexation of Kuwait and 1253 n246
judicial notice of international law 140–1, 144
judicial review 182, 188–91
judicial role 146, 147
justiciability 140, 179–88
law of the sea, role in development of 79
legislation, presumption of consistency with international obligations 143, 153
legitimate expectations 151, 188
municipal and international law, interrelationship 139–57
passive personality principle and 665
Ponsonby Rule 152–3, 912
prerogative 137, 149
prisoners of war (Military Manual) 1174 n32 Privy Council, state responsibility for acts of 788
protection of nationals abroad, use of force 1145
protective principle and 667
recognition, effects 472–81
recognition of governments 193–4, 455, 458–9, 467, 481
recognition of states 447, 450–1, 463, 464
Refugees Convention (1950) 185
SADR and 237 n208
sanctions obligations 154–5
SC membership 3
SC membership/veto 3, 215, 1206, 1237
separation of powers 148
ships, state-owned (immunities) 148–9
Somaliland and 237 n211, 467 n99
state immunity and 702–3, 705–7, 710–11, 727–8, 732–5
state immunity and commercial transactions 718–21
state immunity from execution/attachment 745
state immunity from jurisdiction, waiver 740–2
state immunity from pre-judgment attachment 742–3
state immunity and human rights law violations 716–18
Taiwan and 463
territorial sea and 565 n61, 569
Torture Convention (1984), implementation 675
transformation doctrine 139, 145
treason, jurisdiction 663, 667
UK legislation
Antarctic Act 1994 663
Anti-Terrorism Crime and Security Act 2001 663
Asylum and Immigration Act 1996 185
Asylum and Immigration Appeals Act 1993 152
Bretton Woods Agreements Act 1945 1302
Burma Independence Act 1948 493–4
Civil Aviation Act 1982 679 n156
Civil Partnership Act 2004 768 n393

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

UK legislation (cont.)
Crown Proceedings Act 193
Deep Sea Mining (Temporary Provisions) Act 1981 631
Diplomatic and Consular Premises Act 1987 463 n78
Diplomatic Privileges Act 1964 193 n354
European Communities Act 1972 156–7, 179
European Parliamentary Elections Act 1978 149
Extradition Act 1989 687 n211
Extradition Act 2003 (Designation of Part 2 Territories) Order 2003 687 n211
Fishing Limits Act 1964 581
Fishery Limits Act 1976 565 n61
Foreign Corporations Act 1991 479
Hong Kong Act 1985 539 n285
Human Rights Act 1998 156
International Organisations Act 1972 1300–1, 1328
Merchant Shipping Act 1894 663
Offences Against the Person Act 1861 663
Official Secrets Act 1911 663
Outer Space Act 1986 547 n323
Protection of Trading Interests Act 1980 691–2, 693
Sex Offenders Act 1997 663
Sexual Offences (Conspiracy and Incitement) Act 1996 663
State Immunity Act 1978 182, 193, 713 nn82 and 83, 716–21, 725–6, 727–8, 732, 733–4, 738 nn225 and 226, 740–1, 743–4, 745, 746, 748–9, 750 n288, 762–3, 770
Suppression of Terrorism Act 1978 663
Taking of Hostages Act 1982 674
Territorial Sea Act 1987 569
Territorial Waters Jurisdiction Act 1878 142
United Nations Act 1946 154–5
War Crimes Act 1991 663–4
website 1334
UK legislation, interpretation treaties as aid 150–1, 154
unincorporated treaties and 150, 168, 183
UK, treaties
boundary/territorial treaties 151
'financial' treaties 151
implementation and enforcement 148–57
implementing legislation, need for 149–53
interpretation 150, 152–4, 155–7
interpretation of legislation and 150–1, 154
legitimate expectations and 151
municipal law conflict, relevance 153–4 Ponsonby Rule and 152–3, 912
ratification (VCLT 14) 140, 912–13
treaty-making power 149, 161, 908
treaty succession 980–1
unincorporated treaties, effect 51, 183–6
Ukraine
CIS membership 249
Climate Change Convention (1992) 879
EU Guidelines (1991) and 451–2
minorities in 295
OSCE Mission 1033
recognition 262–3
state succession and 961 n21
treaty succession 976–7
UDHR and 278–9
UN membership 218, 464
ultra-hazardous activities 887–97, see also hazardous activities; nuclear activities
UN 1204–81, see also crimes against UN and associated personnel; ECOSOC; Security Council; Trusteeship Council; UNGA
establishment 31, 1204, 1284–5
Headquarters, choice of 31
international law, applicability 1232–3 League of Nations and 31, 225, 1330, 1331 n221
purposes 1204–5
universality 31, 47
website 1339

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

UN Administrative Tribunal, website 1338
UN Centre for Human Rights 280, 336
UN Charter (UNC)
amendment, procedure 931, 1209
amendment, proposals for 931, 1207–8 assistance in respect of UN action under Charter 1206–19 conflict with obligations under another international agreement, primacy (UNC 103) 127, 927, 1025, 1183 n79, 1236, 1270, 1274
as constitutional document 1205
as customary international law 929
domestic jurisdiction principle: see domestic jurisdiction principle (UNC 2(7))
equality of states 1205
good faith and (UNC 2(2)) 103–4, 1205 human rights provisions 276–8
interpretation as living instrument 937
interpretation, responsiblity for 1304 League of Nations Covenant as basis 1216 non-UN members and 97, 928–9, 1124 peaceful settlement of disputes obligation 105 political aims, effect 252 self-determination principle (UNC 1(2) and UNC 55) 252 self-executing, whether 163–4 sovereign independence and 1205
third parties and (UNC 2(6)) 97, 928–9, 1124
UN Charter (UNC), interpretation
Declaration on Principles of International Law (1970) and 1123
ICCPR and ICESCR as aids 253–4
subsequent practice and 252
UN Children's Fund 303
UN Commission on Sustainable Development: see Sustainable Development, UN Commission on UN Compensation Commission (Iraq) 1045–7
applicable law 1047
Compensation Fund 1046
due process and 1047 n220
establishment (SC resolution 692 (1991)) 1045
expedited procedure 1047
Governing Council 1208
jurisdiction 1045
jurisprudence 1046–7
measure of compensation 1045
'oil for food' scheme (SC resolution 778 (1992)) 1046
as political organ 1047
procedure 1046
as quasi-judicial body 1047
structure 1045
as subsidiary organ of Security Council 1045, 1208
website 1338
UN Conference on Conditions of Registration of Ships (1984) 612
UN Development Group Guidelines on Indigenous Peoples' Issues (2008) 299–300
UN Drug Control Programme 1213
UN Economic, Social and Cultural Rights Committee: see UNCESCR
UN forces: see peacekeeping operations
UN High Commissioner for Human Rights
establishment (1993) 280, 1213
role and responsibilities 280–1
unified human rights treaty body, proposal for 337
website 281, 1335
UN Human Rights Council 306–7
Advisory Committee 307
complaints procedure 307
Enforced Disappearances Convention (2006) 299, 307 n220
establishment 1213
functions 306
membership 306
reports 1213
review mechanism 306–7
special procedures 307
as subsidiary organ of UNGA 306
as successor to UNCHR 306

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

UN Human Rights Council, election to 1213 UN, human rights responsibilities 303–43, see also human rights, compliance and enforcement; UN treaty bodies; and individual committees
ECOSOC 303
evaluation 335–7
inconsistencies, risk of 327, 336–7
legal obligations, whether 277–8 member state obligation to take joint and separate action (UNC 56) 277 proliferation of committees, effect 336 promotion and encouragement (UNC 1) 276–7 promotion of universal respect for (UNC 55) 277 resource problem 336
UN Centre for Human Rights 336
UNGA obligations (UNC 13(1)) 277, 303
UN human rights responsibilities, Vienna Declaration and Programme of Action (1993) 276, 280, 291 n151, 302, 324, 332 n365, 336
UN membership 31, 47
admissions procedure 1209, 1210
entitlement 1210
expulsion 1211
non-retroactivity 963
recognition of states and 201, 453, 461–2, 464, 466
refusal of credentials 1211
state succession and 960–1, 985–6
'states', limitation to (UNC 4) 201, 453, 461–2, 464, 963 suspension 1211
universality 1295
UN membership of Bosnia and Herzegovina 201
Croatia 201
Czech Republic 985
India 985
Kosovo 453
Liechtenstein 217, 1072 n103
Macedonia 464, 1211
Montenegro 1211
Pakistan 985
Serbia 1211
Slovakia 985
Switzerland 1072 n103
UAR 985
Yemen 985
Yugoslavia (FRY) 210, 963
UN Peacebuilding Commission 1218 n67
UN Permanent Forum on Indigenous Issues 299
UN, privileges and immunities
Convention on Privileges and Immunities of the Specialised Agencies (1947) 1319
General Convention on the Privileges and Immunities of the UN (1946) 776, 1319
headquarters agreements and 1319–20
immunity of premises and property 1320
tax exemption 1320
UNC 105 1319
UN Relief and Works Agency 1212–13
UN role
Agenda for Peace 1113, 1215, 1217–18, 1226 n109, 1234, 1274, 1313
changing nature 649, 1205 effectiveness in maintenance of peace 1233–5 preservation and restoration of world peace (UNC 1) 1204–81
Road Map Towards Implementation of the UN Millennium Declaration (2001) 1218 UN Secretary-General/Secretariat 122–4, 1214–16 action at request of parties 1223 action at request of UNGA or Security Council 1223, 1225 action in concert with regional organisations 1223–4
appointment 1215
assumption of Security Council functions 1210, 1223

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

authority and power 1215–16 binding Security Council resolutions and 1223
chief administrative officer of UN (UNC 79) 1223 Congo crisis (1960) and 1216, 1226–7
Cyprus (1964) 1227
depositary for treaty ratifications 913
discretionary nature of powers 1223 good offices 1018–19, 1215–16, 1223–4 holders of office 1215
ICJ advisory jurisdiction and 1113
inherent powers 1223
international peace and security 1222–3
Middle East peacekeeping force, withdrawal 1216 peacekeeping forces and 1216, 1225, 1226–7 qualifications and qualities 1214 respect for international character of responsibilities 1214–15
tax exemption 1324
UN Security Council: see Security Council
UN Special Committees
Apartheid 303
Decolonisation 253, 303
Inalienable Rights of the Palestine People 303
Israeli Practices in the Occupied Territories 303
UN Standby Arrangements System 1275 n346
UN Statistical Commission 1213n40
UN, status
international legal personality 47, 83, 1297–8, 1300–3
Reparation for Injuries 47, 83, 1297–8, 1302–3
statehood distinguished 1302
as subject of international law 47, 261
UN treaty bodies
see also Child, Committee on the Rights of; Disabilities, Committee on the Rights of Persons with; Enforced Disappearances Committee; Migrant Workers Committee; Racial Discrimination Committee; Torture Committee; UNHRC; Women, Committee on the Elimination of All Forms of Discrimination Against autonomy 309, 311
chairpersons of human rights treaty bodies meetings 325, 336, 984
harmonisation of working methods, working party 336 n390 inter-committee meetings 336 n390
UN Secretariat, role 311 unified body, proposal for 337
unified body, pros and cons 337
UN treaty bodies, common practices grave or serious allegations, right to inquire into 335 individual communications 225, 245, 258, 311, 313, 319–22, 324, 328, 334, 335, 342, see also standing/locus standi (individual)
inter-state complaints 313, 328, 334, 335
reporting obligations 309–10, 312–13, 314, 315, 316–17, 328–9, 331, 334, 335, 337 reporting procedures, guidelines on harmonisation of 337
UNAMIC 1129 n124
UNAMIR 1262–3
UNAMIS 1265
as regional arrangement (Chapter VII) 1280
UNAMSIL 1263–4
UNASOG 1011–12
UNAVEM I 1228–9
UNCESCR
establishment 309, 1213 n42
financing and budgetary arrangements 336
General Comments: see General Comments (UNCESCR)
general discussion days 310–11, 332
General Recommendation 21 (self-determination) 293 individual right of petition, exclusion 311 inter-state complaints, exclusion 311

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

UNCESCR (cont.)
means of implementation, adequacy 309
meetings 309
non-autonomous status 309, 1213 n42 reporting obligations, effectiveness 309–10 UNCHR 304–6
achievements 306
complaints, power to deal with (ECOSOC resolution 1235 (XVII)) 304 criticisms of 306
membership 304
minorities and 305
politicisation 306
public debate and 304
recommendations to UN bodies, right to make 281 replacement by Human Rights Council 306, 1213 n40 resolution 1994/16 (adhesion of successor states to human rights treaties) 983–4
special rapporteurs 222–3, 287 n128, 299, 304–5, 1325
UNCHR, working groups
Apartheid, Group of Three 305
child, rights of 305
Communications (ECOSOC resolution 1503 (XLVIII)) 305, 308
Declaration on Religious Intolerance 305
Disappearances 304
Right to Development 304
Situations revealing a Consistent Pattern of Gross Violations of Human Rights 304, 305
Torture Convention (1984) 305
UNCITRAL
Arbitration Rules 1038–9, 1044
development of international law and 121
website 1334
UNCLOS III, consensus and 10 n38
UNCRO 1259
UNCTAD
development of international law and 121
establishment 40, 1213
UNDRO 891
UNEF
establishment 1226, 1272
as non-enforcement action 1272–3 withdrawal 1228
UNEF II 1227, 1228 n117
UNEP 846, 865, 878, 1213
unequal treaties 38
UNESCO 341–3
advisory jurisdiction of ICJ and 1325 n190
aims 341
codification and development of international law and 121 conventions and resolutions, member state obligations 342
dispute settlement 1035
establishment 341, 1285
General Conference 341–2
legal personality in domestic law 1299 n71
object and purpose 1285
outer space and 550
questions of massive, systematic or flagrant violations 343
Racial Discrimination Committee and 313
rule of law and 341
state archives and 994
structure 341–2
UNESCO, complaints procedure absence of constitutional provision 342
admissibility 342
Committee on conventions and Recommendations, role 342–3 Conciliation and Good Offices Commission 342
confidentiality of proceedings 342–3
exhaustion of local remedies, need for 342 friendly settlement as objective 342–3
individual communications 342

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

UNGA, organisation and procedure
see also ILC; Namibia, UN Council for; UNCITRAL; UNRRWA
First Committee (disarmament and international security) 303, 1212
Second Committee (economic and financial) 1212
Third Committee (social, humanitarian and cultural) 303, 1212
Fourth Committee (special political and decolonisation) 245, 1212
Fifth Committee (administrative and budgetary) 1212
Sixth Committee (legal) 303, 1212
General Committee 1212
meetings 1272
NLM observer status 245–6
Special Political Committee 303
special sessions 1212, 1272
Standing Committees 1212
Uniting for Peace (UNGA resolution 377 (V)) 1212, 1222 n90, 1272–3
UNGA resolutions by number
91 (I) (Switzerland and ICJ Statute) 1072
95 (I) (Nuremberg Charter) 400
109 (II) (threats to Greece) 1226
194 (III) (Palestine Conciliation Commission) 1024
377 (V) (Uniting for Peace) 1212, 1222 n90, 1272–3
1262 (XI) (ILC Model Rules on Arbitral Procedure) 1050, 1053–4
1514 (XV): see Declaration on the Granting of Independence to Colonial Countries and Peoples (1960) (UNGA resolution 1514 (XV))
1541 (XV) (Obligation to transmit information under Art. 73(e) (non-self-governing territories)) 256 n294
1803 (XVII) (Permanent sovereignty over natural resources) 83, 834–53
1962 (XVII) (Outer Space) 544
2131 (XX) (Armed Intervention in the Domestic Affairs of States) 1127
2145 (XXI) (South West Africa) 226
2248 (XXII) (South West Africa) 226
2574 (XXIV) (seabed resources: moratorium) 629
2625 (XXV): see Declaration on Principles of International Law Concerning Friendly Relations (1970) (UNGA resolution 2625 (XXV))
3034 (XXVII) (ad hoc committee on terrorism) 1160
3061 (XXVIII) (Guinea-Bissau) 205–6
3247 (XXIX) (NLMs) 245–6
3314 (XXIX) (definition of aggression) 439, 469 n104, 488 n6, 502 n78, 1148 n157, 1152 n174, 1153 n177
3452 (XXX) (torture/cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment) 327
36/39 (ILC membership) 40
37/10 (Manila Declaration on the Peaceful Settlement of International Disputes) 1013 n17, 1014 nn18 and 20, 1016 n28, 1026 n78
40/144 (Human Rights of Individuals who are not Nationals of the Country in which they Live) 826
41/65 (Principles on Remote Sensing) 551–2
41/128 (Declaration on the Right to Development) 301–2
42/22 (Enhancement of the Effectiveness of the Principle of Refraining from the Threat or Use of Force in International Relations) 1123 n24
43/53 (global warming) 875–6, 878
44/207 (global warming) 878
47/68 (Outer Space) 547
47/135 (minorities) 297
48/104 (violence against women) 287 n129, 325

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

UNGA resolutions (cont.)
48/134 (national institutions for protection of human rights) 276 n67
48/141 (UNCHR) 280
49/60 (Declaration on Measures to Eliminate International Terrorism) 1160–1
50/50 (UN Model Rules for the Conciliation of Disputes Between States) 1023
51/126 (Outer Space) 544
51/210 (Ad Hoc Committee on Terrorist Conventions) 1161
53/97 (condemnation of violence against diplomatic and consular missions and persons) 764
55/12 (FRY: UN membership) 210, 963 n39
60/1 (Declaration on Measures to Eliminate International Terrorism) 1160–1
60/180 (Peacekeeping Commission) 1218 n67
60/251 (Human Rights Council) 306, 307, 1165
60/264 (secession of Montenegro) 963 n39
60/288 (Ad Hoc Committee on Terrorism) 1161 UNGA resolutions, legal status adoption of treaties and 909–10
as evidence of state practice 82–3, 115–17, 544, 1295
Legality of Nuclear Weapons 116–17
non-binding nature 3, 1212, 1222, 1225
opinio juris and 115, 116–17, 544
UNGA, role 3, 114–15
admission, suspension and expulsion of member states 1209, 1210, 1211
authorisation of request for advisory opinion 1113 declarations, non-binding effect 1222 discussion and recommendation on any UN matter (UNC 10 and 11) 1221–2 establishment of subsidiary organs 303, 1225 human rights responsibilities (UNC 13(1)) 277, 303
ICJ judges, election 1209
ICTY judges, appointment 404
international peace and security 1210, 1221–2, 1225, 1271–3
as parliamentary body of UN 1210, 1212
recommendations for peaceful adjustment (UNC 14) 1222, 1225
SC and 1209, 1210, 1217, 1218, 1221–2
SC functions, assumption of 1210, 1222, 1271–3
SC, referral of question requiring action to SC (UNC 11) 1272–3
UN charter, review and amendment 1209
UNGA, voting
2/3 majority requirement 1211
bloc voting 1211 n30
equality of states and 211, 1211
UNHCR: see Refugees, UN High Commissioner for (UNHCR)
UNHRC 314–22
conciliation commissions 319
confidentiality of proceedings 305
consensus decision-taking 315, 316
establishment 315
General Comments 316–19, see also General Comments (UNHRC) ICCPR, competence to interpret 923–4
inter-state complaints 319
interim measures 320
meetings 315
membership 314–15
minorities and 294–7
NGOs and 315–16
reporting obligations 315, 316–17
self-determination and 290
specific comments 316–17
torture and 326
UN Secretary-General and 319
urgent action procedure 337
Yugoslavia and 982–3

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

UNHRC, individual petitions 319–22
Communications Working Group and 319, 320
concurrent jurisdiction 319
decisions, compliance/enforcement 320
exhaustion of local remedies and 273–4, 319
interim decisions 319
jurisprudence 321–2
right of (Optional Protocol I) 319
Special Rapporteur (communications) 320
Special Rapporteur (follow-up) 320 n302
workload 320
UNIDO, dispute settlement 1035
unification of states: see merger of states
UNIIMOG 1244 n201
UNIKOM 1229
unilateral acts, legal effect 121–2, 201, 203, 206, 478, 905, 967, 979, 1242–3 United Arab Republic
dissolution 974, 980, 985
treaty succession 972 n92, 973, 974, 980
UN membership 985
Uniting for Peace (UNGA resolution 377 (V)) 1212, 1222 n90, 1272–3
Universal Declaration of Human Rights (1948) (UDHR) 278–80 abstentions 278–9
binding, whether 46, 279
Byelorussia and 278–9
as customary international law 279
Czechoslovakia and 278–9
general principles of law/international law and 279
human rights as general principles of international law and 265 individual's rights under 46
Poland and 278–9
proposal for binding universal convention, delay 280 Saudi Arabia and 278–9
scope 279
SFRY and 278–9
Ukraine and 278–9
universal jurisdiction 668–87
apartheid 671
arrest/detention on high seas or within the forum state 398
aut dedere aut judicare principle 671, 1160
crimes against humanity 668–73, 1200
crimes against peace 670
Crimes against the Peace and Security of Mankind, ILC Draft Code (1996) and 671
definition 397–8, 668
Eichmann 669 n102, 671–2
enforced disappearances 678 n153
environmental offences 671
Geneva Conventions (1949) and 669–70
genocide, jurisdiction 671, 673
'grave breaches' 434–5, 669–70, 1200
hijacking 678
Institut de Droit International and 672–3 international crimes, sufficiency of status as 671
jus cogens/peremptory norms and 673–4 justification 668
municipal courts and 671–3
nationality, relevance 673
Non-Applicability of Statutory Limitations Convention (1968) and 669 non-retroactivity principle (nullum crimen sine lege) and 672 Nuremberg Charter (1945)/Nuremberg Tribunal and 669–70
piracy 270, 397–8, 615–16, 668
presence of the accused, relevance 672–3
slave trading 397–8
slavery and 270, 673
state practice 671–3 terrorism, support for and 670
torture 675
war crimes 434–5, 668–73
UNMIK 232–3
UNMIS 1265–6

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

UNMISET 234, 425
UNMOGIP 1226 n108
UNMOP 1229–30
UNMOVIC 1249–50, 1256
UNOMIL 1277
UNOMUR 1262
UNOSOM II 1261–2
UNPREDEP 1259–60
UNPROFOR 1257–60
UNRRWA, dissolution 1330 n214
UNSCOB 1226
UNSCOM 1249–50, 1255 n253
UNSMIH 1230
UNTAC 231, 1129 n124
UNTAES 231 n177, 1229–30
UNTAET 233–4, 424–5, 1230
UNTAG 231 n177, 1229
UNTSO 1226
UPU 219, 1098 n74, 1163
  establishment (1874) 28, 1284
urgent/emergency measures 335, 386, 393–4, see also provisional measures Uruguay, human rights in 383
Uruguay Round 1034–5, 1287
USA
  act of state doctrine 191–2
  Afghanistan operations 1134, 1136–7, 1140
  Antarctic and 536
  Arab countries and 467
  Arctic territory 535
  boundary disputes between constituent states 498
  commissions of inquiry 1020
  Connally Amendment (ICJ jurisdiction) 1083–4 consular access (VCCR 36) and 135–6, 220–1
  criminal jurisdiction 663 n73
  deep sea mining 630
  Diplomatic and Consular Personnel, Guidance with regard to Personal Rights and Immunities 771 diplomatic motoring offences 766 n379
  diplomatic premises, abandonment 758
  diplomatic protection 814 n232
  EEZ 584
  expropriation/nationalisation of property of foreign national 191–2
  extraterritorial jurisdiction: see effects doctrine/extraterritorial jurisdiction on economic matters
  federal/component state powers, allocation 219, 220
  flags of convenience 612–13
  forcible abduction/unlawful arrest and 681–2
  foreign relations, justiciability 189–92
  Grenada, invasion of (1984) 1144, 1151, 1183 n79, 1276 n355
  Hawaii, annexation of (1898) 973–4
  heads of state, immunities 736–7
  Hickenlooper Amendments 191, 1128–9
  historic bays 564–5
  human rights breaches, justiciability 190 human rights treaties, implementation 220 n112 ICC obligations and 414
  ICJ decisions and 158–9, 220–1
  ILO conventions and 220
  Innocent Passage, Uniform Interpretation of the Rules of International Law Governing (1989) 573–4 international law, respect for 8 international organisations, privileges and immunities 1320, 1328
  intertemporal law 160–1
  Iraq annexation of Kuwait and 1253 n246
  League of Nations and 30
  Marshall Islands and 225
  municipal and international law, interrelationship 157–66
  Northern Mariana Islands and 225
  Pacific Islands Trust Territories and 225
  Palau and 225
  Panama, intervention in 1144, 1151, 1189
  passive personality principle and 665–6

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

PLO and 165
political question doctrine 189–92
prisoners of war (Law of Land Warfare) 1174 n32
protection of nationals abroad, use of force 1144–5
protective principle and 667 n97
publications relating to state practice 82 n39
recognition of governments 162, 458, 467
recognition of states 445, 446–7, 450–1, 452
SC membership/veto 3, 215, 1237
space law, influence on 80
sphere of influence 57
State Department suggestions (executive certificates) 194, 471, 482, 484–5, 705
state immunity and 703–4, 715–16
state immunity in case of violations of international law including human rights 684, 685, 715–16
state immunity and commercial transactions 721–4
state immunity from execution/attachment 745–6
state immunity from jurisdiction, waiver 742
Taiwan and 467
taking of property in foreign state, justiciability 191–2
Tate Letter (1952) 705
territorial sea and 569
UN and 163–4
USA legislation
Act to Combat Terrorism 1984 679
Alien Tort Claims Act 1789 159–61, 683–6, see also torts in violation of international law, jurisdiction (US Alien Tort Claims Act)
Anti-Hijacking Act 1974 679 n158
Anti-Terrorism Act 1987 165
anti-trust legislation 688–96
Antiterrorism and Effective Death Penalty Act 1996 685 n197, 715–16
Byrd amendment 164
Comprehensive Crime Control Act 665
Cuban Democracy Act 1992 692–3
Detainee Treatment Act 2005 658 n57
Diplomatic Relations Act 1978 766 n379
Foreign Assistance Act 1129
Foreign Operations, Export Financing and Related Programs Appropriations Act 1994 766 n379
Foreign Sovereign Immunities Act 685, 700 n14, 701, 707, 708, 709 n64, 715, 721–2, 727–8, 731–2, 736–7, 742, 745–6, 750 n288
International Organisations Immunities Act 1945 1328–9
Military Commissions Act 2006 659 n57
Omnibus Diplomatic Security and Anti-Terrorism Act 665–6 presumption of consistency with international obligations 159, 164–5 Taiwan Relations Act 467
Torture Victim Protection Act 1992 160 n165, 684–5
website 1334
USA, treaties
applicable law 165
boundary/territorial treaties 162
compliance/implementation (VCLT 26–7) 220
executive agreements 161–2
municipal law conflict, relevance (VCLT 27) 164, 165–6
ratification (VCLT 14) 913
self-executing/non-self-executing treaties 162–4
treaties as 'supreme law of the land' 165–6
treaty-making powers 161, 219, 908 treaty succession, attitude to 974 n106, 976–7 UN Charter, status 163–4
website 1337
usage 115
use of force prior to UN Charter 1119–22, see also war, renunciation as instrument of policy hostile measures short of war 1121

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

use of force prior (cont.)
humanitarian intervention 270, 1155
just war 1110–20
League of Nations and 1121–2, 1216–17
as means of asserting rights or punishment 1121
proportionality 1120
reprisals 1121, 1122, 1123
self-defence, right to and 1017
use of force (UNC 2(4)) 1123–8, see also aggression; blockades; boycotts; collective use of force (Chapter VII); collective use of force other than under Chapter VII; economic sanctions as response to threat to or breach of the peace (UNC 41); humanitarian intervention by states; intervention in the affairs of another state, justification; intervention in the affairs of another state, prohibition; regional arrangements for the maintenance of international peace and security (UNC Chapter VIII); reprisals
Chapter VII action 1123–4
colonial domination and 807
as customary international law 1123
Declaration on Armed Intervention in the Domestic Affairs of States (1965) 1127
Declaration on the Enhancement of the Effectiveness of the Principle of Refraining from the Threat or Use of Force (1987) 1123 n24
Declaration on Principles of International Law (1970) and 1123–5
'force' 1124–6, see also 'force' (UNC 2(4)), classification as
as general principle of law 1123–4
humanitarian intervention by states 155–8
independence of states and 1123
as jus cogens/peremptory norm 126
non-recognition policy and 469 protection of nationals abroad 1143–5, see also protection of nationals abroad, use of force
retorsion 1128–9
self-defence, right to (UNC 51) and 4–5, 1123–4, see also self-defence, right to (UNC 51)
self-determination, right to 1123, 1148–9
territorial acquisition and 502
territorial integrity and 468, 1123, 1126–8
use or threat of force (general) consensus, need for 1118, 1139 n99 validity of treaties and (VCLT 52) 500, 502, 942–4
USSR
Angola, intervention in 1150
Arctic claims 535
Baltic states and: see Baltic states
civil and political rights 268–9
CoE and 347 n8
deep sea mining 630
economic and social rights 268–9
EEZ 584
Gulf War and 1253 n246
Helsinki Final Act (1975) and 373
human rights in 50, 268–9, 278–9
human rights treaties and 269
ICJ and 269 n18
India–Pakistan Dispute (1965), mediation 1018
individuals, status in international law 46–7, 268–9 Innocent Passage, Uniform Interpretation of the Rules of International Law Governing (1989) 573–4
international law and 8, 31–8
international relations, approach to 35, 36
League of Nations and 30–1, 33
lump sum settlements 840–1
outer space, control of information 551
peaceful co-existence and 33–6, 215, 216
perestroika and glasnost 36, 1209 recognition by UK 460, 472–3 recognition by USA 162, 465, 483
recognition of government (1921/1924) 460
rule of law and 36
sacred trust concept 251

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

SC membership/veto 3, 1206–7, 1237
Siberian pipeline episode 692
space law, influence on 80
sphere of influence 57
state immunity from jurisdiction and 708
state sovereignty and 33–4, 35
state succession 36, 240, 960–1
territorial integrity and 35
Torture Convention (1984) and 269
UDHR and 278–9
UN boycott 1252
UN peacekeeping and 8, 33–5
UNHRC and 315–16
Uniform Interpretation of the Rules of International Law Governing Innocent Passage (1989) 573–4
uti possidetis principle and 527, 968
veto, use of 1206–7
warships, innocent passage 573
USSR, dissolution
see also CIS; Russia; and individual former republics
CoE and 345
EU Guidelines (1991) 207
human rights and 315–16
human rights treaties and 983 n144
regulation of process, need for 198
Soviet attitude to international law and 36, 44
state succession and 209, 240–1, 960–2
state succession to state property, agreements on 993
treaty succession 976–7, 983 n144
uti possidetis principle and 527
USSR, invasion of/intervention in Afghanistan 36, 1153, 1233–4
Baltic states 468, 961
Bessarabia 468
Czechoslovakia 35, 36, 57, 468, 1233–4
Estonia 468
Finland 31, 468
Hungary 57
Latvia 468
Lithuania 203, 468
Poland 57
uti possidetis doctrine/stability of boundaries 522, 525–8
ACY Opinion No. 2 291
Africa and 526–7, 968, 969, 1028
African Union for Peace and Security Council 1028
AU and 290, 526
AU Constitutive Act 1293
Banjul Charter and 392
Burkina Faso/Mali case 290–1, 968
CIS 968 n69
critical date and 509–10
customary international law 526
Czech and Slovak Republic 968 n69
decolonisation and 967–8
definition 200 n19, 290, 509, 527, 967–8
determination of boundaries for purposes of 515, 525, 530 Eastern Europe 527–8
effectivités and 529–30
equity and 530
Eritrea/Yemen 969
former USSR and 527
former Yugoslavia and 527–8 fundamental change of circumstances/rebus sic stantibus (VCLT 62(2)) 968–9
as general principle of law 290–1, 968
internal boundaries, applicability to 528 n230
Latin America and 525–6, 967–8
Libya/Chad 969
maritime delimitation and 591
new states created from independent states and 968 non-boundary territorial disputes, applicability to 528 n233
object and purpose 290
prescription and 504–5
recognition of states and 451
self-determination and 526–8
Somali–Ethiopia conflict and 1027
UNGA resolutions and 290
USSR 527, 968
Vienna Convention on Succession to Treaties and 969
Yugoslavia (SFRY) and 527–8, 968 n68
Uzbekistan, EU Guidelines (1991) and 451–2

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

Valletta Report (1991) 1032–3
Vanuatu 229
Vatican City: see Holy See
Vattel, Emerich de 26, 112
Venice, cession (1866) 500
veto (SC) 3, 4, 37, 215, 1206–7, 1222, 1237 abstention and 1207, 1252
  'double-veto' 1207
  procedural and non-procedural matters distinguished 1207 Uniting for Peace resolution as response to 1272
  use in Iraq situation 1256
victims, protection and privacy 406, 416–17
Vienna Convention on Consular Relations (1963) (VCCR) as codification of existing law 772 n424
  drafting process 120
Vienna Convention on Diplomatic Relations (1961): see Diplomatic Relations Convention (1961) (VCDR)
Vienna Convention on the Law of Treaties (1969) (VCLT)
  as customary international law 496, 903, 933, 948, 951
  drafting process 120
  inter-state agreements, limitation to 904
  third parties and 903
  treaties concluded since entry into force, limitation to 496
Vienna Convention on the Law of Treaties between States and International Organisations (1986): see International Organisations, Vienna Convention on Treaties between States and (1986)
Vienna Convention on the Representation of States in their Relations with International Organisations (1975): see International Organisations, Vienna Convention on the Representation of States in their relations with (2975)
Vienna Declaration and Programme of Action (1994) 276, 280, 291 n151, 302, 324, 332 n365, 336 Vietnam 1185
  archives, Franco-Vietnamese agreement (1950) 995
  as focus of East–West conflict 57
  US intervention in 8
Vietnam War 669, 1150, 1233
violence, protection from child (CRC 19) 331
  women 287 n129, 324, 325
Vitoria, Francisco 22–3, 24, 1120
Vojvodina 1033
Vyshinsky and 33

war
  see also aggression determination of existence of 193
  hostile measures short of war 1121
  as prerogative/discretionary power 181
war crimes
  crimes against humanity distinguished 438
  crimes against peace distinguished 670
  East Timor Special Panels for Serious Crimes 425
  individual criminal responsibility 262, 399, 402, 434, 439, 671, 1200
  as international crime 433–6
  as 'most serious crime' 411
  Non-Applicability of Statutory Limitations Convention (1968) 669 prisoners of war, liability for 1176
  as 'serious crime' 425
  universal jurisdiction 434–5, 668–73
war crimes, definition/classification as 433–4
  ICC 8 434
  ICTY 3 434
  violation of laws or customs of war (ICTY 3) 434 war crimes, jurisdiction 398–9
  ICC and 411
  Iraqi High Tribunal, jurisdiction 429

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

Nuremberg Charter (1945)/Tribunal 399, 400
over nationals 411
war, laws of
see also international humanitarian law
in ancient Greece 16
Catholic Church, influence on 19
De jure belli ac Pacis (Grotius) 23–4
De jure belli (Gentili) 23 demise of the just war and 1120–1
Islam and 18
jus ad bellum and jus in bello distinguished 1120–1, 1167
non-international armed conflict and 435
war, renunciation as instrument of policy see also aggression; use of force prior to UN Charter; use of force (UNC 2(4))
as general principle of international law 1122
Kellogg–Briand Pact (1928) 439 n226, 468, 501, 506, 509, 942, 1122
Warsaw, UN Security Council and 1210
Warsaw Pact
collective self-defence (UNC 51) and 1146–7 EAPC and 1290
establishment 1210
object and purpose 47
origin 57, 1210
warships
immunity from jurisdiction 148–9, 575, 614
innocent passage, right of 570, 572–4
marine pollution and 899
state immunity, entitlement 699
as state organ 558
warships, jurisdiction
flag state jurisdiction 558, 614
internal waters 558
territorial waters 575
Washington Protocol (1992) 381 n219 weapons, prohibited 1186–90
asphyxiating and deleterious gases 1189
balance between military necessity and humanitarian considerations 1187
cluster bombs 1190 n120
dum-dum bullets 1189
explosives or inflammatory projectiles 1168, 1186, 1189–90
Gulf War oil spillage 1190
incendiary devices 1189–90
laser weapons 1190
Legality of Nuclear Weapons 1187–9
mines and booby traps 575–6, 784–6, 1189–90
minimum suffering test 1187
nuclear weapons: see nuclear weapons poisonous weapons 434, 1187, 1192 weapons causing long-term harm to the environment 1190 weapons not detectable by x-ray 1189 weapons, prohibited, treaties and similar international instruments related to Convention on the Prohibition of Military or Any Other Hostile Use of Environmental Modification Techniques (1977) 1190
Convention on the Prohibition of the Use, Stockpiling, Production and Transfer of Anti-Personnel Mines (Ottawa) (1997) 1190 Conventional Weapons Treaty and Protocols (1980) 1189–90
Geneva Conventions (1949), Protocol I 1190
Geneva Protocol (1929) 1189
Hague Declarations (1899) 1189
St Petersburg Declaration (1886) 1168, 1186, 1189
West Bank: see Israel occupied territories
West Indies, sale of territories by Denmark 500
Western Sahara
see also Mauritania, territorial claims against Morocco; Saharan Arab Democratic Republic (SADR) AU mediation (1978) 1027
MINURSO 1229
as non-self-governing territory 237
referendum 1229

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

Westphalia, Peace of (1648) 26, 1120, 1282
WEU
  EU and 1290 n33
  NATO, co-operation with 1279 n368
  website 1340
whales 624 n356
WHO competence 1112, 1303–6
  establishment (1946) 1285
  ICJ advisory jurisdiction and 1112, 1303–6
  legal personality in domestic law 1299 n71
  website 1340
WHO complaints procedure, ICJ/arbitration and 1034 n148
wilful killing/murder
  as crime against humanity 408, 436
  as 'grave breach' 401, 403, 434, 669, 670
  individual criminal responsibility 425, 1200
  as 'serious crime' 425
Wilson doctrine of democratic legitimacy 457, 458
WIPO, Mediation, Arbitration and Expedited Arbitration Rules (1994) 1035 n151 witnesses, protection and privacy 406, 416–17
WMD
  bilateral agreements 620
  criminalisation 620
  Interdiction Principles (2003) 619–20
  Iraq 1248–50
  SC resolution 687 (1991) 1248–50
  SC resolution 1540 (2004) 620
  search and visit, right of 619–20
  as threat to the peace 1240
Women, Committee on the Elimination of All Forms of Discrimination Against see also General Recommendations (CEDAW) Commission on the Status of Women and 322
  establishment 322–3
  general recommendations, procedure 323–4
  grave or systematic violations, right to inquire into 324, 334
  individual petition, right of (Optional Protocol) 324 inquiries 324
  meetings 323, 324
  membership 323
  procedure 323
  reporting obligations 323
  torture, prohibition 325
Women, Convention on the Elimination of All Forms of Discrimination Against (1979)
  'discrimination against women' 287 n129, 288
  nationality and 662
  standing to pursue remedy for breach 385
Women, Convention on the Nationality of Married (1957) 662
Women, Inter-American Commission of 385 advisory opinions, right to seek 385
Women, Inter-American Convention on the Prevention, Punishment and Eradication of Violence Against (1994) 325, 385 women, rights of
  see also gender discrimination
  African Commission Special Rapporteur 392–3 Commission on the Status of Women 322
  death penalty and 318
  development 301
  differential treatment, justifiable 324
  ECtHR, nominations for appointment as judge and 352 n38
  equality in marriage and family relations 324
  female circumcision, eradication 324
  government, participation in 324 growing importance 324–5
  health and 324
  IAComHR special rapporteur 383
  ILO and 325

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

in international law 65
minorities and 318–19, 321
nationality 662
prostitution and 325
UN treaty body obligations 325
UNHRC General Comment 28 318–19
Vienna Declaration and Programme of Action (1993) 280, 324
Violence Against Women, Declaration on Elimination of (1994) 287 n129, 325 violence, measures to protect against 324 Violence, Special Rapporteur on its Causes and Consequences 325
websites 1335
Women, UN Commission on the Status of 322, 1213 n40
work, right to
CIS Convention 378
General Comment (UNCESCR) 1 310
ICESCR 6 and 7 308
UDHR 23 279
workers' rights
consultation 361 n102
ESC 361
EU Charter of Fundamental Rights (2000) 371
participation in the improvement of working conditions 361 n102 working conditions
see also ILO
19th century developments 270
World Administrative Radio Conferences 549 World Bank
accountability 1040
constituent instrument, interpretation 1304 n97
decision-making 1286
dissolution powers 1329
establishment (1944) 40, 1285–6
Foreign Direct Investment guidelines 250, 828, 835, 837, 842 n373
Global Environmental Facility (GEF) 846, 874, 881
Governor, role 1286
IDA 1286
IFC and 1286
immunity from jurisdiction, waiver 1327 n199
membership 1285–6
Multilateral Investment Guarantee Agency 842–3
privileges and immunities 1319 n168
state succession to state property and 993
structure and organisation 1286
voting 1286
websites 1333, 1338
World Bank dispute settlement procedures
Bank Board, role 1040
Bank Management, role 1040
Inspection Panel 1021 n59
World Cultural and Natural Heritage Convention (1972), federal state compliance 222 World Food Council 303
World Food Programme 262
World Heritage List 222 wrecks 589
WTO
see also GATT/WTO dispute settlement procedures; GATT/WTO dispute settlement procedures (DSU)
aims 1287
establishment (1995) 1287
GATS Council 1287
General Council 1287
Marrakesh Agreement (1994) 1287
Ministerial Conferences 1287
structure and organisation 1287
Taiwan (Taipei) and 235
Trade in Goods Council 1287
TRIPS Council 1287
website 1339

Yamoussoukro Accord (1991) 1277
Yemen Arab Republic/People's Democratic Republic of Yemen
UN membership 985
unification (1990) 963–4

www.urdukutabkhanapk.blogspot.com

Yugoslavia (FRY)
arms sanctions (UNC 41) 1245, 1246, 1257, 1269, 1279
designation as (Dayton Agreement) 284 n105
ethnic cleansing 316
Framework Convention for the Protection of National Minorities (1994) and 367 n141
human rights in 982
ICJ, standing 963, 1073–4
Kosovo, sovereignty and territorial title 233
redesignation as Serbia (2006) 963, 1211
as successor to SFRY 209–10, 962–3, 981
UN membership 210, 963, 985
Yugoslavia, International Criminal Tribunal for the Former (ICTY): see ICTY
Yugoslavia (SFRY)
Racial Discrimination Committee and 312
UDHR and 278–9
Yugoslavia (SFRY), dissolution and succession 36, 198, 209–10
ACY Opinion No. 1 198, 210, 448
ACY Opinion No. 2 291, 1005
ACY Opinion No. 8 210
ACY Opinion No. 11 454 n34
ACY Opinion No. 13 958, 991–2
ACY Opinion No. 14 986–91
ACY Opinion No. 18 450
collective use of force other than under Chapter VII 1257–60 continuity of state and 209–10, 960, 962–3, 981 date 959–60, 962
economic sanctions as enforcement measures (UNC 41) 210, 1245–6
EU Declaration on recognition of Yugoslav Republics 452, 465 n88
EU Guidelines (1991) and 207, 451–2 maritime blockade 1275 n350
nationality and 1008
recognition of successor states 451–3
SC resolutions 210, 963
as threat to the peace (SC resolution 713 (1991)) 1237–8
uti possidetis principle and 527–8, 968 n68
Yugoslav Agreement on Succession Issues (2001) 989, 991, 992 n192, 993, 996, 1000

Zaire
see also Congo, Democratic Republic of Bogotá Declaration (1976) 552
seabed resources 628
UNHRC and 315 n271
Zambia, treaty succession and 958 n6
Zimbabwe, judicial independence 393
Zionism, racial discrimination, whether 395 n298
Zouche, Richard 25